“sovereign economy,” an idea which is being implemented most consistently in Ukraine but which has affected all the new states (and is still exciting certain Russian regional leaders, who are now campaigning for oblast sovereignty), has not stood the test of practice. It turns out that you cannot escape from the crisis on your own.

A whole series of objective factors precludes this. To wit, the approximately identical level of the CIS states’ economic development, the fact that they are tied to specific sources of raw materials and subassemblies, and their obvious inability to sell competitive goods on the oversaturated world market in the near future all make it necessary to seek means of integration rather than try to run as far as possible from one another.

For the time being the fear of once again ending up in a totalitarian empire has prevented us from being aware of this. The euphoria over total sovereignty has also gotten in the way. But now that the republics have laid the foundations of their own statehood, something else is becoming increasingly obvious. Namely that it is not collaboration but the lack of it that poses a threat to this statehood.

Significantly, this has been realized by those who encounter the daily hardships of life nowadays. They were more perspicacious and rational than some politicians. Events in Ukraine have shown that jingoistic statements to the effect that Russia is mainly to blame for the crisis do not wash. On the contrary, demands to join the CIS Economic Union and the banking, customs, and payments unions have taken an important place among the political demands. Now may be the first time that there has been such a clear call for reintegration (without, of course, encroaching on state independence).

Leaders can no longer ignore these calls. It is indicative that at the moment the situation reached critical level, the Ukrainian president did not run the risk of postponing the meeting with his Russian counterpart. What is more, if this meeting has not brought concrete solutions to contentious problems, it has at least indicated the ways by which a solution to the deadlock must be sought. And the free trade agreement may be called a step in the right direction.

It goes without saying that it is too early today to say that this approach has won over the Ukraine. But let us not forget that it has been Kiev's policy throughout the CIS's existence that has been the main factor delaying the pooling of Commonwealth economic efforts. And if the development of the political process causes this policy to be reviewed, the CIS may find itself with fresh prospects.

I would remind you that one of the most rational leaders, Kazakhstani President Nursultan Nazarbaev, is drafting a very interesting integration concept. He is proposing, in particular, to develop collaboration as West European countries did in the past by cooperating in certain sectors and formulating a common policy for the production and sale of certain kinds of output.

At any rate the CIS states seem to be starting to emerge from the period of estrangement. I would hope that this trend will grow stronger and gain momentum.

7.19 [Republics] Sign Statement on Economic Integration

ITAR-TASS, 10 July 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The text of the statement of the governments of the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine on urgent measures to deepen economic integration is as follows: Taking account of the historic closeness of the peoples of the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine, the contiguity of their territories, the closeness of the level of development, and the mutual links between their economies, the governments of the three states have decided to implement urgent measures for closer economic integration.

The interests of the states dictate the necessity of preserving a single economic area where in conditions of market relations production will effectively develop; goods, services, and capital will move freely; and efforts will be united for implementing joint economic projects. While expressing the firm intention of participating in the development and implementation of the treaty on the creation of a economic union within the framework of the CIS, the governments expect that the measures for a closer trilateral integration of their economies will aid in speeding up the implementation of the goals and principles of this treaty.

The governments believe immediate measures with respect to economic integration must cover the process of production, investments, foreign trade, and also financial credit, currency, and social relations. These measures are aimed at halting the breakdown in traditional production links and aiding the dynamic and harmonic development of the economies of the three states and the carrying out of economic reforms in the interests of raising the population's standard of living.

Such integration is conditional on the compatibility of their economic systems. To ensure this, close cooperation will be organized in the implementation of economic reforms and there will be coordination of their aims and of the stages and speed of their implementation. It is planned to draw their national economic legislation closer together, primarily in order to create the most favorable conditions for the work of enterprises.

The governments agreed to make it their priority to remove tariff and non-tariff restrictions in trade-economic relations between the three states, to set up a customs union and common customs territory, and also to form a common market of commodities, services, and capital on the basis of a single policy in the field of price-making and investments and in harmonizing the taxation systems.

Special importance is attached to the functioning of the monetary system on the basis of a rigid policy consensus in the field of credit and cash emission. It is planned to coordinate the budget policy by establishing a single limit for deficits of consolidated budgets. An active joint policy will be pursued in the social sphere. At the same time, citizens will receive an opportunity to freely possess property, move around, and live and work on the territory of any of the three states. At the same time, the governments particularly stress that they will strictly protect the legal interests of their fellow countrymen who live outside their states.

The governments note that close integration of their economies will demand joint management of many areas of economic activity. The essential coordinating bodies will be set up for this purpose and allocated the appropriate management functions. It is planned that their activity will include decision-making processes as practiced by international organizations.

The governments proceed from the fact that economic integration cannot be achieved in isolation, without a wider interaction in all aspects of politics, defense, and legislation.

In this regard, they call upon the parliamentarians of the three states to consolidate their efforts in pursuing a coordinated foreign policy, based on adherence to international legal norms, the goals and principles of the UN Charter, and the obligations to maintain territorial integrity of states, which they have undertaken within the framework of the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe, as well as their efforts in bringing national legislations as close together as possible and in this way creating a firm legal foundation for deeper mutual economic integration.

The governments are convinced that close cooperation on the basis of the principles set out in the current statement will be able to settle the fundamental issues of our mutual relations and allow us to leave behind the practice of putting forward unilateral complaints.

The governments have charged V.A. Zalomay, deputy chairman of the council of ministers of the Republic of Belarus; A.N. Shokhin, deputy chairman of the council of ministers and government of the Russian Federation; and V.I. Landyk, deputy prime minister of Ukraine, with organizing practical work on preparing by 1 September a draft treaty between the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine on deepening economic integration and bringing into effect the tenets of the current statement.

The governments declare that states sharing the aims and principles of economic integration set forth in the present statement-and not belonging to any other economic unions or associations, if such participation could violate the integrity of the customs borders of the contracting sides, hamper the pursuance of a coordinated foreign economic policy with regard to third states, or in another way infringe the legitimate economic interests of the sides—may accede to this treaty.

Ivan Ivanov ITAR-TASS, 10 July 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Moscow, 3 July—date as received] Today’s meeting at the residence of the Russian Government near Moscow of Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, Belarusian Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich, and Ukrainian Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma ended with the adoption of a resolution on the formation of an economic alliance by the three countries. They signed the statement drafted by the governments of the three countries on urgent measures aimed at deepening economic integration.

Responding to questions from journalists after the signing ceremony, Chernomyrdin said that “the signing of the treaty on deepening economic integration will be a historymaking event for our states. We are moving forward and making our respective economies into an integrated whole in all spheres.” Kebich stressed the importance of the decisions taken today and said: “Common sense has finally got the upper hand.” The Belarusian prime minister especially mentioned the fact that today’s meeting and its results will not lead to some separatism within the CIS framework. He said that “the economic alliance is open to all the CIS member states who wish to join it, but on definite terms.” The Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksandr Shokhin explained that the economic alliance would be open to all the CIS member states, which do not intend to join other economic alliances.

Leonid Kuchma described today’s meeting of the three prime ministers as a “natural process.”

After the meeting, Russian-Ukrainian agreements on cooperation in oil and gas production were signed. According to Russian Minister of Fuel and Energy Yuriy Shafranik, the agreements include a mechanism of smooth transition to trade in energy carried out at world prices.

7.21 Hastens Central Asian “Isolation”

Artur Vardanyan Kommersant-Daily, 13 July 1993

[FBIS Translation], Excerpts

The most notable thing about the meeting near Moscow [of Belarus, Russia, and Ukraine heads of government in Gorky near Moscow on 10 July] was the absence of representatives of Kazakhstan. According to unofficial information from Russian and Kazakhstani government circles, the reason was economic differences between the two states. The stumbling block in relations between the republics is property rights in the Baykonur space complex. The crisis of credit and financial relations has also worsened. It consists of the clash between Russia and Kazakhstan on debt repayment questions. The essence of the differences is that Russia is demanding that Kazakhstan should return the credits granted in 1992 and 1993.

The approved 1992 debt amounts to 240 billion rubles. As for 1993 debt, which is nearly the same size, Kazakhstan refuses to pay it, proposing a mutual retirement of debts instead. [Passage omitted.]

One way or another, the statement “on urgent measures to deepen economic integration” is a statement by three countries. This document has gone through a curious transformation in comparison with the Declaration of CIS Heads of State on an Economic Union adopted in Moscow on 14 May. Whereas in May the “main issue” consisted of ensuring “mutual interests of the Commonwealth member states,” two months later the governments of the three republics have come to “believe that measures to ensure a closer trilateral integration of their economies will promote a faster implementation of the goals and principles of the treaty on the establishment of an economic union.” The return to the idea of a three-component nucleus of an economic union formed by a different set of republics may be assessed in various ways. The good thing about it is Ukraine's changed stance. This gain, however, is more of a tactical nature given the fact that relations between Moscow and Kiev are hard to predict. Clearly, the bad thing about it is that it is once again (like in Belovezh Forest) damaging to the integration interests of the Asian republics, primarily those of Kazakhstan. This loss may very well prove to be strategic, and an economic union would become-even before having been born-a bargaining chip between a union of Slavic republics and a union of Central Asia whose isolation is being hastened by the statement of the three.

7.22 CIS Executive Secretary on Economic Union

Ivan Korotchenya Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 14 July 1993
[FBIS Translation]

Two reports that appeared in the mass media within a period of a couple of days could not but rivet the attention of the public. One report was from Istanbul and the other from Moscow. Both dealt with burning issues of economic integration among the former USSR republics. Both questioned the results of CIS agreements on the creation of an economic union, signed by nine leaders of Commonwealth states.

Let me briefly recall the results of the Istanbul conference of the leaders of the states that are members of the Organization for Economic Cooperation [OEC]. As it was reported, along with Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, and Afghanistan, former Soviet republics of Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan attended. A unanimous declaration was adopted at the conference, in which the OEC's main goal was depicted as safeguarding the social and economic well being of its members. The final document noted that the participants at the conference agreed to enhance the role of free enterprise in order to boost the process of integrating the OEC states with the world economy.

Projects approved in Istanbul include those on the development of transport infrastructure and telephone communications, cooperation in science and technology, and the removal of customs barriers hampering trade. Construction of roads was called a priority task aimed at granting access to the sea for countries that have no sea borders. Other priorities include the creation of a bank for development and trade, an institute of culture, the introduction of most favored nation status for OEC members, and granting free flow of capital and workers.

The participants at the conference agreed to open joint OEC coordinative organs—an airline and a shipping company in Iran, an insurance company in Pakistan, and a bank for trade and development in Turkey.

While assessing the results of the discussion in Istanbul and the documents signed there as “a firm foundation for the creation of another large economic union,” Kazakh President Nazarbaev and Kyrgyz President Akaev pointed out the importance of “mutually advantageous cooperation between the OEC and the CIS for the benefit of all nations” and that the experience of interstate relations within the CIS may be useful for the OEC.

What happened in Moscow? The prime ministers of three Slav states gathered there, conferred for a while, as they did a year and a half ago in the Belovezh Forest, and decided to adopt a joint declaration. The declaration does not offer any new ideas, unusual approaches, or unexpected proposals. The declaration contains all the provisions of the Treaty on the Creation of an Economic Union. While reading the text of this document one may notice that the prime ministers have managed to resolve a number of problems that were the subject of heated debates, including the issues in which participants have advocated their specific stance, in particular the issue of creating coordinating organs.

It is very relevant that the prime ministers acknowledged that the adequacy of economic systems is a necessary condition for integration. This means lifting tariff and non-tariff barriers in trade and economic relations, the creation of a customs union with a single customs space, and in the future, the creation of a common market of goods, services, and capital. It is symptomatic that an epithet “strict” has been used for the first time in a CIS document with reference to the most important and delicate sphere—that of financial relations. The agreement envisions strict coordination of policy in the spheres of issuing loans and printing money, including the establishment of a standardized budget deficit ceiling.

Numerous adversaries of Belarus joining the collective security treaty and advocates of Ukrainian sovereignty were surprised at the unanimous acknowledgement by the prime ministers that “economic integration cannot be achieved in isolation, without broad comprehensive cooperation in the fields of politics, defense, and legislation.”

Does this mean that the Economic Union of nine states has been rejected and that the idea on its creation has repeated the fate of many useful but unimplemented CIS projects? Is the existence of the CIS not threatened by the fact that its members overtly grouped in accordance with their Muslim or Slav origin? I am not going to make any forecasts, because forecasts are an ungrateful thing in big politics. However, as a person involved in many events in the Commonwealth, I am not indifferent to its fate and I do not quite understand the haste demonstrated by the prime ministers and their unmasked striving to counter the Istanbul move of the Asian republics with an equally strong move of the Slav states. Would it not be better to gather at a common table and resolve all the problems of the day, like normal families do? Today, it is hard to say what has prevailed in Moscow-concern over the economy paralyzed by the crisis or regular political calculations. I have no doubt that time will bring answers to these issues.

Arguments used by the signatories to the “tripartite union” in order to justify this determined step seem unconvincing to me. They said that there was no chance to create an economic union of nine states, because CIS members have been lacking in accord and mutual understanding and there was no hope left for the situation to change in the near future. However, the prime ministers must have known that virtually all the disputable issues had been resolved at the 1 July Consultative and Coordinating Committee session. The document was sent to CIS governments for final signature before the presidential summit.

Now, let us see what is the authors’ vision of the legal basis of a broad union, its “pillars” and “roof,” compared to the construction suggested by the three prime ministers.

Speaking in terms of official documents, both the small and the big unions see their aim as creating conditions for the stable development of the economies of their members and, in the future, creating a single economic space on the basis of market relations. This means the free flow of goods, services, capital, and workers, a single customs space, and a coordinated policy with regard to loans, budget, prices, and foreign economic relations. At first glance, this means a return to the previous state of things. However, this is a purely superficial resemblance-the new consolidation is supposed to be made on a strictly voluntary and mutually advantageous market basis.

The authors of the project distinguish several stages of building a new union. Each stage will move their states from simple forms of cooperation to more elaborate forms. First, through interstate association of free trade, the abolition of quotas, taxes, and licenses, through the introduction of single tariffs, the gradual formation of a customs union is envisioned. Lifting the barriers hampering the development of interaction among the producers will lead to the formation of a common market. Finally, when a full-scale union is formed with a single market of goods, services, and capital, a single monetary and banking system will be created and facilitate implementation of a common economic policy.

Each stage depends on a number of factors. For example, a free trade zone cannot be introduced without coordinating and standardizing the prices, because otherwise, goods from “cheap” areas will flow to more “expensive” areas regardless of all the borders.

A customs union will not be possible without a coordinated policy toward third states, and a common market will not exist without a joint investment and social policy. However, these issues cannot be resolved by even the most organized voting and by the adoption of separate legal acts. These things demand time and patient and diligent work. Only these conditions can grant vitality to any union.

The draft “treaty of nine” envisages a package of measures whose implementation will be provided for in separate agreements. In the experts' opinion, the package of accompanying documents should consist of fifteen agreements regulating relations between the states in the sphere of mutual interests. These agreements will, in fact, be the legal mechanism for the fulfillment of the honorable ideas and principles of the union. Such a package cannot be omitted also during the realization of the "treaty of three."

Some documents are inevitable in order to build the structure of an economic union. I will name some of them. These are agreements on common conditions and mechanisms of supporting cooperation in the sphere of production, development of direct ties between enterprises, standardizing tariff and non-tariff measures in the framework of free trade, and coordinating the policy of prices and taxes. It is not a secret that one of the most complicated problems of the CIS is that of regulating credit, financial, and convertible currency relations. No matter what variant of a common economic space will be chosen, these problems will have to be resolved.

Both the Istanbul meeting and the “Moscow weekend” of the prime ministers have demonstrated all over again that the independent states resemble boats that once hurried away from an old big ship and then, having enjoyed all the pleasures of lonesome sailing, are now trying to get together again. The recent meetings have demonstrated that even the most ardent advocates of “virgin independence” are now ready to give it up and pass certain functions to transnational structures. Life has proved that independence and sovereignty have little in common with political and economic isolation. This is even more true with regard to former union republics that have shared a common fate for decades. Their attempts to reach the desired shore of plenty and progress all by themselves, in most cases, have proved to be futile. Judge for yourself. According to official statistics, the volume of industrial production in the CIS has decreased by 18 percent in 1992, while in the sphere of capital construction the figure is 45 percent. This process was more painful in Armenia, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan. The first half of 1993 has brought another 16 percent decline in industrial production. The volume of foreign trade between the CIS members and the third states has dropped by 22 percent, consumer goods production has gone down by 10 percent. At the same time, retail prices have increased ninefold and the number of unemployed has reached some one million people.

In experts’ opinion, one of the main reasons behind the developing paralysis of the economy of newly independent states is the destruction of former economic ties. The restoration of these ties on a new mutually advantageous basis has become the number one task for every state. As Ukrainian Prime Minister Kuchma once said: “A year of our states’ independence has demonstrated their total mutual dependence.”

In this light, I would like to draw your attention to one aspect. The opponents of unions and broad integration are placing an emphasis on bilateral relations. Afraid of the revival of the former command center, they consider bilateral relations a sufficient and the only possible form of cooperation among the former USSR republics. However, the two years that have passed after the divorce have persuasively proved that criticizing the drawbacks of the former system is much easier than the practical establishment of new economic relations. Independent states have found themselves in a paradoxical situation, when the single center ceased to exist and, without the conductor, even duets started to play out of tune. The reason is plain to see-bilateral relations cannot solve the problems of four closely intertwined and mutually dependent economic systems. We need full-scale integration that would stipulate not only trade on favorable terms but also broad cooperation and even division of labor within the framework of a single economic space. This space can be restored on a market basis by means of a multipartite union, no matter whether it consolidates three or nine states. There has been enough material evidence in support of this idea.

For example, Ukraine can reach an agreement with Belarus on the direct purchase of tractors and MAZ trucks. However, Belarus cannot fulfill the agreement without Russian enterprises that produce 70 percent of the components of these machines. Thus, a whole chain of contracts would have to be signed with Russian enterprises. Yet, Uzbek, Kazakh, and Tajik enterprises also contribute to the production of trucks. The coordination of this system of agreements without common favorable conditions in the spheres of customs, taxes, transport, and the like has turned out to be practically impossible. If superficial political considerations are rejected, the only alternative to the economic union is transition to an isolated subsistence economy. The modern world does not know any examples of efficient functioning of this kind of economy-be it Albania or North Korea. Attempts by some leaders of the newly independent states to abolish objective economic laws, as was once done by Bolsheviks, and limit relations among our states to bilateral contracts, are doomed to failure.

This is why the idea of creating a firm framework in order to safeguard equal conditions for entrepreneurship and business within the CIS seems logical and timely.

There exists one more aspect-both the treaty and the declaration view the unification of legislation regulating economic relations as one of the conditions for success.

First of all, these are legal acts facilitating the free flow of goods, services, workers, and capital; standardizing taxes and prices, regulating civil, transport, and anti-monopoly legislations. Discrepancies and drawbacks in existing documents must be corrected if they hamper the development of a single economic space. National legislatures will have to perform this strenuous task.

In my opinion, committees in charge of economy should immediately draft a list of legal acts that would facilitate the fruitful participation of Belarus in the economic union. If we are truly concerned with market reforms, if we genuinely want Belarus to recover and overcome the crisis, we should put aside our political ambitions and devote the rest of our “deputies’ life” to diligent work on drafting laws. The fate of the program of the creation of a single economic space to a great extent depends on real active support from the legislatures of the Commonwealth.

Federatsiya, 15 July 1993 [FBIS Translation]

For the purpose of regulating the issuance of state credits in the currency of the Russian Federation to state governments of the former republics of the USSR and for their more efficient utilization, the Supreme Council of the Russian Federation decrees as follows:

1. Establish that state credits are to be issued by the Council of Ministers and the government of the Russian Federation to state governments of former republics of the USSR in accordance with bilateral intergovernmental agreements at the expense of and within limits of funds allocated for these purposes in the republic budget of the Russian Federation.

2. The Council of Ministers and the government of the Russian Federation is to establish the order in which state credits are to be issued, repaid, and serviced;

Stipulate the maximum overall amount of allocations in drafts of the republic budget of the Russian Federation (including the one for 1993) for credits to state governments of former republics of the USSR and for corresponding expenses associated with their servicing.

3. Establish that the granting of technical (payment) credits to governments and to central (national) banks of former republics of the USSR will be discontinued as of 1 July 1993.

4. The Council of Ministers and government of the Russian Federation, together with the Central Bank of the Russian Federation, are to:

Conduct negotiations within one month with governments and central (national) banks of former republics of the USSR regarding conversion of indebtedness for technical (payment) credits granted in 1992-93 into state debts owed by these governments to the Russian Federation;

Conduct negotiations with interested states regarding the granting of state credits to them in 1993, bearing in mind that these credits may be granted only after the indicated conversion by these states of all debts for technical (payment) credits obtained by them from the Russian Federation in 1992-93;

Conduct of negotiations to be governed by the fact that the balance of unpaid state credits granted governments of former republics of the USSR are indexed in accordance with changes in the ruble to U.S. dollar exchange rate at the current rate of the Central Bank of the Russian Federation. The indexed amount of state credit is subject to repayment.

5. Adopt the proposal of the Council of Ministers and the government of the Russian Federation concerning inclusion of appropriations from the republic budget of the Russian Federation for issuance of indicated state credits as part of the national debt of the Russian Federation and the corresponding increase, in the established sequence, of the maximum amount of national debt of the Russian Federation by 2.3 million rubles [R].

Recommend that the Central Bank of the Russian Federation record the indebtedness within limits of the indicated amount of national debt for a period up to the year 2000 with its repayment starting in 1995 in equal annual increments without the accrual of interest.

6. The Council of Ministers and the government of the Russian Federation are to introduce proposals before 1

July 1993 concerning the size of allocation from the republic budget of the Russian Federation for the granting of credits to governments of former republics of the USSR in 1993.

Henceforth, until the adoption of the maximum allocations for the issuance of state credits by the Supreme Council of the Russian Federation in the republic budget for 1993, the Council of Ministers and the government of the Russian Federation are authorized to issue state credits up to a total sum of R800 billion to governments of former republics of the USSR, with a corresponding increase in expenditures from the republic budget of the Russian Federation.

7. The Council of Ministers and the government of the Russian Federation, following coordination with the Central Bank of the Russian Federation, will submit proposals to the Supreme Council of the Russian Federation pertaining to conditions involved in servicing the part of the national debt of the Russian Federation associated with the issuance of state credits to governments of the former republics of the USSR in 1993.

8. Establish that state credits may be repaid pursuant to the agreement for the delivery of goods, by making other payments with property (transfer of property, packages of shares in key production facilities), as well as with payments in rubles or a hard currency.

9. Grant the Central Bank of the Russian Federation the right to place at the disposal of governments and central (national) banks of states which preserved the ruble as legal tender ruble banknotes of the 1961-93 series (state treasury bills of the USSR and bank notes of the State Bank of the USSR, as well as bank notes of the Central Bank of the Russian Federation) on the condition that appropriate intergovernmental and interbank agreements are signed as stipulated for states with which agreements were concluded on the terms and conditions governing utilization of the currency of the Russian Federation on their territory as legal tender, assuring the unconditional return of the cash to the Central Bank of the Russian Federation if national currencies are introduced by these states or upon the withdrawal of the corresponding bank notes from circulation.

Recommend that the Council of Ministers and the government of the Russian Federation study whether there is a need to form currency reserves on the basis of deductions by states signing the indicated agreements in order to ensure the withdrawal of ruble currency.

In the case of states not signing such agreements, the allocation of rubles may be made at the expense of and within the limits of state credit granted to governments of these states. The total amount of cash cannot exceed 25 percent of the total amount of monetary emission of the Central Bank of the Russian Federation.

10. The Central Bank of the Russian Federation will quote on a regular basis the ruble exchange rate for national currencies of former republics of the USSR with which agreements were not concluded regarding the terms and conditions for utilizing the currency of the Russian Federation on their territory as legal tender, with the systematic publication of that information in the press.

11. The Council of Ministers, the government of the Russian Federation, and the Commission of the Council of the Republic of the Supreme Council of the Russian Federation for the Budget, Plan, Taxes, and Prices are to provide for a rise in the deficit ceiling of the republic budget of the Russian Federation in accordance with this decree, when working out indexes of the republic budget of the Russian Federation for 1993, in accordance with the Supreme Council of the Russian Federation decree of 14 May 1993 on introducing a law on the republic budget of the Russian Federation for 1993.

7.24 On the Statement by the Governments of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine on Urgent

Measures to Deepen Economic Integration
Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 21 July 1993 [CD translation]

Editor's Note: The following is an editorial that finds irony and surprise in the signing of a trilateral Slavic economic agreement so soon after the signatures were dry on an Economic Union for the CIS. At this point in time, Russian politics were probably pushing the decision to form a trilateral economic space more than any strategy for catalyzing greater CIS cooperation. Russian national patriots, who adhered to the Slavophile tradition of Russian greatness, were becoming highly vocal in the parliament, and Russia was headed for a constitutional crisis over the powers of the presidency.

The heads of government of Belarus, Russia, and Ukraine recently issued a statement on the need to deepen economic integration through the development of market relations and closer trilateral cooperation...

This statement cannot fail to raise a number of questions.... How does it mesh with the decision by the CIS Heads of State on creating an economic union that would include all the states that signed the well-known Declaration of 14 May 1993 in Moscow? Does this statement nullify the declaration or propose a new way to realize the idea of creating an economic alliance according to the plan worked out in Belovezh Forest? One cannot avoid the impression that this statement by the heads of government of the three republics was dictated by more than just a recognition of the need for closer economic integration. Regardless of the intentions of its initiators, it can be seen as a political reaction to the actions being taken by the states of Central Asia, Kazakhstan, and Azerbaijan toward closer economic cooperation with Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, and Afghanistan....

The last paragraph of the statement says that the treaty can be joined by states that “are not involved in any other economic unions or associations.” And although provisos are made there that participation in other unions is possible if it does not harm the interests of this union, the point of this wording in the context of the whole statement is unambiguous.

This is an extremely important issue. It cannot be resolved by impulsive statements.... This initiative by the three states, for all its progressiveness, cannot be regarded as a way to accelerate the implementation of the treaty on establishing an economic union within the framework of the CIS. The adoption of this statement without preliminary consultations and without ascertaining the positions of Kazakhstan and the Central Asian states puts significant limitations on the possibility of their participating in the union.

Furthermore, such a statement could push those states away from participating in the economic alliance. And this is despite the fact that, throughout the entire existence of the CIS, Kazakhstan in particular has acted as one of the chief initiators of closer economic integration and the establishment of a system of coordinating bodies.

It seems to us that this kind of foreign economic policy with respect to Kazakhstan and other states in the CIS is shortsighted and is not in the interests of Russia and the other states in either the short or the long term. In our view, the main way of deepening economic integration with the near foreign countries [other former Soviet republics] lies in developing and implementing the Declaration on creating an Economic Union within the CIS framework. It is on this that all states should concentrate their efforts, without bringing into this inherently difficult process restrictions and obstacles that could undermine the foundations of the accord, so fragile and so necessary that was achieved in Moscow.

7.25 Barriers to Russian-Kazakh Economic Integration Assessed

Revmira Voshchenko Rossiya, 21-27 July 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Economic differences and indecision between Alma-Ata and Moscow also contributed to the motivation for the three Slavic states to signal that they were ready to deepen their own economic cooperation. The Rossiya article below offers insight into the issues that bedeviled Russian Eurasianists.

Alma-Ata-Top-level negotiations in Uralsk and in both capitals, the Omsk meetings of government delegations and the heads of administration of contiguous regions, meetings of leaders of enterprises of the iron and steel complex, oil workers, agrarian specialists, and industrialists in Surgut, Akmola, Karaganda . . . A mass of documents on the restoration and further development of economic relations between Russia and Kazakhstan has been signed. The parties have scrupulously specified the terms of duty-free trade and questions of the elimination of customs barriers and the establishment of direct contacts between the commodity manufacturers and suppliers.

But ... The lines of communication are still overloaded with wordy telegrams and hours-long negotiations: non-payments, absence of quotas and licenses, plants coming to a halt in Kazakhstan....

It is paradoxical, but, following all these numerous intergovernment signings and agreements, the chaos has only increased. And the speeches heard at a recent republic meeting of Kazakhstan President Nursultan Nazarbaev and Prime Minister Sergey Tereshchenko on the economic situation in the republic and the state of credit and monetary relations with countries of the CIS were not at all comforting.

Ties to Russia, the prime minister emphasized, are of decisive significance for Kazakhstan, but it is they which are having particular difficulty taking shape. The series of toplevel meetings has not produced an effective result. Nor was the last one in Moscow in June any exception. Russia refused to count as payment of Kazakhstan's debt its own enterprises' actual debts to Kazakhstan. Nor was an agreement for 1993 reached in the credit sphere either. The winding down of interstate economic relations could bring about the total paralysis of many enterprises and increase social tension in both states.

So why are the intergovernmental negotiations not producing the anticipated results? I put this question to Sauk Takezhanov, co-chairman of the Interparliamentary Commission for the Cooperation of the Russian Federation and the Republic of Kazakhstan.

Each side, my partner believes, is defending primarily the interests of its own state. And only recently the latter were part of a common economic organism and had as a common goal the building of a socialist economy. But the problem is that this term implied by no means equal partnership but the pumping of the raw material resources of our republic in the name of the prosperity of the so-called all-union economy.

Nonetheless, business relations, abandoning which is inexpedient, did take shape. They need to be modified, but such that highly marketable production be developed at home on the basis of our own raw material, the necessary components for this being obtained from the former suppliers.

Another problem is that the documents which are adopted have no legal basis. Each state en route to the market formulated many laws, but they differ markedly. It is for this reason that our commission intends to look for conceptual approaches bringing the legislative practice in the two countries closer together. An agreement was reached at the first session of the commission, for example, on the economic and legal conditions for the development of business relations between Russia and Kazakhstan. It emphasized that the principal figure in cooperation is the commodity producer and industrial manager contributing to the fulfillment of bilateral trade and economic agreements.

A harmonious duet is not resulting as yet, in S. Takezhanov's opinion, although the difficult dialogue in a search for a convergence of the positions of federal Russia and unitary Kazakhstan continues. Thus it has been decided to establish a Russian-Kazakhstan bank to regularize reciprocal payments and monetary circulation, obviating the need for government intervention. So is an economic union taking shape? Wait a while. The Russians are proposing to their Kazakhstani partners the creation of a business cooperation association, bringing together all enterprises, associations, and stock companies which have received state support. The priority areas of activity would be the harmonization of supplies of most important product types, assurance of the conditions for efficient capital investments, the creation of a variety of joint ventures, and the establishment of a permanent arbitration body for the examination of industrial disputes. Kazakhstani members of parliament, on the other hand, are sure that reforms in Kazakhstan and Russia being implemented independently of one another will not contribute to an intensification and expansion of bilateral relations. Nor does the contemplated association promise this-it pretends to nothing more than the preservation or restoration of the former overly centralized contacts.

In order to remove the barriers obstructing relations of the commodity manufacturers, it is necessary, Almaty believes, to legislatively confirm the procedure of duty-free trade in industrial-engineering products, and of equal importance, of the use in Kazakhstan of the Russian ruble, to streamline transport flows, etc.

It is thus a question of imparting some legal basis to the rules of the game, which have not become firmly established as yet, without infringing the interests of either party.

7.26 CIS Economic Union Concept Advocated

Interview by N. Zhelnorova Argumenty i Fakty, no. 30, July 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Nikolai Gonchar, who is interviewed below, is a prominent member of the Russian new left. Chairman of the Moscow Soviet since 1989, Gonchar endorsed Boris Kagarlitsky's August 1991 initiative to establish the Party of Labor, which is committed to a form of socialist selfmanagement of society and the economy. This and other new democratic socialist groups have allied themselves with the trade unions. The party's platform argued that "Thatcherites" had come to power in Russia, and vowed to combat what they termed "wild-cat privatization," and opposed "market Stalinism." Their goal was to defend labor interests in the transition to the market. Kagarlitsky warned that capitalism was taking the route familiar in the Third World, where state interests engaged in an exclusive form of capitalist modernization. Yeltsin, he maintained, could easily become an authoritarian president, because he represented sections of the old nomenklatura and state managers. Gonchar espouses a distinctly Marxist viewpoint and seems to identify the Economic Union with a rehabilitation of Trotsky's Fourth International and working-class power, a concept with which he sympathizes.

Interview with N. Gonchar, chairman of the Moscow City Soviet and leader of the Moscow Civic Union branch, by correspondent N. Zhelnorova; ... ] [Zhelnorova]: Nikolay Nikolaevich, something, it seems, is on your mind?

[Gonchar]: It is the idea, making its way in politicians' minds, that whoever is not with us is against us. This is a sign of political impotence. Reaching agreement is difficult, brains are needed here. But to counterpose yourself to someone else you need a cast-iron throat in order to orate at a demonstration that there should be "no more compromises with this scum." Of course, he is scum since you lack the brains.... But our history shows that the winner on each occasion is a previous loser.

[Zhelnorova]: You have begun to actively advocate the creation of an economic union within the framework of the CIS because the situation has reached crisis point?

[Gonchar]: It is a cri de coeur! For Moscow, for its industry, for its population-it is the sole salvation.

We cannot go on like this. See here, in 1991 industrial production declined 2 percent, in 1992, 25 percent, and in just five months of this year, 17 percent! The main reason is the severance of economic links. And the strain in the economy is immediately echoed in civil conflicts.

[Zhelnorova]: But Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus recently agreed to conclude an economic agreement. What else?

[Gonchar]: A “mere trifle” is needed-that it be fulfilled. Many such decisions were adopted in 1992, but after each of them the economy was torn apart increasingly.

What is the problem? Or is it a question of those who sign the decisions and do not fulfill them? And one further pertinent question-where is Kazakhstan?

I believe that there can only be one guarantee of the fulfillment of such agreements-the will of the peoples. This is why I propose that we conduct a referendum and learn the opinion of the peoples as to whether they need an economic union or not.

[Zhelnorova]: But the Union also fell apart so easily for many reasons: It was a colossus with feet of clay, dozens of people wished to become presidents, premiers....

[Gonchar]: And? The American system is strengthened by such desires. Truly, some politicians conceived a desire for both personal aircraft and carpeted walkways in front of them, and in the aircraft, their own pilots. And others wanted to be the personal pilots.

When do people take to the streets? When they have no other way of changing their fate. So they need to be given an opportunity to express themselves legally-at a referendum.

It would be beneficial, incidentally, to those who signed the documents in Belovezh Forest also. If people respond “no” to an economic union, the formation of the CIS was the right step, not the voluntarism of Yeltsin, Kravchuk, and Shushkevich. And if they say “yes,” well, then, “the people’s voice is the voice of God.” After all, the presidents were not, I hope, dissembling in talking constantly about economic integration. They would have something to lean on.

Even under these conditions we should not be pulling someone or other apart from someone else but seeking what unites them. Some people are reluctant to part with the idea of sovereignty. But why is it not possible to create an economic union with regard for the current state independence?

[Zhelnorova]: There is no harm in wanting, but in recent years the peoples have somehow adapted to living in isolation and would hardly decide to return to the recent past.

[Gonchar]: Why to the past? When, after World War II, people began to create a united Europe, there was an entrepreneur by the name of Monnet who said: “Economic solidarity needs to be substituted for politics.” A wise thought! Now no one in Europe is shouting about the fact that a Greater German Empire is being created. Why is this not possible with us? True, there are banks which earn money exchanging coupons and rubles. But in Europe there is the ECU and the Deutsche mark and the franc. And one does not prevent the other. A solution could, therefore, be found with us also. If there is the desire ...

So we need to choose: either the first version-civil war: “the armor’s strong, and our tanks are fast”-or the European version, when the Deutsche mark has come to resolve economic problems better than the Wehrmacht and the Schmeisser submachine gun.

[Gonchar]: Politicians should understand that the economy influences everything. Remember that the uprising on the Battleship Potemkin began with rotten meat. And, further, today’s national elites need to be given an opportunity to preserve what they have. Otherwise they will fight to the last. You want a banner, coat of arms, army? By all means. Your own monetary unit? Go right ahead.

[Gonchar]: It is better to take a long time reaching agreement than to quarrel quickly. Account has to be taken today of people’s serious dissatisfaction. Someone said recently at the meeting of foreign ministers of Russia and Ukraine with officers in Sevastopol: “If the politicians cannot find a solution, we will suggest it to them-restoration of the Union.” And the room erupted in applause.

Or remember the recent decision on the division of the Black Sea Fleet. This is in fact a sentence to its virtual destruction! Truly, how can you divide the indivisible? You know the parable? Two women with one child came to King Solomon, and each tried to prove that it was her child. The king then said: “Very well, let us cut him in two.” To this one replied: “Very well,” and the other: “No, you must not!” And the king gave the child to the one who had not wanted such a cruel sharing for she was the true mother. One has the impression that for those who wanted to divide up the fleet it is someone else’s....

Referenda should be held in the fall. We should say what kind of union we are talking about: a common unit of currency, a common bank, not subordinate to any government. No borders or customs. And we should obtain from the people an answer without any ideological motives, on the basis of the reality of life.

[Zhelnorova]: Interesting, but what about the local currency? In the old days it was said: “God gave the money, the devil, the hole. And God’s money runs into the devil’s hole.” Will this be the case with us?

[Gonchar]: When a start is made on integration of the economy, much will become clear. The Ukrainian government may, for example, print as many coupons as it likes, but with a common money this item would not wash. A common bank would be responsible for this. If the politicians need to fulfill some of their wholly unsupported promises and cover intrastate problems with local money, print as much as you wish. But then your coupon would slide downward in relation to the common currency. In a word, there would no longer then be any idle talk about who was getting rich at the expense of whom.... But transrepublic financial-industrial structures should operate in accordance with common legislation in order not to have to hide from taxes in, say, Kazakhstan or Ukraine.

But the main thing is that capital would flow in the direction in which the level of political stability were higher. So compete to ensure that you have this stability. And if hysteria is spurred somewhere or other, capital ... will float into another state.

There is the term real politics. An economic union with Ukraine and with Kazakhstan and with Belarus is not simply advantageous to Russia today, where the situation is better than in Ukraine, but essential..... How much demagoguery we have heard about the fact that they are, allegedly, robbing us, that we are feeding them.... This is, you know, as though the hands had decided that they were constantly feeding the mouth for nothing and had held out the feet.

At the start of 1933 two ministers-Russian and Ukrainian-wrote their premiers that to compensate for the severed relations in iron and steel industry alone Ukraine would require $8 to $10 billion, and Russia, $28 to $30 billion. And such a price has to be paid merely for the fact that politicians cannot reach an agreement! Perhaps it would be cheaper to change the politicians?

7.27 Nazarbaev Views Results

Oleg Velichko ITAR-TASS, 7 August 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The leaders of Russia, Kazakhstan, and Central Asian Republics called on all CIS states to hold a summit meeting in Moscow on 7 September to sign documents establishing an economic union of CIS states.

Commenting on the results of the meeting, Kazakhstan's President Nursultan Nazarbaev said that Russia, Kazakhstan, and Uzbekistan signed an agreement committing them to stay in the ruble zone. "This is what we need today. It is necessary to create a core and there is no need to force anyone into the Commonwealth," Nazarbaev said.

The Kazakh leader said the participants in the summit meeting also signed three documents on Tajikistan. Additionally, Russia and Kazakhstan issued a joint statement and instructed the ministers of defense and foreign affairs to work out within a month a document on military cooperation which would dot all “i”s and cross all “t”s in determining the future of the Baykonur space center in Kazakhstan. “In this connection I suggested establishing an international company with the participation of Russia, Ukraine, and Kazakhstan,” Nazarbaev said.

7.28 Analyst Warns Against Undue Haste in Implementing Ruble Zone

Grigoriy Selyaninov Kommersant-Daily, 19 October 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

Construction of the new ruble zone has entered upon the phase of actually coordinating and bringing together the economic legislation of the participating countries. This process will be supported by bilateral consultations. The decree signed by Viktor Chernomyrdin “On Measures to Implement the Intergovernmental Agreements on Unifying Monetary Systems,” concerning which “B” reported on Saturday, has confirmed the personnel composition and departmental structure of the Russian government delegation. Meanwhile, however, an “opposition” has emerged within the Russian government with regard to the model of the ruble zone to be implemented; and this allows us to assume that the rapid pace undertaken in creating the new ruble zone will hardly be sustained. It’s possible that a corrective adjustment will ensue—one aimed at protecting and defending Russia’s economic interests. The situation which has evolved is analyzed below by Grigoriy Selyaninov.

The pace set in creating a ruble zone based on the Russian ruble has been impressive. On 7 September the agreement of the six countries “On Practical Measures for Creating a New Type of Ruble Zone” was signed. On 23 September signing was completed on bilateral agreements providing for Russia’s partners joining in its monetary system. By mid-October Russia and the other countries of the new ruble zone had reached agreement on the need to standardize economic legislation in accordance with the Russian model. Some of the already adopted documents have been ratified by the parliaments of the ruble-zone countries.

The following reasonable question arises: Why are Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan with such readiness and haste essentially abandoning their economic sovereignty in favor of Russia? In Minsk and Almaty they reply that restoring economic ties with Russia is the only way to keep their economies afloat and thereby retain their national states. This answer corresponds to reality. Economic ties within the CIS [Commonwealth of Independent States] have developed in accordance with the following specific cycle: at first, euphoria with national independence, now-the recreation of economic ties as the only realistic method of smoothing over the economic crisis to a certain extent, and-in the future-it is entirely probable that there will be a resumption of the centrifugal tendencies, accompanied by the slogan of restoring sovereignty and creating a national currency.

However, there is also a more tangible price to be paid for abandoning economic sovereignty (most likely, temporarily). Membership in the ruble zone allows the partners to count upon an expansion of Russian deliveries of supplies within an increase of their deficit in trade with Russia. Eliminating this deficit under the conditions of a unified monetary system is more than problematical. Furthermore, the targeted convergence of the currency exchange rate of the ruble in the ruble-zone countries (with all the difficulties of achieving this goal under the conditions of different levels of development in the currency markets concerned) will reduce the economic motivation for exporting goods to Russia. And this-in turn-will expand the trade deficit.

Russian officials (with the exception of Boris Fedorov-a traditional opponent of the Central Bank, in accordance with whose prescriptions the ruble zone was created) until recently were loyal with regard to the matter of the ruble zone. A crack appeared only after the IMF [International Monetary Fund] came out with a criticism of the ruble zone in a confidential letter to Viktor Cheromyrdin. The Fund bases its argument on the concept that a model in which one country determines and specifies the monetary-credit policy of other countries is not a very viable one. The IMF's recommendations boil down to advising against any attempt to set a speed record; it would be better to retain "individual and separate" currencies in the various countries concerned during the period of preparation for a currency union.

The letter from the IMF revealed that within the Russian government there is an opposition to an overly fast formation of a ruble zone, which could lead to a premature transfer of rubles to the republics involved-something that would not be at all to the ruble's advantage. Both Egor Gaydar and Aleksandr Shokhin turned out to be among the oppositionists. As a result, there are grounds for assuming that the "unification of the monetary systems" will be slowed down. The decree "On Measures to Implement the Agreements on Unifying the Monetary Systems" has set the task of establishing and coordinating a system of indicators-one which will show the budget deficit, price increases, the currency exchange rate, as well as the pace of privatization, etc. The closer Russia's partners come to approximate these indicators, the more they can count on obtaining Russian rubles (they have the most need for rubles in the form of cash). If this system is really put into operation, then the new ruble zone will be presented with its first test of strength. However, even if this test is successfully passed, we cannot rule out the possibility that—as time goes by—the phase of disintegration will ensue.

7.29 Convertible Local Currencies Could Settle Russia-CIS Debts

Aleksandr Krotkov Rabochaya Tribuna, 22 October 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Help! Russia intends to blackmail “near abroad” countries using their growing debt to Moscow as a tool of political pressure on its neighbors. This is the way some newspapers commented on the results of the recent meeting of the Russian Federation Council of Ministers Current Affairs Commission headed by Oleg Soskovets, at which they discussed the issue of fulfilling treaties and agreements on production ties between CIS member states.

Well, we have to admit that a proposal was indeed put forward at the meeting to use the economic debts owed to us by “near abroad” countries to resolve foreign policy problems (such as, for instance, the rights of the Russian-speaking population or the ownership of the Black Sea Fleet). It came, however, not from the commission chairman or even the head of the foreign policy department, but from Russia's chief privatizer-

Anatoliy Chubays-whose responsibilities, it should be noted, are limited to strictly domestic matters.

I agree that Anatoliy Borisovich's influence on the government is extremely great, and it would not hurt him to weigh more carefully the words he utters. But in this particular instance it is more likely that he stepped into "unfamiliar territory" out of desperation.

Seriously speaking, the economic crisis that has struck the Commonwealth countries has resulted in a situation whereby our neighbors have not delivered to us $3.03 billion worth of goods. To be fair, our indebtedness to them also is in excess of $2.319 billion. And now this $700 million positive balance has turned into a mortally dangerous clot in the way of developing foreign economic relations between Russia and the former brotherly republics.

This clot cannot dissolve on its own: the CIS countries do not have in their treasuries Russian rubles they could use to pay for our goods, while the Central Bank of Russia refuses to accept USSR banknotes that are no longer in use here. This is logical. The whole idea of introducing the Russian ruble was, I would like to remind, precisely this: to shield the country from the tidal wave of Soviet banknotes from the "near abroad," whose uncontrolled influx boosts inflation.

Our new national currency, however, in its current shape proved to be a double-edged sword, one side of which has dealt a painful blow to domestic enterprises. They now are frequently unable to get payment for the goods they deliver to CIS countries. And the Central Bank is forced to play hide-and-seek with itself, having promised to issue to neighboring countries 800 billion rubles [R] in so-called interstate technical credits so that they could pay us back.

And since this also boosts inflation, Russia is trying by hook or by crook to withhold the promised handout: by the middle of October it had allocated only R113 billion in credits to the near abroad. By the end of the year their total amount will reach a maximum of R400 billion. In other words, in the economic battle with its neighbors, Russia also has tied itself into such a knot that now, no matter how it tries to “bite” its partners, it only bites, excuse me, its own tail.

How can it untie this knot? Vladimir Mashchits, head of the Russian state Committee for Economic Cooperation with CIS Member States, proposed at the Current Affairs Commission's meeting to first unload this mind-boggling problem onto the producers (they are now independent, so let them figure it out with their foreign partners on their own); and second, to reach an agreement with CIS countries on converting our mutual debts into promissory notes secured by real estate (if the plants cannot pay their bills, let them become the property of the note holders).

In principle, this is not a bad idea. A similar mechanism exists in all civilized countries of the world. However, as Anatoliy Chubays correctly warned the meeting participants, Russia will lose more than it will gain as a result of such operations. It will acquire ownership of hundreds of backward "bedridden" enterprises. To make them work will require enormous investment, for which we do not even have enough money for ourselves.

Actually, even if acquisition of enterprises in "near abroad" countries were indeed a super-lucrative deal, it would still be naive to count on getting rich soon. In order for such operations to take place, it is necessary to bring to a common denominator the respective codes of law of the CIS countries. If we recall how difficult and hopeless the process of reaching consensus between the branches of power was even in Russia proper, one can imagine what debates the settlement of this issue will spawn between the sovereign CIS republics. Because at issue, I want to emphasize, is not just signing some non-binding official papers-it is partial acceptance by our neighbors of our model of economic reforms, permitting mortgaging and selling enterprises.

Certain hope in this respect stems from the recent agreement on the creation of a new ruble zone on CIS territory. At least, that is the way it may look to the uninitiated. In the general opinion of experts, however, the aforementioned agreement, alas, would not facilitate in any way economic ties between neighboring countries. Because in the final analysis the real weight of the ruble is determined in each of them by the seriousness of its own internal problems.

So it turns out that in Kazakhstan, for example, the ruble has one-third of the dollar content of that in Russia. Which means that if we accept rubles from Kazakhstan in payment for Russian goods at the rate of one to one, we devalue our exports there by a factor of three.

The situation, in short, is dismal. The absolute hopelessness and helplessness in the voices of most Russian statesmen speaking at the Current Affairs Commission meeting would depress the most irrepressible optimists. Had it not been for the commission chairman, who resolutely dismissed this universal moaning and demanded from the procession of sad speakers at the rostrum an answer to the question "What to do?," the discussion almost certainly would not have produced any results whatsoever.

In the end, however, the discussion did get onto a constructive track: the only salvation for economic ties with the near abroad is the soonest possible introduction of convertibility of local currencies. You are offered soms in payment for goods sure! You take them, exchange them at the bank for rubles, and no headache. If you are offered karbovantsy, lits, or Kazakh or Belarusian rubles-the procedure is the same.

True, implementation of this idea will require considerable effort. But why not make an effort if you know it will not be wasted?

7.30 Problems of Transnational Enterprises in CIS Discussed

Evgeniy Spiridonov Segodnya, 30 October 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The state's degree of participation in transnational companies has not been decided yet.

The Collegium of the Russian Federation State Committee on Economic Cooperation with the CIS States [Goskomsotrudnichestvo] discussed the draft of an intergovernmental agreement on cooperation in the development of transnational enterprises yesterday. The draft proposes cooperation in the support of joint financial and industrial groups, production corporations, associations, unions, and joint ventures, as well as commercial establishments, and financing and credit institutions.

Goskomsotrudnichestvo Deputy Chairman Marat Khusnutdinov said that the work on this program should restore the economic ties that existed earlier and worked so effectively among enterprises of the countries belonging to the Economic Union. The program was drawn up in conjunction with the Ministry of Economics, the Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations, the State Committee on the Administration of State Property, the State Committee on Industrial Policy, the Committee on Machine Building, the State Committee on the Defense Industry, and the Committee on Contracts. It is the first of a group of documents which will have to be finalized before the end of this year for the restoration of the economic zone in the territory of the former USSR. Pyotr Kormilitsin, the head of Goskomsotrudnichestvo's recently established Main Administration for the Coordination of Foreign Economic Operations, told the Segodnya correspondent that the main article of the agreement that is still in question concerns the degree of participation by budget-carried organizations in the transnational economic structures. The current plan proposes that 51 percent of the capital stock be retained as the state property of countries participating in the establishment of the joint production units. This stock would be turned over in trust to the government agencies whose representatives would be members of the supervisory councils of the transnational economic structures.

The very same government agencies that worked together to draft the agreement-i.e., Goskomsotrudnichestvo, the Ministry of Economics, the Committee on Machine Building, and so forth-would serve, according to Pyotr Kormilitsin, as the Russian co-founders of the joint financial-industrial groups and other economic and commercial structures. This participation in the management of corporations, in his opinion, would be warranted by the privileges and licenses they would grant the economic entities for the fulfillment of intergovernmental obligations in reciprocal deliveries of goods for state needs and the cooperative network.

The final decision on the degree and forms of participation by the state in international associations in industry, trade, insurance, and banking is being complicated, in Mr. Kormilitsin's opinion, by the varying speed of reforms in the Commonwealth countries and by the fact that the economic language of intergovernmental communication has not lost its political dialect. This is why economic integration without expressly stipulated participation by the state in the operations of the joint production structures has not worked. Machine assembly plants in Russia, for example, hoped to rely on Ukrainian suppliers of components, but customs officials said they could not.

According to Mr. Kormilitsin, the draft agreement has been approved on its merits and will now be discussed by the Russian Council of Ministers. If it grants its approval, the document will be forwarded to the governments of the other states.

7.31 Moscow Blamed for Kazakhstan's Decision Not to Join Ruble Zone

Aleksandr Krotkov Rabochaya Tribuna, 5 November 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The current Russian leadership's harsh treatment of its opponents (or competitors-call them whatever you wish) is moving from the sphere of domestic policy to foreign economic operations, at least in relations with nearby foreign states. The interests of the great nation, which associate the Kremlin with macroeconomic stabilization, have caused Moscow to encourage its most loyal Kazakh and Uzbek neighbors to institute national currencies of their own.

I will remind you that both of these Central Asian republics were willing until recently to keep the ruble as their main form of legal tender, but normal trade with Russian enterprises and payment for imports from the north required not simply the ruble, but the new Russian rubles. Many rubles-hundreds of billions. Meanwhile, Moscow was increasingly reluctant to lend money to its southern neighbors, feeling that this kind of generosity could only escalate galloping inflation.

On the one hand, the rising prices in Russia were partly a result of the extension of colossal credits to former associates in the indestructible Union. On the other, cutting off the supply of rubles to Kazakhstan could have closed the hundreds of enterprises living on exports to that republic. After all, it would have had no way of paying for our goods, and we would still be overcome by the inflation caused by these production cuts.

There were only two ways of breaking out of this vicious cycle: Our colleagues in the ruble zone could have been asked to acknowledge the Central Bank of Russia as the only official body issuing currency (but that would have brought them to their knees before Moscow in the financial sphere) or forced to institute their own currencies, which could then be exchanged for rubles at an acceptable rate.

Then Russia made a stipulation a week ago: It was willing to give its two southern neighbors rubles in cash, BUT(!) only for half a year and only at the regular Central Bank rate of interest (which businessmen in the country have called usurious). Furthermore, they would have to put up 50 percent of the credit in hard currency as collateral. If these neighbors would then refrain from introducing their own currencies in the next five years, Russia would return the collateral and would not charge interest on the credit.

It is understandable that Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan felt that these terms (especially the five years of ruble “bondage”) were unacceptable in these troubled times.

One thing is clear: There will be no increase in the quantities of Central Asian musk melons, watermelons, and other exotic fruits in Moscow stores in the near future. The Russians will manage to survive somehow without these luxuries, but can they live without cotton? ...

7.32 Case Argued for Economic Union with Ukraine

Interview by Vladimir Kuzmishchev Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 23 February 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Interview with Nikolay Gonchar (chairman of the Federation Council Committee for the Budget, Financial, Currency, and Credit Regulation, Monetary Emission, Tax Policy, and Customs Regulation) by Vladimir Kuzmishchev. ]

[Kuzmishchev]: Nikolay Nikolaevich, I recently heard that you are calling for economic reunification with Ukraine in connection with the situation in the Crimea. To be honest, my first thought is God forbid. Loss-making mines in the Donbass, exhausted mines in the Krivoy Rog area, the mighty defense industry in Dnepropetrovsk in need of restructuring. We just won't be able to cope....

[Gonchar]: Imagine that a third of the modules are removed from your computer here and you are asked: How are we to get it to work? Simple. You either replace the parts that have been removed with some new components, which is a costly, awkward, and exacting business. Or you put back the old ones. Then you can use the computer.

[Kuzmishchev]: That is debatable. It transpires that Ukraine produced 18 percent of the former Union's GNP. Some went on reproduction and on intrarepublic deliveries, some to Central Asia, Georgia, and the Baltic. And, no matter how you look at it, Russia's dependency on Ukraine was minimal. But Ukraine experienced maximum dependency on Russia, as the last few years have shown.

to continue the computer analogy, a new program loaded. But why destroy things?

[Gonchar]: The former political system turned out to be fiction. If it could collapse because of a conflict between two leaders, it did not exist. I suggest that we evaluate reality. The reality is that borders which were established in an extremely arbitrary manner in the past (everyone was after all convinced that they were a formality) suddenly proved real. So far only economically, but the logic of confrontation is not always the logic of common sense. It dictates its own laws. Border guards carrying assault rifles have already appeared. The absurd thing is that a person's membership of a particular nation is only decided by geographical latitude and longitude....

[Kuzmishchev]: You have been able to say things to me a journalist that you cannot say as a politician. Having traveled the entire length and breadth of Left Bank Ukraine I was never able to understand how the thinking, lifestyle, psychology, or, as people are now saying, the mentality of a peasant, a miner, an engineer in those areas differs from the mentality of someone from Tula, Saratov, Omsk, or Minsk, say. There has never been a language barrier. It was harder for me to understand, say, what a coastal dweller from Arkhangelsk was saying than a peasant from Kharkov. According to Dal [nineteenth-century Russian ethnographer] a person belongs to the nationality in whose language he thinks. Second, what have the millions of Russians who came from Russia to Ukraine or to Kazakhstan on an institute placement or in response to the authorities' appeal done to hurt us? By political realities I meant the situation today.

[Gonchar]: The saying that politics is economics in a concentrated form is more appropriate today than ever. Economic integration represents the means of survival for us. There is a cheap work force in Ukraine. Tell me please how we will be able to stem the flow of people from there who are desperate to come to our country to work. They are even willing to take half pay, but what are we to do with our own people? This threatens a social explosion. Now let us take the situation in the Crimea. The recently elected president Yu. Meshkov was the leader of the "Russia" bloc. A fairly eloquent name. Their objective is to leave the economic wreckage of Ukraine and form a single economic area with Russia and other states. Russia now seems to be accommodating that aspiration. But there are many problems here. We do not after all even share borders. Electricity comes from Ukraine as does the water for agricultural irrigation, and so on. The Crimea is greatly indebted to Ukraine. What will happen to Left Bank Ukraine where there are similar pro- Russian sentiments? But no one there is advocating the revival of the Soviet and Socialist Union. It is a question of economic integration.

[Kuzmishchev]: The chain reaction will hit Kazakhstan next. Whereas the breakup of the Union caused a series of wars in outlying regions, the breakup of Ukraine and Kazakhstan would mean....

[Gonchar]: There are plenty of politicians in Ukraine and our country who would not be averse to playing that card. Both in order to remain in big-league politics and in order to reach new heights. Suppose someone in Ukraine wanted to postpone parliamentary and presidential elections. Is the possible deterioration of the situation in the Crimea not an excuse for those politicians? And aren't our radicals even better?

[Kuzmishchev]: But doesn't integration involve a partial loss of sovereignty for states with a weaker economy?

[Gonchar]: Sovereignty is not the aim, but the means of attaining contemporary civilization and a high standard of living. People in Ukraine were convinced that autonomy is the way to success. Now the result is clear. No one on the long-established Western market is waiting for us or for them. Look how quick they were to reach agreement with us and drive down prices of aluminum and oil. We thought that we would inundate the West with these goods and take off like the Arab Emirates did in the past. That is not the case. Besides, it is offensive if you have high technologies to place the emphasis on raw materials when all countries are trying to sell finished output. But for the time being we are prepared to trade finished output mainly among ourselves....

[Kuzmishchev]: But how specifically are the first steps to be taken? How long has there been talk of creating a ruble zone at the highest level and it has all been to no avail....

[Gonchar]: The key issue here is the number of money supply centers. Needless to say, Russia will never agree to there being several points deciding the money supply. There must only be one of these points. Europe has already reached that conclusion-a currency institution has been set up there and it will have a single currency. Why are our politicians opposing proposals dictated by life itself? Remember the advertisement that begins with the words: "Ladies and Gentlemen, you have thirty seconds to think about it ...." There are no deals that are any easier or grander than those involved in playing with exchange rate differences and brokering currencies transfers. This is a colossal network and can produce billions out of thin air. On the one hand, these billions affect prime cost and thus bring soaring prices and inflation; on the other, they require political protection and lobbying for their interests. I therefore propose that, if the politicians do not reach agreement, let the people reach agreement. The politicians must be presented with the fait accompli of the people having reached agreement. Let us hold a referendum. With one sole question: Is it necessary to create a single economic area?

[Kuzmishchev]: The population of Ukraine will probably vote “for,” but Russia is another matter. What a hullabaloo there has been over the creation of a single monetary system with Belarus. But here, after all, the scale is far greater. And the political forces of those opposed are far more aggressive. It will be enough for someone in Russia say that this will whip up inflation, and then....

[Gonchar]: If you so desire, shortcomings can be found, exaggerated, and dreamed up in any plan, any idea. Let us first grasp what is meant by “unification” [ob’edinenie] or the creation of a “single economic area,” the specific steps involved.

There are of course plenty of people in our country, in Ukraine, and in Kazakhstan whose political career is based on the policy of separation [razyedinienie]. Many people are only interested in nationalist hysteria so that they can come to power. Some individuals have already succeeded, but the parade of sovereignty indisputably had adverse consequences for most of the population. At the same time we have enough sober politicians who are capable of telling people that economic integration by no means signifies that Russia will include Ukraine in its budget and exchange rubles for coupons on a one-to-one basis.

[Kuzmishchev]: What does it mean then?

[Gonchar]: Primarily that the economic and legal barriers should be taken down and the duties removed. And private capital given the freedom to invest money in the Ukrainian economy.

[Kuzmishchev]: But, as Marx said, capital is not sentimental, it goes where there is the greatest profit. It is hard in Russia to force someone to invest in production in conditions of inflation, never mind in Ukraine.

[Gonchar]: A contentious issue. Even from the purely economic viewpoint. You only have to remember Ukraine's mighty oil refining industry, which is driving down our monopolists' prices. Anyone with a reasonable knowledge of the Ukrainian economy can name straight off several sectors in which it is profitable to invest capital. That is not the point. Entrepreneurs are primarily interested in political stability and legal protection. Russian firms, say, are willing to refine oil in Ukraine, but what guarantee is there that Ukraine won't appropriate the oil tomorrow? There must be seamless legislation on property.

[Kuzmishchev]: Common legislation.

[Gonchar]: No. Ukrainian and Russian legislation. The main thing is that the laws should not contradict one another. In a word, there must be an incentive for a change of legislation. If you want to employ an incentive, then think it through. Capital, I repeat, goes where there is greater social and political stability. If we squabble, there will be no capital. That is, the economic motor is cranked into action via politics. And, on the contrary, every stage of political rapprochement must have legal and political backup. Let us give Russian and Ukrainian capital a chance to work together. If it is just a question of Russian capital, there is one system of taxation, if it is just Ukrainian, then another applies. But if it is a joint project, there must be lenient taxes to provide incentives. It is not important what language people speak. Or what they wear. They will be united by profit and a common cause. When people come along and undermine the common cause out of personal interest, Russian businessmen will tell their Ukrainian colleagues: The plan will collapse if this idiot forces the situation. Would you be so kind as to have it out with him? Give money to his election rival, give money to the party that backs integrationist processes and we will deal with our Russian loonies. People of the same blood must be united by common interests.

[Gonchar]: Why has the rich United States suddenly taken the initiative and started strengthening the economy of Mexico? Mexicans were dying to get across the border, so economic potential had to be created there. The situation is far more acute in our country. Things are so bad in Ukraine that an explosion may be about to occur. We are hoping in vain that the debris will only fly inward. There is no alternative to economic integration. People in the Crimea have realized that and are clearing the way. The others are only hampered by the fact that some politicians in both capitals are afraid to acknowledge their mistakes, which have brought national tragedy.

7.33 Committee to Explore Creation of CIS Monetary System

Konstantin Smirnov Kommersant-Daily, 15 July 1994
[FBIS Translation]

There are two main tasks involved in the construction of the Economic Union of the CIS countries at this time: the creation of a supranational administrative body and the establishment of an effective settlement system for the Commonwealth countries. These tasks will not be completed within the near future, but a decision was made at yesterday's meeting of the CIS Consultative and Coordinating Committee (CCC) to return to the idea of the Interstate Economic Committee (MEK) and appoint an international team of experts to plan a settlement system for the CIS countries.

The short history of the Commonwealth of Independent States already has some predictable patterns of its own: Decisions requiring no commitments are approved with relative ease, but as soon as there is any mention of real limits on national sovereignty (or at least the need to give up part of the state budget), the pattern of action in CIS agencies is one step forward and two steps back. The history of the long-suffering Interstate Economic Committee is the most indicative example of this. The initial response to Nursultan Nazarbaev's idea of establishing a standing body of the Economic Union in Moscow, with specific supranational functions, was more than favorable in the majority of CIS capitals, but during the Moscow summit in April 1994 the as yet unborn MEK was turned into nothing more than the CCC Commission of the Economic Union (KES), with no directive or supervisory functions whatsoever. A statute on the KES was prepared for the last meeting of the CCC in Moscow, but by then everything had reverted to the old pattern.

First Alma-Ata, which had secured approval of the decision to establish supranational institutions of the Central Asian Economic Union at the last meeting of the three presidents, revived the idea of the MEK. Then President Yeltsin asked Deputy Premier Aleksandr Shokhin, the chairman of the CCC, to make all of the arrangements for the replacement of the stillborn KES with the MEK by the time of the September summit in Sochi. Besides this, after Leonid Kuchma won the presidential election, his support for the MEK could also be expected.

The CIS settlement system has not taken shape yet either. In April this year, the heads of state approved a plan for a payment union, proposing the eventual creation of a monetary union of the members of the Economic Union. The idea of the payment union was supported by commercial banks in Russia and the other CIS countries. At yesterday's meeting of the CCC, the Russian Ministry of Cooperation with the CIS Countries and the Association of Russian Banks gained acceptance of the idea of appointing an international team of experts to plan a settlement system for the CIS countries. President Sergey Yegorov of the association and Deputy Minister of Cooperation with the CIS Countries German Kuznetsov became the co-chairmen of the international team. According to German Kuznetsov, proposals on the creation of the payment union will be prepared for the CCC by 1 September. The first step in the normalization of settlements between CIS countries was the approval of the standard draft agreement on measures to secure the mutual convertibility of national currencies on a bilateral basis at the last meeting of the CCC.

Proposed Status of Interstate Economic Committee of CIS Economic Union

The committee will be a standing executive and coordinating body of the Economic Union; it will be accountable to the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of the Government of the CIS.

The decisions the committee makes within the confines of its jurisdiction will be binding for the states of the union whose representatives voted in favor of them.

Standard Draft of Bilateral Agreements on Measures to Secure Mutual Convertibility of National Currencies

- mutual alignment of the national monetary systems in operation within the territory of the republics party to the agreements;
- gradual institution of the mutual convertibility of national currencies-the stabilization of national currency exchange rates in relation to one another and to hard currency during the first stage, and complete mutual convertibility during subsequent stages;
- establishment of liquid currency markets in the republics party to the agreements;
- regular (at least weekly) adjustment of the official exchange rates of national currencies in relation to one another and to the dollar on the basis of supply and demand in domestic currency markets by the central (or national) banks of the republics.

7.34 Supranational Body to Coordinate CIS Economic Policies

Konstantin Smirnov Kommersant-Daily, 23 July 1994
[FBIS Translation]

Analysis of economic integration in the former USSR gives rise to the following conclusion: In the CIS, they harness quickly, but ride slowly. Lots of agreements and treaties have already been signed, but their implementation leaves much to be desired. An attempt to mend the situation will be made in September 1994 in Sochi. Yesterday, a group of experts representing virtually all CIS countries was set up to prepare constituent documents of an Interstate Economic Committee [IEC] for the Sochi summit.

The history of setting up the committee, as Kommersant-Daily already reported in its issue of 15 July, has a certain detective-story tinge. Before it had time to come to life, the committee was replaced at the Moscow summit this past April with the Commission of the Economic Union as part of the CIS Coordinating Consultative Committee. In the view of Vladimir Pokrovskiy, deputy minister for cooperation with CIS countries and head of the Russian expert group in talks on setting up the IEC, last spring those “on high” in the Commonwealth were not mature enough to form such a committee.

In addition, Mr. Pokrovskiy emphasized in an exclusive interview for Kommersant-Daily, the first draft statute on the IEC was palliative in nature and for that very reason the committee, designed to be the CIS Economic Union’s working body, did not have real supranational functions. Moreover, according to Kommersant-Daily experts, the creation of an Interstate Economic Committee would have called into question the status of the Consultative and Coordinating Committee (CCC). Now, a Solomonic decision has been found. The IEC, according to the concept of its architects from Russia, Kazakhstan, and Belarus, will be given a supranational status and will be directly subordinate to the Council of CIS Heads of Government. The CCC together with its chairman will be converted into the IEC’s board. Aleksandr Shokhin, current CCC chairman, liked this solution, so the committee decided to elevate the commission’s status to that of an interstate committee. The shift occurred without a snag at the latest CCC meeting (see Kommersant-Daily of 15 April).

Thus, with one month to go before the Sochi meeting of the CIS prime ministers, the IEC “detective story” appears to have come to an end. The sides have begun to finalize the draft agreement on setting up the committee and its draft statute. According to its architects, the new executive and coordinating body is to assume supranational functions in the areas of anti-monopoly and customs regulations, the standardization and certification of mutual deliveries, energy supply, transportation, and communications.

Only the problem of settlements and payments between CIS countries will be left outside the committee’s terms of reference. This area of relations between the former USSR republics will be regulated by the Interstate Bank—as far as the servicing of government credits and payments by staterun enterprises is concerned—and by commercial banks of CIS countries, which even at this stage service up to 70 percent of all mutual settlements. Another international group of experts tasked with devising a concept of the CIS countries’ payment system must draw up by 1 September its proposals on setting up a single center for the quotation of national currencies against each other; this could be done, for instance, by the Moscow Interbank Currency Exchange.

7.35 Russian Official on Interstate Economic Committee

Evgeniy Spiridonov Segodnya, 26 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

An international group of CIS experts, which was tasked by decision of the CIS Consultative and Coordinating Committee [CCC] on 14 July 1994 with drawing up a statute on the Interstate Economic Committee [IEC], started its work today so as to submit the document to the meeting of Commonwealth heads of government scheduled for September 1994. This was said to your ADS correspondent by Vladimir Pokrovskiy, deputy Russian Federation Minister for Cooperation with CIS Member States, who joined the expert group from the Russian side.

While the recently created Commission for the Economic Union (CEU), which operates as part of the CCC, performs only expert and analytical functions, he said, the IEC, according to its authors' concept, must be the Economic Union's management body endowed with operational and executive functions in the areas that will be turned over to it by the Commonwealth governments. That is to say, as a supranational management structure, it will be able to make decisions binding on all CIS members. According to Mr. Pokrovskiy, existing interstate sectoral cooperation bodies (a total of around fifty), whose operation has been plagued by discord, may be "dragged" into the IEC structure in the capacity of its departments, he said.

If a universally acceptable document that would legally formalize a higher level of integration between the economies of CIS members is prepared by September, at the next meeting of Heads of Government Russia will put forward specific initiatives on free trade-an agreement on which has already been signed-customs tariffs, and mutual payments.

Mr. Pokrovskiy thinks that the fiercest arguments in the process of drawing up the IEC statute may be triggered by the debate on the committee's decision-making procedure. At present, most CIS members advocate the one-state-one-vote principle, regardless of their varying economic potentials. Still, one can draw on the EC's method of equalizing "weight categories" between member countries in the voting procedure, taking into account their economic potentials. In this case, for instance, Russia would be given enough votes to block any IEC decision that would put it at a disadvantage economically.

In Mr. Pokrovskiy's view, the states should show the political will to entrust the IEC with the power to impose economic sanctions should any state disregard its decisions and thereby cause damage to other members of the Economic Union. The IEC's weight will be boosted, he thinks, if the Consultative and Coordinating Committee, made up of deputy prime ministers, becomes the new committee's board.

7.36 Outlook for CIS Economic Union

Yuriy Shishkov Rossiyskiy Ekonomicheskiy Zhurnal, 15 August 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

From the very beginning, we must note that for many years, the Soviet economic and political space was not merely unified, but also maintained a certain functional equilibrium. Yet it has been over three years now since the formerly unified space broke up into fifteen separate parts and entered a state of wandering and searching for means to a new equilibrium. Along this path it has encountered everything territorial claims, military conflicts, civil wars, deep economic crisis which gripped the newborn independent states, and the desire of some to get rich at the expense of others. The impression is of some confused conglomeration of mutual claims and suspicions, assurances of friendship and compromises. At the same time, two stages are clearly apparent here.

The point of departure of thefirst of these stems from the spring of 1990, when there was an increasing tendency toward sovereignization. The course toward independence was proclaimed by Estonia (30 March), Lithuania (4 May), Russia (12 June), Ukraine (16 July), and Armenia (28 August). After August of 1991, the centrifugal tendency reached a critical mass and took on avalanche-like proportions, fed by the euphoria of independence. There were hopes that the very fact of economic independence would allow every former union republic to more effectively utilize its natural and other resources, to quickly implement economic reform, and to embark upon a successful autonomous course in the open sea of the world economy. The leaders of the Baltic states, Ukraine, Turkmenistan, Georgia, and Azerbaijan spoke most confidently about this. Life, however, did not confirm these optimistic suppositions. In practice, it turned out that independence is not only a blessing, but also that it involves many problems and difficulties, often entirely unforeseen. The initial hopes for rapidly overcoming the painful disintegration of former ties, the forced integration into the world economy, and the mastery of new foreign trade horizons, was replaced by the understanding that even after the divorce it would still be necessary to live in the “same apartment” for some time to come.

The second stage began in spring 1993. An even deeper strategic shift became evident. Earlier, beginning with the Treaty on Economic Cooperation signed on 18 October 1991 and with subsequent agreements of a multilateral character, it was quietly assumed that the search was on for organizational forms of civilized divorce. Today, the problems of real reintegration of the twelve national economies have appeared on the agenda. This new tendency strengthened when the Russian reserve of "charity" toward the other CIS states was exhausted. In 1992, Russia granted them so-called "technical credits" toward payment for the power resources and other goods supplied by Russia in an amount equivalent to $15-$17 billion. (With high rates of inflation, such interest-free credits are a direct loss for Russia.) In the first seven months of 1993, such aid totaled $1.2 billion more than the previous year. Moreover, the CIS states received considerable benefit in the form of hidden subsidies, determined by the varying degree of increased prices on goods which they imported from Russia, on the one hand, and those which they supplied to Russia on the other hand. Finally, Russia was forced to put an end to the flooding of its domestic market with devalued Soviet rubles, which were emitted in large volumes by the national banks of other CIS states to pay for imports from Russia.

As a result, it became apparent that the traditional system of “feeding” the former Soviet republics at the expense of the center had finally faded into the past, and that now each of the new states must itself earn money “to live on.” At the same time, it became clear that for many of them, the resolution of such a task was beyond their means. There was no basis to depend on their own means and, consequently, they had to opt for uniting seriously, and for a long time. Even the leader of Turkmenistan, a country rich in natural resources, who intended to rapidly turn this country into a new Kuwait, sharply altered his negative attitude toward the restoration of a unified economic space within the boundaries of the CIS.

A period of hopes for the transformation of the old, integral command-distributive economic space inherited from the USSR into an equally integral market space had come to an end. A period of the formation of a new common market comprised of the domestic markets of twelve countries, which were somewhat autonomous and somewhat dissimilar, had begun. It was necessary to hastily undertake a search for suitable mechanisms for the reintegration of the national economies.

Model of Reintegration Borrowed from the European Community

From the very beginning, the model developed and used in the European Community was viewed as the standard for the future economic interaction of the CIS states. However, its competent emulation was hindered by two circumstances. The first of these was the fact that, for some time after the disintegration of the USSR, the economic “transparency” of the inter-republic boundaries was retained, and up until the fall of 1993 there was also a unified ruble space within the CIS. It seemed that the decisive elements of the economic union toward which the EC countries had stubbornly been moving for three and a half decades, already existed within the confines of the CIS. Therefore, the problem, it seemed, was reduced merely to implementing a task which was not too difficult: to finish building the “lower stories” of the building of integration—to create a customs union, a unified market of capital, and so forth, all the while retaining and strengthening its finished “roof.” The second circumstance was the following. The conviction prevailed that on the whole the entire situation in the CIS was much more favorable than in the EC, whose participants had in the past been entirely independent states, with their own economic, legal, and institutional specifics. The situation in the CIS was believed to be principally different. Here all the countries were as similar to each other as twins, since their national economies had quite recently been a single whole and, it would seem, were well adapted to each other.

Moreover, the states of Western Europe had moved forward by feeling their way, by the method of trial and error, while the CIS countries already knew the trail which they had blazed, making it possible for them to follow it confidently and quickly.

As a result of the indicated circumstances, the understanding of the need for consistent passage by the CIS states through all the stages of integration from a zone of free trade to a currency and economic union did not come all at once. At first it was considered enough to retain the transparency of the borders and the unity of the customs territory, and the rest seemed to be a simple task of secondary importance. In the spring of 1992, there was intensive work on the agreement on a customs union, and in April of that same year it was signed. At that time, it was still not difficult to implement. The boundaries between the CIS member states remained rather transparent, and a set of trade and political tools for relations with third countries, which still rested on a unified system inherited from the USSR, could be rather easily unified. However, due the prevalent orientation toward “divorce” at that time, the CIS states were in no hurry to recognize the multilateral agreements which had been signed.

At the same time, events followed their own course, and for objective reasons the “transparency” of the interrepublic borders quickly evaporated. Differences in the rates of economic reorganization caused different levels of price liberalization in the CIS countries, which led to significant differences in levels of economic development. And this, naturally, gave rise to the rush of goods, including vitally important resources, from the countries with relatively low domestic prices to the others, where they were higher. Just as strong was the drain of material goods, caused by the repeal of the state monopoly on foreign trade. Raw materials, fuel, and metal began to flow in a broad current to the “far abroad,” i.e., to the world market, where a higher price could be obtained for them (sometimes two to three times), with payment in hard currency. Often such a drain occurred through the customs territory of other CIS states. All this forced Russia and the other Commonwealth states to introduce strict quantitative and tariff limitations on export, and to create customs services at the borders. As of 1 January 1993, Russia expanded a unified regimen of setting quotas and licensing not only on exports to the Baltic states, but also on exports to all the CIS states.

Parallel with this trend was the unchecked erosion of the unified monetary space. When the old Soviet ruble was a unified means of payment in the CIS zone, independent national banks of the member states were able to implement uncontrolled emission of credits and to use them to settle accounts with each other, especially with Russia, which accounts for up to 60 to 80 percent of the foreign trade of most of these states. This formed the means for flooding Russia with a devalued mass of money, which spurred on the already galloping inflation. It was necessary for Russia to introduce its own currency and to change over to a strict credit policy with regard to the other CIS states. Each of them (except for Tajikistan) in turn introduced its own national currency.

Thus, the initial situation changed significantly. Almost nothing was left of the ready “stockpiles” for the future economic union, and it became quite clear that it would be necessary to pass through the entire “building cycle,” from foundation to roof. The decision to prepare the appropriate multilateral treaty on a step-by-step movement toward an economic union was adopted by the heads of the CIS states on 14 May 1993. Its text was prepared in only one-and-onehalf months. On 1 July it was coordinated at the level of vice premiers, and on 24 September of the same year it was signed in Moscow by the heads of nine states: Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan. Turkmenistan joined in the Treaty on the Economic Union on 24 December 1993, as an equal member, and Ukraine on 15 April 1994, as an associate member.

Many principles of this treaty testify to the fact that its participants relied on West European integration theory and practice. The goals of the union and the means of attaining them were rather similar to those which were fixed in the treaty on Instituting the EES [European Economic Space] (1957), in the agreement on the EFTA [European Free Trade Association] (1960), and in the Unified European Act (1987). Thus, according to Article 3 of the treaty, “The Economic Union presupposes the unhindered movement of goods, services, capital, and manpower; coordinated credits, budget, tax, price, foreign economic, customs, and currency policy; harmonized economic legislation of the agreement parties.”

Article 4 of the treaty exactly reproduces the stages of integration laid down in the Rome Treaty: “The Economic Union is created through a step-by-step intensification of integration and coordination of action in the implementation of economic reform. An interstate (multilateral) association of free trade; a customs union; a common market of goods, services, capital, and manpower and a currency (monetary) union will facilitate this coordination process.”

Thus, after several unsuccessful efforts, having skipped several stages of development, in order to get rapidly to the finish line, the CIS states had to reconcile themselves with the fact that they would have to move ahead in the same way as Western Europe did, i.e., step by step. ...

The political disintegration of the USSR occurred at the very beginning of the transition from such a command-distributive model of economic management to the market model. Therefore, the economic space of the former USSR divided between the fifteen sovereigns began to be managed not through one centralized mechanism, but through fifteen mechanisms smaller, more decentralized, but of the same type as the former one. A large part of industry, transport and other infrastructure, and even a certain portion of agriculture in the CIS, still remains under state ownership (see table). Also, the newborn independent countries cannot ensure the functioning of their economies in any other way but through the centralized redistribution of the resources under their management. And since the latter are rather limited, there is no other way out but to establish strict governmental control over all these resources, limitation of their loss to neighboring republics, and concentration of the national monetary and fiscal sphere in their hands.

Thus, despite the declaration of intent to preserve the “transparency” of the borders, immediately after the division of all-union property there occurred an unstoppable spontaneous formation of fifteen closed economic organisms, genetically repeating the basic traits of the Soviet economic model. This barrier to the path of reintegration will remain until denationalization of the economy reaches a level characteristic for the majority of the developed countries which have a market economy....

The third barrier arises from the fact that, for a number of historical and political reasons, the transition to the market model of economic management in the various countries of the CIS is taking place at different rates. This means that, for a certain period, the post-Soviet economic space turns into a mosaic of different variants of transitional models of economic management. This circumstance erects invisible barriers between the CIS states. However, aside from this, such asymmetric transition to a market economy gives rise, as we have already said, to a flow of goods to countries where domestic prices are higher. And with the introduction of national currencies or quasi-currencies, this stimulus is coupled with factors associated with uncomplementary market exchange rates. All this forces the young states to shut themselves off from one another.

The fourth medium-range obstacle is associated with the changes in price structure after elimination of state control. Bringing domestic prices closer to world prices exposes the irrationality of certain former interrepublic movements of goods. These trading patterns have been disrupted, and often it is necessary to seek new partners beyond the boundaries of the CIS, which leads to a relative reduction in trade for each former republic, and the CIS as a whole. In the future, a reorientation of trade will be supported by the need for resource- and energy-saving technologies required to deal with increased costs of power and raw materials, whose prices were artificially low in the USSR. The need for buying such technologies will demand a partial reorientation of the foreign trade relations of the CIS countries to the West, and this factor will indirectly hinder the process of reintegration for a prolonged period of time. This will last until a new balanced structure of foreign trade relations between the CIS countries is established, and until a new model of international export specialization for each of them has been formed.

Along with the above-named medium-range factors, the process of reintegration will be opposed by one other circumstance of a deeper, structural character. The insufficiently developed and weakly diversified economy of the Central Asian and Transcaucasus countries of the CIS, as well as Moldova will hinder the process. The sectoral structure of the economy as a whole, by the level of industrial production, the level of labor productivity, and the social well-being of the majority of the population, position these countries closer to the developing states than to the developed industrial countries of the West....

The division of the post-Soviet economic space into a relatively developed industrial center, and a developing periphery, becomes even more valid when examining the industrial structure of the CIS countries. High technology sectors of machine building, electronics, electrical technology, and the chemical industry, which are usually associated with the development and production of arms, are concentrated in Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine. Certain types of machine building are present also in the Transcaucasus, Uzbekistan, and other countries of the periphery. However, the main industries on the periphery are the mining and primary processing of mineral resources, food, and light industrial products.

At the same time, at that stage of economic development when agriculture, the mining industry, and the “lower stages” of processing dominate, national economies are not so much complementary as they are competing partners. There is little basis for any broad and effective division of labor between them.

Therefore, from a trade perspective, the developing and even the moderately developed countries may remain indifferent to one another for a long time, while between the highly developed countries there is actively increasing mutual attraction.

In 1990, for example, the volume of per capita intraregional exports among the countries of Western Europe comprised $3,121, while the per capita volume of West European exports to third countries was $1,250. For Latin America, the amounts were $412 and $262, respectively, and for Africa-$6.50 and $110. In Western Europe, the ratio of intra- and extra-regional trade is approximately 2.5:1; in Latin America, 1:6.4; and in Africa, 1:17.9. It is quite obvious that the less developed the national economies, the less their economic interest in one another, and the more actively they seek partners from among the number of industrially developed states.

For the CIS, this means that its least developed member states are not inclined toward broad economic cooperation with each other. They may be “attracted” either by a more developed center of the former USSR (the European part of Russia, the Urals, Ukraine, Belarus), or by the even more developed West. And in fact, statistics show that almost all the CIS countries are oriented in their exports toward Russia, to a lesser degree toward Ukraine, and (with the exception of Azerbaijan and Tajikistan) export only an insignificant portion of their products outside the boundaries of the CIS. Aside from the higher technical-economic level of development of Russia, the huge volume of its domestic market is, of course, also well-known here. Interstate trade among the Central Asian countries is not great. For four of them it does not exceed 20 to 25 percent of the total volume of exports, and only for Kyrgyzstan does it reach 32 percent. Moreover, interstate trade among the three Transcaucasus states is quite negligible-not more than 4 percent (in some measure this is determined by the military conflicts in the region; however, even in peacetime the relative share of intraregional exchange was very small here).

Under such conditions, the tangible integrational processes among the CIS countries referred to here as “the periphery” are improbable in the foreseeable future. Even if the coordination of their economic policy outlined after the Tashkent meeting of 4 January 1993 by leaders of the five countries of Central Asia were to grow, say, into the creation of a Central Asian free trade zone, the real effect would be rather insignificant. The experience of most of the “free trade zones,” “customs unions” and “common markets” in the developing world speaks in favor of such a conclusion. The interstate trade among the ASEAN [Association of Southeast Asian Nations] countries, which in 1960 comprised 21.7 percent of their total exports, by 1970 had declined to 14.7 percent; in 1980 it did not exceed 17.8 percent, and in 1990-18.5 percent.

Thus, it is reasonable to conclude that the integrational process on a multilateral basis in the CIS zone still does not meet any favorable objective prerequisites. No matter how important the political decisions adopted in this regard may be, it is unlikely that they will go beyond the realm of good intentions. Meanwhile, however, real multilateral integration of the national economies of the CIS will progress at an extremely slow rate. It is true that fairly adequate material prerequisites exist here for one-sided integration according to the “heliocentric” model, when each of the less developed countries of the Commonwealth will be “drawn” ever more strongly to its developed nucleus, and primarily to Russia. The tendency toward such development was clearly outlined already in the first years after the disintegration of the USSR. Here, however, much will depend on how greatly Russia itself and its economic subjects are interested in strengthening and intensifying economic ties with the countries of the post-Union periphery. There is no unanimous answer to this question. There are a number of economic and political conditions in support of such interest, among which, in particular, is the threat for Russia of losing prospective markets in the CIS countries. In evaluating this circumstance, we must not, however, forget that Russia itself is a less developed country in comparison with the leading states of the West. And therefore, due to this objective reality, Russia is more interested in economic rapprochement with the West, and not with the peripheral partners of the CIS.

The practical experience of recent years shows that the tendency toward a reorientation of Russia's trade relations with the "far abroad" is intensifying. While the specific weight of the latter in the overall volume of Russian exports in 1989 comprised 33.3 percent, and in 1990-35.5 percent, in 1991 it reached 41.2 percent, and in 1992-52.5 percent, in 1993- 60.7 percent, and in the first quarter of 1994-75.7 percent. At the same time, within the CIS itself Russian exports are ever more greatly concentrated on the countries of its developed nucleus, i.e., on Ukraine and Belarus. In 1990, their share of Russian exports to the current Commonwealth was 57.2 percent, in 1991—61.3 percent, and in the first quarter of 1994-already 70.8 percent. An analogous tendency is observed in the changes of the geographical structure of Russian imports. The peripheral countries of the CIS are becoming ever more marginal partners of Russia. Therefore, their propensity toward integration with it risks being a case of unrequited love. And this would mean a slowing of the process of reintegration within the CIS economic space, even in its one-sided “heliocentric” variant...

Many multilateral government agencies of a sectoral character have been formed within the CIS, including the Eurasian Coal and Metal Association. Thus, as is customarily said, “much work has been done.”

Nevertheless, many leaders of the Commonwealth countries admit that the institutional system of the CIS operates most ineffectively. By the summer of 1994, around 500 different multilateral documents had been signed within the scope of the CIS, but most of them are not being realized in practical application. And there is nothing sensational about this. The same situation is characteristic for most international organizations of an integrational character which operate in the developing regions. The main reason for such ineffectiveness is also clear: The economic conditions for real merging of the national economies have not yet matured.

Not understanding this, or not giving this factor proper attention, certain leaders of the CIS countries are striving to correct the situation by means of intensifying the supranational institutions of the Commonwealth. The repeated initiatives by Kazakhstan President N. Nazarbaev have become particularly notable in this regard. Back in September of 1992, he proposed creating administrative rather than coordinating structures of the CIS, which would in fact turn it into a confederation. In March 1994, he spoke out with the idea of transforming the Commonwealth into a Eurasian Union, and at the beginning of June he publicized a detailed plan for such a union. It proposes the creation of supranational power structures (a council of heads of state and governments, and EAC [Eurasian Union] Parliament, a Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, and an Interstate Executive Committee), which would make decisions by a qualified 4/5 majority of votes, under the condition that each of the countries would have one vote. These decisions would be binding for the member countries. It is presumed that this would make it possible to create the legal and organizational prerequisites for intensifying integration toward economic, currency, and political union, and for the creation of a unified defense space.

N. Nazarbaev's initiative was met with suspicion on the part of most of the leaders of the CIS countries, although it did find support among certain Russian politicians. It seems, however, that in spite of all the good intentions which lie at the basis of such an initiative, the idea of a Eurasian confederation, at least for the immediate period, does not have any chance for success-primarily due to the above-named objective economic reasons. These are supplemented by important political reasons-subjective as well as objective.

Among the subjective ones is the “anti-imperialist syndrome,” which has been deeply imprinted in the national memory of the people. Any steps in the direction of confederation are perceived by a significant part of the population of the peripheral CIS countries as a tendency toward restoration of Russian hegemony. Even if the current leaders of these countries understand the ephemeral nature of such suspicions, they can still not ignore them, if for no other reason but that the nationalist opposition will use such attitudes for strengthening its influence and for seizing power. In such a political atmosphere, it is difficult to expect success for the idea of the Eurasian confederation.

There is also an important objective political obstacle in the path of strengthening the supranational power structures of the CIS. This is the huge imbalance of forces in favor of Russia. It accounts for 59 percent of the GNP, 91 percent of oil drilling, 77 percent of the natural gas, 58 percent of the smelted steel, two-thirds of the machine building production, and the overwhelming portion of the scientific-technical and military potential of the Commonwealth. Already because of this, in the CIS, as at one time in CMEA [Council for Mutual Economic Assistance], there objectively exists the danger that the interests of the “younger brothers” will be subordinated to the interests of “big brother.” After all, what is beneficial to Russia is ultimately also beneficial to the CIS as a whole. But not everything that is necessary for Russia or even for the Commonwealth as a whole corresponds to the interests of individual member states at a given moment. Therefore, for them it is extremely important that decisions of the organs of the Economic Union be adopted unanimously. In other words, each state must have the right of veto. Only in this way can they guarantee for themselves their own individual key to the start-up mechanism of this union, and guarantee their own economic security. However, it is specifically this principle that is fixed in Article 23 of the CIS Charter, and repeated word for word in Article 27 of the Treaty on Development of an Economic Union: “Decisions of the Council of the Heads of State and the Council of the Heads of Governments are adopted through general agreement-consensus. Any state may declare its lack of interest in one question or another, which should not be viewed as an obstacle to adoption of the decision.”

It is characteristic that this principle is copied almost word for word from the Charter of CMEA, whose members also strived to safeguard themselves from the dictate of the USSR. However, such a procedure, which is suitable to the members of the association, is extremely ineffective for the common cause because any collective decision may be torpedoed by any one country which is dissatisfied with it. CMEA spent years “hammering out” one or another form of cooperation, but suffered from the same problem.

The European Community also spent a long time languishing in a similar procedure. It took three decades to almost entirely edge out the principle of consensus from the practice of the EC Council.

However, we cannot forget that direct analogies are incorrect here. After all, a relative equilibrium of forces existed within the EC from the very beginning. In 1958, the share of the FRG [Federal Republic of Germany] comprised 36.2 percent of the total GNP of the six EC countries, of France-32.8 percent, and of Italy—8.5 percent. Under these conditions, the small participant countries could maneuver within this triangle, supporting that “angle” of it which was closest to them in each specific case. With the entry of Great Britain, the balance of powers in the EC was strengthened even more. Today, however, the situation has changed, and the unified Germany has become clearly dominant in the Community. However, the integration here had already gone so far that this circumstance cannot stop the process.

If Germany had been unified already in the late 1950s, it is unlikely that the institutional system of the EC would have taken on its present form, and the integration process could hardly have gone as far as it has by the present time. In the CIS, however, the imbalance between economic and political forces is a huge obstacle in the path not only of confederation, but also of an economic union of fully sovereign states. And this creates significant additional complications for reintegration of the post-Soviet economic space.

Thus, a new stage in post-Soviet history has begun. The pendulum of history has swung in the direction of unification of the economic and political efforts of the CIS states, which had initially been intoxicated with independence. Both in Moscow and in Kiev, as well as in the other capitals of the states entering into the Commonwealth, the voices of sober pragmatists are sounding ever louder, becoming capable of rising above the nationalistic emotions. Under the pressure of the problems which have crashed down upon them, the leaders of the peripheral Commonwealth countries are even ready in some measure to ignore the “anti-imperialist syndrome.” Most of the state leaders here obviously believe that the problem of reintegration of the post-Soviet space lies in the sphere of political freedom, and that everything here comes down to a search for the correct decisions, which take into consideration the attitude of the broad popular masses. After all, it is no accident that N. Nazarbaev proposes to launch the construction of the Eurasian Union with the passage of referenda in the CIS countries.

However, we believe that such logic is based on deep delusion. It loses sight of a most important circumstance. In the three to four years which have elapsed, powerful forces which determine the subsequent course of events have gone into action-economic regularities. Today the decisive role is played not by leaders and political parties, not by conceptions and programs, but by inherent economic processes taking place in each country which is a successor of the USSR....

7.37 Guidelines for CIS Economic Committee Agreed

Interfax, 8 September 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Based on what the author of the preceding article said, the reader can better understand just how impotent the Interstate Economic Committee probably will be. The fact that some decisions will inevitably be based on “economic weight” of the Member States means that Russia will dominate the Committee, and that most other Member States will ignore its decisions, due to the “principle of consensus.”

The delegations of twelve CIS member nations agreed on the text for guidelines for the Interstate Economic Committee. Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksandr Shokhin told journalists that this was the main result of the CIS Consultative and Coordinating Committee (CCC) meeting held in Moscow Wednesday.

Shokhin, who chairs the CCC, said that his committee had come to the conclusion that the CIS Economic Union's commission, an auxiliary mechanism rather than a body of authority, had to be replaced by an agency to which CIS member nations could delegate some of their powers.

Decisions will be made in the Interstate Economic Committee through straightforward democratic procedures such as consensus and “qualified majority” and by the economic weight of the member states, Shokhin said.

Shokhin is convinced that if the ISEC is set up soon, it will handle numerous issues that now encumber the agenda of the Council of Heads of State, the Council of Heads of Government and CCC which will focus on the current issues in bilateral and multilateral relations.

He said that the CIS has now reached the stage when the Commonwealth is capable not only of adopting documents but also of tackling specific issues.

7.38 Sangheli Supports Interstate Economic Committee
Interfax, 8 September 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Moldova supports the creation of an Interstate Economic Committee as a coordinating and executive body of the CIS economic union, and the adoption of an agreement on a single payment space, Moldovan Prime Minister Andrey Sangheli told Interfax before his departure to Moscow to attend the meeting of the Council of the CIS Prime Ministers, which is to take place 9 September.

He also intends to speak on the consequences of the natural disasters which hit Moldova in summer.

Reliable sources told Interfax that at their meeting, CIS prime ministers are expected to adopt an appeal to all CIS countries to render aid to Moldova to help it overcome the aftermath of the drought, hurricane, and torrential rains in the summer. The total damage is estimated at 1,200 million leu (4 leu = $1).

7.39 Chernomyrdin Views Proposed CIS Economic

Body

Vladimir Taranov and Gennadiy Ezhov ITAR-TASS, 9 September 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

The Council of the Heads of Government of the CIS countries today agreed to set up an Interstate Economic Committee [IEC] [Mezhgosudarstvennyy Ekonomicheskiy Komitet-MEK] within the framework of a CIS Economic Union-the first body within the Commonwealth with distributive functions. Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin said this at a news conference at the President Hotel. He stressed that a final decision on setting up the IEC would require the approval of the Council of CIS Heads of State, which is scheduled for the beginning of October this year. So far, the agreement to set up the IEC at government level has been signed by all those participating in the council with the exception of Turkmenistan and Azerbaijan, which will work on their positions before the meeting of the Heads of State.

“The appearance of an IEC,” the Russian prime minister emphasized, “will make it possible to work on the adoption of decisions within the CIS framework before they are carried out, which has not, by and large, been the case in the Commonwealth thus far.” At the initial stage, the IEC’s basic functions will be performed by the CIS Consultative and Coordinating Committee. It is proposed to create an IEC presidium from the CIS governments operating in the Coordinating and Consultative Committee and to create the collegium on a permanent basis.

It is proposed to locate the IEC headquarters in Moscow. Over fifty Commonwealth bodies operating today will be considerably reduced once the IEC has been created, so that the CIS structure does not give at the seams, Viktor Chernomyrdin observed. This will be done, basically, in order to save money. Important decisions will be taken in the IEC by consensus; the others by a majority of 80 percent of the votes, where Russia is allocated 50 percent of their total number.

Turning to the question of the creation at today's sitting of CIS Heads of Government of a Payments Union within the framework of the Commonwealth, Viktor Chernomyrdin said Russia will not in the immediate future choose to amalgamate its monetary system with that of the Republic of Belorussia [Belarus]. The republic will have to bring its economy up to Russia's level. Russia will also be cautious, Viktor Chernomyrdin said, in its approach to the question of removing customs barriers with Commonwealth countries. "We were not the first to introduce them here, but today the situation has changed too significantly. A great deal now goes not only from Russia, but also through Russia, for example, drugs and weapons," the Russian prime minister stressed.

Viktor Chernomyrdin said the discussion of the other items on the agenda of the Council of Heads of State session (there were more than twenty of them in all) was constructive, but not very easy. The only package of agreements giving rise to no objections was, he emphasized, the documents on the joint marking of the fiftieth anniversary of victory in the Great Patriotic War....

7.40 Kiev Against CIS Common Strategic Space

UNIAR, 9 September 1994 [FBIS Translation]

As a UNIAR correspondent reported, Russia's Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, while opening a regular session of the Council of CIS Heads of Government, first and foremost reminded that "the European Economic Community has been taking shape for thirty-five years. We do not have so much time, therefore, there should be a different pace," he pointed out.

One of the main issues considered in Moscow is the issue on setting up an Interstate Economic Committee (MEK). This structure is endowed with suprastate functions, although, according to Mr. Chernomyrdin, countries should themselves determine exactly which issues will be within MEK's competence.

Ukraine's delegation expressed certain reservations concerning the system of voting within the framework of the MEK. Depending on the importance of the issue, the authors of the draft proposed four systems of voting. To adopt a decision on the most important issues, 80-85 percent of votes at the MEK will be required, other issues are to be resolved through a consensus. Ukraine will have 14 percent of the votes, Russia-50 percent. In the opinion of some Ukrainian experts, Ukraine can refuse to join this or that proposal by the leadership of the MEK, if it wishes to do so. Others believe that the mechanism of defending [Ukraine's] own interests is not clear enough.

This is why the Ukrainian delegation agrees to signing the agreement on setting up the Interstate Economic Committee with the following reservation: The term of the validity of the proposed mechanism of voting should be limited by the end of 1996.

The Ukrainian delegation refused to sign in any form the agreement “On the payments union” because no system of payments is available as yet in the countries-members of the MEK, it believes.

Among the issues considered at the meeting there were issues of military and technical cooperation. The Ukrainian delegation came out against the formation of a single strategic space and spoke out for establishing bilateral relations. As Col.-Gen. Ivan Bizhan pointed out in his speech at the meeting, “we believe that Ukraine’s state borders have already been outlined and there is no need to raise the question on common CIS borders.”

The participants in the meeting discussed over twenty issues on the agenda of the session of the heads of government of the CIS member states.

7.41 Special Opinions Voiced on Economic Issues

Vladimir Taranov and Gennadiy Ezhov ITAR-TASS, 9 September 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Azerbaijan, Turkmenistan, and Ukraine expressed special opinions during the debating of two fundamental documents in the economic package of documents at a meeting of the Council of Heads of the Government of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) on Friday. These are the agreements on setting up an Interstate Economic Committee and a Payments Union in the framework of the CIS Economic Union.

Azerbaijan’s Prime Minister Suret Guseynov told ITAR- TASS after the first stage of the discussion that he will not sign either of these agreements on Friday as the Azeri parliament is not yet ready to approve of the delegation of some supranational functions of economic management to an Interstate Economic Committee, the proposed executive body of the Economic Union of the CIS.

Turkmenistan, while not rejecting the idea of an Interstate Economic Committee, asks for a month of deferment, until CIS Heads of State meet in October, for additional debating of the matter in the republic. Nevertheless Turkmenistan's delegation is prepared to sign the agreement on forming a Payments Union today.

Ukraine's attitude is more complicated. Ukrainian Prime Minister Vitaliy Masol told ITAR-TASS that, in his opinion, a Payments Union should be formed gradually because it provides free conversion of national currencies and their market quotation. It would be expedient to form a Payments Union by concluding bilateral agreements between the republics. "For free quotation of the Ukrainian coupon, Ukraine should have a stabilization fund, a gold reserve in the amount it does not have at present," Masol said.

Ukraine's special stand on forming an Interstate Economic Committee is determined by its associate membership in the Economic Union, Igor Mityukov, Ukrainian Deputy Premier for the economy, told ITAR-TASS. He said Ukraine does not intend to alter its status in the Economic Union. Mityukov said that if Ukraine signs the agreement on forming an Interstate Economic Committee it will keep associate membership. It will participate in debating only whatever matters it deems necessary. "If the documents on the Interstate Economic Committee and the Payments Union are finally coordinated, taking into account Ukrainian amendments, on Friday, we shall be ready to sign them," the Ukrainian deputy premier said.

The memorandum on the basic trends of integration among the CIS countries was initialed during the first part of the meeting. There have been no special objections. Foreign ministers of Commonwealth countries who held a separate meeting on this matter and defense ministers agreed upon all aspects of the document which is expected to be signed on Friday. Amendments and supplements to the document that have not been submitted to it within a month will be agreed upon and attached to the signed text of the document as supplements.

7.42 Economic Union Augurs Reintegration of CIS States

Anna Ostapchuk Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 7 October 1994
[FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The following document was chosen to illustrate the Russian parliament's intense involvement in the CIS reintegration question. The Belarusian and Ukrainian parliaments have joined in on the issue of formulating "financial-industrial groups" (FIGs). If these factions of their respective parliaments were able jointly to influence their state's legislation, reintegration could become more than wishful thinking.

The creation of an interfactional deputies group, the Economic Union, including representatives of both houses of the Russian parliament, was announced yesterday evening. It includes nineteen people representing various groupings of the Federation Council united by one objective: to begin work on the economic reintegration of the former USSR countries "from below," by forming transnational financialindustrial groups. By 6 October similar groups had been created in Belorussia [Belarus], Ukraine, and Kazakhstan. The minimum program of all these four entities is to work out and get through their legislatures corresponding laws on financial-industrial groups.

The creation of a structure that tasks itself with coordinating the reintegration efforts of the legislative branches of the four CIS republics is unprecedented. No fewer than several hundred documents have been adopted on the subject of economic integration within the CIS framework. Unfortunately, however, it has to be admitted that so far they are not working. An economic union on Commonwealth territory has not materialized.

“It has not happened because it was envisioned as an association of bosses, not producers,” Nikolay Gonchar, initiator of the new integration model and chairman of the Federation Council’s Budget and Finances Committee, believes. According to him, for real reintegration to begin, a common legal field is needed. Quite obviously, it can be created in two ways: either by adopting uniform laws (while there is no common legislature) or by working out coordinated laws-analyzing and adjusting current laws and trying to bring new laws as close together as possible in the drafting stage. It is not hard to see that the second path appears to be the most realistic.

According to Gonchar, the interfactional Economic Union group includes deputies who share the following theses: preservation of an industry-based economy is the major prerequisite for Russia’s survival; it can be helped only by massive nonstate investments; investment will begin only when production is integrated, and only integration will restore it; the model of integration through financial-industrial groups is recognized as quite effective.

The interfactional group does not encroach on the structure of factions. Nikolay Gonchar said that “if a faction is categorically against integration, its representatives will not join us.” The Economic Union is essentially a working group for coordinating different interests represented in parliament and for promoting the ideas of economic integration. In Ukraine, the statement on the Economic Union was signed by twenty-one deputies; in Belarus, by sixteen; in Kazakhstan, twenty-one; and in Russia, nineteen. Russian parliamentarians sharing this position include Aleksandr Pochinok, Yuriy Yakovlev, Vladimir Semago, Yuriy Boldyrev, Aleksandr Belyakov, Oleg Ochin, and Sergey Shakhray (in all, nine deputies of the State Duma and ten members of the Federation Council).

The first law drafted by the Economic Union with the aim of forming a common legal space is the Law On Financial- Industrial Groups. The draft has been sent to the Supreme Soviets of Ukraine, Belarus, and Kazakhstan.

7.43 Moscow Seen Regaining Former Authority in CIS

Sergey Parkhomenko Segodnya, 22 October 1994
[FBIS Translation], Excerpt

[Passage omitted.] The sixteenth summit since the CIS's inception was attended by-all heads of state without a single exception. It was organized in Moscow without frills, in a modest and businesslike manner. Everything has returned once again according to cycle: in the absence of more serious business to attend to, the big boss summoned lower-level clerks for yet another briefing to give them guidelines and chart the prospects-well, of course, also to hear their views as behooves a democrat and to turn down quietly their objections and proposals.

Summing up the talks that lasted nearly three hours, Russian President Boris Yeltsin said at a news conference yesterday that participants in the meeting unanimously approved an agreement on setting up the Interstate Economic Committee (IEC). “Not all participants in the meeting demonstrated a full unanimity of views. Not all states are ready to be equally involved in the Economic Union,” the Russian Federation leader conceded, stressing in the same breath that the draft of the IEC constituent document was “passed without amendments, right in its initial version.” No one voted against it. Leonid Kuchma, who for the first time attended the talks as Ukrainian head of state, deserved particular praise: “The situation was entirely different from what it was under the former president. Today we did not have arguments with Ukraine on a single question.” [Passage omitted]

Despite the Belarusian president’s protests, it was decided to set up the IEC head office in Moscow. In Boris Yeltsin’s opinion, the key argument was the availability of “experienced specialists” on interstate cooperation in the Russian capital. It seems unlikely, however, that leaders of the sovereign countries will be delighted by the possible comeback of Comrade Baybakov’s [a Soviet Gosplan chief] time- and battle-tested old guard (which, as is known from the ancient wheeze, has “an immense destructive capacity”) to full-time decision-making activity. It seems rather that another argument of the Russian president held sway: in his opening address he proposed that if any complications or delays arise over the creation of the IEC, its powers be temporarily turned over to the Russian Economic Cooperation Ministry. Apparently, the prospect that national economies will be simply subordinated to a Russian ministry did produce the desired impression.

Journalists who attended the news conference also were given the opportunity to form their opinions about the tone and style of the talks that had just finished. When asked by a correspondent of a Tajik newspaper about the prospects for recreating the ruble zone. Boris Yeltsin responded that he himself has “always supported the idea,” but locally there are—so far—some officials who oppose the introduction of a single currency “with whom we will fight and simply replace them.” [passage omitted]

What is it that comes to mind in this regard? Ah, yes: “Pluralism is essential for us—there cannot be any disagreement.”

7.44 Russian Newspapers Comment on CIS Summit

ITAR-TASS, 22 October 1994 [FBIS Translation]

The creation of the Interstate Economic Committee became a feature event of the regular session of the Council of CIS Heads of State, Rossiyskaya Gazeta reported today. For the first time in the history of the new commonwealth an institution with controlling, distributing, and executive functions has been created. Actually, it is the firstling of the supranational structure, which will take decisions on some matters, mandatory for all the CIS member states.

Delovoy Mir carries an article by its political observer entitled “Economic Integration Speeded Up in CIS.” The newspaper stressed that problems of the integrated development of the new commonwealth was in the focus of attention of the CIS leaders. Their solution is connected with pursuing an active policy, aimed gradually turning the CIS into an effective alliance of sovereign states. The session discussed and adopted the memorandum entitled “guidelines of integration development of the Commonwealth of Independent States.” The development of effective economic cooperation, which is the main condition for overcoming the crisis and ensuring the economic direction of integration. According to the memorandum, it has become evident that it is necessary to improve the efficiency of the CIS working bodies and to create a mechanism for cooperation inside the new commonwealth. The necessity emerged to give supranational powers to some of those bodies. It is for this reason that the council decided to create the Interstate Economic Committee-a permanent working body of the economic alliance, whose task is to ensure the effective work of alliance and the rational development of integration in the CIS.

The session discussed a number of military matters. The priority task in this respect is the formation of the collective security system, the observer wrote.

The session of the council may become a breakthrough in the process of economic integration of the CIS member states, Kommersant-Daily wrote. The results of the session are unprecedented: The agreements on the creation of the payment alliance and on the setting up of the Interstate Economic Committee were adopted unanimously. Participants in the session reserved the right to interpret those agreements in their own way. President Yeltsin said, however, that “a stop has been put in the discussion of the need for economic integration.” Progress was achieved in the settlement of some political problems. By its structure the economic integration of the CIS member states is approaching the highest world standards. The same question remains: In what way will the signatories to the agreements behave during their implementation? Now the agreements reached by the presidents leave much room for one's own interpretation of the commitments assumed. The difference between relations inside the group of independent states and show-off programs is that in the first case the quest for solutions is impossible without taking into consideration conflicting interests. Anyway, integration has been given a start.

Yeltsin said at a final press conference that the creation of the Interstate Economic Committee, the need for which was discussed on more than one occasion at previous meetings of leaders of former USSR republics, was the main result of the session, reported Nezavisimaya Gazeta. The creation of the committee has become a reality. Besides, a decision was made on the future functioning of the payments and customs unions of the CIS member states. The Interstate Economic Committee was created in line with the best traditions of "commonwealth cooperation." All the CIS member states agreed that the committee was a necessity. It was one of the few unanimous decisions in the short history of the CIS. However, it is the presidents and governments of the CIS member states who will decide in what way each particular country will take part in its work and what powers it will delegate to the committee. Thus, Nezavisimaya Gazeta continues, the Interstate Economic Committee has little chance to become a truly working structure. It is more probable that it will be an auxiliary body for those who wish to avail themselves of its services.

A high-flown and elaborate diplomatic protocol, which was typical of the initial period of CIS history, has become a thing of the past, according to Segodnya. The Moscow session was unemotional, modest, and businesslike.

The problem of the creation of an Euroasian alliance, included in the agenda on the initiative of Nursultan Nazarbaev, again sparked a lively discussion. The idea was discussed from a theoretical point of view, because most of the CIS leaders who attended the session believe that the CIS has not yet exhausted its potentialities. In the opinion of Krasnaya Zvezda, the creation of the Interstate Economic Committee may give a new impetus to the development of the CIS.

7.45 Nazarbaev on Setting Up Interstate Economic Committee

From the "Presidential Bulletin" feature compiled by Nikolay Zharebtsov and Andrey Petrovskiy; and edited by Vladimir Shishlin
Interfax, 24 October 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev believes that the setting up of an Interstate Economic Committee [IEC], the first transnational body in the CIS, is evidence that the Commonwealth is very much alive. He said that this step fit the idea of a Eurasian Union. In Nazarbaev's view, the IEC could be chaired by somebody not coming from the old structures but a well-known personality in the CIS, such as Grigoriy Yavlinskiy (IF Note: a leader of the Yavlinskiy-Boldyrev-Lukin group in the Russian State Duma, a well-known economist and a coauthor of the Treaty on Economic Community of the former USSR's republics in 1991).

Even though the CIS summit only took note of the Eurasian Union project, its ideas have played and will play a significant role in the integration of the Commonwealth member nations, Nazarbaev thought.

7.46 Chyhir on Results of Moscow CIS Summit

From the “Presidential Bulletin” feature compiled by Nikolay Zherebtsov and Andrey Petrovskiy; and edited by Vladimir Shishlin

Interfax, 25 October 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

At a press conference on Monday evening in Minsk, head of the Cabinet of Ministers Mikhail Chyhir expressed his opinion saying that “one should not demand immediate results from the agreement on creation of the Interstate Economic Committee (IEC) signed by heads of CIS states.” “This supranational body has no leadership yet but it must work on a permanent basis,” he said.

“However, having signed this document, the presidents have given their private guarantee that the agreement will function,” Chyhir noted.

He expressed his conviction that the IEC would not infringe upon national interests of CIS states. In his opinion, this body will assist each republic “in testing the integration process on a scale which it deems appropriate.”

Chyhir reassured listeners that the IEC is an organization which controls and manages, it will primarily be busy with transnational sectoral issues. Among them Chyhir mentioned power engineering, communications, and transport.

Chyhir noted that in the course of his meeting with Russian Premier Viktor Chernomyrdin in Moscow they reached an agreement that economic cooperation between Russia and Belarus would deepen irrespective of the results of integration processes taking place within the Commonwealth.

Commenting on the proposal of Belarusian President Aleksandr Lukashenka to station the IEC headquarters in Minsk, Chyhir expressed his doubt that the republic “will be able to tow this burden.” He pointed out that there would inevitably appear problems related to transport, communication, accommodation of the committee’s employees if the IEC were located in Minsk. “Even if we allocate apartments, highly qualified specialists would hardly agree to come to Minsk,” he said....

The agreement on a Payments Union signed by the heads of CIS states is necessary for mutual accounts, Chyhir said. He called the creation of an interstate bank, the work on which was suspended due to the absence of large mutual projects, a practical move for implementing this agreement. Chyhir said that the information stating that Belarus has withdrawn its share of capital from the bank under creation is invalid.

“Of course, the bank will not work within the next half a year. But there is a need for its creation in the future,” he indicated.

7.47 Yeltsin Message to Interstate Economic Committee Presidium

Interfax, 18 November 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Russian President Boris Yeltsin has sent a message of greetings to the participants in the first session of the Presidium of the Interstate Economic Committee which is to open in Moscow on 19 November, the presidential press service announced on Friday.

As the chairman of the Council of CIS Heads of State, Yeltsin expressed the conviction that it was a “remarkable event in the life of the CIS.” The beginning has been laid for the work of a body which possesses great powers and which is expected to set the mechanism of the Economic Union into motion, says Yeltsin’s message. The immediate task, the message goes on to say, is to establish a Customs and Payments Unions, and to create conditions for the transition to a common market of goods, services, capital and labor resources.

Yeltsin believes that “favorable conditions have been created for the integration of the CIS countries.” He also expressed confidence that the Interstate Economic Committee would become an efficient instrument for strengthening the CIS.

7.48 Russian Minister on Economic Union Aim

Interview by Aleksandr Zolotarev Rossiyskie Vesti, 8 December 1994 [FBIS Translation]

[Interview with Marat Khusnutdinov, Russian Federation Minister for Cooperation with CIS Member States, by Aleksandr Zolotarev. ]

[Zolotarev] Marat Khayrutdinovich, what does the CIS integration program adopted in October represent?

[Khusnutdinov]: It consists of not one but several documents. They are the memorandum “The Main Directions of the Development of Integration in the Commonwealth of Independent States” and the “Long-Term Plan for Development of CIS Integration.” They were adopted as “one package,” as they complement one another. The memorandum contains basic agreements on the aims of integration and ways of moving toward it. The Long-Term Plan sets out for perhaps the first time concrete measures, indicating specific time limits and the people responsible for their implementation.

The plan did not arise out of nothing. It is built on the fairly solid legal contractual basis created earlier. You only have to recall the treaty on an Economic Union, the agreements on the formation of a free trade zone as the first stage of a customs union, the documents on a payments union, cooperation in the field of investments activities, and efforts to facilitate the development of coproduction, and so on. Several of those adopted earlier are now no longer in force. For example, the introduction of national currencies in the CIS states “repealed” the agreements on forming a single ruble zone.

I would like to express my satisfaction that, for the first time in the CIS republics' as yet short life, favorable conditions have appeared not only for normalizing but for expanding multilateral ties among them. So we have every reason for talking about the beginning of a new phase in the development of the CIS states' integration.

[Khusnutdinov]: It is likely to be difficult to give a concrete schedule. You see, we have formulated a plan to organize effective economic cooperation and the gradual formation of an Economic Union, as well as cooperation in the humanitarian and social spheres and in the sphere of human rights. Add to that the formation of a security system and the implementation of the idea collective peacekeeping for the Commonwealth states, as well as joint measures to guarantee the security of their external borders.

As you see, there are various tasks which will be carried out as we become ready to do so. By the end of this year a draft agreement should have been produced on a Customs Union and in the first half of 1995-a draft blueprint and plan of action to form a common market for goods, services, capital, and manpower. Draft agreements for the formation of a currency union will be ready by mid-1998.

[Zolotarev]: Are any steps being taken to that end, or is everything as yet limited to discussions?

[Khusnutdinov]: Practical work is, of course, being carried out for the purpose of implementing the agreements signed. Here are some examples. You know that there is an agreement on the formation of a Payments Union. The Ministry for Cooperation with the CIS States and the Bank of Russia are holding talks on concluding the necessary bilateral agreements on direct action with those states interested in bringing the union into being. Models for these agreements have been produced.

A start has been made on forming the future common market's production infrastructure: Work is being carried out on the formation and development of transnational associations. At the end of March 1994 Russia and Kazakhstan came to an agreement on the principles for creating Russian- Kazakh financial-industrial groups. Similar agreements with Ukraine and Belarus are being prepared. The formation of such groups is being organized on the basis of intergovernmental agreements.

In particular, schemes are being examined to form a financial-industrial group from the "Gazprom" Russian joint-stock company and the "Kazakhgaz" holding company, to set up the "Mezhdunarodnyye Aviamotory" financial-industrial group with Ukraine, and to organize a Russian-Kirghiz [Kyrgyz] financial-industrial group to be called "Roskyrgyzinvest." From May of this year a Coordinating Council for Problems of Transnational Structures has been operating on a permanent footing at the Ministry for Cooperation with the CIS States. What also should be pointed out are the joint projects in the areas of investment, scientific and technical cooperation, and the deepening of cooperative and direct ties between enterprises.

and multifaceted activities?

[Khusnutdinov]: There is no single coordinating body. All the Commonwealth's statutory bodies are working in this area. As far as the future is concerned, executors for each of the measures planned have been identified. They include the Council of Foreign Ministers, the Council of Defense Ministers, the Collective Security Council, the Permanent Consultative Commission for Peacekeeping Activities, the Councils of the Leaders of Foreign Economic Departments and the Customs Services, the interstate and national banks, the Interstate Industrial Council, the Interstate Scientific and Technical Council, and others.

[Khusnutdinov]: As I have already said, the integration plan envisages specific measures to monitor the progress of the agreements' implementation. But both the Council of Heads of Government and other CIS bodies will deal with this in their sessions.

Clearly, sanctions can be applied to those who do not carry out the decisions adopted. It is, however, necessary to recognize that work on this question has not yet been completed in the Commonwealth. The memorandum notes that a mechanism for cooperation which ensures the implementation of the multilateral agreements is essential, that Commonwealth bodies can make executive decisions including mandatory ones, and that an effective monitoring system is necessary.

[Khusnutdinov]: The Economic Union has a permanent coordinating and executive body in the shape of the IEC, which performs monitorial and administrative functions. Now the whole range of questions pertaining to the socio-economic sphere of cooperation are passing into its jurisdiction. The IEC will also examine questions prepared by the Council of Foreign Ministers, the Council of Defense Ministers, and other Commonwealth bodies, if their resolution entails significant expenditures.

The Committee has been given wide-ranging rights. On a basis of consensus it can adopt decisions on matters of principle concerning the Economic Union's development and on specific economic questions, taking the states' economic potential into consideration. The IEC prepares the most important questions for scrutiny at sessions of the Commonwealth's Council of Heads of Government and Council of Heads of State.

All IEC integration measures directed at forming a common market will one way or another serve to maintain and deepen cooperation between technologically interconnected works. It is expected to play a particularly large role in ensuring the normal functioning of energy systems, transport, communications, gas and oil pipelines, and other facilities and spheres of a transnational nature.

7.49 End to Concessions in Trade Sphere Warned

ITAR-TASS, 9 December 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: As the following article shows, Russia started taking immediate steps to bring problems to a head for the other CIS states, which would create strong pressures for economic reintegration. While the non-Russian states should be held accountable for making interenterprise payments, their economic structuring problems and dependence on Russia (except for energy) were not entirely of their own making. The question of bilateral debts to Russia creates the greatest long-term imbalance within the CIS.

Russia will be forced to introduce the principle of advance payment in trade and economic agreements and contracts for the supply of commodities. In order to resolve debt problems, financial penalties for failure to pay on time will become a mandatory condition of such agreements. This was announced today by Viktor Chernomyrdin, head of the Russian government, when he addressed the meeting of the Council of CIS Heads of Government at the President Hotel in Moscow.

We have gone as far as we can on payments for supplies and cannot make any further concessions, Chernomyrdin notes. This is the umpteenth time we have had to bring up the question of the debts owed to the Russian fuel and energy sector by the CIS countries. The Russian prime minister disclosed that on 1 November 1994 these debts amounted to 7.5 billion rubles [R], and almost $6.6 billion of the total is for gas. Gazprom, Chernomyrdin said, has been forced to raise the question of reducing gas supplies for countries that do not pay.

Chernomyrdin proposed that the Commonwealth give priority to resolving the problem of nonpayments. Let us agree, the Russian prime minister said, that any new questions that come up in 1995 will only receive joint examination if the problems of 1994, connected with debts and nonpayments, are resolved in a positive way.

Referring to credit and monetary relations between the independent states of the Commonwealth, Chernomyrdin said that since the establishment of the CIS, the Russian government had granted state credits to these countries worth the equivalent of $5.6 billion, in order to make it easier for the partners to adjust to the new conditions of economic cooperation.

However, Chernomyrdin went on, we now have to acknowledge that these credits have not only not resolved the problem of nonpayments, but have also exacerbated the debt situation. The settlement of these debts is proceeding extremely unsatisfactorily. We have to bring about a qualitative change to our relationship and put into practice the principle of mutual benefit and the idea that our relations with CIS countries take priority over those with other countries.

7.50 Objectives of Interstate Economic Committee Viewed

Andrey Storch and Gennadiy Ezhov ITAR-TASS, 9 December 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

The main objective of the CIS Interstate Economic Committee (IEC) is to make the CIS's plans and agreements practical, Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin said in an opening address.

The IEC should avoid becoming another speechifying organ thrusting away practical challenges it is expected to handle, Chernomyrdin stressed. There is no point in debating on whether national sovereignty is dented by the IEC, an authority with certain executive functions, the prime minister said.

Chernomyrdin said the IEC is expected to be joined by CIS states which want solutions to issues rather than mere discussions. And this requires the IEC to become a thinktank and an executive center of the CIS.

“We have founded an organization from which we expect much. And its range of responsibilities is quite broad: From rapid management of specific painful problems, such as energy supplies and compliance with agreements, to strategic integration problems,” Chernomyrdin continued.

The prime minister said CIS members expected the IEC to have just these roles when they proposed both coordinating and executive functions for the committee. It is obvious that rights should be jointly delegated to the IEC to provide for its efficient work, Chernomyrdin said.

7.51 Russia, Kazakhstan, Belarus Sign Accord

The Moscow Times, 31 January 1995 [UPI, © 1995 by Independent Press]

The agreement, signed Saturday, envisages unifying trade regimes and customs rules by the second quarter of this year, lifting all mutual trade barriers and eventually creating a Customs Union, which could also include additional former Soviet republics, ITAR-TASS reported.

“We created a strong nucleus for economic union,” Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin said after the signing, which came just after Russia and Kazakhstan pledged to unite their armies.

But economists interviewed Monday said the three nations’ different interests and economic situations, and their disagreements over trade policy with other countries, would derail any attempt to put the pact into practice.

“So far I have a feeling that once again this will just be a piece of paper,” said Yelena Ishenko, an economist in the foreign trade department of the Russian Economics Ministry’s Center for Economic Analysis and Forecasting. “First we need more political coordination; then there can be concrete economic agreements. Now, union with these republics, where who-knows-what is going on, would be suicide,” she said, referring especially to the porous borders with other neighbors.

The pact requires members to unite their economic, monetary, and foreign trade policies. Previous integration agreements, including an attempt to create a ruble zone, have run aground on concerns that member countries’ inflationary monetary policies could undermine the Russian economy.

Another Russian economist, who asked not to be identified, said the three countries would be unlikely to unify their import policies. “Russia has high tariffs on imported cars to protect its car industry. In Kazakhstan, they don’t make cars,” so tariffs are kept low to benefit the consumer.

He said Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev had refused a request by Russia last year to raise tariffs. He said, “We are not going to pay for the welfare of Russian manufacturers to the detriment of Kazakh consumers.”

Russia too does not sound ready to compromise. Russian Customs Committee spokesman Anatoliy Kruglov said recently that Kazakhstan and Belarus would face Russian customs barriers until they adopt Russian customs policies, Kommersant-Daily reported. A top Western economist, who asked to remain anonymous, said that potential for integration today is limited because the former republics “are not at the same stage of political and economic reform.”

He said he suspected most recent integration agreements had been motivated by “nonmarket” concerns, such as popular nostalgia for the Soviet Union.

Some leaders have argued that reintegration would repair economies hit by a sharp decline in interrepublic trade since the Soviet Union collapsed.

A 1994 World Bank study blamed the “precipitous decline” in interrepublic trade from 1990 to 1993 partly on export restraints “at least as severe as those that impede trade with third countries.”

The Russian economist said removing barriers would increase Russia’s exports, but not significantly.

“It would legalize the trade that is going on already,” he said. “The goods that are now going across the steppe would start going down the highway.”

Ishenko said increasing trade would not necessarily increase income for Russia. She said 50 percent of Russian deliveries to former republics were not paid for in the third quarter of 1994-up from 40 percent in the second quarter.

7.52 Ukraine Attends Interstate Economic Committee Session

Radio Ukraine, 11 March 1995 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpt

A session of the presidium of the Interstate Economic Committee [IEC], which was set up by a decision of the CIS heads of state, got under way in Moscow on 10 March. A government delegation from Ukraine, led by Deputy Prime Minister Serhiy Osyka, is taking part in its work. Aleksey Bolshakov, chairman of the IEC presidium and Deputy Prime Minister of the government of the Russian Federation, greeted the participants in the session on behalf of the Government of Russia. He wished them success in achieving the main goal of the Interstate Economic Committee-development and interaction of economies of the CIS member states.

Consideration of a draft agreement on setting up an Interstate Currency Committee [ICC] was among the priority issues at the session of the IEC presidium. The ICC is supposed to promote multilateral cooperation in the field of currency and credit relations, development of forms and methods of coordinating the monetary, credit and currency policies of the signatories to the agreement on setting up a Payments Union of the CIS countries. As is known, Ukraine will join the Payments Union only after its national currency is put into circulation. However, at the current session the delegation of Ukraine submitted a number of fundamental proposals concerning the draft agreement on setting up an Interstate Currency Committee. In particular, these are proposals concerning the procedure of seceding from the ICC, which should be based on internationally recognized principles.

The activities of the International [as heard] Currency Committee will undoubtedly contribute to developing economic cooperation between the CIS countries, bringing their currency procedures closer to each other, speeding up mutual settlements, and regulating the issue of debts. The desire of all the participating sides to build their economic relations on the basis of mutual respect and equality should be regarded as the main factor in this process. The draft agreement on setting up an Interstate Currency Committee will be submitted for the consideration of the Council of the CIS Heads of State.....

7.53 Ukraine Abstains From Joining CIS Customs Union

UNIAN, 11 March 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan have submitted applications to the Interstate Economic Committee seeking admission to the Customs Union. Ukraine did not submit an application to join the Customs Union. Aleksey Bolshakov, deputy head of the government of the Russian Federation and chairman of the Presidium of the Interstate Economic Committee, relayed this news to journalists after the Presidium and the board of the Interstate Economic Committee ended their 10 March session.

At UNIAN's request, Ukraine's Deputy Prime Minister Serhiy Osyka commented on this fact as follows:

"Ukraine supports the idea of setting up the Customs Union in general, but the distance to it should be covered not at a rocket-escape velocity, but at a normal pace." According to him, the agreement on free trade, concluded between Ukraine and the Russian Federation, will contribute to coordinating the fiscal, taxation, and economic functions of the customs borders between the two countries. "The law enforcement and political functions of the customs borders will remain unchanged," Serhiy Osyka pointed out.

In his opinion, the issue of Ukraine's accession to the Customs Union will depend on the effectiveness of free trade between Ukraine and the Russian Federation.

7.54 CIS Governors Criticize "Integration from Above"

Olga Kolotnecha Kommersant-Daily, 14 July 1995
[FBIS Translation]

It seems that phenomenal activity is characteristic not only of some of Russia's regional leaders but also of their colleagues from the former Union republics. Often in their desire to set up direct economic links, the governors even outdo the government. Recent confirmation of this has been provided by a conference of the heads of twenty-seven oblasts of Ukraine, Russia, and Belarus that just ended in Minsk. Conference participants signed a cooperation agreement envisioning the provision of the most favorable conditions for effective economic integration.

Russia can be considered the initiator of the intergovernor movement: The first conference was held in January in Novgorod under the personal patronage of Andrey Kozyrev and the subsequent ones-in spring in Novgorod and this time in Minsk-were attended by representatives not only from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs but also from the Cooperation Ministry [Minsotrudnichestva]. The Minsk meeting gained in its official weight from a presentation by Belarus President Aleksandr Lukashenka. True, the authorities' attention did not prevent the governors from subjecting "integration from above" to serious criticism. A special target of attack was the Interstate Economic Committee, which, in the region's opinion, has failed to become an effective structure, and with it all heads of the Commonwealth states for the non-viability of most of their decisions. A real alternative to the cumbersome bureaucratic machine of the CIS, in the participants' view, can be direct interregional cooperation, conditions for which, however, should be created by the Commonwealth governments.

So as not to drag out this process, the governors immediately drafted an inter-government agreement "On Cooperation of Regions of Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine." The fourteen articles of this document, its authors believe, should bring closer the bright economic future of the CIS. The agreement in particular provides for mutual investments, the conclusion of agreements directly between regional economic entities, the creation of joint ventures and interregional shareholding companies, and also a free exchange of labor and intellectual resources. Separate treaties should regulate freight, cooperation of law enforcement bodies, environmental protection schemes, and other spheres of mutual interests.

The main condition for the implementation of the agreement, according to the heads of the regions, is the conclusion of a customs union. The request to speed up this process is contained in a conference address to the governments of the three countries. The governors' aspirations quite coincide with the hopes of the Russian government, which somewhat clarifies the participation of the Russian Foreign Ministry as a midwife. The criticism of the authorities heard at the meeting only strengthens the impression of an accurate calculation on the part of the latter: Even by criticizing the government, the governors implement its will. It is noteworthy that even the delegates from Ukraine, whose government cannot be suspected of particular affection for customs unions, were well disposed toward integration. A representative from Kiev oblast states that the next meeting in September will necessarily be held in Kiev even if this is not to the liking of the Ukraine authorities. And although it is not quite clear yet who has earned the main laurels for the successful operation "in the enemy rear," it is obvious that a powerful "fifth column" has appeared on the territory of one of Russia's main adversaries in the customs war.

7.55 Kuchma: Too Early for Customs Union

UNIAN, 17 July 1995, [FBIS Translation]

Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma, who arrived in the Belarusian capital today on an official visit, told journalists at the airport there were no border problems between the two countries.

He said: "Ukraine is in favor of a Customs Union, but it is too early yet. This is not an issue for the present. We would be pleased to establish a border-crossing system so that our citizens would not be inconvenienced, but we are not going to remove the customs barriers.”

He recalled that the two countries’ European neighbors, Poland, the Czech Republic, and Hungary, have allowed themselves ten years to form a Customs Union. Kuchma stressed the need to create a legislative framework and sign a free trade treaty before such a union is established.

8 On Constitutional and Parliamentary Processes

Introductory Notes

Two instruments have been created within the CIS for guiding and coordinating the process of political integration. Russian politicians have relied more on these two institutions than any others within the CIS infrastructure to carry out its attempts to advance a restorationist agenda. The CIS Charter and the Interparliamentary Assembly (IPA) are to become, at least in line with Russia's agenda, the unitary constitution and parliament of a new confederation among the CIS states. Despite the determination of the strong Russian leaders who have headed these two institutions, however, their progress has been very slow, forcing Russia to resort more and more overtly since the spring of 1995 to a unilateral military program to rebuild its strength and influence in the region.

Those who supported a new Union wrote the draft CIS Charter in early 1992. Notwithstanding Russia's protestations that the charter in no way diminished the memberstates' sovereignty, it was obvious to most CIS leaders that the language in the document was integrationist. The language which set the long-term direction and goals of the organization left little doubt that the final destination was a renewed Union. The goals, which were directly contradictory to those of equal partnership and loose consultation sought by most of the other CIS leaders (with the notable exception of Kazakhstan's president, Nursultan Nazarbaev), spawned a contentious battle, reminiscent of one between the Soviet center and the periphery. The two-year process of holding out for a diluted document more in line with perspectives of the non-Russian CIS leaders is documented in this chapter, although at the time the specifics on arguments over the charter were kept secret.

After much debate, the final charter was brought to its present form, which does little to directly threaten any CIS member's sovereignty or territorial integrity. Nevertheless, as indicated in one Ukrainian observer's analysis in this chapter, many of the terms (for example, "external borders"), which have become catchwords for a restored Union, are contained in the charter, and the organs referred to as CIS "coordinating institutions" are obviously slated to become supranational bodies. Russia quite clearly needs the charter to legitimize its Great Power policy goals in the "near abroad." As a result, those CIS member states which rejected integrationist goals were forced to react to Russia's imperial ambitions more than to the charter itself.

The IPA, established in September 1992, was envisaged as the vehicle for coordinating and aligning CIS memberstates' legislation. As its two successive hard-line chairmen (Ruslan Khasbulatov and Vladimir Shumeiko) from the Russian Federation have made clear, however, it was looked upon by Moscow as the pivotal instrument for transforming the Commonwealth into a close confederation of states. The documents selected here follow the evolution of the IPA's plenary sessions as disclosed in articles by Russian spokesmen (often parliamentarians), who confidently predict eventual success in integrating the CIS, and speeches by its chairmen.

The CIS Charter

The draft CIS Charter was first debated at the 25 December 1992 CIS heads of state summit. From the reports, it is obvious that the battle over provisions in the charter was fierce. Ukraine and Turkmenistan rejected the entire document, reporting during subsequent press interviews that it needed “further study.” Kravchuk made an open statement endorsing a bilateral approach over the collective one, in keeping with his position that the CIS was a transitory organization. Belarus's Shushkevich steadfastly maintained that the charter was incompatible with his country's commitment to military neutrality. Only five of the ten CIS members (Georgia and Azerbaijan had still not joined) initialed the draft.

The draft was scheduled to be the main subject of discussion at the next CIS summit on 22 January 1993. On 5 January, Golos Ukrainy published a detailed critique of the articles contained in the twenty-three-page draft by V. Skachko. His analysis, contained here, brings out the blatantly re-integrationist character of this new "constitution." Article 2, for example, states that the purpose of the CIS is: "Comprehensive and balanced economic and social development of member states within the framework of a joint economic space, along with interstate cooperation and integration." Article 9 states that: "obligations that arise during the period of participation in this charter link the corresponding states until their total fulfillment." These statements actually imply that the states must assign certain supranational authorities to the CIS.

Russian leaders were quite aware of the controversial language in the draft and used every method they could think of to ease the way for its acceptance. Another article in this collection quotes Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksandr Shokhin, advising Russia and the other Commonwealth members not to sign the draft. His reasoning was specious; because the draft gave each state one full year in which to sign, he advocated allowing the parliaments to take their time to ponder it and make suggestions for amendments. He also conspicuously mentioned that “Ukraine would not be able to initiate any dramatic steps.” Ukraine, of course, is an essential member of the charter. The Russians were worried that President Kravchuk would resign from the CIS over the charter issue. If its parliament had enough time to consider the draft, however, Russia calculated that Ukraine would go along, and it would have time to “work on” other member states. Under the rules the council had adopted, any state not signing the charter within one year would automatically become an observer, and its intra-CIS relations would be conducted at the bilateral level only.

Ukraine was not the only worry, however. In an interview recorded here, a few days prior to the January summit, Turkmen Deputy Prime Minister Boris Shikhmuradov announced that Turkmenistan opposed any “rigid structures” and rejected the entire concept “of the creation of a center.” He said his country considered the charter “unnecessary” given the other structural documents which had already been signed. He stressed the feeling of his administration that the CIS should develop along “horizontal,” not “vertical” lines. Likewise, in a pre-summit statement included here, Stanislav Shushkevich emphasized that the many different goals expressed in the charter “should be reached in stages ....,” implying that they should not all be contained in one overarching document.

Russia was also concerned that it had troubles with the Central Asian states. Yeltsin’s statement as he boarded the plane for the summit, which appears in this series, was that all the CIS states “had to sign” (even though he did not expect Ukraine to do so) because “we must not allow the Central Asian republics and Kazakhstan to break away.”

At the January summit, all the CIS leaders were deeply concerned about their countries’ economies, and especially about payments to Russian enterprises. Some accepted the charter as a way to meet Russia’s wishes and to perhaps persuade Russia to be more generous with its interstate ruble credits. The outcome was that seven of the ten members signed the draft. They all had one year in which to obtain ratification by their parliaments.

As documented in this collection, the Kazakh, Russian, and Kyrgyz parliaments ratified the charter in April. Armenia, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan ratified the charter in December 1993. Georgia ratified in March 1994, forced by its need for Russian assistance in its civil war in Abkhazia. The Belarusians waged a long battle between the prime minister, Vyacheslav Kebich, and Speaker Shushkevich (Belarus still had no president), but finally ratified the charter in April 1994 with the reservation that its troops would not fight outside its own borders. Ukraine and Turkmenistan never signed or ratified the charter.

8.1 Working Group Coordinator on CIS Charter

Interview Narodnaya Gazeta, 5 December 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

[Interview with I.M. Korotchenya, coordinator of the CIS Working Group and people’s deputy of the Republic of Belarus, by unidentified Narodnaya Gazeta reporter. ]

Two events-the anniversary of the signing in Belovezh of the Agreement on the Formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States and the completion of the lengthy and strenuous work on the draft CIS Charter-are deserving of a balanced analysis and an exacting appraisal. It was this which led to Narodnaya Gazeta's interview of I.M. Korotchenya, Coordinator of the CIS Working Group and People's Deputy of the Republic of Belarus.

your direct involvement in the first anniversary of the Commonwealth?

[Korotchenya]: No, I do not. I have participated directly in the preparation and realization of the vast majority of meetings of leaders of the CIS and in the elaboration of many important documents. Since the Council of Heads of State appointed me coordinator, I have been ex officio, as they say, at the source of many initiatives and practical steps of the Commonwealth and, naturally, bear my share of responsibility for all that has been unsuccessful and failed to come to fruition.

[Narodnaya Gazeta]: The CIS is commemorating its anniversary, although it is not a question, of course, of the date. What is important is that the Commonwealth, for which breakup was predicted from its very first days, virtually, is strengthening and developing....

[Korotchenya]: Politicians have observed repeatedly that the CIS is a unique formation. Unique if only because communities are usually created for the sake of an intensification of processes of integration. Take, for example, the European Common Market, the Organization of American States, the British Commonwealth.... Despite the pronounced differences, they are all connected by a single purpose-strengthening and expanding all-around cooperation.

The states of the CIS, however, while having proclaimed approximately the same ideas, have in actual policy more often moved, unfortunately, in a different direction. If they have not directly prompted disintegration processes, neither have they decisively prevented them. The statements of the leaders of certain countries to the effect that they consider the CIS a transitional formation and see it merely as a mechanism of the civilized divorce of recently inseparable sister republics are widely known.

The unflattering assessments of the Commonwealth expressed in domestic and foreign media are largely justified, alas. Although it makes sense for objectivity's sake to quote other opinions also, of the New York Times, for example: "Had the leaders of the three Slav peoples not managed to reach agreement in Belovezh Forest, the disintegration of the Soviet empire could have had far grimmer consequences both for the peoples inhabiting it and for the world."

Many attempts were made in the year of the Commonwealth's existence to convert it from an amorphous formation into a structure capable not only of declaring its good intentions but of consistently realizing them also. We may put in this category the institution of the Economic Court and the idea of the creation of an economic body endowed with coordinating functions. Finally, we cannot disregard the activity of the numerous, already more than fifty, interstate councils and commissions. These are the bodies which are involved in applied, specific, and, frequently, urgent business.

But, I repeat, I am not about to exaggerate the positive undertakings in the activity of the CIS. The time allotted for its formation and people's reserve of trust in it are drying up. The draft Commonwealth charter to be submitted to the December meeting of the heads should, we believe, be the test precisely determining each state's attitude toward the fate of the Commonwealth.

It is in the present version oriented toward the achievement of two principal goals. On the one hand the charter should lay a sufficient legal foundation for the states' cooperation within the CIS framework. And the second goal, which is dominant today, perhaps, is the preservation by all the states of full, wholly unlimited sovereignty.

[Narodnaya Gazeta]: Could you not describe the actual preparation of the draft in more detail? We realize what a complex business this is.

[Korotchenya]: The Tashkent meeting of the Council of CIS Heads of State in May of this year may be considered the start of the elaboration of the CIS Charter. It was there that the decision on the preparation of the draft was adopted in accordance with the proposal of B. Yeltsin, president of Russia. Shortly after, legal experts, economists, political scientists, and diplomats were sitting at a common desk. Authorized representatives of the states in the working group joined in actively. In a word, a very authoritative joint team was assembled.

We were rendered great assistance by scholars from various Commonwealth countries, and, as we now say, the remote outside. Their studies and scholarly publications were frequently "support structures" of the draft. I recall, for example, meetings and talks with Professor Emile Noel, who had come to Minsk at our invitation. President of the European University in Florence-one of the world's leading centers of learning-he was formerly present at the start of the European Community, and elaborated the theoretical foundations of its composition and functioning. He was then for many years head of the EC Executive Council. And, of course, his unobtrusive recommendations and counsel were for us a considerable support at the initial stage.

[Narodnaya Gazeta]: And what is the fate of the idea of the creation of a flexible, multilevel system of participation in the CIS-popular and supported by the leaders of the majority of states?

[Korotchenya]: As we all know, during the preparation of the charter there were many arguments and a clash of mutually exclusive viewpoints, when finding wording for this article or the other and this section or the other acceptable to all was incredibly difficult. But right from the outset there was among us complete unity on one point: Everyone wanted to see the Commonwealth as open as possible and accessible to cooperation in any form and for any state. It was here that the ideas of the leadership of Russia on “different speeds” of entry into the CIS and “different levels” of participation came in useful. I will go further, a formation with such diverse aims and uniting such dissimilar subjects cannot be rigid and carved out by a single yardstick.

This is why, according to the present version of the charter, associated members may join the CIS also with full rights and obligations of members. These are the states which would like to cooperate not in all but merely in some forms of activity. For example, they may wish to tackle economic problems together, but pursue an absolutely independent policy in the sphere of military organizational development. In addition, in accordance with a decision of the Council of Heads of State, representatives of all other countries could be admitted to meetings of bodies of the Commonwealth as observers.

Nor is the reverse path forbidden anyone either. The sole condition for a state wishing to quit the CIS is that it announce this twelve months prior to its withdrawal.

[Narodnaya Gazeta]: It is said that appreciable adjustments have been made to the main goals and principles of the Commonwealth which were proclaimed formerly....

[Korotchenya]: Nothing of the sort. As we all know, these goals and principles were originally formulated in the Belovezh agreements and later developed and amplified in the Alma-Ata Declaration and other subsequent documents and have in the draft charter acquired, if we may put it this way, a certain consummate and concentrated form. But the main goals of the voluntary and equal association of sovereign states remain as before. These are all-around cooperation in the economic, political, defense, humanitarian, and other spheres of life; realization of the rights of each country to freedom of choice in its development path; the creation of a common economic space; and the coordination of economic policy. Cooperation in the assurance of peace and security and joint protection of human rights and basic liberties in accordance with the standards of international law is another goal. And, finally, concordance of action contributing to the formation on the territory of the states of the Commonwealth of a single legal space is ultimately envisaged.

The principles of mutual relations within the framework of the Commonwealth were also declared in the first, initial documents. The most important of them are good-neighborliness, mutual understanding and cooperation, recognition of and respect for the integrity of the territories and the inviolability of the borders, non-interference in one another's internal affairs, conscientious discharge of the commitments assumed, the solution of disputes only by peaceful means, and the rejection in international relations of the use of force or even the threat of force.

be judged from the scant press reports, the main stumbling block, virtually, during preparation of the charter was the Commonwealth's coordinating bodies. The president of Kazakhstan, our prime minister, and several other leaders are propounding the idea of the creation within the framework of the Commonwealth of structures endowed with command authority to a certain extent. The president of Ukraine and his Moldovan and Turkmen colleagues are championing the principle of full sovereignty of their states. What has the result been, whose ideas have acquired "charter recognition"?

[Korotchenya]: The charter stipulates precisely that the highest bodies of the Commonwealth are the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government. They alone are endowed with the right to adopt decisions, exclusively by way of consensus. What is more, any state may declare its interest in this problem or the other and decline to participate in its discussion. There are, generally, in the charter practically no imperative, mandatory points. For example, the formation of a common legal space is not proclaimed as a duty of states of the Commonwealth; mention is made merely of the desirability of such actions. Each country retains the full, wholly unabridged right to determine actual policy.

Nonetheless, it would be wrong to maintain that the states which sign the charter would have in respect to one another no duties other than those which are recorded in, for example, the Helsinki agreements. While confirming these obligations (and it is superfluous to mention how important they are in respect, say, to the inviolability of borders and the observance of human rights), the charter at the same time provides a general outline of the mechanism which under our specific conditions would make it possible to put these principles into practice.

If, say, we are speaking of a single economic space within the framework of the CIS, it has to be borne in mind that controlling or coordinating institutions are, naturally, necessary for its normal functioning.

Specialists in all countries of the Commonwealth without exception are agreed that without such structures, extricating ourselves from the vise of today's brutal crisis and reattaching the completely severed threads of long-standing ties will be very difficult.

It cannot be ruled out that these circumstances will be taken into consideration by the heads of state when they examine the section of the charter on the Consultative Economic Commission and the working group.

[Narodnaya Gazeta]: Does the charter record the birth within the framework of the Commonwealth of new bodies?

[Korotchenya]: To some extent, yes. Aside from the main, “legislative” bodies-the Councils of the Heads of State and Heads of Government-it incorporates Councils of Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Defense and the above-mentioned Consultative Economic Working Commission, to which is entrusted the elaboration of proposals pertaining to the development of socio-economic cooperation and the realization of multilateral decisions, and also the Interparliamentary Assembly, the Economic Court, the Human Rights Commission, and sectoral cooperation bodies.

The new executive body could be called the Committee of Permanent Representatives, perhaps. It should incorporate authorized representatives of the members of the Commonwealth at, it is anticipated, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary level.

The committee would be entrusted with the organization of sessions of the councils of the heads of state and heads of government, fulfillment of their instructions, the preparation of information and proposals concerning the exercise of cooperation in various spheres, the organization of meetings of experts, and certain other functions. Organizational-support work would be assumed by the secretariat of the Committee of Permanent Representatives.

The states should also, undoubtedly, be represented in the Committee and the Economic Commission, which also will work on a standing basis, by top-class professionals with experience of both international work and economic management. In addition, and this is particularly critical for the host country, it is essential to create for these people conditions both for their work and their residency befitting their rank. They should not be huddled together in hotels, and their work should not be paid according to some standards other than diplomatic.

I am sure that the heads of state understand this and are already taking practical steps. I refer to the decision adopted at the July meeting in Moscow on the construction of a building for CIS headquarters in Minsk and certain other documents.

[Narodnaya Gazeta]: Does all this mean that appreciable transformations in the present working group are inevitable?

[Korotchenya]: The decision, as I have already said, will always be up to those who have the right to sign the document. I can only say that, in the event of the adoption of the charter, the functions of both the Committee of Permanent Representatives and the secretariat will be somewhat different....

8.2 Proposals for Resolving Constitutional Status of CIS

B. Pugachev Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 9 December 1992
[FBIS Translation]

8 December 1991- S. Shushkevich, chairman of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Belarus, B. Yeltsin, president of Russia, and L. Kravchuk, president of Ukraine, sign an agreement in Minsk creating the Commonwealth of Independent States. The agreement stipulates “that the USSR is ceasing its existence as a subject of international law and a geopolitical reality.”

Article 11 of the agreement proclaims that “from the moment of the signing of this agreement the application of third-country norms, including those of the former USSR, is prohibited on the territory of the signatory states.” In other words from the moment of signing of the agreement three union republics considered themselves as having withdrawn from the USSR.

12 December 199—The Supreme Council of the RSFSR with its resolution ratifies this agreement. On the same day the Supreme Council of the RSFSR denounces the agreement creating the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The withdrawal of Russia from the USSR was thereby granted legal status.

There is no doubt that the procedure followed in the dissolution of the USSR and the withdrawal of Russia from it contradicted norms of the USSR constitution which was then in force.

Neither the president of the USSR nor the Supreme Soviet of the USSR provided an appropriate legal evaluation of such a procedure involving “liquidation” of the USSR. Moreover, the law of the USSR “On organs of state power and administration of the USSR in the transition period,” adopted on 5 September 1991 at the Congress of People’s Deputies of the USSR, contained an anti-constitutional Article 8-“Provisions of the constitution of the USSR are effective in the part that does not contradict current legislation.” The diluted nature of such a formulation opened up broad possibilities for arbitrary interpretation of the union constitution. At the same time the Congress of People’s Deputies delegated its rights to amend the constitution of the USSR to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR.

In that manner the Congress of People’s Deputies of the USSR itself committed a crude violation of the union constitution for the sake of political expediency. Continuing on that course, the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and the president of the USSR failed to make an appropriate legal evaluation of the procedure itself involved in the dissolution of the USSR, which was undoubtedly a very crude violation of their constitutional duties.

The Minsk agreements of 8 December 1992 [sic] were supplemented with a number of other legal enactments. The most important one of which was “The protocol on the agreement on creation of the Commonwealth of Independent States” signed on 21 December 1991 in Alma-Ata. In accordance with that protocol the CIS itself was changed in a radical manner-their intent to join it was declared by the Republic of Azerbaijan, Republic of Armenia, Republic of Kazakhstan, Republic of Kyrgyzstan, Republic of Moldova, Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and the Republic of Uzbekistan. At the same time it was coordinated that the agreement on creation of the CIS goes into effect for each of the sides from the moment of its ratification. The fact that corrections and amendments to the agreement, signed at Minsk, were applied to the protocol is of a paramount importance. Such corrections were also made during ratification of the agreement on the formation of the CIS in the republics and especially in Ukraine. There is no doubt that all of these corrections, just as the indicated protocol of 21 December 1991, had to be ratified by the Congress of People’s Deputies of the Russian Federation, which, however, was not done. All the more since the Alma-Ata declaration, adopted the same day by representatives of Azerbaijan, Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine, proceeded from the premise that “with the formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics ceases to exist.” In this manner the fact that the USSR ceased to exist was recorded not in an interrepublic agreement but in a declaration which did not have the status of a law-establishing document. In a strictly legal sense the USSR continues to exist to this day, inasmuch as an international law agreement was never concluded concerning its partitioning among the former union republics.

All of the subsequent treaties within the framework of the CIS bore the stamp of legal dualism-without dividing the population of the USSR by means of an international law agreement and not determining its successors, the sides participating in the CIS were likewise unable to establish reliable legal foundations for cooperation.

Not having resolved the issue of USSR succession in the form of an agreement, CIS leaders signed a temporary agreement on the Council of the Heads of State and the Council of Heads of CIS Governments on 31 December 1991. In accordance with that agreement the Council of the Heads of State is empowered to discuss numerous issues, “including problems of succession occurring in connection with the dissolution of the USSR and the elimination of union structures.” These problems of succession, including those regarding union property, common union infrastructures of the state (as well as army infrastructures), and citizenship, however, were not resolved on the basis of an agreement.

The above makes it possible to question the constitutionality of the agreement on creation of the CIS and the protocol on that agreement of 21 December 1991 just as that of the decrees of the Supreme Soviet of the RSFSR on ratification of the agreement on formation of the CIS and the 12 December 1991 denunciation of the agreement on formation of the USSR.

Constitutionally the resolution of this issue may be restored by two methods.

First method. The Sixth Congress of People's Deputies of Russia, neglecting to ratify the agreement on formation of the CIS, failed to fulfill its direct constitutional obligations. The next regular Congress of People's Deputies should return to the examination of that issue. Ratification of the agreement on formation of the CIS at the congress, changes in the constitution of the Russian Federation in connection with that agreement, and requirements rigidly formulated by executive power concerning legal resolution of the issue of succession to the "abolished" USSR through an agreement could restore constitutionality with regard to this issue.

The second method involves a study of the case by the Constitutional Court of the Russian Federation. By virtue of Article 2, Paragraph 1 of the law on "The Constitutional Court of the RSFSR," the Constitutional Court cannot evade the study of as important an issue as the correspondence of the agreement on creation of the Commonwealth of Independent States with the provisions of the constitution of the Russian Federation. Constitutional law must be observed in all countries.

8.3 Snegur: Moldova Will Not Subscribe to CIS Charter

A. Pasechnik Pravda, 11 December 1992 [FBIS Translation]

In an interview on national radio Mircea Snegur, president of Moldova, declared that he would not sign the CIS Charter, even if that creates severe economic consequences for it. He considers bilateral ties to be the best variant of mutual relations among countries of the former USSR. Commenting on certain statements by responsible officials of the Romanian MFA, which stipulate deadlines for the unification of Moldova with Romania, he indicated that he strongly favors independence for the republic.

8.4 Disagreements May Prevent Signing of CIS Draft Charter

From the “Presidential Bulletin” feature compiled by Andrey Pershin, Andrey Petrovskiy, and Vladimir Shishlin; and edited by Boris Grishchenko
Interfax, 18 December 1992 [FBIS Translation]

On Thursday [17 December], the Belarusian parliament gathered for a closed session to discuss the draft charter of the CIS. According to parliamentary sources, the need to consider this issue arose during the discussion of the Belarusian military doctrine, whose individual provisions have to do with relations between the CIS republics and with the CIS as a whole. Chairman of the Belarusian parliament Stanislav Shushkevich is reported to have backed the initiative of a group of deputies to continue the discussion of the CIS Charter. Local observers believe that the parliament’s opinion may influence the position of the Belarusian leader during the CIS summit in Minsk.

Having noted that the parliamentary session was closed, Ivan Korotchenya, the coordinator of the working group of the Council of the Heads of State and of the Council of the Heads of Government, refused to tell Interfax [IF] about the situation, but, as a people’s deputy of the Republic of Belarus, he said that he had a cautious approach to the spontaneous discussion of the charter.

IF Note: Prior to his appointment to the post of coordinator of the working group, Ivan Korotchenya was a member of the presidium of the Belarusian parliament and chairman of the Commission for Openness, the Media and Human Rights.

“If the deputies start changing the draft charter, coordinated and signed by CIS experts and representatives, this document may not be signed on 25 December,” he told Interfax in an exclusive interview. Korotchenya explains this possibility by the fact that “not all of the changes made by the deputies may be accepted by the CIS leaders.”

As we reported earlier, the draft charter has a provision on the ratification of this document by the parliaments of all of the CIS signatory states.

IF Note: Earlier, President of Kazakhstan Nursultan Nazarbaev said, speaking on Channel I of the Ostankino TV company, that a great controversy is going on on the eve of the Minsk summit. “Reports say that Ukraine, Moldova, and other states disagree with the draft charter. If this is so, the CIS that was established last year, no longer exists,” he said. On Thursday, it was announced that Stanislav Shushkevich had canceled his visit to Chisinau. Local observers explain this decision by the Belarusian leader’s reluctance to give rise to speculations that he was going to Chisinau to persuade Snegur to join the CIS Charter.

8.5 Shushkevich Urges Moldovans to Collaborate in CIS

Svetlana Gamova and Eduard Kondratov Izvestiya, 23 December 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Relations with Russia and the CIS were the focus of attention during a visit to Chisinau by a Belarusian delegation headed by S. Shushkevich.

Voicing concern at the relations taking shape between Moldova and Russia, the Belarusian Supreme Soviet chairman attempted to persuade Moldovan parliamentarians that the conference of CIS Heads of State in Minsk is a lever that the Moldovan side can use to resolve its problems. The fact that more than 80 percent of Belarus's commodity turnover is with Russia points to the need to further develop relations, above all with the east, Shushkevich declared. The same is also evidently characteristic of Moldova's economic ties. According to the Belarusian Supreme Soviet chairman, "there will be no miracle with world markets." "If they dismember us, we will lose everything," he emphasized. "They are dividing us and cleaning us all out one by one. Therefore we must unite in our poverty to oppose the welldeveloped system for collecting tribute from the republics of the former Union."

Moldova prefers at present to be just an observer within the CIS framework, afraid of being crushed by the structures that are being created within it. But it also expects Russia to take steps which will confirm its respect for Moldova's constitutional foundations.

Two points were emphasized at the meeting that took place, and Moldova does not consider it possible to trust Russia and the Commonwealth as a whole unless they are eliminated. The first is the presence of the Russian 14th Army on Moldovan territory. The second, according to Moldovan Supreme Soviet Chairman A. Mosanu, is Russia's support for the Trans-Dniester region. Making a choice in favor of the CIS now would mean "being misunderstood by the majority of the population." To restore trust, the presidium of the Moldovan parliament believes, "Russia must publicly declare that it defends constitutional Moldova and does not support the separatist movement.”

At a news conference after signing a treaty of friendship and cooperation it was announced that Moldovan President M. Snegur and Prime Minister A. Sangheli will participate in the Minsk meeting of CIS Heads of State. Shushkevich called this a “courageous action.”

8.6 National Democratic Forces Critical of New CIS Charter

Radio Ukraine, 27 December 1992 [FBIS Translation]

The signing of any version of the CIS Charter by Ukraine representatives would be a betrayal of the Ukrainian people. This was stated by the Council of the Congress of National Democratic Forces of Ukraine after discussing and becoming familiar with the draft of that document. In the opinion of members of the council, the new designers of the single and indivisible state [Russia] want to do with the help of the CIS Charter what they failed to do with the help of the new union treaty. The Council of the Congress believes that signing this document would impose new bondage on our people. The leading body of the congress called on all democratic forces of Ukraine to unite into an anti-imperial front.

8.7 CIS Working Group Coordinator Interviewed

Interview by Aleksey Eroshenko Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 31 December 1992 [FBIS Translation]

At the intersection of two alleys in Minsk there is a gloomy and chilly looking building of unremarkable appearance whose offices for a year now have been linked by invisible capillaries to the circulation system of the giant organism called the CIS. Before the New Year our correspondent in Belarus, Aleksey Eroshenko, met here with I.M. Korotchenya, the coordinator of the CIS working group. He speaks:

Over the year the CIS has existed there have been many attempts to transform it from an amorphous formation into a community capable not only of declaring good intentions but also of implementing them consistently. The Economic Court, the Coordination Economic Council conceived but not yet born, and much else deserves the best possible fate on this plane. Nor can we fail to value the activity of over fifty interstate councils and commissions which have made their contribution to the CIS life support system. But these are all just “units” and not an integral structure of the CIS locomotive. The charter submitted for approval by the next summit meeting should be the universal mechanism which defines in principle each subject’s attitude toward the fate of the Belovezh Forest formation.

A formation which unites so many dissimilar “characters” cannot be strictly cut according to a single template. None of the document’s forty-five paragraphs contains a single mandatory, arbitrary point. Each country retains the right to determine its own policy. Thus, on the one hand, the legal base is formed for cooperation among states and on the other their sovereignty is preserved with nothing to encroach upon it. That is what we cudgelled our brains over. Here Russia’s ideas on “different speeds” for joining the CIS and different levels of participation in it were very useful indeed.

Mutual accounts between the states should be just as trouble-free as they were in the recent past between the republics of the former Union. This optimistic forecast is connected with the creation of an interstate bank, the draft agreement on whose formation has already been signed by experts of eleven countries, although for some details complete unanimity has not yet been reached. In this case the search for a single international means of accounting has been tricky since many republics have their own currency in circulation. Everyone agreed beforehand on the Russian ruble. Although the most attractive proposal was the one for the introduction of a special inter-nation currency like the European Economic Community's Ecu [European currency unit].

8.8 Kravchuk, Conference Delegates Discuss CIS Charter

Interfax, 4 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk has said that before the CIS Charter can be signed, Ukraine must conclude largescale economic agreements and interstate treaties with Russia and other CIS member states. He was speaking at a consultative meeting of delegates from political parties, socio-political associations, trade unions, cultural workers, women's and youth organizations in Kiev on Monday [4 January]. The consultative meeting discussed whether Ukraine should put its signature to the Charter of the Commonwealth of Independent States at the forthcoming CIS summit.

Kravchuk argues that the emphasis must be placed on wider bilateral and multilateral cooperation within the CIS. The Ukrainian president says that any integration process must stem from the idea of resolving economic problems first and political problems second.

Participants in the conference have said most delegates believe the charter in its present form should not be signed. They argue that if signed after all, the charter would upset the principle of free membership of the CIS and run counter to the agreements concluded in Belarus and Alma-Ata.

Most speakers on behalf of their organizations asked the president, the cabinet, and parliament to consistently protect Ukraine's sovereignty in keeping with the Ukrainian Independence Declaration Act of 24 August 1991 and the will of the people expressed in the referendum of December 1991.

The consultative meeting was attended by the Ukrainian Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma and first deputy speaker of the Ukrainian parliament Vasiliy Durdinets.

8.9 Ukrainian Government Declines to Sign

Interfax, 5 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The CIS Charter offered for signing now coincides neither with Ukrainian potentialities and legislative norms, nor with its national interests. It answers to the interests of those forces which want to return to a united state, said Ukraine's president, Leonid Kravchuk, on Monday [4 January] at a consultative conference with spokesmen for twenty-six Ukrainian political parties, associations, and movements. Participants in the conference discussed Ukraine's attitude to the plans to sign the CIS Charter.

According to L. Kravchuk, at first it is essential to resolve common problems, finalize the necessary documents, and consider the consequences of signing the charter for all members of the Commonwealth.

Ukraine, said its president, will not consider the prospects for participating in the CIS in the capacity of an associated member or observer. According to him, the republic might consider the entire package of documents with addenda and explanations to it, not the suggested CIS Charter. However, it might take decades to work out such documents.

World public opinion, said L. Kravchuk, is interested in having the CIS Charter signed, because it fears that the development of events in the former USSR might take the Yugoslav road, and that nuclear arms will get divided uncontrollably. "I don't think that our internal problems interest them," the president said.

Ukraine also has forces that want it to be a member of the CIS, said L. Kravchuk. "I held a post in the CPSU when the USSR existed as an empire. Now I'll spare no efforts in opposing the attempts to return to an empire," he said. "A different attitude would be a step away from my people and from my country." According to L. Kravchuk, Russia has always been beset by the idea of a superpower and a leading force in the CIS and beyond it. "We are not criticizing it for this. Russia pursues a policy that answers to its interests," he said. Ukraine must not interfere in the internal affairs of any country. However, the Ukrainian president said, as a member of the United Nations and of the CSCE, Russia should be guided in its policy by international norms and principles; it has no right to prevent the Ukrainian people from expressing their will. Besides, said L. Kravchuk, if there are wise politicians in Russia, they'll do their best to avoid confrontation between the two countries.

The president dismissed the assertions that Ukraine's failure to sign the CIS Charter will bring about economic pressure on it. "No nation will part with its wealth in favor of Ukraine simply for its signature to the charter. President Yeltsin told me in a cable that from now on Russia will determine the general quota of oil exports, not quotas for each consumer state, as it did previously,” said L. Kravchuk.

8.10 Proposed CIS Charter Criticized

V. Skachko Ukrainy, 5 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

This question inevitably arises if one carefully reads to the end this twenty-three-page document entitled “Charter of the Commonwealth of Independent States” (Draft). Along with the question of “Who needs it?” there appears another no less important one: “What for?”

In order to answer these questions, in my opinion, it is necessary to return to the sources—to 8 December 1991 when the CIS was born below Minsk, and 21 December of the same year, when ten of the fifteen former union republics unified in the Commonwealth. The CIS was regarded differently in the various countries, but they all noted one factor: the Minsk-Alma-Ata Act signaled the final demise of the USSR of the old type, but also the start of a new process for those ten states which did not find sufficient national fortitude to say “farewell” to the largest and newest empire and embark on an independent voyage. They all lived on hopes and anticipations, the different nature of which comprised a tight new complex of contradictory problems, in part with directly opposite content and directions for their resolution. The CIS, as the final death knell of the Soviet Union, was necessary for all, but with respect to their answer to the question of “What for?” the countries diverged. Some of the new states (including Ukraine) viewed the CIS as a mechanism for a civilized divorce, so that it would really not be necessary to break off primarily economic ties. Some other states were willing to continue performing the role of the newest “underbelly” (A. Solzhenitsyn) of Russia and have that powerful ally and (military, economic, and finally, political) patron protecting against solicitations of other states of the world. Finally, Russia occupied a separate position within the CIS. It was recognized by the world community as the sole legal successor to the Soviet Union and which, according to the statement of its president in Kiev in March of last year, in fact declared: "We never have ceded from the USSR." It was then that the contradictory nature of the CIS was revealed in a clear manner: to be equal partners and to strive to dominate at the same time is impossible. In the year of its existence the CIS irrevocably proved this new truth which, at the same time, is as old as the world. The CIS failed to resolve a single serious problem in any spheres of activity of the young independent states. Still, the achievements within the framework of the Commonwealth may be attributed only to the bilateral interstate agreements, including the ones between Russia and Ukraine. For Russia, however, that is apparently not enough.

Does the "CIS Charter" reflect these realities? Yes, fully and entirely. For while proclaiming absolute de jure equality and independence of members of the Commonwealth, it also de facto preserves the impossibility of realizing these principles. At the same time if the charter would simply establish another incontrovertible truth of the day, that it is impossible to be absolutely independent in a world which is moving toward planetary integration, there would be nothing to be afraid of. But Article 2 of the document already states that the purpose of the CIS is "Comprehensive and balanced economic and social development of member states within the framework of a joint economic space, along with interstate cooperation and integration."

Further on it gets “even better”: Article 9 proclaims that “obligations that arise during the period of participation in this charter link the corresponding states until their total fulfillment.” In other words, if you signed the charter, and its fulfillment is detrimental to your national interests, you must still fulfill its provisions. Otherwise (Article 10) with regard to the violating state “measures may be initiated which are allowed under international law.” What kind of measures these are is not indicated. Why?

There exists a certain principle: a state is totally independent only when it fully controls primarily its economic space. Not some “general” one, but its own, and establishes contacts with any state on that basis. “The CIS Charter,” however, in Article 19, offers “the formation of a common economic space based on market relations and free movement of goods, services, capital, and manpower.” That same article speaks about “development of transportation and communication systems, coordination of credit and financial policy, cooperation in standardization and certification of industrial production and goods,” etc. It is not difficult to imagine the reaction, for instance, of American Ford to a proposal by Japanese “Toyota” to standardize production. We, however, are being offered just that under the guise of “formation of a common economic space, a European and Eurasian market, and customs policy” (Article 4).

The term “external borders” of the CIS is incorporated in “the charter,” which calls for joint protection by combined means, including military forces, stipulating the creation of common forces which could be used to resolve disputes, naturally, upon agreement of the sides (Articles 11-13). What if there is no such agreement?

See Article 10 above.

The charter also talks about “joint coordinating institutions” (Article 4). I attempted counting the number of such “institutions” just in the economic sphere: Council of Heads of State, Council of Heads of Government, Consultative Economic Working Commission attached to two councils, Economic Court, organs (councils, committees) of branch cooperation, and also the Committee of Permanent Representatives headed by a coordinator with his own secretariat.

Some of these “institutions,” of course, engage in dealing with political problems as well. In politics, however, they are assisted by the Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, the Council of Ministers of Defense, the Main Command of Unified Armed Forces, the Council of Commanders of Border Forces, the Commission on Human Rights, the Interparliamentary Assembly with its Council. Forgive me, of course, for such a long list, but all of these organs also have their rights and their powers. Instead of a comment I will allow myself to raise another question: What will remain within the competence of national leaders of the so-called independent states?

“The charter” also contains the rather strange Article 20: “Member states cooperate in the sphere of law, particularly through the conclusion of multilateral and bilateral treaties on the extension of legal assistance and promotion of rapprochement in national legislation.” That is exactly what it states, no more and no less. Even if one hypothetically imagines that, for example, democrats and conservatives come to power in two individual states, not just economic cooperation will be needed (which is quite possible) but it will also be necessary “to conduct consultations and negotiations for the purpose of working out proposals to eliminate such contradictions.” In what manner? What is more important is why is it necessary to bring closer together something that cannot be brought closer together either by treaty or through economic sanctions or even through aggression. Since in either case those to suffer will be the people who, in picking their leadership, may have possibly made a mistake, but they alone have the power to correct it. Legislative alignment under pressure merely preserves non-democratic regimes in individual states. That is confirmed by world experience.

We are talking, however, not about universal problems but about the fact that the Ukrainian delegation in Minsk will be asked to sign this “CIS Charter.” There will probably be some economic pressure applied as well in accordance with the principle “either food or independence,” coupled with the demand to continue the existence of the CIS. But no longer even in the form of a mechanism for a civilized divorce and conclusion of mutually advantageous bilateral or multilateral agreements, but in another form—that of a peculiar supracountry formation, which is not too far removed from a new “unified and indivisible” state. For even such interstate agreements (according to Article 5 of “The Charter”), “concluded within the framework of the Commonwealth, must suit the goals and principles of the Commonwealth, the obligations of the member states according to the present charter.” Authors of the document let it be clearly understood that the CIS will act only with a voluntary rejection of independence, which means it will no longer be what it was conceived as, which was an association of truly independent states. That is why “the CIS Charter” is a hidden trap in the manner of the Soviet Union.

Almost all of the serious political forces have arrived at this conclusion in Ukraine in recent months. State leadership is expressing approximately the same thoughts. Then what is preventing the final expression of opinion regarding the CIS? After all, everyone, I repeat, everyone knows that.

8.11 CIS Charter Seen as Rejected for Political Reasons

Lyubov Khazan Nezavisimost, 6 January 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Three diehards of the Eastern Slavic policy prevailed over the fourth just over a year ago in the celebrated Belovezh Forest.

People call it a year of lost opportunities, a year of lost illusions. The illusions have given way to the same old stereotypes, and it turns out that 52 percent of our fellow citizens already regret the demise of the Soviet Union.

The hope of sovereign prosperity was vanishing with each hopeless day while the unforgettable Vitold Pavlovich closed his eyes to the corruption and dealt the final blow to the almost lifeless economy. His high-level patrons and the political leaders who claimed the exclusive right to love our common motherland should know that they were instrumental in Vitold Pavlovich's success. The 52 percent who miss the Union are also partly the result of your efforts, ladies and gentlemen.

According to the Oriental calendar, the year of the monkey, which is not quite over yet, promised us the sneers of fate. One of them, perhaps the most fascinating, is the CIS Charter that was drafted by a certain working group.

It was supposed to consist of ten states, and representatives from most of them took part in coordinating the draft. Ukraine did not participate in these efforts, and judging by our president's fairly harsh words of 4 January, the new charter looks like an attempt to restore the old imperial USSR....

The president cleared up all of the details. When he was asked who needed the charter, he replied that the charter appealed to the forces that want to turn the CIS into the Union. When he was asked where these forces are located, he replied that, first of all, they are abroad, because people there are frightened by the prospect of another Yugoslavia and the spread of nuclear weapons. Second, they are in Russia, because Russia wants to reclaim the glory of a superpower. Third, they are in Ukraine, because those who are campaigning in favor of the charter (primarily pro-communist forces) expect the Union to give them a share of the power.

The president concluded by proposing a compromise: He would consider the draft charter only in a package with other documents-supplements, clarifications, etc. According to his calculations, their compilation will take at least ten years. Therefore, there is no need to bother with the charter now. As they say in the East, by that time either the donkey will drop dead or the shah will expire. The only indisputable thing at this point is our president's ability to make points where no one expected him to. There is no question that the venerable leaders of the political parties and movements gave him the highest marks. This was clear when the irrepressible patriot Stepan Khmara and the equally ardent patriot Larisa Skorik nodded their approval: The president made them happy.

8.12 Shokhin: Russia "Should Not Sign" CIS Charter

Ivan Ivanov ITAR-TASS, 19 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

"Russia, as well as other CIS states, should not sign the charter of the Commonwealth at the CIS summit in Minsk on 22 January," Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksandr Shokhin told reporters on Tuesday.

The draft charter gives member states a year to sign it, including ratification in parliament. Thus, the approval of the charter in Minsk will only signal the beginning of the process of joining it in the legal framework existing in every CIS state, he explained.

Shokhin does not expect any dramatic developments at the summit. “Neither a new organization will be created, nor the Commonwealth will collapse,” he said, adding that “Ukraine will not be able to initiate any dramatic steps.”

The Minsk summit will begin the formation of a new legal structure of the Commonwealth which will last for a year.

Even if the Russian delegation does not go to Minsk, it would not impede Russia from joining the charter the next day, according to the deputy prime minister.

Shokhin believes such a “soft” scheme of joining the charter is the correct one as it allows parliaments to participate in the process. Among the most serious Commonwealth problems, Shokhin listed trade and economic relations, as well as credit and monetary issues in 1993. He spoke in favor of creating an interstate bank of the Commonwealth “which is to act as a clearing chamber at the first stage.”

8.13 Deputy Prime Minister Rejects Draft CIS Charter

Interfax, 21 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

In his interview with Interfax Boris Shikhmuradov, the republic’s deputy prime minister, declared that Turkmenistan will not sign the CIS Charter. In Shikhmuradov’s words, the leadership of Ashkhabad “does not perceive the draft of the charter conceptually.” “We oppose rigid structures and deny the idea of creation of any center. Life demonstrates that any issue within the so-called single space can be solved on the basis of bilateral relations. Direct contacts do work and they do not work in the CIS,” Shikhmuradov said.

“We welcome a flexible approach with respect to the draft of the charter and believe that the charter is not necessary; there are already basic documents about the creation of the CIS which have been signed. It is necessary to develop horizontally that fragile sovereignty which we have now,” Shikhmuradov believes.

8.14 CIS Heads of State, Government Work on Draft Charter Russia Favors Signing

Moscow Mayak Radio, 21 January 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

[Announcer]: It seems that almost all our news items today are in some way connected with the latest meeting of the leaders of the countries in the Commonwealth of Independent States, which opens tomorrow in Minsk.....

[Korshunov]: Leonid Grigorievich, beginning, I think, almost from the very first meetings of CIS leaders, there have been claims that the CIS structure will not be long-lived, that it is on the verge of ceasing to exist. However, the most recent meetings would seem to have refuted such claims. Even so, the situation does not permit complete optimism. What might be the consequences if the CIS were to disappear for the territory that used to be the Soviet Union in the event of the current participants in the CIS not signing documents on the further existence of this structure?

[Ivashov]: Well, first I would like to point out that the draft charter will bring the problems of the CIS to a head. In the event of its not being signed by some of the Commonwealth members, they will automatically become observers of the Commonwealth, as it were. Then, the bases for mutual relations will be decided at a rather different level, that of bilateral relations, maybe of multilateral relations, but such close multilateral cooperation will, no doubt, be complicated.

[Korshunov]: When people talk of a possible danger for the CIS or the probability of a particular state not signing the CIS Charter, Russia seems (to be above) suspicion. Is there any possibility or danger that Russia, too, might not sign such a document?

[Ivashov]: At all the meetings, whether of experts, ministers of foreign affairs, deputy ministers of foreign affairs [words indistinct] in Minsk, Russia has been in favor of signing and has merely made constructive contributions to drawing up a draft that would suit everyone. If something quite extraordinary happens and Russia does not sign the CIS Charter, the consequences could, to be blunt, be disastrous. And, in such circumstances, the situation for Russia would be most unfavorable. It would be cut off from close cooperation with the Central Asian region, and bearing in mind that Russia is a Eurasian state and that the greater part of its territory is in fact in Asia, the priority trend of cooperation in the military and in other spheres must be in this region and, all the more so, when the leaders of these states are preparing for closer cooperation and are ready for profound integration. It is not fortuitous that of the six states that signed the Treaty on Collective Security in Tashkent, four of them were the states of Central Asia and Kazakhstan. Thus, it is not in Russia's interest not to sign the Commonwealth Charter.

Yeltsin Says Ukraine Must Sign

Interfax, 22 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

President Yeltsin told journalists before flying off to the Belarusian capital Minsk on Friday [22 January] that it was necessary to sign a CIS Charter at the Minsk summit, and all the countries but Ukraine were prepared to do so. However, he noted that “to sign the CIS Charter without Ukraine would be undesirable.”

In Mr. Yeltsin’s words, participants at the summit are in for hard work and will have to make some hard decisions. He said there would be three main issues on the summit’s agenda. The first one concerns the signing of the charter. The president emphasized that the alliance of five Central Asian states should be prevented from sudden secession.

Mr. Yeltsin regards nuclear arms as the second issue to settle with Ukraine and Kazakhstan. As for Belarus, an agreement with it has already been reached. He wished the parliaments of Ukraine, Kazakhstan, and Belarus would ratify the START I Treaty.

The third “very hard” issue in Mr. Yeltsin’s view is that of the combined CIS armed forces, the status of which, in his words, is declining. The president urged reaching final agreement on these forces.

He said he was going to focus on the situation in Tajikistan in Minsk. In his opinion, to stop the bloodshed in that republic, Russia’s 201st Division should be backed up by peacekeeping troops from other CIS states.

Three States Refuse to Sign

Interfax, 22 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Discussion of the draft CIS Charter at the summit in Minsk on Friday has shown a divergence of views by various sides. At the joint assembly of the Council of the Heads of State and the Council of the Heads of Commonwealth Governments, the majority were in favor of signing the draft charter.

Belarus announced its readiness to sign the draft, without part 3 regarding collective security, and the provision on dividing border troops. Russian President Boris Yeltsin remarked that “absolutely all provisions of the charter” suit Russia and they correspond with the country’s national interests. Kazakhstan was in favor of approving the draft charter.

Until the recess, however, Turkmenistan’s position was still unclear; the country does not categorically refuse to sign the charter, but has several reservations. The Moldovan delegation announced that due to the difficult political situation in the republic, and the fact that the Moldovan parliament has not yet ratified the founding documents of the CIS, Chisinau cannot sign the draft charter at this time.

Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk confirmed that Kiev did not find it necessary to sign the draft charter in its present form.

The heads of Commonwealth states, taking into account the Ukrainian president’s announcements, decided to discuss possible compromise versions during the recess in order to find a formula which Ukraine would find acceptable to join the charter.

Experts think it possible that for instance, a memorandum could be signed or a protocol to the CIS Charter, which would reflect Ukraine’s interests.

In addition to this, according to information from Minsk, separate meetings of the Council of Heads of State and Heads of Commonwealth Governments have begun. The presidents have returned to the question of the CIS Charter.

In the first half of the day on 22 January, at the joint meeting the heads of states and Commonwealth governments in principle approved an agreement on a CIS interstate bank and a document on regulating an interstate securities market.

8.15 Seven States Sign Charter

Leonid Timofeev ITAR-TASS, 22 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Heads of seven CIS states signed the CIS Charter today, although with some reservations. Discussions on its content have lasted the last several months. Moldova, Turkmenistan, and Ukraine appeared to be unprepared for this step.

Explaining the Kiev stand, Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk told the final news conference “the adopted wording corresponds to the current situation in the Commonwealth.” However, the economic situation is now the most important for Ukraine. He said the time will come for Ukraine to determine its stand on the issue.

The Ukrainian leader also said the Commonwealth as a structure has potential to upgrade its work in all spheres, both political and economic.

The meeting of the [Council of Heads of States] reached an agreement to sign a common statement on the charter. In the opinion of Russian President Boris Yeltsin, the most important thing about the document is that the charter is declared open for signing by any state head any time.

The meeting focused on a set of economic issues. In particular, it reach an agreement on creation of an interstate bank and principles of its work. Government heads considered fourteen economic issues and prepared four issues for discussion together with state heads. All of them were signed, with the exception of ones sent back for improvement. In the opinion of Russian Premier Viktor Chernomyrdin, the meeting, held at a high professional level, was a success.

As for political aspects of the meeting, one should note the discussion of the Tajik situation, which resulted in a decision to close the Tajik-Afghan border that is, in the words of Uzbek President Islam Karimov, the gates for penetration of arms and drugs on CIS territory. Five states, which signed the agreement on collective security, decided to send a battalion each to reinforce the border.

At the same time, state heads voiced an opinion that Tajikistan and its new leaders, after stabilizing the situation in the republic, must be able to ensure the inviolability of borders by themselves.

Commenting on correspondents' request for the results of the first year of CIS existence, Boris Yeltsin said the Commonwealth "underwent normal and natural processes of self-awareness in the world for young, newly established states." The Commonwealth was living, growing experienced, and has done much, said the Russian leader.

He stressed a "chaotic disintegration" of the nuclear state was prevented. Understanding of the need to preserve the whole set of relations, especially under conditions of an economic crisis, has been reached. "We understood we cannot live without each other," noted the Russian leader.

In the opinion of head of the Belarusian Supreme Soviet Stanislav Shushkevich, results of the CIS existence are evident. "State and government heads have never before met each other with such respect and understanding of each other's dignity. This is the main result of the Commonwealth," he said.

8.16 Kuchma Interviewed by Japanese Papers on CIS Charter

From the “Diplomatic Panorama” feature, compiled by Andrey Pershin, Andrey Petrovskiy, and Vladimir Shishlin; and edited by Boris Grishchenko
Interfax, 4 March 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

In an interview to Japanese Tokyo Shimbun and Chunichi Shimbun daily papers, Ukrainian Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma answered their correspondents’ questions concerning the current economic and political situation in the republic, as well as Ukraine’s relations with its CIS partners....

Q: Will Ukraine be supportive of the policy of greater integration in the framework of the Commonwealth of Independent States and sign the CIS Charter?

A: I don’t know a single person who said that the CIS policy was sensible after he has analyzed it. I regard the CIS merely as a screen, and nothing else. In the meantime, I wouldn’t take it as a tragedy if Ukraine signed the CIS Charter. In fact, by doing so we would cut the ground from under some of the politicians who seek to set apart Russia and Ukraine. On the other hand, under the present-day situation, I can also see the reason for not signing the charter. In his decision making, the president, certainly, was proceeding from the interests of political conciliation in this country. With Ukraine being divided into two rival camps, it is evident that our most important mission today lies in preserving equilibrium, hence conciliation, in Ukraine.

8.17 Kazakh Parliament Ratifies CIS Charter on 14 April

Fyodor Ignatov ITAR-TASS, 16 April 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The parliament of Kazakhstan ratified the CIS charter late on Thursday [14 April].

Parliament Speaker Serikbolsyn Abdildin expressed hope that the document, which was signed on 22 January in Minsk, will promote the creation of an economic union among former Soviet republics which may be later joined by former Comecon members.

8.18 Russian Parliament Ratifies CIS Charter on 15 April

Ivan Novikov ITAR-TASS, 15 April 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The Supreme Soviet (Parliament) of Russia on Thursday ratified the Charter of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) adopted in Minsk on 22 January 1993. The decision won a majority at a joint meeting of the parliamentary chambers.

Anatoliy Adamishin, first deputy foreign minister, who presented the document the charter meets the national state interests of Russia, emphasized [sentence as received].

Adamishin believes that the charter is an important instrument for equitable operation between Russia and CIS partners.

The charter is aimed at enhancing centripetal tendencies in the CIS and at consolidating it, Adamishin said. "This signifies that a new tendency aimed at establishing a zone of stability and active cooperation throughout the former Soviet Union has emerged and is growing stronger,” he added. The charter is yet another proof that the CIS makes headway toward civilized work, not a civilized divorce as some predicted, Adamishin said.

The diplomat stated that the adoption at the same time reflected growing awareness of the fact that political independence of their states does not rule out close interconnection between them and moreover that such interconnection is of benefit to all.

He recalled that the charter sets out better guarantees for human rights. “To us this is a factor of exceptional importance since about 25 million of our compatriots live outside Russia,” Adamishin stressed.

8.19 Further on CIS Charter Ratification

From the “Diplomatic Panorama” feature by Andrey Borodin, Dmitriy Voskoboynikov, and Igor Porshnev Interfax, 15 April 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Russia’s parliament ratified the CIS charter on Thursday [ 15 April].

In an appeal before the vote, Speaker Ruslan Khasbulatov asked lawmakers to ratify the charter despite all its flaws. He called the document the core of cooperation between the Commonwealth countries, especially in the run up to the 25 April referendum.

Khasbulatov rebuked the executive structures for their attempt to claim foreign policy as its own sphere of activity. He declared that the holding of a CIS summit in Minsk on 16 April and a meeting of the leaders of national parliaments on the same day testified to attempts to become fully separate.

Reporting on the CIS charter at the session, the first deputy foreign minister Anatoliy Adamishin noted that the statute consolidated a new trend aimed at creating on the territory of the former USSR an environment for cooperation in the economic, humanitarian, and other fields.

In his words, the charter is yet more proof of the Commonwealth's advance toward integration rather than toward a civilized divorce, as was earlier expected.

This international document has already been ratified by Kazakhstan's parliament without amendments or reservations. Kyrgyzstan's parliament is to ratify it on Friday.

"Russia should not lag behind other CIS countries, all the more because it has ratified fewer CIS documents than the other Commonwealth states," Adamishin said.

ITAR-TASS, 15 November 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The government of Belarus has approved with amendments the charter of the Commonwealth of Independent States which was adopted in Moscow on 22 January 1993.

The charter has now to be ratified by the republican parliament.

An amendment to the section "Collective Security and Military Political Cooperation" says that the use of the Belarusian armed forces in other CIS states, as well as the deployment or use of the armed forces of other CIS states in Belarus, should be sanctioned by the Belarusian parliament.

In Article 16 of the section “Prevention of Conflicts and Settlement of Disputes” the phrase “all possible measures” is understood by Belarus as all possible non-military measures. The republic proceeds from the fact that disputes indicated in Articles 17 and 18 of the CIS Charter should be resolved in accordance with generally accepted principles and norms of international law, the government said.

Belarus believes that the provisions of Articles 28 and 29 concerning the Coordinating and Consultative Committee and the secretariat and Article 30 concerning the main command of the unified armed forces do not fully correspond to the present-day realities and need correction. The latter should be made in the form of amendments to the CIS Charter as envisaged by its Article 42.

8.21 Belarus May Have to Leave CIS if Charter Not Ratified

Unless Belarus’s parliament ratifies the CIS Charter before 23 January, the republic will be automatically removed from the composition of the Commonwealth, CIS Executive Secretary Ivan Korotchenya declared in his interview with Interfax.

He recalled one thesis from the CIS Charter confirmed by heads of states 22 January 1993 in Minsk. The document stipulates that “those sponsor states which adopt commitments according to the present charter within a year after its adoption by the Council of Heads of States are member states of the Commonwealth.” At the same time Korotchenya stressed that “the charter is brought into force for all sponsor states, from the moment they hand over instruments of ratification for storage or for sponsor states which will hand over their instruments of ratification in a year following adoption of this charter.”

According to Korotchenya, as of today only six states have ratified the CIS Charter, namely Armenia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan. Korotchenya said that they expected ratification from Azerbaijan and Georgia in the near future. Russia, Kazakhstan, and Tajikistan have already forwarded their instruments of ratification to Belarus’s governmental archives, to the countrydepository of the CIS.

At the Ashkhabad summit, leaders of the Commonwealth countries have prolonged the term of ratification of the CIS Charter for Moldova for three months more, said Korotchenya.

The session of the Belarusian parliament is to resume its work in Minsk on 18 January. Korotchenya, a people’s deputy of this representative body, believes that the issue on ratification of the Commonwealth charter “must be considered without any delay during the first day of the session’s work.”

8.22 Georgian Parliament Votes to Join CIS Charter

ITAR-TASS, 1 March 1994 [FBIS Translation]

At its evening session today the Georgian parliament adopted a resolution that the Republic of Georgia should join the CIS Charter. There were 125 parliamentarians voting for this decision, 64 against, 4 abstained, and 3 deputies did not take part in the voting.

Eduard Shevardnadze, head of the Georgian state, who made a speech during the stormy debate on the question of ratification, stressed that Georgia “has no other choice and that this has already become obvious during the events in Abkhazia.”

The Interparliamentary Assembly

The intra-CIS debates concerning the formation of an Interparliamentary Assembly were tense, but perfunctory. An IPA was established in early 1992, with seven states as signatories, primarily because a majority of the CIS leaders considered it necessary to facilitate a smooth separation from the previous economic planning system and interrepublican economic and legal obligations. They also realized that some coordination in the re-drafting of national laws and regulations might be useful or necessary. Nevertheless, the IPA rapidly became the target of intense Russian pressure for integration into a unitary confederal state, with a joint parliament. This collection of documents highlights the outcomes of the IPA Council’s plenary sessions, as it tried to define its role within the CIS.

The first plenary session was held on 14 September 1992 in Bishkek. Ruslan Khasbulatov, speaker of the Russian parliament, was elected the Council’s chairman. Following the meeting, Khasbulatov announced here that “this is the beginning of the creation of a new confederation.” In the interview included here, he compares the IPA to the European Parliament, and denies that his plans for it have anything in common with reinstituting the USSR Supreme Soviet. It is noteworthy, however, that despite the momentous importance Khasbulatov attached to the organization, its agenda in January was restricted to coordinating regulations on social security, conditions for entrepreneurs, and some trade activities, as well as establishing a joint publication on legal issues.

On 29 September 1992, Khasbulatov issued his own “Guidelines” (signed only by himself) expressing the goal of the IPA as being to “provide legal support for a common economic space within the framework of the Commonwealth and to prevent and eliminate juridical conflicts in the process of regulating social and other processes.” (The phrasing raises the question of why the IPA should try to eliminate all disagreement, which is bound to occur among independent national legislatures.) The guidelines, which are included here, list ten areas in which Khasbulatov hopes to “eliminate contradictions between national legislation.”

At the second plenary session of the IPA Council on 28 December, Khasbulatov proves himself to be an extremely ambitious and controlling chairman. In his opening statement, he says: “Given the chaotic and unpredictable nature of the talks between the heads of the CIS member states, the Interparliamentary Assembly should take charge of the integration processes.”

Although Chairman Khasbulatov attempts to lead a discussion on coordinating the constitutions of CIS member states, the representatives confine themselves to sharing experiences and to a discussion of values and principles they hold in common. The disparate views of the agency’s role in the Commonwealth are evident from post-session interviews included in this selection of documents. Only the Kazakh representative draws attention to the “former unified state, which existed for hundreds of years,” as being a model for creating a “life-support system” in the CIS. The Russian Supreme Soviet representative, Sergey Sirotkin, who is also quoted here, says the IPA is responsible for recreating “the Union’s complex legacy at a qualitatively new level.”

Nothing much has been written about the IPA's activities during 1993. Membership remained stagnant at six. Leadership attention shifted to the draft Economic Treaty, introduced during the spring CIS summit and to the extraordinary developments in Russia's internal politics. Khasbulatov was removed from the chairmanship following the Russian Supreme Soviet's October uprising against the Yeltsin government. It appears that the IPA's influence over the economic integrationist goals harbored by Russia and Kazakhstan became eclipsed by the Economic Union treaties being drafted within the full CIS and separately among its members (see Chapter 6).

During a special meeting of CIS parliament heads in St. Petersburg in February 1994, Vladimir Shumeyko is elected by secret ballot as the new IPA chairman. A Segodnya article in this collection refers to a list of laws which the Russian delegation announces it will submit "under Russian sponsorship" for enactment at the upcoming March IPA plenary session. This list, somewhat ominously, includes procedures for imposing martial law on CIS territory—"On Mobilization," "On the Procedure for the Development, Production, Testing, and Delivery of Armaments and Military Hardware," among others.

Vladimir Shumeyko is another strong sponsor of the Russian restorationist agenda. A series of 1994 press accounts in this collection reviews his goals for the IPA's role in strengthening the CIS. In November, Yuriy Lepskiy, writing here in Trud, notes the lack of attention being accorded to the IPA's activities, but predicts that it will nevertheless be the determining force in shaping future CIS integration. It is interesting to note that, in analyzing the IPA's potential impact, he foresees the 1996 Russian presidency going to those who are now "quietly and professionally creating the legal basis" for the renewed Union.

The sixth plenary IPA Council session was held on 20 February 1995. The main issue on the agenda, which is reviewed here, was how to strengthen the IPA, which had not progressed far despite all the dedication of its Russian chairmen. The explanation given for its weak performance in Rossiyskaya Gazeta is that the association's initiatives are "not effective due to the disparity between national legislation"-a rather obvious statement making it appear that the Russian delegation might have been deluding itself. Speaking on the eve of the February plenary session, Shumeyko moves far to the right, openly supporting Nursultan Nazarbaev's initiative to create a "Eurasian Parliament." (Shumeyko is re-elected chairman at the session, by secret ballot.) Following the meeting of parliament heads, Shumeyko says a new draft IPA Convention to be discussed in May will raise the institution to a level equal in authority with the CIS Councils of Heads of State and Government. His optimism seems to correspond more with Russian policies than with a consensus of CIS members, of which there were seven as of mid-1995. The series of documents on the IPA included here ends with an interview with Vladimir Shumeyko on 16 May 1995 in which he confidently discusses the outcome of the council's sixth plenary session, going into some detail on what he calls the "model Civil Codes" for the CIS's participating members. The interviewer questions him at some length on why these are considered “model” codes.

8.23 Khasbulatov on New Confederation

Interfax, 14 September 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Chairman of the Russian Supreme Soviet Ruslan Khasbulatov believes the establishment of an interparliamentary assembly of CIS nations is “the beginning of the creation of a new confederation.” He announced this Monday [14 September] in Bishkek, where he arrived to participate in the assembly, which starts 15 September.

According to Khasbulatov, Ukraine’s absence in no way affects the work of the interparliamentary assembly, since Ukraine plans to participate in the assembly in the future.

Chairman of Kyrgyzstan’s parliament Medetkan Sherimkulov pointed out that he views the Interparliamentary Assembly as similar to the European parliament and doesn’t believe it is a repetition of the USSR Supreme Soviet. He said the assembly will become an independently operating organ which will have the right to protest decisions made by heads of Commonwealth states.

8.24 IPA Agenda Described

Interfax, 15 September 1992 [FBIS Translation]

A parliamentary assembly of CIS countries is opening in Bishkek today. In the morning the council of the assembly consisting of the speakers of parliaments held a session.

On the first day the role of parliaments in expanding relations between community countries is to be discussed, as well as the draft regulations of the assembly. The working bodies are also expected to be elected.

There will be a debate on the efforts of parliaments to guarantee social security, the coordination of legislations in the economy, the foundation of a joint weekly publication, the formation of a parliamentary club of political movements and parties.

According to the press service of the assembly, the Kazakh delegation does not think it useful to form a club because the assembly does not have the purpose of coordinating the actions of political movements and parties.

A draft resolution on cooperation between parliaments in economic legislation has been circulated. The aim is to create favorable legal conditions for entrepreneurship and free trade throughout the CIS.

The draft resolution says that economic laws, including laws on enterprise, finance, banking, prices, and taxes, should be based on common concepts and their adoption should be coordinated. It is necessary to exchange information about legislation that has been passed or is in the makings and it is desirable to remove contradictions between the laws of different member countries.

8.25 Document on Aligning Legislation in CIS States

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 19 September 1992 [FBIS Translation]

“Basic Guidelines for Rapprochement Between the National Legislation of the Commonwealth Member States,” signed by CIS Assembly Council Chairman R. Khasbulatov in Bishkek on 15 September.

The Interparliamentary Assembly of the CIS member states recognizes the need to provide legal support for a common economic space within the framework of the Commonwealth and prevent and eliminate juridical conflicts in the process of regulating social and other processes. The Interparliamentary Assembly sets itself the goal of assisting by every means the creation of the most favorable and equal legal conditions for the development of enterprise, economic activity, and free trade throughout the Commonwealth, economic security, and also the creation of common guarantees of citizens' rights.

1. The Interparliamentary Assembly deems it advisable to bring about a rapprochement between national legislation in the following areas:

- the status and general conditions of the activity of enterprises and other economic entities;
- legal support for common energy networks and nuclear power engineering;
- legal regulation of interstate transport networks;
- conditions for the movement of goods and financial resources between states and common procedures for mutual settlements;
- customs rules and tariffs;
- basic conditions for the movement of the work force and guarantees of the labor and social rights of employees;
- conditions and regulations for the exchange of information between states;
- basic principles for the rational exploitation of national resources and for ecological security;

-foreign economic activity, including foreign investments and currency regulation;

-inventions, discoveries, industrial models, and trademarks.

2. It is recommended that activity to bring about rapprochement between national legislation be based on common concepts and be carried out in a coordinated fashion, as far as possible ensuring that the corresponding acts are adopted at the same time.

3. With the aim of eliminating contradictions between national legislation, the Interparliamentary Assembly and the Supreme Soviets (parliaments) will use such forms of work as: recommended (model) legislative acts of the Interparliamentary Assembly, mutual exchange of information on legislative acts after adoption or, where necessary, during preparation, joint discussion of legislation issues, examination of questions of rapprochement between legislation in Commonwealth coordination institutions, scientific conferences and recommendations from academics on ways and means of bringing about rapprochement between legislation.

4. In the event of the discovery of substantive differences in legislative regulation which hinder the formation and functioning of a unified market, a consultative conference of the chairmen of Supreme Soviets (parliaments) is to determine the timetable and procedure for preparing proposals to overcome these differences.

5. In view of the important role of legally binding acts in the legal regulation of relations in the member states of the CIS, the Council of Commonwealth Heads of State is to be instructed to discuss ways and means of coordinating and aligning the legally binding acts as far as their jurisdiction applies.

[Signed] Assembly Council Chairman R. Khasbulatov
[Issued in] Bishkek, 15 September 1992

8.26 Khasbulatov Addresses IPA Session

Interfax, 28 December 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Given the chaotic and unpredictable nature of talks between the heads of the CIS member states, the Interparliamentary

Assembly should take charge of the integration processes, chairman of the Russian parliament Ruslan Khasbulatov, who also chairs the Interparliamentary Assembly, said at the opening of the second plenary meeting of the Interparliamentary Assembly in St. Petersburg today.

The plenary meeting is attended by representatives of Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Russia, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan, and by observers from Azerbaijan. Among the guests are delegates of the Parliamentary Assembly of Northern Europe, the Northern Council, Finland, and Bulgaria. The agenda includes various aspects of the constitutional reform in the CIS, the implementation of the agreements on coordinating the national legislative systems and principles regulating citizenship matters in the Interparliamentary Assembly's member states.

Having referred to the opinion of many observers, Khasbulatov said that the disintegration of the USSR was not a fatal phenomenon, but the result of serious political errors. He also expressed the opinion that the Interparliamentary Assembly should establish the exact cause of the Soviet Union's breakup.

To quote Khasbulatov, the interest in the assembly's activity has increased lately, largely due to a splash of integration moods, which can be seen from various opinion polls and from the activity of political parties and movements.

He said that the assembly should draft a common policy, reflecting the equality of the CIS member states and excluding any pressure or roll-back to the past.

The Russian Movement for Democratic Reform believes that the plenary meeting of the Interparliamentary Assembly should attach priority importance to the search for solutions that would stop disintegration and create conditions for restoring normal economic contacts between the newly independent states.

On the eve of the plenary meeting, the Movement for Democratic Reform circulated a statement in Moscow, which says that due account should be taken of the bilateral and interstate interests of the CIS states and that the Assembly might discuss the possibility of setting up special state bodies in charge of the entire complex of relations between the CIS member states.

Editor's Note: The following articles document the discussions which have transpired within the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly, (IPA), an institution slated to bring constitutions and legislation into line with one another, especially in the economic realm. The IPA has assumed responsibility for coordinating, above all, the human rights legislation and control mechanisms of the CIS states. Russian participants, as seen in the following, dominate in these discussions.

St. Petersburg-Beksultan Ishimov, chairman of the Kyrgyzstan Supreme Soviet Commission for Legislation Issues, Human Rights, Defense Matters, National Security, and the Struggle Against Crime:

“Constitutional reform cannot be confined to repairing the existing fundamental laws but is called upon to seriously update their content, principles, and forms. While in St. Petersburg we have seen for ourselves that work on draft constitutions is in full swing not only in our country but also in other Commonwealth countries. We have also seen for ourselves that many of us are trying out national constitutions to combine problems of today and a future which is still hard to imagine. This means that we need to exchange experience and information.”

Babken Ararktsyan, chairman of the Armenian Supreme Soviet:

“In speaking of the creation of their own constitutions, my colleagues who have spoken have frequently referred to the experience of other states. But the CIS countries were missing from these lists. I believe that it is possible to create within the framework of the Interparliamentary Assembly a structure which could make an expert appraisal of the constitutions which are still being drawn up. Being the basis of the state’s legislation, the constitution must always be the focus of attention for countries which intend to cooperate closely in the future.

“We very much hope not only for an exchange of experience in the course of constitutional reforms but also that we will confirm and enshrine in the new constitutions our adherence to common principles. People’s lives depend on this, as does, in the final analysis, something of which all people in our states dream: of returning to the principles of friendship, cooperation, and mutual respect which we always had.

“The new independent countries have inherited from the former unified state, which existed for many hundreds of years, a common infrastructure, a unified life-support system, and numerous interregional economic ties. Their disruption in recent years has been one of the most important causes of the crisis. In addition to purely political causes, the splintering of once unified legislation and the emergence of gaps and contradictions in it have been a specific cause of this breakup. It would be useful to complete the specific accords on legislation by creating mutual plans for eliminating groundless legal disagreements and creating legally binding acts under the auspices of the Council of Heads of State and Heads of Government and other structures. Of course, there can be no question of drawing the Commonwealth countries' entire legislation closer together, merely of eliminating contradictions with regard to the common infrastructure, the common 'life-support systems,' and interregional deliveries."

"Control mechanisms are essential in the sphere of human rights. Even the very best constitution with a very broad catalogue of rights is never an adequate guarantee unless rights are backed up by control. A complex legacy of the Union's breakup is the fact that the population of the now sovereign states has been wrested from the unified humanitarian area. We are responsible for recreating it at a qualitatively new level. With any degree of our integration in the 'European' or 'Asian' home, we remain, all the same, a unified geopolitical area."

Evgeniy Shaposhnikov, commander-in-chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces:

"The breaking up of the armed forces of the former USSR into constituent parts has been far from painless.

The second serious loss has been the lowering of the armed forces' combat ability and of the CIS states' level of security. Unless we wish to dissemble, we should admit that the combat readiness of the Commonwealth's army is a cause for very serious alarm. Certain states are reckoning on building strong and effective modern defenses on their own. The high command seeks to coordinate the Defense Ministries' efforts on questions of military and military-technical policy in the Commonwealth. In this we receive support and understanding from Armenia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, and Russia. Ukraine and Turkmenistan participate in military cooperation only on certain questions, and the Belarusian Defense Ministry constantly vacillates. Moldova is moving farther and farther away from the CIS military organization. We need a clear-cut and definite approach in the positions of parliaments and their assistance. The high command proposes the idea of creating a defensive union which will constitute the military basis of the CIS countries' collective security system, and its doctrine must be defensive and be a generalized reflection of national military doctrines."

8.28 Russia to Sponsor CIS Laws at Interparliamentary Assembly

Elena Tregubova Segodnya, 2 February 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The following article is significant because it documents Russia's dominant sponsorship of CIS-wide laws.

[Elena Tregubova reports under the "CIS" rubric: "Federation Council Delegation to Interparliamentary

Assembly Named. 'Russia Remains Main Sponsor of Legislation'.']

The Federation Council has prepared a list of representatives to attend the upcoming meeting of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly [IPA]. The delegation will apparently include Federation Council Speaker Vladimir Shumeyko; Vadim Gustov, chairman of the Federation Council's Committee for CIS Affairs; Evgeniy Pavlov, his deputy; and Viktor Stepanov, Federation Council member and chairman of the Karelian Supreme Soviet.

Vadim Gustov recalled that the meeting of CIS parliamentary heads at St. Petersburg on 8-9 February will focus on the election of an Interparliamentary Assembly chairman "to replace the departed Ruslan Khasbulatov." According to Gustov, reports that Vladimir Shumeyko has recently offered the post of "CIS speaker" to the "fired" Stanislav Shushkevich "do not square with reality, because this post can only be held by an acting head of parliament." He said that "talk about Shushkevich took place before recent events."

The chairman of the Federation Council's Committee for CIS Affairs listed legislative enactments that would be worked out under "Russia's sponsorship." Some of them are based on the CIS "Treaty on Collective Security" (many provisions of which Stanislav Shushkevich opposed as speaker of the Belarusian Supreme Soviet); they include enactments on the procedure law on CIS territory, "On Mobilization for the Development, Production of Armaments and Military Forces."

The IPA plenary session scheduled March will set up a number of commit committee chairman assured, “Russia its ideas along, because in the light of always been and will be the main s legislation within the CIS.”

8.29 CIS Interparliamentary Assembly Meets in St. Petersburg: Shumeyko Views Tasks

Svetlana Ivanova ITAR-TASS, 8 February 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: It is not entirely clear what Vladimir Shumeyko thinks he can do to get CIS states' parliaments to ratify pending CIS treaties, but he clearly hopes to apply pressure on state parliaments through their IPA delegates.

St. Petersburg, 8 February, TASS-Speakers of the two chambers of the Russian parliament, Vladimir Shumeyko and Ivan Rybkin, have arrived here today to attend a session of the Council of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly.

Shumeyko told ITAR-TASS at the airport here that even in dealing with international matters some leaders had the habit of "looking at what the neighbor will do" and waiting for somebody to make the first step. "This is why," the speaker of the Council of the Federation (the upper chamber of the Russian parliament) believes, "the Economic Union treaty, signed on 24 September 1993, has still not been ratified by CIS parliaments."

Shumeyko believes that the main task confronting the current session of the Interparliamentary Assembly is to create a mechanism to settle problems linked with the ratification of interstate treaties. Shumeyko thinks the leaders of the delegations, attending the current session, are able to reach an agreement on the simultaneous ratification of the Economic Union treaty by all the CIS parliaments.

8.30 Shumeyko Says CIS Strengthened

Gennadiy Talalaev ITAR-TASS, 8 February 1994
[FBIS Translation]

St. Petersburg 8 February TASS-Vladimir Shumeyko, elected chairman of the Interparliamentary Assembly (IPA) of the Commonwealth of Independent States by secret ballot here today, told ITAR-TASS that the assembly has a great role to play in strengthening the Commonwealth. "No matter what economic and other agreements may be signed by the executive, they are difficult to translate into life without a legislative basis which provides a firm foundation," Shumeyko said in an exclusive interview with ITAR-TASS.

"This foundation can be created only by the parliaments of the Commonwealth member states. If we learn to consider coordination of legislation of all CIS states at IPA sessions, we shall be able to remove unnecessary barriers hampering the development of market economies and combine the national economies of the Commonwealth member states quite soon. I mean legislation concerning taxes, export/import duties, and the customs union," Vladimir Shumeyko said and added that much work was lying ahead.

As concerns IPA's political significance, it is also great, according to the assembly chairman. Interparliamentary assemblies have long existed in Europe and Asia, he said. Now an Interparliamentary Assembly has also appeared on the territory of the former Soviet Union. "It must have a significant weight in the world because it has brought together countries which have embarked on the path of democratic reforms," Shumeyko said. He stressed the need of establishing contacts with other, older interparliamentary assemblies.

8.31 Shumeyko Says Democratic Reform Depends on Integration

Lyudmila Ermakova ITAR-TASS, 29 October 1994
[FBIS Translation]

“Time and new circumstances serve us, because they produce an increased awareness of the fact that our prevalence over the economic crisis and the fate of democratic reforms in the CIS member states depend on the results of integration,” said Vladimir Shumeyko, chairman of the Council of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly, when addressing the latter’s fifth session here on Saturday.

The integration has reached the stage of concrete decisions based on stage-by-stage shaping of an Economic Union, Shumeyko pointed out.

Heads of CIS member states passed a memorandum setting out guidelines for integration at their recent summit. To encourage integration, it is necessary to work out its legislative basis, he said.

The way Shumeyko sees it, the main task of parliaments of the CIS member states consists of “working out a thoroughly considered legislative basis for shaping the Economic Union, intensifying efforts aimed at drawing the national legislations closer together, and coordinating (parliaments’) law-making activities for the purpose of forming a unified law-governed space.”

We should propose that the CIS Heads of State adopt a convention on the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly, which would enhance its legitimacy both on interstate and interparliamentary levels and correspond to the international practice of parliamentary organizations, he said.

The final documents adopted at the Moscow summit of the CIS Heads of State this month “expanded the horizons for coordinating the law-making activities” in particular, as far as entrepreneurial activities, taxation, and investments are concerned. Shumeyko described the models of a civic code and a criminal-procedural code as major contributions toward the integration.

The peacemaking function of the assembly is ever growing in importance, Shumeyko said.

The tangible result of such efforts may be seen in the Bishkek Protocol, which brought about cessation of hostilities in Nagorno-Karabakh last spring, he recalled.

The Council of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly formed a peacemaking task force to tackle the Georgian- Abkhazian crisis at its session late in the evening on Friday. Another peacemaking task force, which is to tackle the crisis in the Trans-Dniester region, will soon be formed.

In conclusion, the chairman of the upper house of the Russian parliament thanked Azerbaijan, Turkmenistan, Kazakhstan, and Uzbekistan for the support they gave to the inhabitants of the Sakhalin region who suffered badly from recent natural disasters.

8.32 Shumeyko Argues CIS Court Not Necessary

Interfax, 30 October 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Chairman of the Russian Federation Council and the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly Vladimir Shumeyko believes that the Commonwealth of Independent States does not need a single court.

Answering the question put by Interfax he told the news conference in St. Petersburg on Saturday that the only thing to be discussed is the economic court of arbitration within the CIS framework.

Shumeyko said that the CIS countries are trying to draw closer their legislation systems and as soon as this is achieved court decisions of CIS member states will be similar.

Meanwhile, chairman of the Belarusian parliament, Myacheslav Hryb said that the economic court of arbitration had been created in Minsk. It will resolve financial disagreements between CIS member states.

8.33 CIS Assembly Seen Shaping Integration

Yuriy Lepskiy Trud, 4 November 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Unfortunately we write little and know even less about what happens at sessions of the Interparliamentary Assembly. To us it seems to be a particularly dull and uninteresting event. I also thought that way but I was wrong.

Now I believe that it is at the Tauride Palace in St. Petersburg that the economic, political, and social models of our life in the twenty-first century are being quietly and professionally shaped (let me remind you that the end of the twentieth century is just six years away). It is not impossible, furthermore, that we will find out about the "Tauride" deliberations far earlier than that, for example, during the 1996 summer and fall political season in Russia.

What does the Interparliamentary Assembly actually do? Briefly, the official version is that it is actively preparing the legislative base for a new integration of the republics of the former USSR. Unofficially, however, the Interparliamentary Assembly has begun building the new home that we will possibly move into in a few years' time. The foundations of that building are being laid now; model legislation (or acceptable legislation common to all the sovereign republics of the CIS) is being written and adopted. The assembly's present session, for example, has approved part one of the CIS states' Civil Code. To give you an idea of this document's content, let me mention just a few of its 447 articles: "Protection of honor, dignity, and professional reputation," "Right to protection of personal privacy," "Right to inviolability of the home," "Enterprise," "Official and commercial secrecy," "Money," "Basic provisions on the joint-stock company," "Public funds," "Right of ownership and other property rights . . ."

The important thing is that this document, which does not contain a single declaration, is entirely practical, adapted to our actual daily lives, and has the form, essence, and force of a law which is recommendatory for the time being. I would remind you that the Civil Code is a legislative model common to all CIS states. I stress the word common.

What else does the assembly plan to adopt in common for the whole CIS? Next year it will be discussing a model Criminal Code, Labor Code, and Housing Code. At the Tauride Palace they will be examining the following common laws: "On the Principles of Settlements Among Economic Components of the Interstate Economic Committee Member Countries," "On Securities," "On Joint-Stock Companies," "On Limited-Liability Companies,” “On Agreed Common Standards for the Production of Output in the CIS States,” “On the Basic Principles of Taxation,” “On the Concept of Collective Security of the States Party to the Collective Security Treaty,” “On the Protection of Consumers’ Rights.” ... This is far from a complete list of laws common to the CIS republics, but it is enough for us to understand that we are going to be living together in earnest for a long time to come. Whereas in the past the foundations of our common home were built on the shifting sands of the political declarations written by S. Mikhalkov and G. El-Registan, but in reality held together by the steel bonds of the empire, now they are being created on a quite firm legal foundation and written by the full-fledged representatives of sovereign states and their strength will be determined by how much the partners need one another.

Around four years ago, if you recall, the most widely used words in our political lexicon were “renewed Union.” This meant that if the republics of the USSR were to get greater autonomy and Moscow fewer administrative functions, everyone would be content and happy in the Union thus renewed. Now it is clear that these ideas were quite naive. Moscow would never actually surrender its administrative privileges to the republics voluntarily and the opposite of that would mean the suicide of the system. It sometimes seems to me that the unrestrained sovereignty bandwagon, the rapid formation of republic bureaucracies, the bloody regional conflicts, the explosions of nationalism, and the ethnic cleansing are quite simply the real price of the renewal of the Union. Undoubtedly the price is too high. However, that is the price that is being paid for the structural alteration of a gigantic country and the attempt to transform it into what really is a union of sovereign and equal members. It seems to me that the best guarantees of sovereignty and equality are the existence of ethnic property owners in the republics and a local bureaucratic administrative apparatus which will never simply surrender its powers to Moscow just like that. Whether all this is worth even a single human life is another matter....

One way or another the Interparliamentary Assembly, in my view, is already laying the foundations today of a really new Union of Sovereign States and not simply a commonwealth of republics of the former USSR. I wonder what the supporters of the restoration of the USSR will do when everything that we have talked about becomes a political reality? Either they will publicly thank the Interparliamentary Assembly or they will choose to fight for ideological purity (or rather for the second and third “s” in the abbreviation-denoting “Soviet” and ”Socialist”). In any event, it is the Interparliamentary Assembly which has done quite a lot to ensure that in 1996 the electorate who previously voted for the Umalatovs, Zhirinovskiys, Konstantinovs, and Anpilovs give their vote to those who made the renewed Union a reality not at rallies but by quietly and professionally creating its legal basis.

However, it is not that easy. I only had to ask the heads of the republic delegations a question about the “renewed Union” to immediately receive in reply a series of moral lectures on what a journalist should and should not ask. Answering my question on the renewed Union, Abish Kekilbaev, chairman of the Kazakhstan Supreme Council, Pyotr Luchinskiy, speaker of the Moldovan parliament, Yashar Aliyev, deputy chairman of the Azerbaijan National Assembly, and Ara Saakyan, first deputy chairman of the Armenian Supreme Council, on the contrary, did everything they could to stress the sovereignty of their republics. Only Abish Kekilbaev cautiously used the term “integration.” Essentially I was taught a lesson in political good manners and it served me right! Of course, I should have remembered that in the house of a hanged man you do not talk about ropes, so among the heads of the CIS parliaments you should scarcely utter the word “Union,” especially not in the sense of “indestructible.”

The movement toward one another, or integration, is now taking place with great caution on the thin fall ice which has finally formed on the surface of the recently stormy sea of national ambitions and interrepublic conflicts. Any injudicious movement and the ice could break and everyone would drift away on their own ice floe. The important thing here is to do nothing which would cause panic, obstruction, or even endanger this cautious movement.

Vladimir Shumeyko, chairman of the Interparliamentary Assembly, believes that the process of political integration should not be hurried but should occur strictly after the strengthening of economic ties. The economy must dictate to the politicians both the forms of unification, the timetable, and the intensity of that process. I think he is right. For too long everything has been the other way around in our country: Politics forced the economy and indeed people’s lives to fit into the framework of a single ideological doctrine. We know what the result of that was. Now the solution of political problems- Karabakh, Abkhazia, the Trans-Dniester region-will have to wait for the results of economic integration. And as for the “renewed Union,” Shumeyko answered that question using the words of Ukrainian President Kuchma, who commented: “Anyone who does not regret the disintegration of the USSR has no heart; anyone who hopes to revive it has no head.” Well, you cannot bring back the past, do not make the same mistake twice. That is all there is to it.

However, not everything that existed in the past has gone forever. Prior to the Interparliamentary Assembly session in the Tauride Palace an international conference opened on the legal problems of the social protection of veterans of the last draft of the war. It seems that they, drafted as seventeen-yearolds in the last year of the war, still do not even have the status of Great Patriotic War Veterans. Furthermore, many of those who do have that status still do not have decent housing, high-quality medical services, or a worthwhile pension even to this day.... There is just one thing that no one can take away from them: their common memory of the war, of their dead comrades, of the difficult days and nights at the front and in the rear, and of the hard postwar life given wholeheartedly to their common motherland-the Soviet Union.

These people are still alive, they have not disappeared into the past along with the name of the country, its cities, streets, and lanes. And everything that subsequent generations consider past has not gone, it all continues to live on with them and therefore with us. If you do not understand that, you have neither a heart nor a head.

8.34 Report on CIS Interparliamentary Assembly Council Session

Sergey Alekhin Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 22 February 1995
[FBIS Translation]

[Report by Sergey Alekhin: “Members of Parliament, Unite! Single Information Area Essential to CIS”]

More than twenty questions concerning economic, social, and cultural cooperation between Commonwealth states were placed on the agenda of the CIS countries’ Interparliamentary Assembly [IPA] Council session which took place in St. Petersburg.

Questions of strengthening the IPA and of its cooperation with the parliaments of CIS member states occupied a central position in the work of the nine countries’ delegations.

But from a practical point of view, there is the question of changing the status of the IPA, which does not at present have any direct influence on the political and social processes in Russia and the CIS countries, although quite a few very necessary and appropriate documents have been produced within the framework of this interstate formation. But they are not effective due to the disparity between national legislation. Speaking at the meeting of CIS Heads of State and Government in Alma-Ata on the eve of the IPA Council session, Vladimir Shumeyko, speaker of the Russian parliament's upper chamber, supported an initiative by Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev to create a so-called Eurasian parliament.

At the final press conference, Vladimir Shumeyko, who has again been elected to the same post, emphasized the extreme importance of the draft convention's first paragraph confirming the assembly as an organ of interstate cooperation. In his opinion this should raise the assembly to the level of the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government. Shumeyko considers that the role of the CIS member countries' IPA will without doubt be strengthened in the future and it is possible that it will be renamed and transformed into a parliamentary assembly with the right to adopt laws which are binding throughout the Commonwealth's territory.

However, it is pointless at present to think about the IPA's development and the enhancement of its role when we do not possess a common information area. People in the states, which not so long ago comprised a single country, now know more about the situation in Germany or life in the United States than about the joys and misfortunes of their nearest neighbors across customs checkpoints. Therefore, a decree was adopted at the current assembly on the formation of a special organ under the IPA Council: the Council of Commonwealth Countries' News Agency Leaders.

Yuriy Sizov, executive director of the Council of CIS State News Agency Leaders, emphasized in a conversation with your Rossiyskaya Gazeta correspondent that the CIS states' aspiration to more efficiently provide broader and more diverse information about the political, economic, and social processes taking place in the CIS should be at the heart of a coordinated information policy.

Questions of strengthening peace and security on the territory of Commonwealth states were examined at the IPA Council's February session. It was proposed that IPA peacekeeping groups continue the quest for ways to achieve a political settlement in the Georgian-Abkhaz and Trans-Dniester Region conflicts.

Particular attention was paid at the current meeting to the preparation of recommendatory legislative acts, aimed at stepping up the struggle against organized crime in Commonwealth countries. A program committee and working groups have been formed to produce a model Criminal Code and Code of Criminal Procedure.

Other questions of interparliamentary cooperation were also examined at the current assembly.

8.35 Interparliamentary Chief Discusses CIS Integration

Interview by Yuriy Lepskiy Trud, 16 May 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The Sixth Plenary Meeting of the Interparliamentary Assembly of the CIS Countries took place in St. Petersburg. Trud's political commentator talked with its chairman, Vladimir Shumeyko.

[Lepskiy]: There is a persistent suspicion with respect to the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly: with the help of this organization, the Soviet Union is being quietly reconstructed....

[Shumeyko]: Well, it is 1925 again! It is impossible to reconstruct the former USSR, either quietly or noisily. What we are actually doing goes by another name-the strengthening of integration within the framework of the CIS.

[Lepskiy]: But, perhaps, this is basically no different?

[Shumeyko]: Here is the current agenda of the IPA [Interparliamentary Assembly]. We intend to examine and adopt the second part of the model Civil Code for the CIS's participating members. I would remind you that the Civil Code is the law which regulates the daily mutual relations of a person with respect to property and with respect to the organizations and structures which represent in our countries the new market relations. This time, we are also discussing a model Criminal Code and Criminal Procedure Code for the Commonwealth's countries. ...

[Shumeyko]: Because the CIS countries' parliaments view them as models for the development of their own laws. During this process, the essential strategic ideas of the model are preserved, while the details may well be modified or adapted to the needs of a specific state. But, as a result, within the CIS's framework, we obtain a unified legal domain without infringing the sovereignty of the independent states. Just imagine how important the adoption of unified criminal procedure legislation will be for us. This will make it possible to find, to neutralize, and to punish criminals rapidly, efficiently and without delays, regardless of the state in which they committed the crimes. For the time being, however, our disunity is creating splendid opportunities for criminal structures to evade accountability.

And here is one more example for you. We are once again examining a draft of model legislation on financial-industrial groups in the CIS. Such groups will establish their own banks and insurance companies. It is very important that the mutual relations of the various states' enterprises "within" a financial-industrial group will not be international in status. Within the framework of this association, the partners maintain domestic prices and economic ties have been simplified to the maximum extent. This will make it possible for us to preserve the high-tech industries which existed within the bounds of the former USSR and which fell apart together with it. For example, the production of civilian aircraft. And there are plenty of examples! Just recently, I was at Baykonur. Today, Russia is paying Kazakhstan $20 million a year to lease the cosmodrome. As for the cosmodrome itself, there is only enough money at least to maintain this unique installation in operating condition somehow and to preserve its infrastructure. It turned out that there, just in the Buran [shuttle] program, there were 650 absolutely new technologies. But both Baykonur and Buran were developed through the efforts of the former union's many republics, since Russia alone was not able to do this then, and it is not able to do so now. This is why we consider it essentially important to maintain a unified legal and economic domain on the territory of the former union. I hope you agree that this is scarcely reminiscent of a process for the reconstruction of the USSR in the form that the leftist radicals picture it.

[Lepskiy]: But are you not afraid that, when you finally restore a unified economic domain and a unified market within its former borders, when all these subcontractors and suppliers again turn to one another, then the citizens of the CIS countries will one day, to their consternation, discover in the shops the Rubin [Ruby] and Izumrud [Emerald] television sets, even though they will have barely begun to get used to the Sony and Philips receivers so standard for the rest of the world? To put it briefly, do you not believe that all this economic integration is beneficial only to those who are used to living within the bounds of a closed, non-competitive market?

[Shumeyko]: First of all, if a market is closed and noncompetitive, then this is no market at all, rather, it is called something else. But, if this is a real market, then people will always buy in it what is of the better quality and what is cheaper. You know that, in Kaliningrad oblast, there is a city-Sovetsk-and there is a pulp and paper combine. So, this combine produced cardboard of disgracefully poor quality, but the production was sold under those Soviet-era conditions in one of the USSR's republics. The plant did not sell its own cardboard, it supplied it. The [Soviet] Union collapsed and market relations of one sort or another arose and it became very clear very quickly that no one needed the "Soviet" cardboard. Now they are producing remarkable wallpaper and selling it with enormous success. Thus, I want to tell you that the enterprises which are being integrated today into a unified economic domain are no longer the ones which existed previously and that the republics are not the ones which made up the USSR at one time. Much has changed. And what we want to create will not be a closed market and it will contain all the best things produced in other countries, as well as those things at which the USSR was good at one time. I am talking about the high-quality space technologies, the achievements of aircraft building, and many other things about which Trud's readers know as well as I do. So, Sony and Philips will not disappear from our shops, but we will also not be building a new Russian economy for the sake of increasing employment in Japan or Germany.

[Lepskiy]: As of 12 May, a year had passed since the day that a real armistice ensued in Nagorno-Karabakh. It is well known that achieving this was the successful result of the efforts of the peacemaking group under the auspices of the Interparliamentary Assembly, which finally led to the signing of the Bishkek Protocol. Attempts to stop the bloodshed in Karabakh had been undertaken previously as well. Why, in your opinion, did the Interparliamentary Assembly's peacemaking activities prove to be more successful here than those of others?

[Shumeyko]: Because these peacemaking activities were carried out by deputies who knew the problem very well from the inside. And also because the deputies from the various sides had one thing in common: they had all been elected by their own peoples and were not seeking in the negotiating process either personal profit or political dividends. They were sincerely striving for one thing-for peace. By the way, we understood that it is precisely on the basis of the Karabakh example that the work of the peacemaking deputy groups may be effective. Now a peacemaking deputy group under the auspices of the Interparliamentary Assembly is also at work in Moldova. Recently, we met with Eduard Shevardnadze and discussed for a quite lengthy period the Interparliamentary Assembly's participation in settling matters in Abkhazia. I think that the leaders of many CIS states have sensed the Interparliamentary Assembly's peacemaking capabilities. And this is good.

[Shumeyko]: I think not. You see, the Interparliamentary Assembly is, all the same, an international organization, while the conflict in Chechnya is an internal Russian matter, inasmuch as Chechnya is a component of the Russian Federation.

[Lepskiy]: Do you want to say that Chechnya cannot be viewed as an independent party in the conflict?

[Shumeyko]: Exactly so.

[Lepskiy]: How would you regard the idea of establishing, under the auspices of the Interparliamentary Assembly, a summer camp or holiday resort, where children from Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Nagorno-Karabakh, from Ukraine and Russia, and from Georgia and Abkhazia would live and vacation together?

[Shumeyko]: In my opinion, it is an excellent idea. It works for the future. It would then be a sin for fathers whose children are friends to shoot one another. I support it. And what is more. At the end of May, the heads of state of the CIS are supposed to gather in Minsk for a routine meeting. It is anticipated that the Convention on the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly will be adopted at this meeting. The convention about which I am talking provides for the establishment of a special Interparliamentary Assembly humanitarian fund. We could allocate money from this fund for the realization of this idea. It is something worthwhile.

8.36 Future UN Role as Main Peacekeeper in CIS Considered

Boris Sitnikov ITAR-TASS, 31 August 1995 [FBIS Translation]

United Nations, 31 August (Itar-Tass)—“n conditions where the United Nations’ strained resources do not permit it to undertake the conduct of its own full-scale peacekeeping operations in conflict zones in the territory of CIS member countries, it should delegate its powers to the CIS peacekeeping forces and provide financial, technical, and economic assistance to the efforts of the Commonwealth member states aiming to maintain peace and settle conflicts in the hot spots of the Commonwealth of Independent States,” Deputy Chairman of the Federation Council of the Federal Assembly of the Russian Federation Valerian Viktorov said at a special session of the Interparliamentary Council which is being held here on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations.

“A pressing problem for the United Nations is to ensure regional approaches to maintaining peace and security. It must be admitted that the United Nations and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe are unfortunately unable as yet to provide adequate assistance in preventing and settling regional conflicts, including in Nagorno-Karabakh, Trans-Dniester, and Abkhazia.

“In these conditions, the Council of the Heads of State, the Interparliamentary Assembly, and the Council of the Heads of Government of the Commonwealth member states, seeking to observe the generally accepted international legal norms, standards, and principles, have to prevent threats to peace and ensure Security in the CIS region through their own efforts,” said Viktorov, who represents the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly at the forum.

“A collective security system is now being formed within the framework of the Commonwealth of Independent States on a regional basis, which enhances the role played by parliamentarians in terminating armed conflicts.

“Pursuant to a decision of the Council of the Interparliamentary Assembly, parliamentarians have formed peacekeeping groups to deal with the problems of Nagorno- Karabakh, facilitate the settlement of the Georgian-Abkhazian conflict, and bring an end to confrontation in Trans-Dniester,” Viktorov said.

“The Interparliamentary Assembly, jointly with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation, has succeeded in initiating the signing of the so-called Bishkek protocol by the leaders of the parliaments of the conflicting countries. On the basis of this document, a bloody war was halted in the zone of the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict, and ceasefire was ensured in the conflict zones in Abkhazia and Trans-Dniester with the help of Commonwealth member countries, the Russian Federation above all.

“It appears that the regional approach to the solution of security problems is an important means of strengthening stability in the whole world,” Viktorov said.

“It is advisable for the Interparliamentary Assembly to summarize experience gained by parliamentarians in peacekeeping actions and arrange, jointly with the United Nations and other international organizations, a seminar on “Parliamentarianism and Peacemaking.”

“A seminar of this kind could be held in St. Petersburg where the headquarters of the Interparliamentary Assembly of the Commonwealth of Independent States is located,” Viktorov said.

9 The Military Evolution

Introductory Notes

The dissolution of the Soviet empire left its prodigious armed forces in an ambiguous position. Did they “belong” collectively to the Commonwealth, or to the newly independent Commonwealth states on whose territory they were deployed? The founders of the Commonwealth had very different perceptions of what the answers to this question should be. Russian President Boris Yeltsin, who had presumably discussed this issue with the Soviet defense minister, Evgeniy Shaposhnikov, before the seminal Belovezh Forest meeting, supported the concept of a single, combined CIS armed forces (or a “single CIS defense space”), with Russian officers in full control. For Yeltsin and Shaposhnikov, there was no need for debate. Splitting up the post-Soviet forces would create a security vacuum into which surrounding countries would move, eager for influence in the European and Asian regions of the former Soviet empire. Although both Yeltsin and Shaposhnikov had supported greater autonomy for the former republics during the Novo-Ogarevo talks in 1990, they saw no reason why the new states should want to try to build their own national armies.

A plan for unified Commonwealth armed forces, drafted by Shaposhnikov and the former Ministry of Defense, was discussed at the first summit of CIS Heads of State. This plan was debated at the summit alongside an alternative submitted by the former Soviet chairman of the Committee for Military Reform, General of the Army Konstantin Kobets. The Kobets plan was less centralized and provided only for general coordination among the separate member-state defense ministries. It, ultimately, was the scheme adopted by the CIS Heads of State, reflecting the fears of the former republics that Russia was showing its hegemonic intentions in its defense plans for the Commonwealth. Both plans are analyzed in this chapter by noted Russian military commentator Pavel Felgengauer.

For the other members of the Commonwealth, the military questions weighed heavily on their minds. The Ukrainian president and CIS co-founder, Leonid Kravchuk, in particular, viewed any talk of a unified army as tantamount to the restoration of the USSR and an insupportable breach of sovereignty of the newly independent states. Ukraine therefore shocked Moscow in January 1992 by immediately declaring full control of the former Soviet forces stationed on its territory, and announcing its intention to build a large national army of some 400,000 soldiers. Moreover, Kravchuk and his government declared that the Black Sea Fleet, stationed in Sevastopol on the Crimean peninsula (transferred to Ukrainian suzerainty by Khrushchev in 1954), would become the new Ukrainian navy. Ukraine, in fact, quickly assumed leadership of a small bloc of CIS states that insisted on building their own armies (including Moldova and Azerbaijan). Within a year this bloc had persuaded other non-Russian CIS leaders to take the same course of action. By May 1992, most former republics had established a national Ministry of Defense and were building national armies. The debates over how to divide the former Soviet forces had become acrid disputes, raising much speculation in the press that the CIS was nothing but a fig leaf.

Two events in May demonstrated conclusively that Russia was in for a long and difficult struggle and that the non-Russian CIS heads of state had rejected the CIS as a unified security alliance. On 7 May, President Boris Yeltsin announced that Russia would create its own independent Russian armed forces and Ministry of Defense, indicating that he had decided to pursue a unilateral approach to unifying CIS military capabilities; on 15 May, the CIS Heads of State debated a collective security treaty, with only six countries becoming signatories by the end of the day.

Significantly, Yeltsin chose to build his defense structure on the foundations of the former Soviet military-industrial complex, rather than create a whole new system, and he put a military officer, rather than a civilian, in charge. (Army General Pavel Grachev was appointed Russian defense minister, a position he continued to hold until mid-1996, when Yeltsin established an alliance of convenience with Grachev's rival, Aleksandr Lebed.). How Russia would define its military mission in the CIS and elsewhere immediately became a new security issue for the former Soviet republics.

These leaders fear for the security of their own states in view of a Russian military run in accordance with conservative Soviet military beliefs. This includes the long-standing Soviet military tradition that the formulation of an adequate defense is the sole province of military leaders. Non-Russian CIS leaders worry that there are no effective civilian controls over the Russian military now that Communist Party control has ended and a weakened Russian president appears to rule largely as a result of the personal backing of his defense minister. (By mid-1994, these apprehensions were intensified by the alliance between the Russian military and the increasingly powerful KGB, now split into several new agencies.) Leaders of the Soviet successor states are well aware that military reforms planned during the Gorbachev era had never been implemented. Moreover, the Russian military has suffered the most in the post-Soviet transformation and shown itself to be radically nationalist in its political makeup. The big difference between the Soviet and Russian armies is that now the army will serve Russian Great Power goals and interests rather than those formulated in terms of a socialist internationalist ideology.

Of even greater concern is the size and economic preponderance of the Russian military complex. The Soviet military structure, with all its attendant socio-economic problems, still operates in Russia. Essentially, the economy is still a mobilization economy with a great many ministries engaged in research and production for the armed forces, albeit with reduced resources. Although Russian military spending has been reduced from Soviet days, it is still an unknown quantity, and the military is agitating for far bigger budgets. (Revelations about real Soviet defense spending continue to astonish Western and Russian citizens alike. Some estimates state that the defense sector in the USSR employed 10 million people and consumed more than 25 percent of the Soviet gross national product. Business Week [29 July 1991] quotes 52 percent.) All these facts make non-Russian CIS leaders extremely nervous.

On 15 May 1992 the focus in the Council of CIS Defense Ministers shifted from the reapportionment of former Soviet troops and bases to the drafting and signing of a CIS collective security treaty. At the 15 May Tashkent summit of CIS Heads of State, a Russian draft was signed by six of the eleven Commonwealth members (Georgia had still not joined the CIS). The paucity of support for the treaty was a telling sign of CIS resistance to Russian defense policy. The treaty, often referred to in the CIS as the Tashkent agreement or Tashkent alliance, was rejected by Ukraine and Turkmenistan, whose governments had still not acceded to the treaty when this account went to press in January 1996. The treaty itself is included in Chapter 10. To date it is more of a political symbol than a binding alliance or security doctrine.

Three key unresolved issues have been on the CIS military agenda since the signing of the Tashkent agreement: (1) How should the collective security interests of the CIS be defined? (2) Should the CIS refer to its “external borders” or to “internal borders” of member states? and (3) What kind of coordination should occur among the defense ministries of the twelve CIS member states? For non-Russian CIS leaders, another inescapable issue has been: How will Russia choose to utilize its total forces (about 2.1 million) and soldiers deployed on army bases in other CIS states, and how will Russia relate to Ukraine-the only other real military power in the CIS (with about 400,000 forces)?

Abandonment of the Unified CIS Armed Forces

In 1993, the Soviet military machine continued to devolve into separate, tiny armies (with the exception of Ukraine's army). Without unanimity, the CIS finally abandoned all pretense of creating unified conventional forces on 15 June 1993. Strategic forces were, however, maintained under CIS collective control (under Russia), as decided early in 1992. Nevertheless, even after the collapse of the program for a single defense space, military issues remained the primary bone of contention in CIS relations. Several pieces in this chapter document the collective security treaty debate and the mid-June events that forced Russia to switch to a bilateral and increasingly unilateral approach to military "integration."

A new CIS general staff was created and subordinated to the Council of Ministers of Defense, with General Viktor Samsonov as chief of staff. Samsonov (fifty-two years old at the time) had been chief of staff of the CIS Unified Armed Forces, and before that general staff head of the USSR armed forces as well as USSR first deputy defense minister. Supreme Commander Evgeniy Shaposhnikov was relieved of duty and appointed secretary of the Russian Security Council when the combined armed forces were abolished. Several documents in this chapter describe these events and their subsequent impact on the CIS military debate.

The creation of twelve separate armies was fraught with difficulties. Most forces of the former Soviet republics were made up of mixed ethnic groups, but usually a majority were Russians, and most officers were Russian. Consequently, loyalties to Russia within these forces has in many cases lingered. Since President Yeltsin's face-off with the extreme nationalists in the Russian parliament in October 1993, and the electoral success of nationalists and former communists in the December 1993 parliamentary elections, Russia's relations with the "near abroad" (the former Soviet republics) have evolved into a tougher, more aggressive policy, based on the overt declaration that Russia possesses a "sphere of influence" in the Soviet successor states.

Russian leaders often define their “special interests” in CIS states in terms of their sacred duty to protect the minority rights of the Russian diaspora now living in these countries. Even Andrey Kozyrev defended and encouraged a Russian-dominated economic and political/parliamentary integration among CIS states. Paradoxically, although the CIS states admit that they need closer economic association, most do not want a restoration of the USSR, which they fear is the dominant agenda for most Russian politicians.

On 2 November 1993 the Russian military promulgated its new military doctrine. Several journalist accounts of the doctrine’s orientation and significance are contained in this chapter, along with two interpretative articles on the subject. One of these is by Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev, writing in Krasnaya Zvezda for the neo-democratic position on the doctrine. The other is by Army General Pavel Grachev, writing in Nezavisimaya Gazeta on 4 June 1994, representing Russia’s great power military posture. In the West, the consensus was that the “hawks” in the Russian parliament, Foreign Ministry, and military emerged as victors in the struggle over the drafting of this doctrine.

With its promulgation, Russia launched a campaign to obtain official sanction from the United Nations and individual Western states as the principle “peacekeeper” in the CIS. For Russia, the role implies that the CIS states are its special sphere of influence. No one can deny the need for some type of operational peacekeeping presence in Soviet successor states embroiled in civil war, such as in Tajikistan, Moldova and Georgia, Armenia and Azerbaijan. Yet the extent to which Russia has manipulated these confrontations to its own advantage (especially in Moldova, Georgia, and Azerbaijan) has made Western countries distrustful of its “sphere of influence” and “peacekeeping” rhetoric. Ukraine, in particular, views Russia’s campaign as an attempt to win the right to intervene militarily at will in the CIS states.

During 1994, Russia adopted a bilateral approach to its military relations with the CIS states. Part of the approach included the establishment of military bases and deployment of border troops in the Transcaucasus and Central Asia. This policy has been pursued aggressively and, in light of Russia’s twin campaigns in Chechnya and in the Caspian Sea oil pipeline war, is a cause of high anxiety among all the post-Soviet, non-Russian states. Despite the deplorable social conditions in Russia’s army, it is the strongest tie that binds the CIS states at this time.

Partly in reaction to Russia’s bilateral and regional military pressure, the non-Russian states began to seek separate accommodations with NATO in 1994. By the middle of the year, all the CIS states (including Russia) had joined NATO’s Partnership for Peace (PFP) except Azerbaijan, which signed the accession documents in May 1995. Each state has adopted a neutral position on NATO’s expansion into Central Europe, using publicly veiled statements such as Moldovan President Mircea Snegur’s in an interview with the German newspaper Handelsblatt in November 1995: “We do not think that NATO’s possible broadening towards the East will bring any danger to Moldova’s security,” adding “when NATO begins the expansion, it should necessarily consider all factors, all possible consequences, first and foremost-the Russian factor.”

Because all the non-Russian states, except Ukraine, have tiny armies, their activities in the PFP are necessarily limited. Nonetheless, the PFP has been integrating the PFP countries into an “interactive program” including such activities as training CIS armies and guard units to conduct peacekeeping operations and humanitarian assistance programs, as well as how to control air flights and establish cooperation between civil authorities and military commands. Assisting CIS soldiers to learn English is also a part of some PFP programs in the CIS states. Although Russian military leaders are presumably not pleased about so much interaction, there has been little said publicly about the PFP. The principle taboo is on NATO membership per se.

As usual, Ukraine is a special case. Because of its size and geopolitical importance in the region, its consultations with NATO have gone farther than with the other non-Russian successor states. In September 1995, as documented here, Ukraine and NATO held “sixteen plus one” talks within the framework of the PFP program. Before this, only Russia had been granted this privilege. In October, President Kuchma felt it necessary to oppose the eastward expansion of NATO, but couched his opposition in terms of not wanting a division of Europe, but favoring an “evolutionary” expansion of NATO after the Russian presidential election. In December, Ukraine announced that it would expand its relations beyond the PFP, but not to the point of joining either NATO or the Tashkent alliance.

Several documents describing the types of programs NATO is establishing in the CIS through the PFP, and political statements on the part of CIS leaders (meant to reassure Russia that they do not intend to join NATO), are contained in Chapter 9. These documents give the reader a sense of the delicate but firm way in which non-Russian leaders are treating the issue of CIS external ties as well as the difficulties Russia is having creating any kind of voluntary single defense space within the CIS.

By October 1995, hard-line Eurasianists, who believe that Russia's strategic interests lie to its south and stress the union of Slavic, Transcaucasian, and Central Asian states in a strong alliance, were drafting a second Russian military doctrine that is reputedly far more aggressive and hegemonic than the 1993 doctrine. The influence on the Russian Ministry of Defense of extremists such as Anton Surikov, general director of a mysterious Independent Institute of Defense Studies (INOBS), has been widely conjectured upon in the Russian press. Mr. Surikov has written a long paper cataloguing external threats facing Russia and putting the United States and its policies in the CIS at the top of the list. Subsequent articles by Surikov in right-wing journals have advanced the thesis of a Western conspiracy against Russia and given long explanations of hostile intentions toward Russia emanating from the United States and its fellow members of NATO. The institute and its personnel, who possess sophisticated computer design equipment and a large, modernized office building, were purportedly consulted on a frequent basis by the Russian defense minister, Pavel Grachev. It may be that Surikov's articles constitute nothing more than "paper rhetoric" designed to placate nationalist forces. However, those who want to restore Russia's great power status in the world are using nationalism and external "adversaries" to unite the country and to restore Russia's identity. The views expressed in these articles are not new, but harken back to Eurasianist national themes tolerated by the Soviet Communist Party in order to give the population something around which to rally in difficult economic times. Surikov's paper and articles are provided here to demonstrate how volatile Russian politics had become by late 1995, and leading up to the 1996 Russian presidential election.

The following documents capture the evolution in the CIS military debates among CIS heads of state and government and other officials from January 1992 to December 1995. In certain respects, this debate follows the progressive politicization of the Russian military and the increasingly aggressive direction in the development of Russia's military doctrine after the fateful storming of the Russian parliament in 1993. The debate has become something like a dance at which Russia chooses its partners, while they carefully try to end the dance without stepping on their very large and demanding partner's toes.

9.1 Comparison of Military Reform Plans Charted

Pavel Felgengauer Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 31 December 1991 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

When Yeltsin, Kravchuk, and Shushkevich agreed at Belovezhskaya Pushcha on 8 December on how to first disband the USSR and then take apart the vestiges of the inheritance, they did not begin to consult either with President Gorbachev, Nazarbaev, or moreover, with Bush. The only person they called was USSR defense minister Marshal of Aviation Shaposhnikov. Republic leaders could never have acted so decisively without a mutual understanding with the highest military leadership. But then again, the preliminary agreement was, we need to assume, reached beforehand, most likely during Marshal Shaposhnikov's meeting with President Yeltsin on 3 December 1991.

We have every reason to believe that it was the minister of defense who finally coordinated with the Russian president personnel changes in key leading posts in the army and, first of all, the retirement of General of the Army Lobov who was removed from his post as chief of the general staff on the morning of 7 December. Other arrangements were also made in expectation of inevitable changes: the elimination of the USSR

Ministry of Defense in its present form and the creation of the new Commonwealth military structure where, instead of the previous, purely formal supreme commander-USSR President Gorbachev-a quite real commander-in-chief of the “Combined Armed Forces” from the military will appear (so far, the only real contender for this post is Marshal of Aviation Evgeniy Shaposhnikov).

On 11 December, during an expanded session at the Ministry of Defense, President Gorbachev called on the military leaders to “save the Union” but he encountered little understanding or sympathy among them. In the corridors, they joked maliciously: He should have issued those appeals, they said, on 19 August-then things would have been worked out. In December 1991, the military leadership had quite different problems: how to adapt to the new state (more accurately, non-state) structure and to the newly emerged CIS [Commonwealth of Independent States].

By the time of the conference at Alma-Ata on 21 December, when the republics of Central Asia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Moldova had joined the CIS, the Ministry of Defense had prepared and submitted a package of documents on the new armed forces structure (see Diagram 9.1.1). However, the republics did not adopt this proposal (although they anticipated some sort of independent armed forces for Ukraine). Besides, an alternative draft was submitted from the Committee for Military Reform (chairman-General of the Army Konstantin Kobets), which received serious support in the republic delegations (see Diagram 9.1.2).

After Alma-Ata, the agreements were continued and a compromise plan for the transition period was drawn up during the conference with the republic ministers of defense in Moscow on 26-27 December: An Agreement on Defense Issues Among the CIS Member States.

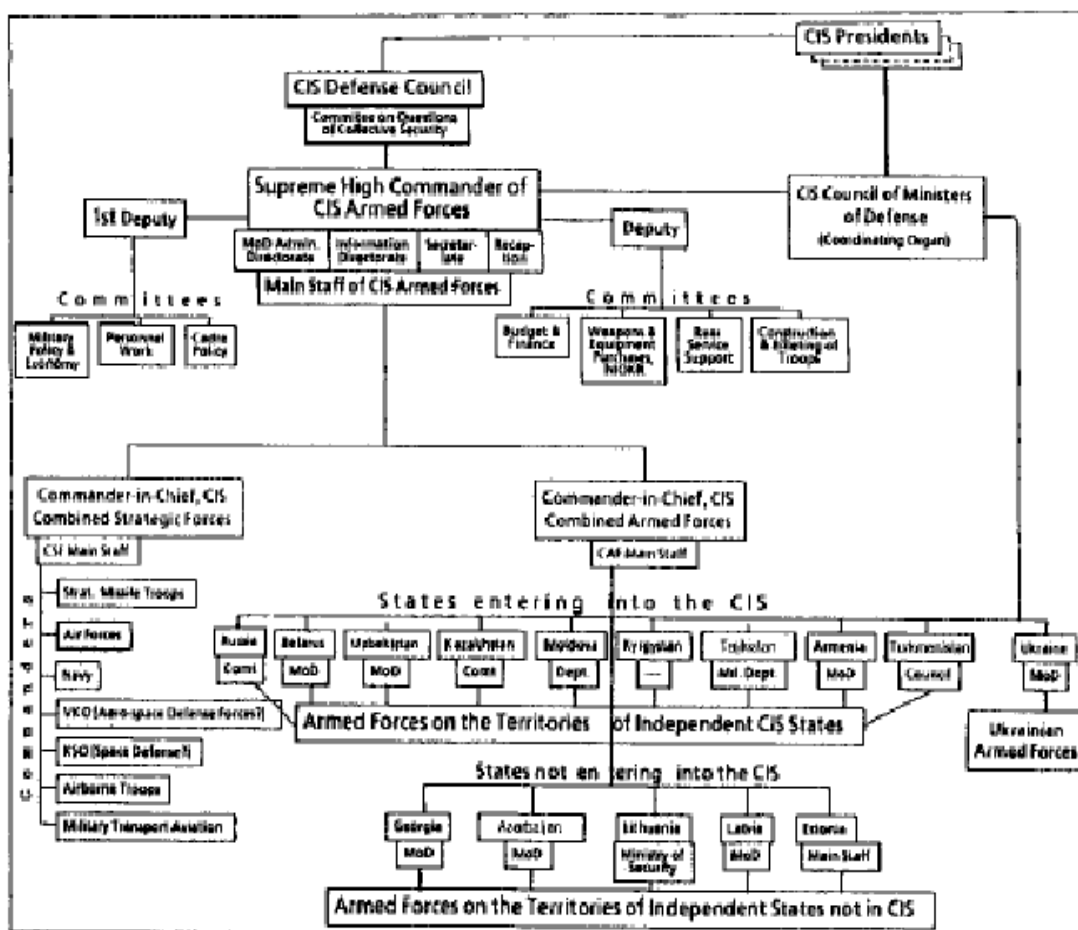

Diagram 9.1.1 Ministry of Defense

Plan drafts of both the Committee on Military Reform and the Ministry of Defense were utilized in the agreement reached.) Representatives from all CIS member states agreed that an adequately lengthy transition period was needed for a relatively peaceful transformation of the armed forces of the former USSR.

The Agreement on the Status of the Allied Armed Forces on the territory of the Commonwealth Member States was approved (without any special friction) (troops will not interfere in internal matters and servicemen have been directed not to participate in any political activity; separate agreements will be concluded on all remaining issues in each specific case). An interim provision on the CIS Council of Ministers of Defense was also approved. The CIS Council of Ministers of Defense will consist of the republic ministers of defense (the chairmen of the appropriate state committees) and also the combined armed forces commander-in-chief and the combined armed forces chief of the general staff. The Council of Ministers of Defense must coordinate the policies of the individual independent states on issues of military policy and also ensure civilian control over the army that was left and still exists when the state that created it no longer exists. The Council of Ministers of Defense will convene in turn in the capitals of all of the independent states and a representative of the state that hosts the Council of Ministers of Defense at that time will be the chairman. Any decisions will be adopted by the Council of Ministers of Defense only unanimously and at the same time they will be recommendatory in nature.

They have not yet managed to find a streamlined formula for an interim compromise on more substantive issues.

During the session, it was ascertained that although all “Commonwealth member states confirm their legal right to establish their own armed forces” (Article 6 of the agreement), so far only three states are actually insisting on the immediate establishment of their own army: Ukraine, Moldova, and Azerbaijan. The remaining republics have agreed to transfer the share in the common inheritance owed to them to the allied command since they understand very well that they (with the exception of Russia) have neither the economic nor financial resources even to simply maintain those modern armed forces that are deployed on their territory today. Most are talking about conducting further rational military structural development.

Thus, the army will still be divided, but into quite unequal shares:- into the combined armed forces which in turn consist of the “Strategic Forces”-“armies, division-sized and smaller units, institutions, institutes, strategic and operational reconnaissance, the RVSN (Strategic Missile Troops), the Air Forces, Navy, Air Defense Troops, Airborne Troops,” and so forth; and also ”Combined General Purpose Armed Forces”—“armies, division-sized and smaller units, institutions, institutes, and other military facilities that are located on the territories of the Commonwealth member states concerned that are not part of the strategic forces of the independent state (the list for each Commonwealth participant is defined by a separate protocol”); or into some independent states’ own armed forces.

If a large number of the states that have proclaimed their independence see the need and advisability of concluding a defensive alliance (they actually were ready to sign a treaty on the CIS at Novo-Ogarevo), the current Ukrainian leadership does not intend to participate in military alliances and the Agreement on Defense Issues must cease to be in force with regard to Ukraine by the end of 1994 (the Ukrainian delegation’s amendments to Articles 4 and 9).

There is every reason to assume that verbal formulas for an interim compromise on defense issues will be found in Minsk on 30 December. In any case, the majority of members feel sufficient optimism. General of the Army Kobets, while answering a Nezavisimaia Gazeta correspondent’s questions, stated: “There are no fundamental differences between Russia and Ukraine on defense issues. I think that the agreement will be adopted in Minsk.”...

This political burlesque will certainly disrupt to some degree the campaign planned by the Ukrainian authorities to compel servicemen deployed in Ukraine to take the new oath “for loyalty to the Ukrainian people.” At the same time, it is easy to imagine how difficult it will be for Marshal Shaposhnikov to command the remaining army (combined armed forces), now officially totally composed of different nationalities, when he achieves what he is seeking and has been confirmed as its commander-in-chief.

9.2 Armed Forces “Keystone”

From the “Novosti” Newscast Ostankino Television, 12 January 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

Kebich, the prime minister of Belarus, has declared that the question of the armed forces is the keystone of our fragile Commonwealth. In his opinion, if the leaders of the republics fail at their conference in Minsk on Friday, 14 February, to find acceptable solutions on financing the army and on the future structure of the armed forces, then the question of the Commonwealth’s existence in the future will be extremely problematic. Today, however, work was under way in Minsk to prepare for the forthcoming meeting ....

[I.M. Korotchenya, coordinator of Commonwealth working group]: Painstaking work is under way in order somehow to unite all these sorts of nuances which have been drawn up locally by the governments of the republics into a unified whole, what can be unified, that is; and to draw up a single document for the heads of states to discuss and sign.

[Zhuk]: All the heads of state and heads of government of the Commonwealth countries are preparing for the Minsk meeting in the most painstaking way. Incidentally, the prime minister of the Republic of Belarus, Vyacheslav Kebich, has visited one of the military units of the Belarus Military District.

[Kebich]: I have come in order to draw up my own approaches, the government’s approaches to the further fate of the army.

9.3 Attitudes Toward Military Noted

From the “Novosti” Newscast Ostankino Television, 12 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

In Minsk, about one hundred top army command staff experts are preparing documents for the upcoming meeting of Commonwealth presidents. Marshal Shaposhnikov himself is supervising the drafting of the military documents.

As you know, the focal issue today is the maintenance of the army and its very prospects for existence. The army today is effectively paid for by Russia. Even after cuts in weapons purchases, the costs are awesome. Some republics are prepared to pay only for their own army; others think Russia should bear any extra costs because the army in the republics defends the strategic interests primarily of Russia; and others still would prefer to instill some decisive clarity into the money issue, proposing bilateral defense treaties instead of a CIS army. Under this kind of approach, Russia should pay if it wants to defend itself, its allies think. We hope to get a report with details of what is happening in Minsk by this evening.

9.4 Armed Forces “Might Collapse”

Interfax, 12 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Political scientist Maj.-Gen. Vladimir Dudnik has acknowledged the existence of considerable differences on military matters among the Commonwealth member states. He warned that, unless these differences were narrowed at next Friday’s [ 14 February] CIS summit in Minsk, the “artificially united CIS armed forces” might collapse.

Asked by Interfax to predict the possible outcome of the pending top-level meeting in Minsk, Dudnik observed that continuing differences on military development might cause the Russian Federation to follow the example set by other ex-Soviet republics and speed up the formation of its own armed forces and defense ministry.

Commenting on the future of the Black Sea Fleet, a major stumbling block in Russo-Ukrainian relations, the general said that the problem could only be settled by reviewing the existing strategic concepts and radically restructuring the fleet.

9.5 Belarus: “Independent Army Concept” Backed

Postfactum, 12 February 1992 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpt

On 12 February the group for preparation of the meeting of CIS state and government leaders managed to discuss only several drafts from the twelve-page document package at its session at Kolodishchi Army Base near Minsk. The discussed documents, in particular, included the regulations on social insurance and civil rights of retired military servicemen, regulations on the authorities of state leaders in defense issues, regulations on the council of defense ministers of the Commonwealth, and several other documents.

Virtually at once the draft regulation on the authorities of the Commonwealth armed forces supreme military bodies was revoked from further discussion. Leonid Privalov, deputy chairman of the Belarus Supreme Soviet's standing commission on national security, defense, and crime, told Postfactum that none of the representatives of the CIS armed forces command was able to explain to him what the CIS united armed forces are.

For this reason Privalov concluded that Moscow does not have any clear concepts of this issue itself. He also believes that the documents submitted for discussion do not express the existent situation as they do not clarify the positions of the states urging for the formation of their own armies and others currently overlooking this problem. In the words of Privalov, the session has been rather poorly organized. He assumed that over such a short period it would be difficult to discuss the whole package of documents in details. It would make far more sense to draft a single fundamental law and equip it with the basic solution of all military issues.

9.6 “Transitional Period” Needed

Colonel P. Chernenko and Captain O. Odnokolenko
Krasnaya Zvezda, 13 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

The conference of the Commonwealth of Independent States working group which is preparing the ground for the meeting of the CIS heads of state in Minsk on 14 February began work at Kolodishchi near Minsk on 11 February. Marshal of Aviation E. Shaposhnikov, commander-in-chief of the CIS armed forces, and the defense ministers, chairmen of defense committees, and military experts from the CIS countries are taking part in the conference. The only absentees at the moment are the representatives of Uzbekistan, who have been delayed by bad weather.

Unfortunately, the conference is being held behind closed doors and journalists have not been allowed access there at the moment. It is presumed that the agenda of the CIS Heads of State meeting will include around twenty questions, the majority of them military. There will be a discussion of draft laws and agreements on defense, military doctrine, the social protection of servicemen and their families, the reduction of the armed forces, and so forth.

Clearly it will not be easy to resolve these questions since on many problems the Heads of States have their own, sometimes diametrically opposed, opinions.

As Marshal of Aviation Evgeniy Shaposhnikov stated, he was and remains a supporter of the balanced approach to military problems and considers that a two-to-three-year transitional period is needed to resolve all the questions connected with the armed forces. However, the commander-in-chief refrained from making a prediction on the results of the CIS heads of state meeting.

Meanwhile, addressing officers and non-commissioned officers at the Rogachev Motor-Rifle Division on 11 February at Uruchye, where they are stationed, V. Kebich, chairman of the Republic of Belarus Council of Ministers, promised officers reliable social protection and pension provision. According to his statement, the republic must have its own army, and all the property of the Belarusian military district belongs to Belarus, with the exception of strategic weapons, of course.

Expressing the government's viewpoint, Vyacheslav Kebich stated that after reduction the Belarus Army will number no more than 80,000 men. It is planned to reduce one division a year since a larger reduction would be too costly. He also expressed the intention to halt wholesale conversion and to support defense plants in every way. The military hardware which they produce is planned to be sold. Otherwise, the prime minister stated, we will not be able to survive.

It has become clear that recently Belarus's position on the creation of a nuclear-free zone within the republic's borders has been changing radically. No one is going to talk with a non-nuclear power, Kebich stated at the meeting with servicemen. There was no comment on that statement.

9.7 Deepening Crisis "Papered Over"

From the "Novosti" Newscast Ostankino Television, 14 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Without an army there cannot be a strong state. It is precisely the army that currently determines to a large extent how peaceful and stable our life will be in the near future. Therefore, what was being decided in Minsk today was not simply the question of a united army-to a large extent, the future of the Commonwealth was being decided.

First of all, it soothed the world community. Not one of the meeting's participants rejected the idea of united strategic deterrent forces. The nuclear button will remain in the same hands as before. In the opinion of many experts who accompanied the leading officials to the conference of the heads of state, the meeting has, to say the least, not brought the former Union republics close together. At the same time, the optimism of the documents signed increases from one meeting to the next.

The deepening crisis is papered over in fine style by various declarations of cooperation. Officially, none of the participants has rejected the Commonwealth of Independent States, but the clear split with regard to the united general purpose armed forces may considerably speed up this process. At one extreme are the eight states that are putting their forces under a united command, and at the other extreme are Ukraine, Moldova, and Azerbaijan, which want to take command of the Soviet Army property that is in their territory. Evidently, this course of events motivated the former members of the Union, in one of the documents that was adopted, to conclude an agreement on renouncing the use, or threat of use, of weapons.

[Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev]: The Commonwealth, the sort of Commonwealth we want, does not yet cause satisfaction because we do not have any sanctions or strict monitoring of the implementation of our decisions. And when we do actually prepare specific documents, when they are subsequently discussed, the specific elements in them somehow disappear and I personally am not satisfied with the way we postpone some specific questions from one meeting to the next.

[Gerasimov]: According to the facts that we have, only a few of the fourteen [as heard] planned documents were signed today. The CIS heads of states will hold their next meeting on 20 March in Kiev. Tomorrow in Minsk, there will be talks between Yeltsin and

Kravchuk that will be of no less importance than the meeting that has just ended. [End recording.]

9.8 Defense Officials View Meeting

Postfactum, 14 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Ukrainian Defense Minister Konstantin Morozov: The Ukrainian Army already exists. As many as 352,000 servicemen have sworn allegiance to Ukraine to date. Before the opening of the Commonwealth summit in Minsk, which is devoted to the military issue, Col.-Gen. Konstantin Morozov told Postfactum Ukraine would build its own defense system as befits a sovereign European state. He believes the time is past when Moscow could dictate its will to others. Morozov observed that this pressure is felt also at the present talks. But this is not the path that can be crowned with success, he said. The basis for agreement is mutual respect for each other's interests. The interests of Ukraine are known. They are bolstered by the strong enough economy, the will of the republic's government, and the will of the Ukrainian people. Observers believe it is these factors that played not the least role in shaping the Ukrainian position. It is likewise obvious that not all the republics which were recently part of the Soviet Union are prepared to take on themselves all cares for the maintenance of their own army. Observers think this may be manifest in several hours after the beginning of the summit and many of the republics may strike a certain defense alliance with Russia.

For instance, Eduard Simonyan, deputy chief advisor on national security issues to the Armenian president, emphasized that the Armenian delegation is against ill-considered decisions and comes out for a transition period that would enable the parties to specify their positions and elaborate mutually coordinated decisions. Simonyan thinks if the Union no longer exists and the armed forces cannot be maintained in their old form, they should be reformed both in structure and the form of command. But this work requires time and, what is all-important, coordination and mutual understanding. Certainly, nothing can be simpler than to nationalize the units of the Seventh Army stationed in Armenia, but this is not a way out of the situation, Simonyan observed. It is high time to learn to solve problems in a civilized way. He said the Armenian delegation has exactly this sentiment when it sits down at the negotiating table.

Representatives of the Central Asian republics and Kazakhstan were the first to support Russia's course of creating the uniform armed forces. For instance, Lt.-Gen. Sagadat Nurmagambetov, chairman of Kazakhstan's State Committee for Defense, noted: Kazakhstan stands for the single armed forces, for their single supply and the single personnel training. It wants the army to be staffed under both territorial and extraterritorial principles, specifically the strategic forces. Col.-Gen. Petr Chaus, acting defense minister of the Republic of Belarus, expressed the supposition that this meeting would fail to reach an agreement on the integral armed forces. He believes some military union is possible but it is already obvious that Ukraine, Azerbaijan, and Moldova will pursue an independent path. Already today they have de facto their army as, for example, Ukraine. Others envisage a transition period of two to three years for this purpose as, say, Belarus. These are the points on which agreement should be reached, Chaus thinks.

Marshal Evgeniy Shaposhnikov, commander-in-chief of the Commonwealth's armed forces, asked if there is any hope for an accord about the single armed forces, answered: Yes, and there is a basis for this accord. The Commonwealth defense ministers have already reached some agreement in previous days. At least, we have reached mutual understanding on thirteen documents. This is the foundation on which my hope rests.

9.9 Kravchuk Interviewed Upon Arrival

Interfax, 14 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Speaking in the airport upon his arrival in Minsk today (14 February), Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk said he firmly stuck to the view that the CIS should not have joint armed forces, for this was only possible in a single state. "The CIS is not a state," President Kravchuk stressed. Apart from this, he said, it was clear that having joint armed forces "is dangerous for all of us," for they could be used to strangle the democratic movements in all Commonwealth states.

As regards the Black Sea Fleet, the Ukrainian president doubted the issue could be resolved in the course of the Minsk summits, though he expressed the hope that at least the basic principles would be worked out in the Belarusian capital for the solution of the naval problem.

President Kravchuk said he would like to have a bilateral meeting with Russian President Yeltsin in Minsk and emphasized that they needed no mediators.

Speaking about economic problems to be dealt with in the course of the summit, Mr. Kravchuk expressed the hope that the meeting would work out an agreement on economic relations within the CIS. "It would be a mistake to assume that Russia can strangle Ukraine economically by refusing to sign such an agreement," he said. "Yes, Russia is able to do this, but thereby it will kill itself as well-it'll simply die a day later."

9.10 Nazarbaev Proposes Initiatives

Leonid Sviridov Radio Rossii, 14 February 1992 [FBIS

Translation]

The meeting of the heads of the Commonwealth of Independent States member states is continuing in Minsk. An interval was announced at 1400. [Seytkazi Mataev], press secretary of Kazakhstan, spoke to journalists, who are thirsty for any piece of news. He told the journalists that a definitive agenda has not been approved yet. [Mataev] confirmed reports that Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk is chairing the meeting on the proposal of Boris Yeltsin, and that Ukraine and other republics have proposed discussing economic issues.

At the start of discussion on military issues, differences emerged among the republics. Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev proposed new initiatives. He had four proposals:

The first proposal is to declare a transitional period, but Nazarbaev himself disowned that proposal immediately because Moldova, Ukraine, and Azerbaijan already have set up national armed forces. The proposal has been withdrawn.

The second proposal is to set up separate armed forces in each republic, and then to establish a defense alliance.

The third proposal is to allow CIS member states to join the defense alliance at their discretion.

The fourth proposal is to declare all armed forces on the territory of the republics their own national armies, and then to conclude a defense alliance.

According to [Mataev], there was an exchange of views on the wording about what should be considered strategic forces and what should be regarded as conventional armed forces. [Mataev] believes that there are no differences of opinion here, just variant interpretations.

A news conference is being postponed to 1900. There will be a break of one hour at 1530, when the presidents will have lunch. It looks as though the journalists are ready to descend on the presidents with numerous questions. There are 150 CIS journalists and 180 foreign reporters accredited to the meeting of the heads of the CIS member states.

9.11 Shaposhnikov Address on Nagorno-Karabakh Issue

ITAR-TASS, 19 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Marshal of Aviation Evgeniy Shaposhnikov, commander-in-chief of the Commonwealth of Independent States Joint Armed Forces, has addressed the Council of CIS Heads of State in connection with the events in Nagorno-Karabakh. The address said:

The events around Nagorno-Karabakh are taking on an ever more tense and menacing character. The scale of combat operations is widening. The number of casualties is rising. Towns and villages are being destroyed. There are continued attempts to draw servicemen into the conflict, and continuing encroachments on the arms, military hardware, and stocks of material resources belonging to the Transcaucasian Military District.

All these actions run completely counter to the statement of the CIS heads of state of 14 February 1992 on the impermissibility of using or threatening to use force and on the need to resolve contentious problems by exclusively peaceful means, through negotiations.

The situation is being made worse by the persistent attempts of the leadership of the Azerbaijani Republic to set up its own armed forces on the basis of the Fourth Army of the Transcaucasian Military District which, in turn, prompts the Armenian side to create its own army on the basis of the Seventh Army of the Transcaucasian Military District.

The implementation of these intentions will result in drawing regular units and formations of the Transcaucasian Military District into combat operations and will inevitably turn the conflict into a large-scale fratricidal war.

The development of events in the Transcaucasus is causing serious concern among states bordering the Azerbaijani Republic and the Republic of Armenia.

The command of the CIS Joint Armed Forces deems it necessary to undertake urgent measures in order to prevent Transcaucasian Military District troops from being drawn into combat operations and to prevent the conflict around Nagorno-Karabakh from escalating. For these purposes it is essential to solve the following priority issues:

1. To employ the entire political authority and capabilities of leaders of independent states to solve the conflict around Nagorno-Karabakh by political means.
2. Until a political solution to the problem is found, the Transcaucasian states should refrain from creating their own armed forces.
3. To examine the issue of forming a contingent of interstate armed forces of the CIS, which will be subordinate to the Council of CIS Heads of State, for the purpose of maintaining order, stabilizing the situation, and insuring a solution, and insuring a solution to interethnic and internal political issues by political means.

9.12 Shaposhnikov Answers Questions

Interview by Irina Lapina on “How Are We Going to Live?" Program

Moscow Television, 22 February 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Question and answer session with Air Marshal Evgeniy Shaposhnikov, commander-in-chief of the Commonwealth of Independent States Armed Forces, in the Russian TV Studio in Moscow; "How Are We Going To Live?" program presented by Irina Lapina, also reading questions telephoned in to Shaposhnikov-live.]

[Lapina]: Hello, here is our live program entitled "How Are We Going To Live?"

Our guest today is Marshal Evgeniy Shaposhnikov, recently the minister of defense, and nowadays commander-in-chief of the CIS Unified Armed Forces. Evgeniy Ivanovich, you are the first military man in our program, but of course this is not the reason why I am welcoming you here especially warmly. I remember your answers when you were still a deputy and were being vetted for the ministerial post. Your answers were precise, military style, but also humanely wise. So let us start our program-and now we have a couple of minutes while the questions are being prepared so help me to clarify one point.

The change of your title is, naturally, connected with the breakup of the Union and with the formation of the CIS. So, what about the Unified Armed Forces? Have there been the same changes as with the Union? I ask because the process could not fail to influence the army. So, do we have an army as a single whole at the moment, or is what we call Unified Armed Forces as different from the old army as the CIS is different from the USSR? Let us start from here.

[Shaposhnikov]: Thank you. Dear television viewers, many greetings, I will certainly try to answer all your questions, and as far as possible, will do so during the program. Well, on the first issue, I would like to say the following: Indeed, with the formation of the CIS-and the CIS as we know is neither a state nor a superstate superstructure. Therefore, there are naturally no ministers in charge of any area within the CIS.

Therefore, in connection with changes that have taken place in our states, a change in the armed forces has taken place, since the army is part of society. We have actually been fighting for a long time for the armed forces to be unified. In my opinion, this is the most acceptable idea for a transitional stage since so many visible as well as invisible links connected all our states-take the common economy, the common military-strategic space, the common procurement system of the troops, the common system of orders for equipment and weapons. Groups of armed forces were located on the territory of the former Union, regardless of the administrative borders of the states, and so on and so forth. Therefore, we have been repeatedly putting forward this idea of unified armed forces.

However, at the last Minsk meeting of the heads of independent states a decision was made-at last-and I am actually pleased that there is some clarity now.

Because, you know, some people had been talking about unified, others about single, yet others about independent [armed forces], and so on and so forth. The eight states that decided to stick to the position of unified armed forces, that is, unified by the common aims and tasks that I have just been talking about, they decided to create unified armed forces.

Well, three states did not join this agreement. They are on their way toward the creation of their own armed forces. One of the issues was that of the command of the Unified Armed Forces. Therefore, you know, there has to be a commander-in-chief of the Unified Armed Forces. The Council of Heads of State decided to appoint me. There are also two command authorities that have been set up-the strategic forces and the general purpose forces, which are organizationally included into this chief command authority. All other candidates for the positions of commanders of specific services will be confirmed at the next meeting in Kiev on the 20th [of March]....

[Shaposhnikov]: Yes, we have been talking a lot about military reform for a long time. This discussion began before the August events. Two concepts were elaborated. One concept was an unofficial one. It was advocated by a group of officers and people's deputies of the USSR-as it then was and by some Russian deputies. Another concept was worked out in the Defense Ministry, in the former Defense Ministry. I would like to say that the more radical reform, or reform concept, was elaborated by the officers. The reform elaborated by the Defense Ministry was milder and covered a longer period, and to a large extent was a cosmetic reform.

Therefore, as soon as I took over the post of defense minister I would like to say that I, as it were, combined these two reforms into one. We began implementing it. But at that time the Union still existed. The first steps that we managed to take are at present being implemented. But then there began this confusion over defining the armed forces, defining them as independent for some states, and so on. The actual reform of the armed forces themselves was slowed down somewhat, I admit this. This was because I was devoting all my strength and energy to somehow trying, in the broad sense, to preserve the armed forces as a whole. We are at present working on the internal reforms.

Now we have made the decision to hold a meeting, literally sometime after 23 February-actually on the 27th and 28th-with the defense ministers of the Commonwealth countries at which we will begin elaborating the documents that will guide the reform. Therefore, it can be said that the reform is progressing in two directions. In the large and broad sense it is a reform of the armed forces on the scale of the Commonwealth countries. The second part in the narrow sense is the part that directly concerns the armed forces themselves ...

[Lapina]: ... What do you think about the redrawing of borders? If one looks at history, then territorial claims have been the most frequent cause for the outbreak of wars. Well, the independent states really do have a lot of claims. What is going to happen, Evgeniy Ivanovich?

[Shaposhnikov]: I am categorically opposed to redrawing all the borders that exist between the CIS states since this could lead to very severe consequences. In general there are no precedents. At the initial stage, before the formation of the CIS, there was some mention of this. But at the present time the political leaders of our states have shown sufficient responsibility and wisdom; on 14 February in Minsk an agreement was signed to the effect that the countries of the Commonwealth would never use armed force against each other. In the same way it has been declared that all questions that arise can be resolved only by political methods, peacefully, by means of talks.

[Lapina]: Thank you. There are some questions here which I simply cannot overlook. Teryukhina of Saratov asks: Evgeniy Ivanovich, on behalf of all mothers I ask you not to send Russian lads to places where wars are going on. Let them sort things out themselves. Our boys are dying. It is even hard to read this: there are very many questions like this. Soldiers on compulsory service are sometimes really just boys, and how many tragedies there are. What is your opinion on the army's role in so-called interethnic disputes? They do need to be quelled and contained somehow, and the heat needs to be taken out of them, but on the other hand there is no need to send young boys into that furnace.

[Shaposhnikov]: Yes, I agree with you. My position is that the army should never-and in no circumstances-be used in interethnic conflicts, or to solve political tasks, or to back particular aspirations of individual leaders within the CIS. Therefore, taking advantage of the agreement reached by the heads of state in Minsk on the non-use of the armed forces in dealings with each other, I sent all the heads of state an appeal on the 19th [not further specified]. That appeal contained three points. The first was that they should apply all their political sense and all their political authority to settling the Karabakh problem peacefully. The second was that national armed forces should not be set up in the CIS countries in the Transcaucasian region until there is a political settlement of the Karabakh problem, since it is clear for what or how those armed forces would be used. The third was that they ought probably, perhaps, to think about establishing within the CIS, in addition to the armed forces, some kind of body or corps along the lines of the United Nations, which could be used to stabilize the situation in a particular region, but only volunteers could be sent to that corps. We are now finalizing proposals to this effect, and we shall put them forward in specific form in Kiev on 20 March ....

9.13 Shaposhnikov Views Future Role of the Armed Forces

Interview Radio Moscow, 24 February 1992 [FBIS

Translation], Excerpts

.... The first question was what are the prospects for reform of the ex-Soviet Army?

[Shaposhnikov]: I believe that in the end all the armed forces can be divided up according to national or state principles the CIS is not a state, but a group of states which does not have a single center, so the final objective of any state is complete independence and everything which follows from this. [Passage omitted.]

[Announcer]: It is often said that the CIS Armed Forces are placed above the state. What is your opinion?

[Shaposhnikov]: At present, eleven chiefs of strategic forces and eight chiefs of conventional forces are subordinate to me, and that is difficult. I cannot alone make any decision, particularly if it is a serious and important one. It is a little easier in the area of current business-we have established a Council of Defense Ministers of the CIS to complete the documents which were not able to be signed in Minsk, as well as the mechanisms for the implementation of decisions. The defense ministers will work in close contact with their respective presidents....

9.14 Kravchuk on Disputes with Russia, CIS Armies

Helsinki Radio, 26 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk, who arrived in Finland this morning, said during an interview at the airport that he was very confident that disputes between Russia and Ukraine will be solved. Kravchuk believes that the dispute on the Black Sea Fleet will be solved, possibly next month.

The president of Ukraine said that he believes that the dispute will be solved at a meeting in Kiev around the 20th of next month. On the one hand the dispute depends on the committee working on the matter, while on the other it depends on what the two states, Russia and Ukraine, want. The president of Ukraine also believes that every member country of the Commonwealth of Independent States will form its own independent army. He did not view this as a special threat to the member countries of the CIS.

Leonid Kravchuk, together with four other CIS presidents, will sign the CSCE Final Act at the Finlandia Hall this afternoon.

9.15 Armed Forces Being Financed Mainly by Russia

Interview Krasnaya Zvezda, 6 May 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[Interview with Col.-Gen. V. Samsonov, chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces General Staff, by unnamed correspondent; date and place not given: “Plenty of Agreements, But They Are Working Poorly So Far. CIS Joint Armed Forces Chief of General Staff Answers Our Correspondent’s Topical Questions”]

Krasnaya Zvezda published an interview on 18 March with Col.-Gen. V. Samsonov, chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces General Staff. Judging by the letters reaching the editorial office, it generated a great deal of interest among readers many of whom have proposed making such meetings a regular feature of the newspaper and having the chief of the General Staff give regular assessments of current events, talk about the problems being resolved in the Joint Armed Forces, and answer the questions posed by the readers’ letters. We put this request to Viktor Nikolaevich and, having obtained his consent, asked several currently topical questions.

[Krasnaya Zvezda]: It is well known that the State Commission for the Creation of a Russian Federation Defense Ministry, Army, and Navy has announced that the Russian Armed Forces' administrative structures will be set up on the basis of the former USSR Defense Ministry and the USSR Armed Forces General Staff. How is the General Staff participating in this work, have mutual understanding and coordination been achieved with the State Commission on everything, and what problems and difficulties can be identified in this area?

[Samsonov]: The main work is, of course, being implemented by the State Commission. At its request, representatives of the General Staff are being involved in drawing up materials for reference, background information, and analysis purposes, as well as in holding various kinds of consultations and operational calculations.

The main difficulty is caused by the tough time limits.

[Krasnaya Zvezda]: A month ago you stated that the forward-based strategic echelon in the former USSR's defense system had been completely destroyed. How can such significant damage be offset during the creation of the Russian Army? Is some kind of work under way to restore the strategic echelon of the armed forces under the new conditions?

[Samsonov]: In the West the basis of the USSR armed forces' forward-based strategic echelon was provided by troops (forces) under the Western , Northern, Central, and Southern Groups of forces. With the troop withdrawal from the East European countries a situation has come about whereby the forward-based echelon has to all intents and purposes started disappearing. And, naturally, that would have meant considerable damage for a unified state such as the Soviet Union. But today we can no longer assess the situation from these positions. The CIS has been set up and the geopolitical situation has completely changed. We no longer treat the West as our enemy. So there is no need to restore the forward-based strategic echelon in the same form or give it the same tasks as before.

Although work is undoubtedly under way to set up new CIS Joint Armed Forces troop groupings and arrange for their strategic arrangement. But this work arises from entirely different assessments of the existing military danger, is based on the concept of "mobile defense," and presupposes the creation of structures which will be primarily aimed at preventing local conflicts.

As far as Russia is concerned, we need to take account above all of its security interests and its realistic potential. During the elaboration of proposals on the creation of Russian armed forces, the questions of their organizational development and alignment will naturally be examined.

[Krasnaya Zvezda]: Is the General Staff currently exerting full control [kontrol] over the military units and combined units under the jurisdiction of the CIS Joint Armed Forces? What problems are there in this area?

[Samsonov]: Controlling the troops' activities is one of the tasks carried out by the General Staff. But, with the formation of the CIS and the announcement by some of its member states that they are to set up their own armed forces, this task has been made considerably more difficult. The "privatization" of the troops located on these states' territories, the ambitions of certain politicians, the unilateral resolution of questions concerning the army, and the reluctance to reach a compromise sometimes considerably complicate the General Staff's ability to control the troops' lives and activities. This in turn could lead to a destabilization of the overall situation.

The main task today, in my view, is to ensure reliable monitoring [kontrol] of nuclear weapons. I can confidently assert that the General Staff, along with specialized forces and means, is confidently carrying out this task.

Another topical problem requiring constant General Staff control is staffing. Agreement was reached at the Minsk summit of heads of state this February that the CIS Joint Armed Forces should be manned by units of troops (forces) allocated out of the CIS states' own armed forces. But this question has not been finally worked out as yet.

As for troops (forces) which are not part of the sovereign states' armies but are located on their territories, as well as the groups of forces in the East European countries, the Baltic, and Mongolia, they come under the direct control of the General Staff, which continues to administer all of their activity, including the withdrawal.

[Samsonov]: Under the agreement on the formation of a unified defense budget signed between them in Minsk on 14 February 1992, the Commonwealth states pledge to participate in the formation of a unified defense budget by paying fixed contributions into it. The same agreement stipulates that the size of these fixed contributions and the procedure for their payment will be determined in the Commonwealth Heads of Government Council. But, given that no such council decision has yet been made, there is no Commonwealth defense budget. Therefore the Joint armed forces are still being financed mainly out of the Russian Federation budget.

[Krasnaya Zvezda]: Attacks on military units are continuing in various regions. What statistics are currently available on these attacks? Do you have any generalized information on the human and material losses suffered by the Armed Forces as a result of such actions? What measures are being taken to rule out losses in the future?

[Samsonov]: The CIS Joint Armed Forces High Command and the General Staff have accurate and exhaustive information about human and material losses. A clear-cut system of operational information about all illegal acts committed either by or against the troops has been worked out.

This year alone there have already been 305 attacks on military installations, including 34 on weapons and supply dumps, and 90 on guards (sentries). As a result of these attacks, 31 servicemen have been killed, 72 have been wounded, and more than 7,500 firearms and 500 units of combat and other equipment have been stolen. Most of the attacks have been in the Transcaucasus-265-with 16 in the North Caucasus. There have been four attacks in Central Asia, four in Siberia and the Far East, and eight in the central part of Russia.

Servicemen often have to show considerable restraint, persistence, and sometimes even courage in negotiating with local and state organs of power and administration with regard to each attack on military installations and seizure of people, weapons, or military hardware.

Close contacts have been established on all military and defense matters with the sovereign states' defense ministries (committees). The legal basis for the functioning and collaboration of strategic and general-purpose troops (forces) with the republics' military departments has been worked out and continues to be developed and improved. Measures are being taken to step up security around military installations and to provide them with technical means and fortifications. The training and selection of the personnel and the tasks of the sentry and internal services are being implemented in a higher-quality fashion. But, because of low manning levels at a number of combined and other units, it has proved harder to solve this problem. I wish to make no secret of the fact that we have even been forced to use officers to protect certain installations.

I am profoundly convinced that whatever measures are taken by the troops to protect and defend installations, this problem can only be completely resolved by reducing socio-political tension and ending armed conflicts in the regions.

[Krasnaya Zvezda]: The last summit in Kiev is often said to have succeeded in resolving military issues. At the same time, there has been concern about the fact that no mechanism has been developed to implement the adopted agreements and accords. What can you say on that score?

[Samsonov]: Yes, the Kiev summit should have provided the foundation for the planned and civilized reform of the former USSR's armed forces. All the more so as thirty-four documents were adopted on military matters at the Minsk and, particularly, the Kiev summits, whereas just five were passed at the first three summits.

What were these documents? I would recall that the Commonwealth heads of state signed agreements defining the powers of the top CIS organs on questions of defense, the position and functions of the Joint Armed Forces during the transitional period, the legal basis for their activity, and the principles underlying their manning and the provision of military hardware and other material means. Decisions were passed on the Joint Armed Forces High Command, and appointments made to leading positions in their structures. As you can see, a sizable chunk of the military issues which constituted a stumbling block at previous summits was successfully resolved. But in practice all these agreements and accords are working poorly so far.

The negotiations with Ukraine about clarifying the list of combined and other units to be part of the Strategic Forces have been difficult. There have also been a lot of contradictions over the General-Purpose Forces.

Here we need to understand that the new political and economic relations between the Commonwealth states require not a cosmetic reorganization of the armed forces, but a profound revision of the principles of military organizational development and a search for original approaches to the resolution of the questions of guaranteeing the Commonwealth's defense capability.

[Krasnaya Zvezda]: It is well known that Russia, as a subject of international law and a UN Security Council member, is considered the successor to the former Union when it comes to carrying out the commitments under the START Treaty and the Paris CFE Treaty. How are these issues being resolved at the moment?

[Samsonov]: May I briefly remind readers that the Commonwealth's stance on these issues is that the START Treaty-signed 31 July last year-should be ratified without delay. Russia advocates its strictest fulfillment. Moreover, it advocates in principle the complete elimination of nuclear weapons and other mass destruction weapons.

The following measures have currently been taken to limit and reduce strategic offensive weapons. I will dwell on just a few points. Thus, around 600 land-based and sea-launched ballistic missiles (almost 1,250 nuclear warheads) have been stood down from combat alert. Of this total, 130 ICBMs and 49 launch silos have been destroyed, and equipment has been dismantled at 81 silos.

Furthermore, six nuclear missile submarines have been decommissioned. Since last October all existing rail-mobile ICBMs have been at their permanent base sites. Tu- 95MS and Tu-160 heavy bombers have been stood down from combat alert. Production of existing types of longrange air- and sea-launched nuclear cruise missiles is ending.

And one last point to which I would like to draw attention-the number of strategic offensive weapons on combat alert will be reduced to the level agreed in the treaty within a three-year period, instead of in seven years. Now to turn to the CFE Treaty. Russia views it as one of the cornerstones of the future European and world security system. It is making efforts to ensure that the treaty comes into force and begins operating in full in the very near future.

The question of implementing the treaty is a subject for painstaking work between the independent Commonwealth states. The complexity of the problem lies in the search for decisions acceptable to the CIS members regarding the devolution of the former USSR's treaty commitments to the newly formed states. Several consultation sessions at expert level are currently under way. A number of difficulties have emerged in the course this work. One significant difficulty is the problem of the distribution of the levels of arms held by the USSR and due to be limited under the treaty. The emergence of this problem is entirely natural, since it is bound up with the division of the former USSR's property, and each successor state is relying on its right to a share of this property, not least as regards defense potential.

But the generally constructive mood which, despite the presence of certain differences, prevails in the work on these problems, and the understanding of the treaty's importance shown by all interested parties gives every reason to believe that mutually acceptable solutions will be found.

9.16 Committee Debates CIS Collective

Security Treaty Interfax, 8 April 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The Russian parliament's Committee on International Affairs and External Economic Ties debated the CIS Charter and collective security treaty on Thursday [8 April] following the Russian president's request to speed up the review of these documents.

In committee chairman Evgeniy Ambartsumov's view, the ratification of the treaty gives at least some opportunity to keep the CIS intact. The pact has been ratified by five of its six signatories. The Belarusian parliament is now debating its ratification.

Although the committee recommended parliamentary approval of the document, it noted that "given some asymmetry on defense between Russia and other signatories, the pact will obviously mean in practical terms Russia's military assistance to these countries rather than the other way round." The committee believes that with current military and political instability in the former USSR, that "would be tantamount to attempts to involve Russia in various military conflicts with undesirable consequences."

It viewed as unacceptable for Russia Article 4 of the treaty, which makes the granting of such aid an automatic decision, and voiced displeasure with the treaty's clause saying that any decision to use armed forces would rest with the presidents of the participant states in disregard of what parliament thinks. The committee recommended government talks on amendments to the treaty.

Regarding the CIS Charter, the committee argues that the principle of recognizing the existing borders (Article 3) might cause certain problems for Russia. It claimed for one that since Russia's frontier with neighboring states had not been demarcated, Russia's state border was not yet clearly defined. It also said that such issues as the status of the Crimea and Sevastopol remained unsettled.

9.17 Shaposhnikov Urges Integration of CIS Armed Forces

From the "Novosti" newscast Ostankino Television, 13 May 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The preparations for the meeting of CIS leaders, which is known to be taking place in Moscow tomorrow, are continuing. Today, the CIS ministers of defense met in the capital of Russia.

[Begin correspondent Sergey Omelchenko recording]: Improving and strengthening defense capacity and military cooperation is on the agenda of today's session of the Council of Ministers of Defense of the Commonwealth countries in Moscow. Exactly a year has passed since the treaty on collective security was signed, which six states are party to today, but up to the present time, it has not been filled with specific content. No mechanism has been worked out for implementing it.

The ministers of defense gathered today to put this state of affairs right and make specific decisions.

[E. Shaposhnikov, commander-in-chief of the CIS Joint

Armed Forces]: The time has come when one has to move toward integration, and precisely according to the formula quality rather than quantity. Let there be a smaller number of states, but real ones. I perceive the Commonwealth as a qualitatively new type of cooperation among our fraternal peoples.

[Omelchenko]: The doors of the Commonwealth's defense alliance are open to all those who are interested in collective security. It was announced at the session that one could become a member of the alliance on a bilateral basis. Thus, the ministers of defense of the CIS countries are counting on coming out at a qualitatively new level of military cooperation. [Video shows scenes at meeting and interview with Shaposhnikov.]

9.18 Shaposhnikov Interviewed on Military Reform Plan

Interview by Aleksandr Zhilin Moskovskie Novosti, 30 May 1993 [FBIS Translation]

[Interview with Marshal Evgeniy Shaposhnikov, commander-in-chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces, by Aleksandr Zhilin, Moskovskie Novosti military observer; place and date not given: " 'Shaposhnikov's Plan' Not Yet Shelved"]

The Russian Defense Ministry did not support Shaposhnikov's proposals aimed at reforming the Joint Armed Forces at the latest meeting of the Council of CIS Defense Ministers. Nonetheless, the Joint Armed Forces commander-in-chief still hopes that his plan will be adopted.

[Zhilin]: Why was it that your concept drew so vehement a protest from the Russian Defense Ministry?

Wasn't it because you suggested that the Joint Armed Forces be set up in the absence of normal national armies? No one in the world, it seems, has ever embarked on this path.

[Shaposhnikov]: Indeed, up to the present day joint armed forces have been set up on the basis of full-blooded national armies. This is a classical scheme, but should we blindly emulate it? Our situation is not classical, either. The collapse of the USSR resulted in a process leading in the opposite direction: Joint armed forces are turning into national ones. What is better in this situation, to wait until the breakup is complete or to set up joint structures along parallel lines preserving, as much as possible and utilizing in a rational fashion, the most important components of the systems that had been designed to operate as a single whole and are capable of operating only as such.

[Shaposhnikov]: I have always argued for maintaining the unity of the main pillars of the joint defense space for some time. During the current transition period, we could have ensured a civilized transition from Joint Armed Forces to national armies.

Alas, this idea has been rejected. General-purpose troops of the Joint Armed Forces that have been mechanically, often arbitrarily, turned into national units and have encountered a large number of new problems in addition to old ones, ranging from social to logistical, operational, legal, and international matters. In the final analysis, the republics themselves have realized that, in order to overcome this extremely difficult situation, we have to join forces.

[Zhilin]: Moskovskie Novosti extensively reported about your plan in its previous issue. But here is a new objection from Pavel Grachev: “Russia is not against the Joint Armed Forces, but setting them up now would be premature, because it will require enormous extra financing,” which, he said, will have to be fully paid by the Russian Defense Ministry.

[Shaposhnikov]: Let us consider an elementary example. Let us imagine that, under a national defense doctrine, the Russian Army consists of three divisions for which the requisite money has been appropriated. One of the divisions is placed under the operational command of the Joint Armed Forces commander-in-chief. Evidently, this will not require additional investment. This is precisely what the proposed principle on the formation of the CIS Joint Armed Forces boils down to, but if Russia is to form its armed forces exclusively on its own, the most primitive measures to protect its borders will translate into about 20 trillion rubles-to say nothing of saturating the border areas with weaponry and equipment. The same applies to the other states of the CIS.

We are not intent on creating some artificial structures. Moreover, while arguing for the maintenance of some of the global defense systems of the former Soviet Union, we are in effect saving Russia and the other CIS states the hair-raising and absolutely unjustifiable expenses both in the short run and in the more distant future. This is why we believe it is necessary to create, on the basis of available units, the following operation commands: the “South” Air Defense Command, including Russia, Kazakhstan, and the Central Asian states; and the “Caucasus” Air Defense Command, which would combine the forces and equipment of Russia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia. It is worthwhile to consider creating joint ABM and Air Defense Commands tentatively called “West.” I think that decisions that, hopefully, will be made by the Council of Heads of State of the CIS in July would open up the prospect for moving in precisely this direction.

[Shaposhnikov]: It would be a pity. What does it mean, for instance, for the Central Asian countries to create “fullblooded national armies” from scratch? It is perfectly clear that some of them are objectively unable to cope with this task without resorting to help from other countries outside the CIS. This assistance will have to be paid for, if not with money, then with their independence.

There is another side to the problem. If the republics of the former USSR start looking for help outside the CIS, the East Europeans will begin drifting toward NATO. Even at present we feel the desire on the part of Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan to exploit what they perceive as an emerging “geopolitical vacuum” to strengthen and broaden their influence on the Transcaucasus and Central Asia. Given that each of these states has completely different interests, we will in no time find ourselves among new military-political blocs, alliances, and groupings within the CIS. Zones of rivalry are bound to emerge, which will give a powerful boost to instability. As a result, the states of the former USSR will join an arms race against each other. Furthermore, if this insane marathon is dangerous for the world community, it will be economically fatal for its participants.

[Zhilin]: The plans are that the CIS Joint Armed Forces are to include peacekeeping forces. With what functions will they be entrusted?

[Shaposhnikov]: Yes, we have envisioned the creation of a force that will deal with the settlement of conflicts within the CIS. The emphasis is put on the political solutions to the problems, but an effective mechanism is also essential to regulate conditions on which peacekeeping forces could be brought in: the withdrawal of the combatants from combat positions, control over ceasefires, measures to deter the extremist forces trying to thwart the implementation of agreements, etc. My dream is to set up an interstate military and political body within the CIS that would symbolize the indivisibility of the historical fortunes of the CIS peoples, the unity of combat traditions of their defenders, and the reliability of their joint defense and collective security system.

9.19 Expert Sees Hawks' Win on Russian Military Doctrine

Aleksandr Zhilin Moskovskie Novosti, 16 November 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

The military doctrine, recently approved by the Security Council and the president of Russia, is remarkable if only in that such a document has appeared for the first time in the state's history. Specialists point out, however, that it carries a stamp of rivalry between various political interests. The doctrine has reflected a battle between the "moderates" and the "hawks" outside the walls of the General Staff.

According to Russian Federation Defense Minister Pavel Grachev, the doctrine's authors have worked on the assumption that as of now "Russia has no probable adversaries” or potential enemies. Nonetheless, commentators did not ignore the fact that the document, which rose on the yeast of political declarations first by the Soviet Union and then Russia about the renunciation of first use of nuclear weapons, does not contain such an obligation in its text. On the other hand, it contains references to the possibility of “exporting” military force. Presumably, the world will not draw a conclusion from this that Russia is making preparations for an offensive war, but it will hardly add to its neighbors’ calm ....

As for the former union republics, “the more Russian military bases are located on their territory,” [Maj.-Gen.

(ret.) Gennadiy] Dmitriev believes, “the quicker a single economic and military union will be restored.” Therefore he is not worried over the fact that observers read into the military doctrine Russia’s possible expansion over the entire CIS. This expansion does not mean that tomorrow new wars will begin. These may also be “cold,” where the state maintains its interests from a position of force. Which is what we are seeing in Russia’s relations with Georgia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Tajikistan, Moldova...

And if Russia itself does not see “probable adversaries” around itself, the foreign policy section of its military doctrine will hardly pacify the neighboring and the more distant countries, which are accustomed to looking back at it as a potential threat.

Another dubious aspect of the military doctrine is the provision about the possibility of using army subdivisions “to assist the law enforcement bodies.” Because the document does not specify in what instances this “assistance” is allowed, there is a high likelihood of this provision’s being interpreted loosely. In effect, it sanctions the use of the army in internal political conflicts.

Some military analysts therefore suspect that what they regard as an overhasty adoption of the doctrine was designed to provide some justification for the authorities’ actions on 3 and 4 October. The president, who received support from the army in those days, apparently hopes for it in the future as well. Few will know that not all the troops brought into Moscow have been withdrawn from the capital. A special purpose airborne regiment is being formed with the facilities of a communications division in Sokolniki. The 27th Motorized Brigade of the Moscow Military District is being attached to paratroop forces. The stationing of commando units in and around the capital in the absence of facilities to airlift them to zones of potential military conflict suggests that these troops are designed for “internal use.”

The paradox consists in that at another spiral of political confrontation, military force may turn also against the president.

At any rate, the army is increasingly inclined to think that it alone is capable of putting things in the country in order. “Pavel Grachev has made the most of the 4 October victory. At present no one has any doubts that it is the army that controls the situation in the country. I think that as of now the period of endless compromises has finished and an era of order begins, and it will be enforced by us, the military”-this conclusion from the military doctrine was made by military expert Colonel (ret.) Dmitriy Kharitonov. He is not alone in his appraisal. It was not accidental that at one of the recent sessions of the military collegium Pavel Grachev, responding to a remark about the likelihood of the doctrine's being amended by the new parliament, noted: "We shall amend the parliament."

In the opinion of Colonel Konstantin Ivanov, an officer at the General Staff, "never before have the power ministers moved so close to the helm of political power." And should the incumbent president become unamenable to them for some reason or other, "Boris Yeltsin's illusions about his power functions will be dispelled at once."

In presenting the military doctrine to journalists, the defense minister said that it will not be considered by the Federal Assembly. It seems that society is again being deprived of the right of oversight in a sphere that affects both its well-being (as a taxpayer) and its security.

9.20 Vorontsov: Military Doctrine Allows Peacekeeping

Boris Sitnikov ITAR-TASS, 19 November 1993 [FBIS Translation]

United Nations Organization 19 November TASS-A memorandum of Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev to UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali about a new military doctrine of Russia evoked a lively interest here. Journalists, accredited at the UN headquarters, asked Russia's permanent representative to the United Nations Yuliy Vorontsov to explain the meaning of the message, handed by Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov during his meeting with Boutros-Ghali on Wednesday.

"The deputy foreign minister spoke about a new strategic military doctrine of the Russian armed forces, which includes a special chapter about UN peacekeeping operations. It assesses peacekeeping operations most positively. At the same time, it mentions operations on the overall territory of the former Soviet Union, on which CIS member states will reach an agreement. It will become an additional element for the peacekeeping process in general," Vorontsov said.

"Thus, along with the participation in UN peacekeeping operations, the doctrine provides for the beginning of so-called regional peacekeeping operations within the CIS boundaries," the Russian representative added.

9.21 CIS Security White Paper Extracts Published

Viktor Litvinov Izvestiya, 20 November 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

The paper that we are presenting to readers today was only issued at the end of this year. Izvestiya has obtained the exclusive right to quote excerpts from it-it is entitled "Toward Security Through Cooperation." It is a report from the commander-in-chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces to the heads of the CIS countries and the leaders of their military departments on the state of the CIS's national armies, the organization of collective defense, their collaboration in this sphere, and the development of the strategic situation in the world and on Commonwealth territory.

Giving Izvestiya a reprint copy prepared for publication, Maj.-Gen. Georgiy Klimchuk, chief of the information and intelligence sector [napravlenie] at the CIS Joint Armed Forces Staff, said:

"This is the first time in world practice that we are unprecedentedly offering for free distribution full official analytical materials on the CIS Armed Forces based on seventy government documents. We are revealing the aims, principles, content, structure, and practical activity of our armies. Stripped of unnecessary secrets, this information can and should serve as a source of confidence among the governments and peoples of our countries.

"The paper has been drawn up by the CIS states' Center for Information and Analytical Support in conjunction with the Commonwealth Joint Armed Forces High Command. Leading military scientists, including specialists from the Russian Academy of Sciences, the Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, and other academies, took part in writing it. It is to be published in Russian and English in three versions-a concise edition in the form of a 150-page booklet; a regular, 600-page edition; and an expanded edition including all the acts of legislation adopted in the Commonwealth states on the question of armed forces organizational development, with photographs and biographical information on the leaders of the CIS military departments.

“All the factual information is current as of May 1993. Amendments will be made a year later in the next edition, if one is published,” General Klimchuk stated. He also said that it is hard as yet to say how big the print run will be-specialists are looking at the demand for the paper and the number of requests for it, but a decision has already been made to send a folio free of charge to the leaders of states, including major world powers, to the United Nations and NATO, and to CIS states’ power ministries; other citizens and organizations will be able to acquire the “White Paper” for hard currency or its equivalent.

It will comprise the following rubrics-the state’s geopolitical position, military doctrine, the organization of defense, armed forces organizational development, the system of manpower acquisition, and social and legal protection for servicemen. We do not have room to quote from each of these-we will select what are, in our view, the most substantive points.

The System of Organizing Military Cooperation in the Commonwealth

The system underlying the organization of military cooperation in the Commonwealth can be tracked on the following flowchart. [No flowchart given.]

Incidentally, it was first published in Izvestiya no. 158 in July 1992. There have been a few changes to it over the past eighteen months. [Passage omitted.]

Structure and Composition of CIS Strategic Forces

The structure and composition of the CIS strategic forces comprises the Strategic Rocket Forces, naval strategic nuclear forces, and airborne strategic nuclear forces.

Note: More than 20 percent of the intercontinental strategic missiles deployed on the territory of the CIS countries are mobile, and 90 percent of their warheads are multiple warheads.

The memorandum of understanding establishing initial figures in connection with the START Treaty between the USSR and the United States lays down that the grouping of intercontinental strategic missiles will comprise 1,398 missiles.

Where are the missiles actually deployed and how many nuclear warheads do they carry? This is covered by Table 9.21.1.

More than 20 percent of the intercontinental strategic missiles deployed on the territory of the CIS countries are mobile, and 90 percent of their warheads are multiple warheads. Incidentally, the prestigious annual British publication The Military Balance 1992-1993, published by the International Institute for Strategic Studies, confirms the figures on strategic missiles published in the “White Paper.”

Sea-launched strategic nuclear forces are located: in the Northern Fleet-at the Nerpichya base (six Typhoon-class nuclear submarines with 120 RSM-52 missiles, each missile equipped with ten nuclear warheads. Izvestiya also discussed these boats in Nos. 50-52 in February 1992): at the Yagelnaya base (six Navaga-class nuclear submarines with 96 RSM-25 missiles, four Delta II nuclear submarines with 64 RSM-40s, one Navaga-M nuclear submarine with 12 RSM-45s, and three Delta III, IV submarines with 48 RSM-50s); at the Olenya base (two Navaga III, IV nuclear submarines with 32 RSM-50s and seven Dolphin nuclear submarines with 112 RSM-54s); and at the Ostrovnoy base (nine Delta I nuclear submarines with 108 RSM-40s).

Pacific Fleet: at the Rybachiy base there are three Navagaclass nuclear submarines with 48 RSM-25s, three Delta Is with 36 RSM-40s, and nine Delta III, IVs with 144 RSM-50s; at the Pavlovskoe base there are three Navaga nuclear submarines with 48 RSM-25 missiles and six Delta I nuclear submarines with 72 RSM-40s.

In all, the Russian Navy has 62 nuclear submarines with 940 strategic missiles.

The ICBM stockpiles for the submarines, the plants where the missiles are produced, test ranges, and the sites where missiles are loaded onto the submarines are depicted on the following map. [Map indicates Olenya, Nerpichnya, Yagelnaya, Ostrovnoy, Pavlovskoe, and Rybachiy as submarine bases; Okolnaya as an SLBM loading and storage site; Revda as an SLBM storage site; Nenoksa as a test range and SLBM storage site; Severodvinsk as an SLBM loading and silo refitting or elimination site; Zlatoust as an SLBM production site; Pashino as an SLBM elimination site; Krasnoyarsk as an SLBM production site; and Bolshoy Kamen as an SLBM silo refitting or elimination site.]

Heavy strategic bombers are part of the Air Force’s Long- Range Aviation. This means bombers with a range of more than 8,000 km and missile-carrying aircraft equipped with long-range nuclear air-launched cruise missiles (ALCMs).

At the time of the signing of the START Treaty the Soviet Union had 147 Tu-95 and 15 Tu-160 heavy bombers, of which 84 and 15 (respectively) carried long-range cruise missiles. These accounted for 735 and 120 nuclear warheads.

All heavy bombers were deployed on the territories of three former Union republics. At Mozdok and Engels in Russia, at Priluki, Uzin, and Ukrainka in Ukraine, and at Semipalatinsk in Kazakhstan. There are now 79 bombers on Russian territory (2 Tu-160s, 25 Tu-95MSs, 45 Tu-95K22s, and 7 Tu-95Ks), and 43 aircraft on Ukrainian territory, including 16 Tu-160s. There are 40 Tu-95MSs in Kazakhstan.

Long-Range Aviation also includes 34 tanker aircraft. These were all based at the Engels Airfield in Saratov Oblast, but, just before the collapse of the USSR, some of them were redeployed to Ukrainian territory. They are still there today.

at the time the “White Paper” was drawn up was as shown in Table 9.21.2.

Belarus has stated its readiness to abide by previously signed international agreements, has ratified the START I Treaty and the Lisbon Protocol, has signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty, and has concluded a treaty with Russia on the status of the strategic nuclear forces on its territory. These include not only the strategic missiles and nuclear warheads due to be withdrawn to Russian territory by the end of 1997, but also servicing and maintenance, intelligence-gathering system, space communications, ABM defense, and missile early-warning units.

Kazakhstan too has ratified the START I Treaty and the Lisbon Protocol, but has not yet acceded to the Non- Proliferation Treaty, although it has stated its desire to do so. It is leaning toward recognition of Russia’s right to have ballistic missiles, nuclear warheads, and strategic aircraft; approaches to other complexes and systems are being worked out. (Many experts claim that the Kazakhstani leadership’s decision in this area will largely depend on Ukraine's stance on strategic nuclear weapons. Kiev's example could also influence Almaty's non-nuclear status-V.L.)

Ukraine has officially stated its adherence to non-nuclear status and its readiness to abide by the international commitments stemming from the Lisbon Protocol. But the current Ukrainian parliament has not set any deadline for carrying out these commitments, the START I Treaty has been ratified with major reservations, and the state itself intends to accede to the Non-Proliferation Treaty as a country possessing nuclear weapons.

Conventional Arms

On 15 May 1992 Georgia and seven CIS states-Azerbaijan, Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Moldova, Russia, and Ukraine-signed a joint statement reaffirming their adherence to the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe [CFE]. Kazakhstan signed the agreement as a state, part of whose territory is covered by the treaty. It has no troops or armaments on this territory.

Under these accords the quotas for armaments and hardware were divided up between the Transcaucasian states and Moldova as follows in Table 9.21.3.

In actual fact the Azerbaijani Armed Forces have four motorized rifle, one tank, and two artillery brigades which organizationally make up two separate army corps, as well as a detachment of warships, one air squadron, and a separate Spetsnaz battalion.

The "White Paper" does not quote a precise figure for the number of troops in the republic or for the number of armaments. It only indicates that, following the Russian Army's departure, there are 20 Mi-24 and Mi-8 helicopters left behind, along with 70 Czech-made L-29 aircraft and 16 Su-24 and MiG-25 reconnaissance aircraft.

The Military Balance ascribes 400 tanks, 470 armored vehicles, 120 aircraft, and 14 helicopters to the country. But there is probably nobody who could quote an accurate figure today. Some of this equipment has been “consumed” in the flames of war, other equipment has broken down owing to a shortage of spares and poor servicing.

What is known is that the republic’s Defense Ministry was allocated 3 billion rubles in 1992 and that Azerbaijan plans to have a 50,000-strong army by the year 2000.

According to the “White Paper” the Armenian Armed Forces comprise 10,000 men, or 15,000 together with other military formations. The law allows the army to have up to 30,000-35,000 men.

The CIS Joint Armed Forces High Command report claims that Armenia does not have the amount of combat hardware which the republic is permitted to have under the CFE Treaty. The two divisions which Russia transferred to it had 180 tanks, 180 infantry fighting vehicles [IFV], 60 armored personnel carriers [APC], 130 artillery systems, and several dozen “Osa,” “Strela,” and “Igla” surface-to-air missile systems, as well as the “Shilka” self-propelled anti-aircraft gun.

Armenia’s greatest shortage is its lack of aircraft. It only has a squadron of Mi-24 and Mi-8 helicopters. Admittedly, the Institute for Strategic Studies gives the following figures-the republic has 250 tanks, 350 fighting vehicles, and 7 helicopters.

The Moldovan Armed Forces consist of regular troops and a reserve. The regular troops are based on ground units, air defense forces, and army aviation. The army comprises four groupings, each with a motorized rifle brigade and an helicopter squadron. The total strength of the armed forces is 10,000 men. They have been equipped at the expense of the 14th Army units which were located on the south bank of the Dniester. Their aviation comprises 38 MiG-29s. Efforts are being made to exchange them for helicopters. Combat hardware, including T-55 tanks and 2,000 assault rifles, is also reaching the republic from Romania.

According to The Military Balance figures, the republic has no tanks or armored vehicles.

Belarus

Armament and combat hardware quotas for Belarus are as shown in Table 9.21.4.

The Belarusian Armed Forces are based on the Belarusian Military District, which comprise 130,000 servicemen-not counting the 40,000 men in the strategic forces. There was one serviceman for virtually every 43 inhabitants of the republic. The figures for Russia, for instance, were one serviceman for every 634 members of the population; for Ukraine, one for every 98 people; and for Kazakhstan, one for every 118 people.

By the end of this year the Belarusian Army should comprise 87,000 men-10,000 officers and generals are to be cut. Stress is being laid on the creation of airborne assault and assault landing units and mechanized brigades. The air force consists of seven to eight air regiments. Some 1,600 tanks, more than 1,200 IFVs and APCs, and 130 aircraft are due to be scrapped.

According to the British annual publication, there are currently 1,850 tanks, 1,390 armored vehicles, 617 aircraft, and 80 helicopters in the republic.

Russia

Armament and combat quotas for Russia are as follows in Table 9.21.5.

Russia's Armed Forces were set up by Boris Yeltsin's edict of 7 May 1992. They are based on the Strategic Rocket Forces, the Ground Forces, the Air Defense Forces, the Air Force, and the Navy. Apart from these, the armed forces include the Airborne Forces, the Military Space Forces, rear service units, and military construction and troop-billeting units.

In terms of military administrative organization Russia has eight military districts (the Leningrad, Moscow, North Caucasus, Volga, Ural, Siberian, Transbaykal, and Far East Military Districts) as well as, currently, three groups of forces (the Western, Northwestern, and Transcaucasus Groups of Forces). At the time when its own armed forces were set up the Russian Army had 2.8 million men; there should be 2 million by 1995.

The "White Paper" devotes around 55 pages to the Russian Army....

Ukraine

The Ukrainian Armed Forces were set up on the basis of the Kiev, Carpathian, and Odessa Military Districts, part of the Black Sea Fleet, and other military formations located in the republic. They number 700,000 men in total.

The concept developed in Ukraine for the armed forces' organization development envisages the creation of two operational commands—the Western and Southern Commands—as well as airspace defense troops based on the air force and the air defense forces. Armed forces strength is planned to be 420,000 by 1995 and 230,000 by the year 2000.

It is planned that the armed forces will comprise three branches of service—ground, air, and naval forces. It has also been stated that missile and space troops will begin to be set up. It is planned that the organizational and manpower structure of combined units will include three motorized rifle regiments and tank, self-propelled artillery, surface-to-air missile, and separate anti-tank battalions. Logistical subunits will include a reconnaissance battalion, a communications battalion, a combat-engineer battalion, a chemical warfare defense battalion, and others.

It is planned that the Ukrainian Navy will have 100 ships and vessels by 1998, as well as around 40,000 men. We would recall that the Black Sea Fleet currently comprises 45 large surface combatants, 28 submarines, more than 300 medium-sized and smaller ships and vessels, 151 aircraft, and 85 deck-borne helicopters.

The most modern combat vehicles and aircraft are in service with the Ukrainian Army; these include the T-72 and T-64 tanks, the BMP-2, the Su-27 and MiG-29, the “Smerch” and “Uragan” multiple rocket launcher systems, “Tochka” tactical missile systems, and S-300 surface-to-air missile systems. Enterprises from nine defense-sector [oboronyy] and seven machine-building ministries work for the country’s military-industrial complex. The state can independently produce strategic missiles and other kinds of military output.

Armament and combat hardware quotes for Ukraine are as follows in Table 9.21.6 (see page 463).

9.22 CIS Armed Forces Command Abolished

Interfax, 22 December 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The CIS Council of Defense Ministers meeting Wednesday in Ashkhabad has decided to annul the CIS Joint Armed Forces Command. Instead, a staff will be formed, subordinate to the CIS Council of Defense Ministers, which will be in charge of coordinating military-technical cooperation among the CIS countries.

Those present agreed that they recommend General Viktor Samsonov to be approved at the summit as the chief of staff. Earlier the general was chief of staff of the CIS Armed Forces.

9.23 Defense Agreements Signed

Interfax, 23 December 1993 [FBIS Translation]

At a session of the CIS Defense Ministers Council in Ashkhabad on Thursday [23 December], Russia signed bilateral treaties on military and technical cooperation with Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, Belarus, and Armenia.

As a Russian negotiator has told Interfax, the documents allow not only promotion of military cooperation bilaterally but also reinforcement of the CIS collective security system.

The session also finally resolved the issue on funding headquarters to be set up to coordinate military cooperation among the CIS states. According to an agreement, Russia is to foot 50 percent of the headquarter's maintenance bill. The remaining costs are equally shared among the other collective security treaty's participant states-Kazakhstan, Belarus, Tajikistan, Armenia, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan. The headquarters will be housed in the former building of the CIS Combined Armed Forces Command in Moscow. The agreement will be submitted for endorsement at the CIS summit on Friday.

9.24 Kozyrev Writes on Military Doctrine

Andrey Kozyrev Krasnaya Zvezda, 14 January 1994
[FBIS Translation], Excerpts

The results of the December elections to the Federal Assembly have generated a debate abroad about possible changes to Russia's foreign and military policy. Citing the irresponsible, profascist statements made during the election campaign, certain observers have been predicting a strengthening of Moscow's "imperial aspirations."

I have already stated my attitude to such statements. I would like to reemphasize that Russia's line in the foreign policy and security sphere is determined by the Russian Federation president. This situation, which is enshrined in the new democratic Constitution, reliably protects that line from the influence of national extremism. The policy basically remains the same-both in terms of being geared to the development of good-neighborly relations of partnership with the outside world and in terms of being open and predictable.

Another guarantee of the stability and consistency of the country's foreign and military policy is the Russian Federation military doctrine approved by the Russian president in early November. Together with the foreign policy concept ratified in April, it is an integral part of the emergent concept for the country's security.

The distinctive features of our military doctrine are its defensive thrust and the strict account it takes of the country's actual requirements as regards ensuring national security. In terms of its content it is entirely comparable with the doctrinal provisions of most democratic states. I am referring above all to the similarities in the assessment of the military-political situation and the prospects for its development both globally and regionally. A key factor is the absence of any potential military enemy for Russia. According to the doctrine, the main threat to the country's security is posed by local conflicts and the spread of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction.

any attempts to abuse military force. While using the full panoply of means available to it to safeguard its security, Russia will at the same time give priority to peaceful-above all, political and diplomatic-means. Military force can only be used for self-defense purposes, in order to rebuff aggression.

The Russian armed forces will be shaped to take account of the major changes in the world and the country's actual economic potential. By the end of this century, after the transition to the mixed principle of manpower acquisition, they will be substantially smaller, but more mobile and equipped with effective weapons systems and military hardware in sufficient quantities to ensure the defense of the country and its allies.

This provision of the doctrine can be illustrated by the navy. It will fully retain its role as a factor determining Russia's might as a great power. Moreover, given the cuts envisaged by the Russian-U.S. START II Treaty, the naval component of our strategic "triad" will have increased. The decommissioning of obsolete ships will be combined with efforts to equip the navy with modern hardware. The ships flying the St. Andrew's ensign should embody the most advanced achievements of Russian science and technology.

The fact that all this is not only necessary but possible was something I saw for myself at Severomorsk in Murmansk Oblast, where the electoral district, which I represent in the State Duma, is located. An immense potential is concentrated there-the flower of Russia's navy. This was also attested by my visit to Russia's naval outposts in the Far East and to the ships of the Black Sea Fleet. The navy is traditionally one of the most flexible foreign policy tools at the disposal of the Russian state, whose interests naval seamen and diplomats have defended and will continue to defend together. I am therefore all the more aware of the social need-requiring state support-of those who serve the motherland on its ocean and maritime borders....

It would be a mistake to make out that our new approach to nuclear weapons increases the risk of nuclear war. The fact that we do not intend to be the first to use any weapons, and see nuclear weapons as a last resort, is of fundamental importance.

The military doctrine's provisions take full account of CIS collective security interests and are geared to strengthening defense cooperation among the CIS states on a multilateral and bilateral basis. The prerequisites for this are shared national security interests, a standard armed forces structure and standardized weapons systems, and an interest in maintaining the former Union's defense infrastructure within your own territory. ...

The new view on the nature of a possible war, which recognizes the minimal likelihood of the unleashing of world nuclear and conventional war along with the increased risk of local wars, including those on the territory of the former USSR, orients our diplomacy toward more active cooperation with other states with regard to peacemaking. The CSCE declaration condemning aggressive nationalism, which underlies many local conflicts-a declaration adopted on Russia's initiative-is of great significance.

In accordance with the doctrine the Russian Federation Armed Forces acquire a new function: participation in carrying out peacemaking operations. These are implemented by decision of the UN Security Council and other collective security organs or in accordance with international agreements, primarily within the CIS context. It is a matter of Russia's fulfilling not some sort of gendarme functions, but a mission fully consonant with its status and duties as a permanent member of the UN Security Council. The Russian troops taking part in such operations strictly respect the sovereignty of the sides involved in the conflict and act with their consent and in accordance with a clearly defined mandate.

In fulfilling peacemaking functions on the territory of the former USSR, the Russian Federation is prepared to cooperate closely with all interested countries and international organizations, primarily the United Nations and the CSCE. We are entitled to expect the world community to provide material support for this activity. We are raising the question of creating an international voluntary fund for these purposes.

The military doctrine envisages completing before 1996 the withdrawal to Russian territory of the Russian units stationed outside Russia. We will seek to ensure that the agreements being elaborated with a number of countries regarding this properly take into account Russia's security interests and also the interests of the Russian-speaking population in these countries.

At the same time the doctrine realistically proceeds from the premise that the interests of the security of the Russian Federation and other CIS members may necessitate the stationing of Russian Federation forces outside its territory. But, of course, this will be done only on the basis of appropriate international legal documents and with the consent of the states on whose territory our armed forces will be stationed.

In outlining the main directions for the development of Russia's cooperation with other countries in the militarytechnical sphere, the doctrine officially sets the relevant departments, the Foreign Ministry included, tasks which we effectively began to work on from the first months of 1992. On the one hand, there is a need to maintain the country's export potential in the sphere of conventional arms at the proper level, partly so the hard currency proceeds can be used for the needs of military production and for purposes of conversion. On the other hand, we cannot allow deliveries of arms and military equipment to lead to the spread of technology making it possible to create weapons of mass destruction and delivery systems for them, to the undermining of regional stability, or to the breaking of embargoes or other international accords to which Russia is a party. ...

The adoption of the basic principles of the foreign policy concept and military doctrine marks an important milestone in the development of democratic Russia's political and military thought. They graphically reflect the profound changes in the life of our state and society. Free from ideological rhetoric and claims to superpower status, these documents are called upon to help form in the world an image of democratic Russia as a peace-loving state with natural national interests. Not regarding any state as its enemies, Russia is prepared to see as partners all states whose policy is not detrimental to its interests and does not contravene the UN Charter.

Only thus will we be able to reliably ensure the security of the motherland.

9.25 Shikhmuradov Signs NATO Partnership for Peace Program

Moscow Radio Ekho, 10 May 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Turkmenistan today became the first Central Asian country to join the NATO Partnership for Peace program. Turkmen Deputy Prime Minister Boris Shikhmuradov signed the document in Brussels.

9.26 Comments on Partnership with NATO

Aleksandr Mineev ITAR-TASS, 10 May 1994 [FBIS Translation]

"Turkmenistan is not seeking NATO's help, but is striving to develop partnership with the alliance on a mutually advantageous basis," Boris Shikhmuradov, deputy prime minister of this Central Asian republic, told an ITAR-TASS correspondent. At NATO headquarters in Brussels today, he signed the outline document of the "Partnership for Peace" program. So, eighteen countries have joined the program, including eight former Soviet republics.

Turkmenistan, the deputy prime minister said, has possibilities of broad cooperation with NATO member-countries in all spheres, including the military one. He said talks were under way on joint programs for training officers of the Turkmen Armed Forces and on cooperation in other areas of military construction.

At the signing ceremony, B. Shikhmuradov said Turkmenistan sees the main purpose of its participation in the program set out by NATO member-countries in objectively promoting a solution to the principal task, which is strengthening Turkmenistan's sovereignty and turning it into a fully independent member of the international community.

Along with developing partnership relations with new democratic Russia, the deputy prime minister noted, his republic is developing cooperation with West European countries and the United States, Asian states, and CIS neighbors. He specifically noted Turkmenistan's potential role as a bridge between Europe and south and Southeast Asia. [Passage omitted.]

9.27 Almaty Signs NATO Partnership for Peace

Aleksandr Mineev ITAR-TASS, 27 May 1994 [FBIS

Translation]

Kazakhstan has become the nineteenth state to join the Partnership for Peace program proposed by the NATO leadership. At the alliance's headquarters in Brussels on Friday the republic's foreign minister, Kanat Saudabaev, put his signature to the program's framework document. Kazakhstan's embassy in Brussels noted that the republic was the second nuclear state, after Ukraine, to give official support to the initiative put forward by the NATO countries' heads of state and government. This has taken place soon after Kazakhstan's accession to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and this, Almaty believes, is clear confirmation of Kazakhstan's firm political desire to strengthen international security and stability.

Speaking at the signing ceremony, K. Saudabaev expressed the hope that the implementation of the Partnership for Peace concept would make it possible to rule out the emergence of any grounds for new confrontation after the ending of the Cold War, would create real possibilities for a smooth transition to an atmosphere of stability, mutual trust, and cooperation throughout the world, and would ensure firm guarantees for the security and territorial integrity of Kazakhstan.

Acceding to this initiative, he stressed, opens up for the republic broad prospects for military-political, economic, and technical cooperation with NATO in terms of setting up a modern army in accord with democratic principles and world standards, for conversion of the defense industry and for participation in peacekeeping operations under the UN aegis. The minister said that the importance of Kazakhstan's accession to this program is that it contains a stimulus for the further development of economic reforms, transition to a market economy, and the construction of a law-based democratic state.

Kazakhstan's foreign minister had a conversation with Sergio Balanzino, NATO deputy secretary general.

9.28 Grachev Gives Overview of Military Doctrine

Army General Pavel Grachev Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 9 June 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

As we know, following the collapse of the Soviet Union and the formation of a number of independent states on its territory, Russia's state-legal status has changed radically. It has become an autonomous subject of international relations, the USSR's successor as permanent member of the UN Security Council, and one of the five world nuclear powers.

The cardinal changes in the geopolitical and military strategic situation in the world, the new nature and system of international relations, and the creation of Russian armed forces have put before Russia the task of elaborating and adopting a fundamentally new national military doctrine.

On the one hand, the end of the confrontation which had proceeded under the sign of the struggle between two systems, with its projection onto all aspects of international life, has not only reduced the threat of global war but has laid down the preconditions for establishing constructive cooperation between states which were previously confronting each other and for a fundamentally new relationship between Russia and the world around it.

However, it must be clearly understood that these new relations do not by any means rule out the emergence of differences and contradictions, which at times are quite sharp.

The main thing, in our view, is that they should be resolved and settled within the framework of normal collaboration between states, with the specific nature of national interests taken into account.

On the other hand, attention must be paid to the relatively high level of tension in individual regions of the world. The probability of local and regional wars continues to exist, as well as of armed conflicts within individual states on the basis of national-ethnic, territorial, religious, and other contradictions. A particularly dangerous challenge to regional and international stability is presented by the growth of aggressive nationalism in various regions of the world.

From the very beginning of work on the military doctrine it was absolutely clear that what had to be done was not simply to amplify military-doctrinal views which existed in the Soviet period but to elaborate fundamentally new stances and approaches.

Essentially for the first time we stated that we would protect not the ideology but the vitally important interests of the country, which do not affect the security of other states in any way and are ensured within the framework of mutually advantageous interstate relations based on equal rights.

The cornerstone of our military doctrine is the provision that Russia does not regard any state as its enemy. This has brought about the need for a radical review of approaches to the entire spectrum of problems of military-organizational development....

The “Basic Provisions of the Russian Federation Military Doctrine,” which are of a most general and conceptual nature, have made it possible to unite all these legislative acts and departmental documents in a single whole, a kind of “military constitution.” For the first time in our country’s history, this document was thoroughly examined at a number of sittings of the Russian Federation Security Council and ratified by Russian President B.N. Yeltsin. Thus the “Basic Provisions of Military Doctrine” are an official normative legal document, a constituent component of the concept of Russian Federation security, and represent a “document of the transitional period—the period of the formation of Russian statehood, the implementation of democratic reforms, and the formation of a new system of international relations.” In other words, the adopted “Basic Provisions of Military Doctrine” constitute not dogma but a document open to relevant revision as the military-political situation develops. It is intended to ensure the implementation of a minimum of two basic functions....

Another function, the informative function, is also highly significant. The military doctrine enables the peoples of our country and the world community to correctly understand Russia’s aims and tasks in the sphere of the struggle to avert possible armed conflicts and wars and in preparations for repulsing possible aggression against Russia and protecting its vital interests.

Structurally speaking, the “Basic Provisions of Military Doctrine” are made up of a preface, political, military, military-technical, and economic sections, and also a concluding section.

The political principles of the military doctrine reflect two interconnected tasks-the prevention of war, and readiness to repulse an aggressor.

Russia rejects any war, use of military force, or threat of force as means of achieving political, economic, and other aims. It advocates the adoption of commitments by all states not to use military force first and adheres to the principles of the inviolability of state borders and non-interference in the internal affairs of other states. All questions under dispute should be resolved only by political and diplomatic means.

As I have already noted, the political principles of the military doctrine indicate for the first time that the Russian Federation sees no state as its enemy. I will say frankly that for us the professional military, who have gotten used to having the most specific of guidelines, this turn of events has created a lot of additional difficulties. Primarily we had to retune ourselves psychologically, but there were also difficulties of what I would call a technical nature. This primarily concerns questions of strategic planning, the instruction and training of cadres, and finally, the determination of the defense budget. Today we are building our defense policy, gearing ourselves to taking existing and potential threats into account. These are expounded fairly fully in the doctrine. While Russia has no enemies, like any state, it has its vitally important interests. We are capable and prepared to protect them ....

I believe that Russia is entitled to expect a different attitude to Paragraph 5 of the CFE Treaty. However, the lack of a solution to the problem of flank restrictions can be viewed as evidence that by no means everyone has yet jettisoned the bloc-style thinking of the Cold War era.

Russia believes that the main principles for resolving its military security problems are the maintenance of stability in the regions adjoining its borders and compliance with international commitments. At the same time the doctrine indicates that Russia's security should be protected without prejudice to other countries' security or the security system as a whole.

Regarding the matter of maintaining international peace and security and preventing wars and armed conflicts, the Russian Federation views as partners all states whose policies do not prejudice its interests or contradict the UN Charter. A priority for us is to establish cooperation within the CIS-cooperation with its members in resolving problems of collective defense and security and coordinating military policy and defense building.

At the present time we are formulating a blueprint for collective security within the CIS framework. The basis for this is the Collective Security Treaty. It is becoming increasingly evident that no state in the Commonwealth can develop normally in various spheres without close integration. And there is no sense in looking for the notorious “hand of Moscow” or a new “imperialist thinking” on Russia’s part. This is an objective assessment of present realities. We favor an equal pooling of efforts by all CIS member states in order to resolve problems that arise.

On a regional level, Russia is implementing cooperation with CSCE member countries and other states and militarypolitical structures in adjacent regions which have an existing or nascent collective security system. But here too there is a major peculiarity. Russia is not just a European but also an Asian state. Consequently, in order to protect our security and vital interests we cannot retire into Europe alone; we must make efforts to establish collective security systems in other regions too, including the Asia-Pacific region ....

In accordance with this, the main objective of Russia’s peacekeeping activity is to protect its national security interests through encouraging the establishment and maintenance of peace and stability both on the planet as a whole and in various regions.

In realizing this objective, Russia firmly adheres to the generally accepted norms and principles of international law as well as the specific norms and rules for carrying out peacekeeping activity. The latter category includes:

- matching the form and content of peacekeeping steps to the situation to be resolved;
- giving priority to political over military ways and means of settling a situation;
- strictly observing and protecting human rights;
- using military contingents of peacemaking forces only with the consent of the opposing sides and with the approval of the international community.

In the context of the said norms and principles the leading areas of the Russian Federation's peacemaking activity are:

- mediating in settling crisis situations and preventing the escalation of conflicts;
- influencing the conflicting sides by diplomatic means above all but also, in extraordinary circumstances, by military means with a view to ensuring the fair and peaceful resolution of disputed issues;
- taking measures to preserve peace by disengaging the conflicting sides by using military contingents of the Russian Federation Armed Forces operating under UN auspices or sent into the crisis zone with the consent of the conflicting sides within the framework of the Collective Security Treaty;
- determining and supporting structures which seek to strengthen peace and to prevent the emergence or the continuation of a conflict.

Thus it is possible to maintain that there is nothing in Russia's peacemaking activity or in the tasks entrusted to its armed forces that runs counter to the fundamental, universally recognized norms and principles of international relations.

All this confirms once again Russia's desire to be a full and equal member of the world community in the resolution of international peacekeeping questions.

The second fundamentally new task for us is to assist internal affairs organs and internal troops of the Russian Federation Ministry of Internal Affairs in localizing and blocking regions of conflict, ending armed clashes, and disengaging opposing sides and also to defend strategically important installations according to the procedure laid down in existing legislation.

The possibility of fulfilling such tasks is provided for in the legislation of many countries. It is not a question of the armed forces' assuming any special internal functions but of the possibility of additionally involving forces and equipment in halting bloodshed. It must be realized here that it is just as legitimate to come between, let us say, Ossetians and Ingush who have taken up arms as between Serbs and Muslims in Bosnia.

What is new is the provision that "the security interests of the Russian Federation and other CIS states might require the stationing of troops (forces) and means outside the territory of the Russian Federation."

This provision has elicited a highly ambivalent response abroad, particularly in certain "near" countries and in Eastern Europe. Such a reaction, however, is, rather, nothing but an attempt at political speculation because the same paragraph unequivocally states that "the conditions for such stationing and manning are defined in the appropriate international legal documents." In other words, these questions are in full accordance with the universally recognized norms of international law.

The need of military bases outside Russia's territory is dictated, above all, by the interests of maintaining stability in individual regions. Their deployment is initiated primarily by those states that are in need of additional stability factors.

As regards military installations, the need for these outside Russian territory is determined in some cases by their purpose (for example, missile attack early warning system radar stations) and in other cases by their technical uniqueness and by the impossibility of creating a replacement of equal worth on Russian territory in the very short term.

In all cases military bases and installations are deployed outside Russia by mutual agreement between the sides.

Here I would like to dwell on the thesis, which is being greatly exaggerated by certain people, that Russia is supposedly ready to interfere in its neighbors' internal affairs. I will cite from the doctrine: "The Russian Federation abides by the principles of the peaceful settlement of international disputes, respect for a state's sovereignty and territorial integrity, non-interference in its internal affairs, inviolability of state borders, and other universally recognized principles of international law." This is set forth in the military doctrine's political fundamentals, which take priority over its other constituent parts.....

At the same time the doctrine defines for the first time that the needs of the armed forces and other troops for armament, military hardware, and property will be met with due regard for the country's scientific, technical, and economic potential.

A few words about military-technical cooperation with foreign countries.

Whereas military-technical cooperation in the former Soviet Union was aimed at supporting welcome regimes and, as is known, was more ideological in nature, today Russia regards it as, above all, a constituent part of the balanced support for its own economic interests. Therefore continued trade in arms and military hardware will be one of the elements of activity in this sphere. But, at the same time, what is new is the emergence in the military doctrine, as one of the basic principles of Russia's policy, of the following: "The inadmissibility of deliveries of arms and military hardware which might exacerbate a crisis situation, undermine regional stability, or violate embargoes or other corresponding international accords to which the Russian Federation is a party."

In addition to sales of weapons, it is also planned to expand contracts for training foreign servicemen, above all from CIS countries, in Russian educational institutions.

The final section of the "Basic Provisions of Military Doctrine" states that the Russian Federation guarantees the fulfillment of the provisions of this document. At the same time it will strictly abide by the UN Charter and by universally recognized international legal norms and principles.

This is a brief resume of the crux of the main doctrinal provisions aimed at ensuring Russia's security and the defense of its vital interests.

Like the whole world, Russia is now going through an extremely difficult and crucial historical period. It is a period of the creation of a new world order. To all appearances, its character will predetermine the destiny of mankind in all countries and peoples for many decades. It is in precisely this world-historical context that the search must be made for the role and place of the Russian state in the still evolving and largely contradictory and impermanent geopolitical balance of forces and interests.

9.29 Samsonov on CIS Collective Security Concept

Moscow Radio, 22 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

A regular conference of the CIS defense ministers took place in Moscow this week. Problems of setting up CIS joint armed forces were discussed. Speaking about the results of the work, Col.-Gen. Viktor Samsonov, chief of staff for coordination of military cooperation of the CIS countries, noted:

The concept of collective security is the totality of what has been agreed by the treaty participant states on averting and removing threats, on joint protection against aggression, and on guaranteeing sovereignty and territorial integrity.

I would like to draw attention, in particular, to the clause of the concept that says the strategic nuclear forces of Russia fulfill the function of restraint from possible aggressive intentions against all CIS participant states.

I will note that the Commonwealth's collective security is based upon the principles of the indivisibility of security, equal responsibility, the collectiveness of defense, of a consensus in the adoption of fundamental decisions in the sphere of defense.

The concept also notes that in the long term participant states may take the decision to create joint armed forces. Therefore, collective security may be created by collective peacekeeping forces. The main directions for creating effective collective security have been outlined: the drawing closer together of defense legislation, consultations on problems of military organizational development, the development of common approaches for training troops, coordinating questions of operations organization of territories, carrying out joint operational measures and combat training, coordinating both operational and other plans and programs, training cadres, coordinating questions on manufacturing, and repairing equipment and others.

The concept provides for three stages in the formation of a collective security system. At the first stage, the creation of national armed forces must be completed, a system of military and military-technical cooperation must be worked out, and a legal base for the operation of the collective security must be created.

At the second stage, a coalition grouping of troops and a joint air defense system must be created and the questions of the formation of joint armed forces must be examined.

At the third stage, the creation of a collective security system must be completed in a practical form.

9.30 Further on Samsonov Comments

Gennadiy Meranovich Krasnaya Zvezda, 22 July 1994
[FBIS Translation]

At the press conference held here yesterday, Col.-Gen. Viktor Samsonov, chief of staff [for the coordinating of military cooperation], commented on the results of the session of the CIS Council of Defense Ministers on 18-19 July. He noted that the greatest disagreements among participants in the session were evoked by the draft decisions regulating the performance of peacekeeping operations in the Georgian- Abkhazian conflict zone and material-technical, financial, and cadre support for peacemaking operations in the CIS framework. According to the decision of a joint session of the Council of Defense Ministers and the Council of Foreign Ministers, General Samsonov reported, the question of the form of the CIS countries' participating in this operation is to be examined promptly.

The adoption of the draft concept of collective security of the states party to the Collective Security Treaty was described as the session's most important result. In this regard Col.-Gen. Viktor Samsonov drew the journalists' special attention to the provision of the concept in which the Russian Strategic Nuclear Forces are assigned the functions of providing a deterrent to potential aggressive intentions directed against states party to the treaty.

9.31 General Volkov Proposes Changes in CIS Collective Security System

Major General Vasiliy Volkov Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 20

August 1994 [FBIS Translation]

[Article by Maj.-Gen. Vasiliy Petrovich Volkov, candidate of legal sciences, and representative of the CIS Executive Secretariat Council of Defense Ministers.]

More than two years have elapsed since the Collective Security Treaty was signed in Tashkent. The peoples of the former Soviet Union, and not they alone, breathed somewhat easier. Some, because there was now hope that the focal points of the interethnic and other conflicts that had erupted full force by that time on the territories of certain states of the Commonwealth would be extinguished, others, because they understood that the new regional community professing the principles of non-aggression, non-interference, and good-neighborliness in mutual relations with other states was prepared to use force in the sole instance of it, the community, or any of its members being subjected to some aggression on the part of third countries. These declarative postulates of the treaty were subsequently bolstered by real actions. The nuclear weapons were concentrated mainly on the territory of Russia and the strategic missiles were no longer targeted at facilities of the former probable enemies.

So the world community could sleep easy. But can the mother, wife, or family of the soldier and officer of the Commonwealth peacekeeping forces (Russian servicemen, mainly), who are literally separating with their bare hands the inhabitants of one and the same state who are avid to exterminate each other, sleep easy? The peacekeepers themselves quite often find themselves caught up in this fight.

It may now be affirmed that everything with regard to our commitments to the world community is being fulfilled unswervingly. Yet our attempts to create an effective regional system of collective security, within whose framework not only problems of military security but also, perhaps, at this stage, problems of greater urgency for the Commonwealth of Independent States could be tackled successfully, remain in many instances merely good intentions, with which the road leading whither is well known.

Only the efforts of Russia, perhaps, are somehow as yet holding back the points of tension that are at times slowly dying, at times flaring up. One has the impression here that it is losing far more than it is gaining. Not to mention the charges of "imperial ambitions," Russia is sustaining considerable economic losses. It is losing its sons. Is it not too high a price for, as some people maintain, "the defense of Russia's interests in the near abroad"? I believe that what we have there are the interests of the whole Commonwealth, not just of Russia.

God forbid, but what is at this time someone else's business could come to be the epicenter of tragic events like those that have occurred in the Dniester region, Karabakh, Abkhazia, and Tajikistan. It makes no difference here what goals were being pursued or who ignited these conflicts. The main thing is that people, the absolute majority of whom are totally innocent, are dying.

In order for such things to have been ruled out in the future, real political will should have been displayed yesterday, even. Although even today this is not too late.

But, as the almost three-year experience of the CIS shows, political will alone is frequently insufficient for ensuring that the documents adopted in the Commonwealth at the highest level operated flawlessly.

If we go back to that cart in which the Collective Security Treaty is peacefully slumbering, the political will of its participants does, it would seem, exist, and all want to pull this cart in the same direction (as distinct from the participants in the operation from Krylov's well-known fable), but there have been no real, tangible results as yet.

Evaluating this situation, you involuntarily make a comparison with the activity of the NATO bloc. You may take a varying view of this organization and question the very need for its existence under modern conditions, but the fact that no armed conflicts are permitted within the NATO framework and that, if they do arise, they are quickly cut short with the use of all possible means is indisputable. NATO has a mechanism for the realization of adopted decisions. With us, however, this mechanism is far from perfect.

In expressing my position on this issue, I would like to mention that, as a representative of the Joint Armed Forces Main Command and, subsequently, a representative of the Commonwealth of Independent States Executive Secretariat Defense Ministers Council and simultaneously, for almost a year now, having been acting chief of the Department of Interstate Political-Legal and Military Cooperation of this Secretariat (may there be no wincing, as they read these words, among employees of the Finance Office of the CIS Military Cooperation Coordination Staff, where I am down for all the types of allowance—hold the latter position on a voluntary basis, that is, on an unpaid basis, strictly in accordance with clause 7 of Article 10 of the law of the Russian Federation “Status of the Serviceman”) and participating in practically all sessions of the Commonwealth Council of Heads of State, the Council of Heads of Government, and the Defense Ministers Council since the moment of their formation and in certain sessions of the Foreign Ministers Council, I have concluded that the attempts to transfer international experience of the adoption and realization of decisions onto our reality are not always justified. There are many reasons of both an objective nature for this: The absence thus far of the necessary legal base and supranational bodies whose decisions would be binding on all states and the readiness of all bodies, organizations, officials, and citizens to abide unswervingly by the decisions adopted by arms of the Commonwealth, and here the reason is that same legal nihilism to which all of us became inured over decades, and much, much else, including a lack of interest in and, in some cases, active resistance to the integration processes occurring in the Commonwealth on the part of individual states, organizations, and officials. This is natural; each has his own interest here.

Considering this, it will take a considerable amount of time to create the conditions where the decisions adopted within the framework of the Commonwealth are fulfilled unswervingly.

And in addition, while there is an absence in our states of a law-based, civil, democratic society, and while all processes are controlled only by individuals or groups of individuals, not rules of law, we need a chief who can lead us to that same law-based, democratic society. This is the mentality of the majority of our society. And we simply cannot escape this.

Considering what has been said, a number of organizational-legal measures are necessary in the immediate future, in my view, to ensure that the Collective Security Treaty operates for the good of the Commonwealth of Independent States, each participant, and, yes, the entire world community as a whole.

The signing of the Collective Security Treaty in May 1992 pursued military-political goals, primarily. This meant preservation of the single defense space, joint armed forces of the Commonwealth, the unified command of the strategic nuclear forces, and certain other points, which corresponded in full to the constituting documents of the Commonwealth of Independent States. The adoption in states of the CIS of legislative instruments on the creation of their own armed forces and on neutrality and such is evoking in the Commonwealth a cool attitude, to put it mildly, both toward the very idea of the treaty and toward all other documents adopted in its development.

In addition, collective security, it is customary to believe, means mainly joint defense against a military threat, and this, let us be realistic, has been pushed back considerably at the present time compared with the Cold War period.

Yet the very concept of security incorporates several subspecies. According to some criteria, security is subdivided into political, economic, environmental, military, and so forth; according to other, most general, criteria, into security of progress, social security, and so forth; according to yet others, into the security of the person, society, the state, and a system of states and planetary security.

To ensure that the involvement of CIS states in the Collective Security Treaty is more compelling and, most important, necessary and useful for all members of the Commonwealth, it is essential to determine the priority threats to each state. For the Republic of Belarus, possibly, these could be environmental and economic threats, for the Republic of Tajikistan, political and military threats, and so forth. Having all united together within the framework of the Collective Security Treaty, each state could participate in the areas that it needs most.

And now concerning the role of the chief in this process. The entire system of collective security at the first stage could operate under the direct leadership of the head of the state that is the chairman in the statutory bodies of the Commonwealth-the chairman of a Collective Security Council. To ensure continuity in leadership and the fulfillment of the adopted decisions, it is essential to have on a permanent basis one first deputy chairman of the Collective Security Council and three deputies, who could be responsible for the entire set of questions on problems of security in one of four regions of the CIS: Eastern Europe, the Caucasus, Central Asia, East Asia.

There could under the first deputy be a small staff consisting mainly of citizens of the state whose representative is the first deputy himself. The basic preparatory work (preparation of draft documents, their concordance and substantiation, and so forth) should be performed in the regional structures of the system of collective security of the CIS and also in the Defense Ministers Council, the Foreign Ministers Council, and the Military Cooperation Coordination Staff, and also, if necessary, in other arms of the Commonwealth.

The entire organizational-support work on the final polishing of the documents and the preparation and realization of sessions of the Collective Security Council could be assumed by executive secretariat.

Why do I speak about this in such detail? Recent sessions of the Commonwealth Defense Ministers Council and the Foreign Ministers Councils have confirmed once again that the majority of subscribers to the Collective Security Treaty are reluctant to have a structure of the system of collective security that presupposes its strict centralization and the creation of costly new interstate bodies. But it is not even the economic difficulties that frighten some states, although some of them are allocating up to 4 percent of their budget, which is sparse by today's standards, for the upkeep of the interstate bodies that already exist. The main thing is that such a system of collective security and the assignments that it is proposed tackling within its framework are not to the states' liking. Consequently, it is necessary to change the system and give it different assignments. I believe that at this stage, whatever degree of integration we achieve in the immediate future, it is essential to shift the brunt of the work on problems of security to the states and the regions and to reserve for the center the solution of organizational-legal questions and the elaboration of the conceptual propositions of the collective security of the Commonwealth.

The fact that the main intellectual potential in all areas of the proposed activity of the Collective Security Council is concentrated in the states and that it needs to be utilized to the maximum extent in the interests of the entire Commonwealth also speaks in favor of the creation of just such a system of collective security.

The framework of an article does not allow the proposal of a solution of all the complex problems of the collective security of the Commonwealth. But it would be better, in my view, to discuss this at a conference of leaders of the staffs of the security councils of the participants in the Commonwealth of Independent States, that is, the people who feel in their bones and who know better than anyone all the problems of the security of their states, the regions, and the CIS as a whole. It is simply amazing that we have been attempting thus far to decide these most important questions for the Commonwealth without their participation.

It may be assumed with a great degree of probability that some of the proposals that have been expressed in this article will not suit some people-particularly those who have no interest in a strengthening of the Commonwealth in all areas, specifically in the creation of a dependable defensive alliance. But the integration processes in the Commonwealth have already begun, and no one can stop them.

9.32 CIS General on Military Cooperation

Interview Rossiyskie Vesti, 20 September 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

Following the breakup of the USSR, there has been less and less talk in the Western press about possible aggression by our country.

Recently, however, certain Western politicians have suddenly started once again fearing a threat from the East. Why? Their concern is due to the fact that the former Soviet republics have decided to deepen their military cooperation and have started thinking about creating a defense union. The West sees in the CIS collective forces the renascent military might of the USSR. How valid are these fears, when Russia's military doctrine is of a highly peace-loving nature?...

[Pyankov]: Recently this question has been put to me quite frequently both by former Warsaw Pact allies and by representatives of Western military departments. I am profoundly convinced that the question of creating a defense union cannot be resolved right away. The conditions for forming it do not yet exist. The young sovereign states are now creating national armies. I would even say this: The fragments of the former Soviet Army are disintegrating. In other words, not one of these states is tackling questions of any close military union or seems to have any intention of tackling them in the immediate future. All the CIS members are faced with other problems: completing the dividing up of the army, reducing it, and strengthening their national armies.

[Pyankov]: You see, both politicians and military people understand that today it is still necessary somehow to guarantee the states' security with the minimum expenditure on national armed forces. The former Soviet Army has melted away like ice. Today the independent states cannot maintain even those units of that former army that remain on their territory. Ukraine is a vivid example. It has inherited three mighty military districts: Carpathian, Kiev, and Odessa. If you also include units under central jurisdiction all brigades and divisions-you can even talk about five districts. Ukraine is not in a position to maintain such an army. Today it is being reduced. It will not be increased again even in the future. Today we speak of collective security, but the defense union question is not mentioned directly at all. At conferences with the heads of the CIS states' defense departments we resolve questions of the moment, as the saying goes. We have just been discussing problems of repairing military hardware. This is the crux of the matter: Hardware goes out of commission, but repair plants are scattered across the territory of the former Union. Some states are able to repair only armored vehicles, others only aircraft.... Henceforth we will repair all hardware together. But does this really mean that the defense union is being created? The USSR war machine will not be revived either today or tomorrow....

[Kozyreva]: How do you see the problem of relations with the NATO bloc? A number of politicians in the West believe that it is time to disband NATO. What is your viewpoint on this? [Pyankov]: I believe that the disbandment of NATO would accord with the interests of all the world's peoples. The Warsaw Pact does not exist, and Russia's president and defense minister have repeatedly declared that they do not see NATO as their enemy. Of course, we are not yet allies like Britain and France, let us say. But it is a lengthy process to develop relations of alliance. The mistrust between our peoples was sown over long years. People in both Europe and in the world must understand that Russia is not the USSR, which saw as its chief task to defeat NATO.

[Pyankov]: Undoubtedly. These exercises were the first step on the path of mutual rapprochement. We are not enemies, and we can be allies, but for the time being we are partners. Joint exercises help us to understand one another. I am an old general who has served in the army for forty years. Throughout these years the politicians told us that the United States, West Germany, and the other NATO countries were our enemies. We studied the potential of the enemy armies, their weak and strong points.... Today we must change. We are slowly freeing ourselves from old stereotypes. I believe that no military danger threatens us today. The fact that we might be conquered economically is another matter. We should be concerned about that.

[Kozyreva]: And yet, how prepared are the CIS joint forces to defend their territory, and will they be able to repulse possible aggression?

[Pyankov]: But who is going to attack? A specific image of the enemy has not been formed in our military doctrine. Military matters are a specific science. The military must know against whom they are to defend themselves. If there is a specific enemy, it will at once be clear whether we are weak or strong. If we are weak, we will create groupings, stocks, reserves.... But our task today is not to have a strong fist to repulse aggression but to be friendly with everyone. It is up to politicians and diplomats to have their say here. By 1995 Russia will have an army of just 1.5 million men.

[Pyankov]: Unfortunately Russia bears the whole burden. There are many undesirable points for it in doing so. People are once again calling it an occupier and saying that it is once again demonstrating its imperial ambitions to the world. When the problem of the war in Tajikistan was discussed at the conference of leaders of the CIS states' military departments, I personally said: "Let us all provide one regiment each and give joint assistance.” But what is the position today? Only Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan have each provided a battalion. Fortunately, the situation is being normalized in other hot spots. But it must be pointed out that there are still no joint peacemaking forces.

[Pyankov]: Chechnya is Russian territory, and I would put the question like this: Let neutral forces go there, for example, joint forces of Ukraine and Kazakhstan. Because, if we are going to talk about collective security, then we must act together and help one another. But if Russia sends its own troops into Chechnya, then the situation can only worsen: Russian troops might be viewed as occupation troops, and both government troops and opposition detachments would fire at the soldiers. But our CIS allies are in no hurry to help us at present. I hope, however, that we will still succeed in creating genuine peacemaking forces of all the CIS states, and then our task of ensuring the security of the CIS with minimal armies and with minimal material expenditure will have been resolved.

9.33 Report Views CIS Defense Issues

ITAR-TASS, 21 September 1994 [FBIS Translation]

“Changes in the military-political situation in the world characterized by decreasing tensions on the global level, by the rejection by Russia and other CIS states of the concept of permanent adversaries, by the beginning of interaction with NATO does not mean that potential threats to security have been eliminated completely,” according to a report of the Foreign Intelligence Service headlined “Russia-CIS: Does the Western Position Need Correction?” made public on Wednesday.

“Interethnic and interstate conflicts in the CIS and neighboring states tend to expand.” Thus, the intelligence service possesses information that Afghanistan, which borders on the CIS, “has forces striving to separate the north of the country, populated mostly by Tajiks and Uzbeks, and create on its basis a Farsi-speaking state which would include Tajikistan.”

Iran and Turkey also work to expand their influence claiming the role of “regional superpowers” which does not allow them to stay away from conflicts on the CIS territory, according to the report.

Islamic extremism-“a movement aimed at forced spreading of Islam, suppression of forces resisting it, changes in the secular character of states”-negatively tells on the situation in hot spots in the CIS and especially in Tajikistan, the document added.

Its authors note that the “export of the ideology of militant Islam acquires the character of a serious threat also outside the CIS and this means that contraposition to it meets the interests of the whole world community.”

The Russian intelligence also noted “inadequate reaction of the West to conflicts close to Russian borders.” The number of victims in hot spots of the CIS is comparable to that in former Yugoslavia; however, “there exist serious differences in peacekeeping diplomacy regarding the two crisis areas,” the report says. Moreover, many foreign countries criticize the “special Russian role” in peacekeeping operations in the CIS and the thesis that Russian vital interests depend on stability in other CIS countries. The intelligence service denounces “the double standards in assessing the rights and obligations of the West and Russia” and believes it to be groundless to claim that “Russia contrapositions its efforts to the actions of the United Nations and other international organizations.”

Despite all post-“cold war” changes in military doctrines of leading Western powers, Russia and other CIS countries have to take into account that the countries are not going to refrain from modernizing and developing their offensive armaments. “This practice results in the conclusion that, at the present stage, the CIS countries have to preserve and develop their own strategic offensive forces. However, in conditions when nuclear forces in the CIS, according to international agreements, can exist only in Russia, the necessity of creating a single defense space of the Commonwealth is growing,” the report says.

Other security requirements of today include “problems of overcoming the ecological crisis,” joint efforts in the fight against organized crime, drug trafficking, and the smuggling of radioactive materials and weapons, according to the document.

“Thus the realities of security confirm that economic, political, and military integration in the Commonwealth ... meets the demands of the time and is a natural and objective process,” the report says.

9.34 [Kazakh] Agreement with Russian Federation on Military Cooperation

Kazakh-Russian Agreement on Military Affairs

SovetyKazakhstana, 19 October 1994 [FBIS
Translation]

[Treaty between Republic of Kazakhstan and Russian Federation on Military Cooperation, signed in Moscow on 28 March 1994]

The Republic of Kazakhstan and the Russian Federation, hereafter referred to as the contracting parties, Guided by the Treaty on Friendship, Cooperation, and Mutual Assistance Between the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Russian Federation of 25 May 1992.

Mindful of earlier agreements on cooperation in the sphere of defense within the confines of the Commonwealth of Independent States and on a bilateral basis in the interest of guaranteed collective security,

Aware of the need for the precise and consistent fulfillment of the obligations assumed by the contracting parties in connection with the Treaty on the Reduction and Limitation of Strategic Offense Arms of 31 July 1991 and the protocol signed in Lisbon on 23 May 1992, hereafter referred to respectively as the START I Treaty and the Lisbon Protocol,

Acknowledging the need for united effort and concerted action for reliable joint defense within the confines of the common military-strategic territory, And expressing the wish to give the military cooperation between the contracting parties a new quality and to provide it with a legal foundation, have agreed as follows:

Article 1. For the purposes of this treaty, the following terms will be defined in this way:

organizations, and facilities, armed with or storing strategic nuclear weapons, and the units securing their operations.

“Integrated military units”-large and small units of the Armed Forces of the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Armed Forces of the Russian Federation assigned by the contracting parties for joint defensive missions.

“Facilities used for defensive purposes”-test sites, military facilities, the facilities of industrial representatives, and battlefields, located on parcels of land within the territory of the contracting parties and capable of being used by the parties jointly or transferred by one of the parties to the other, including lease transfers, for use for military purposes in the interest of strengthening the defensive capabilities of both parties.

“Delivery system”-the intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM), the heavy bomber (HB), and the air-launched cruise missile (ALCM).

“Nuclear munitions”-the ICBM or ALCM warheads containing a nuclear charge.

Article 2. The contracting parties reaffirm their commitment to friendly interstate relations based on the principles of mutual respect for state sovereignty and territorial integrity, the inviolability of borders, the peaceful settlement of disputes and the refusal to use force or threats of force, and the conscientious fulfillment of treaty commitments in accordance with the Treaty on Friendship, Cooperation, and Mutual Assistance between the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Russian Federation of 25 May 1992, as well as the observance of other common standards of international law.

In the event of a situation threatening the security, independence, or territorial integrity of one of the contracting parties, the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Russian Federation will hold consultations without delay and undertake specific actions to give one another the necessary assistance, including military assistance, in accordance with international law, the bilateral Treaty on Friendship, Cooperation, and Mutual Assistance of 25 May 1992, and the Treaty on Collective Security of 15 May 1992.

Article 3. Strategic nuclear forces within the territory of the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Russian Federation will perform missions in the security interests of the contracting parties.

The Republic of Kazakhstan, with a view to the existing system for the functioning of the strategic nuclear forces located within its territory, will assign these military units of the strategic nuclear forces the status of strategic nuclear forces of the Russian Federation-Russian military elements temporarily deployed within the territory of the Republic of Kazakhstan.

Until all of the strategic nuclear weapons temporarily located within the territory of the Republic of Kazakhstan have been eliminated or withdrawn to the territory of the Russian Federation, the decision on the need to use these weapons will be made by the president of the Russian Federation with the approval of the president of the Republic of Kazakhstan.

In these cases, the Russian Federation will guarantee the institution of organizational and technical measures to preclude the unauthorized use of strategic nuclear weapons located within the territory of the Republic of Kazakhstan.

The terms of the presence of strategic nuclear forces within the territory of the Republic of Kazakhstan, corresponding to the standards of international law, will be defined in a separate agreement.

Article 4. All movable and immovable military property will belong to the contracting party within whose territory it was located on 31 August 1991.

The Russian Federation acknowledges the right of the Republic of Kazakhstan to receive compensation (in monetary form or some other form) equivalent to the value of the materials, agreed upon by the contracting parties, in nuclear munitions and delivery systems, as well as equipment and other property of the strategic nuclear forces located within the territory of the Republic of Kazakhstan on 31 August 1991 before their withdrawal to the territory of the Russian Federation.

Appraisals of the value of the materials and equipment and of the Russian Federation's expenditures on their maintenance, transport, and recycling, as well as the proportional share of compensation to be granted to the Republic of Kazakhstan, will be conducted according to a procedure agreed upon by the contracting parties.

Property rights to facilities, buildings, and installations erected after 31 August 1991 or weapons, vehicles, equipment, and property brought into the territory after this date will be exercised by the contracting party financing these operations. In the event of shared financing, property rights will be defined in separate agreements with consideration for proportional contributions.

The contracting parties reaffirm the possibility of the use of facilities and installations located within the territory of one contracting party by the armed forces of the other. The list of military facilities and installations and the procedures and terms of their use will be established in separate agreements.

Proceeding from the need for improvement in joint defense and the consolidation of national security, each of the contracting parties may turn the property of its own armed forces over to the other party for possession and use on mutually beneficial terms, including the terms of lease, in accordance with its own legislation.

One contracting party will not be obligated to compensate the other, unless other agreements stipulate otherwise, for improvements made by the other party in military facilities or on parcels of land located within the territory of the first party and used for military purposes, or for buildings or installations remaining on these grounds at the time this treaty expires, or for the early surrender of facilities and parcels of land.

Article 5. The status of facilities used jointly by the contracting parties for defensive purposes will be defined in line with the legal authority of the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Russian Federation as states responsible for the management of these facilities and their operation and material and technical support, as well as the joint authority of the contracting parties in the supervision of the activity and use of these facilities for the enhancement of the defensive capabilities of the parties.

During the performance of functions connected with the management, operation, and material and technical support of the SNF and of defense facilities leased from one another, the contracting parties will be fully responsible for their safe operation and the maintenance of the necessary levels of nuclear safety and other types of security.

During these processes, each of the contracting parties pledges to refrain from actions that might in any way prevent the other party from fulfilling its obligations, including those stemming from the START I Treaty and Lisbon Protocol, and prevent the functioning of its government agencies and/or damage state and/or private property.

The Russian Federation will take measures agreed upon with the Republic of Kazakhstan to eliminate the aftereffects of the operations of strategic nuclear forces located within the territory of the Republic of Kazakhstan, as well as facilities used for defensive purposes and turned over to the Republic of Kazakhstan by the Russian Federation. In the event of emergencies, the contracting parties will take immediate measures to eliminate the causes and will notify one another of this without delay....

Article 6. With a view to the importance of the strict observance of the provisions of the USSR-U.S. Treaty on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Defense of 26 May 1972, and with a view to the mutual interests of the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Russian Federation, the contracting parties will proceed from the knowledge that the Sary- Shagan test site will be used for the purpose of developing and improving ABM systems or components deployed within the region as specified in Article III of that treaty. The conditions of the use of the Sary-Shagan test site by the contracting parties will be defined in a separate agreement.

Article 7. The contracting parties will give one another mutual assistance in the implementation of multilateral international treaties and political commitments for the reduction and limitation of strategic offensive and conventional arms.

Each of the contracting parties must consider the interests of the other party during the conclusion of treaties and agreements with third states on military cooperation and deliveries of equipment and weapons.

Article 8. The defense ministries of the contracting parties will draft and conclude separate agreements on matters pertaining to the joint planning and use of troops in the interest of the mutual security of the parties and will plan and conduct joint operations in the preparation of command and control agencies and the training of troops within the territory of either of the parties by mutual agreement.

The contracting parties may form integrated military units under a joint command....

Article 9. The management, personnel hiring, and material and technical supply procedures for facilities used jointly by the contracting parties for defensive purposes, and their integrated military units and joint command, will be defined in separate agreements.

Article 10. The contracting parties will cooperate in the sphere of military intelligence.

Each of the contracting parties pledges not to conduct military intelligence activities directed against the other party.

Article 11. The contracting parties will conclude an agreement on the use of the forces and resources of the Navy of the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Navy of the Russian Federation in the Caspian Sea basin for joint operations to safeguard the security of the parties.

Article 12. Questions connected with the legal status of the servicemen of the armed forces of one of the contracting parties serving within the territory of the other party and of members of their families, their pension security, and other matters pertaining to the social and legal protection of these individuals, will be addressed in a separate agreement.

The contracting parties will extend the guarantees of the application and exercise of social and civil rights envisaged in their legislation to their citizens in military service outside the boundaries of their state.

The contracting parties will acknowledge the validity of military titles, state honors, and educational and pension documents of servicemen, the privileges granted to servicemen, individuals with military discharges, and members of their families, in accordance with the existing legislation of the contracting parties, with a view to their term of service in the armed forces of the former USSR and their subsequent service in the armed forces of the contracting parties, including contracted military service.

The contracting parties will guarantee civilian personnel equal rights, irrespective of their citizenship, to employment in military units and the enterprises and institutions of their armed forces and will include this period of their employment in their total term of service for pension eligibility.

When one of the contracting parties is inactivating its military units, establishments, and institutions located within the territory of the other party, the former party will compensate civilian personnel in accordance with its own labor legislation.

The contracting parties will consult one another on ways of improving and coordinating their national legislation, including laws on the financial and social security of the servicemen and civilian personnel of the armed forces and on the privileges granted to servicemen and individuals with military discharges and the members of their families.

Article 13. Members of the staff of military units, establishments, and institutions will not require visas to cross the state border of the contracting parties or require travel passports or special notations in passports if they carry identification (military service cards or passports) and travel authorization papers from their commanding officers (furlough passes or travel orders), and their minor children will not have to meet these requirements if their names are listed on the documents. When they are sent to a new service location or their permanent place of residence, they will transport their personal belongings across the state border between the contracting parties without the payment of duties, taxes, and other fees.

Subunits, units, and teams of more than fifty servicemen of the armed forces of one of the contracting parties may cross the state border of the other party after advance notification and by agreement of the defense ministries of the parties.

Article 14. Material and technical supply operations for military elements will be conducted by the defense ministries of the contracting parties on mutually beneficial terms, guaranteeing the maintenance of their armed forces and integrated military units at a high level of combat readiness and combat effectiveness, and will be regulated by separate agreements.

Article 15. The activities of the military elements of one of the contracting parties located within the territory of the other party will be financed by the party with jurisdiction over them.

Questions connected with the circulation of the national currencies of the contracting parties for the daily needs of the servicemen and military elements of the parties located within their territory will be regulated in accordance with the agreement between the National Bank of the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Central Bank of the Russian Federation.

Article 16. Each of the contracting parties pledges not to violate the state and public security of the other party and the personal safety of its citizens during its activity in facilities and on parcels of land belonging to the other party.

Article 17. The contracting parties will agree on policy in the sphere of joint development, production, repair, and shipment of arms, military vehicles, and material and technical resources in the interest of the comprehensive support of the armed forces, facilities used for defensive purposes, and integrated military units, and will coordinate aspects of military-technical cooperation, securing the preservation and development of existing cooperative relationships between enterprises developing and producing weapons and military hardware. Deliveries and services will be performed on a duty-free basis at prices set by each of the contracting parties for their own needs. Prices and rates will be agreed upon by the parties and will be defined in a separate agreement in each case. Questions connected with the coordination of policy in the sphere of arms and military hardware and reciprocal deliveries of goods (and work or services) will be addressed in special agreements on the basis of joint weapons programs.

The contracting parties will create an intergovernmental commission on industry and scientific research and experimental design projects for the pursuit of the policy agreed upon in the military-technical sphere, with the preservation and development of existing patterns of specialization and cooperation.

The contracting parties will create an intergovernmental commission on military-technical cooperation by the Republic of Kazakhstan and the Russian Federation for the pursuit of the policy agreed upon in the military-technical sphere.

Article 18. The contracting parties will retain their existing procedures for the education and training of officers and junior military specialists for the armed forces of the parties on the basis of the corresponding agreements.

Article 19. The contracting parties will retain the existing network of all types of communications, air defense, anti-ballistic missile defense, and early warning systems and supply lines and will agree on measures for their development.

The contracting parties will cooperate in the sphere of military transport movements. The procedures of this cooperation will be defined in a separate agreement.

The contracting parties will retain the common air space for flights by military and civilian aircraft and the joint flight control system on the basis of the corresponding agreements.

Article 20. For the purpose of reinforcing discipline and order in the armed forces, in facilities used for defensive purposes by the contracting parties either jointly or on the terms of a lease, and in integrated military units, the contracting parties will coordinate operations in the law enforcement sphere.

Article 21. The contracting parties will plan measures jointly and render mutual assistance in the resolution of ecological problems connected with the aftereffects of military operations.

Article 22. This treaty is not directed against any other states and will not affect the contracting parties' rights and obligations stemming from other international treaties to which they are party.

Article 23. The contracting parties will not allow the use of their territory by a third state for activity directed against the other contracting party.

Article 24. For the purpose of implementing the provisions of this treaty, and in the interest of broader and more intensive cooperation in the sphere of defense, the contracting parties will form a joint committee, which will act in accordance with a statute approved by the parties.

Article 25. This treaty may be amended and supplemented by mutual agreement of the parties.

The treaty must be ratified and will go into force on the date of the exchange of instruments of ratification.

The treaty will be concluded for a term of ten years. It will be renewed automatically for the next ten years unless one of the parties notifies the other, in writing and at least six months before the expiration of this term, of its wish to withdraw from the treaty.

This treaty will be in force as an interim agreement on the date it is signed.

9.35 CIS Military Integration Prospects Viewed

Dmitriy Trenin Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 4 November 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Within the framework of the revitalized debate concerning the reintegration of the post-Soviet states, a notable place is occupied by questions of convergence in the military-political and military spheres. Things have not been confined to debate. It may be affirmed that for the first time in three years the trend toward the drawing together of the defense space is starting to be the prevailing trend. A minimum of three most important circumstances are contributing to this: an awareness by the political elites of many new independent states (NIS) of the enormous difficulties that attend the independent building of national defense systems and, consequently, the gravitation toward a military alliance with Russia; the gradual formation in Russia itself of the political will in support of the military-political union of the countries of the CIS as a means of stabilizing the situation on the periphery of the Russian Federation and the creation of a “good-neighbor” zone around Russia; finally, as a derivative of the first two, the far greater realism in the vision of the actual ways to realize military integration plans.

The purpose of the present Russian defense policy in the “near abroad” is, evidently, the restoration-on a new basis and on a different scale-of the unity of the military-strategic space of the former Union (minus the Baltic), which was torn apart or seriously undermined as a result of the disintegration of the USSR. Designed to achieve this purpose is a strategy whose main components are the creation of a military-political alliance out of the CIS, headed by Russia; the close coordination of the efforts of the Russian Federation and the NIS in guarding, and if necessary, defending the external borders of the Commonwealth; the restoration of militaryeconomic relations within the former Union military-industrial complex; the conversion of the CIS into a regional organization that is recognized by the world community as bearing (with Russia having the leading role) the main responsibility for the settlement of armed conflicts on the territory of the post-Soviet states. It is thus obvious that the former approach based on the theory of collective security and the practice of the division of the once united Soviet Army is giving way to a new approach aimed at realization of the principle of collective defense and the creation under the aegis of Russia of joint, and in the future, united, armed forces of the CIS.

It might at first glance seem that those that in the fall and winter of 1991-92 were defeated in the argument over the fate of the Soviet military legacy have been compensated by history: The course of events has confirmed that they were right and, on the other hand, set an inordinately high price for the success of the recent “nationalizers” of the army. Nonetheless, it has to be seen that irreversible changes, which rule out a direct return to primary unification ideas, have occurred in the past three years in all the former Soviet republics.

We need first and foremost to scrutinize the concept of a common Eurasian strategic space as the cornerstone of the majority of integration constructs. The unity of this space is seen as natural and stabilizing, and its rupture as, correspondingly, unnatural and destabilizing. The weakening of Russia’s position in the world, the conflicts in the post-Soviet states, the expansionist aspirations of certain contiguous countries-these are the main arguments adduced in support of this proposition. The conclusion-unite before it is too late-sounds logical.

What is the basis of this unification? The imperial interests of a vast multinational state served as this basis in past times. Today there is no such state, and it will hardly emerge tomorrow. It has to be a question of a community of security interests among a number of independent states, a number of which are located in Eastern Europe, others in the Transcaucasus, and yet others, in Central Asia. How great can this community be?

There are two instances wherein it could be sufficient for the formation of a military-political alliance. The first, traditional instance: a perception by the community of a common threat. It was such a perception that formerly united Norway and Italy, Portugal and Turkey around the United States and beneath the flag of NATO. The second instance is a natural consequence of multilateral integration, in which it is essential that the building of a federative structure entails the “federalization” of defense. This process is occurring currently within the framework of the European Union. How do matters stand in the CIS in this connection?

For the majority of NIS a common external threat (and its perception) is absent. The attention of Armenia is concentrated on Azerbaijan and Turkey, and of Uzbekistan, on Tajikistan and Afghanistan, and Belarus is, possibly, free of the perception of any threat at all. The total resistance of the CIS countries to Russia’s repeated attempts to enlist them in joint peacekeeping operations in conflict zones on the territory of the former USSR testifies to the degree of real, not sham, community of perceived threats.

As far as broad reintegration, the result of which could be a unified defense system, is concerned, all attempts at “reunification” have thus far proven unsuccessful mainly owing to the fact that they have conceptually been addressed to the past and have been based on material and ideological structures whose positions have been incessantly eroded. In this sense there should be even fewer hopes for a Eurasian union than for the CIS.

A number of regions are actually forming in the space of the “subworld of the USSR”: a new Eastern Europe, Transcaucasus, and Central Asia. The differences in the geostrategic position of the NIS and their security requirements, threat levels, and so forth are extraordinarily great and are continuing to increase. They are, of course, drawn together by one circumstance: All three new regions are situated on the periphery of Russia, which has interests in each of them. But even in this case the relations among the new East Europeans, Caucasians, and Central Asians are indirect. Thus the unity of the strategic space-in the sense of a buffer separating it from the traditional abroad-really exists only for Russia and is a fiction for the NIS.

Consequently, it cannot be expected-even less demanded-of Belarus that it will perceive the situation in Gornyy Badakhshan as directly affecting its fundamental interests or that Uzbekistan will display concern for a strengthening of Russia's Far Eastern borders. On the other hand, Russia and some of the other states have an undoubted interest in each of the newly formed regions. Under these conditions, what is more beneficial from Russia's viewpoint-relying on an illusory community of interests of all the former republics and heaping onto itself the burden of building and maintaining a new Warsaw Pact, whose history could prove shorter than, and its fate similar to the fate of the prototype? Or seeking less all-embracing, but more efficient, longer-lasting, and cheaper options? This, it would seem, is an important question, the answer to which will help impart the optimum parameters to the planned military-political integration.

The author sees the following version of an answer. Instead of a single, but predominantly formal military-political alliance within the framework of the entire CIS, Russia could adopt a policy of building a system of regional agreements for deterring and warding off possible power challenges to itself and its new neighbors. In each region Moscow would rely on the countries whose long-term security interests are so consonant with its regional interests that no change of leaders or governments could rapidly alter Russia's national strategic priorities.

Obviously, in Eastern Europe this means Belarus, which covers a most important strategic axis, secures our ground line of communication with the rest of Europe, and brings Russia as close as possible to its Kaliningrad enclave. A union with Georgia, which is interested, like Russia, in preventing the regional expansion of neighboring states, is natural in the Transcaucasus. In Central Asia our strategic ally on the southern and eastern axes is Kazakhstan.

Close Russian-Belarusian relations in the military sphere ensuing from the organic convergence of the two countries could be developed on the basis of a bilateral security treaty, which would not cause apprehension among neighbors: Ukraine, Poland, and the Baltic. The corresponding supreme political and military authorities would be formed and joint armed forces would be created within the framework of regional treaties on the collective defense of Central Asia and the Transcaucasus. Even though the allies of the new Russia would not be that many, they would be key, supporting states bound to Russia by strong ties. Russia could accord its allies dependable security guarantees.

The separation from the ranks of CIS countries or a group of allies poses the question of Russia's relations with the other, "non-allied" states. Would Russia not thereby repel them and hurl them into neighbors' embraces? Would regional balances not thus be to Russia's detriment?

If we are speaking of Eastern Europe, then, despite the good prospects of economic integration and certain coincidental security interests of Russia and Ukraine, their military alliance is hardly possible politically as a consequence of the manifest domination therein of Russia. In addition, an alliance concluded despite the manifest absence of a military threat in Eastern Europe could itself give rise to the apprehensions of neighboring Central European states and provoke a process whose result might be the reconstitution of the enemy image. Under such conditions Russian-Ukrainian cooperation in the defense sphere could include the basing in Crimea on the corresponding terms of the Russian Black Sea Fleet, the integration of air defense and ABM systems, the coordination of border activity, and of course, the military-technical cooperation of the two countries.

In the new situation the strategic significance of Moldova for Russia is peripheral. A military threat to our country from this direction is absent. In addition, Moldova is split, and under these conditions a military alliance between Moscow and Chisinau could be of significance only to Tiraspol. For its part, despite the economic attachment to the countries of the CIS, Chisinau is firmly attuned toward a neutrality that excludes a foreign military presence. Russia's interest consists of promoting a settlement of the conflict between the Left Bank region and the rest of Moldova, not of acquiring bases "with a view of the Balkans."

There can hardly be any expectation of an alliance with Azerbaijan with the intention of deterring potential challenges on the part of Turkey and Iran (and where else?). Account should be taken also of the steadfast anti-Russian mood of part of the Azerbaijani political elite. Cooperation with Baku could include military-technical and border issues and lease of the radar station. Armenia, on the other hand, is definitely oriented toward an alliance with Russia, for which this country also is of obvious strategic interest. Nonetheless, despite the presence of Russian bases and border guards and also Moscow's assistance in the formation of Armenia's armed forces, an official military alliance with Yerevan-prior to the settlement of the Karabakh conflict, in any event could be detrimental to Russia's position in Azerbaijan and in the region as a whole.

Finally, in Central Asia the military-political line that Russia is actually in a position to hold extends, probably, along the southern and eastern borders of Kazakhstan, which should be its strategic ally. The other countries are either extraordinarily unstable or are pursuing goals barely consonant with Russia's or demonstratively prefer neutrality. In addition, as experience shows, threats emanating from the Central Asia-Middle East region cannot be countered with traditional bloc building. Bilateral and multilateral military cooperation in specific areas (air defense, borders, military-technical cooperation) could produce greater benefits.

So a system of Russia's collective defense alliances would include a security treaty with Belarus, a defense treaty with Georgia a special agreement with Armenia, and a defense treaty with Kazakhstan. Affiliated with this system would be a package of agreements with Ukraine and agreements on border protection, the unification of air defense systems, the leasing of facilities, and military-technical cooperation with other countries of the CIS.

Contrary to the widespread notion, collective security is not a lower form of military-political integration compared with collective defense. In actual fact, these two constructs differ in principle. Whereas the first is designed to ensure security against encroachments emanating from within some community (“collective”) of states, the second is aimed at repulsing threats directed from outside. Collective defense could, of course, also imply the collective security of the allies in respect to one another, but this aspect is undoubtedly subordinate. Finally, “security” does not require indication of the potential aggressor since all would obtain equal guarantees against one another but “defense” could not be built without a sufficiently certain vision of a probable enemy. In practice this means that it would be expedient, together with the creation of regional defense systems, to preserve the system of security of the CIS, which could be entrusted with the mission of practical peacekeeping on the territory of the Commonwealth.

9.36 PFP Viewed as “Waiting Room” Before Joining NATO

From the “Diplomatic Panorama” feature Interfax, 21

December 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Kyrgyzstan regards the NATO Partnership for Peace [PFP] program as a waiting room before joining NATO.

Kyrgyz Foreign Minister Rosa Otunbaeva said in Bishkek Tuesday [20 December] that Kyrgyzstan was drafting a document on joining the partnership and a Kyrgyzstan- NATO program.

According to Otunbaeva, Kyrgyzstan's joining Partnership for Peace would contribute to regional security and help Kyrgyzstan deal with the effects of natural disasters and in carrying out technological and training programs.

She believes that Central Asian countries should not trail behind the others. They have to form their own peacekeeping forces and keep them prepared for various operations, notably peacekeeping in Tajikistan.

Otunbaeva emphasized that the conflict in Chechnya is a Russian internal affair. She called for avoiding bloodshed and looking for resolution of the conflict through political dialogue.

9.37 CIS Divided on Treaty on Defense of CIS External Borders

Interfax, 9 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Azerbaijan categorically disagrees with the draft treaty on cooperation for defense of CIS external borders submitted for consideration by the CIS summit opening in Almaty on 10 February, Azer; Foreign Minister Hasan Hasanov told the joint meeting of the CIS defense and foreign ministers and the commanders of the CIS border guard troops in Almaty this evening.

The Azerbaijan delegation said the draft treaty did not conform with the national interests of the country. Baku insists on preserving both internal and external borders in the CIS. Hasanov said Armenia had “occupied” more than 130 kilometers of the Azerbaijani border with Iran and Armenia and “seized” 20 percent of Azerbaijani territory. Baku proposed that the draft treaty be amended and discussed at the next CIS summit.

The Ukrainian delegations also stated a special position on the draft treaty. Kiev said national border guard troops must defend the Ukrainian state borders.

However, Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev, chairing the meeting, said that the document had been recommended for consideration by the CIS summit in Almaty and could be discussed in detail at the next meeting of the CIS leaders if the appropriate instructions were given.

Kozyrev said all CIS members had backed the initiative of Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev on signing a memorandum on peace and stability in the CIS in Almaty. The memorandum will confirm inviolability of borders and will be aimed at preventing any actions undermining inviolability of borders.

The signatories of the memorandum will agree to refrain from military, political, economic, and other forms of pressure as well as from participating in unions and blocs aimed against any of them, and to prevent on their territory actions of organizations and individuals aimed at undermining territorial integrity and inviolability of borders of the signatories.

9.38 CIS Plans Four Regional Collective Security Zones

Moscow: CIS military integration will start with the formation of a chiefs of staff committee and four regional collective security zones in the Commonwealth, said Lt.- Gen. Leonid Ivashov, the secretary of the CIS Defense Ministers Council.

He told an Interfax reporter Tuesday [14 February] that in all, four military regions were planned to be set up on CIS territory. Western, Eastern, Central Asian, and Caucasus zones will unite nine CIS member states, along with cooperation on an irregular basis by Ukraine, Moldova, and Turkmenistan.

According to Ivashov, the Western zone is reserved for Belarus “as the key element,” and for the Kaliningrad and Smolensk regions of Russia. “Ukraine and Moldova will be in touch with them, if needed,” Ivashov explained. The Caucasus zone will include Azerbaijan, Armenia, Georgia, and the North Caucasus republics within the Russian Federation. The Central Asian zone is reserved for Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan. The three republics will cooperate “with Turkmenistan on some elements.” Kazakhstan, Russia, and part of Kyrgyzstan will belong to the Eastern zone.

Ivashov stressed that no special groupings would be set up within these zones, nor would army units be transferred there. “Everything will be done depending on what is available in these zones,” he said. It is assumed that if one of the states belonging to a zone is attacked, the rest will help it to repulse the aggression. A planning body will determine what force and means are necessary to curb the attack.

“The coalition defense forces will train jointly and will have common combat-readiness standards for troops and headquarters,” Ivashov reported, adding that joint exercises are planned to be carried out as well. He announced that these proposals would be submitted to CIS heads of state at the end of 1995.

9.39 NATO, Bishkek to Make Cooperation More Active

Interfax, 16 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

NATO is interested in developing and activating cooperation with Kyrgyzstan within the framework of the Partnership for Peace program. This statement was voiced at a press conference in the republic’s Foreign Ministry Thursday [ 16 February] that was devoted to the arrival of a NATO delegation to this country headed by Colonel Dan Kwist.

It was declared that the Foreign Ministry and Defense Ministry have prepared a document on the republic’s participation in Partnership for Peace program that will be considered at NATO headquarters in Brussels; an individual program of actions will be developed on the basis of this document.

Participants in the press conferences underlined NATO’s interest in rendering assistance in projects on environmental protection, research programs, military production conversion, and technical assistance to fight natural disasters.

Dan Kwist expressed interest in Kyrgyzstan’s active involvement in programs, seminars, and conferences on regional economic and environmental security.

A representative of Kyrgyzstan’s Foreign Ministry expressed interest in Kyrgyz servicemen’s participation in exercises of the U.S. Armed Forces as supervisors.

9.40 Prudnikov Views Unified Air Defense System for CIS

Sergey Ostanin ITAR-TASS, 17 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Commonwealth defense departments have started to implement an agreement on an allied air defense system. The agreement was signed by Commonwealth leaders on 10 February in Almaty, commander-in-chief of the Russian air defense troops and commander-in-chief of the Commonwealth allied air defense system Col.-Gen. Viktor Prudnikov told a news conference here today.

In his words, the departments are elaborating basic legal documents on military-technical cooperation in air defense.

After disintegration of the former Soviet Union, air defense means and forces were divided by the former Soviet republics and, as a result, became less efficient. "Many systems are losing combat readiness and the personnel is losing skills," said the general.

Commonwealth leaders with the exception of Moldova and Azerbaijan have decided to [pool] efforts in protection of the Commonwealth air space and assign means and forces from each state to the allied air defense system. The latter is expected to have a coordinating committee to include air defense commanders of each member state, their deputies, and other high-ranking officials.

The military-technical cooperation provides for the delivery of material, repairs of armaments, and training of the personnel, said Prudnikov. Cooperation details have not been specified. This will be done later during meetings with air defense commanders.

In the opinion of the commander-in-chief, “the creation of the allied air defense system will help settle many problems associated with the stabilization of national air defense forces and with consolidation of defensibility and sovereignty of states.”

9.41 Further on Prudnikov Comments

Interfax, 17 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The joint air defense force of the Commonwealth of Independent States will concentrate on air surveillance and the exchange of information, the chairman of the force's coordinating committee and the commander-in-chief of the Russian air defense forces General Viktor Prudnikov told newsmen Friday at his headquarters in Balashikha near Moscow.

Neither aircraft rocket launchers nor fighter jets belong with the joint air defense force, Prudnikov said, adding that under "a plan for interaction" it is up to the Commonwealth republics to decide what units and hardware are to be detailed for service on the joint force.

In Prudnikov's view, the Commonwealth republics are not likely to be able to build their own armed forces without help from Russia. Today, Russian air defense men serve in Latvia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan, he said.

According to Prudnikov, air defense installations are made and undergo repairs mostly in Russia. Other Commonwealth republics will be supplied with air defense hardware in keeping with bilateral agreements.

Addressing the results of the Commonwealth's Almaty summit, Prudnikov said that all the republics, except Azerbaijan and Moldova, signed an agreement on the creation of a joint air defense force. Problems of air defense will be settled in the context of bilateral relations between Russia and Azerbaijan, and Russia and Moldova, he told newsmen at Balashikha.

Russia's Foreign Ministry had been instructed to discuss prospects for the joint protection of air space with the Baltic republics.

In response to journalists' questions, Prudnikov said that "on the whole" the Russian air defense force showed "a good fighting potential and was capable of meeting its objectives." Ninety percent of its active components-rocket launchers and fighter planes-were of the newest makes, he said.

9.42 Collective Security Council Chief Interviewed

Interview Krasnaya Zvezda, 15 June 1995 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

[Interview with Gennadiy Shabannikov, general secretary of the Collective Security Council, by an unnamed questioner.]

[Shabannikov]: The Collective Security Council is the supreme political organ of the states adhering to the Collective Security Treaty signed 15 May 1992 in Tashkent. The tasks which the Collective Security Council must resolve include examining questions connected with ensuring the fulfillment of this treaty: holding consultations to coordinate positions of the member states if a threat arises to commonwealth security, territorial integrity, or sovereignty of one or several signatory states or if there is a threat to international peace and security; elaborating measures to improve defense management in signatory states; examining questions of aid, including military aid, to a signatory state subject to aggression from any state or group of states; taking steps deemed necessary to maintain or restore peace and security (reports of such measures are immediately sent to the UN Security Council); coordinating the signatory states' activity on the main avenues of mobilization training of the armed forces and economic structures; the elaboration of recommendations for the main avenues of military-technical policy, and the provision of weapons and military equipment for the armed forces of the signatory states.

[Shabannikov]: The initial members of the Collective Security Treaty were the six states which signed the treaty: the Republic of Armenia, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, the Republic of Tajikistan, and the Republic of Uzbekistan. In 1993 the Republic of Azerbaijan, the Republic of Georgia, and the Republic of Belarus acceded to the treaty. In accordance with the Collective Security Treaty the Collective Security Council has been joined by the Collective Security Treaty signatory states and the commander-in-chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces. Since the formation of the Joint Armed Forces Main Command in 1993 and the staff for the coordination of the CIS states' military cooperation, the Collective Security Council composition has been revised. In accordance with the decision of the heads of the Collective Security Treaty signatory states adopted 24 December 1993, the Collective Security Council includes the heads of state, foreign ministers, and defense ministers of the signatory states and the general secretary of the Collective Security Council. The Collective Security Council's supreme consultative organs are the council of foreign ministers for questions of coordinating domestic and foreign policy and the council of defense ministers for questions of coordinating military policy and military organizational development which include, respectively, the foreign ministers and defense ministers of the Collective Security Treaty states.

[Shabannikov]: The Collective Security Council general secretary is appointed from the ranks of civilians. He is assigned the holding of political consultations, the coordination of the Collective Security Treaty states' positions on military questions, the preparation of council sessions, and the generalization of questions for discussion and decision; on instructions from the Collective Security Council he represents it in relations with heads of state, international organizations, and the mass media, and represents the signatory states' common interests on questions of collaboration with NATO and other military-political groupings, blocs, and alliances, and he leads the work of the Collective Security Council secretariat.

9.43 Kozyrev Addresses Ambassadors, Federation Council on CIS

6 July 1995 BBC © Copyright 1995 The British Broadcasting Corporation, (Excerpts)

Editor's Note: In mid-1995 the Russian Foreign Ministry stepped up its advocacy on behalf of CIS military and economic integration. A concerted effort was made by Foreign Minister Kozyrev and his staff to get the United Nations member states to condone Russia's legitimate role as "peacemaker" and "peacekeeper" within the CIS, which Russia claims is "one security space." The United Nations has never sanctified Russia's role as peacekeeper in the region, however, preferring to express its approval of “combined CIS peacekeeping troops,” and the efforts of other international bodies, such as the OSCE, to monitor “hot spots” in the region. Most of the non-Russian leaders view “peacekeeping” as a mask for Russian intervention in the internal affairs of the CIS states.

A meeting of Russia’s ambassadors to the CIS is being held at the Foreign Ministry. Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev told the ambassadors that relations with the CIS are central to Russia’s foreign policy. He also stressed that message in an address to the Federation Council. Kozyrev passed on to the ambassadors the greetings of President Yeltsin, who also emphasized the central importance of relations with the CIS. Kozyrev went on to discuss the continuing economic reintegration of the CIS states and their crucial role in peacemaking. He noted that the organization had played a very important role in maintaining stability in the former Soviet Union since its collapse. The meeting is continuing....

[Presenter]: A two-day meeting of Russian ambassadors to the CIS countries opened in Moscow today. President Boris Yeltsin greeted its participants. Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin said he intended to meet the ambassadors. Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev opened the meeting....

[Kozyrev, voice]: Not only has it been found possible to generally ensure a civilized divorce, but in what is in historical terms a very short time, for we are only speaking of two to three years, it has been found possible to ensure that integration trends and trends toward cooperation in a number of areas have reappeared.

[Presenter]: On the same day, Andrey Kozyrev addressed the Federation Council, and our parliamentary correspondent Vyacheslav Osipov has the details.

[Osipov]: He stated straightaway that relations with the CIS were a priority for the Russian Foreign Ministry. The main problem besetting relations within the Commonwealth, noted Kozyrev, was the implementation of accords that were reached.

Russia will give sympathetic consideration to specific credits, but it will, at the same time, take account of strategic interests where relations with the CIS are concerned.

The level of Russia's relations with Belorussia [Belarus] was termed as being "unprecedented"-but the key issue does remain: political accords should not be suspended in midair. Kozyrev stressed that the problem of ensuring security in the former union republics needed to be met with understanding and support on the part of the parliament and international organizations. Kozyrev said the United Nations had adopted a resolution to support Russia's peace efforts in Tajikistan. He also said it was impossible to resolve the problem of ethnic minorities by diplomatic methods alone. Kozyrev welcomed the establishment of a commission dealing with expatriate affairs, headed by Sergey Shakhray....

[Moscow, 6 July, RIA Novosti correspondent Viktor Bezbrezhnyy] For Russian diplomacy there is no task more important than the strengthening of the Commonwealth of Independent States. Such is the injunction of Russian President Boris Yeltsin, conveyed on his behalf by Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev to the Russian ambassadors in the CIS countries.

The minister spoke at the working meeting which has opened at the Foreign Ministry today. He stressed that “the CIS is a zone of important vital interests for Russia.” But Russia too, according to Kozyrev, “is an object of vital interests for the CIS states.” Characterizing the situation in the Commonwealth, the head of Russian diplomacy noted that in the recent period “there have occurred serious changes in the desired direction of the CIS—a period has set in of digesting the experience of economic ties and political interests which weakened after the breakup of the USSR.” Kozyrev believes that in carrying out integratory processes the Commonwealth has found “a successful, flexible scheme of multivariants and multi-rate development.” Calling the promotion of economic cooperation the “basis of integration,” the minister identified as a major aim “the creation of a common market.” Among other main objectives of Russian diplomacy in the CIS, Kozyrev names the turning of the Commonwealth into an influential regional organization, the ensuring of security along the perimeter of the boundaries of the CIS countries with countries which are not members of the Commonwealth, and the fight against terrorism and contraband....

[Moscow, 6 July] Russia is ready to integrate in the CIS as far and in such forms as its partners are ready, Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev said in Moscow on Thursday, opening a conference of Russian ambassadors to the CIS states. According to Kozyrev, integration within the CIS was still based on the principle of multispeed and multioption development. “It was prompted by life itself,” he added.... According to Kozyrev, “cooperation ensured not only a civilized divorce, but a successful start of pulling together most countries of the former Soviet Union.” Kozyrev said the Commonwealth’s functional basis had been and will be economic cooperation. “An important step in this field has been made as Russia, Belarus, and Kazakhstan form a customs union and a mechanism of trilateral interaction, creating landmarks to move toward and toward which other CIS states may move,” he added. Many CIS states already show interest in such forms of cooperation, Kozyrev remarked. He stressed the customs union was open for all CIS states sharing its goals and principles. In this context, economic integration will require “ever increasing transparency of internal borders,” Kozyrev said. At the same time, unfounded aid and unrecoverable loans should be abandoned, he said. “Both in politics and economics there must be equality of rights and duties for all partners,” he emphasized. Nevertheless, Kozyrev was convinced that “everything should not be brought to pure mathematics.” “Of course, we should account for all loans and aid, but we should also remember our plans in a longer term. We should see the forest of our long-term interests behind the trees of concrete figures. All this, maybe later, will justify itself,” he said.

Kozyrev Discusses CIS role in Peacemaking

[Excerpts from report by ITAR-TASS news agency]

[Moscow, 6 July, ITAR-TASS correspondent Dmitriy Gorokhov and Yuriy Kozlov] The CIS is an important instrument of maintaining stability in the post-Soviet expanse and thus contributes consistently to the consolidation of regional and global security. Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev said this at a meeting of Russian ambassadors to CIS countries that opened here on Thursday. Kozyrev said it is necessary to emphasize this role of the Commonwealth and to ensure that it is mentioned in all documents of international forums.

The peacemaking activity of the CIS spreads, to Nagorno- Karabakh, to the zone of the Georgian- Abkhaz conflict, and to Tajikistan, Kozyrev said. He said the world community, including the United Nations and OSCE, should share the considerable load borne by the Commonwealth in settling regional conflicts.

There must be “no room for double standards” in the area of peacemaking as far as sovereign states and the United Nation’s members are concerned, the minister said. As a result of persistent efforts of Russian diplomats, the Security Council registered a few days ago the collective appeal of CIS countries for launching a full-scale operation of the United Nations in Tajikistan, Kozyrev said.

The interaction of independent states in peacemaking and in the military-political area should be ensured by the collective security system of the CIS, the minister said. “It is not meant to form a closed bloc opposed to the rest of the world, but a mechanism that will be playing the stabilizing role” in the huge expanse of the former USSR, Kozyrev said....

It is the second time that a conference of Russian ambassadors to CIS countries has been held by the Russian Foreign Ministry with the participation of representatives of other ministries and agencies concerned. The debates have a working character and are held behind closed doors. Such meetings are planned to be held on a regular basis in the future.

9.44 “Sixteen Plus One” Talks Open in Brussels

Aleksandr Mineev ITAR-TASS, 14 September 1995
[FBIS Translation]

The North Atlantic Alliance and Ukraine today began their “Sixteen plus One” political dialogue. Earlier out of twenty-six countries participating in the NATO program “Partnership for Peace” only Russia had been granted this privilege.

Ukrainian Foreign Minister Gennadiy Udovenko arrived in Brussels for the meeting with NATO Secretary-General Willy Claes and then took part in a meeting behind closed doors of the NATO Council together with the ambassadors of sixteen member-countries of the alliance.

Before the opening of the NATO Council meeting, a ceremony was held to adopt Ukraine's individual program within the framework of the "Partnership for Peace" program.

The program provides for joint army exercises, personnel training, and exchange of peacekeeping experience, as well as assistance in the development of democratic control over the Ukrainian armed forces.

Ukraine has been one of the most active participants in the NATO program since the beginning of its implementation. It has participated in most military exercises conducted within the framework of the program and even permitted the exercises to be held on its territory, whereas Russia has taken part only once, in a naval exercise.

During the "Sixteen plus One" meeting, the members of the NATO council and the Ukrainian foreign minister conducted "an in-depth analysis of problems relating to the strengthening of European security," and stressed their desire to "develop relations both within the framework of the "Partnership for Peace" program and beyond, the parties said in a joint communique.

The NATO secretary-general said in his speech that the alliance and Ukraine would exchange visits of their high officials and hold consultations, including under the “Sixteen plus One” format on the most important issues of mutual interest, which include European security architecture, prevention and settlement of crises, nuclear security, non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and disarmament.

Claes stressed that NATO attached “key importance to its relations with sovereign, independent, and democratic Ukraine and its place in a new European architecture of security and cooperation.”

Ukraine made a special note of NATO’s contribution to the creation of an atmosphere of confidence in the Euro-Atlantic region with its “respect for territorial integrity, existing borders, and the rights of national minorities.”

Udovenko recalled that Ukraine was the first CIS country to sign the “Partnership for Peace” program. “We are open to cooperation with NATO and Europe in building a single and indivisible system of European security,” he said. He then stressed that the development of good relations between NATO and Russia was in Ukraine’s interests.

Kiev expressed the desire to receive a delegation from NATO to inform Ukraine about the results of NATO’s “internal discussion” of procedures and terms of its eastward enlargement.

Asked about Kiev’s view on the NATO enlargement plan, Udovenko said Ukraine itself had no plans for joining the alliance in the foreseeable future but it had no right to veto its neighbors’ ascension to the North Atlantic alliance. “It is important for Ukrainian national interests to be taken into consideration in the process of expanding NATO. We would not like to become a buffer state between an enlarged NATO and signatories to the Tashkent security treaty,” he said.

9.45 Agreement with NATO to Set Up Contacts

From the “Diplomatic Panorama” feature by Aleksandr Korzun, Igor Porshnev, Evgeniy Terekhov, and others
Interfax-Ukraine, 14 September 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Ukraine and NATO have agreed to step up their contacts, NATO headquarters reports.

An agreement to this effect was reached between Ukrainian Foreign Minister Gennadiy Udovenko and NATO Secretary-General Willy Claes in Brussels.

Udovenko attended the North Atlantic Council meeting on 14 September and presented a draft of the Ukraine-NATO cooperation program.

The NATO headquarters says in an official report that the cooperation will include exchange of top-level visits, in particular a visit to Kiev by the NATO secretary-general.

Consultations will be held continuously between Ukraine and NATO at various levels on the European security prevention of conflicts, peace missions, nuclear safety, non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, disarmament, and arms control.

Ukraine will step up its activities in the framework of the Partnership for Peace program and the North Atlantic Council. Ukraine invited a team of NATO experts to visit Kiev to present their findings on the issue of NATO enlargement.

In the discussion held in Brussels on 14 September, NATO expressed support for Ukraine's sovereignty, independence, territorial unity, economic reforms, and democratic changes. It was said that an independent, democratic, and stable Ukraine is a key factor of stability in Europe.

The North Atlantic Council also took note of the significant contribution made by Ukraine to the UN peacekeeping operations, notably in the former Yugoslavia. NATO also welcomes Ukraine's efforts to resolve peacefully all the issues in its relations with its neighbors, the NATO headquarters report says.

To reach the political aims of the NATO Partnership for Peace program, Ukraine is working for openness in defense planning and budget-making, securing democratic control over the armed forces, and expanding military relations with NATO with the purpose of joint planning and training. Thus reads part of the presentation document of Ukraine's cooperation program with NATO submitted to a special session of the North Atlantic Council in Brussels Thursday.

The Ukrainian delegation is led by Foreign Minister Gennadiy Udovenko.

In keeping with the document, the Partnership for Peace program involves on the Ukrainian side an operational group of generals and officers, two peacekeeping battalions, and an airborne landing battalion, a squadron of Ilyushin-76 transport planes and a squadron of Mi-8 helicopters with crews, two ships, and a motorized civil defense brigade. Ukraine will also offer two test sites for exercises.

Ukraine signed a framework cooperation agreement on 8 February 1994 and handed the presentation document to the NATO leadership on 25 May. A senior official told Interfax- Ukraine that Kiev finds the Partnership for Peace program a timely and promising step that should not draw new dividing lines in Europe. It will allow all interested sides to take practical political and military steps.

“Ukraine also believes that the Partnership for Peace program is a key mechanism for maintaining peace in Europe,” the diplomat added.

9.46 Marchuk: Partnership Does Not Mean Joining NATO

From the “Presidential Bulletin” feature compiled by

Nikolay Zherebtsov and Andrey Petrovskiy; and edited by Vladimir Shishlin
Interfax, 14 September 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Ukraine's individual partnership program with NATO does not mean that the country is joining the military alliance, Prime Minister Yevhen Marchuk declared during a visit to an international health protection exhibition in Kiev Wednesday (13 September).

He confirmed Ukraine's status as a non-aligned country, saying that the main thing is for Ukraine not to become a buffer between NATO and what is not NATO.

(Interfax Note: The North Atlantic Council held a special session in Brussels Thursday at the ambassadorial level attended by a Ukrainian delegation led by Foreign Minister Gennadiy Udovenko. The individual partnership program was presented before the session. On 8 February 1994 Ukraine signed a framework Partnership for Peace agreement with NATO and on 25 May 1994 submitted the presentation document to the NATO leadership. Immediately thereafter Kiev started working on the individual partnership program.)

On the situation in the former Yugoslavia, NATO air attacks on Bosnian Serbs in particular, Marchuk said that, whatever the reasons, bombing is not the best policy.

He also said that Ukraine must carefully analyze everything happening in the former Yugoslavia, NATO, and Russia before changing its attitude toward NATO.

The prime minister also said that his meeting with his Russian counterpart regarding the division of the Black Sea Fleet will not take place before the end of the month.

According to Marchuk, the Ukrainian side suggested that the experts of the two countries meet to update the draft agreements on the principles of mutual settlements and the city of Sevastopol. "One should not waste time on the discussion of questions undecided even by experts," the prime minister believes.

9.47 Aliev on Readiness to Develop NATO Relations

Interfax, 20 September 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Azeri President Geydar Aliev confirmed Baku's readiness to develop relations with NATO within the framework of the Partnership for Peace program Tuesday, at a meeting with a NATO delegation headed by a representative of the NATO allied command, Italian Brig.-Gen. Angelo Arenò.

The president told the delegation that the Azeri presentation document necessary to join the program will be submitted in the near future.

According to Aliev, the Partnership for Peace program aims at "consolidation of global peace."

The president hopes that NATO will render political support to Azerbaijan in finding a solution to its territorial integrity problems. "The ongoing Armenian aggression against Azerbaijan must be denounced," he said.

Brig.-Gen. Arenò said that NATO is ready to expand cooperation with Azerbaijan.

According to him, an official NATO representative in Azerbaijan will soon be nominated to coordinate cooperation between NATO and Azeri Ministry of Defense.

9.48 Strategic Policy Toward CIS Published

Editor's Note: (January 1996) The following edict appeared in the Russian media suddenly, with no preparatory debate, announcements of pending doctrinal materials, or allusions as to who the author or group of authors might be. The edict marks a fundamental departure in Russia's policy toward the CIS, in that it makes close integration among CIS members a top-priority "strategic goal." The edict is strongly worded, and has understandably raised the suspicions of other CIS leaders about Russia's intentions. This suspicion may be well-founded, because were a Russian leader to appear who is dedicated to the reinstatement of the Soviet Union, this "strategic plan" would be used as the policy guideline. At the 19 January 1996, CIS summit, President Yeltsin continuously referred to Russia's "strategic plan" for the CIS, indicating that the September edict is being used as the "blueprint" or "working model" for guiding Russian CIS policy. Likewise, the 10 January 1996 appointment of Evgeniy Primakov as foreign minister, and Primakov's subsequent allusions to the primacy of CIS reintegration among his foreign policy goals, points to the possibility that he and the staff of Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service (SUR), where Primakov was appointed director in 1991, may have authored the edict. It is of interest to note that the edict's provision for forming a "government commission" for implementing the strategic policy toward the CIS had not been carried out as of 15 March 1996. The Commission would have pushed the Russian Foreign Minister and the Ministry of Foreign Economic Affairs into the background on CIS affairs. Instead, Evgeniy Primakov, as the new foreign minister, appears to have claimed for himself the key decisionmaking role on CIS matters, eclipsing even the so-called Ministry for Cooperation with the CIS member states, headed by Valeriy Serov.

On Approval of the Strategic Policy of the Russian Federation Toward CIS Member States

With a view to deepening the integration processes within the CIS and enhancing the coordination of activity by Russian Federation organs of executive power along this avenue, I decree:

1. The appended Strategic Policy of the Russian Federation Toward CIS Member States is approved.

Organs of executive power at all levels are ordered to be rigorously guided by it in all their practical work.

2. A government commission for CIS questions is to be created for the implementation of the Strategic Policy of the Russian Federation Toward CIS Member States.

The Russian Federation Government is to approve a statute on the aforementioned government commission and its composition.

3. This edict comes into force on the day it is signed.

[Signed] Russian Federation President B. Yeltsin

[Dated] Moscow, The Kremlin, 14 September 1995

Strategic Policy of the Russian Federation Toward CIS Member States

The development of the CIS is in line with the Russian Federation's vital interests, and relations with CIS states are an important factor for Russia's inclusion in the world's political and economic structures.

I. Objectives and Main Tasks of the Strategic Policy of the Russian Federation Toward CIS Member States

1. The priority given to relations with CIS member states in the Russian Federation's policy is primarily determined by the fact that: our main vital interests in the spheres of the economy, defense, security, and protection of the rights of Russians are concentrated on the territory of the CIS, and the safeguarding of these interests constitutes the basis of the country's national security; effective cooperation with CIS states is a factor that counteracts centrifugal tendencies in Russia itself.

2. The main objective of Russia's policy toward the CIS is to create an economically and politically integrated association of states capable of claiming its proper place in the world community.

3. When developing relations with our CIS partners, it is important to be firmly guided by the principle of not inflicting any damage to Russia's interests. The partners' diverse interests must be coordinated on the basis of balanced mutual compromises.

4. The main tasks of Russia's policy toward the CIS states are: to ensure reliable stability in all its aspects: political, military, economic, humanitarian, and legal; to promote the establishment of CIS states as politically and economically stable states pursuing a friendly policy toward Russia; to consolidate Russia as the leading force in the formation of a new system of interstate political and economic relations on the territory of the post-Union space; to boost integration processes within the CIS.

II. Economic Cooperation

5. Mutually advantageous economic cooperation should be seen as the fundamental prerequisite for solving the entire package of questions concerning mutual relations with CIS member states. This task must be accomplished by means of the best possible combination of multilateral relations within the Economic Union framework and of bilateral forms of relations.

6. The development of trade links must proceed from the premise that they constitute an important instrument for stabilization of the economic situation and extrication from the crisis both in Russia and in the CIS member states.

7. One of the most important ways to organizationally strengthen the CIS is the gradual expansion of the Customs Union, which is made up of states linked with Russia by a deeply integrated economy and a strategic political partnership.

Matters must be driven toward the gradual accession to the Customs Union of the remaining members of the Economic Union as conditions for this ripening.

It is necessary to aim for a convergence of national economic systems by elaborating, jointly with our partners, ways to improve standard model acts within the framework of the CIS member-states'

Interparliamentary Assembly.

The model for variable-speed integration proposed by Russia within the CIS framework is not mandatory. But our partners' attitude toward this model will be an important factor determining the scale of economic, political, and military support by Russia.

With a view to consolidating and expanding the Customs Union, bilateral agreements should not give the parties to them equal (let alone greater) advantages than those enjoyed by members of the aforementioned Union.

8. The normalization of payments and settlements relations must be perceived as the most important condition for developing and improving cooperation. In this context, it is necessary to accelerate the practical work on forming a Payments Union, with a view to introducing common rules for the organization of currency markets in CIS member states, adopting a currency exchange rate determined in line with supply and demand, attaining mutual convertibility of national currencies, and using the Russian ruble as the reserve currency for the foreseeable future.

9. The formation of a viable integrated association presupposes effective cooperation in the development of production, science, and technology.

The most important avenues for this work must be: to identify common scientific and technological priorities and pursue a joint strategy for the purpose of forming a unified scientific and technological space; to coordinate the processes of restructuring national economies through the elaboration of common interstate investment programs; to ensure conditions for joint work by scientists and production specialists; to pool efforts for solving ecological and environmental protection problems.

10. It is necessary to consistently resolve the task concerning the convergence of legal and economic conditions so as to create joint property on the basis of free entrepreneurial activity and create, in the long term, a common capital market. Comprehensive state support must be given to the creation of financial-industrial groups consisting of enterprises and banks from CIS member states, and to the formation of transitional production, scientific, technical, and other structures.

11. The necessary conditions must be provided for the functioning of the Interstate Economic Committee of the CIS member-states' Economic Union as an international organization pursuing the goal of boosting the effectiveness of cooperation within the CIS framework.

III. National Security

12. Matters must be driven toward the creation of a collective security system on the basis of the Collective Security Treaty [CST] of 15 May 1992 and of bilateral treaties between CIS states. States parties to the CST should be encouraged to unite within a defensive alliance on the basis of shared interests and military-political objectives.

Consistent work must be done to fine-tune the mechanism for implementing agreements already achieved within the CIS member framework in the defense sphere and to preserve military infrastructure facilities on the basis of mutual agreement. There should be a switch to the principle of military basing in the event of reciprocal interest, with clearcut regulations governing the legal position of Russian military bases and the status of servicemen and members of their families living in these states.

These questions should be resolved in line with the military-political situation prevailing in each CIS member state.

It is necessary to ensure that CIS member states honor their pledges to refrain from participating in alliances and blocs aimed against any of these states.

13. Cooperation between CIS member states must be deepened in the sphere of state border security.

It is necessary to proceed from the premise that the reliable protection of borders along the CIS perimeter, which is their common cause and should be effected through joint efforts, corresponds with Russia's national interests and the common interests of CIS member states.

Work must be completed on settling the package of border questions with CIS member states and creating a treaty-legal basis for the stationing of Russian Federation Border Guard Troops in these countries. There should be a study of the possibility of creating in the future regional command units of CIS member states border guard troops, and efforts should be made to create a uniform system for the protection of their borders.

At the same time, and with due consideration for the foreign political situation, the Russian Federation's state border with all adjacent states should be defined in line with the Russian Federation Law "On the Russian Federation

State Border,” while bearing in mind that the retention of the principle of open borders within the CIS corresponds with Russia’s long-term plans. Practical work should be guided by differentiated approaches toward individual sectors of the Russian Federation state border, depending on bilateral relations with different states.

14. It is necessary to proceed from the premise that peacekeeping activity aimed at settling and preventing conflicts in CIS member states, primarily by peaceful political and diplomatic means, is an important component of efforts to ensure stability on CIS territory.

Matters must be directed toward ensuring that peacekeeping activity becomes the fruit of collective efforts by CIS member states via their more active participation at all stages of activity to set up a mechanism for effective solution of peacekeeping questions within the CIS framework. All work along this avenue must be done in collaboration with the United Nations and the OSCE, and effective participation by these international organizations must be sought in settling conflicts on CIS territory.

In this process, and when collaborating with third countries and international organizations, it is necessary to seek their agreement that this region is primarily a zone of Russian interests.

Cooperation along the line of security services ought to be developed, primarily with a view to preventing the use of CIS territory by special services from third countries for purposes hostile to Russia. Cooperation with CIS countries' security services should be organized in strict compliance with Russian Federation legislation and respect for Russia's international commitments in the area of human rights.

IV. Humanitarian Cooperation and Human Rights

15. It is necessary to step up Russia's cultural exchanges with states in the "near abroad" and cooperation with them in the areas of science, education, and sports. Russian television and radio broadcasting in the "near abroad" should be guaranteed, the dissemination of Russian press in this region should be supported, and Russia should train national cadres for CIS member states.

Special attention should be placed on restoring Russia's position as the main educational center on the territory of the post-Soviet space, bearing in mind the need to educate the younger generation in CIS member states in a spirit of friendly relations with Russia.

Reciprocal exchange of information and cooperation should be organized between CIS member states' national commissions for UNESCO.

16. It is necessary to aim for real guarantees of equal rights and freedom for all citizens of CIS states regardless of nationality and other differences. The expression, preservation, and development of the ethnic, cultural, linguistic, and religious uniqueness of all peoples inhabiting these countries should be encouraged.

There should be active promotion of Russians' adaptation to the new political and socio-economic realities in the countries, former USSR republics, of which they are permanent residents.

In the event of violation of Russians' rights in CIS countries, the solution of questions concerning financial, economic, military-political, and other cooperation between Russia and the specific state could be used as a possible means of influence depending on that state's real stance in terms of observing the rights and interests of Russians on its territory.

Russians should be helped in exercising production, economic, entrepreneurial, commercial, cultural-enlightenment, and educational activity.

Work should be completed on elaborating within the CIS framework a treaty basis regulating mutual relations between CIS member states in the terms of observing the fundamental rights and freedoms of man and of ethnic minorities, bearing in mind the need to fundamentally ease the acuteness of nationalities problem.

V. Coordination of Activity for Solving International Problems and Collaboration with the World Community

17. Our CIS partners should be persistently and consistently guided toward the elaboration of joint positions on international problems and the coordination of activity in the world arena. Joint efforts should be applied to achieve the further affirmation of the CIS as an influential regional organization and to establish broad and mutually advantageous cooperation with authoritative international forums and organizations at the CIS level.

18. It is necessary to proceed from the premise that the growing efficiency of mutual cooperation must become the most important factor capable of preventing centrifugal tendencies within the CIS.

Efforts should be concentrated mainly on coordinating the CIS member states' positions in the United Nations and the OSCE and their approaches toward relations with NATO, the EU, and the Council of Europe.

VI. Basic Tasks of Bilateral Relations

19. Bilateral relations with CIS member states should be formed with due consideration for the specific features of each of these states and their readiness for different forms of deeper integration. In the elaboration of Russian policy toward CIS member states on a bilateral basis, it is necessary to proceed from the premise that the following are in line with Russia's interests: assistance in stabilizing the political, economic, and social situation in these countries; their far-reaching and stage-by-stage gradual voluntary involvement in integration processes and in the collective solution of questions concerning military security, border protection, and peacekeeping activity; prevention of confrontational aspects in Russia's relations with CIS member states.

20. The following must become subjects of permanent concern in bilateral economic relations: maintenance of balance-of-payments equilibrium on the basis of long-term agreements; preservation of Russia's leading position in CIS markets, especially with respect to markets for finished products; performance of obligations in production-sharing relations, prevention of debts resulting from commodity deliveries, and normalization of payments and credit relations; favorable conditions for the transit of Russian goods across the territory of these states.

VII. On the Domestic Russian Mechanism for Implementing This Strategic Policy Toward the CIS

21. The Russian Federation government fine-tunes the domestic Russian mechanism for the implementation of strategy toward the CIS, specifies the powers of ministries and departments performing certain functions concerning mutual relations with CIS member states, and systematically consolidates the legal basis of cooperation with these states.

22. The Russian Federation Ministry of Foreign Affairs, exercising state management over the Russian Federation's relations with foreign states, ensures the implementation of common strategy and the coordination of foreign policy with CIS member states.

23. The Russian Federation Ministry for Cooperation with Member States of the CIS is assigned responsibility for implementing the Russian Federation's economic and social policy in the area of mutual relations with CIS member states.

The ministry in question organizes the work and coordinates the activity of CIS executive organs and Russian Federation executive organs on the development of cooperation with CIS member states in the economic and social spheres; organizes the negotiating process and drafting of bilateral and multilateral treaties and agreements with CIS member states on economic and social questions; assists the foreign economic activity of Russian Federation economic components with CIS member states; monitors the performance of agreements reached with CIS member states and the honoring of commitments under Russian Federation treaties and agreements with these states.

24. A government commission for CIS questions is to be set up as an organ ensuring the implementation of Russian Federation state policy as regards cooperation with these states.

Advancement along all these avenues will create a real opportunity in the long term to build a regional international organization capable of ensuring political and socio-economic stability on the territory of the CIS.

9.49 Conceptual Provisions of a Strategy for Countering the Main External Threats to Russian Federation National Security

Anton Viktorovich Surikov, General Director INOBIS
(Institute of Defense Studies), Moscow October 1995

There are a significant number of external threats to Russian Federation (RF) national security at present that are difficult to classify. At the same time, several of the main threats of this kind are rather obvious.

An analysis shows that above all the United States is the main external force potentially capable of creating a threat to RF military security and to Russia's economic and political interests abroad and of exerting substantial influence on the economic and political situation within Russia and on Russia's mutual relations with the former Soviet republics. As a rule, the United States implements its policy toward Russia in coordination with other Western countries, Israel, and Japan.

"Assistance to processes of democratization and of transition to a market economy with the help of the West and in close, equal partnership and cooperation with it" is declared to be the West's official policy with respect to Russia. At the same time, recent experience demonstrates that the West places its own interpretation on all the above terms. In particular, the term "equal partnership" is understood to mean unconditional movement in the direction of U.S. and Western policy in the international arena. And the West's "help" for Russia is extremely limited in nature and determined by the fulfillment of a whole series of preconditions. On the whole, it appears the principal mission of U.S. and Western policy with respect to Russia is to keep it from turning into an economically, politically, and militarily influential force and to transform post-Soviet space into an economic and political appendage and raw materials colony of the West. Because of this, it is the United States and its allies that are the sources of main external threats to Russia's national security, and they should be considered the principal potential enemies of the Russian Federation.

1. The Nature of the Main Threats to Russia's National Security Caused by External Factors

A. The line of the United States and its allies toward intervening in Russia's internal affairs to impose on it paths of development in a direction favorable to the West represents the greatest danger. The comprador model of building the economy suggested to Russia by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank consists of orienting Russia toward exporting raw materials and importing everything else, encouraging default on the debt to Russia by CIS countries, as well as encouraging outflows of capital from Russia to the West and, at the same time, stifling national industry, science, and agriculture. Attempts at destroying the high-tech potential of national industry and, above all, of our military-industrial complex by not admitting Russia to world markets for arms and for space, missile, aviation, and nuclear technologies and nuclear materials are most obvious at present.

Protectionist measures against Russian exports of fuel for nuclear power stations, opposition to the Russian-Iranian nuclear deal, and the hysteria over cryogenic engine deliveries from Russia to India are examples of such attempts.

On the whole, the economic model being realized threatens to degrade the country's economic potential and eliminate the unified domestic market, which can in turn become a basis for regional separatism and for raw materials regions and maritime regions to fall away from Moscow, thereby reducing the country to fourteenth- and fifteenth-century borders. It should be noted that, in following that line, the West finds support among part of the Russian elite and relies on Russian comprador business, which has become especially entrenched in speculative-finance banking structure and export-oriented raw materials sectors of the economy. The West is least interested in the growth of internal accumulations of any kind whatsoever in Russia, otherwise such accumulations could be used for modernizing the national processing industry and agriculture, for conversion and rescue of high technologies of the military-industrial complex, and for maintaining the armed forces' combat power and solving their social problems. A so-called strategy of black holes, through which material and financial resources are being pumped out of the country, is being implemented to prevent this. And although Dudaev's Chechnya has been the best-known "black hole," it is far from the only one. The comprador-oriented export policy being effected within the framework of the described "black hole strategy" in the oil and natural gas industry, non-ferrous and in part ferrous metallurgy, the timber industry and production of mineral fertilizers is leading to colossal plundering of the country's national wealth in favor of a narrow group of people—the so-called new Russians.

The outflow of capital from Russia, with the TEK [fuelenergy complex] accounting for the lion's share, is estimated to be from one billion to two billion dollars monthly. The bulk of these funds settle in foreign bank accounts of "new Russians" or are invested abroad in real estate, stocks, and bonds. But even the export receipts from that return to Russia often go for comprador imports and for importing expensive consumer goods into the country for the "new Russians." Or they go, via the budget, to commercial and above all "authorized" banks for "investment." Or in the final account they are directed toward realization of various expensive projects of dubious importance, above all in the construction area. It should be recalled here, for example, that the Mafia in Sicily traditionally makes its main money specifically on construction contracts by inflating by many times the estimate for work done.

It is also important to note that all major operations of pumping resources and funds out of the country are being carried out with the involvement of foreign partners. In terms of petroleum exports alone there are approximately twenty various joint ventures operating in Russia today. And according to up-to-date information from Russian special services, a considerable number of the foreign associates of such organizations are persons connected with intelligence agencies of Western countries. It follows from the Federal Security Service press release "On Federal Security Service Activity in 1994" that "around ten identified agents and around ninety specialists and advisers whose affiliation with foreign special agencies is undoubted have been exposed just within the system of a number of major RF economic departments. Over a hundred foreign firms and organizations, including those in banking, are being used as cover by special services." Special services of Western countries have full access today to all documentation of joint ventures and other partners of Russian exporters. They have original financial documents, they are knowledgeable about the movement of commodity resources and financial flows, they have information on bank account numbers of the "new Russians" and on their real estate and securities transactions abroad. And it should be understood that the way the outflow of resources and capital from Russia is taking place today has become criminalized to the highest degree and represents not only a violation of domestic laws but also the grossest violation of laws of the Western countries themselves. Consequently, foreign intelligence agencies have in their hands compromising criminal information on many Russian parties to foreign economic activity and on the politicians and state officials connected with them. As a result, these representatives of the Russian business and political elite are not completely independent in their actions and are extraordinarily vulnerable to the pressure of outside forces who possess compromising information. It follows from what has been said that they are by definition incapable of following a consistent policy conforming to Russia's national interests. The most striking example of that situation lately appears to be Russian government policy on the question of Caspian oil. Another notable example is the "peacemaking process" in Chechnya.

B. Turkey's political penetrations and U.S., U.K., and FRG economic and intelligence penetration into Azerbaijan is in full swing. This is the most suitable base of operations for subsequent Turkish and Western expansion in the direction of Central Asia, the Volga region, and the North Caucasus using the “Turkic” and “Islamic” factors. And Turkey is acting here as an instrument by which U.S. policy is being pursued.

The principal goal of such a policy is to establish Western control over energy resources and, above all, petroleum resources of the Caspian Sea. Caspian oil reserves are commensurate with the oil reserves of the North Sea and Alaska when their exploitation began, but oil resources of the latter two will be exhausted in the foreseeable future. Therefore to avoid the Persian Gulf region’s total monopoly of oil exports, the West is very interested in Caspian oil. It should be noted that the problems of Caspian Sea oil arose immediately with the USSR’s disintegration. It was then that the regimes of Caspian states cast doubt on the 1940 Soviet-Iranian treaty on the division of the Caspian and began its repartition without prior arrangement. And this is being done illegally the Caspian is not a sea, but a lake. Since that is so, the rules of international maritime law do not extend to it. Any decisions relating to the use of Caspian resources must be made based on a consensus of all Caspian countries of the CIS. And the 1940 Soviet-Iranian treaty, ratified at one time by the USSR Supreme Soviet, can be revoked only by parliamentary vote, not by a decision of particular RF government representatives. It follows from this that the so-called contract of the century concluded by the Azerbaijani government with an international consortium of eleven oil companies is illegal from the start, but the West openly ignores this fact.

With the actual assent of a number of highly placed

Russian government officials and businessmen, the question of the rightful ownership of Caspian shelf resources is being replaced by a discussion of pipeline routes over which it is proposed to pump “early” oil.

Another aspect of the West’s Caspian policy is the attempt to cut Russia off from the Transcaucasus by encouraging separatism in the North Caucasus, above all in Chechnya. In particular, there are projects for establishing an anti-Russian “Confederate of Mountain Peoples” made up of Dagestan, Chechnya, Ingushetia, Kabardino-Balkaria, Karachay- Cherkessia, and Adygea. It is presumed that this entity will gain direct egress to the Black Sea and to Turkey through the territory of Abkhazia. Plans for assisting separatism in Tatarstan and Bashkiria for the purpose of actually cutting off from central Russia regions of the Urals, Siberia, and the Far East rich in energy resources are being considered in the longer term.

C. Western policy with respect to NATO’s future is seen as an attempt to isolate Russian and ultimately oust it from Europe. An eastward expansion of the NATO bloc obviously is inevitable and is planned in several stages. In the first stage (over two to three years), Poland, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, and Hungary will be accepted as NATO members. In the second stage (tentatively by the year 2000), it is planned to accept Slovenia, Romania, Bulgaria, and, if possible, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia in NATO. The inclusion of Finland and Austria in NATO is likely at this same stage. Finally, the acceptance of Ukraine in NATO is possible at the third stage (approximately in 2005). But Russian will not be accepted in NATO under any circumstances.

West Germany is the main instigator of NATO's eastward expansion (the decision on expanding NATO was ultimately made after the withdrawal of the Western Group of Forces from the former East Germany had been completed). In fact, we are dealing with a resumption of German expansion in the eastern and southeastern directions twice interrupted in this century and being accomplished this time primarily by political and economic methods under the American "nuclear umbrella." The United States is another instigator of NATO's eastward expansion. In the opinion of a number of influential representatives of the American elite, such a line will permit reinforcing the U.S. leading position on the European continent and thereby compensate somewhat for America's obvious economic weakness compared with the European Union headed by the West Germany.

Many Western politicians now express assurances that they do not plan a NATO expansion by means of the Baltics and Ukraine or the stationing of Western troops and nuclear weapons in Eastern Europe, but there are no grounds for believing this. Just two years ago Russia was assured that they did not plan to expand NATO at all, even by means of Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic. Moreover, there generally was uncertainty in NATO during 1991-92 with respect to the future of this military-political alliance. Today, however, proposals for stationing tactical nuclear weapons in the Czech Republic and Poland are being discussed, operational plans for the movement of NATO mobile forces to the Baltics in case of its conflict with Russia are being drawn up, and the idea of establishing a 60,000-member “Baltic Corps” from troops of Poland, Denmark, and West Germany is being discussed.

D. The line toward Russia’s unilateral disarmament, which threatens strategic stability in the world, also should be examined in the very same way. With respect to strategic nuclear weapons, this line is being fulfilled today in two main directions. First, in the absence of financing, a rapid degradation is occurring in strategic systems presently in the inventory, and much Research Development in Technology and Engineering (RDT&E) in this area has been slowed or entirely halted. Second, international agreements clearly unfavorable to Russia are being imposed on it: the START II treaty and proposed changes to the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile treaty.

With respect to the START II treaty, there are two groups of arguments, against its ratification, military-strategic and political. In speaking of the first group of arguments, one should single out the problem in inequality in so-called rapid uploading potentials of the U.S. and Russian strategic forces (expected ratio 5:1 in favor of the United States) and U.S. attempts to change the regime of the ABM treaty under the pretext of a need to create a “tactical ABM defense system.” It should be emphasized that, in practice, if the U.S. delegation’s proposals at the Geneva talks are accepted, they legalize the U.S. right to create a strategic system for defending its own territory against ABMs. And the Republican majority in the U.S. Congress is stepping up pressure on the U.S. administration to persuade it to take such a step even without coordinating with Russia and in spite of international restrictions in force.

In considering the second group of arguments, one should direct attention to the fact that, as of the moment, the START II treaty was signed in January 1993, there were illusions in Russia regarding the possibility of friendship and partnership between it and the United States. Because of this, skews in the treaty favoring the United States did not seem so important, but today START II treaty shortcomings appear quite differently under conditions of the approaching “cold peace” caused by the NATO bloc’s planned eastward expansion. At the same time, the practice being followed of implementing treaty provisions without prior arrangement, without its ratification, and on a unilateral basis may lead to irreversible consequences in the very near future.

equality with the United States in strategic arms may become practically unattainable. The importance of observing this principle is explained by the fact that the majority of Western politicians are not military specialists and are capable of grasping only the simplest quantitative parameters characterizing the ratio of both sides' nuclear forces. Under these conditions, the widening gap between Russian and U.S. strategic nuclear forces, in terms of the number of operational nuclear warheads, obviously will be perceived in the West as grounds for regarding Russia as a second-rate nuclear power, which the United States, the only remaining nuclear superpower, will be able to subject to nuclear blackmail for the purpose of dictating its will. (The expected result of START II implementation in a version curtailed for financial reasons is no more than 500-600 Topol-M missiles in the Strategic Missile Troops by 2003-5, and new nuclearpowered missile-armed submarines have not been built at all since 1990.)

The situation also is largely similar with respect to the Conventional Forces in Europe (CFE) treaty. Russia's partners in the CFE treaty refused to accommodate Russia until recently on the question of so-called flank quotas; that is, to agree that Russia can have as many heavy weapons in the inventory in North Caucasus and Leningrad [St. Petersburg] military districts as necessary for the country's defense, and not as many as specified by the treaty concluded in November 1990 under quite different military-political conditions, when the Soviet Union and Warsaw Treaty Organization still existed. Only when it became clear that Russia would unilaterally refuse to fulfill this part of the CFE treaty if that line was continued did NATO begin to show readiness to take into account Russia's interests. But in exchange they demand that Russia remove objections to the NATO bloc's eastward expansion.

E. Western attempts to counteract integration trends operating within the CIS framework are obvious. This is manifested most openly with respect to Belorussia [Belarus], which is more ready than the other former Soviet republics to undertake close integration with Russia. On the whole, however, this opposition as well as NATO's eastward expansion, the activeness of Turkey and Western oil companies in the Caucasus and the Caspian, attempts to coerce Russia into unilateral disarmament, barring it from world markets of high-tech products, and, finally, the economic model being imposed on Russia by the IMF and World Bank all are links in the same chain: creeping expansion of the United States and its allies, with an ultimate goal of eliminating Russia as a state and turning its territory into a raw materials colony of Western countries.

2. Strategy for Neutralization of External Threats and for National Survival of the Russian Federation

A. A most rapid, fundamental change in the country's economic course appears to be fundamentally important to the Russian state's survival. The general outlines of such a change are presented in detail in programs of a number of political parties and blocs that plan to take part in the 17 December 1995 parliamentary elections. They include, in particular, rejecting cooperation with the IMF and World Bank; reversing the privatization of state property; imposing elementary order in foreign trade, in the banking system, and in exporting sectors of the economy (even within limits of existing legislation, which will permit reducing the outflow of capital and thereby increasing state investments in converting the military-industrial complex and in modernizing and restructuring national industry); increasing import tariffs for fifteen to twenty-five years; that is, until national industry and the national agrocomplex can withstand the competition of imported goods relatively painlessly; extraordinary measures in fighting organized crime and corruption, and expropriation of money and property acquired through criminal means; and economic integration within the CIS framework.

B. Preventing illegal exploitation of Caspian Sea shelf resources by Western oil companies is a vitally important goal for Russia, and the problem of deterring the “Turkic” and “Islamic” factors should be considered above all in this light. The main task here in the short term is a rapid end to the war in Chechnya by imposing constitutional order throughout its territory, providing for the elimination of Dudaev’s armed units, and disarming the population. It is obvious that this is possible only by force; therefore, it is advisable to stop the so-called peacemaking process and renewing operations of federal forces to disarm and eliminate illegal armed units.

Another very important task is to prevent fulfillment of the “Caspian oil contract” in its present form. In this case it is advisable to carry out measures such as officially refusing to recognize that part of the Caspian stipulated in the contract as a zone of Azerbaijan’s jurisdiction; taking practical steps, including also forceful steps, should it be necessary, to stop any oil production activity of foreign companies in the former Soviet part of the Caspian until its legal status is determined; preventing Turkey’s territorial tie with the main part of Azerbaijani territory; and exerting pressure on the regime in Baku; for example, by creating threats of a fragmentation of Azerbaijan and of an Armenian military offensive on Gyanzha [sic] and Yevlakh.

C. Opposition by force to the NATO bloc’s eastward expansion seems an extremely urgent task. At the same time, in the case of Poland and other East European countries, it is obvious that Russia has no real opportunities to hinder this by way of force, and threats not backed up by corresponding actions only discredit a state. An example of such discrediting was Russia's reaction to the NATO military operation in the Balkans in September 1995. But creating a military bloc of CIS countries, particularly the involvement of Central Asian countries in confronting the NATO bloc, is also obviously needed. With respect to Ukraine, it obviously will refuse to participate in such a military alliance in the foreseeable future.

The situation with respect to Belorussia [Belarus] is different. Close military cooperation on a bilateral basis should be developed here, and a key element of such cooperation should be the deployment of tactical nuclear weapons on the territory of Belorussia, in Kaliningrad, and on naval vessels of the Baltic fleet. Such a step is needed because, for economic reasons, Russia cannot permit itself to have as large an army today as the USSR did ten years ago. NATO now surpasses Russia by two to three times in the number of troops and conventional weapons in Europe. This gap will grow even more after Poland, Hungary, and the former Czechoslovakia join the alliance. Under such conditions the only possible and economically realizable way to deter NATO is by relying on tactical nuclear weapons capable of overcoming enemy superiority in conventional weapons, that is, to adopt the strategy to which the NATO bloc itself adhered during the "Cold War." And it is a question not only of the Western Theater of Military Operations (TVD), including the former Soviet-Polish border and Baltic Sea, but also of the Northern Theater of Military Operations, encompassing Russia's border with Norway and the Barents Sea, and the Southern Theater of Military Operations, encompassing the Black Sea and bases of Russian troops in Crimea, Abkhazia, Georgia, and Armenia-tactical nuclear weapons must become the basis of Russia's defense in all three European theaters of military operations.

The situation is completely different with respect to the Baltic as compared with Eastern Europe. In general, a neutral status of the Baltic republics similar to that of Finland during the "Cold War" probably would meet Russian interests, but if NATO accepts the Baltic republics as members, RF armed forces should be sent to the territory of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia.

It should be noted that Russia has the legal and moral grounds for introducing troops to the Baltics. First, an extension of the NATO military infrastructure to this region would present extreme danger to RF national security interests. During the "Caribbean crisis" [the Cuban missile crisis], when the USSR began deploying nuclear weapons on Cuban territory at Cuba's request, a similar situation from the U.S. standpoint provoked a naval blockade of the island by the United States accompanied by direct threats of military invasion and led to the most acute crisis of the "Cold War." Inclusion of the Baltic states in NATO would present no less a threat from Russia's standpoint than did the deployment of Soviet nuclear weapons in Cuba at one time from the U.S. standpoint.

Second, there are illegal, anti-democratic regimes in Estonia and Latvia similar to those that previously existed in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia [Zimbabwe]. In these biethnic republics, one ethnic group arbitrarily deprived people of the other nationality of their civil rights and usurped all power. Under these conditions, the part of the population being discriminated against (so-called non-citizens) are entitled to create their own parallel structures of authority and power. If force is used against them, they have the right to turn to Russia for armed support. Lithuania, does not recognize the “Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact.” Consequently, Russia and Belorussia have the right to take back Klaipeda and Vilna kray.

Third, the Baltics is a criminal zone living chiefly on smuggling and controlled by mafia structures. Considering the precedent of the U.S. invasion of Panama and the arrest of General Noriega, Russia also has the right to arrest and indict a large number of Baltic figures in Russian courts. It is obvious that a Russian return to the Baltics must be accompanied by the deportation to the West of persons who sullied themselves by complicity in discriminating against people of a different nationality and who do not wish to live in republics where the scope of civil rights does not depend on nationality.

With respect to presumed Western reaction to the probable introduction of Russian armed forces into the Baltics, an analysis shows that no one in the West plans to fight Russia over the Baltics. Economic sanctions are possible, but they most likely will not be in the nature of a total embargo. Above all this concerns the export of Russian energy resources. In particular, it is expected that in the foreseeable future Europe will experience a natural gas consumption deficit of 100 billion cubic meters per year. At the same time, Russian natural gas reserves make up one-third of world reserves. The experience of the conflict over the “gas/pipes” deal in the 1980s persuades us that West Germany, France, Italy, Finland, Greece, and Eastern Europe will continue to buy raw material resources from Russia as before, which will provide funds for conversion of the domestic military-industrial complex and for the country’s reindustrialization.

Finally, in case of a total break in relations with the United States, Russia has such convincing arguments for it as the nuclear-missile potential and the threat of proliferation of weapons of mass destruction around the world, which with skillful tactics can play the role of a kind of trading card. And if Russia is persistently driven into a corner, then it will be possible to undertake to sell military nuclear and missile technologies to such countries as Iran and Iraq, and to Algeria after Islamic forces arrive in power there. Moreover, Russia's direct military alliance with some of the countries mentioned should not be excluded, above all with Iran, within the framework of which a contingent of Russian troops and tactical nuclear weapons could be stationed on the shores of the Persian Gulf and the Strait of Hormuz.

D. Concerning the question of the attitude toward strategic nuclear forces, it should be noted that the Russian nuclear potential is one of the few arguments convincing to the West that Russia inherited from the USSR and that is not yet fully destroyed. There needs to be a most rapid formation of a program for developing the strategic nuclear forces based on the fact that they must develop within the framework of the START I treaty over the next fifteen years. The RF Ministry of Defense must develop such a program in a short time, and parliament must provide financing for its realization. Funds for these purposes could be found, for example, if financing is terminated for recovery work in the Chechen Republic and a large number of other programs, the need for which is not obvious.

An analysis shows that if the strategic nuclear forces develop within the framework of quantitative limits of the START I treaty, then this is a technically and economically fully realizable option, even considering Russia's loss of production capacities of the former USSR Ministry of General Machine-Building on Ukrainian territory. And in the first stage the warranty operating life of part of the multiple independently targetable reentry vehicle (MIRV) ICBMs in the inventory today-UR-100N, R-36 M UTTKh, [possible translation-“Upgraded specifications and performance characteristics”], R-36 M2, AND RT-23 UTTK—obviously should be extended to twenty years. In the second stage (by the beginning of 2009), ballistic missiles equipped with six medium-power warheads and now being developed within the scope of RDT&E for creating the D-31 naval missile complex obviously should be deployed (400 to 500 of them) in silo launchers of the above MIRVed ICBMs as well as in certain UR-100N ICBM silo launchers. After 2008 (when the effect of the START I treaty expires) it is advisable to begin deploying approximately another one hundred such missiles mounted on railroad flatcars.

It appears extremely important to offer opposition to U.S. plans for creating a “tactical anti-ballistic missile defense system” and in this connection changing the terms of the 1972 ABM treaty. These plans essentially are another attempt at dragging the Strategic Defense Initiative idea in through the back door, and they present a significant threat to strategic stability in the world and provoke China and other “small nuclear countries” to build up in their nuclear missile forces. In China’s case, for example, its nuclear forces, which are heavily inferior to the strategic forces of Russia and the United States, can be completely depreciated by the deployment even of a very limited U.S. ABM defense system. In view of this, a sharp quantitative increase in Chinese nuclear-missile forces, above all in the MIRVed ICBM grouping, should be expected if a U.S. ABM defense system is deployed. This in turn obviously would provoke India, which in that case will follow China. Pakistan would then also undoubtedly will join in the nuclear race.

Russia must not consent to any changes in the text of the treaty that would contradict the part of it that prohibits giving tactical ABM defense systems characteristics permitting their use for strategic ABM defense purposes. Arguments according to which Russia and the United States should cooperate in the area of creating a “tactical ABM defense system” in view of the fact that they allegedly have common enemies sound altogether unconvincing. It is obvious that countries such as Iran, Iraq, and North Korea are not Russia’s enemies. Second, any kind of cooperation between Russia and the United States will hardly be possible under conditions of the approaching “cold peace” connected with the upcoming NATO bloc expansion. Finally, by virtue of a policy of “double standards” being followed by the United States relative to the Israeli nuclear program, which is aimed against Russia among others, any U.S. argument regarding the question of non-proliferation of nuclear weapons should be viewed with suspicion. In view of the power of the pro-Israel lobby in the United States, one should not expect any serious steps by the United States to force Israel to give up its nuclear potential.

On the whole, we should take into account the fact that, as an analysis shows, the regime of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) most likely cannot be preserved over the long term and the number of nuclear powers will grow steadily. Israel already has approximately two hundred nuclear devices in the inventory. The range of Israel's nuclear weapon delivery vehicles is up to 2,500 km (i.e., Moscow is within reach of Israel's nuclear forces). It is obvious that Israel will not give up its nuclear potential and accede to the NPT under any circumstances. It should be understood that Israel's nuclear potential was created not just for deterring a non-nuclear attack by Arab countries, but also for blackmailing the USSR to compel it to exert a deterring influence on the Arabs in case of their conflict with Israel and the latter's military failures.

A final decision on creating nuclear-missile forces of small size to deter China and Pakistan was also made in India not long ago by the country's political leadership. And this decision is the product of national consent of all of India's political forces, and in all likelihood no arguments by the world community about the inadvisability of turning India into a nuclear power will be accepted by India's leadership and no threats of sanctions against India will influence its resolve to create its own nuclear-missile forces. At the same time, it is obvious that equipping the Indian armed forces with nuclear weapons will deprive the world community of arguments against Pakistan turning into a nuclear power, already the eighth in count (after Russia, the United States, U.K., France, China, Israel, and India). Along with this, Algeria, in which there is a great probability of Islamic forces coming to power, also has everything necessary for creating this kind of potential in a short time if its leadership makes the corresponding political decision.

Under the conditions now forming, Russia has two possible options for behavior. The first option presumes continuation of the present RF Ministry of Foreign Affairs line toward cooperating with the United States in order to pressure potential Third World possessors of nuclear weapons to give up realization of their nuclear programs. It appears that such a line will suffer total failure in the short term. The second option presumes Russia's refusal to follow the U.S. line in the question of non-proliferation of nuclear weapons and missile technologies and an unfolding of its cooperation in the nuclear-missile area above all with India. India is one of the few countries whose national interests do not run counter to Russia's. Russian and Indian cooperation in the nuclear-missile area modeled after U.S.-U.K. relations, where the United States supplies the U.K. with delivery vehicles-Polaris and Trident missiles-on which the U.K. installs its own nuclear warheads, is seen as most rational. And it is important to remember that India is also capable of creating its own nuclear-missile forces independently and in the extreme case undoubtedly will do this. But it would be extremely advantageous for it to cooperate with Russia in this matter. The economic advantage to Russia in the event of such cooperation also is obvious.

In the more distant future Russia could also develop cooperation in this area with Iran and a number of the Arab countries. It appears that such cooperation not only would bring Russia appreciable commercial advantages and political influence in Southwest Africa and North Africa, but also could deter Russia's Third World partners with respect to the content and direction of their work in this area.

E. The course toward integration within the CIS framework, above all with Ukraine, Belarus, and Kazakhstan, must become a very important direction of Russian policy. With respect to Belorussia and in part to Kazakhstan, it can be said that these republics probably will welcome integration with Russia. The situation appears much more uncertain with respect to Ukraine. At the same time, an analysis shows that, judging from everything, the results of Kuchma's "reforms" will be even worse than those of Gaydar's "reforms" in Russia. In contrast to Russia, Ukraine has no oil or natural gas, and the West will not be able to put Ukraine on full support. This fundamentally distinguishes the prospect of Ukraine's development from that of the Baltics, for example. Because of the small size of its population, the latter can be subsidized by the West in the extreme case within the range of $3-5 billion per year-this is little for Ukraine but enough for the Baltics. On the whole, it should be expected that in three to five years Ukraine's economy will approach a final collapse and the republic quite probably will go to pieces. Under these conditions its eastern and southern parts obviously will express a desire to reunite voluntarily with Russia. Realizing this, the West and western Ukraine's nationalist forces may try to provoke a conflict between Russia and Ukraine. Crimea might be the cause, and the goal would be to start the two peoples quarreling and sow hatred between them, as the West succeeded in doing in the former Yugoslavia with respect to the Serbs, Muslims, and Croats, and thereby make any future reunion of Russian and Ukraine impossible.

In this connection it should be emphasized that the West's goal is to provoke a sharp deterioration of Russia's relations not just with Ukraine but also with such countries as China and Iran, and to create powerful, constant pressure on the periphery of post-Soviet space in the Tajik-Afghan and Asia Minor zones. It appears that, on the one hand, Russia should be decisive in following its line concerning NATO expansion, the Baltics, Chechnya, the Caspian shelf, and the situation on the Tajik-Afghan border. But, on the other hand, it should react with extreme caution to provocations of west Ukrainian nationalist forces in Crimea and in eastern and southern Ukraine, especially as Crimea's present political elite is comprador-oriented and totally corrupt.

On the whole, it appears that if a judicious policy is followed, there are grounds for counting on restoration of a union in five to ten years made up of Russia, Belorussia, Kazakhstan, the majority of Ukraine, as well as the Dniester region, Abkhazia, and South Ossetia. And Russia's relations with the Transcaucasus and Central Asia could develop according to the model of relations that existed earlier within the framework of the Council on Mutual Economic Assistance, and with Moldavia, the Baltics, and western Ukraine according to the model of Soviet-Finnish relations between 1944 and 1991.

9.50 New Defense Doctrine Would Stem NATO Expansion

Aleksandr Lyasko Komsomolskaya Pravda, 29

September- 6 October 1995 [FBIS Translation]

[Report by Aleksandr Lyasko: "Doctrine Is New, But Looks Old."]

I learned from reliable sources that some time ago the General Staff completed its formulation of a version of the basic principles of Russia's new defense doctrine.

The first element is a demand for amendments to the Conventional Forces in Europe (CFE) treaty on the so-called flank quotas. The changes boil down to the idea that Russia should be allowed to have as many heavy arms as it considers necessary to its defense in the arsenal of the North Caucasus and Leningrad [St. Petersburg] military districts. Hitherto the arms ceilings have been laid down by the 1990 treaty, which the participating countries signed back in the time of the USSR and the Warsaw Pact. With the collapse of both structures Russia is refusing to accommodate the Turkish and Norwegian restriction demands.

Another detail of the new defense strategy is Russia's stance with regard to NATO's eastward expansion. The Defense Ministry believes that the president was slightly overdoing it when he spoke of a CIS military alliance in response to the 'East European states' admission to NATO. The president's idea that Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan will help us in a confrontation with NATO cannot be attributed to anything but emotion, especially since there is no point in counting on Ukraine's involvement in a new military alliance. Belarus is another matter. People on the Arbat [square] (i.e., the Defense Ministry) see the deployment of tactical nuclear weapons on Belarusian territory (as well as in Kaliningrad oblast and on Baltic fleet ships) as a key element in military cooperation with that republic.

According to our interlocutor at the General Staff, this is the only means that we have at our disposal for curbing NATO expansion. The country just does not have the money to maintain the army that we had ten years ago. That is why national strategists consider it necessary to eliminate the enemy's edge everywhere: the western theater of operations (the Polish border and Baltic waters) along with the northern theater (the border with Norway and the Barents Sea) and the southern theater (the Black Sea and Russia's bases in Crimea, Abkhazia, Georgia, and Armenia). Tactical nuclear weapons will be deployed everywhere.

The military department's next sensational idea involves dramatic action in connection with NATO's expansion. As regards Poland and the other countries of Eastern Europe, Russia is currently unable to stop this process by force. However, the plan presupposes that if NATO agrees to admit the Baltic republics, Russian Federation armed forces will immediately be moved into Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. Any attempt by NATO to stop this will be viewed by Russia as the prelude to a nuclear world catastrophe.

The draft new military doctrine casts doubt on the international system for monitoring the nonproliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Russia will decide the question of sales of military missile technologies to India, Iraq, Iran, and Algeria under certain conditions. A direct military alliance with Iran is not ruled out.

According to the high-ranking General Staff officer, the preliminary outlines of the defense doctrine formulated by General Grachev's department have been cautiously approved by the minister himself and his first deputy and constitute the military's response to the lack of any consistent policy by the Foreign Ministry and presidential structures on questions of military security. According to some of Grachev's statements following his talks with Yeltsin in Sochi, the army is ready to begin erecting a nuclear shield over the besieged fortress, which is how it sees Russia.

It is of course quite possible that the actual draft or, to be more precise, its publication is just a means of putting pressure on the West: Do not toy with Russia or it will return to the pre-perestroika positions, start to bristle, and instead of a civilized partner will be forced to become a bogeyman as before for Western democracy, a friend of dark Islamist forces, and a spawning ground for Zhirinovskiy and others. Regrettably, this is no empty threat, given the fact that the authors of the draft by no means lack allies in the Duma and within the Kremlin Walls.

9.51 “Provisions” May Underlay New Military Doctrine

Aleksandr Lyasko Komsomolskaya Pravda, 27 October- 2 November 1995 [FBIS Translation]

[Article by Aleksandr Lyasko under the “Komsomolskaya Pravda Investigation” rubric: “Will Grachev Invade the Baltics? A New Russian Military Doctrine Is Being Drawn Up at a Secret Defense Institute.”]

Three weeks ago Komsomolskaya Pravda reported, citing a senior officer of the General Staff, that the formulation of a new Russian military doctrine had begun at the Defense Ministry. Later we were able to establish that the trail of the document in question, which is being eagerly cited by military men, leads back to a man by the name of Anton Surikov, military expert at a rather closed institution called the “Independent Institute of Defense Studies” (INOBIS).

What is INOBIS? Some 30 km northeast of Moscow, if you follow the Yaroslavl highway, you will come to the city of Kaliningrad. Hidden deep within one of the city’s pleasant parks is an eight-story building in pale pink brick with no signboard. If you try to get into the building the security guard will examine your documents meticulously and summon his superior. Then the superior will call the security chief, and together they will ask you to explain in detail the purpose of your visit. If they are satisfied with your answers, they will assign you to an escort in a severe suit that barely meets across the chest-also with no identification marks.

On the eighth floor, in an office under a portrait of Lenin, you will most likely be greeted by Mr. Anton Surikov, who introduces himself as an “independent scientist.” He works surrounded by powerful computers, half a dozen telephones, and a poster giving instructions on how to handle a U.S. M 16 rifle. Don’t be surprised if your conversation is interrupted from time to time by telephone calls from Washington, London, or Delhi. The staffer will answer the callers in good English, but with an accent betraying the training of a Soviet military instructor of the mid-1980s.

It was thanks to the assistance of this inquisitive man of science that we were able to obtain the document with the ominous title “Conceptual Provisions of a Strategy for Countering the Main External Threats to Russian Federation National Security.” This work was prepared “by way of initial data for the pursuit of military-technical studies.”

Let us note particularly that INOBIS is a complex organization originally founded by respected private individuals. They include: Nikolay Alekseevich Sham, former chief of the USSR KGB Main Economic Counterintelligence Directorate; Vitaliy Khusseynovich Doguzhiev, USSR deputy prime minister and minister of general machine building (that was the Soviet euphemism for the missile and space industry); Yuriy Dmitrievich Maslyukov, formerly chairman of the USSR Gosplan (State Planning Committee).

Every year, 1995 included, INOBIS carries out a number of studies financed by the Defense Ministry on research regarding strategic nuclear weapons, the military use of space, and anti-ballistic missile defense. To cap it all, certain fragments of the “Conceptual Provisions” bear a suspicious resemblance to remarks made by Defense Minister Grachev after his meeting with the president in Sochi. These interesting similarities and coincidences prompt the obvious thought that the text of the “Provisions” contains what Grachev cannot say by virtue of his office, but which the Defense Ministry would like to make known urgently to probable allies and, equally, adversaries.

Above all, the document confirms what we have said before: It examines the question of a close military alliance with Belarus involving the deployment of “tactical nuclear weapons on the territory of Belars, in Kaliningrad, and on the naval vessels of the Baltic fleet.” It also proposes the siting of nuclear weapons and delivery vehicles in both the Northern (the border of the Kola Peninsula and Barents Sea) and Southern (the Black Sea and Russian Federation bases in Crimea, Abkhazia, Georgia, and Armenia) theaters.

The theme of the admission of the Baltic republics to NATO is also developed in an interesting way in the “Provisions.” It is recognized that Russia’s interests would be met by a neutral status for the Baltic republics along the lines of Finland during the “Cold War.” However, the document says, “if NATO admits the Baltic republics as members, Russian Federation armed forces should be sent to the territory of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia.”

The “moral and legal justification” whereby Russia is to be absolved of its sins in connection with a possible occupation of the Baltics is particularly curious. First, the “Provisions” relate from Russia’s viewpoint, the inclusion of the Baltic republics in NATO would constitute no less a threat than, from the U.S. viewpoint, did “the deployment of Soviet nuclear weapons in Cuba.” Second, the defense researchers believe that one ethnic group (in Estonia and Latvia) has deprived people of another nationality of their rights and has usurped power. Therefore the noncitizens who are discriminated against are “entitled to create their own parallel structures of authority and power” and, in response to the use of coercion against them, to appeal to Russia for armed support. The Russian population of the Baltics is thus assigned the unenviable role of hostages whom the Russian armed forces may save by once again depriving the Baltic republics of their independence.

The authors of the “Provisions” believe that the West is not likely to go to war with Russia over the Baltics. And there will not be a total blockade, if only because they value our gas exports and the possibility of thereby covering 100 billion cubic meters of the gas shortfall in Germany, Italy, and Eastern Europe. Or if the enemy takes a very strong line, we could intimidate them by selling nuclear missile technologies to Iran, Iraq, or Algeria. We could even form a military alliance with Iran, “within the framework of which a contingent of Russian troops and tactical nuclear weapons could be stationed on the shores of the Persian Gulf and the Strait of Hormuz.”

What do the authors propose that Russia should do after it has washed its warheads in the waters of the Persian Gulf? Extend the operating life of MIRVed (multiple independently targetable reentry vehicle) ICBMs to twenty years. After the year 2008, start deploying one hundred ballistic missiles with six medium-power warheads each, in the version mounted on railroad flatcars. Finally, in extremis, bury the Treaty on the Nonproliferation of Nuclear Weapons because according to the “Theses,” the number of nuclear powers is going to increase steadily in any case.

That point is particularly noteworthy. The text contains references to two hundred nuclear weapons belonging to Israel with a range that would reach Moscow. China is also likely to build up its nuclear missile forces. At the moment, Russia, following official Foreign Ministry policy, is cooperating with America to contain the possessors of nuclear weapons in the “Third World.” The document’s authors believe this line will fail completely in the near future. Instead, we should sell delivery vehicles first to India (just as the Americans sold Britain the Polaris and Trident missiles for British warheads) and in the longer term to Iran and certain Arab countries.

This could mean the prospect of unfurling a nuclear umbrella over such fine men as Saddam Hussein—in the event, of course, that the “Provisions” really do get incorporated in the Defense Ministry’s future work plan. And they will at the end of the text, it says in black and white: “This document may be used in developing a new Russian Federation military doctrine.”

What might the immediate future of the “Conceptual Provisions” be? They are expected to be used in the introductory volume to the future Russian military doctrine. In the course of twelve to eighteen months General Staff officers will be able to come up with a whole host of appendices to them, such as an operational plan for sending troops into the Baltic republics. By 1997, this whole collection of folios could be approved by the next defense minister. After that it will become clear that local conflicts in the Caucasus and tactical nuclear strikes against NATO troop accumulations in Eastern Europe are not the last surprise being prepared for us by the military strategists and “independent researchers.”

9.52 NATO Delegation Examines PFP Participation Option

Basapress, 31 October 1995 [FBIS Translation]

A NATO delegation comprising representatives of European armies led by Italian Army Colonel Carlo Greco is visiting Moldova to assess the possibilities of Moldova's participation in the "Partnership for Peace" (PFP) program. During their meetings with Moldovan officials, the delegation will discuss possibilities of conducting peacekeeping operations and humanitarian assistance programs, controlling flights, and establishing cooperation between civil authorities and military commands. They will be familiarized with the activity of Moldovan peacekeepers, systems of civil defense, and military instruction and training. Aspects of assisting Moldovan soldiers to study English will be also examined.

Viorel Cibotaru, Defense Ministry spokesman, told Basapress that the visit will conclude on 3 November. Tiraspol leader Igor Smirnov declared in his speech on 29 October during the Dniester All-Deputy Congress that NATO officers would participate in the military maneuvers of the Moldovan army. Defense Ministry representatives denied this in an interview with Basapress.

9.53 President Confirms Plans Not to Join NATO

INFOTAG, 16 November 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Our participation in the Partnership for Peace program does not mean that Moldova is planning to join the North Atlantic Alliance, as claimed by separatist Dniester leaders, President Mircea Snegur stated in the Ministry of Defense today. Mr. Snegur, who is the supreme commander-in-chief of the Moldovan armed forces, remarked that the national army also contributed to the country's integration into international structures. It has been developing cooperation with the armed forces of Bulgaria, Turkey, Romania, Ukraine, United States, and the Russian Federation. Moldova's participation in the Partnership for Peace program includes, first and foremost, assistance in personnel training, consultancies, exchange of experience, and peacekeeping operations, the president stressed. As stipulated by the constitution, Moldova is a neutral state, shall allow no foreign troops to be deployed on its territory and cannot enter any military blocs or unions, Snegur said. The top ministry officials, who took the floor at today's collegium, said that the supreme commander-in-chief should act as co-author in drafting the laws related to military issues. The collegium confirmed some progress in national army development, as exemplified by the first graduation of officers from the Alexandru cel Bun Military College. At the same time, Snegur emphasized the importance of eliminating such drawbacks as low discipline, lack of officers' responsibility for their subordinates, and poor patriotic upbringing of the younger generation.

9.54 Snegur: Country "Cannot Become" NATO Member

INFOTAG, 30 November 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Seeking integration into European Union structures, Moldova nevertheless cannot become a NATO member, as its constitution proclaimed Moldova a neutral country that shall not join any military blocs, President Mircea Snegur stated in his interview with the Neue Züricher Zeitung newspaper of Switzerland and the Handelsblatt of Germany.

"We do not think that NATO's possible broadening toward the East will bring any danger to Moldova's security," he said, adding that "when NATO begins its expansion, it should necessarily consider all factors, all possible consequences, first and foremost-the Russian factor.”

The president expressed concern that the Russian State Duma still had ratified neither the basic Moldovan-Russian treaty, signed as long ago as 1990, nor the agreement of 21 October 1994, on the withdrawal of Russian troops from Moldovan territory. “We are looking forward to the forthcoming elections to the State Duma with interest, for the would-be forum will largely influence official Russia’s stance on the Dniester issue,” Mr. Snegur said.

Moldovan President Mircea Snegur also stated in the aforementioned interview that he is “dreaming of organizing, as soon as possible, a team of like-minded allies so that to conduct the second stage of reforms in the next five years with the fewest possible errors,” the presidential press service said.

Observers have regarded this statement as Snegur’s intention to struggle for a second term as president of Moldova.

“I have been Moldovan president since 1990, and now I must report to the nation what I have done, and to outline new priorities. I believe we have something to tell the people,” Snegur said. He believes that it is a priority to make 1996 a turning point in economic reform. This implies economic growth, making the Bankruptcy Law effective, exports and wages grow, successful privatization, revision of budget policy in favor protecting the people.

In the political field, Snegur places priority on bringing up Moldovan youth in the spirit of patriotism.

UNIAN (in Ukrainian), 26 December 1995 [FBIS
Translation]

Ukraine wishes to extend cooperation with NATO and the Western European Union (WEU) and will continue to develop cooperation with European and trans-Atlantic organizations, Ukraine's Foreign Minister Gennadiy Udovenko told UNIAN on 26 December.

He stressed, however: "Ukraine as a non-bloc national is worried about its national security, as it may end up between an expanded NATO and the Tashkent alliance."

According to the minister, Ukraine has no intention of joining either NATO or the Tashkent bloc, but will not limit its cooperation with NATO to an individual program within the Partnership for Peace. "NATO too, has expressed an interest in cooperating with Ukraine," he added.

9.56 Defense Minister Shmarov Considers Joining NATO "Absurd"

Interfax, 31 January 1996 [FBIS Translation]

The claims that Ukraine is striving for NATO membership are absurd, Ukrainian Defense Minister Valeriy Shmarov told students at the Belarusian Military Academy in Minsk. The idea of NATO's eastward expansion is "premature," said the minister. Ukrainian legislation provides for the "off-bloc and neutral position of this country. Bilateral relations with CIS and other countries are a different thing," said Shmarov.

Ukraine has changed its stand on military threats, said the minister. In his opinion, a serious enemy will not appear in the next few years or decades.

“Local conflicts are possible, but there will hardly be several of them at one time. It is also unlikely that neighboring countries and even more unlikely that faraway countries may be united against Ukraine as a common enemy,” he said.

Commenting on relations with Russia, the minister said these countries and their armed forces “are most eligible for cooperation. They simply will not survive without each other.”

The minister also named Belarus as a strategic partner of Ukraine.

Part III

The Formal Structure of the CIS

10 Major CIS Structural Agreements and Protocols

Introductory Notes

The structural documents contained in Chapter 10 form the legal framework of the Commonwealth.

Agreements and treaties are signed by heads of state and submitted to the state parliaments for ratification. The Council of Heads of State has to date considered more than 450 agreements, most submitted in packages by the councils of Heads of Government, Ministers of Defense and Foreign Affairs, and other working commissions. These agreements and protocols are attached to the core conceptual framework, which consists of the Commonwealth Charter, the Economic Union Treaty and the Collective Security Treaty. Most of the agreements, and even the core framework treaties, have lacked the political will or machinery to carry them out, making the CIS structure an impotent structural shell so far, despite Russia's determined efforts to consolidate the organization into a substitute for the Soviet Union.

The principal political structural instrument, the Commonwealth Charter, is a loosely worded conceptual document, hastily drafted by the Belovezh Forest trio. It has still not been signed or ratified by Ukraine or Turkmenistan (whose presidents have only signed the Commonwealth Declaration). Most interstate political, economic, and military activity is still conducted on bilateral terms. The Interparliamentary Assembly (IPA), under strong Russian leadership, was supposed to coordinate CIS laws, thereby paving the way for the practical implementation of CIS agreements. So far, however, the IPA has been ineffective because its signatories insist on subordinating CIS laws to their own constitutions, and on the sovereignty of their national governments and parliaments.

The CIS Economic Union Treaty has enjoyed little more success than the charter. The treaty has still not been signed by Ukraine or Turkmenistan, and most of the agreements attached to it have fewer than ten signatories. Whereas a great many economic agreements signed in early 1992 played a vital role in implementing the “divorce” among former Soviet republics, the framework for the reintegration of the republics has so far failed to achieve its purpose. In 1995, the thrust toward economic integration was shifted toward a multilevel variant. This approach has shown signs of bearing greater fruit, with a trilateral Customs Union Agreement joined by Russia, Kazakhstan, and Belarus being trumpeted as the first giant step. Even this agreement, however, faces severe difficulty in the practical implementation stage because of the diversity in political and economic development of its signatories.

The Collective Security Treaty has also been rejected by Ukraine and Turkmenistan. This treaty has also failed in its mission to form the framework for building a unified CIS armed forces. Only the strategic command, which has been brought under total Russian control, has a unified command structure. As a consequence, a new regional approach to CIS security is being discussed within the CIS Council for Defense Ministers, as documented in Chapter 9. It remains to be seen whether a legal structure and enforcement mechanisms can be designed to carry out this approach. The other military agreements in this section are basically only statements of principle, lacking the political will or the unified command structure to carry out its military aims. In sum, the entire structural framework of the CIS so far lacks the political support required for successful implementation of unification principles. The only political impetus so far emanates from Russia, in concert with Belarus, Kazakhstan, and sometimes with one or two other CIS leaders. This is insufficient to create the kind of integrated interstate organism implied by the word “commonwealth,” and certainly an insufficient basis from which to move toward a confederation. So far, at least, any pragmatic integrationist measures which have been implemented have been the result of unilateral pressure or force by the Russian Federation.

The Political Framework Documents

10.1 Charter of the Commonwealth of Independent States (22 January 1993)

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 12 February 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The states which have voluntarily united within the Commonwealth of Independent States (hereinafter the Commonwealth), basing themselves on the historic community of their peoples and the ties established between them, acting in accordance with the generally recognized principles and norms of international law, the provisions of the UN Charter and the Helsinki Final Act, and other documents of the CSCE,

- seeking to ensure by joint efforts the economic and social progress of their peoples, fully resolved to implement the provisions of the Agreement on the Creation of the Commonwealth of Independent States, the protocol to that Agreement, and the provisions of the Alma-Ata Declaration,

- developing cooperation among themselves to ensure international peace and security and equally for the purpose of maintaining civil peace and interethnic accord,

- desiring to create conditions for the preservation and development of the cultures of all the peoples of the member states,

- seeking to improve the mechanisms of cooperation in the Commonwealth and enhance their effectiveness,

-have decided to adopt the Charter of the Commonwealth and have agreed on the following:

Section I. Aims and Principles

Article 1. The Commonwealth is founded on the principles of the sovereign equality of all its members. The member states are autonomous and equal subjects of international law.

The Commonwealth promotes the further development and strengthening of the relations of friendship, good neighborliness, interethnic accord, trust, mutual understanding, and mutually advantageous cooperation among the member states.

The Commonwealth is not a state and does not possess supranational powers.

Article 2. The aims of the Commonwealth are:

- cooperation in the political, economic, ecological, humanitarian, cultural, and other spheres;
- the all-around and balanced economic and social development of member states within the framework of the common economic space, and interstate cooperation and integration;
- the guaranteeing of human rights and basic freedoms in accordance with the generally recognized principles and norms of international law and documents of the CSCE;
- cooperation among member states to ensure international peace and security, the implementation of effective measures to reduce arms and military expenditure, the elimination of nuclear and other types of weapons of mass destruction, and the achievement of general and complete disarmament;

-assistance to citizens of member states in free association, contacts, and movement within the Commonwealth;

-reciprocal legal assistance and cooperation in other spheres of legal relations;

-peaceful solution of disputes and conflicts between Commonwealth states.

Article 3. In order to achieve the Commonwealth's aims member states, proceeding on the basis of the generally recognized norms of international law and the Helsinki Final Act, build their relations in accordance with the following interconnected principles of equal value:

-respect for the sovereignty of member states, for the inalienable right of peoples to self-determination, and for the right to determine their future without external interference;

-inviolability of state borders, recognition of existing borders, and rejection of unlawful territorial acquisitions;

-territorial integrity of states and rejection of any actions aimed at dismembering another state's territory;

-non-use of force or the threat of force against the political independence of a member state;

-resolution of disputes by peaceful means in such a way as to avoid jeopardizing international peace, security, and justice;

- supremacy of international law in interstate relations;
- non-interference in one another's internal and external affairs;
- the guaranteeing of human rights and basic freedoms for all regardless of race, ethnic origin, language, religion, and political or other convictions;
- conscientious discharge of commitments assumed under Commonwealth documents, including this charter;
- consideration of one another's interests and of the interests of the Commonwealth as a whole, provision of assistance in all spheres of their mutual relations on the basis of mutual assent;

- the pooling of efforts and provision of support to one another for the purpose of creating peaceful conditions of life for the peoples of Commonwealth member states, and the ensuring of their political, economic, and social progress;

- development of mutually advantageous economic, scientific, and technical cooperation, and expansion of the processes of integration;

- spiritual unity of their peoples, based upon respect for their identity, and close cooperation in the preservation of cultural values and cultural exchange.

Article 4. The following belong to the spheres of joint activity of member states and are carried out on an equitable basis via common coordinating institutions in accordance with the commitments assumed by member states within the framework of the Commonwealth:

- guaranteeing human rights and basic freedoms;

- coordinating foreign policy activity;

- cooperating in forming and developing a common economic space, the pan-European and Eurasian markets, and customs policy;

- cooperating in developing systems of transport and communications;

- protecting health and the environment;

- questions of social and migration policy;
- struggle against organized crime;
- cooperating in the sphere of defense policy and the protection of external borders;

This list may be extended by the mutual assent of member states.

Article 5. Multilateral and bilateral agreements in various spheres of member states' mutual relations form the fundamental legal basis of interstate relations within the framework of the Commonwealth.

Agreements concluded within the framework of the Commonwealth should correspond to the aims and principles of the Commonwealth and the commitments of member states under this charter.

Article 6. Member states promote the cooperation and development of ties among state organs, public associations, and economic structures.

Section II. Membership

Article 7. The states which have signed and ratified the Agreement on the Creation of the Commonwealth of Independent States of 8 December 1991 and the Protocol to that Agreement of 21 December 1991 by the time of the adoption of this charter constitute the founding states of the Commonwealth.

The founding states which assume commitments under this charter within one year of its adoption by the Council of Heads of State constitute the member states of the Commonwealth.

A state which shares the aims and principles of the Commonwealth and assumes the commitments contained in this charter can also become a member of the Commonwealth by joining to it subject to the assent of all member states.

Article 8. On the basis of a decision by the Council of Heads of State, a state desiring to participate in certain categories of Commonwealth activity may join the Commonwealth as an associate member on the terms set by the agreement on associate membership.

By decision of the Council of Heads of State, representatives of other states may attend sessions of Commonwealth organs as observers.

Questions concerning the participation of associate members and observers in the work of Commonwealth organs are regulated by the rules of procedure of such organs.

Article 9. A member state has the right to secede from the Commonwealth. A member state shall inform the depositary of the charter of such intention in writing twelve months prior to secession.

The commitments which arise during the period of participation in this charter are binding upon the relevant states until they are discharged in full.

Article 10. Violations of this charter by a member state or the systematic non-fulfillment by a state of its commitments under agreements concluded within the framework of the Commonwealth or of decisions by Commonwealth organs shall be examined by the Council of Heads of State.

Measures permitted under international law may be applied to such a state.

Section III. Collective Security and Military-Political Cooperation

Article 11. Member states shall pursue a coordinated policy in the sphere of international security, disarmament, arms control, and the organizational development of the armed forces and shall maintain security in the Commonwealth by, inter alia, groups of military observers and collective peacekeeping forces.

Article 12. In the event of a threat to the sovereignty, security, and territorial integrity of one or several member states or to international peace and security, member states shall immediately activate the mechanism of mutual consultations with the aim of coordinating positions and adopting measures to eliminate the threat, including peacemaking operations and the use, where need be, of Armed Forces in exercise of the right to individual or collective self-defense in accordance with Article 51 of the UN Charter.

The decision on the joint use of the armed forces shall be made by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth or the interested member states of the Commonwealth in line with their national legislation.

Article 13. Each member state shall take appropriate measures to ensure a stable situation along the Commonwealth member states' external borders. On the basis of mutual assent member states shall coordinate the activity of border troops and other competent services which exercise control and bear responsibility for ensuring observance of the prescribed procedure governing the crossing of member states' external borders.

Article 14. The Council of Heads of State is the Commonwealth's supreme organ on questions concerning the defense and protection of member states' external borders. Coordination of Commonwealth's military-economic activity shall be exercised by the Council of Heads of Government.

Collaboration by member states in the implementation of international agreements and the resolution of other questions in the sphere of security and disarmament shall be organized by joint consultations.

Article 15. Specific questions of member states' military-political cooperation shall be regulated by special agreements.

Section IV. Preventing Conflicts and Resolving Disputes

Article 16. Member states shall take all possible measures to prevent conflicts, primarily along interethnic and interreligious lines, which could entail violation of human rights.

They shall, on the basis of mutual agreement, render assistance to one another in settling such conflicts, including within the framework of international organizations.

Article 17. Commonwealth member states shall refrain from actions which could be detrimental to other member states and result in the exacerbation of potential disputes.

Member states shall conscientiously and in a spirit of cooperation make efforts toward a fair and peaceful resolution of their disputes through talks of the achievement of accord on an appropriate alternative procedure for settling the dispute.

If member states do not resolve the dispute via the means indicated in the second part of this article, they may refer it to the Council of Heads of State.

Article 18. The Council of Heads of State is empowered, at any stage of a dispute whose continuation could threaten the maintenance of peace or security in the Commonwealth, to recommend to the parties an appropriate procedure or method for settling the dispute.

Section V. Cooperation in the Economic, Social, and Legal Spheres

Article 19. Member states shall cooperate in the economic and social spheres along the following avenues:

- forming a common economic space on the basis of market relations and the free movement of goods, services, capital, and labor;
- coordinating social policy, elaborating joint social programs and measures to ease social tension in connection with the implementation of economic reforms;
- developing systems of transport and communications and energy systems;
- coordinating credit and financial policy;
- promoting the development of member states' trade and economic ties;
- encouraging and mutually protecting investments;
- promoting the standardization and certification of industrial goods and commodities;
- legally protecting intellectual property;
- promoting the development of a common information space;
- implementing joint environmental protection measures, providing mutual assistance in eliminating the consequences of environmental disasters and other emergency situations;

-implementing joint projects and programs in the spheres of science and technology, education, health care, culture, and sports.

Article 20. Member states shall cooperate in the sphere of the law, in particular by concluding multilateral and bilateral treaties on affording legal assistance, and shall promote the alignment of national legislation.

In the event of conflicts between the norms of member states' national legislation regulating relations in spheres of joint activity, member states shall hold consultations and talks for the purpose of elaborating proposals to remove those conflicts.

Section VI. Organs of the Commonwealth

The Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government

Article 21. The Council of Heads of State is the supreme organ of the Commonwealth.

The Council of Heads of State, in which all member states are represented at top level, shall discuss and resolve fundamental questions connected with member states' activity in the sphere of their common interests.

The Council of Heads of State shall assemble for sessions twice a year. Extraordinary sessions of the council may be convened on the initiative of any one of the member states.

Article 22. The Council of Heads of Government shall coordinate the cooperation of member states' organs of executive power in the economic, social, and other spheres of common interest.

The Council of Heads of Government shall assemble for sessions four times a year. Extraordinary sessions of the council may be convened on the initiative of any one of the member states' governments.

Article 23. Decisions of Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government shall be made by common assent-consensus. Any state may declare it has no interest in a particular question, which should not be regarded as an obstacle to the adoption of a decision.

The Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government may hold joint sessions.

The working procedure of the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government shall be regulated by the Rules of Procedure.

Article 24. The heads of states and heads of governments shall take the chair at sessions of the Council of Heads of State and Council of Heads of Government by rotation in the Russian alphabetical order of the names of the Commonwealth member states.

Sessions of the Council of Heads of State and Council of Heads of Government shall be held as a rule in the city of Minsk.

Article 25. The Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government shall create working and auxiliary organs on both a standing basis and a temporary basis.

These organs shall be formed from representatives of the member states vested with the corresponding powers.

Experts and consultants may be invited to participate in their sessions.

Article 26. Conferences of leaders of the corresponding state organs shall be convened to resolve questions of cooperation in individual spheres and to elaborate recommendations for the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government.

The Foreign Ministers Council

Article 27. The Foreign Ministers Council, on the basis of decisions of the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government, shall coordinate the foreign policy activity of the member states, including their activity in international organizations, and shall organize consultations on questions of world policy of mutual interest.

The Foreign Ministers Council shall perform its activity in accordance with the statute approved by the Council of Heads of State.

Coordinating and Consultative Committee

Article 28. The Coordinating and Consultative Committee is the standing executive and coordinating organ of the Commonwealth.

In execution of the decisions of the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government, the committee:

- elaborates and submits proposals on questions of cooperation within the framework of the Commonwealth and of the development of socio-economic ties;
- promotes the implementation of accords in specific areas of economic mutual relations;
- organizes conferences of representatives and experts for the preparation of draft documents to be submitted to sessions of the Council of Heads of State and Council of Heads of Government;
- ensures the holding of sessions of the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government;
- assists the work of other Commonwealth organs.

Article 29. The Coordinating and Consultative Committee is made up of permanent plenipotentiary representatives, two from each Commonwealth member state, and a committee coordinator, appointed by the Council of Heads of State.

For the purposes of providing organizational and technical backup for the work of the Council of Heads of State, the Council of Heads of Government, and other Commonwealth organs, the Coordinating and Consultative Committee has a Secretariat, headed by the committee coordinator-deputy chairman of the Coordinating and Consultative Committee.

The committee operates in accordance with the statute ratified by the Council of Heads of State.

The committee's seat is in the city of Minsk.

The Defense Ministers Council; The Joint Armed Forces High Command

Article 30. The Defense Ministers Council is an organ of the Council of Heads of State on questions of military policy and the military organizational development of the member states.

The Joint Armed Forces High Command exercises leadership of the Joint Armed Forces, as well as of groups of military observers and collective forces maintaining peace in the Commonwealth.

The Defense Ministers Council and the Joint Armed Forces High Command perform their activity on the basis of the relevant statutes ratified by the Council of Heads of State.

The Council of Commanders of Border Troops

Article 31. The Council of Commanders of Border Troops is an organ of the Council of Heads of State on questions of the protection of the external borders of member states and the provision of a stable situation along them.

The Council of Commanders of Border Troops performs its activity on the basis of the relevant statute ratified by the Council of Heads of State.

The Economic Court

Article 32. The Economic Court operates for the purpose of ensuring the fulfillment of economic commitments within the framework of the Commonwealth.

The jurisdiction of the Economic Court includes the settlement of disputes arising in the fulfillment of economic commitments. The court may also settle other disputes referred to its jurisdiction by agreements of member states.

The Economic Court is empowered to interpret the provisions of agreements and other Commonwealth acts on economic issues.

The Economic Court performs its activity in accordance with the Agreement on the Status of the Economic Court and the statute on it ratified by the Council of Heads of State.

The seat of the Economic Court is in the city of Minsk.

Commission on Human Rights

Article 33. The Commission on Human Rights is a consultative organ of the Commonwealth and monitors the fulfillment of commitments on human rights which the member states have assumed within the framework of the Commonwealth.

The commission comprises representatives of Commonwealth member states and operates on the basis of the statute ratified by the Council of Heads of State.

The seat of the Commission on Human Rights is in the city of Minsk.

Organs of Sectoral Cooperation

Article 34. On the basis of agreements between the member states on cooperation in the economic, social, and other spheres, organs of sectoral cooperation may be established to carry out the elaboration of agreed principles and rules of such cooperation to promote their practical implementation.

The organs of sectoral cooperation (councils, committees) perform the functions envisaged in the present charter and in the provisions on them, ensuring the examination and settlement on a multilateral basis of questions of cooperation in the relevant spheres.

Leaders of the corresponding organs of executive power of the member states are members of the organs of sectoral cooperation.

The organs of sectoral cooperation adopt recommendations within the limits of their competence and, whenever necessary, also submit proposals for consideration by the Council of Heads of Government.

The Working Language of the Commonwealth

Article 35. The working language of the Commonwealth is Russian.

Section VII. Interparliamentary Cooperation

Article 36. The Interparliamentary Assembly holds interparliamentary consultations, discusses questions of cooperation within the framework of the Commonwealth, and elaborates joint proposals in the sphere of the activity of national parliaments.

Article 37. The Interparliamentary Assembly comprises parliamentary delegations.

The organization of the activity of the Interparliamentary Assembly is carried out by the Council of the Assembly, which comprises leaders of the parliamentary delegations.

Procedural questions of the activity of the Interparliamentary Assembly are regulated by its standing orders.

The seat of the Interparliamentary Assembly is the city of St. Petersburg.

Section VIII. Finances

Article 38. Expenditure on financing the activity of the Commonwealth organs is apportioned on the basis of proportional participation by the member states and is set in accordance with special agreements on the budgets of the Commonwealth organs.

The budgets of the Commonwealth organs are ratified by the Council of Heads of State on the basis of proposals by the Council of Heads of Government.

Article 39. Questions of the financial and economic activity of the Commonwealth organs are examined according to the procedure established by the Council of Heads of Government.

Article 40. Member states are autonomously responsible for the expenditure associated with the participation of their representatives, experts, and consultants in the work of Commonwealth conferences and organs.

Section IX. Final Provisions

Article 41. The present charter is subject to ratification by the founding states in accordance with their constitutional procedures.

The instruments of ratification are handed over to the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will notify the other founding states of the submission of each instrument for safekeeping.

The present charter enters into force for all founding states from the moment instruments of ratification have been handed over for safekeeping by all founding states, or, for the founding states which have handed over their instruments of ratification, one year following the adoption of the present charter.

Article 42. Amendments to the present charter may be proposed by any member state. Proposed amendments are examined in accordance with the rules of procedure of the Council of Heads of State.

Amendments to the present charter are adopted by the Council of Heads of State. They enter into force following ratification by all member states in accordance with their constitutional procedure, from the date on which the government of the Republic of Belarus receives the last instrument of ratification.

Article 43. In the process of ratifying the present charter, the Commonwealth's founding states may make reservations and appeals* on Sections III, IV, and VII and on Articles 28, 30, 31, 32, and 33.

Article 44. The present charter will be registered in accordance with Article 102 of the UN Charter.

Article 45. The present charter has been done in one copy in the state languages of the Commonwealth founding states. The original copy is stored in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send certified copies thereof to all founding states.

The present charter was adopted 22 January 1993 at the session of the Council of Heads of State in the city of Minsk.

10.2 Statement by the Council of Heads of States Belonging to the CIS

Translated by David Ridler 22 January 1993

The agreements adopted and the mechanisms elaborated within the Commonwealth make it possible to regulate problems of political, economic, humanitarian, military, and other cooperation by international legal means.

The heads of CIS member states are united in the view that the Commonwealth possesses the requisite potential to improve its activity on the basis of existing agreements. However, all the participants in the conference of CIS heads of states in Minsk state their resolve to continue efforts to improve the effectiveness of CIS activity in the economic and political spheres.

The states which have signed and those which have not signed the Decision on the CIS Charter will concentrate their efforts first and foremost on finding ways to overcome the economic crisis and on forming effective ties among the components engaged in economic activity during the transition to market relations.

The heads of state deem it essential to remove persisting obstacles to the development of mutually beneficial economic cooperation.

The heads of state consider that the CIS countries' relations, above all their economic relations, will serve to ensure conditions for normal cooperation among those countries.

The Decision on the CIS Charter is open for signature by those states which are prepared to sign it.

Completed in the city of Minsk on 22 January 1993 in one authentic copy in the Russian language. The authentic copy is lodged in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send an attested copy to the states which have signed the statement.

The Economic Accords/Protocols and Treaties

10.3 Protocol on Economic Relations Published

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 3 January 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[Text published under the rubric "Official Section: Protocol for the Coordination of Measures Being Taken to Preserve Economic Ties in the First Quarter of 1992 Between Enterprises, Associations, and Organizations Located on the Territories of the Commonwealth of Independent States."]

The governments of the Commonwealth's independent states, bearing in mind the need for coordinated actions to create favorable working conditions for enterprises, associations, and organizations located on their territories and the need to implement the interstate agreements on the principles of trade and economic cooperation for 1992, have agreed:

1. In order to prevent the shutdown of production facilities enterprises, associations, and organizations-irrespective of their forms of ownership-which are located on the territories of the Commonwealth's member states and to ensure that the economic relations operating in 1991 are preserved in the first quarter of 1992 and that contracts for delivering raw and other materials, components, and finished products are concluded and met on a scale of not less than 70 percent of the volumes of deliveries in the first quarter of 1991.

2. Before 1 February 1992 enterprises, associations, and organizations are to submit data to the state statistics organs on the volumes and destinations of deliveries under contracts concluded for the first quarter of 1992. Administrative organs of the Commonwealth's member states are to summarize the data submitted for consideration in determining quotas and issuing notices of pairing arrangements for deliveries made under the interstate agreements for 1992.

3. In the period up to 15 January 1992 the administrative organs of the Commonwealth's member states are to furnish suppliers and consumers with plan documents specifying pairing arrangements for the delivery in 1992 of goods according to quotas (attachments No. 1 and No. 2 to the agreements), and in the period up to 15 February 1992 they are to make the necessary adjustments taking account of the concluded contracts for the first quarter of 1992 under established economic ties.

4. Licenses for the export of output above the prescribed quotas are issued only by decision of the states' governments or by organs authorized by them.

The organs regulating deliveries of goods for state needs are to be made responsible for determining the specific suppliers and consumers in accordance with the quotas and for monitoring the conclusion and fulfillment of goods delivery contracts between enterprises.

The sides undertake to inform each other of the license-issuing procedure operating in each state.

5. Economic entities are to be assisted in maintaining and developing reciprocal goods deliveries, including by intersector and intrasector cooperative arrangements, taking account of prevailing production volumes without making additional demands for reciprocal deliveries of other goods.

6. A mutually coordinated procedure for making settlement transactions for licensed goods allowing financial control over their export to be exercised is to be elaborated and approved. Manufacturing enterprises and brokerage organizations make settlement transactions for licensed goods in accordance with the approved procedure.

When output is dispatched without licenses 90 percent of the money received by the supplier from the purchaser is transferred to state budget revenue and 10 percent to the relevant central (national) bank.

7. It is to be agreed that all settlements by the states' enterprises and organizations for reciprocal goods deliveries are made in rubles at free or regulated prices taking account of the states' existing normative acts.

8. Incentives and sanctions are to be applied to enterprises and organizations in order to realize goods deliveries under interstate agreements in accordance with the states' existing legislation. The specific terms of delivery and responsibility for meeting them are stipulated in the contracts concluded by enterprises.

9. It is to be ensured that a coordinated statistical accounting methodology is utilized in the states in order to monitor the progress of the fulfillment of reciprocal deliveries of the output stipulated by interstate agreements.

Questions which arise in the process of reciprocal deliveries are to be periodically reviewed.

10. The organs for managing transport (rail, water, air, road, and other) of the Commonwealth's member states are to ensure that transport resources are allocated in the first quarter of 1992 on presentation of the freight by senders.

11. The leaders of the governments undertake to issue the necessary normative acts ensuring that the commitments ensuing from this protocol are met.

10.4 Trade, Economic Cooperation Accord

TASS, 15 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Agreement on the Regulation of Relations Between the States of the Commonwealth in the Sphere of Trade and Economic Cooperation in 1992

In order to create favorable conditions for the development of trade and economic cooperation between enterprises and organizations located on the territory of the Commonwealth states, the heads of state and heads of government of the Commonwealth states, hereinafter termed the “parties,” have agreed on the following:

Article 1. Trade and economic relations between the states are to be carried out in the framework of the Commonwealth on the basis of mutual advantage, and actions causing economic damage to one another are to be refrained from.

Article 2. The parties use a single monetary unit (the ruble) for reciprocal payments between economic subjects, for credit, and other financial operations within the Commonwealth.

Where individual states of the Commonwealth introduce their own national currency, the procedure for payments will be determined by separate agreements.

Payments between enterprises and organizations of the Commonwealth states are implemented at free market prices. It is possible to set a price ceiling on individual, very important types of products, mutually agreed by the sides, which are supplied within the framework of intergovernmental agreements.

The parties agree to regulate prices on the products of monopoly enterprises on the basis of a special agreement.

Article 3. The sides undertake to ensure unhindered transit across the territory of their states for goods and services being supplied to other states, and to coordinate ceilings for tariffs for the transit of goods.

Article 4. The parties undertake to adopt measures to eliminate double or multiple taxation of income from trade between enterprises of the Commonwealth states.

Article 5. The parties agree not to impose quotas, licenses, or other forms of non-tariff restrictions on supplies of output, with the exception of a list of goods according to a catalogue included in intergovernmental agreements.

Until this list is agreed, quotas and licenses shall be imposed in accordance with the procedure customary in each state.

The parties agree to notify the organizations responsible for implementing the interstate agreements of the quotas for exportation of output to states of the community, in accordance with the volumes fixed by the intergovernmental agreements. The said quotas are the basis for issuing licenses for exportation of output to the relevant states of the Commonwealth. The notifications matching buyers to suppliers and issued by the regulating bodies of the parties within the limits of the fixed quotas are considered as licenses for exportation of output from their territories.

The parties agree, until the adoption of national normative acts regulating the exportation and importation of goods, to ensure unhampered transit across their borders of goods being moved on the basis of matching warrants issued by the authorized bodies of the parties.

Article 6. The parties agree to adopt the necessary normative acts guaranteeing fulfillment of interstate agreements on deliveries of goods, including the conclusion within one month of economic contracts between the parties' enterprises for delivery of output in 1992, in implementation of the said agreements and their implementation.

The parties agree within one week to adopt the necessary normative acts, ensuring in February of the current year the conclusion by the enterprises, associations, and organizations located on the states' territories, of economic contracts for delivery in the year 1992 and their implementation, according to the volumes of deliveries notified by the government bodies in keeping with the intergovernmental agreements. The parties will ensure the acceptance of orders for supply of output by all enterprises, associations, and organizations as per the intergovernmental agreements within the limits of the fixed quotas, and also responsibility for nonconclusion of contracts for the supply of output, in accordance with the volumes indicated, in the form of a fine and forfeits for the non-fulfillment of delivery commitments. The scale of the fine and forfeit is to be agreed within one week.

The parties agree to instruct the enterprises, associations, and organizations located on the parties' territories, when concluding contracts for delivery of output under intergovernmental agreements, not to unilaterally set consumers' additional requirements for reciprocal deliveries of output. By consent of the parties, direct contracts may be permitted with individual regions of the parties as part of agreed volumes of delivery for the year 1992.

Article 7. The parties pledge to take measures in order to maintain and develop coproduction links within and between industries for deliveries of raw and other materials, semi-finished goods, and component items, used in technological conversions, and other output not envisaged by intergovernmental agreements, as a rule at a level of not less than 70 percent of the volume of deliveries in the year 1991.

Article 8. The parties consider it impermissible for enterprises located on the parties' territories to unilaterally make additional demands for reciprocal deliveries of output when concluding contracts for delivery of output in implementation of intergovernmental agreements.

For monitoring the implementation of intergovernmental agreements, for agreeing times of bilateral deliveries, and for examining disputed issues regarding their implementation, the parties are setting up bilateral commissions made up of representatives of the state departments concerned.

Article 9. The parties are organizing records of reciprocal payments and accounts regarding commercial and non-commercial operations on the basis of payment balances, and are endeavoring to make them balance. The parties recognize the right of each of the parties, for purposes of ensuring payments balance, to introduce restrictions with regard to payments and accounts with other parties, and to demand the undertaking of state commitments for clearing the balance of payments.

Article 10. The parties agree not to permit the re-export of goods subject to quotas and licenses without the consent of the authorized body of the state on whose territory the particular goods were produced. In the event of the reexport of such goods, the state on whose territory they were produced is entitled to introduce measures additional to those in intergovernmental agreements to restrict the export of goods to the territory of the state which permitted the re-export, and to demand the full hard currency earnings from the re-export as compensation for the loss.

Article 11. The parties agree that in order to establish a common legal base regulating relations between economic subjects in the various Commonwealth states, to adopt within one month an agreement on common conditions for deliveries of goods between organizations in the Commonwealth states.

Article 12. The parties are to form a Consultative Customs Council, comprising representatives of the parties, to elaborate and implement a joint customs policy, to coordinate cooperation among the customs services, and to record customs statistics, and they instruct the relevant bodies to draw up within one month a statute governing this Council and its membership.

Article 13. The parties agree to conclude agreements within one month on the procedure for settling disputes that arise between enterprises and organizations in the Commonwealth states as they engage in trade and economic cooperation, and to establish within the same period the bodies necessary to consider them.

Article 14. The agreement comes into force from the moment it is signed.

Done in Minsk on 14 February 1992 in one original copy in the Russian language. The original copy is preserved in the archives of the Government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send a certified copy of the agreement to the signatory states.

The agreement has been signed by the representatives of Azerbaijan, Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine.

The representatives of Azerbaijan added the footnote: "From this year, taking account of the world proportions of prices."

The representatives of Turkmenistan added the footnote: "Taking account of the gradual transition over two years to world prices in mutual payments for raw materials and output."

10.5 Foreign Debt Agreement

TASS, 14 March 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Agreement on Additions to the Treaty on Succession Concerning the Foreign State Debt and Assets of the USSR

Confirming their commitment to the fulfillment of their obligations which proceed from the treaty on legal suc-sion concerning the foreign state debt and assets of the USSR adopted on 4 December 1991, the states joined in this treaty have agreed on the following:

Article 1. As the main members of the Interstate Council for monitoring the servicing of the debt and the use of the USSR's assets, the Russian Federation and Ukraine are cochairmen of the Interstate Council. Other members of the Interstate Council appoint a third co-chairman on the basis of rotation.

Article 2. The authorized bank provides full information on its operations to the Interstate Council and its members. The Interstate Council appoints an independent auditor on a competitive basis who is provided with any documentation of the authorized bank which he may need for drawing up a report submitted to the Interstate Council at least once a year.

Article 3. The Foreign Economic Bank retains its rights as authorized bank. The relevant alterations are being made to the Foreign Economic Bank's charter. They are listed in the supplement to the present agreement to lend the authorized bank international status. The Interstate Council, at which the sides are represented with plenipotentiary powers, remains the highest body for the authorized bank. The Interstate Council sets up a standing observer body at the level of experts, to be located in Moscow.

The votes of plenipotentiary representatives on the Interstate Council are distributed in accordance with the proportionate burden borne by the sides in contributions to pay off the state debt of the former USSR. Decisions of the Interstate Council are adopted by no less than 80 percent of the votes of council members taking part in sessions. Sessions of the Interstate Council have valid authority when plenipotentiary representatives with at least 80 percent of the votes are present at them.

Article 4. The powers and functions of the interstate commission to work out criteria and principles in relation to the distribution of all the property of the former USSR abroad are transferred to the Interstate Council and the activity of the commission is terminated.

Article 5. The memorandum on mutual understanding of 28 October 1991 will be open for signing on behalf of the governments of the states joined in the present agreement who have not signed the aforementioned memorandum.

Article 6. The present agreement comes into force from the moment of its signing. It was completed in the city of Moscow on 13 March 1992 in one original copy in Russian. The original copy is being kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send a certified copy of it to the states which have signed this agreement.

The agreement has been signed by representatives of the governments of Armenia, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, and Ukraine.

The following document is appended to the agreement:

The Position of the Republic of Uzbekistan's Delegation

Regarding the Draft Agreement on Additions to the Treaty on Legal Succession in Respect of the USSR's Foreign State Debt and Its Assets

1. The agreement's preamble confirms the adherence of the agreement's participants to fulfillment of the obligations stemming from the 4 December 1991 treaty on legal succession in respect of the USSR's foreign state debt and its assets. Uzbekistan did not sign that treaty in connection with differences over methodology for apportioning the foreign debt (disagreement with the overall figure).
2. The Republic of Uzbekistan is unable to agree with the proposed procedure for the adoption of decisions by the Interstate Council (the decisions are adopted under Article 3 of the agreement by no less than 80 percent of the votes of the council members taking part in a session). Russia with 61.34 percent of the votes has the potential to block any decision.
3. The provisions of this agreement are at variance with the provisions of the joint communique on the results of the interstate consultative conference on questions of creating the necessary conditions for the timely fulfillment of the debt liabilities of the former USSR, which was signed on 25 February 1991 in Kiev. It is envisaged to remove the USSR Foreign Economic Bank from the jurisdiction of the Russian Federation. The present agreement is restricted only in the sense that the co-chairmen will propose the candidature of the bank's deputy chairman on questions of servicing the foreign debt.

Arising from this, we consider it impossible to sign the agreement, and also the protocol on foreign debt and assets and the charter of the Interstate Council.

At the same time, this does not signify a refusal on the part of the Republic of Uzbekistan to take part in clearing off the foreign debt.

Rules of the Interstate Council on Supervising the Servicing of the Debt and Use of the Assets of the USSR

Article 1. The Interstate Council to supervise the servicing of the debt and the use of the assets of the USSR is set up in accordance with the treaty on legal succession with regard to the external state debt and assets of the USSR (hereinafter referred to as the treaty) with the aim of resolving all questions connected with servicing and repaying the USSR's external debt, and also with managing the foreign currency debts owed to the USSR and other assets of the USSR and their sale.

The Interstate Council is created from plenipotentiary representatives of the parties to the treaty. Any party which unilaterally halts debt-servicing payments without the agreement of the other parties which are members of the Interstate Council loses the right to a deciding vote in the Interstate Council and, until it resumes payments and makes up the incurred indebtedness, acquires the status of observer.

The Interstate Council is the supreme body of administration of the USSR Foreign Economic Bank (the authorized bank), which fulfills the functions of an agent of the parties which have signed the treaty, in questions of administering the debt and assets of the former USSR. The Interstate Council, at the level of experts, is creating a standing supervisory body located in Moscow. (A special unit will be set aside at the Foreign Economic Bank which is independent of any state and which is responsible exclusively for the servicing of the foreign debt, with clearly defined powers.)

Article 2. The members of the Interstate Council are appointed by the supreme executive bodies of the sovereign states.

The cochairmen of the Interstate Council are the authorized representatives of the Russian Federation and Ukraine, and a third cochairman is appointed on the basis of rotation from among the authorized representatives of other parties.

Article 3. The parties grant the Interstate Council powers on the following questions, connected with the implementation of the treaty:

- monitoring the fulfillment of commitments regarding the debt of the USSR and the distribution of the assets of the USSR in accordance with the treaty;
- holding an inventory and an appraisal of the debts and assets of the USSR;
- adopting decisions on the operative regulation of the commitments regarding the debt of the USSR and the distribution of assets of the USSR;
- carrying out the reorganization of the USSR Foreign Economic Bank without prejudicing credit agreements which have been concluded;
- implementing the monitoring of the activity of the standing supervisory body;
- attracting independent financial and juridical consultants;
- examining other issues which have been tabled for discussion by the Interstate Council, the initiative of the parties, the supervisory body, or the board of the authorized bank.

Article 4. Votes in the Interstate Council are distributed between its members in proportion to the shares specified for each of the sides under Article 4 of the treaty, and by additional agreements between the sides.

The Interstate Council is empowered to adopt decisions on issues submitted for its consideration, if Interstate Council members representing in total no less than 80 percent of the votes of the sides which signed the treaty are taking part in a sitting.

Decisions of the Interstate Council are adopted by a qualified majority of 80 percent of the votes represented by the Interstate Council members taking part in a sitting. The sides which signed the treaty have the right to participate in the work of the Interstate Council as observers.

Article 5. A working apparatus is being set up to organize the current activity of the Interstate Council. The activity of the Interstate Council and its working apparatus is financed by the parties on a shared basis in proportion to the payments to pay off the external debt.

Article 6. The Interstate Council ceases its activities after the fulfillment of the treaty.

The Rules were signed by representatives of the governments of Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Ukraine.

Protocol on Foreign Debt and Assets

The governments of the Azerbaijan Republic, the Republic of Armenia, the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Georgia, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, the Russian Federation, the Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, the Republic of Uzbekistan, and Ukraine have agreed to the following:

1. To entrust the Interstate Council with supervising the servicing of the USSR's debt and the use of its assets with regard to submitting proposals directed at enhancing the efficiency of the work of the Interstate Council, including the allocation to it of essential funds, the setting up of the working apparatus, and other matters, for consideration by the regular sitting of the Council of Commonwealth Heads of Government.
2. To instruct the Interstate Council to present within one month to the Council of Heads of Government of the Commonwealth information on the existing assets of the former USSR abroad.

Completed in the city of Moscow on 13 March 1992 in a single original copy in Russian. The original copy is being kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send an authorized copy to the states who have signed the said protocol.

10.6 Agreement on the Former USSR's Internal Debt

TASS, 14 March 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Agreement on the Principles and Mechanism for Servicing the Former USSR's Internal Debt

Recognizing the need for continuity in meeting the former USSR's obligations toward citizens, proceeding from the need to provide financial backing for measures aimed at economic recovery and transition to the market, and to pursue coordinated financial, credit, and social policies, the governments of the states participating in this agreement have agreed on the following:

Article 1. For the purposes of the present agreement, the state's internal debt consists of money owed by the former USSR government to the population in respect of deposits still held in savings banks. It also consists of the state loans floated in 1982 and 1990 but not yet repaid, including additional compensation, income, and interest deriving from them. Also included are amounts of compensation for citizens' contributions to long-term insurance contracts and other debts owed to the USSR State Bank, the USSR State Insurance, and the USSR

Savings Bank arising from funds used to finance the expenditure side of the union budget.

Article 2. The parties accept liability for repaying the former USSR's state debt to the public in sums proportional to the residual debt outstanding on 1 January 1991 on balances held with branches of the USSR Savings Bank on the territory of each of the parties.

The remaining part of the debt-that owed to the USSR State Bank, the USSR State Insurance, and other components of the internal debt-will be apportioned among the parties on an integrated scale, based on the respective contribution of each party to produce national income and the utilization of centralized capital investment from the union budget on the territory of each party, as averaged out over 1986-1991.

Article 3. All expenditures involving the servicing of the former USSR's internal debt for the period starting 1 January 1992 are made by the sides at the expense of their state budget.

Article 4. To convert state domestic premium loan bonds issued in 1982 quickly and to convert the former USSR's state treasury obligations regarding the loan issued in 1990 by entering the relevant sums into bank accounts and by exchanging state loan bonds and other forms of attracting the funds of the population of the states party to this agreement;

Not to conduct future prize draws on the USSR state domestic premium bond issued in 1982.

Article 5. The parties' finance ministries are charged with taking appropriate amounts of the former USSR's state debt to the population onto their balances from the USSR State Bank and converting it into the debt of these states in the manner agreed with the central (national) banks. The procedure for the division and mutual settlements of the residual part of the former USSR's state domestic debt is determined by a separate agreement, taking into account the provision emanating from Article 2 of the present agreement.

Article 6. The agreement comes into force from the moment it is signed.

Completed in Moscow on 13 March 1992 in one original copy in Russian. The original copy is kept in the archives of the Republic of Belarus, which will send a certified copy of it to the states which have signed this agreement.

The agreements have been signed by representatives of the governments of Armenia, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine. Moreover, the representatives of Belarus, Moldova, Turkmenistan, and Ukraine have made individual notes.

Appeal of the CIS Heads of Government and the Republic of Georgia on Adopting the 13 March 1992 Agreement on the Principles and Mechanism for Servicing the Former USSR's Internal Debt

Considering the social implications involved in servicing the USSR's internal debt and considering it is essential to safeguard the rights of every citizen of the former USSR, irrespective of the present place of residence within the former USSR's territory, the CIS heads of government and the Republic of Georgia appeal to the heads of former USSR states that have not joined the CIS to accede to the aforementioned 13 March 1992 agreement on the principles and mechanism for dividing and servicing the former USSR's internal debt and to instruct the appropriate bodies to ensure that it is implemented.

The appeal was signed by representatives of the governments of Armenia, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine. Moreover, the representatives of Belarus, Turkmenistan, and Ukraine have made individual notes. Appended to the document are the following proposals by Belarus, to which Ukraine and Moldova have affiliated themselves:

Proposal by the Republic of Belarus on the Agreement on the Principles and Mechanism for Servicing the Former USSR's Internal Debt

Article 2 in the aforementioned agreement envisages that the Commonwealth states accept liability for repaying the former USSR's state debt to the population of their states in sums corresponding to the residual debt outstanding on 1 January 1991 on balances held-with branches of the USSR Savings Bank on the territory of each of the Commonwealth states.

This debt arose as a result of the borrowing of savings bank funds by union bodies. It was distributed unevenly around the union republics.

In light of this, we believe that the agreement on the partition of the internal debt should be signed at the same time as the agreement on the partition of the assets and liabilities of the former USSR State Bank.

10.7 CIS Treaty on the Formation of an Economic

Union

TASS International, 24 September 1993 [Translation by the Council of Advisors to the Parliament of Ukraine]

The states participants of the current treaty, hereinafter referred to as agreeing parties,

- based on the historic closeness of their peoples and realizing the importance of expansion and intensification of versatile and mutually advantageous economic relations;
- respecting the sovereignty of every nation and confirming their commitment to the goals and principles expressed in the constituent documents on the formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States;
- in order to create favorable conditions for the dynamic and harmonious development of the economies and for the implementation of economic reforms aimed at the improvement of the living standards of their peoples;
- realizing the objective necessity of forming and developing a single economic space, based on the free movement of goods, services, labor, and capital, as well as the necessity to strengthen the direct ties between the
- economic subjects of the agreeing parties;
- realizing also the importance of technological interconnections of highly integrated scientific and technical, as well as industrial potentials of the states;
- in order to create favorable conditions for organic integration of their economies into the world economy;
- emphasizing the equality of all the nations of the former USSR and the urgent necessity to resolve the problems connected with the inheritance of the property of the former USSR, in order to secure the development and intensification of economic cooperation;

-based on the generally accepted norms of international law;

have agreed on the formation of an Economic Union.

Chapter 1. Goals and Principles of Economic Union

Article 1. The Economic Union shall be established on the basis of voluntary participation, respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity, equal rights and mutual responsibilities among the agreeing parties for the implementation of the principles of this Treaty.

In their activities within the borders of the Economic Union the agreeing parties shall adhere to international legal principles, including:

-non-interference in the internal affairs of others, respect for human rights and liberties;

-peaceful solution of conflicts and non-use of any kind of economic pressure in interstate relations;

-responsibility for assumed commitments;

-elimination of race or of any other kind of discrimination in relation to any legal entities or individuals of the agreeing parties;

-mutual consultations with the purpose of coordinating positions and in order to take appropriate measures in the event of economic encroachment against any of the agreeing parties, on the part of any state or group of states, which are not the participants of this treaty.

Article 2. The goals of the Economic Union are as follows:

- creation of conditions for stable development of the economies of the agreeing parties with the purpose of improving the living standards of their populations;

- gradual formation of the single economic space on the basis of market relations;
- provision of equal possibilities and guarantees for all economic subjects;
- joint implementation of economic projects, which are of interest to all agreeing parties;
- joint efforts to resolve ecological problems and liquidation of consequences of natural disasters and catastrophes.

Article 3. The Economic Union envisages:

- free movement of goods and services, capital and labor;
- coordination of monetary, credit, budgetary, taxation, foreign economic, customs, currency, and price policies;
- harmonization of the economic legislation of the agreeing parties;
- availability of a common statistical base.

Article 4. The agreeing parties agree that the Economic Union shall be formed through gradual deepening of integration and coordination of actions in the process of implementation of economic reforms, through:

- an international (multilateral) free trade association;
- a single market of goods and services, capital and labor;
- a currency (monetary) union.

Each form of integration shall be realized through a complex of special interconnected measures, which shall be adopted and implemented in accordance with other agreements to this one.

Chapter 2. Trade and Economic Relations

Article 5. In accordance with Article 4 of this treaty, in order to create an international free trade association, the agreeing parties concurred on the following principles:

- a gradual decrease in and final abolition of customs duties, taxes and collections, quantitative and other restrictions and limitations;
- harmonization of customs legislation and mechanisms of tariff and non-tariff regulations;
- simplification of customs procedures;
- unification of statistical customs forms and documentation;
- gradual equalization of tariffs for cargo and passenger transportation, as well as transit tariffs, preserving the principle of free transit;
- prohibition of non-legitimate reexport to third countries.

Article 6. In the process of establishing a customs union, the agreeing parties agreed to abolish tariff and non-tariff regulation of the movement of goods, services, and labor, as well as to:

- establish common tariffs with states which are not participants in this treaty;
- coordinate foreign trade policies with states which are not participants in this treaty.

Article 7. In the process of making the transition to a single market the agreeing parties shall:

- create the necessary legal, economic, and organizational conditions for free movement of capital and labor;
- create conditions for fair competition, including the elaboration of anti-monopoly regulations;
- conduct coordinated policy in the fields of transport and communications, aimed at realizing effective cargo and passenger transportation;
- ensure equal economic conditions for capital investment in the development of the economies, and elaborate effective mechanisms for protection of rights and interests of investors.

Article 8. Trade relations will be based on free market prices, which will be set through the integration of internal markets of the agreeing parties. The agreeing parties pledge not to use discriminatory price policies toward their economic subjects, regardless of nationality.

Article 9. Agreeing parties shall not conduct without coordination any unilateral activities of a non-economic character with the aim of limiting access to their markets.

Chapter 3. Entrepreneurship and Investments

Article 10. Agreeing parties shall ensure legal national regulation of economic activity by residents on the territories of member states of this Treaty.

Article 11. Agreeing parties shall promote the development of direct economic relations between economic subjects, creating favorable conditions for strengthening productive cooperation.

Article 12. Agreeing parties shall promote the creation of joint ventures, transnational corporations, networks of commercial and financial credit institutions and organizations.

Article 13. Agreeing parties shall coordinate their investment policies, including the attraction of foreign investment and credits in branches of mutual interest, and shall conduct joint capital investments, including those made on a barter basis.

Chapter 4. Relations in the Sphere of Money, Credits, Finance, and Currencies

Article 14. Agreeing parties shall coordinate their policy in the sphere of money, credits, currency, and financial regulations.

Article 15. In the functioning of interstate free trade, the agreeing parties shall use in their financial relations:

- a multicurrency system, which shall include national currencies functioning in separate states;
- a system based on the Russian Federation ruble.

The transition to a single currency system for mutual payments will be ensured whenever a currency union has been created. This system should be based on a common (reserve) currency, which shall be the most utilized and stable currency.

Article 16. The creation of a monetary and currency system based on national currencies shall be implemented in stages through the creation of a Payments Union based on the following principles:

- mutual recognition of national currencies and recognition of their quoted values;
- the realization of payments in national currencies with the use of multilateral clearing mechanisms through the Interstate Bank and other payment centers;
- the introduction of a mechanism for coordinating deficits in balance of payments;

- establishing a standard conversion rate for national currencies in current operations;

As the integration process deepens, the Payments Union shall be transformed into a unified currency system which shall stipulate:

- the use of floating exchange rates and the coordination of limits on their standard fluctuations;

- the introduction of a banking mechanism for controlling exchange fluctuation rates;

- the achievement of full currency conversion between national currencies.

Article 17. The agreeing parties will join a unified ruble zone based on the use as legal tender of the Russian ruble in accordance with the undermentioned:

- until the activity of the Interstate Bank commences as the emissions institute of the states using the ruble as a national currency, the authorities of the central (national) banks which make credit and monetary emissions shall be delegated to the Central Bank of the Russian Federation. Central (national) banks of these states commit themselves to coordinate their credit emission with the Russian Federation Central Bank;

- relations between central (national) banks shall be established through a special interbank treaty;

- limitations on the use of rubles in the interstate payments of states which use the Russian ruble shall be removed;

- [a balance of payments deficit between states will not be treated as a mutual debt which is subject to regulation].*

**Note:* Proposal by Ukraine, supported by all experts except those of the Russian Federation.

Article 18. The states of the common ruble zone commit themselves to common principles in the implementation of monetary and credits policies:

- on deposits of jointly owned money on their territories in keeping with anticipated price indices;
- on standards governing obligatory reserve demands on commercial banks acting on the territories of the agreeing parties;
- on the maximum volume of credits to be issued to government and local power organs by the commercial banks of the agreeing parties;
- on the level of the discount rate on loans granted by central (national) banks to commercial banks;
- on the rules of payment between economic subjects, and also between commercial banks, including rules of opening an account by a bank and by a non-resident economic subject from a third country;
- on regulation of commercial banking activities;
- on a regular basis provide each other with the balances of central (national) banks and of the banking system as a whole, as well as with other required information.

These states will apply a coordinated ruble exchange rate to hard currency and to the currency of third countries including participants in the Economic Union who use their own currencies.

Article 19. Agreeing parties which enter into the ruble zone will carry out a coordinated budget policy, which stipulates:

- coordinated limitations on the consolidated budget deficit, as compared with the gross national product;

- methods of financing states' budget deficits;
- conditions, kinds, and magnitude of non-budget fund formation;
- limits on increases in the amount of internal debt on the emission base.

The agreeing parties commit themselves to the implementation of coordinated measures aimed at the consecutive decrease of consolidated budget deficits and nonbudget funds.

Agreeing parties which exceed the coordinated deficit of their consolidated budgets, should, during a stipulated term, take measures for their normalization.

Article 20. The agreeing parties shall implement a harmonization of their taxation systems. They shall unify basic types of taxes, and the legal regulations which govern the procedures of taxation and taxation rates.

The harmonization of the agreeing parties' taxation systems will be implemented through a special treaty on taxation policy within the framework of the Economic Union, and through a unified methodology of cost accounting.

Chapter 5. Social Policy

Article 21. The agreeing parties will provide their citizens with "non-visa" regulations within the territory of the Economic Union.

Article 22. The agreeing parties recognize the need to coordinate their policies in the sphere of labor relations, taking into account statements, conventions, and recommendations of the International Labor Organization; to regulate household incomes on the basis of the condition of the manufacturing and consumer markets; and to maintain the standard of living for the handicapped and low-income families.

Article 23. The agreeing parties will extend mutual recognition to documents of education and worker qualifications without additional confirmation, where conditions and the character of the work permit it.

Article 24. The agreeing parties will not permit discrimination against citizens on the basis of nationality or any other basis in the provision of jobs, payment for labor, determination of work conditions, and extension of social guarantees.

Article 25. The agreeing parties shall coordinate policy in the sphere of labor conditions and labor protection, taking into consideration the generally accepted international rules, developing general requirements for norms and rules of labor protection, state supervision, and inspections of working conditions.

Article 26. The agreeing parties shall agree specially on rules for labor force migration, commitments dealing with social security, pension guarantees, and other issues requiring mutual consent among the states forming the Economic Union.

Chapter 6. Legal Regulation of Economic Relations

Article 27. Economic relations among the agreeing parties and the subjects of their economies shall be regulated by this treaty, bilateral and multilateral agreements, international legal norms, and national legislation. When this treaty's norms and rules are at variance with national legislation, the rules and norms of international law and of this treaty shall prevail.

Article 28. The agreeing parties recognizing the need to standardize the regulation of economic relations, agree to align themselves with the norms contained in this treaty and under international law.

In light of the foregoing, the parties agree:

- to develop model legal statements regulating economic relations;
- to coordinate and closely align national legislation with model projects and international legal norms in order to eliminate contradictions among them;
- to agree on the adoption of national legislation on economic issues;
- to examine normative statements in advance in order to ensure their correspondence with international legal norms, this treaty, and bilateral and multilateral agreements.

Chapter 7. Institutions of the Economic Union

Article 29. In order to sustain the activity of the Economic Union the agreeing parties shall use existing and establish new joint executive and coordination bodies.

Article 30. Procedures for establishing, operating, and financing the institutions of the Economic Union, together with their coordination with other CIS economic bodies, shall be regulated by special agreements.

Chapter 8. Concluding Statements

Article 31. Membership in the Economic Union requires acceptance of the full scale of commitments and the extension of all rights stipulated by this Treaty; it does not prohibit economic ties between states which are not members or with other economic groups and societies, as long as these do not run counter to the interests of the Economic Union.

The agreeing parties bear mutual responsibility for implementing this treaty, and abstain from any steps which would threaten its non-fulfillment.

Article 32. Any state wishing to assume only a portion of the commitments contained in this treaty may receive the status of associate member by consent of the members of the Economic Union. Conditions for joining the Economic Union as an associate are determined by its members.

Article 33. The agreeing parties are committed to discussions of issues connected with the interpretation and implementation of the current treaty through negotiation or through an appeal to the Commonwealth of Independent States Economic Court.

If the Economic Court declares that a member state has not fulfilled one of the commitments imposed by the current treaty, the state shall comply with the judgments of the court.

The agreeing parties shall agree separately on procedures for considering issues connected with the economic relations of the subjects of member states of the Economic Union, as well as on a system of sanctions to be used in cases of non-compliance with the tenets of this treaty.

If it is impossible to settle issues through negotiations or through the Commonwealth of Independent States Economic Court, the agreeing parties agree to discuss them in other international legal bodies in accordance with rights and procedures.

Article 34. No reservations with respect to this treaty shall be permitted.

Article 35. This treaty shall be concluded for ten years, and shall be automatically extended for five years if none of the agreeing parties declares its intention to withdraw from it.

Every agreeing party may declare its secession from this treaty, having informed the other agreeing parties no less than twelve months in advance. Secession procedures are discussed in a special agreement.

Article 36. This treaty shall be ratified by the agreeing parties in accordance with their constitutional procedures.

Any state which recognizes this treaty may join by consent of the treaty members.

This treaty comes into force after the third instrument of ratification has been submitted to the state depositor.

For every state which ratifies this treaty or joins it after the third instrument of ratification has been submitted to the state depositor, the treaty shall come into force on the thirtieth day after the state has submitted its instrument of ratification or a statement on joining the treaty.

The state depositor of this treaty is the Republic of Belarus.

Accomplished in the city of Minsk, 24 September 1993, in a single original copy in the Russian language. The original copy of this treaty shall be kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send a certified true copy to the states which have signed this treaty.

10.8 Russia, Belarus, Kazakhstan Sign Customs Union Agreement

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 28 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The government of the Republic of Belarus and the government of the Russian Federation, on the one hand, and the government of the Republic of Kazakhstan, on the other hand, referred to hereinafter as the "contracting parties," seeking to further develop balanced and mutually advantageous economic relations, expressing the intention to continue to implement the Treaty on the Creation of an Economic Union of 24 September 1993, and desiring to initiate the establishment of a Customs Union between them, have agreed as follows:

Article 1. The contracting parties shall establish a single Customs Union, whose objectives, establishing principles, mechanisms and phases of creation, and operating procedures, as well as the distribution of customs duties, taxes, and fees, and the terms governing the imposition of temporary restrictions and the implementation of customs control, are set forth in the Agreement on a Customs Union Between the Russian Federation and the Republic of Belarus of 6 January 1995.

Article 2. The contracting parties shall assume the full rights and responsibilities arising from the Agreement on a Customs Union Between the Russian Federation and the Republic of Belarus of 6 January 1995, with respect to the objectives, operating principles, and mechanism and phases of creation of the Customs Union, the distribution of customs duties, taxes, and fees, and the terms governing the imposition of temporary restrictions and the implementation of customs control. At the same time, regulation of the foreign economic activity of the Republic of Kazakhstan shall be effected in accordance with the Agreement Between the Government of the Russian Federation and the Government of the Republic of Kazakhstan on a Standardized Procedure for the Regulation of Foreign Economic Activity of 20 January 1995.

Article 3. With a view to implementing this agreement, the contracting parties, on the basis of a separate agreement, shall establish an executive agency of the Customs Union.

Prior to the establishment of an executive agency of the Customs Union, the contracting parties shall abide by the provisions of Agreement Between the Government of the Russian Federation and the Government of the Republic of Belarus of 6 January 1995.

Article 4. The contracting parties have agreed that the Agreement Between the Government of the Russian Federation and the Government of the Republic of Kazakhstan on a Standardized Procedure for the Regulation of Foreign Economic Activity of 20 January 1995, and the Protocol on the Introduction of a Free Trade Regime, without exclusions and limitations, between the Russian Federation and the Republic of Kazakhstan of 20 January 1995, shall constitute inalienable parts of this agreement.

Article 5. This agreement shall not affect the right of any contracting party to adopt, in accordance with international law and its domestic legislation, any measures necessary to safeguard national security, public order, public health and morals, the cultural and historical heritage of their peoples, and rare animals and plants.

Article 6. Disputes and disagreements between the contracting parties with respect to the interpretation and/or application of the provisions of this agreement shall be resolved through consultation.

Article 7. This agreement shall not affect the validity of other international treaties of the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and the Republic of Kazakhstan that do not conflict with this agreement.

Article 8. Each contracting party may cease its participation in the agreement by furnishing official notification in writing to the other contracting parties of its intention to withdraw from the agreement twelve months prior to said withdrawal.

Article 9. This agreement shall be applied provisionally as of the date of signing and shall enter into force on the date of final notification of completion by the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and the Republic of Kazakhstan of internal state procedures required for its entry into force.

10.9 Commonwealth Countries Sign Payment Union Agreement

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 28 January 1995 [FBIS

Translation]

Agreement on the Creation of a Payment Union of the Member States of the Commonwealth of Independent States

The member states of the Commonwealth, referred to hereinafter as the parties, believing the creation of a Payment Union and of an effective payment system to be a necessary condition for the normal functioning of an Economic Union, fostering conditions for the free movement of goods and services, seeking to ensure balanced trade and economic relations, promoting the growth of the economic potential of their national economies on the basis of mutually beneficial cooperative and other economic relations, mindful of the close historical, cultural, and ethnic ties of their peoples, and promoting conditions for the gradual establishment of an optimal system of mutual settlements, have agreed as follows:

Article 1. To create a Payment Union through the voluntary drawing together of the parties for the purpose of ensuring uninterrupted settlements through the use of mutual convertibility of their national currencies and the formation of a payment system on this basis.

The parties view the creation of a Payment Union as a gradual process and shall set about its implementation through the conclusion of bilateral and multilateral agreements.

In the subsequent stage the parties may adopt measures to establish a multilateral system for effecting settlements in a collective currency.

Article 2. The establishment of the Payment Union shall be based on the following principles:

- recognition of national currency sovereignty and the role of the central (national) banks of the parties as emission centers and agencies of cash-credit and currency regulation on the territory of each party;

- the inadmissibility of any restrictions on the territory of each party on the acceptance and use of the national currencies as payment instruments in trade and nontrade transactions set forth in contracts;
- the establishment of state foreign trade and currency regulations that promote the development on the territory of each party of a full-fledged (liquid) currency market for transactions relating to the buying and selling of its national currency for the national currencies of the other parties and for other currencies;
- the ensuring of guaranteed conversion of a national currency into the currencies of the other parties with regard to socially significant payments: remittances of pensions, alimony, state entitlements, disbursements, and compensation payments, including payments to employees to compensate for damages arising from injury, occupational illness, or other loss of health sustained on the job; sums paid on the basis of sentences, rulings, determinations, and resolutions of judicial and investigative agencies; payments relating to the death of citizens; monetary compensation to victims of political repression and members of their families and their heirs; and compensation for expenses incurred by legal, investigative, arbitration, notary, and other law enforcement agencies;
- the granting of permission to authorized commercial banks to effect settlements relating to foreign economic transactions and to extend credits to correspondent banks and other non-residents that are parties to foreign economic transactions;

- the inadmissibility of administrative restrictions with respect to determination of the currency of payment in the concluding of contracts between economic entities of the parties;
- the permitting of non-residents to hold a national currency and to use it to pay for goods and services and to effect payments of a non-trade character within the framework of the parties.

Article 3. The payment system to be established on the basis of the Payment Union shall service settlements relating to: trade turnover in the non-state and entrepreneurial spheres; non-trade transactions; services in the transportation, communications, and other spheres; state, bank, and commercial credits; currency exchange (conversion) transactions; and the buying and selling of currency in cash through the banking systems of the parties.

The participants in the payment system shall be:

- the governments of the parties, with respect to bilateral and multilateral agreements concluded between or among them;
- the central (national) banks that ensure the functioning of the payment system and the narrowing of differences between currency norms and regulations;
- commercial banks authorized by the central (national) banks to process transactions in foreign currencies;
- an Interstate Bank, which shall constitute a specialized institution of the Payment Union and shall effect settlements between the central (national) and other banks of the parties, and perform other functions in the interests of the Payment Union;

· economic entities-legal entities, entrepreneurs operating without the formation of legal entities, and physical persons-that are residents of the parties, with respect to the performance of non-trade transactions.

Article 4. The participants in the payment system may, at their discretion, use the national currencies of the parties or other currencies as the currency of payment.

International settlements shall be effected through correspondent accounts in the central (national) and authorized commercial and other banks.

The participants in the payment system may freely place funds in the national currency of another party on the latter's domestic money market in the procedure established by the legislation of that party.

The parties shall use a standardized currency exchange rate for all types of foreign economic transactions.

The participants in the payment system shall use an exchange rate determined by supply and demand on the parties' currency markets.

The parties shall seek to take coordinated steps to maintain the stability of the exchange rates of their national currencies.

With a view to regulating the exchange rates, the central (national) banks shall create and utilize stabilization funds in freely convertible currencies and precious metals.

The parties shall ensure access to their domestic currency markets for non-resident banks, as well as for the Interstate Bank, in accordance with their national legislation.

The exchange of the parties' national currencies by physical persons shall be effected by commercial banks and other banking institutions at the exchange rate in effect on the currency market.

The parties shall seek to liberalize regulations governing the exchange of balances in the accounts of non-residents in their national currencies for the national currencies of the other parties.

The central (national) banks shall not be responsible for the performance of obligations incurred by the parties' commercial banks.

Article 5. With a view to promoting multilateral cooperation in the sphere of currency-payment and credit relations, narrowing differences between currency regulations relating to the multilateral settlement-credit relations of the Parties and improving such regulations, and developing forms and methods of coordinating cash-credit and currency policies, the Parties shall create an Interstate Currency Committee.

Article 6. In order to provide information and technical support for the payment system, the Interstate Bank and associations of commercial banks shall establish data banks. When necessary, a specialized international organization to provide information services for the payment system shall be created in the form of a closed-type joint-stock company, a controlling bloc of shares in which shall be held by the central (national) banks, with the remaining shares to be distributed among commercial banks.

Article 7. The parties shall cooperate and take concerted actions in currency control matters on both a multilateral and bilateral basis, in connection with which they shall direct their respective executive bodies to conclude the necessary agreements.

Article 8. The parties shall take measures to foster favorable credit-banking and currency-financial conditions for the establishment and development of the operation of transnational financial-industrial and banking groups and the broadening of international production specialization and cooperative production, scientific-technical and investment cooperation, and reciprocal trade turnover.

The parties shall direct the Interstate Bank to facilitate the provision of credits and financing for interstate projects, in conjunction with the commercial banks of the parties and international credit-financial organizations.

Article 9. The parties shall intensify reciprocal contacts in order to solve the non-payments problem, as well as to reduce the volume of barter deals, by taking measures to introduce interest-bearing notes in international economic turnover, as well as a multilateral clearing mechanism through the Interstate Bank and other specialized institutions.

Article 10. Any disputes or disagreements between the parties regarding the interpretation and/or application of the provisions of this agreement, as well as other disputes relating to the rights and responsibilities of the parties under this agreement or in connection with it, shall be resolved in the following procedure:

- through direct consultations between the parties concerned;
- within the framework of a special reconciliation procedure involving the creation of working groups to study the dispute and to issue recommendations;
- on the basis of other procedures established by international law.

A shift to a subsequent procedure shall be made possible by the mutual consent of the parties between which the dispute or disagreement arose, or at the request of one of the parties, provided efforts to reach agreement have been unsuccessful for a period of six months from the date of commencement of the procedure.

Article 11. This agreement may be altered or amended by the mutual consent of the Parties.

No qualifications with respect to this agreement shall be permitted.

Article 12. This agreement shall be open for accession to any member state of the Commonwealth of Independent States that recognizes the provisions of this agreement in effect at the time of accession and that expresses a readiness to abide by the agreement in its entirety.

Accession shall be effected on the terms and in the procedure set forth in a separate agreement with the acceding state; said agreement shall be reconciled with the parties in advance and shall be subject to their approval in accordance with their internal state procedures.

Article 13. Each Party shall have the right to freely withdraw from the agreement by providing written notification to the depositary at least six months prior to withdrawal. The depositary shall inform all the parties of said withdrawal within 30 days. In the event of a breach by any party of the provisions of this agreement that causes substantial damage to the achievement of its objectives, the other parties shall be empowered to adopt a decision to suspend the agreement or individual provisions of it with respect to that party or to adopt a decision to expel that party from the agreement participants.

In order to settle potential disputes and claims, including property-related disputes and claims, the provisions of this agreement shall remain in force with respect to a party that has ceased its participation until such time as all claims have been settled in full.

Article 14. This agreement shall enter into force as of the date of placement with the depositary of a third notification that the parties that have signed it have completed all the internal state procedures required for its entry into force.

The depositary of this agreement shall be the Republic of Belarus.

Executed in the city of Moscow on 21 October 1994, in one original copy in the Russian language. The original copy shall be placed in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which shall provide a notarized copy to each state that has signed the Agreement.

10.10 Commonwealth States Sign Agreement on Aid to Refugees

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 28 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Agreement on Aid to Refugees and Forced Resettlers

The states signatories to this agreement, henceforth referred to as the parties, on the basis of commonly accepted principles of international law and humanitarianism, confirming their obligations in accordance with international agreements aimed at the protection of human rights, taking into consideration the critical situation that has formed in connection with the rise in the number of resettlers and refugees on the territory of the former USSR, recognizing their responsibility for the fate of people experiencing hardships and deprivations, and recognizing the need to extend aid to the refugees and forced resettlers, have agreed as follows:

Article 1. For the purposes of this agreement a refugee is recognized as an individual who is not a national of the party granting asylum, who was forced to abandon the place of his permanent residence on the territory of another party as a result of violence or persecution in various forms against himself or members of his family, or because of a real threat of persecution because of his racial or national origin, religious faith, language, political convictions, or affiliation with a certain social group in connection with armed and international conflicts.

An individual who has committed an offense against peace or humanity or some other premeditated criminal act cannot be recognized as a refugee.

Article 2. For the purpose of this agreement an individual who, being a national of the party which granted asylum, was forced to abandon the place of his permanent residence on the territory of another party as a result of violence or persecution in various forms against himself or members of his family, or because of a real threat of persecution because of his racial or national origin, religious faith, language, political convictions, or affiliation with a certain social group in connection with armed and international conflicts is recognized as a forced resettler.

Article 3. The status of refugee or forced resettler is determined in accordance with this agreement, generally recognized norms of international law, and the legislation of the party which granted asylum and is confirmed by the issuance of appropriate documentation.

Article 4. The state of departure, with the cooperation of interested parties:

- Carries out evacuation of the population from zones of armed and interethnic conflict, granting the opportunity for its unhindered and voluntary movement to the territory of one of the parties on the basis of the provisions of Article 1 and Article 2 of this agreement;

- Ensures the personal and property security of evacuees, striving for a cease-fire of public order during such evacuation;
- Matters concerning financial, material-technical, food supply, medical, and transportation support of evacuees will be resolved among the interested parties.

Article 5. The parties providing asylum assume the following obligations:

- To ensure the availability of necessary social and household services for refugees and forced resettlers in the areas of their temporary deployment;
- To assist refugees and forced resettlers with job placement in accordance with legislation adopted by each of the parties on employment.

Article 6. The parties assume the following obligations:

- To assist refugees and forced resettlers with their demands and the acquisition of documents necessary for resolution of questions connected with citizenship;
- To assist refugees and forced resettlers with the acquisition of certificates of marriage, birth, labor books, and other documents at their place of former residence that are needed to resolve issues connected with pensions, confirmation of work background, travel abroad, etc.;
- To assist with acquisition of certificates on relatives living on the territory of the state abandoned by the refugee or forced resettler, as well as on his property left there.

Article 7. The state of departure reimburses refugees and forced resettlers the value of housing and other property left or lost by them on its territory, and compensates for damage to health and loss of earnings. The amount of material compensation is determined on the basis of evaluation by the state of departure.

The order of accounting for lost personal and real property belonging to refugees and forced resettlers and determination of material damage and payments of compensation is determined jointly with the interested parties.

Article 8. The parties will create an Interstate Fund for Aid to Refugees and Forced Resettlers.

The conditions, order of formation, and utilization of fund assets will be determined by statute, which will become an intrinsic party of this agreement.

Article 9. The Consultative Council for Labor, Migration, and Social Protection of the Population of the Commonwealth of Independent States will provide practical assistance with realization of the provisions included in this agreement.

Article 10. Every refugee or forced resettler has the right to appeal to courts on the territories of the parties.

Article 11. The parties shall take measures to ensure their participation in international agreements on problems of refugees and forced resettlers.

The parties shall bring national legislation into accord with international legal norms in that sphere.

Article 12. This agreement is subject to ratification.

The agreement goes into effect after deposit of the third instrument of ratification with the depository. In the case of parties that ratify it later, it goes into effect on the date they deposit their instruments of ratification.

Article 13. Any one of the parties may denounce this agreement by means of written notification submitted to the depository. The agreement terminates for that party six months after the day of receipt of such notification by the depository.

Article 14. With the consent of all parties this agreement is open to other states sharing its goals and principles, which may join it by submitting documents on such affiliation to the depository. Affiliation is considered to be effective on the day the depository receives notification concerning agreement to such affiliation.

Done in the city of Moscow in one original copy in the Russian language. The original copy is kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which shall forward a certified copy of it to the states that are signatories to this agreement.

The agreement has been signed by the heads of state of Azerbaijan, Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan.

The Military Accords

10.11 Agreement on the Powers of the Highest Bodies of the Commonwealth of Independent States on Questions of Defense

30 December 1991 Translated by David Ridler

The member states of the Commonwealth, hereafter referred to as “the member states,”

-guided by the principle of the provisional agreement on a Council of Heads of State and a Council of Heads of Government of the Commonwealth of Independent States of 30 December 1991,

- recognizing the need to ensure the security of each member state,
- taking into consideration their interest in coordinating the activity of the member states of the Commonwealth in solving questions of strengthening defense capability,
- proceeding from the understanding that the Joint Armed Forces include the strategic forces and the armed forces of the member states of the Commonwealth-on the decisions of these states-as well as special purpose forces (apart from the armed forces of states who are not part of the Joint Armed Forces), have agreed to the following:

Article 1. The Council of Heads of State is the highest body of the Commonwealth on questions of defense.

The Council of Heads of Government carries out the coordination of the military-economic activity of the Commonwealth.

Article 2. The Council of Heads of State:

- works out and implements the military policy of the Commonwealth;

- determines the concept of collective defense and the basic directions of military construction;
- adopts the military doctrine and nuclear strategy of the Commonwealth;
- establishes the procedures for adopting decisions for the use of nuclear weapons and the system of measures for excluding unsanctioned use, and also the procedure for carrying out the unified control of nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction;
- determines by referral to the heads of government of the Commonwealth the volume of allocations and materialtechnical resources for defense and the upkeep of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth;
- establishes the composition and structure of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth, creates the Main Command of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth, and determines its powers;
- establishes the procedure for the performance of military service in the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth;
- reviews the plan for the development of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth, the mobilization plan of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth, and the plan for their adaptation in wartime;
- appoints on recommendation to the Council of Ministers of Defense, which in the future will be the Council of the Ministers of Defense, a commander-in-chief, chief of the General Staff, and deputy commanders-in-chief of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth, and also a commander of the Strategic Forces;

- confers the rank of Army General and its equivalent;

- adopts decisions:

  - on the introduction of martial law throughout the territory of the Commonwealth in the event of aggression or the threat of aggression against the Commonwealth, against several of its member states or one of them, on a declaration of war, on the conduct of military operations, on the lifting of martial law, on the cessation of the state of war and on the conclusion of a peace treaty;

  - on the procedure for bringing into force normative acts in wartime and of the termination of their validity;

  - on the use of contingents of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth through the necessity to fulfill international treaties and obligations;

  - and other decisions on the more important questions of defense.

The decisions of the Council of Heads of State are taken on the basis of a consensus.

Article 3. The Council of Heads of Government:

- submits to the Council of Heads of State the draft unified defense budget of the Commonwealth;

- works out, together with the High Command of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth, an agreed program for developing armaments and military hardware for the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth for an appropriate period, the finances for this program within the limits of allocations for defense and the upkeep of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth, and the priorities in meeting orders for military goods;

- establishes the procedure for adopting armaments, military hardware, and other military property for the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth and the procedure for their material and technical provisioning;

- determines the procedure for conducting scientific research and developmental work in the defense field, and ensures via the appropriate bodies of the independent states that the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth are equipped with armaments, military hardware, and other material requirements and that the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth are provided with essential services;

- agrees on the annual contingent of citizens who are liable for conscription for military service in the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth and the annual number of forces-trained specialists liable for training or retraining;

- draws up mobilization plans for the national economy and plans for accumulating material resources for the mobilization reserve;

- establishes tasks for preparing and handing over to the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth means of transport and communications and other material and technical facilities when mobilization is declared as well as other mobilization tasks in war time;

- takes decisions on the creation, development, and procedure for the use of defense facilities and lines of communication between the communications and transport networks on the territory of member states in the interests of collective defense, and the system of management within the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth;

-takes decisions regarding social and legal guarantees and financial, material, housing, domestic, and pension provisions for servicemen of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth, people released from military service and their families, and the families of servicemen who have been killed (or died) in carrying out the obligations of their service.

Article 4. A Council of Defense Ministers from the member states is formed to coordinate military construction. A High Command of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth is created to carry out decisions taken by the highest bodies of the Commonwealth on defense matters. The provisions on the Council of Ministers of Defense and on the High Command of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth are endorsed by the Council of Heads of State.

Article 5. This agreement comes into force on signing and applies to the states-signatory to it. Done in the City of Kiev on 20 March 1992, in one original copy in the Russian language. The original copy is to be kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send the certified copies to the states-signatory to this agreement.

This agreement is signed by representatives of Armenia, Belarus (with the addition of the words: “with transitional period for the Republic of Belarus-years”), Kazakhstan (with the addition of the words: “It is necessary that measures are taken for creating an effective technical measure for controlling and blocking the use of nuclear missile systems within the shortest possible time”), Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan.

10.12 CIS Agreement on Guarding of Borders

30 December 1991 Translated by David Ridler

Agreement:

On the guarding of the state borders and maritime economic zones of the member states of the Commonwealth of Independent States,

-the states that are party to this agreement, henceforth called “the Commonwealth member states,” in accordance with the agreement of the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States on armed forces and border troops of 30 December 1991,

-proceeding from the need to implement mutually acceptable decisions in the interests of guarding the state borders and maritime economic zones of the Commonwealth member states, and taking into account the system and the principles for ensuring inviolability of those borders which have come into being, have agreed the following:

Article 1. In this agreement, the terms below mean:

1. "State borders of the member states of the Commonwealth of Independent States"-the sections of the state borders of independent Commonwealth member states with states that are not in the Commonwealth.
2. "Border troops"-formations of border troops of the Commonwealth and of states' own border troops.
3. "Own border troops"-formations of border troops belonging to a Commonwealth member state.
4. "Commonwealth border troops"-formation of border troops which are not own border troops.

Article 2. The guarding of the state borders and maritime economic zones of the Commonwealth member states is implemented by Commonwealth border troops or by states' own border troops.

Article 3. With the aim of ensuring their security, the Commonwealth member states pledge not to undertake actions on state borders and in maritime economic zones that are to the detriment of the political, economic, or other interests of other Commonwealth member states. The establishment of state borders and changes to their system of operation are implemented by mutual accord with neighboring states and with regard for the interests of the Commonwealth member states.

Article 4. The Council of Heads of State is the supreme coordinating body of the Commonwealth of Independent States in the sphere of guarding of state borders and maritime economic zones of the Commonwealth member states. The Council of Heads of Government carries out the coordination of measures to ensure the guarding of state borders and maritime economic zones.

Implementation of decisions of the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government on matters of the guarding of state borders and of maritime economic zones of the Commonwealth member states is effected by the joint command of border troops, which coordinates the activities of border troops.

The regulations on the joint command are confirmed by the Council of Heads of State.

The leadership of the Commonwealth border troops is provided by a commander-in-chief for border troops appointed by the Council of Heads of State.

Article 5. Prior to conclusion by Commonwealth member states of interstate agreements on borders and maritime economic zones and their system of operation, the organization and activities of border troops are regulated by the Acts of the Commonwealth, national legislation of states, and law-making Acts of the former USSR that do not contradict the latter.

Matters of manning, finance, and material-technical supply for Commonwealth border troops and of the social and legal status of those serving in them are regulated by special agreements of the Commonwealth member states.

Article 6. This agreement is open for states which are not member states of the Commonwealth of Independent States to subscribe to it.

Done in the City of Kiev on 20 March 1992 in one original document in the Russian language. The original document is kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send a certified copy to the states that have signed this agreement.

Article 1 (Ukraine's wording). The states' borders of the Commonwealth member states are of identical status for the whole of their length, then as given.

Article 4 (Azerbaijan's and Ukraine's wording). The implementation of decisions of the Council of Heads of State and Council of Heads of Government on matters of the guarding of the state border and of maritime economic zones is effected by the competent bodies of the Commonwealth member states.

Collaboration by the Commonwealth border troops and Commonwealth member states' own border troops is implemented on the basis of separate agreements.

The agreement was signed by representatives of Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan.

The representative of Moldova made a note: "Issues of the guarding of the state borders of the republic of Moldova are resolved on the basis of bilateral agreements with the main command of the CIS border troops."

Article I (in Ukraine's wording) and Article 4 (in the wording of Azerbaijan and Ukraine) quoted above were signed by the representative of Ukraine.

10.13 CIS Agreement on Strategic Forces

30 December 1991 Translated by David Ridler

The Agreement on Strategic Forces was concluded between the eleven members of the Commonwealth of Independent States on 30 December 1991.

Preamble

Guided by the necessity for coordinated and organized solutions to issues in the sphere of the control of the strategic forces and the single control over nuclear weapons, the Republic of Armenia, the Republic of Azerbaijan, the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, the Russian Federation, the Republic of Tajikistan, the Republic of Turkmenistan, the Republic of Ukraine, and the Republic of Uzbekistan, subsequently referred to as "the member states of the Commonwealth," have agreed on the following:

Article 1. The term "strategic forces" means: groupings, formations, units, institutions, the military training institutes for the strategic missile troops, for the air forces, for the navy, and for the air defenses; the directorates of the Space Command and of the airborne troops, and of strategic and operational intelligence, and the nuclear technical units and also the forces, equipment, and other military facilities designed for the control and maintenance of the strategic forces of the former USSR (the schedule is to be determined for each state participating in the Commonwealth in a separate protocol).

Article 2. The member states of the Commonwealth undertake to observe the international treaties of the former USSR, to pursue a coordinated policy in the area of international security, disarmament, and arms control, and to participate in the preparation and implementation of programs for reduction in arms and armed forces. The member states of the Commonwealth are immediately entering into negotiations with one another and also with other states which were formerly part of the USSR, but which have not joined the Commonwealth, with the aim of ensuring guarantees and developing mechanisms for implementing the aforementioned treaties.

Article 3. The member states of the Commonwealth recognize the need for joint command of strategic forces and for maintaining unified control of nuclear weapons, and other types of weapons of mass destruction, of the armed forces of the former USSR.

Article 4. Until the complete elimination of nuclear weapons, the decision on the need for their use is taken by the president of the Russian Federation in agreement with the heads of the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, and the Republic of Ukraine, and in consultation with the heads of the other member states of the Commonwealth.

Until their destruction in full, nuclear weapons located on the territory of the Republic of Ukraine shall be under the control of the Combined Strategic Forces Command with the aim that they not be used and be dismantled by the end of 1994, including tactical nuclear weapons by 1 July 1992.

The process of destruction of nuclear weapons located on the territory of the Republic of Belarus and the Republic of Ukraine shall take place with the participation of the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and the Republic of Ukraine under the joint command of the Commonwealth states.

Article 5. The status of strategic forces and the procedure for service in them shall be defined in a special agreement.

Article 6. This agreement shall enter into force from the moment of its signing and shall be terminated by decision of the signatory states or the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth.

This agreement shall cease to apply to a signatory state from whose territory strategic forces or nuclear weapons are withdrawn.

10.14 CIS Agreement on the Status of the Border Troops

TASS, 30 January 1991 [FBIS Translation]

The member states of the Commonwealth, fulfilling the agreement of the heads of the CIS member states on armed forces and border troops of 30 December 1991, have agreed on the following:

Article 1. The protection of the states' borders and the maritime economic zones of the member states of the Commonwealth is carried out by the border troops of the Commonwealth or by the states' own border troops.

Until new normative documents regulating the activity of the border troops are adopted, they are guided by the documents of the Commonwealth, by the national legislation of the states, and by normative documents of the former USSR that do not contravene it.

The border troops of the Commonwealth are not involved in the fulfillment of other tasks, with the exception of the elimination of the consequences of natural calamities, accidents, and disasters.

Article 2. The border troops of the Commonwealth are formed from personnel on the basis of the principles defined by a separate agreement.

Article 3. The participating states in the present agreement recognize the necessity for the existing system for training and raising the qualifications of cadres for the border troops of the Commonwealth to be used and developed.

The training of cadres is carried out to orders from the commander-in-chief of the border troops and commanders of the states' own border troops.

Article 4. The social and legal guarantees of servicemen in the border troops of the Commonwealth, of individuals discharged from military service, and of members of their families is regulated by the 14 February 1992 agreement between the CIS member states on the social and legal guarantees of servicemen, individuals discharged from military service, and members of their families, and by the national legislation of the member states of the Commonwealth.

Article 5. Controlling bodies of Commonwealth border troops undertake their activities in conjunction with appropriate state bodies, enterprises, and organizations of the Commonwealth member states.

Commonwealth border troops conclude contracts with enterprises and organizations of the Commonwealth member states to carry out work for developing and modernizing weaponry and military equipment and for other matters concerned with facilitating the activities of the Commonwealth border troops. Commonwealth member states assist in the conclusion of such contracts.

Movements of formations and units of Commonwealth border troops, and other actions undertaken outside their permanent (base) areas, are carried out in accordance with decisions of the Border Troops Joint Command by arrangement with the government of the states where they are located or with bodies empowered by that government.

Article 6. The member states of this agreement, in the interests of protecting the state borders and maritime economic zones, provide for the military formations of the border troops of the Commonwealth the land, air, and sea space and internal navigation routes necessary for this movement and assist in the movement of these formations.

The provision of air flights and of navigational and hydrographical supplies for ships of the Commonwealth's border troops, as well as the use of mooring and port facilities, airfields and airports, railways and roads and their construction on the territory of the member states of the Commonwealth, connected with the protection of the borders and maritime economic zones, is carried out gratis.

The member states of this agreement provide the border troops of the Commonwealth with plots of land for the siting of engineering and technical buildings and monitoring facilities along the border, for use without time limit free of charge.

The construction of new roads, bridges, buildings, and other facilities in the interests of protecting the borders on the territory of the member states of the Commonwealth is carried out with the consent of the competent bodies.

Article 7. The member states of this agreement take a proportional part in financing the border troops of the Commonwealth and providing them with material and technical supplies. The volume of expenditure for these purposes and the procedure for their financing is determined by separate agreements.

Article 8. The states participating in this agreement retain for the Commonwealth border troops the land which they had before this agreement was signed and also provide them with electric power and communal and other services. The procedure and conditions of use of the land plots that had been allocated (with the exception of cases provided for by Article 6 of this agreement) and of the provision for the Commonwealth border troops of all manner of services are determined in accordance with the laws of the host state and agreements on the mechanism of the activities of the Commonwealth border troops on the territories of the Commonwealth states.

The movable property of the Commonwealth border troops is in their ownership and use. The procedure of what can be done with it is determined by the Council of CIS Heads of Government.

The motor transport resources of the Commonwealth border troops have registration numbers and distinguishing marks. The registration numbers and marks are established in agreement with the High Command of the Commonwealth Joint Armed Forces.

Article 9. In cases where laws have been violated by persons who are members of the Commonwealth border troops or members of their families, the laws in force on the territory of the Commonwealth member state where these violations of the law occurred will apply.

Article 10. The Commonwealth border troops have a border flag, naval and air border flags, and identification symbols, the description of which and the procedure for the use of which are approved by the Council of Heads of Government.

Article 11. The Commonwealth border troops servicemen wear the prescribed military uniforms and are allowed to keep and carry standard issue firearms in accordance with the established procedure.

Article 12. The procedure for the stay and the status of the Commonwealth border troops on the territories of states which are setting up border troops of their own and which are not members of the Commonwealth are determined by separate agreements.

Article 13. Each state signatory to this agreement has the right to withdraw from this agreement. A state intending to withdraw from the agreement notifies the depository state and all other participant states in writing about its decision to do so. Such notification is given not less than six months in advance of the proposed date of withdrawal from this agreement. The border troops of the states which are not members of the Commonwealth could be incorporated in the Commonwealth border troops on the basis of a special agreement.

Article 14. The present agreement comes into force from the moment of its signing. Done in the city of Kiev on 20 March 1992 in one original copy in the Russian language. The original copy is to be kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send the certified copies to the participant states-signatories to the agreement.

This agreement is signed by representatives of Armenia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, and Tajikistan.

10.15 Strategic Forces' Status Agreed

TASS, 15 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[”Agreement Among the Member States of the Commonwealth of Independent States on the Status of the Strategic Forces.”]

The Republic of Azerbaijan, Republic of Armenia, Republic of Belarus, Republic of Kazakhstan, Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, the Republic of Uzbekistan, and Ukraine, hereinafter referred to as the “Commonwealth member states,” guided by the agreement on the strategic forces among the member states of the Commonwealth of Independent States,

-taking into account the role of the Commonwealth’s strategic forces in ensuring the security of the Commonwealth member states,

-confirming their commitment to the principles and norms of international law,

Have agreed to the following:

Article 1. For the purposes of the present agreement, the following terms mean:

1. “Strategic Forces”-military formations and installations which are under united command, the list of which is determined by each state in agreement with the command of the strategic forces and is confirmed by the Council of Heads of State.

2. “Military Formations and Installations”-military units, establishments, military training establishments, enterprises, organizations, military representations, air bases, test sites, command points, and other installations of the strategic forces.
3. “Host State”-a state which is a member of the Commonwealth on whose territory strategic forces are deployed.
4. Place of Deployment (Basing)-the territory allocated for use by the strategic forces.
5. Immovable Property of the Strategic Forces-the military settlements, airfields, naval bases, ports, access rail tracks, structures at combat positions, training areas, firing ranges, fixed site command and control facilities, communications equipment, residential buildings, and other structures in use by the strategic forces and guaranteeing their ability to function, which are located on the areas of land granted to them for temporary use.
6. Movable Property of the Strategic Forces-all forms of weaponry, ammunition, and military equipment, including the necessary means of transport and other material and technical resources in use by the strategic forces.
7. Persons Belonging to the Strategic Forces-servicemen and civilians performing service or working in formations of the strategic forces.
8. Members of the Families of Persons Belonging to the Strategic Forces-spouses, children, and other dependent relatives.

Article 2. General Provisions

1. Any state which is a member of the Commonwealth may be a party to the present agreement regardless of whether military formations and installations of the strategic forces are deployed on its territory.
2. The purpose of the strategic forces is to ensure the security of all states which are party to the agreement and they are maintained at the expense of fixed payments from these states. (The property of the strategic forces is the joint property of all the states which are party to the agreement-Armenia dissenting.)
3. Each of the Commonwealth member states gives its consent to the permanent or temporary deployment and functioning of military formations and installations of the strategic forces in their places of deployment (bases), in which they were deployed and were functioning at the moment of the signing of the present agreement. Alterations to the places of deployment are implemented by agreement between the parties to the present agreement.
4. The deployment of military units and facilities of the strategic forces on the territory of a Commonwealth member state in no way affects the sovereignty of that state. The strategic forces do not interfere in the internal affairs of the host state.

Military units and facilities of the strategic forces on the territory of a Commonwealth member state and persons belonging to them are obliged to respect and observe the laws of that state.

5. The Commonwealth member states do not commit actions obstructing the strategic forces in the fulfillment of their functions, unless they contradict the legislation of a sovereign state.

Article 3. Acquisition of Manpower by the Strategic Forces

The strategic forces acquire their manpower on the basis of the principles defined in a separate agreement.

Article 4. Command of Strategic Forces

1. The strategic forces function as an independent strategic grouping.
2. Command of the Commonwealth strategic forces is exercised by the commander of strategic forces, subordinated to the Council of Heads of State and the commander-in-chief of the Joint Armed Forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States.
3. The Strategic Forces Command
  - draws up plans for the combat application of the groupings, formations, and units of strategic forces;
  - organizes combat duty (operational service) (boevoe dezhurstvo [boevaya sluzhba]), plans and carries out other measures to maintain the strategic forces in the requisite state of combat readiness;
  - exercises direct operational control of groupings, formations, and units of strategic forces; organizes and carries out measures to maintain the safety of the civilian population and measures to protect the environment;
  - carries out the functions prescribed to it in the general system of measures to prevent unauthorized actions involving nuclear weapons;

- places orders with scientific and industrial organizations of the member states of the Commonwealth on a contractual basis for the development and supply to the strategic forces of armaments and combat hardware in line with approved armaments programs, and finances the works that are carried out within the limits of the budget allocations earmarked for these purposes;
- and carries out measures to observe international treaties on nuclear weapons and other forms of weapons of mass destruction.

4. A decision on the need to use nuclear weapons is taken under the procedure laid down in Article 4 of the Agreement on Strategic Forces between the member states of the Commonwealth of Independent States of 30 December 1991.

Article 5. Legal Position of Persons Who Are Members of the Strategic Forces and the Members of Their Families

The legal position of persons who are members of the strategic forces and the members of their families is regulated by the agreement between the member states of the Commonwealth of Independent States on Social and Legal Guarantees for servicemen, persons discharged from military service, and members of their families.

Article 6. Relations Between the Strategic Forces and the State Bodies, Enterprises, and Organizations of the Commonwealth Member States

1. Military command bodies of the Commonwealth's strategic forces carry out their activity in cooperation with the state bodies, enterprises, and organizations of the Commonwealth member states.

2. The Commonwealth's strategic forces conclude contracts with enterprises and organizations of the Commonwealth member states to carry out work to create, modernize, and destroy weapons and military equipment and work on other matters of providing back-up for the activity of the strategic forces. The Commonwealth member states assist in concluding such contracts.

3. Movements by units of the strategic forces, exercises, maneuvers, and other activities organized for the operational and combat training of the strategic forces outside the confines of their places of permanent deployment (base) are conducted in accordance with plans agreed with the body authorized by the government of the Commonwealth member state on whose territory it is intended to conduct those activities, or with the consent in each case of that government or of the body authorized by it.

The Commonwealth member states grant the military units and facilities of the strategic forces the necessary transportation facilities and land, air, and sea space for their movement, in accordance with the above plans.

4. The construction of new roads, bridges, buildings, and permanent radio and radio-electronic structures with defined frequencies and capacity in the places of deployment of the strategic forces and the construction of other immovable facilities of the strategic forces is carried out with the consent of the responsible bodies of the Commonwealth member state on whose territory it is proposed to construct the new facilities.

5. When areas of land in use by the strategic forces are left, they revert to the host state. The subject of immovable facilities built there with the funds of the strategic forces is settled in accordance with the legislation of the host state or with a relevant agreement.

Article 7. Financing the Strategic Forces and Providing

Them With Material and Technical Back-Up

1. The Commonwealth member states participate proportionately in financing the strategic forces and in fulfilling international obligations to reduce and destroy them. The volumes of expenditures on the above aims and the financing procedure are determined by a separate agreement.
2. The procedure for providing material and technical back-up for the strategic forces and payments in the currency of the host state is determined by the Council of Heads of Government of the members of the Commonwealth.

Article 8. Property of the Strategic Forces

1. The host states reserve to the strategic forces the immovable property which they had at the time of the signing of the present agreement; they provide them with electricity and communal and other services. The procedure and conditions under which the strategic forces use the areas of land allocated to them and also for providing the strategic forces with all types of services are determined in accordance with the legislation of the host state.
2. The movable property of the strategic forces is at their disposal and for their use. The procedure for dealing with it is determined by the Council of Heads of Government of the Commonwealth.

The Commonwealth member states undertake not to hinder the transfer of movable property of the strategic forces outside the state by agreement with the host party.
3. The road transportation vehicles of the military formations of the strategic forces have registration numbers and distinguishing signs. Unified registration numbers and signs are established by the main command of the Commonwealth's unified armed forces.

Article 9. Matters of Jurisdiction

In cases of crimes and misdemeanors committed by persons belonging to the strategic forces or by members of their families, the legislation in force on the territory of the Commonwealth member state where the crimes or misdemeanors were committed shall apply.

Article 10. Procedure for Withdrawal from the Agreement

In exercise of its sovereignty, each member state of the Commonwealth has the right to withdraw from this agreement. A member state of the Commonwealth which intends to withdraw from the agreement informs the depositary state and all other member states in writing of its decision to act in this way. Such notification is to be given at least one year before the proposed withdrawal from the agreement.

Article 11. Coming into Force of the Agreement

1. The present agreement is subject to ratification by each member state of the Commonwealth in accordance with its constitutional procedures. The instruments of ratification are handed over for safekeeping to the government of the Republic of Belarus, which by this agreement is appointed as the depositary.
2. The present agreement comes into force ten days after the instruments of ratification have been handed over for safekeeping by all member states of the Commonwealth.
3. The depositary immediately informs all member states of the Commonwealth:
  - (a) of the handing over for safekeeping of each instrument of ratification;

(b) of the coming into force of the present agreement;

(c) of any notification of the member states of the Commonwealth to withdraw from the present agreement in accordance with Article 10, and of the date of their withdrawal;

(d) of any matter requiring the provisions of the present agreement to be revised or defined more precisely.

The agreement comes into force from the moment that it is signed.

Completed in Minsk on 14 February 1992 in one original copy in Russian. The original is kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send a certified copy to the states which have signed this agreement.

The agreement was signed by representatives of Azerbaijan, Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine.

The Azerbaijan representative added the footnote: "On condition that the strategic units located only on the territory of Azerbaijan are financed, and that those units are withdrawn by the end of 1994."

The representative of Armenia added the note: "With a dissenting opinion."

The Kazakhstan representative noted that "an agreement on the test sites will be concluded with the Republic of Kazakhstan."

The Kyrgyzstan representative specified: "Inclusion of Article 2, Point 2.”

The Ukraine representative made the annotation: “With the exception of Article 2, Point 2, and Article 10 (for Ukraine, in accordance with the Minsk agreement, the term for withdrawal is the end of 1994).”

10.16 General Purpose Forces Agreement

TASS, 18 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[“Agreement Between the Republic of Armenia, Republic of Belarus, Republic of Kazakhstan, Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and the Republic of Uzbekistan on General Purposes for the Transitional Period.”]

The states participating in the present agreement, referred to as the “participant states,” proceeding from the need for a mutually acceptable and organized settlement of matters in the area of directing the general purpose forces, bearing in mind the role of general purpose forces in ensuring the security of the participant states, guided by the Agreement of the Council of Heads of Member States of the Commonwealth of Independent States on Armed Forces and Border Troops of 30 December 1991, have agreed on the following:

Article 1. The participant states shall form joint general purpose forces.

The term “general purpose forces” means: groupings, formations, units, institutions, military training establishments, other military formations, and military facilities which do not form part of the strategic forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States, as well as the armed forces of the participant states themselves, operationally subordinated, with their consent, to the commander-in-chief of the Joint Armed Forces.

The list of military formations subject to inclusion in the general purpose forces and their deployment is determined by separate protocols for each participant state.

Article 2. The directing of the Commonwealth participant states' own armed forces is carried out by the ministries of defense (defense committees) of those states.

Article 3. The state of the general purpose forces is determined by a separate agreement between the participant states taking into account their national legislation.

Article 4. The material, technical, and financial backing for the general purpose forces is regulated by separate agreements.

Article 5. Each participant state has the right to withdraw from the present agreement, having given the other participant states at least six months notification of this.

Article 6. The agreement comes into effect when it is signed, and for the Republic of Belarus from the moment it is ratified by the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Belarus.

Concluded in Minsk of 14 February 1992 in one original copy in Russian. The original is kept at the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus which will send the states which have signed the present agreement a certified copy.

The document has been signed by representatives of Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan.

The president of Armenia made the following note: To add to Article 1, after the word “protocols,” the following: “and is approved by the Council of Heads of State.”

10.17 Agreement on Defense Budget

TASS, 18 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[“Agreement Between the Member States of the Commonwealth of Independent States on Formation of a Single Defense Budget and the Procedure for Financing the Armed Forces of the Commonwealth States.”]

The Azerbaijan Republic, the Republic of Armenia, the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, the Russian Federation, the Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, the Republic of Uzbekistan, and Ukraine, henceforth described as “the Commonwealth member states,” proceeding from the need to make financial provision for the armed forces of the Commonwealth states, have agreed on the following:

Article 1. A single defense budget being formed to finance the armed forces of the Commonwealth states includes the following forms of expenditure on an annual basis:

- maintenance of the army and navy (money allowance for servicemen, salaries of permanent members of staff and office workers, food supplies, payment for clothing and related gear, payment for and storage of special fuels, repair and preparation of weapons, military equipment and property, transportation costs, lease of telecommunications facilities, maintenance of cosmodromes, special testing grounds, bases and depots, covering in rubles any foreign currency spent on maintaining troops on the border, operational, supply and other expenditure connected with providing necessary supplies to the troops);

- payment for weapons, military equipment, and property, including purchase of nuclear munitions;

-payment for scientific and technical production;
-capital construction and capital repairs, including specialized construction and housing construction;
-provision of pensions for servicemen and members of their families.

Article 2. Expenditure on the upkeep of the army and navy will be determined on the basis of the de facto numerical strength of servicemen, workmen, and support personnel of the armed forces of the Commonwealth states; of established levels of and maintenance standards for weaponry, military hardware, and assets; of existing prices and tariffs; of combat training plans; of production and commercial activities; and of other factors.

Expenditure on armaments, military hardware, and facilities will be determined on the basis of their planned supply volumes to maintain the armed forces of the Commonwealth states within the limits of the funds budgeted.

Expenditure on scientific and technological products will be determined on the basis of planned volumes of scientific research and development for military purposes, with account taken of their results and relevance, within the limits of the monies budgeted.

Capital investment in and expenditure on construction of new facilities and reconstruction and expansion of existing fixed assets will be determined as the sum total of spending on creation of proper conditions for combat and special training, on living standards, on storage, maintenance, and repair of armaments, military hardware, and assets, on command bodies, on medical services and recreation for personnel, and also on provision of servicemen and the members of their families with accommodation, social amenities, and consumer facilities.

Expenditure on pensions for servicemen in the armed forces of the Commonwealth states and the members of their families will be determined on the basis of the number of pensioners and the pension sums due to them.

Article 3. The member states of the Commonwealth will recognize the desirability of defining the single defense budget according to the prices of the base year, with allowance for the forecast price index and for social safeguards for servicemen and the members of their families.

Article 4. The draft single defense budget will be drawn up by the high command of the Commonwealth states' armed forces, considered by the Council of Defense Ministers (chairmen of defense committees) of the Commonwealth member states, and submitted to the Council of Heads of Government of the Commonwealth. The single defense budget will be endorsed by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth upon representation by the Council of Heads of Government of the Commonwealth.

Article 5. The member states of the Commonwealth undertake to join in formation of the single defense budget by way of payment of fixed contributions. The extent and procedure for payment of the fixed contribution of each Commonwealth member state will be determined by the Council of Heads of Government of the Commonwealth.

Article 6. If, in the course of a year, the need arises for additional expenditure not envisaged in the single defense budget as endorsed, a procedure for payment into the single defense budget and for financing of the armed forces of the Commonwealth states will be determined in accordance with this agreement.

Article 7. An annual account on implementation of the single defense budget will be submitted by the commander-in-chief of the armed forces of the Commonwealth states to the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth.

This agreement will come into effect when it is signed. Done in the city of Minsk on 14 February 1992 in one original copy in Russian. The original will be held in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will forward a certified copy to the signatory states.

The document is signed by the representatives of Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan, some of whom have made personal notes.

The document contains the following special option, signed by the presidents of Azerbaijan and Ukraine: The Republics of Azerbaijan and Ukraine will not join in the formation of a single defense budget for the upkeep of the joint strategic forces, but will assume a share of the financing solely of the upkeep of the strategic forces on their territory for a period of time determined for the Republic of Azerbaijan and Ukraine in accordance with the Minsk agreement between the members of the Commonwealth of Independent States on strategic forces, dated 30 December 1991.

10.18 CIS Agreement on Joint Armed Forces for the Transitional Period

20 March 1992 [FBIS Translation]

The member states of the Commonwealth, henceforth called “the member states,”

Proceeding from the need for the mutually acceptable and organized solution of the questions of reforming the armed forces of the former USSR,

Have agreed on the following:

Article 1. The CIS Joint Armed Forces are not directed against states which are not participants in this agreement. The Joint Armed Forces are being created for the transitional period with the aim of providing security for the member states, preserving the army command, preventing conflicts, and coordinating the reform of the former USSR armed forces.

Article 2. The CIS Joint Armed Forces include the Strategic Forces of the Commonwealth created in accordance with the agreement reached by the CIS member states on the strategic armed forces of 30 December 1991, and also the General Purpose Forces created in accordance with the 14 February 1992 agreement on the General Purpose Forces between the Republic of Armenia, the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, the Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and the Republic of Uzbekistan.

Article 3. The Strategic Forces of the Commonwealth are subordinated directly to the command of the CIS strategic forces. The military formations and facilities of the General Purpose Forces, with the exception of the member states' own armed forces, are subordinated directly to the commander of the General Purpose Forces.

Article 4. The authority of the supreme bodies of the CIS and the high command is applied to the member states' own armed forces which have been transferred with their consent to operational subordination to the High Command of the Joint Armed Forces, only in respect of questions of operational subordination.

Article 5. Each member has the right to withdraw from this agreement by notifying the other member states not less than six months in advance.

Done in the city of Kiev on 20 March 1992, as one original copy in the Russian language. The original copy is to be kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send a certified copy to the member states which are signatory to this agreement.

The agreement was signed by representatives of Armenia, Belarus (with the addition of the words: “With the stipulation of a transitional period of two years for the Republic of Belarus”), Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan.

10.19 CIS Statute on Joint Command of Border Troops 20 March 1992 [FBIS Translation]

I. General Points

1. The Joint Command of Border Troops is a permanent collegial body of the border troops of the Commonwealth and its states’ own border troops, which effects the implementation of the decisions of the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government of the Commonwealth on matters of the protection of the state borders and maritime economic zones of the CIS member states, and the coordination of the activity of the border troops.

In its activity, the Joint Command is guided by international legal acts, acts of the CIS, the legislation of the CIS member states, and the enforceable enactments of the former USSR that do not contradict it, and also by this statute.

2. The staff of the Joint Command of Border Troops comprises: The commander-in-chief of the border troops, the chief of general staff of the border troops, the commanders of the states' own border troops, and authorized representatives of the CIS member states, but not exceeding a total of two persons from each member state. The commander-in-chief of the border troops and each CIS member state possess one vote in the Joint Command.

The Joint Command invites specialists and experts, as required, to meetings of officials of the border troops.

Representatives of states, formerly republics of the USSR, which are not members of the Commonwealth can take part in the work of the Joint Command as observers.

II. Powers of the Joint Command of Border Troops

1. The Joint Command of Border Troops:

- coordinates the activity of the border troops of the Commonwealth and the states' own border troops;
- submits proposals to the Council of Heads of State and Council of Heads of Government and to the top bodies of state authority and administration of the CIS member states on matters of the protection of state borders and maritime economic zones, and on maintaining the activity of the border troops of the Commonwealth and the states' own border troops;
- works out general principles and proposals on developing the system for protecting state borders and maritime economic zones and allowing persons and means of transport across state borders;
- organizes and ensures the implementation of acts of the Commonwealth and the legislation of CIS member states by the border troops of the Commonwealth and the states' own border troop;

-Works out coordinated approaches on matters of manning, training of personnel, and maintaining combat readiness of the border troops of the Commonwealth and the states' own border troops. The Joint Command can also examine other matters which relate to the protection of state borders and maritime economic zones and to the activity of the border troops of the Commonwealth and of the states' own border troops.

2. Members of the Joint Command have the right:

- To represent the Joint Command, at its instruction, in state and public organizations, including international, on matters within the competence of the Joint Command;
- To receive the necessary information on the activity of the border troops through the governing bodies of the border troops.

III. The Organization of the Work of the Joint Command of Border Troops

1. Conferences, which are held as required under the chairmanship of the commander-in-chief of the border troops, are the main form of work of the Joint Command. Conferences are convened on the decision of the commander-in-chief or on the proposal of the permanent members of the Joint Command.

2. Decisions of the Joint Command are passed on the basis of consensus and are announced by orders of the commander-in-chief of the border troops and the commanders' of the states' own border troops.

When no consensus is reached, an issue is submitted to the Council of Heads of State or the Council of Heads of Government.

3. Other matters of the Joint Command's work are determined by regulations worked out by this command.

10.20 Declaration on Rejecting Use of Force

TASS, 23 March 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[“Declaration on the Non-Use of Force or the Threat of Force in Relations Between the CIS Member States,” issued by the CIS summit in Kiev on 20 March.]

The Commonwealth member states:

- noting that rejection of using force or threatening its use, which is enshrined in the UN Charter and the CSCE Final Act, is an obligation which all states must observe,
- confirming their obligations to tackle all contentious problems by exclusively peaceful means, as was stated by the CIS heads of state in Alma-Ata on 21 December 1991 and in Minsk on 14 February 1992,
- with the aim of ending bloodshed and localizing and averting tension,
- and guided by the desire of the peoples of the Commonwealth for peace, security, and good-neighborliness, declare as follows:

Member states

1. Do not permit the use of force or the threat of its use.
2. Do not deliver arms to zones of conflict.
3. Prevent attacks on troop units aimed at seizing weapons.
4. Refrain from organization or encouraging the organization of irregular forces or armed bands, including mercenaries.

5. Refrain from fanning tension in relations between the Commonwealth states.

6. In the event of disputes arising between them, they will apply their efforts conscientiously and in a spirit of cooperation to reach a fair decision based on international law, within a short period of time.

To these ends, they will use such means for the peaceful settlement of disputes as talks, investigation, mediation, reconciliation, arbitration, court examination, or other peaceful means of their own choosing, including any procedure for settlement that was agreed before the disputes occurred and to which they may have been party, and apply the principles, tenets, and norms for the peaceful settlement of disputes that have been developed within the framework of the UN Organization and the CSCE.

7. Encourage the use of various forms of people's diplomacy and public initiative with the aim of averting the threat of inter-state conflicts.

8. Support the efforts of the international community and its instruments to settle conflicts on the territory of the Commonwealth states.

Done in Kiev on 20 March 1992 in a single original copy. The original is kept in the archives of the government of Belarus, which will forward a certified copy of this convention to the signatory states.

The declaration was signed by representatives of Azerbaijan, Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine.

10.21 CIS Treaty on Collective Security

15 May 1992 [FBIS Translation]

The states participating in the present treaty, henceforth referred to as “the participating states,”

-guided by the independent states’ declarations of sovereignty, mindful of the creation by the participating states of their own armed forces,

-taking coordinated actions in the interests of ensuring collective security,

-recognizing the need to strictly fulfill the treaties that have been concluded with regard to the reduction of arms and armed forces and the strengthening of confidencebuilding measures, have agreed to the following:

Article 1. The participating states confirm their commitment to refrain from the use or threat of force in interstate relations. They pledge to resolve all disagreements among themselves and with other states by peaceful means.

The participating states will not enter into military alliances or participate in any groupings of states, nor in actions directed against another participating state.

In the event of the creation of a system of collective security in Europe and Asia and the conclusion of treaties on collective security to the end-for which the contracting parties will strive unswervingly-the participating states will enter into immediate consultations with each other for the purpose of incorporating the necessary intentions in the present treaty.

Article 2. The participating states will consult with each other on all important questions of international security affecting their interests and will coordinate their positions on these questions.

In the event of a threat to the security, territorial integrity, and sovereignty of one or several participating states or of a threat to international peace and security, the participating states will immediately activate the mechanism of joint consultations for the purpose of coordinating their positions and taking measures to eliminate the threat that has emerged.

Article 3. The participating states will form a Collective Security Council consisting of the heads of participating states and the commander-in-chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces.

Article 4. If one of the participating states is subjected to aggression by any state or groups of states, this will be perceived as aggression against all participating states, to this treaty.

In the event of an act of aggression being committed against any of the participating states it will give it the necessary assistance, including military assistance, and will also give support with the means at their disposal by way of exercising the right to collective defense in accordance with Article 51 of the UN Charter.

The participating states will immediately inform the UN Security Council of any measures taken on the basis of this article. When implementing these measures, the participating states will abide by the corresponding provisions of the UN Charter.

Article 5. The Collective Security Council of the participating states and the organs to be created by it undertake the coordination and ensuring of joint activities by the participating states in accordance with this treaty. Until the aforementioned organs have been created, the activities of the armed forces of the participating states will be coordinated by the High Command of the Commonwealth Joint Armed Forces.

Article 6. Any decision to use armed forces for the purpose of repulsing aggression in accordance with Article 3 of the present treaty is adopted by the heads of the participating states.

The use of armed forces outside the territory of the participating states can be effected exclusively in the interests of international security in strict compliance with the UN Charter and the legislation of participating states in the present treaty.

Article 7. The location and functioning of installations in the collective security system on the territory of participating states is regulated by special agreements.

Article 8. The present treaty does not affect any rights and commitments under other bilateral and multilateral treaties and agreements currently in force and concluded by the participating states with other states, and it is not directed against third countries.

The present treaty does not affect the participating states' right to individual and collective defense against aggression in accordance with the UN Charter.

The participating states pledge not to conclude international agreements that are incompatible with the present treaty.

Article 9. Any questions arising between the participating states in connection with the interpretation or application of any provision of the present treaty will be resolved jointly in the spirit of friendship, mutual respect, and mutual understanding.

Amendments to the present treaty may be incorporated on the initiative of one or several of the participating states and adopted on the basis of mutual agreement.

Article 10. The present treaty is open to all interested states which share its aims and principles.

Article 11. The present treaty is concluded after five years with a subsequent renewal.

Any of the participating states has the right to withdraw from the present treaty if it notifies the other parties of its intention at least six months in advance and fulfills all the commitments resulting from withdrawal from the present treaty.

The present treaty is subject to ratification by each of the signatory states in accordance with its constitutional procedures. The ratification documents will be handed to the government of the Republic of Belarus, which is thus being appointed depository.

The present treaty comes into force immediately after the ratification documents have been submitted for safekeeping by the participating states which have signed it.

10.22 Tashkent Statement on Armed Forces Cutbacks

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 23 May 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[“Statement by the Heads of CIS Member States on the Reduction of the Armed Forces of the Former USSR,” adopted at 15 May 1992 session of the Council of CIS Heads of State in Tashkent.]

Confirming the adherence of the states belonging to the CIS as the legal heir of the former USSR to the international commitments of the former USSR in the field of disarmament and arms control, being persuaded of the need for the further development of the process of the consolidation of security and cooperation in various regions and in the world as a whole on the basis of the radical reduction of existing military potentials,

The heads of the CIS states state:

I

The CIS states confirm their intentions to reduce the armed forces of the former USSR within deadlines agreed among themselves which do not contradict international treaties.

II

The CIS states undertake not to implement unilateral decisions and actions that could harm the fulfillment of the international commitments of the former USSR for the reduction and limitation of armed forces and armaments.

10.23 Treaty on CIS Collective Security Published

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 23 May 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[Signed by representatives of Armenia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan, adopted at 15 May session of the Council of CIS Heads of State in Tashkent.]

The states participating in the present treaty, hereinafter referred to as the “participating states,”

-guided by the independent states’ declarations of sovereignty,

-mindful of the creation by the participating states of their own armed forces,

-taking coordinated actions in the interests of ensuring collective security,

-recognizing the need to strictly fulfill the treaties that have been concluded with regard to the reduction of arms and armed forces and the strengthening of confidence-building measures, have agreed as follows:

Article 1. The participating states confirm their commitment to refrain from the use or threat of force in interstate relations. They pledge to resolve all disagreements among themselves and with other states by peaceful means.

The participating states will not enter into military alliances or participate in any groupings of states, nor in actions directed against another participating state.

In the event of the creation of a system of collective security in Europe and Asia and the conclusion of treaties on collective security to that end-for which the contracting parties will strive unswervingly-the participating states will enter into immediate consultations with each other for the purpose of incorporating the necessary intentions in the present treaty.

Article 2. The participating states will consult with each other on all important questions of international security affecting their interests and will coordinate their positions on these questions.

In the event of the emergence of a threat to the security, territorial integrity, and sovereignty of one or several participating states or of a threat to international peace and security, the participating states will immediately activate the mechanism of joint consultations for the purpose of coordinating their positions and taking measures to eliminate the threat that has emerged.

Article 3. The participating states will form a Collective Security Council consisting of the heads of participating states and the commander-in-chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces.

Article 4. If one of the participating states is subjected to aggression by any state or group of states, this will be perceived as aggression against all participating states to this treaty.

In the event of an act of aggression being committed against any of the participating states, all the other participating states will give it the necessary assistance, including military assistance, and will also give support with the means at their disposal by way of exercising the right to collective defense in accordance with Article 51 of the UN Charter.

The participating states will immediately inform the UN Security Council of any measures taken on the basis of this article. When implementing these measures, the participating states will abide by the corresponding provisions of the UN Charter.

Article 5. The Collective Security Council of the participating states and the organs to be created by it undertake the coordination and ensuring of joint activities by the participating states in accordance with this treaty. Until the aforesaid organs have been created, the activities of the armed forces of the participating states will be coordinated by the High Command of the Commonwealth Joint Armed Forces.

Article 6. Any decision to use armed forces for the purpose of repulsing aggression in accordance with Article 3 of the present treaty is adopted by the heads of the participating states.

The use of armed forces outside the territory of the participating states can be effected exclusively in the interests of international security in strict compliance with the UN Charter and the legislation of participating states in the present treaty.

Article 7. The location and functioning of installations in the collective security system on the territory of participating states is regulated by special agreements.

Article 8. The present treaty does not affect any rights and commitments under other bilateral and multilateral treaties and agreements currently in force and concluded by the participating states with other states, and it is not directed against third countries.

The present treaty does not affect the participating states' right to individual and collective defense against aggression in accordance with the UN Charter.

The participating states pledge not to conclude international agreements that are incompatible with the present treaty.

Article 9. Any questions arising between the participating states in connection with the interpretation or application of any provision of the present treaty will be resolved jointly in the spirit of friendship, mutual respect, and mutual understanding.

Amendments to the present treaty may be incorporated on the initiative of one or several of the participating states and adopted on the basis of mutual agreement.

Article 10. The present treaty is open to all interested states which share its aims and principles.

Article 11. The present treaty is concluded after five years with a subsequent renewal.

Any of the participating states has the right to withdraw from the present treaty if it notifies the other parties of its intention at least six months in advance and fulfills all the commitments resulting from withdrawal from the present treaty.

The present treaty is subject to ratification by each of the signatory states in accordance with its constitutional procedures. The ratification documents will be handed to the government of the Republic of Belarus, which is thus being appointed depositary.

The present treaty comes into force immediately after the ratification documents have been submitted for safekeeping by the participating states which have signed it.

10.24 "Text" of Declaration on State Borders

ITAR-TASS, 7 August 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Declaration on Inviolability of the State Borders

The states which have signed this declaration, reaffirming their adherence to the UN Charter and the principles of the CSCE, as well as the basic documents of the Commonwealth of Independent States;

- stressing that the inviolability of the borders and territorial integrity of states are fundamental principles of international relations, and their observance presents the most important condition toward the preservation of international peace, security, and stability;

- recalling that the territory of a state is inviolable and cannot be an object of the use of force in violation of the UN Charter;

- expressing their concern in connection with incidents of serious violation of their borders by countries which are not members of the CIS;

- proceeding from the inalienable right of the states for individual and collective self-defense in accordance with Article 51 of the UN Charter, state the following:

1. Ensuring the inviolability of the borders of the states which have signed this declaration is seen by them as a sphere of joint, vitally important interests, is their common cause, and is being implemented on a multilateral or bilateral basis.

2. The states-signatory to this declaration will consider any encroachment on their borders to be unlawful actions, which give grounds for the adoption of retaliatory and commensurate measures, in accordance with international law, including the use of armed force, and in the form of individual or collective selfdefense. They will jointly avert and thwart any attempts at incursion from outside on the territory of any of the states signatory to this declaration.
3. The states signatory to this declaration will, on their territory, thwart the activities of individuals, groups, or organizations which are aimed at violating the inviolability of the borders of these states.
4. The states signatory to this declaration bear collective responsibility for the inviolability of their borders with third states. At the same time, none of the states signatory to this declaration bears any obligation to unilaterally ensure the security of the borders of another state.
5. The states signatory to this declaration reaffirm their readiness, by way of talks with the participation of all the interested parties, to seek ways to end and avert armed conflicts on the borders.
6. Internal stability within the states signatory to this declaration is a necessary condition of security on their borders. For this purpose each of them will take the necessary steps to strengthen democratic institutions and to achieve national consensus on the basis of respect for human rights and basic freedoms.
7. The states signatory to this declaration count on support and understanding of its articles on the part of neighboring states and the international community as a whole.

10.25 CIS Unified Air Defense Agreement

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 25 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Agreement on the Creation of a Unified Air Defense System for the CIS States

The CIS states, having signed this agreement and referred to hereinafter as the “member states,” guided by the CIS security principles, basing themselves on the Decision on the CIS Council of Heads of State’s Memorandum “Basic Guidelines for the Integrated Development of the CIS” and the longterm plan for the integrated development of the CIS of 21 October 1994, and proceeding on the basis of the need to pool their efforts on the member states’ air defense and the protection of their airspace borders, have agreed as follows:

Article 1. The member states shall create a unified air defense system for the CIS member states.

The unified air defense shall include member state air defense forces and means (some forces and means) operating on the basis of a coordinated plan and carrying out the tasks envisaged under Article 2 of this agreement.

The principles underlying the formulation and implementation of the unified air defense system's missions shall be determined by the Statute on the CIS Member States' Unified Air Defense System, which is part and parcel of this agreement.

Article 2. The unified air defense shall be set up to resolve the following tasks:

- Ensuring the protection of the airspace of the member states' state borders;
- Implementing joint monitoring of the procedure governing the utilization of the member states' airspace;
- Informing member states about the aerospace situation and providing warnings of missile or airborne attack;
- Conducting coordinated actions by the member states' air defense troops to repulse airborne or missile attack.

Article 3. With a view to coordinating efforts to create and improve a unified air defense system and to coordinate the actions of the unified air defense system troops and forces, a Coordinating Committee for Air Defense Issues shall be set up under the CIS member states' Defense Ministers Council (hereinafter, the Coordinating Committee).

The commander-in-chief of the Russian Federation Air Defense Troops shall be chairman of the Coordinating Committee.

Members of the Coordinating Committee shall include the commanders of the member states' air defense troops (air defense and air force) as well as, at the decision of the CIS member states' Defense Ministers Council, the deputy chairman of the Coordinating Committee and other officials.

The statute on the Coordinating Committee shall be ratified by the CIS member states' Defense Ministers Council.

Article 4. The member states shall ensure the constant combat readiness of the troops and forces allocated to the unified air defense system, and their actions in carrying out their joint air defense missions.

The procedure for cooperation between unified air defense system forces and means shall be laid down by the plan elaborated by the Coordinating Committee in conjunction with the CIS member states' Military Cooperation Coordination Headquarters, taking account of the plans for the utilization of member states' air defense (air defense and air force) forces and means; the plan for cooperation between unified air defense system forces and means shall be ratified by the CIS member states' Defense Ministers Council.

Direct command and control of the air defense (air defense and air force) troops and forces of each member state shall be exercised by the commanders of those states' air defense (air defense and air force) troops taking account of the plan for cooperation between unified air defense system forces and means.

The coordination of the actions of unified air defense system forces and means shall be implemented from the Russian Federation Air Defense Troops Central Command Post.

Article 5. Some of the unified air defense system forces and means shall be on permanent combat standby protecting the airborne borders of the member states on the basis of the plan for cooperation between unified air defense system forces and means.

Command and control of the unified air defense system's standby forces and means shall be exercised from member states' air defense (air defense and air force) command posts, while their actions shall be coordinated from the Russian Federation Air Defense Troops Central Command Post.

Article 6. Air defense armaments and military hardware shall be supplied on the basis of bilateral agreements between the member states' governments, while repairs of air defense armaments and military hardware shall be effected under the procedure laid down by the CIS Council of Heads of Government.

The member states pledge not to sell and not to transfer to other states which are not party to this agreement air defense armaments and military hardware defined on the list ratified by the CIS Council of Heads of Government on the basis of the proposal from the CIS member states' Defense Ministers Council, nor to divulge information constituting member state military secrets.

Article 7. The training of military specialists for unified air defense system forces and means shall be effected on the basis of bilateral agreements between the member state governments.

Article 8. This agreement is open to other states to join with the consent of all the member states.

Article 9. Each member state is entitled to withdraw from this agreement once the relevant written notification has been sent to the depositary. As far as the member state is concerned, the agreement lapses one year from the receipt of notification by the depositary.

Article 10. The agreement of 6 July 1992 on the air defense system shall be deemed to have lapsed.

Article 11. This agreement comes into force from the day it is signed.

Done in the city of Almaty on 10 February 1995 in a single copy in Russian. The original [podlinny ekzemplyar] shall be held in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send a certified copy to each signatory state.

Appendix to the Agreement

Statutes on the CIS Member States' Unified Air Defense System

1. The CIS member states' unified air defense system shall be set up with a view to protecting the member states' air borders, monitoring the procedure governing the utilization of airspace, providing warning of a threatened or incipient airborne or space attack, and protecting the member states' most important installations from air strikes.

2. The unified air defense system unites the member states' forces and means for the joint resolution of missions in the interests of all member states.

The air defense forces and means of each member state resolve missions to provide air defense for their territories independently and in conjunction with the air defense troops of adjoining member states.

3. The coordinated resolution of tasks in the interests of the air defense of all member states is based on the following principles:

10.26 Treaty on Border Protection Between CIS, Non-CIS States

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 7 July 1995 [FBIS Translation]

[“Treaty on Cooperation in the Protection of the Borders of the Participants in the Commonwealth of Independent States with States That Are Not Members of the Commonwealth.”]

The participants in the Commonwealth of Independent States that signed this treaty, hereinafter called the parties,

- guided by the generally accepted principles and rules of international law and a desire to develop friendly, neighborly relations, and to contribute to mutual support for security on the borders of the states of the Commonwealth,

- recognizing the need for cooperation in the protection of the borders of the participants in the Commonwealth of Independent States with states that are not members of the Commonwealth, and

- confirming their commitment to the provisions of the UN Charter, the principles of the OSCE, the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act, the Charter of the Commonwealth of Independent States, and other documents on border issues that have been adopted by the parties and have legal force for them, have agreed as hereunder:

Article 1. For the purposes of this treaty the terms listed below shall mean the following:

Borders-sections of the state borders of participants in the Commonwealth of Independent States with states that are not members of the Commonwealth.

Council of Commanders-Council of Commanders of the Border Troops.

Border Troops-border troops of the parties.

Article 2. The purposes of the parties' cooperation in protection of the borders are:

- protection of the borders with regard to the interests of the parties;

- effective struggle against international and domestic terrorism, all manifestations of separatism and nationalism, drug trafficking, illegal immigration, and the illegal movement of weapons, ammunition, and radioactive, toxic, and psychotropic substances and also other objects and freight whose importation and exportation are banned by national legislation of the parties and international agreements;

- the development of a treaty-legal base for the cooperation and rapprochement of the legislation of the parties on border issues.

Article 3. The parties shall establish and develop between themselves equal partner relations aimed at the effective accomplishment of the tasks for strengthening peace on the borders.

The parties shall be mutually responsible for the protection of their section of the border with regard to the interests of the security of the parties.

The parties shall recognize the priority of the decisions (adopted on the basis of consensus) of the supreme authorities of the Commonwealth on questions of support for the security of the borders.

Article 4. The parties shall protect the borders in accordance with national legislation by concerted or joint efforts with regard to the interests of the parties on conditions that shall be determined by the corresponding bilateral or multilateral agreements and arrangements.

In the event of a threat to the security of the borders arising, the parties shall immediately hold mutual consultations for the adoption of the appropriate measures to eliminate the threat that has arisen.

Article 5. The parties shall be entitled to adopt measures to ensure the protection of their borders with the aid of a contingent necessary for this or another participant in the Commonwealth of Independent States on the basis of international agreements.

Article 6. The parties may, with regard to national legislation, create regional joint commands (operational groups, joint staffs, or coordination councils) for the coordination of joint efforts in the protection of the borders and the realization of border policy.

Article 7. The parties shall cooperate in scientific studies, in the creation of joint programs, planning, and the manufacture and introduction of new technical facilities for protection of the borders included.

Article 8. The parties shall cooperate in raising the level of the border troops' provision with equipment. The procedure and the conditions of preferential supplies to the border troops of special equipment for the border troops and material assets shall be determined by a separate agreement.

Article 9. The parties shall, where necessary, in the interests of protection of the borders, conclude bilateral or multilateral agreements regulating the use by the border troops of sections of territory, the air space, water, and land, airports, airfields, ports, moorings, railroad approach tracks, and motor highways and also obtain the necessary information pertaining to meteorological support for flights of border aviation and navigation and hydrographic support for boats of the border troops.

Article 10. The parties shall for the timely adoption of decisions on protection of the borders provide for the continuous operation of the process of the collection and processing of data and the forecasting of the situation on the borders and the constant mutual exchange of information and also for the preparation of proposals concerning measures of a preventive nature adopted in international practice.

The parties shall maintain in working order the existing special communications channels of the border troops and other competent services and simultaneously adopt joint measures to create new channels (systems) of communications and information within the framework of programs drawn up by the participants in the Commonwealth.

Article 11. The parties shall not transmit to anyone material and information of an official or secret nature obtained from one another without the written consent of the party from which this material and information were obtained.

Article 12. The parties shall cooperate in questions of operational-search activity in the interests of protection of the borders conducted by arms of the border troops authorized for this in accordance with the legislation of each party.

Article 13. The parties shall harmonize (coordinate) their border policy in relations with contiguous countries that are not participants in the Commonwealth. This treaty shall not affect the rights and obligations of the parties with respect to other current bilateral and multilateral treaties and agreements and is not aimed against third countries.

Article 14. The parties shall adopt measures to harmonize their legislative and other law-making instruments regulating questions of the protection of the borders and their procedures.

The parties shall for the creation of the most favorable and equal conditions in support of the activity of the border troops exchange information on the adoption of new national legislative instruments affecting questions of the protection of the borders and their procedures.

Article 15. The parties shall on a contract basis render one another assistance in the training of officer personnel and junior specialists for the border troops.

Diplomas and certificates and also other documents attesting that the corresponding education or specialty has been obtained, including those issued prior to this treaty taking effect, shall be recognized on the territory of the parties.

Article 16. The parties shall, if necessary, conclude separate agreements on questions of the establishment for servicemen and their families and other citizens participating in the protection of the borders outside of their states sums of compensation and privileges with regard to the regional singularities of service, state and interstate insurance, and material, financial, and other forms of support.

Article 17. The parties shall make provision on contractual terms for the admittance to their general health institutions for observation and treatment (hospitalization) servicemen and retirees of the border troops and members of their families and also for the allocation of passes to departmental sanatoriums and recreation centers at the expense of the party that has sent them.

Article 18. Disputes arising in the interpretation and application of this treaty shall be resolved by way of consultations and negotiations between the parties.

Addenda and revisions to this treaty may be made on the initiative of one or several of its signatories and adopted on the basis of consensus.

The parties shall entrust to the Council of Commanders the coordination of measures for the fulfillment of this treaty. To this end the Council of Commanders may, following coordination with the interested parties, create temporary working bodies of representatives of the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, border troops, and other interested ministries and departments of the parties. The procedure of realization of these measures shall be determined by a separate agreement with the host party.

Article 19. This treaty shall take effect the day of the presentation to the depositary of notice in triplicate of compliance with the intra-state procedures necessary for it to take effect. For a party that notifies the depository of compliance with such procedures after the treaty has taken effect, it shall take effect the day such notice is presented to the depository.

Article 20. The treaty is concluded after five years and will automatically be extended on each occasion for the subsequent five-year period. Each party may withdraw from this treaty by way of written notification of the depository of this no fewer than six months prior to the expiration of the corresponding period.

Other participants in the Commonwealth of Independent

States may accede to this treaty after it has taken effect.

Article 21. This treaty is to be registered with the UN Secretariat in accordance with Article 102 of the UN Charter.

Done in the city of Minsk on 26 May 1995 in one authentic copy in Russian. The authentic copy shall be kept in the Executive Secretariat of the Commonwealth of Independent States, which shall send each state that signed this treaty its certified copy.

The treaty was not signed by Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Moldova, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine.

Minsk, 26 May 1995.

Conclusion

The Russian Bloc: Hegemony, Cooperation, and Conflict

Zbigniew Brzezinski

The CIS is still in its formative stage. Since 1992 a great deal of structural growth has taken place, but in a setting of continuing confusion over means as well as ends, and amid much conflict. The four charts below summarize in graphic form the institutional growth of the CIS as a binding network.

The charts, however, cannot convey by themselves the degree to which that process has been moved forward by deliberate pressure, including political manipulation, economic leverage, and even military intervention. That reality emerges more sharply in the preceding chapters. It is testimony to the degree of commitment and initiative involved in the Russian efforts to reverse, at least in part, what transpired in December of 1991.

The charts also cannot convey the degree to which this process has been derived from the reality of a genuinely shared interest in some reconstitution of the economic ties that previously existed in the Soviet Union. Even the most nationally ambitious elites in the newly independent states recognize that a renewal and a consolidation of economic cooperation with Russia is essential to their well being. That basic reality has reinforced the impetus for more formal institutionalization of the CIS.

Still another aspect that the charts cannot convey is the extent of continued evasion of the implementation of the many CIS arrangements. In part, this is due to the inevitable confusion inherent in the post-Soviet conditions, including the disruption produced by the very uneven shift away from a centrally controlled economy in the former Soviet space. The resulting massive chaos is simply not susceptible to management by an orderly process, on the manner, say, of the European Union's deliberate step-by-step integration.

But it must also be noted that some of the evasion is also quite intentional. It is a form of indirect opposition on the part of the new political elites to pressures from Moscow which they cannot resist directly. These elites not only sense the long-range political implications of growing economic integration, but they also follow and fear the debates in Moscow regarding Russia's special role in the geopolitical space of the former Soviet Union. Much of that debate must have an ominous ring for the newly self-governing and increasingly nationally self-conscious non-Russian leaders.

The present situation in the CIS is in some ways strikingly suggestive of the condition of the former Soviet bloc in the 1970s and 1980s. (It is to be noted that similarities do not imply identity; they note, however, some important parallels, significant differences notwithstanding.) The CIS, much like the former Soviet bloc, is a combination of Russian hegemony, many elements of cooperation, and of open as well as often hidden conflict. Russia, just like the old Soviet Union in the former Soviet bloc, is the central player, but its power is not unlimited. Coercion may be the last resort, intimidation may lurk in the background, but bargaining, pressure, and cooperation are also omnipresent.

As in the former Soviet bloc, Moscow's current influence in the various capitals of the CIS differs greatly. In the 1970s and 1980s, the prevailing relationship between the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia was friendly but very wary, with the Yugoslavs utterly determined to maintain their complete independence. The relationship between the Soviet Union and Poland, with the latter's communist regime very dependent on Moscow but also motivated by sensitive nationalist feelings, was more complex, but it certainly was not one of total subordination. On the other hand, Czechoslovakia, especially after 1968, and also the regimes of East Germany 1The Alma-Ata Declaration, signed on December 21, 1991 by eleven republics, ensured the former Soviet republics not a party to the Minsk Agreement, signed on December 8, 1991 by the Russian Federation, Belarus, and Ukraine creating the CIS, could enter the new organization on a parity basis.

2The Interparliamentary Assembly, formed in early 1992, was devised to better coordinate the legislation dockets of the republics. The IPA seeks to ensure that CIS agreements, declarations, and protocols are properly implemented.

3Signed on May 15, 1992.

4Formed on March 20, 1992, the CIS peacekeeping agreement provides for CIS troops to intervene in the various conflict zones in the former Soviet land space and for prevention of future ethnic and political conflicts in the region.

<sup>1</sup>This column indicates if the republic's parliament ratified the CIS Charter, thus making membership in the organization official and legal. The Charter outlines the organizational framework of the CIS, both its functional duties and its guiding principles.

and Bulgaria (with the latter even desiring at one point to join the Soviet Union) were far more directly subordinated. And all, except for Yugoslavia, were militarily integrated into the Moscow-run Warsaw Pact.

In the current CIS, a great deal of diversity similarly prevails in the relationship between Russia and the other states. At one extreme are Ukraine and Uzbekistan. The former has made considerable progress in internal democratization-it is the only CIS member to have had an orderly and democratic presidential transition-and it is also the only one to have created a significant national army of its own. Moreover, Kyiv has refused to integrate that army into the CIS system. It has also asserted itself (as the documents cited show) on a variety of other critically important economic, political, and security issues. It is, in effect, managing to maintain political independence despite continued economic dependence.

Uzbekistan likewise has jealously protected its new status as a sovereign state. The most populous of the Central Asian states and more homogeneous religiously and ethnically, it is less vulnerable to the external exploitation ("divide et impera") of internal ethnic strife—a weakness from which a majority of the other CIS members suffer. It is governed autocratically—in effect, through a personal dictatorship—but with a longer-range design in mind, patterned in part on the predemocratic experience of some of the economically successful Asian countries.

Most important of all, the Uzbek elite and population appear to be motivated by a deeper sense of historical identity than is the case with the other Central Asian states, and they even entertain some regional hegemonic aspirations. The Uzbeks identify themselves with—some would say usurp—the grand legacy of Tamerlane's empire and favor the creation of large Turkestan, embracing the Central Asian region. Much like the Ukrainians, the overall orientation of the Uzbeks is to safeguard and strengthen their suddenly obtained national independence.

At the other extreme are Belarus, Georgia, and Tajikistan. The Belarusians have been largely russified. To all effect, the native language is gone, the economy is merely an extension of the Russian one (with essentially no self-sustaining components), and a large majority of the Belarusian public even voted in late spring of 1995 to adopt Russian as their state language, to restore Soviet-era official (largely ideological) holidays, to return to the Soviet-Belarusian flag and the Soviet-Belarusian national coat of arms, and even to register their desire for a closer union with Russia. (It is noteworthy that this vote was effusively praised by Boris Yeltsin on 24 May in a rare television address to the Russian people.) Though a formal incorporation of Belarus into Russia has been delayed—in part, because of Russian reluctance to assume immediately the economic costs of subsidizing Belarus—politically and militarily Belarus is becoming an extension of Russia.

Of course, one cannot exclude a later reaction against the current trend. It is possible that in time Belarusian nationalism could ferment and revive. That could happen if developments in Russia, especially socio-economically, were to turn very sour. But for the near future and probably beyond, the sovereignty of Belarus is again nominal, largely as it was in the Soviet time.

Georgia and Tajikistan are also examples of political dependence and subordination. In the Georgian case, that is especially tragic because one would have expected the cultured and historic Georgian people to be more successful in establishing their independence. Georgia was an ancient kingdom, independent until 1801 and again, though only very briefly, in the early 1920s. The Georgians have a genuine sense of national identity and they appear to desire independence. Indeed, after the dissolution of the Soviet Union, the Georgians refused to join the CIS at all.

However, the lack of internal unity, ineffective national leadership after independence, clanish conflicts, and also Russian manipulation of the Abkhazian and Ossetian minorities produced such destructive internal violence that ultimately Georgia had to request Russian assistance. It was "granted" in return for Georgia's full adherence to the CIS, the acceptance of three major Russian military bases on Georgian soil, and the inclusion of Georgia in other Russian-controlled CIS security arrangements and border controls. Though certainly still more autonomous, and clearly more nationally distinctive, than Belarus, Georgia's sovereignty is now narrowly circumscribed.

Similarly, the social and ethnic conflicts in Tajikistan created an opening for even more direct Russian military intervention. This effectively stripped Tajikistan of any genuine independence. That intervention, initially also supported by Uzbekistan because of the latter's regional ambitions, has so badly damaged the social structure of the country and has inflicted so many casualties that its destructive impact can only be compared to the war on Chechnya.

In effect, one can delineate two broad constellations within the current CIS. The dominant one by far, led by Moscow, is composed of Russia itself (with almost one-half of the total population of the CIS and commanding about two-thirds of its resources), Belarus, Georgia, Armenia (fearful of Turkey and hostile to neighboring Azerbaijan, hence supportive of Russia), Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, and (more ambivalently) Kazakhstan.

The other constellation, much weaker and largely defensive, is based on Kyiv, with Ukraine's independent stance supported, sometimes overtly and sometimes tacitly, by Moldova (which is geographically sheltered by Ukraine), by Uzbekistan as well as by Turkmenistan (both sheltered geographically by Kazakhstan), and by oil-rich Azerbaijan. This cluster is clearly resistant to Moscow's efforts to transform the CIS into a politically as well as economically more integrated system. Accordingly, these states have tended to support Ukrainian reluctance to give the CIS a supranational status. In private bilateral meetings, the top Ukrainian leadership has been urged by them to maintain its stand in favor of a loose CIS.

Kazakhstan, while generally supportive of Moscow, has played a deliberately ambiguous role in these internal CIS contests. <sup>1</sup> With almost as many Russians in its population as native Kazakhs and hence extremely vulnerable, Kazakhstan has to be especially careful not to alienate Russia. Its skillful and impressive president, Nursultan Nazarbaev, in propitiating Moscow, has carefully maneuvered for greater international recognition for Kazakhstan, and has sought to promote some regional Central Asian cooperation, while also advocating a new Eurasian union, built on closer Russian-Kazakh cooperation.

The collapse of the old Soviet bloc was the consequence of the weakness and failing of the Soviet Union itself. The future of the CIS similarly is dependent, to the greatest degree, on how Russia, and its aspirations, evolves. The latter appear to be increasingly driven by a strategy to create a cohesive power structure in most of the space previously occupied by the Soviet Union. This goal is now expressed quite openly, and is well summarized in an edict entitled “Strategic Policy of Russia Toward CIS Member States,” dated 14 September 1995 and signed by Boris Yeltsin. This policy edict (which appears in this collection as item 9.48) conveys bluntly the prevailing spirit of those who dominate the Kremlin’s current thinking on Russia’s special interests in the former Soviet republics. A commission of the Russian government has been created to see that the policy is implemented.

Some of the policy objectives listed in the edict which most obviously coincide with the goals and objectives of “great power” thinking in Russia are: 2

1. -our main vital interests in the spheres of the economy, defense, security, and protection of the rights of Russians are concentrated on the territory of the CIS, and the safeguarding of these interests constitutes the basis of the country’s national security; effective cooperation with CIS states is a factor which counteracts centrifugal tendencies in Russia itself....

4. -to ensure reliable stability in all its aspects: political, military, economic, humanitarian, and legal;

-to promote the establishment of CIS states as politically and economically stable states pursuing a friendly policy toward Russia;

-to consolidate Russia as the leading force in the formation of a new system of interstate political and economic relations on the territory of the post-Union space; ...

12. -Matters must be driven toward the creation of a collective security system on the basis of the Collective Security Treaty (CST) of 15 May 1992 and of bilateral treaties between CIS states. There should be encouragement of the intention of states parties to the CST to unite within a defensive alliance on the basis of shared interests and military-political objectives....

-It is necessary that CIS states honor their pledges to refrain from participating in alliances and blocs aimed against any of these states....

13. -Work must be completed on settling the package of border questions with CIS states and creating a treatylegal basis for the stationing of Russian Federation Border Guard Troops in these countries. There should be a study of the possibility of creating in the future regional command units of CIS states border guard troops, and efforts should be made to create a uniform system for the protection of their borders....

-At the same time, and with due consideration for the foreign political situation, the Russian Federation's state border with all adjacent states should be defined in line with the Russian Federation Law "On the Russian Federation State Border," while bearing in mind that the retention of the principle of open borders within the CIS corresponds with Russia's long-term plans....

14. -Cooperation along the line of security services ought to be developed, primarily with a view to preventing the use of CIS territory by special services from third countries for purposes hostile to Russia...

17. -Our CIS partners should be persistently and consistently guided toward the elaboration of joint positions on international problems and the coordination of activity in the world arena. Joint efforts should be applied to achieve the further affirmation of the CIS as an influential regional organization and to establish broad and mutually advantageous cooperation with authoritative international forums and organizations at CIS levels....

18. -Efforts should be concentrated mainly on coordinating the CIS states' positions in the United Nations and the OSCE and their approaches toward relations with NATO, the EU, and the Council of Europe. ...

The above passage succinctly defines Russia's goals. But how these broad objectives are pursued, and how they are defined in practice-i.e., whether through voluntary cooperation or through compulsion-depends in the first instance on what transpires in Russia itself over the next ten to twenty years. In broad terms one can envisage at least five different Russian futures:

- i. a truly democratic Russia that is also impressively successful in its economic recovery;
- ii. a Pinochet-type authoritarian and highly nationalist Russia that also attains impressive economic recovery and growth;
- iii. an economically successful Russia, but beset by continued political instability, perhaps with alternating cycles of semi-democracy and authoritarianism;
- iv. a democratizing, perhaps even somewhat anarchistic, Russia beset by continued economic crises;
- v. a politically authoritarian and nationalist Russia, unable to cope effectively with its economic dilemmas.

Obviously, many more variants could be listed, but the five above delineate the basic options. And of these five, only the first two would make likely the full attainment in the near future of the more ambitious Russian goals regarding the CIS though quite obviously they would be defined and pursued in strikingly different ways. A truly democratic and prosperous Russia inevitably would be less likely to attempt to coerce other CIS members into an involuntary union. It would be more likely to heed the advice of those liberal Russians who have warned against the view “that the full independence of the former republics would mean greater economic, political, humanitarian and strategic losses for Russia; [that view] also misjudged the outside world’s tolerance of Russian neo-imperialistic policy and the regular use of force, a probable outcome if this course were adopted.”<sup>3</sup>

Instead, Russia’s power of attraction would be derived from the combination of democracy and prosperity. That attraction would be especially powerful if Russia’s prosperity were to be visibly higher and socially more pervasive than that of the neighboring states. Popular pressures within them on behalf of socio-economic integration with Russia would be likely to overwhelm residual nationalist sentiment.

Under such extraordinarily favorable circumstances, the CIS could eventually become a cross between the European Union and NAFTA. And though NAFTA involves an enormous disproportion in power between the United States and its partners (as is the case with Russia in the CIS), the democratic character of the American political system respects and protects the latter’s political sovereignty. In brief, in seeking a more integrated CIS a democratic and prosperous Russia would be more likely to follow the course advocated by Vladimir Lukin, as cited on p. 7 of our introduction.

The second option for Russia's future would involve both a different concept of integration and different means of seeking it. A Pinochet-type Russia, driven by nationalist zeal, led by an energetic military figure (say, Lt.-Gen. Lebed) and sustained by a thriving economy, would be much more likely to become overtly imperialistic. Such a Russia would most probably be imbued with a special sense of a Eurasian mission and subscribe to the Eurasian doctrines. It would also be very tempted to exploit the presence in the "near abroad" of the Russian minorities in order to disrupt and undermine its neighbors, especially in Ukraine and Kazakhstan. In brief, it would define itself in a manner consistent with the views expressed by Aleksandr Rutskoy, cited on page 5 of our introduction.

Since such a Russia would lack a supernational ideology to justify imperial unity, a function that communism performed in the Soviet Union for the non-Russian Soviet political elites, under the second option Moscow would have to rely on Great Russian nationalism to generate among the Russian people the needed enthusiasm and the willingness to use force. That, in turn, would stimulate stronger opposition from the non-Russians, enhancing Moscow's reliance on coercion as the major instrument for the transformation of the CIS into a more traditional hegemonic structure.

For reasons that do not require prolonged elaboration, neither of the above options is very probable—at least not in the near future. The current Russian combination of pluralism, authoritarianism, and anarchy is not likely soon to be transfigured into a stable democracy and genuine prosperity. The requisite political culture of transnational compromise is also lacking. It is, therefore, unlikely that the CIS can evolve voluntarily in the course of a decade or so into a truly integrated structure, centered on Moscow.

Similarly, the recreation of an imperial structure, dominated by an economically powerful and very nationalistic Pinochet-type Russia, seems unlikely. Chile's Pinochet enjoyed the backing of disciplined and unified armed forces. He imposed martial law on a homogeneous nation. And he could tap the talent and competitive energies of a large entrepreneurial class, grounded in a well established free market tradition. None of these conditions currently prevail in Russia. Moreover, since it is very likely that a blatant effort to reestablish the empire would produce violent resistance from the “near abroad,” the costs involved could become prohibitive, even for an economically successful Russia.

Short of these two extremes, the more likely future involves one of the remaining three options. But none of them entails a Russia healthy enough to attain in the next decade or so the more ambitious goal of a politically subordinated and economically integrated CIS. Without both political stability and impressive economic recovery, Russia will simply lack the means either truly to attract or effectively to dictate.

At the same time, it is also important to note that even a weakened or troubled Russia is still bound to be much stronger than any of the newly independent states. Hence continued progress in enhancing the CIS as a Russian-dominated bloc is to be expected. Moreover, since Russia has already made more strides in its geopolitical than in its socio-economic recovery, it is not surprising that by mid- 1995 statements by top Russian officials, who previously had emphasized the importance of economic interdependence, were increasingly stressing the need to create within the entire space of the former Soviet Union (short of the Baltic Republics) “a collective security system,” including central control over the external borders of the CIS. 4

Though Russia’s own evolution, as well as strength, is likely to be decisive insofar as the future is concerned, the degree to which the new states achieve internal viability, and the extent to which they are drawn into wider international cooperation, will also influence the evolving geopolitical landscape. The political consolidation and economic recovery of the new states can be enhanced by closer contacts with the outside world. Increased international recognition as well as economic ties can strengthen the sense of national confidence of the new elites, making it somewhat easier for them to try to evade the more stringent Russian aspirations for the CIS.

However, the central reality is that all of the new states are very vulnerable to Russia's leverage. All of them face serious, in some cases even threatening, domestic problems. Some of these problems have already been exploited by Moscow, and it is safe to assume that it will happen in the future as well. Almost all of the newly independent states have either large Russian minorities and/or are very vulnerable to internal ethnic conflicts. In several cases, particularly in Central Asia, their borders were defined quite arbitrarily by Moscow, thereby creating the preconditions for territorial conflict. The war in the Caucasus between Armenia and Azerbaijan has already greatly weakened the viability of both states, and a replication of such conflicts elsewhere is certainly not to be excluded.

The future of Kazakhstan is especially uncertain. To survive as an independent state, Kazakhstan will have to navigate with extraordinary skill. To avoid a collision with Russia, it will have to support CIS integration even while seeking to dilute it or to favor alternatives to it-while at home the Kazakhstani regime will have to bend over backward to avoid an internal collision between its Kazakh and its Russian citizens. But tensions are rising-and the proposed redesignation in mid-1995 of the country as the Kazakh Republic (instead of, as heretofore, the Republic of Kazakhstan) seems to indicate a more nationalistically assertive Kazakh attitude. It is almost inevitable that internal Kazakhstani-Russian tensions will intensify, as the Kazakh people become more nationalistic and as the Russians become more openly resentful.

Geopolitical and economic support from the outside, while not decisive, could still be of some consequence. For example, one may assume that China would probably prefer an independent Kazakhstan to one that is reintegrated into Russia. Thus the Kazakh regime may be able to take advantage of the Chinese interest to encourage its powerful neighbor to treat Kazakhstan as a useful buffer state. Large-scale international participation in the exploitation of Kazakhstan's energy resources would also contribute to Kazakhstan's economic consolidation, especially if new pipelines to world markets were to be constructed outside of territories under Russian control. Western support for a series of new pipelines would diminish Kazakhstan's vulnerability to Russian leverage.

As already briefly noted, Kazakhstan provides a geographical shelter for the other Central Asian countries. Without an independent Kazakhstan, they will be far more vulnerable to Russian pressures. Their ability to resist such pressures is already weakened by rivalries among them, potential border conflicts, and ongoing ethnic hostility. That ethnic hostility is not only directed at Russian colonists, with the latter often contemptuously hostile toward the new ruling national elites, but it involves intense and often violent antagonisms among the different Moslem tribes and clans, who live within countries that are not yet quite fully homogeneous nation-states.

That internal vulnerability heightens the importance of international support for the new states. The new countries of Central Asia already enjoy the sympathy of Turkey, Pakistan, and Iran, all of whom have a geopolitical as well as a religious interest in Central Asian independence. Turkey has been especially supportive of the region's efforts to give a more modern definition to its national renaissance. Moreover, like Kazakhstan, both Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan are anxious to gain direct access to Western markets. Hence they have also been actively seeking external support for new pipelines as an alternative to the existing ones that run partially through Russian territory. The same is true of oil-rich Azerbaijan, whose geopolitical isolation in the Caucasus can only be overcome if direct pipelines to the West, through non-Russian territory, are internationally financed. <sup>5</sup>In fact, the pipeline issue is becoming in many respects the critical test of the international community's capacity to sustain Central Asia's and Azerbaijan's political independence.

Among the newly independent states, Ukraine towers over all others. Its future, therefore, is going to be of the greatest significance, both for the other CIS members as well as for Russia itself. Ukraine's survival as an independent state, and especially its ability to draw a clear distinction between economic cooperation and political independence, will directly influence not only the future character of the CIS but perhaps even the self-definition of Russia. Indeed, the Eurasian option for Russia would be either meaningless or threatening to Russia without Ukraine. It would really cease to be a "Eurasian" option and become in fact a predominantly Asian option, thereby further widening the traditional gap between Russia and the West. Only with Ukraine reintegrated into Russia might the Eurasian option have some geopolitical and economic validity for Russia.

Without explicitly debating the issue, Ukraine-like Russia thus also faces the grand option of either Europe or Eurasia. But in Kyiv the choices are not cast in the form of a debate over the country's "soul" or "special mission," nor is the debate driven by a quest for great-power status. Rather, the choice is likely to be made pragmatic, dictated by what eventually happens in Ukraine itself. Hence a prediction here is somewhat easier: If Ukraine succeeds politically and economically, it will gravitate toward the European Union and even some form of a relationship with an expanded NATO. Thus its choice will be Europe. If Ukraine fails, it will be sucked into a politically more integrated CIS, and hence Eurasia will also be its destiny.

So far, Ukraine's first five years have been a mixture of surprising political success and persisting economic difficulties. The political success has been twofold: Ukraine has made significant progress in political democratization and it has avoided any major ethnic collision with its large Russian minority. Political democratization has involved a successful presidential transition as well as the absence of the kind of political violence that occurred in Moscow itself. The Ukrainian political elite has demonstrated a considerable ability to compromise when necessary, thereby avoiding head-on collisions.

At the same time, Kyiv's liberal policy regarding ethnic diversity and a general mood in Ukraine of ethnic and linguistic accommodation has avoided any serious ethnic collisions, outside of the rather specific Crimean problem. In fact, many of the 12 million Russian-speaking citizens of Ukraine actually consider themselves to be Ukrainian-not unlike the Irish in Dublin who speak mainly English but feel Irish. Last but not least, a sense of pride in Ukrainian statehood is beginning to permeate the Ukrainian elite, with even those political leaders (like President Leonid Kuchma himself) who had earlier advocated closer economic union with Russia taking an uncompromising stand on the question of national sovereignty.

The economic difficulties remain Ukraine's primary vulnerability. They are also the source of the greatest Russian leverage. However, if it is applied in a heavy-handed fashion, it is likely to reinforce Ukrainian nationalism. Thus both Moscow and Kyiv know that their relations must be guided by a very careful and subtle balancing of political sensitivities and economic realities. The foregoing limits Ukraine's vulnerability to Russian economic leverage while also giving Ukraine some time both to implement economic reforms and to consolidate wider ties with the outside world.

It is noteworthy that international support for Ukrainian independence has been growing. The United States and Western Europe, notably Germany, have come to recognize Ukraine's geopolitical importance and the influence its future is likely to have on Russia's own evolution. As a result, Ukraine has been gaining in external geopolitical and economic support, all of which enhances its long-term prospects. Indeed, if economic reforms are implemented and if political stability continues, five years from now Ukraine, given its resources, population, size, and favorable geographic location, could outstrip Russia in economic recovery.

Paradoxically, Ukraine's political and economic success may be the best hope for Russia itself and for the CIS more generally. A politically independent Ukraine, economically cooperating with Russia-and, over several decades, accustoming Russia to the reality of Ukraine's independence—would also help Russia to make the ultimate choice in favor of the European option over the Eurasian one. The historical dilemma posed in our introduction would then be answered in a positive fashion. In turn, that would permit the evolution of the CIS into a more stable and cooperative system, minimizing some of the unavoidably enduring elements of conflict.

That hopeful prospect is, admittedly, at best a longterm one. Though it is not to be excluded, in the shorter run the dominant trend is likely to remain the Russian effort to infuse the Russian bloc with more overtly hegemonic characteristics. Given the relative weakness and vulnerability of most of the newly independent states, that effort in the foreseeable future is likely to continue to make progress-as this volume demonstrates.

Nonetheless, in the long run, it cannot resolve the fundamental historical reality that neither the old Soviet Union, based on ideological cohesion, nor the Tsarist Russian Empire, superimposed on politically dormant non-Russians, can be recreated. If the CIS is to avoid becoming a geopolitical space dominated by destructive conflicts highly debilitating to Russia itself-the elements of voluntary cooperation must be enhanced by the deliberate forsaking of hegemonic aspirations. That is the historical challenge which the CIS poses to Russia.

5. Despite American reluctance, Turkey, Germany, Britain, and Austria have become actively engaged in supporting a pipeline from Turkmenistan which would bring Turkmen gas to international markets via Iran. Turkey is also very actively engaged in having both Turkmen natural gas and Azerbaijani oil flow through Turkish territory to an outlet on the Mediterranean.

CIS “Hot Spots” Chronologies of Key Events

Introductory Notes

Since the formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States, several civil wars have erupted on former Soviet territory, each one of massive proportions in terms of the violence it has perpetrated and the destruction that has rained down on the new states. The following chronologies address five zones of violent conflict, or “hot spots,” which have erupted on the former territory of the Soviet Union: (a) Chechnya; (b) Abkhazia; (c) Nagorno-Karabakh; (d) the Trans-Dniester Republic; and (e) Tajikistan. The purpose of these chronologies is not simply to give a factual account of developments, but to provide abstracts that depict the political thinking, tactics, strategic reasoning, goals, and interests of the main players in hot spot zones. Their aim is also to provide a sense of the deep problems surrounding the geopolitical self-determination of the post-Soviet states.

Each Hot Spot Chronology offers an abstract of the month-by-month state of play as these conflicts grew, became internationalized, and ebbed into tension-filled holding patterns while players calculated their next moves. Each conflict has provided a convenient rationale for the creation of a Russian power base, either for reasons of conflict resolution, the protection of the minority rights of Russian people living in another CIS state, or border surveillance. Russian military contingents dispatched to sites of conflict are labeled “peacekeeping forces.” These forces play an important role in the constantly evolving interaction between diplomacy and coercion in the CIS hot spots. The chronologies attempt to convey a sense of what the troops being sent to conflict zones have been doing there, of the political conditions that have surrounded them, and of their strategic import, not only for Russia but also for other CIS states.

In several cases, Russia has competed with the United Nations or the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) in trying to provide a plan or deploy international forces in the conflict zone. For example, Russian commentators have called the OSCE plan for a cessation of hostilities in Nagorno-Karabakh “anti-Russian” because it would prevent the deployment of Russian peacekeepers in the Karabakh enclave. Only by monitoring the exhaustive political bargaining and negotiations between Russia, the combatants, and participating mediators, does the larger picture of the role of Russian troops come into clearer focus.

The Chechnya Conflict

Background Note

The Chechen-Ingush Autonomous Republic, a Soviet republic of 1.3 million people situated in the North Caucasus, proclaimed its independence from the Russian Federation in October 1991. This tiny mountainous republic, bordered by Georgia in the south and by the Russian republics of North Ossetia in the west and Dagestan in the east, is the home of a fiercely proud and independent-minded people whose enmity with Russia reaches far back in history. Its oil-rich territory is considered to be of special importance by Russia, because pipelines from Russia's Caspian oil fields wind through Grozny, Chechnya's capital, to the Black Sea, where the oil is pumped aboard tankers for export.

On 27 October 1991 the Chechen separatist leader, General Dzhokhar Dudaev, and his Chechen National Congress forcibly deposed the republic's communist leaders, seized power in Grozny, and declared their intent to break away from Russia. Two weeks later, presidential elections of dubious democratic merit were held among five candidates, resulting in a landslide victory for Dudaev, who subsequently declared the independence of a new state to be known as Chechnya. To date, no other state has recognized Chechnya's independence.

Immediately following the Chechen declaration of independence, Boris Yeltsin declared a state of emergency and commanded Russian troops and tanks to head toward Grozny. Dudaev answered with the creation of the Chechen national guard, appealing to all Muslims to "turn Moscow into a disaster zone." On 10 November, however, the Russian parliament rejected Yeltsin's decision and called for negotiations. Russian troops were commanded to retreat. This dramatic episode was followed on 31 March 1992 by eighteen federative administrative units of the Russian Federation signing a Federation Treaty drafted by Moscow. The Treaty lays out the basic division of powers between Russia and its federative unit governments. Chechnya and Tatarstan, however, refused to initial the document.

For almost three years, Dudaev ruled quasi-independently-free to run his affairs more or less as he wished. Misreading his popularity, Russia's behind-the-scenes assumption seems to have been that Dudaev would be toppled by internal opposition forces. Dudaev faced opposition from within his own power base and from other groups, such as that of Umar Avturkhanov, head of the Chechen Provisional Council, which controlled several districts in the northwest. Russia's support for Avturkhanov, by his own reports, was substantial. In July 1995, on return from a visit to Moscow, he said he had received 2 billion rubles from Russia over the 1992-95 period. Moscow was unable, however, to affect internal political change despite Dudaev's weak hold on the country and its increasingly desperate economic situation.

To the Chechen people, Dzhokhar Dudaev had been something of a hero-the first Chechen in Soviet history to become a general commanding a strategic bomber wing at the age of thirty-six. His family had been deported to Kazakhstan in 1944, the year he was born, along with almost the entire population of the Chechen-Ingush Autonomous District. Stalin had feared the Chechens might collaborate with the Nazis in order to win independence, given the long history of animosity between the Russians and the Chechens. In Kazakhstan, General Dudaev attended elite Soviet military schools and married a Russian woman, Alevtina. He worked his way up to major-general, commanding a division of Soviet strategic bombers based near Tartu, Estonia, from 1987 to 1990. While there, he learned Estonian and showed remarkable tolerance for Estonian nationalism. He even refused to carry out the orders of the Soviet government to shut down the Estonian television and the parliament. He returned to Grozny from Estonia in 1990.

In December 1994, Russia poured out its full strength on the mutinous leader and his republic. The timing of Russia's escalation to use of force, three years after Chechnya's claim of independence, coincided with a dramatic event in the political economy of the region-Azerbaijan's signing of a consortium agreement with Western companies to develop and pipe oil to the West, bypassing Russia. This put Russia's vital interests in the region into clearer perspective for Yeltsin, who apparently could no longer tolerate Dudaev's recalcitrance. Russia apparently viewed the war as necessary in order to assure its role in decisions involving future routes for Azerbaijani energy exports. These exports will take one of two principal routes, either northward through existing pipelines via Grozny, or westward through Georgia and Turkey, thereby boosting the Turkish economy and Turkish influence in Central Asia.

By asserting full control in Chechnya, Russia is also meeting the challenge Turkey poses to its power in the region. With Chechnya pacified, Russia may well be in a good position to argue that the northern route through Grozny is more secure than the western route through Turkey. As this strategy unfolds, Moscow has also put increasing pressure on Azerbaijan's president, Geydar Aliiev, and Georgia's president, Eduard Shevardnadze, who both have consistently supported genuine power-sharing arrangements within the CIS. So far, Aliiev has not succumbed to Russian demands for either stationing Russian troops along the Azerbaijani-Irani border, or participating in a unified air defense system. Georgia, on the other hand, has agreed to the establishment of Russian military bases on its territory.

On 1 November 1994, which is where this chronology begins its evolutionary account, the situation in Chechnya began its tragic descent into violence. The official date of Russia's military attack on Chechnya is 12 December, but fighting is reported to have flared up in early November. The battle reached its highest pitch in mid-December, when Russian tanks, bombers, and ground troops were sent in full force to Grozny after its refusal to heed Yeltsin's ultimatum to lay down arms. Although few Russians would disagree that Moscow has a legitimate claim to Chechnya, which has been part of Russia for more than a century, Yeltsin's decision to use force appears to have won little support among Russian politicians or the public. Even charismatic military leaders have spoken out against the invasion-most notably Aleksandr Lebed, who would play a key role in ratcheting down the conflict in mid-1996, after the reported death of Dudaev and Yeltsin's electoral-season break with the "war party."

Reactions within the other CIS countries have varied. Most leaders supported Moscow, due to its legitimate fears that Chechnya could pose a threat to its territorial stability by encouraging other republics to break away in similar fashion. However, groups of sympathizers in several CIS countries, including Ukraine, Azerbaijan, and Georgia, have surreptitiously participated in the conflict on the side of the Chechens. From the CIS point of view, of great import was Russia's willingness to use overwhelming force in the face of humiliating military reverses. <sup>1</sup>These events have dampened the hopes of many CIS states that a democratic Russia which respects the sovereignty of the newly formed states on its perimeter will emerge from the ruins of the USSR.

In sum, the Russian-Chechen crisis is the sequel to a long history of enmity between the two peoples. The policies of both Boris Yeltsin and Dzhokhar Dudaev were driven by deeply ingrained perceptions of national and ethnic interests. Russia's policies in the war have revealed a side of its new statehood, however, which is being critically questioned in the West as well as by some of its own citizens. The conflict is also being cautiously evaluated by other CIS members who must decide how to structure their own national policies toward Russia. Some leaders, like Eduard Shevardnadze, support Russia's choice of military intervention. Others, perhaps, privately question what it may mean for them.

Note

1. One way to put Russian actions into perspective is to compare them with Serb misconduct in the Bosnian war. At the height of the Bosnian war, Bosnian Serb forces were firing some 3,500 artillery shells per day into Sarajevo. On the other hand, at one point during the Chechnya conflict, Russian aircraft dropped 4,500 bombs (not artillery shells) on Grozny in one hour, producing a vast number of civilian casualties, many of whom were Russians who had stayed in Grozny. Unlike many Chechens, they had no place to go and no rural relatives to take them in-Ed.

Chronology of Key Events

The following chronology starts as the Russian military buildup on the borders of Chechnya begins, in early November 1994. Up to that time, relations between Russia and Chechnya had become highly volatile, according to Russia because of Dudaev's "criminal activities" and the unconstitutionality of his government.

November 1994

1 · Sergey Filatov, Yeltsin's head of administration, suggests the use of force in Chechnya in order to establish a "state of emergency," which would "normalize the situation for ordinary people."

11 · Russian Vice-Premier Sergey Shakhrai calls for the “voluntary resignation of Dzhokhar Dudaev and free democratic elections in Chechnya.”

13 · The Provisional Council, main opposition group to Dudaev, in which Ruslan Khasbulatov is active, says it is likely to receive large contributions of military equipment from “certain CIS countries.” Commander of the Provisional Council’s armed forces is Beslan Gantemirov, who is using armed forces to internally dislodge Dudaev’s government.

15 · Dudaev tells Interfax that he believes Russia and the United States will confront one another in the Middle East, but that Russia will be defeated. Dudaev also calls China a real threat for Russia, citing a “quiet occupation of Russia by China, to which the patient mentality of the Chinese contributes.” He says the interests of Russia and China will clash in Kazakhstan in particular.

17 · Ruslan Khasbulatov says there are still opportunities to resolve the Chechen situation, calling on as many people as possible to rise up against Dudaev in order to solve the problem peacefully. He predicts a Russian invasion-“to teach people a lesson.”

· The Russian Defense Ministry denies that Russian troops are approaching Chechnya, but many tanks manned by Russian crews are reported breaking into Chechen areas from Northern Ossetia.

18 · Dudaev argues in Die Zeit that Russia is forcing Chechnya into war, saying “we are being provoked into launching a counter offensive.” He notes extensive bombing carried out by Russia in efforts to destroy the Chechen economy.

21 · The Chechen General Staff notes the concentration of some 50 armored vehicles and 5 to 6 infantry battalions in the Naura region and troops and equipment building up in neighboring Dagestan. Pavel Grachev continues to deny reports of a Russian build up.

23 · The opposition Chechen Provisional Council, Dudaev oppositionists, launch gunship attacks on Shalinskiy Tank Regiment-Dudaev's main striking force. Press secretary for the Provisional Council Ruslan Martagov says Dudaev forces suffered considerable losses and he makes clear the damage was inflicted by the Provisional Council forces.

24 · Dudaev introduces martial law and mobilizes all Chechen males between the ages of seventeen and sixty.

- The head of the Provisional Council's armed units, Zaimdi Choltaev, says his forces have blockaded Grozny's main routes and approaches.

25 · Provisional Council forces strike down a helicopter and two transport aircraft headed toward the Naura region. Choltaev claims the destroyed aircraft were delivering munitions and weapons to Dudaev forces.

26 · Press reports confirm that Chechen opposition forces have seized the Interior Ministry and the State Security Committee. Fierce battles are under way and the Presidential Palace is set ablaze. Dudaev forces, despite logistical inferiority, resist successfully and launch counteroffensives. They seize 20 armored vehicles, 3 tanks, and a total of 120 people, 58 of whom are Russians, thus proving Russia's involvement in the opposition.

- Dudaev accuses the Russians of "open military intervention" and "open sanctioning of barbaric air raids on civilian and economic installations." But, he says, "there is no weapon in the world capable of breaking the spirit of a people that has risen to fight for its freedom and independence. The true sons of Chechnya and the Caucasus will stand like a solid cliff in the path of the aggressors and will defend the young Chechen state.”

27 · Dudaev asserts that opposition forces operating in Grozny are composed of Russian troops and equipment. Responding to press questions regarding the opposition, Dudaev asks “what internal opposition in the world has ever had assault aircraft? The opposition is Russia.”

- Dudaev captures seventy Russian servicemen and holds them hostage.

28 · Several North Caucasian leaders appeal to Yeltsin to halt the “bloody conflict in Chechnya” and to “ensure the constitutional order and protection of the rights and legal interests of the people.”

- Dudaev holds Russian authorities responsible for the heightened level of conflict. He repeats his request for an objective UN assessment of the situation, threatening to deal with the 200 Russian hostages he now has as “mercenaries and thugs.”

- Duma Chairman Ivan Rybkin says military intervention is well within Yeltsin’s legal domain as guarantor of the Russian Constitution.

- The Democratic Union passes resolution warning of a “Second Caucasian War.” It notes that the last such war lasted forty-seven years (1817-64) and was the longest of all wars waged by the Russian Empire. It notes Russian crimes against the Chechens, including the banishment of all Chechens to Central Asia in 1944. It questions whether the Chechenpeople can now voluntarily submit themselves once again to Moscow’s authority. It calls Moscow's policy to subordinate Chechnya by force not only a crime, but a mistake, just as the Afghan war was. It warns that Russia will never win a final victory and that thousands of Chechens and Russians will perish.

29 · Yeltsin appeals to Chechen combatants to lay down their arms, and issues a forty-eight-hour ultimatum, after which Moscow will declare a "state of emergency" in Chechnya (although he does not say what this means). Musa Merzhurev, Dudaev's spokesman, says the ultimatum will cause all Chechens to unite.

- Dudaev holds an emergency meeting of his Congress to discuss Yeltsin's appeal. Members are split almost evenly between signing the Federation Treaty and continuing the resistance.

- Russian Su-27 combat planes raid Grozny airport. Three hundred people are reported dead and all planes stationed at the airport burned. Dudaev forces strike down Su-27 with a stinger guided missile-allegedly supplied by Islamic leaders in a neighboring state.

December 1994

1 · Moscow secures Georgian leader Eduard Shevardnadze's guarantee that the Chechen-Georgian border will be completely sealed to prevent Georgian sympathizers from joining Chechen separatists.

- Provisional Council leader Umar Avturkhanov calls for a Russian invasion of Chechnya.

- Several hundred volunteers from the Transcaucasus and the Baltic states arrive to join Dudaev's forces.

2 · General Leonid Ivashov, secretary of the CIS Defense Ministers Council, does not rule out sending military observers from the Commonwealth states into Chechnya, but protests that “the conflict in Chechnya is an internal affair, and CIS participation will only be possible with a request from Moscow’s top political leadership.”

3 · Russian forces continue to build up on Chechnya’s borders. General staff team headquarters are established north of Grozny.

4 · Dudaev supports talks with appropriate leaders of the Russian Federation, but demands an immediate end to the military aggression.

- Maj.-Gen. Polyakov resigns over Chechnya.

5 · The former Russian vice-president, Aleksandr Rutskoy, says the country is on the brink of a large-scale war in the North Caucasus. He warns of a tragedy for Russia if it does not close all borders with Chechnya, barring its relations with any Federation republic.

6 · Ruslan Khasbulatov supports Russian federal authorities and calls for a surrender of arms. He criticizes the Provisional Council's military attack on Grozny of 26 November, noting that it failed because of "the absolute lack of preparedness for the operation from a military and political point of view, not Dudaev's strength."

7 · Chechnya forms a government commission for talks with Russia, headed by Finance Minister Taymaz Abubakarov.

8 · Grozny hands over several Russian POWs, captured during the 26 November abortive offensive against Grozny, but says it will continue to hold others.

- Grachev warns of "toughest option" against Chechnya if it does not cease its resistance. Says units of the Armed Forces, Internal Troops, and Spetnatz are concentrated in the North Caucasus to implement this option.

- The Karabakh Intelligence service reports that a special battalion of the Azeri Army has been dispatched to Chechnya to help Dudaev's government.

13 · The Russian Social Democratic Union issues a statement opposing the use of force in Chechnya.

14 · Aide to President Levon Ter-Petrosyan of Armenia says the events in Chechnya are Russia's internal affair, and that events in Chechnya "cannot affect Armenian-Russian relations in any way."

- Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze tells Radio Tbilisi that the policy of genocide will rebound like a boomerang on everyone responsible. Nevertheless, he then tells journalists that no other path of action is available to Russia, and that preservation of territorial integrity is of vital importance to the Russian state.

- Estonians picket the Russian Embassy in Tallinn to protest the invasion of Chechnya.

15 · The Russian ultimatum to surrender arms expires: five aircraft bomb Grozny, killing twenty, mainly Russians. The village of Pervomaiskiy is bombed all night. Russian troops continue to tighten the blockade around Grozny.

- Shevardnadze's office declares that Chechnya has had repercussions in Abkhazia, causing it to declare a full combat alert.

- Latvian Congress condemns Russian military aggression in Chechnya, citing the right of self-determination of peoples. It calls on the Russian government to withdraw its armies.

16 · The Caucasian Confederation of Russia issues a statement saying that war has already begun in Chechnya, which means that war could grip the whole North Caucasus tomorrow. Its position is that Russian troops must be withdrawn and the sides brought to the negotiating table.

- The Lithuanian parliament offers to send a “mission of good will” to Chechnya in order to help restore peace. The offer of mediation would be carried out with a delegation of representatives from all factions of the parliament.

- A discussion between Grigoriy Yavlinskiy and Egor Yakovlev on the events in Chechnya is recorded in Obshchaya Gazeta:

[Yakovlev]: The past week will become the same kind of tragic page in our history as 25 December 1979, the day of our invasion of Afghanistan, or 13 January 1991—the day the bloodshed began in Vilnius.

[Yavlinskiy]: The executive branch has completely cut off whatever was left that connected the Russian administration to society.... As a result of the military gamble all preconditions are in place for the disintegration of the military and the disintegration of the state .... It has become clear for everyone how dangerous the current constitution is. It ensures complete unaccountability of the executive authority. Neither the parliament nor the public can influence the president's actions.... As to the lawmakers' reaction, we should not forget that the Duma is in constant danger of being disbanded. ... They, together with Zhirinovskiy, are willing to take any unscrupulous steps to cover up any action of the president.

[Yakovlev]: The diagnosis of the current event that many agree on is that we are moving in one direction: from a state of emergency in Chechnya to a state of emergency in Russia.

that Russia must defend its state interests and territorial integrity in Chechnya. He adds that if aggressive separatism is not curbed in Chechnya, it could cause the Russian state to disintegrate. “Georgia is interested in the preservation of an integral and stable Russia,” he says.

19 · Russia completely seals off its border with Azerbaijan with border guards. All transport and movement of people will be forbidden.

· ITAR-TASS announces that no volunteer detachments to aid Dudaev’s regime have been organized in any North Caucasus republic. The ITAR-TASS correspondent held talks with leaders of Dagestan, Kabardino-Balkaria, Adygeya, Ingushetia, and Karachaevo-Cherkessia. They all stressed that statements made by the nationalist Confederation of Caucasian Peoples were untrue. The leaders did express their intent to offer humanitarian aid, however.

20 · Ukrainian Ministry advises Ukrainian citizens temporarily staying in Chechnya and caught in the conflict zone not to take part in the confrontation.

21 · Chechen Vice-President Zelimkhan Yandarbiev urges international organizations not to send humanitarian aid to Grozny, “as the city is blocked by Russians and it is they who get everything.” He says the Russian Army is using chemical weapons which cause damage to the skin.

· Fierce fighting continues in northern Grozny, which is bombed many times during the night. Dudaev calls again for peace talks with Russia, but on equal terms for both parties. He says there is no response from Russia.

· Dudaev blames the West’s policy of non-interference for Russia’s actions. He is also angry that a summit of Muslim countries in the Moroccan city of Casablanca did not produce a statement of support for Chechnya. Following the conference, however, Libya, Iran, and Saudi Arabia all issued statements on the Chechen problem.

22 · Dudaev says on republican television that it is better to die with honor in accordance with the laws of a holy war than to enter into slavery. He calls on his fellow believers to fight against the “satanic methods of Russia.”

24 · As of 24 December, nearly 24,000 forced emigrants from Chechnya have been registered in various Caucasian republics.

25 · Ruslan Khasbulatov, reiterating what Russian officials have said, says that an all-out assault has not yet begun. He estimates that between 150,000 and 180,000 residents remain in the city and that about 1,000 residents have been killed so far.

27 · Yeltsin orders an end to the bombing of Grozny and stresses that a political solution is still possible. He also appeals to Russian servicemen in Chechnya to disarm the bandit formations.

· Vladimir Smirnov, chief of the Russian Federation President’s Expert Council and chairman of the “Military for Democracy” movement, resigns saying: “As chairman of the coordinating council of the ‘Military for Democracy’ movement, I cannot allow my name to be linked directly or indirectly to the military adventurists in state structures. The military adventure in Chechnya is just the last straw, and it is to all intents and purposes the consequence of the policy pursued by our military leadership. From my standpoint, military reform is entirely lacking and the defense minister has no idea of what needs to be done or how to go about it.”

· The Moscow Helsinki Group and a number of other human rights groups picket in front of the administration building of the Russian president in protest against the bloodshed in Chechnya.

28 · Valentin Sergeev, head of the Russian government press service, says that Russian troops are performing operations aimed at getting closer to the outskirts of Grozny, but that no assault has begun.

· Speaking about the Russian blockade of its borders with Azerbaijan, Azeri state advisor for foreign policy says: “Events in Chechnya are harmful for Russia since they exert influence on the international rating of the Russian state, and on its image as peacekeeper of regional and ethnic conflicts settlement.”

30 · Chairman of the Dagestan State Council, Magomed- Ali Magomedov, says that not a single soldier has gone to Chechnya, but that Dagestan “welcomes refugees from Chechnya and has rendered medical and humanitarian assistance to them.”

· Dudaev’s proposal for a New Year’s ceasefire goes unheeded, and heavy bombing in Grozny’s suburbs continues. In an interview, Dudaev says he will accept any condition for talks, except disarmament of the Chechen people.

31 · Dudaev, in his New Year’s address to the people, says, “Despite the great might of the Russian army which is attacking Grozny, we have won a moral victory. Nineteenninety-five will become the year of a powerful moral upsurge for the people of Chechnya.”

1 · Yeltsin issues an edict creating a Temporary Oversight Commission for Observance of Citizens' Constitutional Rights and Freedoms, to be formed from representatives of the Russian Federation Presidential Staff and the Federal Assembly Federation Council and State Duma. V.A. Kovalev, deputy chairman of the Federal Assembly State Duma, is appointed chairman of the Commission. The Commission's duty is to monitor compliance with the Russian Constitution of actions taken by subunits of the Russian Armed Forces and Russian Ministry of Internal Affairs Troops. The Russian Federation Presidential staff is to provide financial, informational, and material support for the Commission's activity. The Commission is to operate until "constitutional legality" is restored in Chechnya.

2 · Viktor Sheynis, Russian State Duma deputy, after visiting Grozny, reports to the Duma: "This operation is monstrous in the way it was planned and in the way it is being carried out. Houses are being destroyed. The center of Grozny is on fire. The refinery is also on fire. Information that Grozny has been taken under control by the government forces is a blatant lie."

3 · Georgian president, Eduard Shevardnadze, announces that camps have been set up in Abkhazia where militants are being trained to be sent to Grozny. Shevardnadze proposes that Georgian and Russian border troops should erect strict joint controls on the border.

4 · Through the German ambassador, the European Union countries protest to Russia over the bloodbath in Chechnya. Internal disagreements among the EU countries have prevented any statement until now. Danish Foreign Minister Helveg Petersen denies that the EU will recognize Chechen independence, and says Chechnya cannot be compared with the Baltic states, which the EU never recognized as Soviet republics.

· The OSCE proposes to send a group of experts to Chechnya to observe the human rights situation there.

- Lt.-Gen. Aleksandr Lebed says “the Chechen problem cannot be resolved by military means.”

- Human rights activist Sergey Kovalev says he expects that Russian troops will storm Grozny the next day. He sharply attacks the tactics of the Russian Defense Ministry and other power ministries, saying Grozny is already nothing but ruins which remind him of pictures of Stalingrad during the Great Fatherland War. He will go to Moscow and insist on talking with Boris Yeltsin, whom he calls responsible for events in Chechnya.

- ITAR-TASS reports seventy-eight incidents involving journalists in the zone of conflict in Chechnya since 1 December, in which the rights of the press were violated. Reports of Interior troops opening fire on journalists, and detention of foreign journalists have been corroborated by reliable sources in the area.

- Grigoriy Yavlinskiy, leader of the Yabloko parliamentary group, calls on Yeltsin to volunteer his resignation as a result of the events in the Chechen Republic. He notes: “We think it is indisputable that neither Boris Yeltsin nor his ministers in Army uniform can now settle the conflict in Chechnya. There is one way out; they should go for the sake of our country’s future.” The President’s dismissal is impossible both formally and juridically, which is why Yabloko calls for voluntary resignation.

5 · The Russian Federal Migration Service reports that more than 130,000 people have left Chechnya since the start of the military action.

- The president’s palace in Grozny is bombed. (The bunker below the palace, however, reportedly remains intact.)

6 · Downtown Grozny is reported still under the control of Chechen volunteers. The Russians do not know where Dzhokhar Dudaev is at this time. A military source in Mozdok emphasizes the fact that the Russian forces have started a new tactic-the use of small mobile groups to “cleanse” Grozny of “bandit forces.”

- Russian Interior Forces report that the Russian-appointed “government of Chechnya’s national revival,” headed by Salambek Khadzhiev, former USSR minister of the oil industry, is expected to come to Grozny that day. This government is composed of Dudaev’s adversaries.

- The head of the Chechen National Revival Government, Salambek Khadzhiev, begins his work. In an interview, he is asked how long he expects to work in this capacity. He responds that it depends on how long it takes for the situation to return to “normal.” He thinks this will take five or six months in the short time-frame, or eighteen months in the long time-frame.

10 · An interview with Dudaev is recorded in Zavtra: [Dudaev]: “About 100 nationalities live here in Chechnya- Russians, Chechens, Jews, Armenians. They are living, as the saying goes, in cramped quarters. De jure they are citizens of one country. Whom are they disturbing? Why are they being bombed, and why are missile strikes being delivered on them? Why even be surprised that the bombing starts and stops on command-that yesterday a Duma delegation of Yushenkov was here, and today a new air strike will be delivered on Grozny!”

- An interview with the president of North Ossetia is recorded in Severnaya Osetiya. President A.Zh. Galazov says: “I do not think that the Chechnya problem can be separated from the overall chain of events linked to the collapse of the former Soviet Union. Chechnya is the only one of the links in this chain that is associated with the tragedies of Nagorno-Karabakh, South Ossetia, Abkhazia, Ingushetia, and North Ossetia.”
- Salambek Khadzhiev, prime minister of the Government for National Revival of the Chechen Republic, says he intends to set up a system of aid for the refugees, then gather together a number of managers, primarily of plants and industrial facilities, to think about restoring the refineries and other plants. Asked what are the government's levers of control, he replies: "the personal influence of the leaders," and "the economic influence of Russia." He says the program of economic recovery will cost in the neighborhood of 1 trillion rubles.

· A military journalist writes in Krasnaya Zvezda about the Chechen forces: "We were initially told that there were only a few bandit formations operating in the city, and that the internal troops would be able to disarm them. We now realize that everything has turned out to be far more complex. There are well-trained and superbly armed and equipped military formations of mercenaries and professionals operating in Chechnya.... And they have no shortage of patrons or instructors. Russian troops are finding the going even harder in Grozny itself. The streets have been cleverly closed off with concrete blocks in such a way that combat hardware has fallen into specially primed 'mousetraps' and is then fired upon from overlooking apartment windows."

· According to Grozny sources more than thirty chemical bombs were dropped on Grozny on 9 January. The Russians bombed the city the whole day. Before the dropping of the chemical bombs, units of Russian troops left the positions from which they bombarded the city. Grozny sources also report that the Russian military leadership is sending soldiers to Chechnya belonging to ethnic minorities, mostly Chuvashs, Mordvins, Tatars, Bashkirs, Komi, Kalmyks, and Marii.

- The Russian Ministry of Economics estimates the cost of rebuilding the housing stock, engineering installations, and other facilities this year could run between 2.3 trillion and 2.7 trillion rubles. The likely cost of restoring the oil and gas complex will run to at least 800 billion rubles (although the oil stock could yield an immediate financial return). The most cautious estimates of the economic losses in 1995 from the Chechnya war range between 3.1 trillion and 3.5 trillion rubles.

- In an interview in Baku, special representative of the Russian president to Chechnya cannot answer the questions: “Why didn’t Moscow react to Dzhokhar Dudaev’s proposal to begin political negotiations without preliminary terms?” or “Why doesn’t Russia use the very methods and means that it recommends to its neighbors, in particular Azerbaijan, for settlement of its internal problems?”

- ITAR-TASS reports on Foreign Minister Kozyrev’s statement to representatives of the OSCE leadership and the Hungarian ambassador on 10 January, namely that “restoration of constitutional order in Chechnya is Russia’s aim,” and “it is an internal affair of the Russian Federation.” He says the OSCE delegation is concentrating solely on humanitarian rights. Their task, he says, is to restore the validity of all rights and freedoms that were infringed by the Dudaev regime for three years on Chechen territory.

- A forty-eight-hour truce is declared in Chechnya on 10 January. The truce saves the lives of hundreds of city residents, who gather in the streets after weeks of cold and starvation.

12 · At 8:00 A.M., the morning of the expiration of the forty-eight-hour truce, gunfire opens on Grozny. Russian aircraft is also heard overflying the capital. The president's palace remains the main target of the Russian forces.

- Viktor Chernomyrdin meets with members of the Chechnya diaspora in Moscow, and says that political methods should be used to resolve the Chechen conflict. These methods include the creation of peace zones and amnesty for members of illegal armed units who voluntarily lay down heavy arms, and a broad dialogue on political settlement in Chechnya among the Chechen people and their representatives.

- Izvestiya reports that Chernomyrdin has taken over command of the whole Chechen operation. He has approved a plan for the recreation of structures of power in Chechnya, including a transitional government and restoration of the economic life. A. Volskiy, as a member of the conciliation commission, is contacting Chechen entrepreneurs. R. Abdulatipov is preparing a meeting with the republic's religious leaders. Shumeyko is gathering together leaders of the republics, krays, and oblasts of the North Caucasus in order that they can provide assistance in restoring organs of power and government in Chechnya. Yeltsin has begun consultations with North Caucasus leaders. Still, according to the article, the disarmament of Dudaev's guerrillas is the sine qua non for the Kremlin. The Army will remain in Grozny under arms. This means danger of further bloodshed. But Filatov has given assurances that a shift has been made toward non-violence.

17 · Military expert Sergey Surozhtsev, writing in

Novoya Vremya, says: “It is now absolutely clear that long before the official decision of the Security Council on the introduction of forces into Chechnya, the Russian forces and special services had taken the unequivocal course of using force to resolve the conflict with Grozny, although political methods were by no means exhausted.” The work was done crudely and soon both the Russian and foreign press began to shed light on the “activity” of the bodies of the counterintelligence service and the Main Intelligence Directorate of the Defense Ministry, whose representatives did everything they could to avoid secret participation in the “establishment of constitutional order in Chechnya.” One of the representatives of the opposition once appeared on Russian television and openly demanded that Moscow cease delivery of old combat equipment and send the most up-to-date equipment. In conclusion, Surozhtsev says that Grachev sent in ten regiments (almost eight times what the “enemy” had), but still does not have complete control of Chechnya. The Russian Army has suffered huge losses of manpower and combat equipment. He says the armed forces must be completely reformed.

18 · Konstantin Zatulin, chairman of the State Duma’s committee for CIS affairs, tells press correspondents that the Chechen conflict has seriously complicated perspectives of integration processes within the Commonwealth. “One can speak of integration seriously only with Belarus,” Zatulin said. In light of the Chechen conflict, certain CIS member states have attempted to distance themselves from Russia, he said. In particular, he mentioned Ukraine. But, he added, the war in Chechnya will not stop after Grozny is seized. In his opinion, Chechnya will play the part of Nagorno-Karabakh in Russia. He criticized the executive branch for “incompetence.”

· Vladimir Shumeyko, speaker of the Russian parliament’s upper house, does not rule out the imposition of a “state of emergency” in Chechnya, which he defines as: “a special legal regime which is to help restore order by using interior troops only, without resorting to heavy weapons.”

· Dudaev makes the statement that: “This conflict cannot be solved by military means. Even if you bring all the armies together it is impossible to crush the nation’s spirit; it is a gift of nature. The Almighty created the Chechen people so that they could not be slaves. This struggle has been going on for 300 years.”

28 · Izvestiya reports that since 25 January, the Central Bank of Russia has started to manage the country's banking system with a consideration for national identity. Dagestan, North Ossetia, Kabardino-Balkaria, and Karachaevo-Cherkassia were sent the following telegram: “In the future, until special instructions, the following procedure is established for the clients of commercial banks. Cash operations by commercial banks are forbidden. Cash may only be paid out by offices of the Central Bank of Russia, strictly for wages, pensions, and social needs. Other payments are banned.” Thus, the Central Bank is being mobilized for operations being conducted in Chechnya. The reporter goes on to remark that the Central Bank's policy is not only offensive to bankers, it is “simply stupid.” Money for Dudaev's supporters can be brought in from any part of the country-whether it is brought in from Dagestan or not makes no difference. He also points out that: “The Central Bank suspects the Southern republics of complicity with Dudaev although this contradicts the Russian authorities' story that the conflict is of a local nature and the people who fueled it do not enjoy support from their neighbors.”

29 · Writing in Moskovskie Novosti, Sanobar Shermatova considers the impact of the Chechen war on two former republics-Tajikistan and Azerbaijan. In Tajikistan, she says, “President Emomali Rakhmonov has spoken for the first time about the need for an armistice with the opposition as a decisive factor in stabilizing the situation in the country ... ” She says that “some explain the president's statement by his shaken faith in the might of his military ally and by the necessity of independently settling relations with the opposition.” In Azerbaijan, she says, the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs has an account to settle with President Geydar Aliev. “Throughout the past year and a half, Aliev step by step has been outplaying his opponents, by making concessions but invariably striving to achieve his goals. With the arrival of Aliev, Azerbaijan joined the CIS, but refused to let the Russians establish military bases on its territory or border forces on the border with Iran.” But she says that Azerbaijan is being punished for its wins. The blockade of Chechnya has drawn a noose around its economy, which has deprived it of foreign shipments. The economy is expected to plummet further in coming months. She cites that a million refugees are in Azerbaijan, and almost 20 percent of the territory has been occupied. A major new offensive by Armenian forces in Karabakh could promote the next overthrow.

1 · The Russian government press reports that they have data which shows that the militants are getting ready to start sabotage activities, such as blowing up the dam of the reservoir.

· Segodnya correspondent writes an article about Russian cabinet fears that Chechnya might become the economy’s “black hole,” sucking in huge sums of money. It is likely, they also fear, that criminal structures will rally around the flow of capital into Chechnya, which will render it unstoppable. This would collapse the policy of financial stabilization, the ruble’s crash, hyperinflation, and an increase in regional separatism. Moreover, cabinet members fear that regional elites might draw on the Chechen precedent as a means of pressuring Moscow to receive substantial funding with no strings attached. The article goes on to say that many government experts believe that “not a ruble from the federal budget should be invested in the reconstruction of the Chechen economy. Even the oil processing and oil industries are unattractive.” He points out that experts are saying that the population is leaving Chechnya anyway, and is unlikely to return. For this reason, some in the government believe it more advisable to “help them settle down elsewhere.” The most convenient regions, he says, are said to be Krasnodar kray and Rostov oblast. In this way, the cost of rebuilding Chechnya’s social infrastructure can be cut fifteenfold. Government officials dealing with the problem believe that all funds being channeled to Chechnya should be handed to a federal body that will run the republic until elections can be held. In the specialists' view, giving Chechnya any tax breaks or export benefits would be impermissible.

2 · Salambek Khadzhiev, head of the Government of National Revival, accuses the Russian mafia of having run Chechnya for the past three years. He gives the following figures: "In the period 1991-1994 Russia pumped 20-30 million tons of oil to Dudaev. There flowed back-after refining-at best 50 percent. But here there are also the subtle details of payment to be taken into account; you could delay payment or salt money away in convenient banks. In general, there were many ruses here capable of producing big money."

· Anatoliy Kulikov, deputy Interior Minister and commander of Russia's Interior Ministry's troops in Chechnya, is appointed head of the joint command of the Russian group of forces on the Chechen territory. He tells reporters Chechnya is a "completely criminal zone and a completely militarized zone." He says further that the West is not supporting Dudaev because it understands what is behind him.

He quotes a passage from Dudaev's book The Thorny Path to Freedom, which he says proves that Dudaev is an international terrorist.

7 · Russian combined forces establish control over strategic facilities in the center of Grozny. Dudaev's supporters move to the southern and eastern districts of Grozny, where one-story private houses are located. A Russian government spokesman tells the press that “Russian Interior Ministry troops will perform mopping-up operations in these districts.”

8 · As before in history, the Sundzha River becomes the major confrontation line between the federation forces and Chechen formations. A spokesman for Dudaev says Dudaev’s formations still possess “a substantial amount” of heavy military equipment, in particular tanks. According to him, Dudaev’s home guards have captured seventy-two units of Russian armored vehicles during the first two weeks of this operation.

9 · Dudaev orders the Chechen armed forces to immediately evacuate Grozny. The city will be surrendered to Russian forces at midnight. The Chechen defense committee says this does not mean, however, that the Russians will be in control of the situation. Dudaev orders his mobile assault groups to remain in the city and to conduct guerrilla warfare behind the lines of the Russian troops.

· Large parts of Grozny are ablaze as Russian troops move to cut off the last remaining road leading south from Grozny. A senior Chechen military commander, Aslambek Abdulkhadzhiev, says that the city will “blow sky high.” “There are a lot of secrets in Grozny,” he adds, referring to unnamed tools with which to destroy the city. “We’ll build a new city.”

· Russian Chief of Staff Col.-Gen. Mikhail Kolesnikov tells reporters that Dudaev “has gone mad and he must be destroyed.” . . . “There is no need for a court trial, investigation, and collection of evidence,” he stresses.

He says Federation forces know about the possible places where Dudaev can stay.

· Konstantin Borovoy, leader of the Economic Freedom Party, gives an interview to Obshchaya Gazeta, in which he says he has spoken with Dzhokhar Dudaev in person. He says he was escorted to Dudaev by his people. He says the main purpose of his trip was “to convince Dudaev that the citizens of Russia, the mass of them, do not support the war in Chechnya and that terrorist acts against Russia’s civilian population are unfair.” He reports that Dudaev said that the image of the Chechen terrorist is being created by the Federal Counterintelligence Service (FCS). Following the meeting, Borovoy met with Col.-Gen. Kulikov, who asked whether Dudaev would not agree to surrender voluntarily. Borovoy says he explained that there is no way one can hope for that. He tells Kulikov that Russia “has effectively lost the war, so why resist?” He says Kulikov responded: “Oh come on, in three days we shall encircle Grozny and then everything will be over.” Borovoy says: “My impression from these talks and from our military is that the sense of realism has been fully lost.”

· Moscow News publishes a survey of Russian public attitudes toward the war in Chechnya. The data show that 42 percent would definitely “vote for opponents of the war” in the next election, while 25 percent were undecided if it would affect their choice of a candidate.

14 · Professor Sayed Abdullo Nuri, leader of the Islamic Revival Movement in Tajikistan, tells the press that “Today we cannot say that the Muslim people of Chechnya have been defeated or that they have failed. This is no defeat; it is the light of jihad and struggle.

These people have our enemy, our colonialist, by the throat. In the near future, we will see that this phenomenon will arise in Dagestan and then come to the Ingush. This movement will continue in the whole of the area.”

16 · Yeltsin issues a decree containing measures to restore the economy and social sphere of the Chechen Republic. He sets up a State Commission for the Restoration of the Economy and Social Sphere, to be formed from Federation executive agencies.

· Russian Security Council Secretary Oleg Lobov says federal authorities are ready to negotiate “practically at any level.” He puts great emphasis on current talks between commander of the Russian interior troops Anatoliy Kulikov and chief of the Chechen staff Aslan Maskhadov. The Security Council has decided that the talks, now mediated by Ingushetia, should possibly involve other parties, he says.

- A report obtained from allegedly “reliable sources” says the Security Council orders all structures engaged in restoring Chechnya order should give priority to the Russian population of Chechnya in all cases-in the distribution of humanitarian aid and in allocating posts in the reestablished local administrations.

17 · Dudaev’s elder brother is reported arrested in Grozny. There is no immediate confirmation of the arrest.

- Chechen mufti leader, Muhamed Alsabekov, says the clergymen are looking for peaceful ways out of the present situation. He says that in talks with Viktor Chernomyrdin he was promised that Moscow would not send its representative to rule Chechnya. He remarks that “the Muslim leaders will support neither Ruslan Khasbulatov, nor Salambek Khadzhiev or Umar Avturkhanov while forming new power bodies.... New leaders will appear during the peace settlement.”

20 · Minister Grachev tells the press that the only viable scenario for resolution of the conflict is an ultimatum from federal troops demanding a total arms surrender by the militants. Defending the Russian operation thus far, he says: “We came up against a situation in which the correlation of forces along the main thrusts of the operation was one to three in favor of the opponent.”

- A spokesman for the Russian Ministry of Defense confirms the arrest of Dudaev’s elder brother, Bekmurza Dudaev, who is being questioned by counterintelligence officers.

23 · Yeltsin creates an office in the presidential staff to represent the Chechen Republic. A document is issued which says this step was motivated by the need to ensure representation of the republic in the federal bodies of power.

28 · Director of the Institute of Economic Analysis Andrey Illarionov tells the press that expenditures for the operation of the federal forces in Chechnya are about $5 billion, or 2.5 percent of the Russian GNP. He says these estimates do not include assets needed to restore the republic’s economy. Illarionov adds that expenditures for defense amounted to 4.1 percent of the GNP over eleven months of 1994, and jumped to 6.6 percent in December, resulting in a growth of the budget deficit to 10.4 percent of the GNP.

- Baltic groups for parliamentary relations with Chechnya maintain that the West does not analyze, and evades the main problem of Chechnya-the nation’s right to self-determination-and by supporting Russia carries out an amoral policy.

- The UN human rights commission calls for immediate termination of the combat operations and of violations of human rights in Chechnya. It calls upon the UN Supreme Human Rights Commissioner to continue his dialogue with the Russian government.

6 · The European Union refuses to sign an interim agreement on trade and partnership with Russia until an effective ceasefire in Chechnya is reached. Sources clarify that the active military operations in Chechnya over the weekend made signing the document impossible.

· The Western press reports that Dudaev formations are still getting into Grozny at night and killing Russian soldiers. One pocket of militants is still fighting in Grozny despite Moscow's claim that it had wiped out the last bastion of Chechen resistance.

9 · The OSCE announces its intention to establish a permanent mission in the Chechen republic.

· Dudaev relays a message to the Lithuanian press, telling reporters that the war in Chechnya may last for fifty years.

· Chechen television is reestablished with the help of Krasnodar and Stavropol territory. Telecasting is based at Znamenskoe, carries 1.5 hours per day, and covers 500 km. Subjects of programming include disarmament of Chechen units, settlement initiatives of the Russian command, and economic problems of Chechnya.

10 · Dudaev announces a general mobilization in the country and calls for implementation of the Muslim laws of Shari'ah in Chechnya.

· Russians shell the Argun area for three hours, then send in T-80 and T-72 tanks to break the defense line of Chechen volunteers.

11 · German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel says that Russia's handling of the Chechen crisis has serious repercussions on the network of international relations in which Russia moves. He refers to the IMF which will delay negotiations on a $6.3 billion credit program.

- The foreign minister of France says the EU is determined as never before to promote economic and democratic reforms in Russia. He says the Chechen crisis undermines the partnership between the EU and Russia. At the same time, he says the EU does not favor isolating Russia.

- Moscow radio reports that a congress of the Chechen people is held in Shali under the chairmanship of Dudaev.

The congress adopts a resolution that, henceforth, the country will live according to military law and that the town of Shali has been declared the new capital of Chechnya.

14 · Head of the presidential administration, Sergey Filatov, rules out the possibility that Dzhokhar Dudaev could take part in talks on a peace settlement of the Chechen conflict. He accuses Dudaev of "global-scale human rights violations."

- A Dudaev aide, Khamad Kurbanov, tells reporters that negotiations on principles of Chechnya's integration in Russia are possible. He made the statement after a briefwalk-out by Dudaev's supporters in protest of a speech made by Salambek Khadzhiev.

- Participants of the "Peace Initiative in the Caucasus" conference held in Moscow approve a plan for gradual settlement of the Chechen crisis. The plan outlines several stages, ending with a treaty between the Russian Federation and the Chechen Republic on the division of powers, similar to the one signed between Russia and Tatarstan.

18 · Commander of the Chechen troops, Aslan Maskhadov, tells "Vesti" news that the Russians now say they will capture Shali. But he asks "So what?" Even if they do, he says, the war will continue until the last Chechen is killed. (Other reports suggest that not all Chechens are willing to die for General Dudaev.)

- Nikolay Semenov, head of the territorial administration, reports that Russia has contributed 12.5

billion rubles to Chechnya to pay overdue salaries to employees of state organizations.

19 · Russian warplanes bomb Shali, killing at least four. A major offensive is launched against Dudaev's strongholds- Argun, Gudermes, and Shali-bringing them under constant air and missile attack.

23 · Boris Yeltsin issues a decree "On Interim Bodies of State Authority in the Chechen Republic" creating a Committee of National Reconciliation, which is to find ways to achieve reconciliation, and to draw up a draft constitution of the Chechen Republic, and stage free elections in Chechnya. The committee is to assume that executive power in the republic will be exercised by the national Revival Government of the Chechen Republic (under Prime Minister Khadzhiev) until a body of executive authority is set up in compliance with its new constitution in accordance with the decision of the Provisional Council of the Chechen Republic.

· News agencies announce that Dudaev has moved his headquarters from Shali, but the whereabouts of the new headquarters is unknown.

24 · A Chechen radio station, "Svobodnyy Kavkaz" (Free Caucasus), is set up in Krakow. A representative of the Chechen information center in Krakow, which was established on 13 January, said the radio would go on the air this year. The Russian embassy in Poland protested against the programs of the Chechen Information Center. Its protest was dismissed on grounds that the Center was engaged in humanitarian activities.

· OSCE representative Istvan Gyarmati returns from Chechnya to Moscow and tells the press that he hopes the OSCE can help create the framework for real talks.

28 · The OSCE says it plans to open a permanent mission in Grozny as early as mid-April, fearing the war in Chechnya could spread to neighboring republics. The mission's role would be to mediate between the Russian authorities and the international community over problems concerning the delivery of humanitarian aid, citing French medical aid group whose doctors were banned by the Russians over allegations they were smuggling weapons to rebel Chechens.

29 · State Duma Deputy Vladimir Lysenko publishes an article in Trud, describing the Chechnya war in stark terms. He accuses the war party in Moscow of trying to prosecute the Chechen war to its "victorious conclusion," that is to say full control over the whole territory of the republic by force. He charges this group with being afraid to face the grim responsibility for their deeds, thus prolonging the judgment day. He predicts that under this scenario, Russia will end up with another Ulster in the North Caucasus. Another scenario would be immediate withdrawal of federal troops and granting self-determination to the Chechen Republic. But he says this "recognition of one's own defeat" is unacceptable to the Russian leadership. He ends by condemning both the military scenario and the political policy of forming a federal government on Chechen territory. He defends the right of the Chechen people to select their own leaders and calls for Moscow to put its political ambitions to one side.

30 · The issue of the Caspian oil deal, which has become more complex due to Chechnya, is examined by radio Turan commentators in Baku. The Kurdish separatists want to lay the pipeline from Azerbaijan through the eastern regions of Turkey, which they call Kurdistan. Turkey wishes to lay the oil pipeline through its eastern regions (after eliminating the Kurds) to the Mediterranean coast. Several Russian sources have confirmed, the radio commentators say, that Moscow and Ankara agree that Turkey will not interfere in Chechnya and Russia will turn a blind eye to the suppression of the Kurdish movements by Ankara. Russia's Foreign Ministry has indirectly confirmed this understanding by expressing its sympathy with Turkey's problems on the border with Iraq, and Ankara has announced its understanding in the matter of genocide against the Chechens by the Russian army.

4 · Kommersant-Daily carries an article in which costs of economic reconstruction in Chechnya are examined. The total figure is estimated at 5.3 trillion rubles. This includes replacement of the housing stock on which 450 billion rubles must be spent and reconstruction of the fuel and energy complex, which will cost about 539 billion rubles. Until the plan drawn up by the State Commission on Rebuilding Chechnya, the banks will grant a credit against a government guarantee. The credit will be paid out of Chechen oil exports. It has been proposed to exempt the republic's oil exports from all duties and taxes, which will earn 360 billion rubles in 1995 alone.

- Federation forces took Shali and Gudermes, says Kommersant-Daily writer D. Kamyshev. But this does not mean disarmament. Dudaev is ready for new battles, presumably from mountainous areas which can be cut off from the rest of Chechnya, which will be "peaceful."

- The press carries reports of refugees continuing to pour into Dagestan. Officially registered so far are 75,544 refugees. Some 30,000 have yet to register.

- Nikolay Starodymov writes in Krasnaya Zvezda that with the taking of Shali and Gudermes it may confidently be said that there no longer exists a unified front of struggle by Dudaev's supporters against federation troops. A turning point in the military confrontation has been reached-at least where heavy artillery is concerned.

5 · Rumors have spread that Dudaev's militants are trying to relocate gradually to Dagestan, taking positions in the mountain regions. Dagestan stresses that the rumors are unfounded.

· Russian aircraft resume shelling in the southwest portions of Chechnya.

6 · Emil Payin, leader of interethnic relations in the President's Analysis Center and member of the Presidential Council, says guerrilla warfare is likely to develop. He says that Dudaev was never a universal national hero in Chechnya, but a popular military leader. With his military defeat, his popularity will decrease.

11 · The Chechen Defense Council, headed by Dzhokhar Dudaev, states that it is "still committed to a political settlement of the conflict between Chechens and Moscow," attempting to include itself in the political settlement process despite the odds. Dudaev continues to say the war will cease if Russia will withdraw its troops, but if not the war will continue.

24 · A "Peace and Accord" Charter is signed by in Grozny detailing the aspects for settlement. Key provisions include:

1. immediate cessation of hostilities;
2. amnesty to be offered by the Russian parliament for those engaged in "illegal activities" in the separatists' movement;
3. disbanding armed formations and confiscation of their equipment and weaponry;
4. preparations for general elections to legislative bodies of power in Chechnya;

5. establishment of national accord committees in every town and district.

Signatories to the charter, according to the Russian press service, were Chechen leaders Umar Avturkhanov, Salambek Khadzhiev, and Mufti Muhamad Arsanukaev and federal representatives Nikolay Semenov and Aleksandr Babak. All of the Chechen signatures, however, were those of leaders installed by a Russian presidential decree, not those of the Dudaev regime.

28 · Separatists forces agree to a ceasefire after talks with Russian Army force commander Gennadiy Troshev. Troshev tells reporters that Chechen military commander Maskhadov “agreed to a ceasefire, did not object to proposals to allow the militants [to] go home and not to persecute those who fought against the federal troops.” Maskhadov did not, however, agree to disarm and said the fighters will do so only when Russian troops fully leave Chechnya.

29 · Interfax quotes Dudaev as saying that the Chechens “do not need interim truce, moratorium, or amnesty from Russia” and that such attempts are merely Moscow’s efforts to demonstrate its “peaceable disposition in the face of the world and at deepening collapse in the Chechen territory.”

30 · Despite the moratorium on continued fighting, skirmishes continue in many villages, most of which occur at night. OSCE delegate to Chechnya Sander Meszaros says both sides are in violation as shooting and cannon fire is widespread near the Bamut village, Vedeno, and around Grozny. He says that should the sides observe the moratorium, there is a good chance for successful negotiations, based on his group's assessment of the situation.

1 · Eight hundred to two thousand separatist fighters are reported in and around Grozny covertly continuing combat operations, according to Russian press services. Four hundred operate as snipers and several Russian servicemen were killed by sniper fire. Most federal troop units in Grozny enter into combat activity daily.

4 · Russian First Deputy Prime Minister Oleg Soskovets announces a government of national revival has been formed in Chechnya. He notes the body “faces a lot of difficulties” and includes some members “unloyal to the federal government.” He urges continued dialogue and blames Dudaev for violating the moratorium on combat actions.

· An article in Moscow’s Segodnya discusses morale and psychological problems emerging within Russian troops of the Ministry of Internal Affairs (MVD). Author Leonid Kostrov talks of “Chechnya syndrome” in which MVD servicemen are tormented by their role in Chechnya as the media characterizes their activities as murderous. Kostrov reports that several military and civilian psychiatrists hold sessions with troops in the combat zones and report that the troops suffer from low morale and psychological problems. Says one Russian general, “it is extremely difficult to perform one’s duty if amid a mass of accusations one begins to feel a murderer.” Also contributing to the “Chechnya syndrome,” according to Kostrov, is the absence of substantial social protection for servicemen and their families. Traveling allowances, compensation for injuries, and aid to injured servicemen’s families all influence this low troop morale and psychological deterioration.

8 · Basaev charges that Yeltsin’s moratorium on combat activities is a ploy to gain favor in the press and the international arena as Russia prepares for VE Day. He indicates that Chechen forces will force federal troops to leave through a guerrilla war, tactics “sure to make the Russian leadership sit down at the negotiating table on conditions of the withdrawal of Russian troops.” Basaev says to defeat the separatist forces, federal troops would have to “cover the mountains with dead bodies.” He resolves that there will be “no peace in Chechnya until the last Russian soldier leaves its territory.”

11 · A press report indicates that Dudaev has issued an elimination order of Grachev for violating accords the two reached in December 1994. The report notes an attempt will be made to execute the Russian defense minister when he visits Chechnya soon. A group of eight specially trained terrorists are reportedly training for the move.

17 · Chechen Chief of Staff Maskhadov announces his readiness to enter into talks with Grachev, saying “I am deeply convinced that this meeting could exert a radical influence in order to stop further bloodshed.” The two are scheduled to meet on 22 May.

18 · Responding to reporters’ questions in Beijing regarding possible talks with Chechen commander Maskhadov, Grachev says preconditions must be met before negotiations can begin. He lists a full ceasefire, full Chechen capitulation and surrender of weapons, and that the Chechen side recognize Chechnya as a constituent entity in the Russian Federation.

· Russian Deputy Finance Minister Oleg Velichko says Russia has earmarked 410 billion rubles to restore the Chechen economy, 365 billion by way of investments and the rest financed by the government. Velichko also notes the government will lobby commercial banks to invest in the Chechen region.

19 · Dudaev describes a peace proposal offered by Chernomyrdin as resulting from talks with “officials from a regime propped up by Russian bayonets.” Chernomyrdin proposed a round-table conference involving the National Accord Committee, the Territorial Board of Federal Authorities, the OSCE mission delegates, and representatives of Dudaev’s entourage. He says the Russian leadership have exhausted their political credit but does not rule out resolution by peaceful means.

· Battlefield update: Fighting continues throughout most of the Republic. Russian aircraft have been reportedly bombing Dudaev positions in south, south-east, and west Chechnya. Russian General Mikhail Egorov, commander of Russian troops in the region, has vowed not to bomb villages but, according to press releases, such is not the case. In Grozny, Russian units fire powerful salvos from “Grad” and “Uragan” missile complexes set up in the area. The Russian military leadership believe Chechen militants hide in the mountains south of Grozny to orchestrate terrorist attacks and guerrilla war. Bamut, Vedeno, Mesket, Alleroi, Shali, and Merzoi-gala remain intense fighting centers and have been the scene of massive Russian air bombardments.

22 · Dudaev says talks will never take place that involve elements of the National Revival Government in Chechnya (Umar Avturkhanov and Salambek Khadzhiev) as he regards this body a puppet government, secure only because of Russian troops. Dudaev also insisted that federal troops must withdrawal for talks to take place. (Talks slated for today obviously did not take place and Dudaev announces that neither he nor his representatives will participate in 25 May talks announced by Russian delegate to Chechnya Nikolay Semenov.)

23 · Press reports note a Dudaev and associates conference taking place in the southern mountain region of Chechnya. Sources close to Dudaev confirm the meeting in which a peace plan was discussed. Elements of the plan include:

- an immediate ceasefire controlled by international observers;

- full withdrawal by the Russian military, political operatives;
- measure to broaden the security zones;
- storing heavy weapons under international control;
- return of refugees;
- presidential and parliamentary elections.

The conference participants also stipulate talks will not include Avturkhanov.

· OSCE head in Chechnya Sander Meszaros announces talks will likely take place in the OSCE mission in Grozny on 25 May. The mission has sent appeal to both sides' leadership asking to halt combat activities by 00:00 on 25 May and enter into talks at 10:00 the same day. Press reports note Usman Imaev will head the Chechen delegation though Dudaev is supposed to be present.

25 · Talks are held in Grozny but break down after three hours. The Russian delegation, headed by Semenov, reportedly storms out of the OSCE building making no comment to journalists. According to Chechen delegation head Imaev, "Russia was not prepared for the talks." A Russian spokesman says the talks did not break down but were suspended. Each side, according to him, confirmed its original positions but expressed interest in settling the matter by political means. OSCE officials believe talks will resume in the next few days once each side consults its respective field commanders.

· Several Chechens, mostly women, hold a rally after the delegations break up demanding “an immediate stop to the injustice inflicted on the Chechen people.” Many note an increase in air strike and combat operations in their respective villages carried out by Russian troops.

30 · Imaev announces a decision made by the council of Chechen field commanders to extend combat hostilities into other regions of the Russian Federation. He says the decision was “provoked by the acts of wanton cruelty and marauding” committed by Russian troops against Chechen civilians. The council will give their proposal to Dudaev and ask for a new policy toward fighting Russia.

31 · Imaev announces that Dudaev has rejected the proposal noted above, opting instead to focus on eliminating the Russians from Chechen territory.

3 · Russian troops seize Vedeno, a Dudaev stronghold. A Russian spokesman says the operation resulted in minimal losses for federal troops while the militants lost many men and equipment. The fall of Vedeno alters the balance of forces according to several commentators, changing significantly the correlation of forces in the foothills. Dudaev has longed prepared the village as the main stronghold for defense.

4 · Dudaev appeals to Clinton to intervene in the Chechen conflict, according to a Russian MVD spokesman.

9 · Press reports indicate that federal forces have encircled all of Dudaev’s forces, which split into four groups, according to Russian military sources, after the fall of Vedeno. An official with the Russian military says they have “blocked the militants, making it impossible for them to move out of the mountains and into the plain in Chechnya’s south.”

11 · Troshev reports that all escape routes from Chechnya’s mountains, where most Dudaev militants operate, have been sealed off, including routes to Georgia, Dagestan, and Ingushetia. He believes all bandit formations will be disarmed within the next two weeks. Shatoy, the last Dudaev stronghold, is in danger of falling to federal forces as well.

12 · In a press interview, Dudaev discusses the war in Chechnya and Russian aims in the Caucasus. Asked why his forces can resist so successfully attacks by the Russian military, he says it is because the Chechens have been doing so for 300 years. He elaborates on the notion of “Russism” a ploy by the Russian military and official leadership to recruit Chechen (or Abkhazian, Georgian, Azeri) criminals and join them with Russian operatives to create an artificial “opposition” group. The group then stirs up ethnic or civil strife and tensions flare, promoting discord between government officials and the domestic population. This is the so-called opposition in Chechnya, Dudaev says, and they have implemented similar operations in Georgia, Nagorno- Karabakh, and Lezhastan (in Azerbaijan). According to Dudaev, these tactics will soon yield complete control in the Caucasus to Russia, who will then move north to recapture the Baltics. In his words, “If the world. .. does not stop this devil or if it does not make Russia a constitutional state (there will never be democracy there), it will be confronted with severe shocks.”

14 · Sixty to eighty Chechen gunmen enter the Russian town of Budennovsk, taking hostages and seizing administrative buildings. The group is armed with automatic weapons and grenade launchers, entering the town in coffins by bus. They reportedly ravage the town, killing several town workers, women, and children. Stavropol Territory authorities notify the federal security services (FSB) and Yeltsin dispatches FSB director Sergey Stepashin. Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin is also informed of the attack, believed to be a Dudaev ploy to continue the separatist war despite several recent setbacks.

· Russian Deputy Prime Minister Soskovets chairs an emergency session, composed mostly of officials from the MVD, FSB, and the Federal Border Service, to discuss events in Budennovsk. He informs the participants of Yeltsin's personal involvement in the matter and that special "Alpha," "Vega," and OMON units have been dispatched to the area. As of 1730 GMT, the militants keep hostage about 500 (varying figures reported) hospital patients and staffers, threatening to kill all should one of their fighters be killed or shot at.

· 1900 GMT: Chief doctor of the hospital seized by the militants contacts Russian officials with two demands made by the militants:

1. Urgent meeting between Yeltsin, Chernomyrdin, and Dudaev;
2. Cessation of combat and the withdrawal of federal troops.

The group threatens to blow up the hospital if the demands go unmet.

· 1930 GMT: Russian Government issues statement urging citizens to "stay calm, show restraint, and be vigilant." They assure the Russian people that "law enforcement bodies have taken all measures to render harmless and eliminate the terrorists." The statement expresses condolences for those whose families members were injured and that aid will be forthcoming.

15 · Dudaev denies involvement in the Budennovsk events through a telephone exchange with Moscow's ITAR-TASS. "Not a single armed structure subordinate to me had ever had any orders or instructions to carry out terrorist actions on the territory of Russia," he claims. Such operations "only bring the national liberation struggle of the Chechen people into disrepute.” Imaev, also in on the conversation, acknowledges the possibility that the invasion was carried out by desperate Dudaev supporters frustrated with recent losses.

- A FSB spokesman says the federal authorities have “absolutely reliable proofs” that the Budennovsk events were carried out the Chechen militant Shamil Basaev, an experienced commander who served in Abkhazia and Nagorno-Karabakh. Talks between the militants and Russian officials have made no progress.

16 · Grachev announces that force may be needed to “liquidate these bandits as fast as possible.” He denies the possibility that the group can simply leave through negotiations and that they have nowhere to retreat to.

- Chernomyrdin arrives in Budennovsk to conduct talks with the militants. He issues statement indicating he will now command talks with the militants and reminds citizens to remain calm and to display restraint.

- Dudaev officials continue distancing themselves from the events, saying the government of the Chechen republic initiated no action, signed no document, nor made any preparations for the terrorist attack in Budennovsk. Chechen Minister for Foreign and Economic Relations Ruslan Madiev says the “Chechen people should not be identified with the criminals who committed the gangster crime. . . .” He expresses deep condolences to those injured and the families losing loved ones.

18 · Chernomyrdin holds telephone talks with Basaev, who spells out the demands of the militants once again. He calls for an immediate end to combat operations, full withdrawal of Russian troops from Chechnya, and (a new demand) a referendum in Russia on the status of Chechnya. Chernomyrdin made clear that he possesses no power to initiate a referendum but agreed to make all others possible. Basaev indicates he needed to consult his group and plans were made to continue talks at 1000 tomorrow. A preliminary agreement was reached to free all hostages in return for an immediate halt to combat operations followed by peace talks to solve all outstanding problems.

- Basaev gives news conference, saying he is not a terrorist but a leader of a “diversionary action.” He lists several atrocities committed by the Russian military over the last few years similar to the events in Budennovsk and that no one has labeled them terrorist acts. He claims responsibility for the some of the deaths but denies any were “hostages.” He notes he has no reason to believe Chernomyrdin is bluffing when assuring him that the demands will be met and names Imaev as the chief delegate to talks when negotiations take place.

- Chernomyrdin arranges to meet the demands set forth by Basaev. He provides eight buses for transporting the militants back to Chechnya (Vedeno) and announces Russian Commander in Chechnya General Kulikov will halt combat activities as of 2000, 18 June. Police are to escort Basaev and his men safely into Chechnya. Chernomyrdin’s only demand was that all the hostages be set free. Volunteers have been recruited (local officials and State Duma members) to ride with the militants to ensure they will not be fired on or ambushed, a demand made by Basaev.

19 · Chernomyrdin informs Basaev all buses are in place, combat actions have been halted, and a Russian negotiating team (lead by First Deputy Minister for Nationalities Affairs Vyacheslav Mikhaylov) is ready and waiting at the OSCE mission building in Grozny.

- Talks open at the OSCE Grozny mission. Imaev and Akhmed Zakaev, field commander, lead the Chechen delegation and Mikhaylov, Semenov, and Kulikov head the Russian team. Talks focus on technical needs for a ceasefire and on the release of hostages. No major progress is recorded.

- 1620 GMT: The bus convoy carrying the militants leaves the Stavropol region for Chechnya. They will be escorted roughly 30 km outside of the region and then proceed on their own. Approximately 150 people travel with the militants as “human shields,” mostly local officials and State Duma members. (Thirteen journalists also are part of the volunteer force.)

20 · Press reports reveal that Dudaev and the Russians have agreed to keep individual federal units in Chechnya to “prevent possible acts of terrorism by militants in the republic.” Russian representatives assure the Chechens in the talks that all those surrendering their arms will be guaranteed safety and freedom to travel. Talks continue on military matters and on implementing and maintaining a ceasefire. The moratorium on combat operations is extended for three days.

· Yeltsin expresses his satisfaction with Chernomyrdin’s efforts in the Budennovsk events, particularly for the safe release of the hostages. The two decide to investigate the incident further. Yeltsin also held talks on the same topic with Federation Council chairman Shumeyko. The two discuss responsibility for the tragedy and focus on strengthening national security.

21 · In a press interview, Kulikov discusses the progress of negotiations. He announces that he informed the Chechen team they must publicly denounce terrorism and demands they hand over the terrorists within three days. Should the Chechen side not comply, Kulikov warns combat operations would again resume. Kulikov continues discussion of military issues concerning the conflict’s settlement and how to go about disarmament, arguing that Dudaev militants should stockpile their weapons under international supervision and in small groups 2-3 km apart. Arrangements for other armed fighters to surrender their weapons have been made. They will be given vouchers upon giving up their arms that protect them from criminal prosecution. A protocol is signed by Kulikov and the Chechen delegation, now headed by Maskhadov, who claims to have full authority to negotiate and make agreements on Dudaev's behalf.

22 · Yeltsin announces his government will work toward a peaceful resolution of the Chechen conflict, saying too much emphasis was placed on the military route. Yeltsin says “a strict line at political settlement of the Chechen problem is the strategic position of the federal authorities.”

30 · Talks in Grozny are held to discuss the political problems associated with the Chechen conflict. Six issues were agreed to by the sides. The main issue was agreeing not to discuss the political status of Chechnya until after democratic elections are held. The other five outline the ways in which the Chechen people participate in political deliberation and how they can best freely express their opinion. Russian delegation head Mikhaylov says he believes the six agreements provide a constructive approach to the conflict's settlement.

· Two members of the Chechen leadership agree to resign. Umar Avturkhanov, head of the National Accord Committee, and Salambek Khadzhiev, leader of the National Rebirth government, announce they would step down “for the sake of peace in Chechnya.” Both leaders insist, however, that the “unconditional resignation of Dudaev and his government” is necessary for further compromise. They contend that Dudaev’s “extremism . . . has thrown many years back not only the Chechen Republic but also Russia with its fledgling democracy.”

1 · A communiqué is issued on the progress of the talks in Grozny. The statement says the sides continue to work out political issues for holding elections and for ensuring their legitimacy. Agreements concluded thus far include guarantees by the state bodies of Chechnya and the Russian Federation not to pursue conflict participants, and measures to monitor public speeches that may damage ethnic relations and on working out arrangements for the safe return of those forced out of the Chechen Republic.

2 · Commander of Russian ground troops in Chechnya

Vladimir Bulgakov says Dudaev is using the Grozny talks to resupply his fighters with food, matériel, and weapons and for moving its troops in the mountains. As for allegations by the Chechens that they are strategically located in Russia to carry out terrorist acts, Bulgakov asserts this is a bluff to keep the Russians in “permanent psychological tension.”

3 · Dudaev holds conversation with deputy head of the Russian delegation Arkadiy Volskiy in which he states he will step down “with my cabinet if the sovereignty of Chechnya is recognized.” Dudaev has rejected the so-called zero-sum plan proposed by Russia which calls for the resignation of all current government officials and their replacement by representatives from all political groups in the republic in November elections.

7 · Yeltsin signs presidential edict setting up the mechanisms for a permanent deployment of the Russian military in Chechnya.

10 · OSCE chief mediator in Chechnya Sander Meszaros believes that the negotiators are making significant progress. He notes talks have narrowed differences on reaching agreement on the status of Chechnya. While the two still differ as to what that status will be, agreements on a number of political issues have paved the way for addressing this point, the most controversial in all of the talks. He praised the fact that military consultations are continuing, the exchange of POWs is being worked out, and the two sides have devised a system of communication that is being tested. Military commanders of the Russian Federation, however, assert that Dudaev is still re-arming.

16 · Talks are suspended due to the serious illness of Chechen negotiator Imaev. A technical break was also announced because, according to Dudaev delegate Maskhadov, “the sides have come to the point of deciding the most fundamental issues and need to consult.” The issue is deciding on the fate of the Chechen Republic. Russian delegation head Mikhaylov says all the main provisions for settlement have been basically agreed on.

19 · In press interview, Basaev says the talks in Grozny should achieve peace first and foremost. After arriving at that, he argues independence and freedom for the Chechen people should be achieved. He recognizes that the republic will always have to deal with the Russian Federation but as long as his regime is in power, “we do not want to be under its heel.” Asked what he would do should a Chechen referendum opt for the republic to remain in the Russian Federation, Basaev says he will not oppose the people’s will and keep fighting. He will continue the struggle, though, “using other weapons and other methods.”

26 · Press secretary for the Dudaev regime Ramzan

Muzaaev says Chechnya is ready to enter a power sharing relationship with Russia in which certain functions will be carried out by the Chechens and others by the Russian Federation.

30 · Russian and Chechen officials sign a military agreement that calls for the immediate cessation of military actions, provides for the exchange of POWs, halts all terrorist activities, and outlines a staged pullout of Russian troops. Special monitoring commissions have been formed. Maskhadov and federal troop commander Anatoliy Shirokov are the guarantors of its fulfillment.

31 · The Russian Constitutional Court rules that Yeltsin's edict on 9 December 1994 ordering the invasion of Chechnya to stop the "activities of illegal armed formations" was legal, 16 to 3. Five of the judges expressed reservations about certain provisions of the edict, including a secret order giving Defense Minister Grachev "sweeping powers" to quell the three-year-old independence bid.

August 1995

1 · A Chechen separatist leader, Abu Movsaev, proposes the partition of Chechnya into two states. The Dudaev regime would assume control of the mountain districts southeast of Chechnya, to include villages such as Argun, Gudermes, and Nozhai-Yurt. The plan notes the regime would not lay claim to the rest of the republic, which would remain in the Russian Federation. Movsaev was active in the hostage incident in Budennovsk.

2 · Press reports note widescale infighting among the Chechen separatists. Information coming from Vedenov, Argun, and Shali says that the Chechen field commanders regularly ignore orders from Dudaev and are voicing their intention of taking power by force. At a meeting of commanders organized by Maskhadov, clashes erupted killing one commander and injuring two. According to the reports, the commanders use the “most foul language toward one another” and there is obvious discord among them.

4 · Russian Interior Ministry troops replace the army in Chechnya. The troops will transit through Ingushetia and the number of troops entering will be much smaller than those leaving. The troops are to assist Chechen police in implementing the military agreement concluded by the sides.

5 · POW exchanges remain troubled as neither side is releasing nor acknowledging the true number of POWs it holds. Russian Lt.-Gen. Anatoliy Romanov says he received word from the Chechen field commanders that they would proceed on an all-for-all exchange but, according to him, they have not been forthcoming. Talks will not continue, says Romanov, until the military provisions of the latest agreement are met and “the Chechen side is aware of this.”

10 · Leader of the Chechen talks in Grozny Khozh-Ahmed Yarikhanov, who replaced the seriously ill Imaev in late July, suspends talks because of Russian non-compliance with the military accords reached thus far. In particular, he points to the POW issue where Russians have not been forthcoming in the “all-for-all” principle. Additionally, Yarikhanov asserts the Russians continue military operations despite a moratorium on fighting and Russian check points have not been allowing the free return of those forced out of the republic. Tensions are again on the rise and Russian military officials have prepared for renewed offensives.

- Russian Commander of the North Caucasian Military District Anatoliy Kvashnin proposes the Russians unilaterally withdraw all troops from Chechnya and disembark all guard posts. The move, says the commander, would provide a trust factor to the talks and allow the military agreements to be implemented more successfully. The main factor hindering progress on the accords is that the Chechens are afraid to disarm. Russian withdrawal would eliminate this fear and smooth the way for implementation of the accords and for the talks to continue.

12 · Talks resume in Grozny between military experts and individual members of the official delegations.

14 · Agreement is reached on an approach to disarmament between Romanov and Maskhadov. The two decide to commission four groups of representatives comprised from the federal forces and Chechen formations which will be dispatched to Chechen settlements to handle disarmament procedures.

· The Russian government issues statement condemning Chechen separatists for not faithfully abiding by the terms of the military accords reached on 30 July. The statement notes the strong potential the agreement holds for arriving at a peaceful settlement to the conflict and notes the Chechens continually thwart the tenets of the agreement. It announces all measures will be taken to end the activity of the illegal armed formations engaging in violence, sabotage, and terrorism.

18 · Construction material and other forms of material aid sent to the Chechen Republic for reconstruction are being pilfered along the way, according to press reports. Officials note barely one-third of equipment sent for reconstruction purposes reaches its intended destination. The rest is pilfered by, according to the reports, transportation agents, suppliers, and those in charge of storage and distribution. Russia has earmarked over 5 trillion rubles for reconstruction of the Chechen economy but due to the forgoing, not much has been accomplished.

21 · Chechen militants enter Argun and seize the internal affairs department. The assault, led by field commander Alaudi Khamzatov, with alleged connections to organized crime, numbers 200-250 in strength. The group was wellarmed. Federal forces surrounded the town and Russian officials said force would not be excluded to extract the rebels should they refuse to lay down their arms and surrender. While the Russians charge the move violates the military agreement, Khamzatov asserts Argun is “my native town and I have been appointed its military commander.” OSCE official Meszaros, after arriving in Argun, could not comment on whether or not the Chechen actions represent a violation of the agreement.

31 · In a press interview, Dudaev representative Khamad Kurbanov asserts that any move to isolate Dudaev from settlement proceedings is futile. He indicates that Dudaev still controls all the processes, from negotiations to implementation of agreements. Any decision taken without his participation, knowledge, or approval is “doomed to failure and can only damage both Russian interests in the Caucasus and the peace process,” Kurbanov says.

September 1995

1 · A voluntary surrender of weapons program begins in Grozny. Individuals are given five days to surrender their weapons. After that, weapons being carried without a legal right to do so by their carriers will be forcibly taken.

3-5 · Disarmament is taking place in many Chechen villages, according to press reports. Fighters in Pervmayskaya, Shatoy, and several other villages are reportedly complying with federal authorities to turn in their weapons. Some still resist and Maskhadov informs the Russian command his representatives are traveling to Chechen settlements to organize steps for disarmament. Romanov announces disarmament is evolving extremely slowly, saying only 1,000 pieces have been thus far recovered. The commander also notes the difficulties associated with organized arms traders, who are penetrating the villages and procuring most of the weapons themselves. Some are not at all involved in the Chechen conflict but are simply “enterprising individuals.”

5 · Grachev announces his serious displeasure with the progress of implementing the military accords. He expresses dismay at the fact that Russian servicemen are being killed while negotiations move on. Grachev reminds officials that the Federation Council has passed a resolution which allows Russia to use “political and force measures” against Chechens failing to comply with the accords.

6 · Over 3,000 people gather in Grozny to celebrate the republic’s fourth anniversary of independence. Dudaev representatives addressed the rally with chants supportive of the Dudaev regime and quite critical of the Russians, whose “gangs provoke the sons of Chechnya to terror!”

7 · Russian Security Council Secretary Oleg Lobov announces an all-Russia search for Dudaev has been launched and a criminal case has been opened. He says it is nonsense to include him in Chechen elections, for criminals have “no right to contest elections.” Should his views change and he enter rehabilitation, Lobov says things would be looked at differently.

11 · After Yeltsin urges his participation in Chechen settlement proceeding, former Russian parliamentary speaker

Ruslan Khasbulatov announces he will indeed enter the peace talks. A native Chechen, Khasbulatov could be instrumental in achieving some Russian-Chechen accord. In a press interview, he says he sees his role as a preparer "of elections in Chechnya in taking the socio-political niche which exists between the federal authorities and the Chechen people." One of the first steps Khasbulatov will take is to remove the Moscow-imposed regime of Khadzhiev and Avturkhanov, as he sees their participation in the talks as a major obstacle to any settlement.

13 · A deadline for widespread disarmament is reached. The agreement, signed by Russian and Chechen officials at the OSCE mission in Grozny, obligates Chechen militants to hand over weapons by 20 September. An issue raised by the Chechen leaders was the establishment of local defense units (SDU). The Russians argue such forces be created only where there exist no law enforcement bodies, while the Chechens insist on their right to establish SDUs in all towns and villages.

· Romanov announces that in the last five days, over 8,000 federal troops have returned to their permanent stations. Romanov says that Dudaev was quick to take advantage of the situation by increasing his forces in the south of the republic, "tipping the military balance in his favor again."

14 · Volskiy announces that some 60 percent of the Chechen military formations are still controlled by Dudaev. The rest, he believes, are under the command of Khadzhiev, Avturkhanov, and Labazanov. In addition, there are scattered Islamic battalions which have no intention of handing over their weapons. All of this, he says, complicates immensely disarmament procedures and for controlling the various factions.

Summary at the End of 1995

The military agreements concluded on 30 July are not fully implemented. Disarmament activities are met with some resistance as splinter factions emerge among the Chechen formations, and no agreement is reached on the establishment of local self-defense units. Sporadic fighting occurs in some regions where the Russians have been active in “disarming illegal armed formations,” which damages mutual confidence and trust between the sides. Reconstruction efforts, despite significant funding and material allocations from Moscow, proceed slowly and are hampered by pilfering and graft. As to the status of Chechnya, several plans are announced but the sides will not agree to discuss the matter until military operations are completely suspended, widespread disarmament has occurred, and the return of refugees has been adequately achieved. As for Dudaev, he still maintains that Chechnya, in whole or in part, will achieve true independence and his mission will not be completed until this happens. The Russians insist elections must be held before discussions on Chechnya’s status. Election dates are canceled and rescheduled because of the refugee problem and the fact that combat operations have not altogether halted. In October, Khadzhiev resigns and is replaced by Doku Zavgayev, who in early December signs an agreement with Chernomyrdin that grants Chechnya certain spheres of autonomy within the Russian Federation. In mid-December elections, Zavgayev is declared the winner. At year's end, Russian and pro-Dudaev forces battle over the city of Gudermes.

The Georgia-Abkhazia Conflict

Background Note

The first freely elected Georgian parliament bears some responsibility for inciting the separatist movement in Abkhazia. Immediately following his election as head of the new parliament in January 1990, Zviad Gamsakhurdia introduced a system of republican prefects to monitor local officials' political activities. This system, which was being used in almost all the former Soviet republics, was only supposed to give prefects the power to report local abuses of republican laws. However, Gamsakhurdia went far beyond this, expanding the center's powers at the expense of local authorities and ignoring calls for local self-rule. In an upsurge of national assertiveness, several of Gamsakhurdia's candidates for post of prefect were refused by ethnic Abkhazian minority leaders, who held most of the positions of power in the former Abkhazian Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic. The self-rule issue and the politically naive and highly sectarian rhetoric employed by Gamsakhurdia heaped fuel on the nationalist Abkhazians' struggle for autonomy and strengthened the local appeal of secessionist leaders.

As early as 1989, the smaller nations of the North Caucasus seem to have realized the advantages of pulling together to recreate a large "North Caucasian Mountain Republic" that would include the Abkhaz Republic, Checheno-Ingushetia, North Ossetia, Kabardino-Balkar, and Karachai-Cherkess. A large republic by this name had existed from 1921 to 1924. The Georgian government, however, would hear nothing of it. The loss of Abkhazia was anathema to Georgian national leaders. Instead, they preferred the concept of a Caucasian “Commonwealth” or “Home”-a confederation which would have included Georgia and given it a dominant role in the region.

Going back much further, Abkhazia gained its independence in 1921 following the disintegration of the first Russian empire; subsequently it formed a confederative state with Georgia in 1922. This state became part of the USSR. Since 1978, the Abkhazians have been campaigning for the secession of their autonomous republic from Georgia, and its incorporation into the RSFSR. The Soviet government continually rejected these demands, but awarded the republic large-scale economic aid and cultural concessions. These concessions obviously did not satisfy Abkhazian separatists.

After much political infighting, the Abkhazian Supreme Soviet restored its 1925 constitution in July 1992, declaring Abkhazia to be a sovereign state. The Georgian parliament immediately annulled the declaration, and President Eduard Shevardnadze sent in Georgian National Guard detachments to restore Georgian national authority, thereby igniting the long and gruesome conflict which was to continue for that year and most of 1993.

During the fighting, the Abkhazians received covert Russian military support with the presumed purpose of bringing the independent-minded Shevardnadze to his political knees. In 1993, General Pavel Grachev entered Georgia at will, ignoring Georgian sovereignty, giving vent to the Russian military's open disdain for the man who had "helped Gorbachev destroy the Soviet Union." Russian soldiers helped the Abkhazians defeat Georgian forces during July 1993, after which Russia tried to impose debilitating terms on Shevardnadze. He initially resisted, but by the fall of 1994 he was forced to join the CIS and to agree to the humiliation of Russian military bases on Georgian territory and Russian Border Guards to patrol Georgia's border with Turkey. The fractious Georgians were unable to consolidate their state, even in self-defense.

The Abkhazians have continued to appeal to Boris Yeltsin for unification with Russia, but after obtaining what it wanted from Shevardnadze, Russia shifted its policy to that of support for Abkhazia's semi-autonomous status within Georgia. Shevardnadze had made Defense Minister Grachev swear that he would control the separatist movement in Abkhazia and keep the republic within Georgia. Exhibiting its displeasure with these arrangements, the Abkhazian government, on 6 December 1994, issued a demarche aimed at acquiring its independence by announcing the inauguration of parliament head Ardzinba as president of Abkhazia, in accordance with a new constitution adopted on 26 November. The United Nations, Russia, and the CSCE refused to recognize Sukhumi's action and proclaimed their support for the territorial integrity of Georgia. Ardzinba's bold move raised concerns for the stability of the peace process, and opened the possibility of new violent confrontation. In the meantime, President Shevardnadze voiced his support for the deployment of CSCE troops in the Georgian-Abkhazian conflict zone, but said that, so far, few countries of the “Minsk Group” were interested.

President Shevardnadze meanwhile attended CIS summits where he supported the Russian government’s actions in Chechnya. The only small gesture of independence he made in August 1995 was to agree to a pipeline to carry Azerbaijani oil through Georgia, to Turkey and to points west. Four days after he attended meetings on this pipeline arrangement, he was almost killed by a bomb carefully placed near his car.

The following chronology documents key events as they unfolded during the tragic, destabilizing civil war between Abkhazia and the Georgian government, and Russia’s role in manipulating the conflict. Georgia’s strategic location in the North Caucasus and its refusal for more than two years to join the CIS made Russian military leaders and many national-patriots in the Supreme Soviet eager to seize the opportunity to intervene in Abkhazia. Moreover, Georgian independence rhetoric, and talk of a “Caucasian Home” during the 1991-92 period were perceived as serious threats to Russia’s national interests in the region and its integrationist policies for the CIS. From the chronology emerges a picture of a Georgian defeat and a Russian victory-built on the ancient destabilizing strategy of “divide and rule.”

July 1992

23 · The Supreme Soviet of the autonomous republic of Abkhazia restores the 1925 constitution, proclaiming control of the republic's "state sovereignty." Georgian parliament annuls the declaration. Abkhazian Supreme Soviet Chairman Vladislav Ardzinba denies that Abkhazia is seceding from Georgia.

11 · Supporters of the ex-Georgian president, Zviad Gamsakhurdia, take hostage Interior Minister Roman Gventsadze and other Georgian officials in Abkhazia.

14 · Georgian National Guard detachments are deployed in Abkhazia. Georgian leader Eduard Shevardnadze announces all measures will be employed to secure the release of Interior Minister Roman Gventsadze and other officials taken hostage. Abkhaz authorities call the deployment an “occupation,” violating the April 1992 bilateral agreement, which permitted Georgian National Guard troops to enter Abkhazia only with permission from the Abkhaz government.

15 · Following the first day of talks between Georgian and Abkhazian officials, a ceasefire agreement is reached, allowing a phased withdrawal of Georgian National Guard units. The following day, fighting erupts in the Abkhazian capital, Sukhumi, prompting a wide-scale crackdown by National Guard units in which more than 200 Abkhazians are arrested. Thirty-nine are killed. Soon after, a Russian airborne regiment is flown to the area to safeguard strategic military installations and to evacuate the 1,700 Russians in the republic.

17 · Shevardnadze declares that Georgian forces have fully restored their authority in Abkhazia and have removed the Abkhazian government. The Georgian State Council guarantees Abkhazia’s right to self-determination within Georgia, but refuses to recognize Abkhazian independence.

18 · Despite Shevardnadze’s declaration, National Guard troops shell Sukhumi in an attempt to force Vladislav Ardzinba to resign. Ardzinba and a group of Abkhaz parliament members flee north to Gudauta, allowing Georgian troops control of major installations in Sukhumi.

19 · With a curfew and martial law imposed, Georgian National Guard units move to establish a military government replacing the pro-independence Abkhazian parliament. Clashes continue throughout the city as Abkhazian separatists launch “a campaign of armed resistance to the Georgian occupation.”

21 · Efforts to peacefully contain the situation in Abkhazia fail as Georgian National Guard units violate an agreement to withdraw and renew clashes with Abkhazian forces. The Georgian State Council issues a statement diminishing hopes for a peaceful resolution to the conflict and announcing Georgian units will not withdraw from the region. The situation worsens as the Confederation of Mountain Peoples of the Caucasus (a loose association of ethnic groups of the northern Caucasus within Russia) announce intentions to assist Abkhazian separatism.

24 · Shevardnadze demands immediate withdrawal of the 1,000 volunteers of the Confederation of Mountain Peoples of the Caucasus assisting the independence cause. The volunteers were incorporated into local Abkhazian forces in the coastal town of Gudauta.

· Boris Yeltsin says he will take steps to end the Georgian-Abkhazian conflict and dispatches Russian State Secretary Gennadiy Burbulis to Sukhumi.

25 · The Georgian State Council’s military commander, Col. Giorgi Karkarashvili, issues ultimatum to Ardzinba, demanding that he resign within twenty-four hours or incur a major offensive by Georgian National troops on Gudauta. Ardzinba agrees to Moscow talks between Yeltsin and Shevardnadze on condition that representatives from Abkhazia and the North Caucasus are allowed to participate. The Moscow talks are slated for 3 September.

September 1992

3 · Negotiations between Russia, Georgia, and Abkhazia in Moscow result in a ceasefire, effective 5 September, establishment of a tripartite monitoring committee, and agreement that Georgian troops will remain in Abkhazia. The agreement includes a clause forbidding the North Caucasian republics in the Russian Federation from participating in the conflict.

8 · Shevardnadze accuses the Abkhazian leadership of “gross violations” of the 3 September ceasefire.

12 · In a series of meetings in Sukhumi, the tripartite monitoring commission revises the ceasefire agreement amid continuing clashes. The Abkhazian parliament cables President Yeltsin, appealing for a Russian security guarantee for the Abkhazian government.

21 · The Russian Foreign Ministry issues a statement which says Russia “is most profoundly concerned” that Abkhazia and Georgia are failing to comply with the terms of the 3 September ceasefire agreement. Georgian deputies in the Abkhazian parliament charge that the Abkhazians are “totally ignoring” the ceasefire.

23 · A new ceasefire agreement is reached calling for the withdrawal of all armed groups from the region and the formation of a tripartite commission empowered to enforce the ceasefire process.

25 · Russian Supreme Soviet passes resolution criticizing the Georgian leadership, accusing Shevardnadze of using “violence to solve complex problems of interethnic relations.” A second resolution suspends the transfer of Russian arms and equipment to Georgia, including those already promised. Georgia accuses Russia of interference in its internal political affairs.

28 · President Yeltsin meets with Shevardnadze in Moscow to review the situation in Abkhazia. The first group of fighters from the Confederation of Mountain Peoples of the Upper Caucasus departs Abkhazia, returning to Grozny.

31 · The situation is confused by a split in the Abkhaz leadership along ethnic lines, with the leader of Georgian Abkhazians in the Abkhaz parliament, Deputy Chair Tamaz Nadareyshvili, calling for the resignation of Chairman Vladislav Ardzinba, still in hiding. Georgian Justice Minister Dzhoni Khetsuriani demands that the Abkhaz parliament dissolve, charging that the electoral law of July 1991 was faulty. The 1989 census shows Abkhazia with only 17.8 percent Abkhazians and 45.7 percent Georgians. The remaining major ethnic groups are Russians and Armenians.

October 1992

2 · Violating the September Russian mediated ceasefire, Abkhazian forces overrun Gagra, on the Black Sea coast. Accusations of Russian involvement escalate as Shevardnadze blames “reactionary forces in the Russian parliament” and conservatives in the Russian military for supplying arms to separatist troops. Russian Foreign and Defense Ministry spokesmen respond, insisting that Russian soldiers remain neutral. However, Boris Yeltsin warned Russia would take “appropriate measures” if Russian lives are threatened.

6 · Abkhazian troops take the villages of Gantiadi and Leselidze, establishing firm control of northern Abkhazia.

12 · Georgian-Russian relations deteriorate as Georgian State Council announce Georgia will assume control of Russian weapons and military equipment on its territory. Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev describes the move as a “flagrant violation of all earlier accords,” warning that attempts to seize Russian military hardware will lead to “armed clashes.”

13 · Talks between Yeltsin, Shevardnadze, and Ardzinba are postponed indefinitely when no agreements could be reached. While the Georgian delegation called for a return to military positions occupied prior to 1 October, the Abkhazians insist on complete withdrawal of Georgian troops.

November 1992

2 · Georgian forces seize a Russian arms depot in southern Georgia. Shevardnadze condemns the incident but Russian army officials accuse Georgia of pursuing a deliberate anti- Russian policy. Georgian Defense Minister Tengiz Kitovani announces he personally ordered the seizure.

19 · Georgian and Abkhaz forces reach a ten-day ceasefire agreement to allow Russian troops to leave Sukhumi.

December 1992

1 · Clashes in the Ochamchira district of Abkhazia erupt following the deployment of Georgian combat aircraft. Shevardnadze declares a state of emergency in the Abkhazian capital Sukhumi and the Ochamchira district.

3 · Shevardnadze imposes martial law throughout Abkhazia and vows to militarily crush the Abkhazian drive for independence. The hard-line announcement comes in the wake of an artillery attack, blamed on Abkhazian forces, on the Black Sea port of Sukhumi. Fourteen are killed and more than twenty wounded.

7 · Russia pushes the United Nations for a UN Security Council resolution demanding all parties to the Abkhazian conflict honor the 3 September ceasefire agreement. Ardzinba writes Yeltsin protesting the exclusion of Abkhazian representation in the mediation process and accuses the Russian military of arming the Georgian army in its fight against the independence-seeking Abkhazian forces.

8 · According to Russian news reports, a brigade of Turkish volunteer soldiers are fighting alongside Abkhazian forces against the Georgian military.

13 · Following a meeting between Georgian and Abkhazian officials, a new ceasefire agreement is reached calling for the withdrawal of all heavy weaponry by 18 December. The agreement also stipulates withdrawing all military hardware from both sides of the Gumista River area, north of Sukhumi, and from the Ochamchira district.

21 · Georgian and Abkhazian forces clash in heated battles near the Gumista River outside Sukhumi. Statements by the Abkhaz leadership note an increase in Georgian forces near Gudauta in preparation for a large-scale offensive.

27 · As clashes escalate, Abkhazian forces shoot down a Georgian Mi-8 military helicopter over the Abkhaz district of Ochamchira.

1993

4 · Shevardnadze appeals to UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali for an immediate dispatch of United Nations peacekeeping forces to the Georgian-Abkhazian conflict zone. Two months ago, Shevardnadze issued a critical statement accusing the United Nations of inaction in the region.

5 · In response to an Abkhazian offensive, the Georgian army launches a counterattack near the Gumista River in Abkhazia. Heavy fighting also erupts in the northwestern region of Sukhumi, which is currently held by the Georgian military. Over 200 are reported to have been killed. A Russian Su-25 combat aircraft is shot down over the village of Eshera near Sukhumi. It is not yet clear whether the plane was shot down by Georgian or Abkhazian forces.

10 · Georgian forces seize forty-five Russian troops taking over a Russian garrison in Lagodekhi to prevent Russian control of the garrison's weaponry. The hostages are released two days later following extensive negotiations between Russian and Georgian officials.

14 · Russian Deputy Defense Minister Georgiy Kondratev calls for concluding a bilateral treaty with Georgia specifying the status of Russian troops in Georgia. The Russian military refuses to withdraw until the volatile Abkhazian conflict is resolved.

15 · Georgian national security advisor Tedo Japaridze says joining the CIS is out of question for Georgia, and “it is about time someone explained the meaning of this commonwealth.” Asked if Georgia misses Western aid going to CIS, he replies, “I doubt that any of the CIS republics besides Russia get anything. That is why the West also realizes now that it has to make its allocations separately, to each country so all the aid is not sucked into the Russian black hole.”

17 · Shevardnadze says Iran, in view of its political, economic, and military strength, can be an important guarantor of regional security in Central Asia and the Caucasus. He regrets that relations between Tbilisi and Tehran have not properly developed due to two centuries of Russian and Soviet imperialism.

18 · Shevardnadze alleges Abkhaz separatists are connected with groups pressing for reviving the erstwhile Soviet Union in order to stop formation of an independent Georgia.

21 · Head of the Russian delegation to talks with Georgia, Feliks Kovalyov, reveals that Russia is considering withdrawing its troops from Georgia, citing financial concerns. Russian troops deployed in South Ossetia and Abkhazia as peacekeepers are continually threatened, adding to Russian concerns.

29 · Russian Lt.-Gen. Sufian Beppaev, former commander of Transcaucasus Military District, says 10 percent of the former Russian troop strength remains in Georgia—15,000 troops. He claims they are incapable of performing in combat and should be withdrawn.

· Aleksandr Chikvaidze describes a bilateral “friendship and cooperation” agreement signed between Abkhazia and the “Dniester Republic” as illegal. He says the agreement can only lead to confusion and more conflict and in no way contributes to a peaceful settlement of the Georgian/Abkhazian conflict. Further, he claims the agreement infringes on the territorial integrity of Moldova and Georgia.

- Georgian radio report more than 15,000 volunteers from the North Caucasus stand ready to fight against Georgians. This was stated on Gudauta TV by an influential Abkhazian member of parliament.

5 · Georgian Defense Ministry accuses Abkhazian forces of shelling a reservoir in the Ochamchira region, disrupting regional water supplies. The Georgian military command in Sukhumi issues a statement blaming Russian aircraft for an assault on Georgian positions. During the assault, a Russian Su-25 combat aircraft was downed by Georgian anti-aircraft units. Russian officials contend the plane was escorting humanitarian aid shipments to Abkhazia.

13 · As sporadic clashes between Georgian and Abkhazian forces continue along the Gumista River, a detachment of 700 Georgian National Guard reinforcements arrive in the Georgian-held Abkhazian capital Sukhumi. Fighting continues in the Ochamchira district, with Abkhazian forces downing two Georgian Mi-8 military helicopters.

15 · Georgian Defense Minister Tengiz Kitovani says the only real threat to Georgian forces is the presence of Russian troops. Kitovani warns Russia not to interfere in the conflict.

23 · Shevardnadze accuses the Russian leadership of seeking an armed conflict with Georgia and demands their withdrawal from Abkhazia and Adzharia. Grachev orders Russian troops to “shoot to kill” to defend against Georgian units seeking weapons and munitions.

24 · Georgian parliament passes resolution attributing full responsibility to the Russian government for “aggressive action” against Georgian forces by Russian troops stationed in Abkhazia. Shevardnadze threatens a total mobilization if Russian troops do not withdraw. The resolution follows the killing of one civilian and the wounding of eight others in the bombing of Sukhumi, the Georgian-controlled Abkhazian capital, on 20 February, which the Georgian authorities claimed was carried out by a Russian aircraft. Russia denied the charge and countered by claiming that Georgian artillery was firing on its positions.

27 · Grachev arrives in Abkhazia unannounced to inspect Russian troops. Shevardnadze criticizes him, claiming the visit was a diplomatic impropriety reflective of Russia’s “ultimatum-oriented approach” to protect its strategic interests in the North Caucasus and the Black Sea region. He maintains, however, his commitment to further dialogue with Russia.

March 1993

2 · Shevardnadze states “the beginning of the disintegration of Georgia will become the beginning of the disintegration of Russia, because an unstable Georgia will stimulate the most negative processes in the northern Caucasus.”

18 · In a letter to Shevardnadze, the ethnic-Azeri “Dayag” organization offers its military and political support.

19 · Georgian anti-aircraft units shoot down a Russian Su- 27 combat aircraft over the village of Esheri, north of Sukhumi. The incident aggravates already tense relations between Moscow and Tbilisi over the role of the Georgianbased Russian military units stationed in Abkhazia.

26 · The Abkhazian parliament condemns the recent transfer of Russian weaponry and munitions to the Georgian military.

27 · Meeting with a visiting CSCE delegation, Shevardnadze states that new opportunities for rapprochement between the conflicting sides result from the military stalemate. The CSCE delegation has been touring the country as part of a three-month human rights fact-finding project.

April 1993

1 · Heavy fighting erupts between Georgian units, stationed in their stronghold of Sukhumi, and attacking Abkhazian forces. Dozens of civilians are wounded in the artillery exchanges.

4 · Ardzinba appeals for international assistance, demanding a UN condemnation of Georgian human rights violations against the Abkhazian population. Ardzinba further asserts his “willingness for peace” only when Georgian units withdraw.

6 · Grachev says Moscow is standing by its position that Georgia must remain an entity with effective autonomy guaranteed to the Abkhazian, South Ossetian, and Adzharian regions. He confirms that the Russian troops stationed in the war zone remain neutral unless attacked.

7 · On the eve of scheduled Georgian-Russian meetings in Sochi, the Georgian parliament votes against a resolution withdrawing Russian troops in Abkhazia.

The Sochi talks aim at reaching a durable ceasefire agreement.

- Georgia and Russia agree to station Russian troops in Abkhazia and elsewhere in Georgia until the end of 1995, as stipulated in a February draft agreement. They also establish a 3 km demilitarized zone between Georgian and Abkhaz forces. No Abkhaz representatives were present at the talks.

8 · Russian and Georgian delegations stumble over settlement specifics. Grachev objects to the Georgian variant because “Georgia puts all obligation in implementing the agreement on Russia, leaves nothing for itself, and the third party-Abkhazia-is not mentioned at all.” No crucial military issues are resolved and the developing rapprochement diminishes.

12 · Shevardnadze meets with Ukrainian officials to forge a “joint political front against Russia.” The Georgian and Ukrainian presidents should conclude a twenty-part series of bilateral agreements, including a treaty on friendship and cooperation.

17 · Georgian Foreign Ministry protests “aggression by the Russian Federation against Georgia.” They charge that Russian military facilities are being used by Abkhazian forces as bases for their military operations.

13 · A mudslide in North Ossetia in Russia damages natural gas pipelines transporting Russian energy supplies to Georgia and Armenia. Meanwhile, secret negotiations on fuel supplies continue between Georgian and Azeri officials. According to Azerbaijan’s terms, Georgia will be allowed to purchase Azeri fuel only if none of it is transferred to Armenia, which remains under Azeri blockade.

14 · Shevardnadze and Yeltsin arrange a ceasefire in Abkhazia effective 20 May. The leaders call for withdrawing heavy military equipment and artillery from the combat area and ban flights over Abkhazia beginning on 25 May. In response to these talks, Ardzinba offers an Abkhaz unilateral ceasefire conditional on a Georgian military withdrawal.

21 · Following a meeting with Ardzinba, Yeltsin special envoy to Abkhazia Boris Pastukhov states deployment of a tripartite Russian-Abkhazian-Georgian peacekeeping force is “unrealistic,” recommending instead a CSCE or United Nations force.

29 · Abkhazian and South Ossetian parliaments appeal to Yeltsin to delay signing a treaty on friendship and cooperation with Georgia until a comprehensive settlement of the conflict in Abkhazia and South Ossetia is achieved. A joint statement says that “Abkhazia and South Ossetia can no longer remain a part of Georgia, which is unable to act as a guarantor of rights of the people of our republics.” Both sides express concern about “the continuing supplies of weapons, ammunition, and military hardware from Russia to Georgia.”

30 · Georgian intelligence reports about 500 armed Cossacks transferring from Krasnodar Kray to territory controlled by the Abkhazian forces.

June 1993

2 · Soldiers from “Dniester” Russian forces in eastern Moldova arrive to support Abkhazian independence. The cooperation is based on a January 1993 Cooperation Treaty between Abkhazia and the self-declared “Dniester” Republic.

5 · Shevardnadze's chief military advisor Col. Vladimir Chikovani accuses Abkhazians of using the Moscow-mediated truce to build up their military might and prepare a new large-scale assault on the city of Sukhumi. He says the Abkhazian side violates the ceasefire agreement consistently, confirming the Moscow agreements on a ceasefire and political solution will scarcely work at this stage.

6 · Reacting to severe shelling of Sukhumi, Shevardnadze warns of a Georgian military offensive response. The delivery of Russian humanitarian aid is continuously endangered by sporadic fighting and by repeated attempts at downing the Russian helicopters transporting the aid shipments. Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev announces his intention to visit Tbilisi, Sukhumi, and Gudauta in a new mediation attempt.

10 · Kozyrev characterizes talks as deadlocked, where Abkhazians are demanding unconditional withdrawal of Georgian Army units and Georgians insisting on restoring the Russian-Georgian border on the river Psou.

1 · Abkhazian forces launch a large-scale offensive to retake the Georgian-controlled Abkhazian capital Sukhumi. Abkhazian forces shoot down a Georgian Su-25 combat aircraft and move rapidly against Georgian positions near the town of Ochamchira, 80 km south of Sukhumi.

6 · Responding to the escalation of fighting with Abkhazian forces, Shevardnadze declares martial law throughout the area. In Tbilisi, Georgian Prime Minister Tengiz Sigua threatens to break all relations with Russia if Moscow continues to arm and supply Abkhazian forces.

7 · Georgian Prime Minister Tengiz Sigua says Georgia will recall its ambassador from Moscow if Russia continues with arms, equipment, and ammunitions supplies to Abkhazia.

8 · Abkhazian forces continue their advance on Sukhumi, seizing a key hydroelectric power plant and several strategic heights overlooking the city. The UN Security Council responds by unanimously adopting a resolution for deploying UN peacekeeping forces in Abkhazia once a durable ceasefire is reached.

14 · Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Pastukhov arrives in Tbilisi to review the situation in Abkhazia with Georgian officials. He announces the Moscow-based peace talks suspend indefinitely, stalemated by Georgia's refusal to meet Abkhazian demands for full restoration of Abkhazian governmental institutions and complete Georgian military withdrawal.

21 · A ceasefire proposal is drafted as a compromise between Russia and Georgia. The move follows Georgian rejection of a Russian-mediated Abkhazian proposal calling for an immediate withdrawal of Georgian forces. The compromise plan calls for the trilateral monitoring of a ceasefire, the coordinated deployment of peacekeepers, and the withdrawal of Georgian forces.

26 · The Abkhaz parliament debates and approves a plan to end the conflict with Georgia.

28 · Meeting in Sochi, Russian, Georgian, and Abkhazian officials formally sign the recent ceasefire agreement scheduled to enter into force within ten days.

August 1993

1 · Russian troops, part of a tripartite ceasefire monitoring group, arrive in Abkhazia.

2 · Shevardnadze welcomes UN involvement in the Abkhazian conflict, saying the UN role serves as a good model for other conflicts in the Transcaucasus region. Based on an agreement reached the previous week, a force of fifty UN peacekeepers is to join a trilateral (Russian, Georgian, Abkhazian) “control group” empowered to monitor and enforce the ceasefire.

10 · In accordance with the provisions of the 27 July Abkhazian ceasefire agreement, Russian, Abkhazian, and Georgian officials agree to specific terms for the staged disengagement of all armed formations from the conflict zone.

16 · A tripartite meeting in Sochi of Georgian, Russian, and Abkhazian officials results in an agreement to withdraw all troops from the conflict zone in accordance with the Russian-mediated disengagement plan reached in late July.

24 · Meeting in Moscow, Russian and Abkhazian officials agree to further negotiations on the Abkhazian conflict to be held under UN auspices with Russian mediation. The UN Security Council adopts a resolution (No. 858) calling for a six-month deployment of an additional eighty-eight ceasefire observers for the Abkhazian accord.

September 1993

6 · The Abkhazian parliament in Gudauta accuses Georgian forces of failing to meet its scheduled withdrawal of military forces and equipment in accordance with the tripartite ceasefire agreement. The United Nations announces it will hold talks on the Abkhazian conflict on 13 September in Geneva.

12 · The planned mediation talks to be convened in Geneva by the United Nations are postponed due to the Abkhazian protest over Georgia's repeated failure to comply with the scheduled withdrawal of its military equipment from Abkhazia.

16 · Abkhazian forces launch an offensive violating the seven-week-old ceasefire agreement. Abkhazian forces break the Georgian blockade of Tkvarcheli, advancing to Georgian-held cities of Sukhumi and Ochamchira. As Abkhazian forces move against Sukhumi and initiate severe artillery attacks, Shevardnadze hastily flies there to personally direct its defense. Responding to the ceasefire violation, strong condemnations are issued by the Russian Foreign Ministry and the UN Security Council calling on the Abkhazian forces to withdraw immediately.

18 · As the Abkhazian offensive continues, Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev meets with Abkhazian parliamentary chairman Vladislav Ardzinba in Gudauta and with Shevardnadze in Sochi. Following the meetings, Russia formally condemns the Abkhazians for the offensive and criticizes Georgia for refusing to negotiate with the Abkhazians and calls for economic sanctions to be imposed on both sides.

20 · Abkhazian forces reach the outskirts of Sukhumi, establishing a nearly complete circle around the city by assuming positions in the hills overlooking the area. The attack intensifies after Georgian troops refuse the Abkhazian offer of withdrawal through an Abkhazian-established corridor from the city. With heavy artillery bombardment and growing casualties, Shevardnadze issues international appeals for assistance.

22 · Reflecting the intense situation in Sukhumi, the third civilian passenger aircraft is shot down by Abkhazian forces advancing on the airport.

24 · As Abkhazian forces enter Sukhumi and street-by-street fighting erupts, nearly 4,000 civilian residents are evacuated from the city. With Georgian reinforcements stalled 15 km south of Sukhumi, the Georgian defenders are bolstered by a mere 300 troops, making the fall of Sukhumi inevitable. Ousted President Gamsakhurdia, exploiting the chaos of the battle for Sukhumi, returns from exile to the central Georgian Mingrelian district capital Zugdidi. It is reported, however, that Gamsakhurdia has ordered his forces to advance on Sukhumi to assist Georgian troops against the Abkhazian offensive.

26 · After eleven days of intense fighting, Abkhazian forces fully seize the Abkhazian capital Sukhumi, forcing the retreat of Georgian troops and causing Shevardnadze to flee south. The Abkhazian victory in Sukhumi represents the last significant military challenge to Abkhazian separatists, as Sukhumi was the last remaining Georgian stronghold in the region. Russian forces based in the Abkhazian city of Gudauta evacuate 10,000 civilian refugees prior to the fall of Sukhumi.

29 · Kozyrev urges the Abkhaz leadership to lay down their arms. He says that Russia imposed economic sanctions on the Abkhaz.

29 · The deputy chairman of the Abkhaz Supreme Soviet says that Abkhazia would hold a referendum on secession from Georgia and requests protection from Moscow.

October 1993

1 · Independence-seeking Abkhazian forces continue their advance through Georgian-held areas of Abkhazia, causing thousands of Georgian refugees to flee. They seize the coastal town of Ochamchira and push on to attack the town of Gali, the last remaining town in Abkhazia under the control of Georgian forces. In Tbilisi, Shevardnadze appoints his former Defense Minister Tengiz Kitovani as commander of all Georgian army units.

4 · Georgian troops retake the western town of Khoni.

6 · The Georgian government issues an urgent appeal to the UN Security Council warning of the plight of over 20,000 Georgian refugees who fled Abkhazia eastward through the mountains to Svanetia. The appeal identifies Svanetia as a disaster area and asks for immediate humanitarian assistance to evacuate the refugees. In response to the growing crisis in the area, the United States dispatches a plane-load of food and emergency medical supplies. The UN Special Representative for Georgia, Eduard Brunner, announces that the Geneva talks on Abkhazia are encouraging and suggests the future involvement of Russia, which he says has “a legitimate interest” in the stability of the Transcaucasus. Ardzinba appeals to the international community for aid and affirms that Abkhazia will soon adopt a new democratic constitution with guaranteed rights for all national and ethnic groups.

8 · After a meeting with the leaders of Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Russia, Shevardnadze announces that Georgia would seek membership in the CIS as their last hope in the civil war. He cites the use of economic blackmail by Russia to force Georgia into the organization: “if you want gas, oil, raw materials ... then join the CIS.” Reaction in Tbilisi is characterized by anger and shock. Shevardnadze justifies joining of the CIS by saying that none of the CIS agreements contain language that implies a loss of sovereignty and that the threatening elements in Russian national politics have been isolated and do not therefore pose a threat to those who do join the CIS. The participants of the meeting agree on the need to coordinate efforts in conflict mediation with the help of international organizations and on deployment of Russian troops to restore rail links from the Black Sea to Tbilisi and to Armenia.

9 · Russia and Georgia sign an agreement legalizing the status of Russian troops currently stationed in Georgia. They also sign a protocol on the joint use of all ports and airfields. The agreement does not specify a date for the final withdrawal of troops from Georgia.

13 · Georgian Foreign Minister Aleksandr Chikvaidze states that Georgia may cede control of some of its military bases to Russia in exchange for military aid.

14 · Ukrainian air crews evacuate 7,000 Georgian refugees from Abkhazia.

· The Russian government issues a statement condemning Abkhazian forces for looting property belonging to refugees from Abkhazia, for human rights violations, and mass-scale ethnic cleansing.

19 · Grachev states Russia could not offer military aid to Shevardnadze because Georgia is not a member of the CIS or its Collective Security Treaty. He says that although Russian, Azeri, and Armenian troops might participate in the securing of the road from Poti to Tbilisi, any other participation in the conflict would be viewed as Russian interference in the domestic affairs of Georgia.

20 · Georgian forces launch a major counteroffensive against Gamsakhurdia's forces and eject them from Poti, Khoni, and Lanchkhuta. The rail junction of Samtredia is also recaptured. Russian forces are rumored to be assisting the Georgian military in neutralizing opposition.

25 · Georgia signs the CIS Collective Security Treaty, clearing the way for Russian, Armenian, and Azeri troops to defend Georgian transport routes.

28 · Forces loyal to ousted Georgian President Zviad Gamsakhurdia launch a counterattack, retaking Khobi. However, Georgian forces recapture the town the following day.

November 1993

9 · Russian Foreign Ministry warns the Abkhaz will face sanctions should their troops or weapons cross the Inguri River, separating Abkhazia from the rest of Georgia. He states also that Georgia should not commit aggression against the Abkhaz and that Moscow would not remain indifferent to such aggression. There is presently a concentration of Georgian troops on the Abkhaz border.

11 · Shevardnadze states reunifying Georgia is the immediate goal. He says that he is not ashamed at having needed Russia's help in defending his country, although prefers Georgia to have been able to defend itself.

December 1993

2 · The first round of negotiations to resolve the conflict under the auspices of the United Nations, with Russian assistance and the CSCE's participation, ends in Geneva. The memorandum signed by the Georgian and Abkhaz delegations says the two sides undertake the responsibility not to use force or threaten to use force against each other during the period of time of negotiations aimed at a full-scale political settlement. The sides assume responsibility for creating conditions for the prompt return of the refugees.

20 · Heated clashes erupt between Russian forces and Georgian paramilitary units of the "Mkhedrioni" militia in the eastern Georgian town of Telavi. Further destabilizing the internal situation are reports of civil disorder and criminal acts in the Azeri-populated districts of Bolnisi and Marneuli in Georgia. Following meetings with the local Azeri community, Shevardnadze forms a special detachment of elite troops to restore order in the two districts.

1 · Shevardnadze rejects a statement made by parliament speaker Goguadze claiming the Georgian situation is so dire that the economic and military aid of Russia is the only solution. Shevardnadze concedes adopting the Georgian coupon as the country's currency last year was a mistake, but that Georgia would need many more months before it could rejoin the ruble zone. Within a year, the Georgian coupon fell from a ratio of 1:1 with the Russian ruble to 100:1. On the issue of Russian troops being used to enforce law and order in Georgia, Shevardnadze comments that “a country which could not instill law and order on its own does not deserve independence.”

4 · Reports from Russian peacekeeping forces stationed in Georgia indicate that Abkhazian forces are engaged in sporadic attacks targeting Georgian refugees as they are repatriated to their homes in Abkhazia. These attacks, although minor and infrequent, continue to delay the return of the estimated 250,000 Georgian refugees displaced from their homes in Abkhazia.

12 · At Georgian-Abkhaz peace talks in Geneva, Abkhaz delegation leader Sokrat Dzhindzholia proposes deploying Russian troops as peacekeepers in the region. The political status of Abkhazia remains far from settled and experts are scheduled to convene in Moscow in February to address this question. Dzhindzholia later states that “life itself has ... meant [Russia must] take part in the destiny of the peoples that were joined by the Soviet Union. There is simply no other way out. No other countries nor the United Nations have the strength or the means to do this. What is more, no one knows better than Russia the situation on the territory of the former USSR.”

18 · Continued clashes between Georgian military units and Abkhazian forces in the Gali region of Abkhazia threaten to delay the return of Georgian refugees to their homes in the region.

28 · Abkhaz Prime Minister Sokrat Dzhindzholia and other high level Abkhaz and South Ossetian officials voice concern over the imminent signing by Russia and Georgia of a treaty on friendship and cooperation. They fear that the treaty would threaten their autonomous status by giving Georgia access to Russian arsenals, and have appealed to the Russian leadership to postpone signing until after settlements have been reached in the Abkhaz and South Ossetian conflicts.

February 1994

2 · A group of Russian parliamentary deputies cautions Yeltsin that signing a treaty with Georgia is premature and could destabilize the entire Transcaucasus.

3 · In Tbilisi, Yeltsin and Shevardnadze sign a bilateral treaty on friendship and cooperation as well as twenty-four other agreements on trade and economic ties, scientific and cultural cooperation, the status of Russian border guards in Georgia, and military basing rights. They also discuss the conflict in Abkhazia and South Ossetia and Georgia's possibility of rejoining the ruble zone. Shevardnadze characterized the agreements and the visit as important for establishing peace and stability throughout the Caucasus.

9 · Yeltsin and Shevardnadze appeal to Boutros-Ghali to send UN peacekeeping troops to Abkhazia. ITAR-TASS reports that Abkhaz Prime Minister Dzhindzholia stipulates that if troops are deployed, they only do so on the border between Abkhazia and the rest of Georgia.

· Georgian officials state that Georgian civilians are fleeing Abkhazia to escape ethnic cleansing. Abkhazian parliamentary speaker accuses Georgia of shelling a hospital in Sukhumi.

10 · As fighting between Georgian troops and Abkhazian forces escalates, the Abkhazian parliament formally adopts a declaration of independence from Georgia. This move repudiates the earlier UN- and Russian-brokered agreement to determine the status of Abkhazia through a national referendum.

14 · Shevardnadze appeals for Russian peacekeeping troops under UN coordination to Abkhazia. Abkhazians agree in principle but want the deployment limited to the Georgian border with Abkhazia.

18 · The Council of Ministers of Abkhazia appeals for Russian intervention to end the Georgian-Abkhaz war, lest "tragedy will be unavoidable and it may be followed by a new, more large-scale and bloody Caucasian war, which may also involve Russia."

22 · In Geneva, negotiations under UN auspices between Georgian and Abkhazian representatives resume. A primary element of the talks is the return of 200,000 to 300,000 refugees, mostly ethnic Georgians, displaced from the heavy fighting in the region.

25 · The third round of UN-sponsored negotiations between Abkhaz and Georgian leaders ends in stalemate. Unresolved issues include conditions for the return of 200,000 Georgian refugees to Abkhazia and the future status of Abkhazia within Georgia.

March 1994

1 · After a stormy debate, the Georgian parliament ratifies Georgia's membership in the CIS, 121-47 (4 abstentions).

10 · Georgian parliament resolves to disband the Abkhazian parliament, further straining relations between the two.

13 · Before leaving for his meeting with Warren Christopher in Vladivostok, Kozyrev tells reporters that he saw "no opportunity for the use of peacekeeping forces from Western countries for operations in Georgia.” This is apparently in response to Clinton’s statement of 7 March: “The United States would be inclined to support a UN peacekeeping operation in Georgia, an operation that would not involve U.S. military units.” Following the meeting with Christopher, there were no reports as to whether this issue was addressed.

18 · Georgian parliamentary deputy Irina Sarishvili delivers a statement to the parliament asserting Georgian membership in the CIS is illegal. As a result, international experts have been called to Georgia to determine the validity of Georgian membership. He equates joining the CIS with joining Russia.

25 · Countering the Georgian offensive, Abkhazian forces retake the village of Nizhnaya Lata, east of the Abkhazian capital Sukhumi, and advance to seize two villages in the Svaneti district, outside Abkhazia. The Abkhazians initiate artillery attacks against Georgian military positions in the Gali district and issue an ultimatum demanding the withdrawal of all remaining Georgian troops from Abkhazia. The United Nations condemns the escalation of violence and calls on both parties to resume talks.

· Georgians and Abkhazians agree to resume negotiations in Moscow with Russian mediation.

26 · Georgian government reports 95 percent of its population is in favor of joining the CIS.

April 1994

3 · In Moscow, Georgian and Abkhaz representatives sign an agreement ending the latest round of violence and providing for the return of 250,000 Georgian refugees to their homes. Both sides call for UN peacekeeping forces to be deployed in Abkhazia.

15 · CIS heads of state adopt resolution to send Russian peacekeepers to the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict area. CSCE and UN observers already are active in the region.

22 · Concluding four days of UN-brokered talks on the Abkhazian conflict, the Georgian and Abkhazian delegations agree to reconvene in Moscow on 10 May to discuss a UN proposal of a federal agreement that would maintain Georgian territorial integrity while attempting to meet the demands of the Abkhazian side. The Abkhazian parliament has threatened to issue its own declaration of sovereignty, however.

24 · An unnamed participant in negotiations between Georgia and Russia on the settlement of the conflict states that any peacekeeping forces deployed in Abkhazia will be Russian, but will be under the control of the UN, the CSCE, Georgia, and Abkhazia.

25 · Shevardnadze states that if the 5 May UN-sponsored talks do not record significant progress, CIS peacekeepers will be requested.

May 1994

13 · Moscow negotiations continue to falter as the Georgian parliament adopts a resolution requiring its delegation to refuse a draft agreement on the military withdrawal of troops and deployment of CIS peacekeepers. The Georgian delegation signs the agreement anyway and assents to the deployment of several thousand CIS peacekeeping troops along the Abkhazian border with Georgia proper.

14 · Contravening the resolution passed the previous day, Georgian delegation signs a draft agreement to disengage the warring forces and deploy CIS peacekeepers along the Inguri River, the de facto border between Abkhazia and Georgia. The Georgian parliament objects, claiming it does not provide adequate safety for the repatriation of Georgian refugees to Abkhazia.

· An Abkhaz delegate to Moscow talks reports the CIS peacekeeping force, primarily Russians, will number 2,500- 3,000 and will be deployed before the end of May.

18 · Georgian parliamentary deputies call on the country's leadership to disavow the ceasefire agreement signed in Moscow. Radical spokesman Irakli Tsereteli proposes a no-confidence vote in Shevardnadze, who defends the agreement as "the most realistic solution."

23 · Moscow announces Russian troops from the Group of Russian Forces in the Transcaucasia will form the backbone of the 3,000-man peacekeeping force to be deployed in Abkhazia.

31 · Talks on the repatriation of Georgian refugees to Abkhazia deadlock over Abkhazia's demand that all returnees sign a declaration to abide by the laws of the Republic of Abkhazia. Abkhazia additionally wants to bar Georgians participating in last fall's fighting from returning. The two sides also disagree on the total number of refugees: Georgia estimates 290,000 displaced; Abkhazia calculates 185,000.

2 · Russia's Federation Council rejects a presidential request for deploying Russian troops to Abkhazia as part of a joint CIS peacekeeping force. Chairman of the Federation Council's Committee on Defense and Security claims that there is no legal basis for deploying Russian troops beyond its borders.

· Russia's Foreign Ministry lifts economic sanctions imposed on Abkhazia last September.

3 · The Federation Council's decision rejecting Russian peacekeepers to Abkhazia is met with disappointment from the Georgian and Abkhaz sides. Spokesman for Yeltsin indicates Yeltsin is "likely to exert pressure" on the Council to reverse its decision. CIS Executive Secretary Ivan Korotchenya, recently completing a tour of the Central Asian and Caucasian states, says most CIS heads support CIS peacekeepers in Abkhazia.

8 · Boutros-Ghali recommends increasing UN observers to Abkhazia to the UN Security Council. He argues for an independent UN operation in close coordination with the CIS contingent.

9 · Yeltsin signs a decree ordering the creation of a peacekeeping force for deployment in Abkhazia. The force will be comprised of three battalions from the Group of Russian Forces already stationed in the Transcaucasus. The actual date of the deployment must still be decided by the Federation Council, which previously rejected Yeltsin's request to send peacekeepers to Abkhazia. The Federation Council is scheduled to meet on 21 June.

14 · According to Russian Deputy Defense Minister Georgiy Kondratev, Russian paratroopers stationed in Gudauta would soon be deployed along the Inguri River, which marks the de facto Abkhaz-Georgian border. He indicates that the approval of the Federation Council is not necessary because the troops were already in the region. Georgian opposition groups protest the move on the grounds that the troops in Gudauta fought on the Abkhaz side in the civil war. At an extraordinary session of the Georgian parliament opposition deputy Nodar Notadze calls for Shevardnadze's resignation, while others demand the suspension of the Abkhaz peacekeeping operation. No votes are taken on the issues.

15 · Russian field engineers clear mines in the Gali region in preparation for Russian peacekeepers. Commander-in-chief of the Russian ground forces announces that Russian peacekeepers will return fire if attacked, but "it is not their task to disarm or eliminate" armed formations.

21 · Following an address by Grachev, the Federation Council overwhelmingly votes in favor of deploying peacekeepers to Abkhazia, reversing the 3 June rejection of the proposal.

22 · Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Patukhov invites the United Nations to send more observers to Abkhazia and expresses his hope that the United Nations will "formally endorse" (i.e., finance) the operation, which will cost an estimated 10-11 billion rubles.

24 · Two battalions of Russian peacekeeping troops take up positions along the 12-kilometer security zone separating the warring parties. In all, between 2,500 and 3,000 Russian troops will monitor the area along the Inguri River. Russian troops will oversee the return of Georgian refugees to Abkhazia and enforce a curfew within the security zone.

28 · Grachev says Russia welcomes an international peace force in Abkhazia “on any terms... even under any command.”

· Abkhazian officials accuse Russian peacekeepers of violating the agreement on the repatriation of Georgian refugees. The Abkhaz claim that Russian soldiers transit masses of Georgian refugees without regard to whether or not those returning participated in the war against Abkhazia. The repatriation agreement stipulates that only those Georgians who did not fight against Abkhazia would be permitted to return.

July 1994

1 · The UN-brokered peace plan for Abkhazia continues with the return of 5,000 Georgian villagers to their homes in the region. Although Russian peacekeeping troops are in place between the Abkhazian and Georgian military forces, sporadic fighting erupts in the Kodori Gorge. In meetings with Shevardnadze in Tbilisi, UN representative Eduard Brunner announces the UN established a fund to aid Georgian refugees.

6 · Russian Deputy Defense Minister Georgiy Kondratev dismisses the charge that Moscow is acting unilaterally in Abkhazia, citing other CIS states-Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and Belarus in particular-offered troops to monitor the security zone along the Inguri River. A decision on this matter will be made at the 18 July meeting of the CIS Council of Defense Ministers.

12 · An agreement on the disengagement of hostile forces from the Kodor Gorge stalled when Georgian Defense Ministry officials claim Abkhazian troops violated agreement provisions. Georgian and Abkhazian forces exchanged fire repeatedly in the 50 km strip of land located between the Kodor and Inguri rivers in Abkhazia.

21 · The UN Security Council votes unanimously to endorse the deployment of Russian peacekeeping forces in Abkhazia. The UN Security Council, however, also increases the number of UN observers monitoring the ceasefire implementation in Abkhazia.

23 · Shevardnadze considers the UN Security Council resolution “the first and very important stage in settling the conflict.” He praises Russia, which “took upon itself huge responsibility by deploying its peacekeepers in the zone of conflict.” Due to Russian and UN efforts, Shevardnadze says, the refugees will return safely to their homes.

24 · Abkhazia issues an ultimatum demanding that Georgia withdraw all its forces from the Kodor Gorge by 30 July and that those Georgians residing near the Gorge be disarmed. Abkhaz deputy defense minister says if the demands are not met, Abkhazian armed forces will “undertake specific measures” to force Georgian troops out. The Abkhaz also have refused to discuss the refugee problem until Georgian forces withdraw.

· Ardzinba states “only the closest ties with Russia” can ensure the development of Abkhazia. The comments demonstrate the Abkhazian strategy to forge political ties with Russia in their quest to secure independence from Georgia.

25 · Shevardnadze, speaking on Russian television, blames Defense Minister Tengiz Kitovani for starting the war in Abkhazia. Shevardnadze states that Kitovani had disobeyed orders when he sent troops into Sukhumi, the capital of Abkhazia.

August 1994

1 · Vadim Gustov, chairman of the Federation Council's CIS Affairs Committee, says that Russia's diplomatic and peacekeeping initiatives "are helping to stabilize the situation in the Georgian-Abkhazian conflict zone." Gustov, who recently led a Russian parliamentary delegation to the area, reports that fighting had stopped and that refugee repatriation is proceeding.

Nevertheless, Gustov says that Georgian troops refuse to disengage from the Kodor Gorge, while the Abkhaz side actively works to delay the return of the Georgian refugees. In addition, negotiations on a political settlement for Abkhazia remain deadlocked.

5 · Quadpartite negotiations were scheduled to resume in Sochi to discuss procedures for the safe return of refugees to Abkhazia, the withdrawal of Georgian forces from the Kodor Gorge, and on reaching a political settlement for Abkhazia. However, the Abkhaz delegation plans to boycott the session until the Georgian troops are withdrawn.

6 · Georgian troops, monitored by UN and Russian observers, began withdrawing from the Kodor Gorge. A Georgian Defense Ministry spokesman says that 250 soldiers left the canyon. Two platoons of Russian peacekeepers will patrol the Kodor region.

10 · A meeting between Abkhazian and Georgian officials is convened by Russian Foreign Ministry officials to review the current ceasefire agreement. Following the meeting, Georgian Defense Minister Vadriko Nadibaidze states his support for Russian peacekeeping forces in the area and hopes Georgian refugees return shortly.

16 · Tens of thousands of Georgian refugees gathered in Zugdidi threaten to march back to Abkhazia en masse if the repatriation process is not sped up.

17 · In a television address, Ardzinba states that the mass return of Georgian refugees threatens Abkhazia's state system. He says that his government would consider a selective return of refugees only after all armed Georgian formations withdraw from Abkhazia. He dismissed Tbilisi's claims that all Georgian troops have indeed left.

· Ardzinba meets with Tatar President Mintimer Shaimiev. They sign a friendship and cooperation treaty, recognizing each other as "subjects of international law."

19 · The aforementioned treaty raises protest from the Georgian and the Russian foreign ministries. In Tbilisi, a Foreign Ministry spokesman argues the treaty constitutes a threat to the territorial integrity of both Georgia and the Russian Federation. In Moscow, Foreign Ministry officials contend signing, which violates provisions of the Russian- Georgian Friendship Treaty signed in February 1994. An Abkhaz spokesman refuted the Russian argument, pointing out that Moscow has not yet ratified the Russian-Georgian Treaty, thus it lacks legal force and cannot apply to the Abkhaz-Tatar Treaty.

22 · Russia sends an additional battalion of troops to Abkhazia, bringing to 2,200 the number of Russian peacekeepers deployed in the conflict zone.

31 · The nominal leaders of both the Russian and Georgian delegations failed to appear in Geneva at UN-sponsored talks on a political settlement in Abkhazia. Georgia's Dzhaba Ioseliani refused "on principle" to attend, stating that Abkhaz officials continued to delay the repatriation of Georgian refugees to their homes in Abkhazia. Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Pastukhov's absence was not explained.

September 1994

1 · UN-sponsored talks on the Abkhazian conflict between Russian, Georgian, and Abkhazian representatives resume in Geneva. Although a preliminary agreement is reached for the safe return of thousands of Georgian refugees displaced from their homes in Abkhazia, the Georgian delegation is harshly critical of the Abkhazian government's delay in allowing for this return. Meeting in Tbilisi with Shevardnadze, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, Madeline Albright, reports that the United States insists on the speedy return of the Georgian refugees as the first step in reaching a settlement. Additionally, she states that the deployment of Russian peacekeeping troops must be temporary and will be "under international scrutiny."

14 · The Abkhaz government accuses Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Georgiy Kondratev of initiating a mass repatriation of Georgian refugees to Abkhazia's Gali rayon. The Abkhaz government announces that it has put its troops on alert to prevent the expected influx. A Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman denied that Moscow and Tbilisi had reached a separate agreement on the refugee situation.

· Grachev says that the deployment of Russian peacekeepers in Abkhazia may be extended beyond the six months originally agreed upon. He argues that the Abkhaz and Georgians have yet to show that they are capable of living in peaceful harmony.

16 · Another round of Russian-mediated talks on the repatriation of refugees and the political settlement of the Abkhaz question opens in Sukhumi. The two sides reportedly reach agreement linking the return of the refugees to the withdrawal of all Georgian military equipment from the hotly contested Kodori Gorge.

20 · Speaking before parliament, Shevardnadze attempts to link basing rights for the Russian army to a satisfactory solution of the Abkhaz conflict. Unimpressed, the vocal opposition faction in parliament denounces Shevardnadze's policy, accusing him of capitulating to the Russians.

23 · Ardzinba states that refugees would not, as previously agreed, be allowed to return to the Gali region on 1 October and that only 200-300 Georgians would be allowed to return to Abkhazia in October. The statements spark a mass demonstration of Georgian refugees in the western Georgian city of Zugdidi.

· Abkhaz troops are laying mines along the Inguri River, which serves as the de facto border between Abkhazia and Georgia. In July, Russian minesweepers cleared the area along the Inguri as a precondition of the deployment of Russian peacekeeping troops into Abkhazia.

28 · Russia's special envoy to Georgia, Feliks Kovalev, says that Russia "has no intention of considering ratification" of the Russian-Georgian friendship treaty (signed on 3 February 1994) "until the resolution of the Georgian-Abkhaz and Georgian-Ossetian conflicts." The treaty would provide for Georgia's territorial integrity. In response, Georgia's ambassador to Russia, Valerian Avdadze, says that "Georgia's independence depends to a great extent on Russia's position. Georgia will be independent if Russia wants it [to be]...."

12 · Three months after deployment of Russian peacekeepers to the area, six Georgian families return to Abkhazia's Gali rayon in accordance with the established procedures.

The UNHCR representative overseeing the operation complained about barriers to repatriation created by the Abkhaz government and states that as many as 33,000 refugees could have been returned by now had the Abkhaz authorities cooperated.

28 · In Tskhinvali, South Ossetia and Trans-Dniester Republic sign an interstate treaty on friendship and cooperation.

31 · A draft agreement on cooperation between Russia and Georgia is completed. It provides for training Georgian officers in various Russian military schools and Russia's active participation in supplying the Georgian army with military equipment in exchange for Russian military bases in Georgia.

November 1994

2 · In Georgia, UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali confirms the UN position on the territorial integrity and inviolability of Georgia's borders. He emphasizes the good relations between UN observers and Russian peacekeepers in the zone of Abkhazian conflict. He says that soon the UN will build up an observer contingent in Abkhazia which will consist of 136 emissaries from 26 countries.

· Following talks with Georgian Prime Minister Otar Patsatsia, Boutros-Ghali declares that further progress on the repatriation of over 250,000 Georgian refugees to their homes in Abkhazia depends on the course of political talks being mediated in Geneva by UN officials. According to Boutros-Ghali, a conference is being considered for next month between Russian, Georgian, and Abkhazian officials.

- Commenting on the results of Boutros-Ghali's visit to Georgia, Chairman of Georgia's Parliamentary Commission on Security and Defense Nodar Natadze says that "at present, the UN is unable to render any practical influence to settle the conflict in Abkhazia."

12 · A bilateral agreement on border enforcement and cooperation is signed between the visiting head of the Russian border troops and Georgian officials. The agreement calls for joint efforts to enforce border security, including cooperation in customs, enforcement, and immigration operations.

15 · Georgia and Abkhazia fail to reach agreement in Geneva talks. The Georgian delegation insists that it would continue the talks only if Abkhazia recognized its territorial integrity. However, the latter says that Georgia and Abkhazia have equal rights and therefore Abkhazia could choose its future on its own-to be part of Georgia or exist as a separate state. The impasse hinders solutions to the refugee problem: only 300 are now returning monthly to Abkhazia under a formal procedure. Proposals from UN and Russian intermediaries to increase the number to 3,000 are rejected by Abkhazia.

- According to officials of the UN High Commission for Refugees stationed in Georgia, Abkhazian forces are engaged in a campaign of harassment and intimidation against Georgian refugees returning to Abkhazia.

26 · The Abkhazian parliament ratifies a new constitution proclaiming the Republic of Abkhazia as a sovereign, lawbased state historically established according to its right to self-determination. Ardzinba is elected Abkhazia's first president.

27 · Shevardnadze assesses the Abkhazian Supreme Soviet's declaration of the republic's sovereignty as an attempt by the separatists to set up an independent state. He says that Georgia will not conduct talks with the Abkhaz side as a representative of an independent state.

28 · Commenting on the constitution adopted by Abkhazia's parliament, Russian government declares that it will continue to duly respect Georgia's territorial integrity and characterizes the adoption of the constitution as an act contradicting obligations assumed by the Abkhaz side toward reaching a peaceful settlement of the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict.

29 · Ardzinba says that the new constitution would make little change in the status of Abkhazia which was a sovereign state under the 1925 constitution. The Supreme Soviet of Abkhazia announces it is necessary to continue the traditions of more than 1,000 years of Abkhaz statehood and that "Abkhazia is not breaking off the negotiating process with Georgia and is prepared to continue with the aim of creating a union state with two equal components."

December 1994

9 · The Azerbaijani Foreign Ministry announces that the unilateral decision of the Abkhazian Supreme Soviet is a flagrant violation of Georgia's sovereignty and that it is in contrast with the peace negotiations and creates new serious threats in the region.

1995

4 · Diplomats and officials of humanitarian organizations in Tbilisi concur that incompetence is the only quality of most of the men in power in Georgia. Shevardnadze still considers the situation in Abkhazia a “personal tragedy,” stating that “if Sukhumi had fallen, I would have resigned.” Given that Sukhumi did fall and he did not resign, Shevardnadze had to alter his statement by saying that he “felt like it,” but the people wanted him to stay in power. The chairman seems to feel that some hope for resolution remains.

His comments on Russia: “I do not believe Russia is interested in a weakened Transcaucasus because this weakness could lead to a major destabilization of the region and will have consequences reaching to Russia.... The majority of the independent states support Russia’s desire to preserve its territorial integrity.”

6 · Deputy Chairman of the Russian parliament’s upper house Ramazan Abdulatipov visits Ardzinba and commander of Russian peacekeeping forces in Abkhazia, Lt.- Gen. Vasiliy Yakushev. Abdulatipov first sought to check on reports that there are bases on Abkhaz territory that train militants for fighting alongside Dudaev in Chechnya, and second, to discuss the extension of the six-month mandate given earlier to Russian peacekeepers in the zone of the Georgia-Abkhazia conflict.

While concluding that the peacekeepers had played a positive role in stabilizing the situation, Abdulatipov says Russia “had undertaken a burden that was too heavy” and that no country or international organization could simultaneously wage an internal conflict and conduct five or six peacekeeping operations.

10 · The Abkhazian government warns illegal (non-Abkhazi) militants to withdraw from the Gali district (which borders on Georgia's Zugdidi district). Otherwise, it will destroy bandit formations and terrorist groups.

12 · Georgian Defense Minister Vardiko Nadibaidze turns down a Ukrainian offer to sell modern combat equipment to Georgia for its armed forces because Russia will hand over similar equipment to Georgian forces free of charge.

13 · Kitovani leads a group of 200-250 partially armed veterans of the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict (in small buses) to western Georgia intent on "restoring the territorial integrity of the state." Kitovani says his actions were agreed upon with the Russian military. Shevardnadze issued orders for his interior, defense, and security ministers to make every effort to stop and disarm the group.

14 · Kitovani and his group are detained and held in the village of Simoneti in western Georgia.

March 1995

3 · Georgian and Abkhaz experts end recent talks by defining the devolution of power between Tbilisi and Sukhumi. The two sides agree that the future treaty will give Tbilisi peacemaking powers on crucial issues (foreign policy, economics, military policies). The location of the new legislature is still to be determined

10 · Russia and Georgia sign intergovernmental accords on increasing joint protection of the country's external border. Shevardnadze believes the accords will be a stability factor for the entire Transcaucasus region.

16 · Georgian Deputy Foreign Minister Mikhail Ukleba reveals that a Georgian delegation in Moscow sent a letter to the Russian Foreign Ministry protesting the presence of an “Abkhazian working team” within the Russian Ministry for Cooperation with the CIS. Ukleba says the Russians were understanding of the Georgian position and vowed to monitor more closely the activities in which Abkhazian separatists are allowed to participate.

21 · Georgian Prosecutor General’s office sanctions the arrest of Ardzinba for war crimes and genocide against the Georgian people. Prosecutor Anzor Latsuzbaya says his office possess sufficient evidence to prove Ardzinba’s guilt in provoking the military conflict in Abkhazia. Latsuzbaya also says a suit must be brought against all those involved in acts of genocide against the Georgian people.

23 · At a Paris conference on European stability, Georgian Foreign Minister Aleskandr Chikvaidze says events in the Caucasus region endangers European stability. He urges conference participants, particularly European Community members, to join efforts to achieve stability in the region.

26 · Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev holds “confidential” meeting with Ardzinba. The two discuss settlement possibilities for the conflict and Grachev defends the presence of the Russian peacekeeping forces in the republic.

3 · In an interview with Tbilisi radio, Shevardnadze says Abkhazia is on the road to chaos and anarchy. He comments how the recent Georgian-Russian military cooperation treaty and talks with the Russian leadership and with UN officials all new developments-have worked to bring the conflicting parties closer to agreement but notes the extreme positions held by separatist forces make negotiation difficult.

26 · In an interview with Interfax, Shevardnadze expresses dismay with Moscow's Abkhaz policy regarding the role of Russian peacekeeping forces in the region. He laments the passive behavior of the peacekeeping forces during a recent attack by Abkhazian separatists on returning refugees. He points out relations between Georgia and Russia would be firmer if "we felt support of Russia's counterefforts confirming reality of Moscow's break with Abkhazia's separatist regime and if we felt support of the peacekeeping forces."

28 · The Supreme Council and the Council of Ministers of Abkhazia announce they cannot support extending the Russian mandate for peacekeeping forces in the conflict "if no positive developments result." The mandate is set to expire 15 May and sporadic fighting continues as refugees returning to their homes are harassed and sometimes beaten. Both sides say their peoples are victims of such abuse and claim peacekeeping forces do nothing to mitigate the clashes. The Georgian side says the mandate will be extended only if the forces assume police functions and "provide real protection for the Georgian population."

9 · After a series of meetings, the UN Security Council votes to extend the UN observer mission in the Georgia- Abkhazia conflict zone until 12 January 1996. The Council praised the efforts of the CIS peacekeeping mission, singling out Russia's role in particular.

13 · Commander of Russian peacekeeping forces in Georgia, Vasiliy Yakushev, announces his forces stand ready to guarantee the security of the Georgian population in Abkhazia. Georgian Defense Minister Nadibaidze tells journalists this marks a clear change in the Russian position and welcomes the new stance.

· After talks in Moscow, Russian chief delegate to the United Nations Sergey Lavrov says Georgian and Abkhazian officials “confirmed their obligations to prevent resumption of the armed confrontation” and agreed they should “live in a single state.” Lavrov only regrets the insignificant progress in negotiations over the political status of Abkhazia and on the slow pace of returning refugees.

19 · Abkhaz representatives reject signing a document that includes Abkhazia in a Georgian federative state with broad autonomy. Georgian officials see the rejection as a ploy to prevent a comprehensive political solution. According to Russian mediator Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Patukhov, Abkhazia suffers from the “victor’s syndrome.”

22 · Ardzinba tells journalists that Georgian refugees can begin returning to their homes in Abkhazia with “full security” on 25 May. Some 200 refugees should be received weekly-a figure Ardzinba declares will allow Abkhaz authorities to keep “irregulars and war criminals away.”

23 · In a press interview, Russian Lt.-Gen. Yakushev describes the security zone as “extremely complex” and rife with banditry. He laments the fact that some 700,000 mines still exist and blow up cattle and people frequently. He also says that refugees allowed to return to Abkhazia should be increased to 1,000 a week.

27 · Shevardnadze meets in Tbilisi with Russian Deputy Prime Minister Nikolay Yegorov. No details are disclosed but reports indicate they discuss settlement of the ethnic conflicts in Abkhazia and South Ossetia. In speaking to journalists after the meeting, Yegorov declares Russia's "unequivocal support for the territorial integrity of Georgia" and condemns separatist activity in Abkhazia.

5 · The former Georgian parliament member and foreign minister, Murman Omanidze, warns that Georgia should not trust Russia's mediation efforts given that, as he points out, quite a few Russian structures own major enterprises in Abkhazia. He declares that the separatist element in Abkhazia must "be blown up from within" and Georgia can achieve this by supporting opposition in Abkhazia to the separatist regime (Ardzinba).

7 · Russian peacekeeping troops will oversee the return of Georgian refugees to their homes in the Ghali and other Abkhazian districts. Georgian Deputy Prime Minister Tamaz Nadareishvili says the refugees will not have to undergo the "preliminary questioning" previously employed by Abkhaz authorities to ensure militants were not allowed into the republic.

9 · Shevardnadze expresses readiness to meet with Ardzinba on the condition that the refugee return process begin immediately. He laments the fact that despite widespread international recognition of Georgia's territorial integrity, Ardzinba continues with referendums in Abkhazia to determine attitudes on independence or for rejoining Russia or Georgia. Given the prevailing international position, Ardzinba "should show some respect to the rest of the world," says Shevardnadze.

14 · In a press interview, Shevardnadze discusses how separatist events in the Transcaucasus and the Russian Federation could evolve into a Balkan-like situation. He says the fragmentation of any country's territory is inadmissible and that the West could help in this regard by expressly denouncing separatism, extremism, and terrorism. Should separatist activity spread in the former Soviet Union space and in the Russian Federation, Shevardnadze says the "Yugoslav tragedy would be nothing by comparison."

16 · In talks with OSCE Sec.-Gen. Wilhelm Hoeynck, Shevardnadze praises the OSCE role in settling ethnic conflicts. Pressed as to what degree of autonomy Abkhazia can expect, Shevardnadze says they will enjoy all the attributes of statehood within the state of Georgia. Hoeynck declares he will personally participate in settlement activities.

· In a press interview, Nadareishvili discusses the dire situation in many Abkhazian cities, where “Abkhazians face a real threat of extinction.” He points out that no one can oppose the Ardzinba regime, that they control all sources of power and that many people have been executed by firing squads. He believes that the return of refugees, given this context, will provoke more violence as Abkhazian police units and administrative structures take defensive positions. Nadareishvili says “we will not be able to regain Abkhazia by peaceful means. I believe it is necessary to use military force.”

24 · In a meeting of the Georgian Constitution Commission, participants discuss two variants to a new constitution. One envisages a federal arrangement where Abkhazia, Ajaria, and Tskhinvali become self-governing regions but are subjects of the federal state, Georgia. The other proposes a strict unitary Republic of Georgia, necessary in many opinions to prevent confrontations between regions and separatism. Shevardnadze favors the federative model and declares a constitution reflective of this is in the “final stage.”

27 · Ardzinba issues statement of dissatisfaction concerning talks between Georgian and Russian officials on deployment of Russian peacekeepers throughout Abkhazia. Ardzinba says participation of the Abkhazian leadership in all talks is necessary for complete settlement of the conflict.

July 1995

2 · The State Constitution Commission approves a draft constitution, 60 to 4. It provides for a federative arrangement where Abkhazia will have the attributes of statehood. Defense and border issues, infrastructure maintenance, and monetary policy will be the responsibility of the “center.” The draft will be sent to parliament for debate.

6 · Tbilisi radio reports that major agreements on national repatriation were achieved, allowing for the safe return of refugees. Representatives from both the Georgian and Abkhazian sides met in the Zugdidi district village of Anaklia.

11 · In Georgia for talks with Shevardnadze, CIS Interparliamentary Assembly Chairman Vladimir Shumeyko pledges 10 billion rubles for humanitarian and refugee use, stressing the aid would go through the appropriate Georgian channels. Shumeyko emphasizes the protection of Georgia’s territorial integrity reinforces Russia’s strategic interest in the region. The Abkhaz leadership was “bewildered” that humanitarian aid intended for Abkhazia should go through Georgian state bodies. In their opinion, they will never receive the money given the disbursement arrangement.

16 · UN special envoy Eduard Brunner arrives in Tbilisi. In talks with Georgian officials, Brunner hears the pessimism of Nadareishvili, who believes settlement negotiations are futile. “There is only the military way to return Abkhazia,” Nadareishvili says in discussions. “Ardzinba is a state criminal” and “we have come to the conclusion that we do not need either the United Nations, the [OSCE] in Europe, or Russian mediation.” For his part, Shevardnadze urges stepped up measures, saying “further delays in the process could cast doubts on the part of the international community to find a political settlement to the problem.” Brunner declares the UN is working to get back Abkhazia, but that a political solution involving Ardzinba must be found. According to the envoy, no “perceptible progress” has been made.

21 · Disagreements over Georgia’s approach to the Abkhazian conflict surfaces between Shevardnadze and Georgian parliament member Jaba Ioseliani, leader of the Mkhedriono opposition faction. Ioseliani favors full-scale military activities without Russian help while Shevardnadze has been urging resolution through continued talks and negotiations with Russian mediation. Ioseliani vows to transform his group into a political party to fight against what he sees as rising despot, referring to the Shevardnadze regime.

25 · In an address to parliament, Shevardnadze urges the body to adopt the draft constitution submitted for their review creating a federated Georgian state. Shevardnadze says it is the right course for the country at the moment and regulates fairly the territorial organization of the state. Parliament members agree to debate the document for eight hours daily until 3 August.

1 · Tamaz Nadareishvili and Zurab Erkvania, head of the Tbilisi-based Supreme Council and the Council of Ministers of the Abkhazia express their satisfaction with the Russian proposal for conflict's settlement. The proposal calls for the safe return of refugees, confirms the territorial integrity of Georgia, and provides for wide autonomy for Abkhazia. The plan is to be used as the framework for the next round of talks.

2 · Patsatsia holds talks with head of the OSCE mission in Georgia Dieter Boden. Boden spoke of the possibilities of rendering humanitarian aid to the refugees from Abkhazia and urged the Georgian prime minister to allow increased Russian participation in the settlement proceedings, believing that Russia can play the decisive role.

7 · Reports surface that the Abkhaz separatists are being supplied weaponry and supplies by Tatarstan. The Republic of Tatarstan, part of the Russian Federation, and Abkhazia have signed a friendship and cooperation agreement.

14 · The conflict enters its third full year, with the death toll reaching 10,000 lives. Tbilisi estimates that over 300,000 refugees have been created as a result of the fighting. Despite the peace agreement signed in May 1994, sporadic fighting continues as no political resolution has yet been achieved.

18 · In a press interview, Shevardnadze denies responsibility for “unleashing war” in Abkhazia. He states the intention of sending into Abkhazia Georgian National Guards in 1992 was to “restore the control” over the main rail and road routes with the aim of averting robberies of food trains passing through Abkhazia and western Georgia on their way to Tbilisi.

· The Supreme Council of Abkhazia announces that Ardzinba has prepared a special decree on an amnesty for the participants in the “liberation war.” The move is predicted to upset many ethnic Georgians living in territories controlled by the secessionists.

September 1995

5 · In a press interview, Shevardnadze says the Abkhaz leadership has once again “destroyed yet another chance [for settlement] through its irresponsible conduct,” referring to Abkhazia’s walkout on talks being held in Moscow. He believes the Abkhaz leadership is procrastinating until Moscow holds elections and politicians with favorable views toward Abkhazia will assume power. As to settlement possibilities, Shevardnadze says “I still adhere to peaceful settlement, but everything has not only a beginning but also an end.”

6 · CIS Interparliamentary Assembly chairman Shumeyko contends the policies of Ardzinba were criminal from the outset. These policies, he argues, led to the war, the human casualties, and the destruction brought to the home, villages, and towns in Abkhazia. Says Shumeyko, “Ardzinba [will] finally face God’s judgment for his deeds.”

7 · UN envoy to the Georgian-Abkhazian peace talks Eduard Brunner addresses a UN Security Council session outlining the “destructive policies” he concludes were orchestrated by Ardzinba. Brunner further charges it was Ardzinba and the Abkhaz delegation who broke the Moscow talks, which, in his opinion, is sure to lead to a deterioration of the situation in the Caucasus region.

11 · Abkhaz ideologue Yuriy Voronov is found murdered in his home in Sukhumi. Voronov was an ethnic Russian who served as vice-premier in the Abkhazian government and was a key part of the Abkhaz negotiating team. Abkhazian ambassador to Moscow Igor Akhba reveals that he has no doubts the killing was contract work and political. Voronov favored independence for Abkhazia and argued for equal union of the two states.

14 · Abkhazian Foreign Minister Leonid Lakerbaya says their intelligence sources have identified increased Georgian troop buildup near the Gali district. Lakerbaya sent letters to the CIS peacekeeping command and to the UN military observers' command urging them to take action. He believes the buildup (due to receive reinforcement from the Georgian army) is in preparation for cutting off the region from Abkhazia and rejoining it to Georgia. In talks with Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksey Bolshakov, Shevardnadze denies the troop buildup, saying "one should be very imaginative to think of such a thing."

17 · The Abkhaz Security Service believes Russia and Georgia will launch a joint mission to "restore Georgia's territorial integrity." Security Service sources say Russia has given warships to Georgia for a landing operation to be launched simultaneously with military operations in the Gali district. The service further asserts that a Russian contingent may take part in the combat operation.

18 · Ardzinba requests that Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev provide him with a copy of a supposed document signed by Chernomyrdin and Shevardnadze which, according to Abkhazian special services, provides for the "forcible methods of resolution of the Georgian-Abkhazian conflict." Ardzinba says the Abkhaz leadership desires the document so they can "make an objective assessment of the situation."

Summary at the End of 1995

The Georgian-Abkhazia conflict has yet to be resolved. The sides still do not agree on what the official status of the Republic of Abkhazia should be in relation to Georgia. The Abkhaz insist on a federative structure while the Georgians are intent on a confederative structure which maintains Georgian territorial integrity. Georgia has said the Abkhaz would enjoy the same attributes of statehood and retain wide autonomy.

The Abkhaz desire complete independence. No major fighting has occurred and the rumored joint Russian-Georgian military operation to retake the republic has not developed. All sides confirm their commitment to arrive at a political settlement through peaceful means. The UN, OSCE, the U.S. and NATO, the EU, and the CIS peacekeeping command are the multilateral organizations involved in talks and the settlement proceedings.

The Nagorno-Karabakh Conflict

Background Note

Starting in late 1988, a wrenching war of tragic proportions raged itself into a tension-filled lull, which now hangs over the separatist enclave, punctuated intermittently by low-intensity outbursts of guerrilla warfare. Ostensibly about reclaiming “historical lands,” the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict is also very much about Russia’s oil interests and external competition for control over the region. In this instance, Moscow has brilliantly played each combatant against the others, accomplishing in the process several of its imperial goals in the Caucasus. To fulfill these goals, it has made use of its by now familiar policy of sending in “peacekeeping” troops, albeit with some muted resistance from Western organizations.

As with most of the CIS “hot spots,” the history of the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict precedes the formation of the CIS. Ethnic Armenians and Azerbaijanis have been fighting for hundreds of years. The most recent feud began in December 1988, when Moscow once again refused an Armenian request to incorporate Karabakh within the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic. Fighting had broken out between Armenia and Azerbaijan following a wave of anti-Armenian pogroms in Azerbaijan and the subsequent erection of a physical and economic blockade between Armenia and Nagorno-Karabakh. The intensity of the hostilities increased in 1989 when the Armenian parliament passed a “Resolution on the Reunification of Armenia with Nagorno-Karabakh.” This open insult to Azerbaijan’s territorial integrity was followed by Nagorno-Karabakh’s 1990 election of twelve deputies to the Armenian parliament, which Azerbaijan, of course, regarded as illegal. Following this challenge, the “Republic of Mountainous Karabakh” announced its existence and its secession from Azerbaijani jurisdiction in September 1991.

Each state has its own stubborn reasons for continuing the long and gruesome battle. In its own defense, Armenia claims it is liberating its historical lands from the illegal apportionments made during the Stalin era. (In 1926, the population in Nagorno-Karabakh was 117,000 Armenians and 13,600 Azeris.) Azerbaijan, on the other hand, regards arbitrarily established Soviet boundaries of the 1920s as legal, and refuses to recognize Armenia’s historical arguments.

Russia’s historical interest in the Nagorno-Karabakh region dates back to its eighteenth-century competition for the lucrative trade routes leading to Iran and Asiatic Turkey. Russia’s increasing appetite for raw materials, notably silk, cotton, and copper, fueled its colonization of Azerbaijan in the early nineteenth century (oil had not yet been discovered in the Caspian Sea shelf). Over everything else, however, the area's attraction stemmed from its strategic value as the Transcaucasian corridor penetrating deeply into Iran, and for its vantage point on Turkey's eastern flank. In the nineteenth century, therefore, Russia became the first European power to establish direct rule over the Transcaucasian slice of the Middle East, far ahead of Britain's colonization of Egypt and France's mandate over Syria and Lebanon.

Returning to today, the chronology which follows begins in January 1992, after the hastily convened Belovezh Forest meeting from which the rather ill-conceived and unplanned CIS sprang. To reestablish its long-standing dominance in the Transcaucasus, the Russian government began to work partly through CIS institutions to assert its "peacekeeping" role in the Nagorno-Karabakh war. For this purpose, it used the Soviet 7th Army, which was deployed in Armenia before the USSR dissolved. During the war, Moscow has employed the 7th Army to support both the Armenians and the Azerbaijanis in the struggle. Moscow's zigzag diplomacy in the region has sometimes met with suspicion and resistance both from countries within the CIS and on the part of international organizations like the United Nations and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) (formerly the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCEI). Nevertheless, the Western powers have been weak in their response, and fearing a major conservative Islamic backlash in Azerbaijan, largely extended their support for Moscow's ceasefire plan in the Karabakh war, as laid out in the May 1994 Bishkek Protocol.

Moscow's rivalry with the CSCE/OSCE over resolving the Karabakh conflict is elucidated in this chronology, as are relations between Russia and the principal parties in the negotiating process, including Turkey, Nagorno-Karabakh, Iran, Armenia, Azerbaijan, the OSCE, the United Nations, and the CIS leaders. Karabakh has, in fact, become something of a test of whether Russia will cooperate with international bodies in the future in resolving CIS hot spots, or whether it will insist on dominating the "peacekeeping" process, thereby forming its own secure sphere of influence. The chronology reflects a sense of Russia's intentions, tactics, and strategy over the course of the gruesome war. The endpoint of its strategy has not, however, been reached, for President Geydar Aliev remains a thorn in Russia's side in his refusal to countenance Russian incursions against Azerbaijani independence.

Chronology of Key Events 1991

28 · Armenians of Nagorno-Karabakh (NKR) hold parliamentary elections and prepare to establish statehood. The Azerbaijani government refuses to recognize the republic and cancels its "autonomous" status.

January 1992

2 · Presidential rule is decreed in Azerbaijan by President Ayaz Mutalibov.

· Nagorno-Karabakh's leadership ignores Mutalibov's decree of presidential rule.

· President Ayaz Mutalibov announces that “war is on in Karabakh. Previously a local conflict, it is escalating into a full-fledged war.” Reports indicate that in the past week, 6,000 Azerbaijanis have been driven from their homes.

6 · NKR Supreme Soviet appeals to the United Nations and CIS states for recognition, declaring the republic ready for diplomatic relations with all states.

8 · Director of the geological museum in Gadrut Artur Mkrtchyan is elected chairman of the NKR Supreme Soviet. The parliament is made up of eighty-two seats, eighteen of which are reserved for Azerbaijanis.

13 · Chairman of the NKR Supreme Soviet announces that NKR and Azerbaijan are in a state of war.

25 · In a press interview, Armenian Foreign Minister Raffi Ovanesyan warns that the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict can become another Yugoslavia. He reveals also that Armenia has concluded friendship and cooperation treaties with Russia and applied for membership in the United Nations and the CSCE.

27 · NKR Prime Minister Oleg Yesayan visits Armenia seeking food aid. During the visit, he informs Armenia’s prime minister about parliamentary elections and efforts to form a government.

29 · Azerbaijan cuts off its gas pipeline to Armenia. Fuel now reaches Armenia through the Georgian branch line.

31 · Armenian Foreign Minister spells out the Armenian position on NKR to a session of the Helsinki Council of Foreign Ministers. He claims the conflict “is not a territorial issue, and Armenia does not have any territorial claims.” He states the NKR problem is one of human rights and the right of citizens to self-determination.

· Mutalibov describes the conflict as an “internal affair and a matter of principle for Azerbaijan,” vowing not to internationalize the conflict by appealing to international organizations.

February 1992

2 · TURAN news agency reports intensive Armenian armed formations along the Azeri border, transported there by Soviet army aircraft. The Armenian forces reportedly are equipped with arms and matériel of the Soviet motorized rifle regiment stationed in the Khankendi region (Stepanakert).

6 · In an address to Azeri political leaders, Azeri Prime Minister Hasan Hasanov notes Russia will soon become the enemy in view of its increasingly pro-Armenian stance. He believes a recent Russian-Armenian security treaty will serve to reinforce Russian support for Armenia in the NKR conflict.

8 · Azeri presidential advisor R. Musabekov states that Russia is not viewed as a neutral, objective force in the conflict by Azeris but decidedly pro-Armenian. While realizing the difficulty of resolving the conflict without a Russian role, he laments the “obtrusive form” taken of late by the Russian leadership.

13 · NKR's Cabinet of Ministers warn CIS heads that should the Russian leadership resubordinate military units on Azeri territory to Azerbaijan, the regional situation will deteriorate, lead to considerable casualties, and damage Karabakh and Armenian relations with Russia. The Cabinet also reveals that over 1,500 missiles have been fired on Stepanakert since November 1991, killing 49 and wounding 159.

20 · In a public address, Mutalibov says instability in Azerbaijan directly relates to the conflict in the NKR and appeals to all political currents, movements, and parties-regardless of ideology-to join in overcoming the difficulties. The same day, Azerbaijani Popular Front (APF) leader Abulfaz Elchibey demands Mutalibov's resignation for the dire state of affairs he has caused.

28 · Mutalibov agrees to combine the general forces in Azeri territory with the CIS army. The coalition will be subordinate to the Azeri president and CIS Commander Shaposhnikov. The Azeri leadership has previously insisted on incorporating the general forces units stationed in Azerbaijan into an Azeri army. The move should ease tensions between the general forces and the Azeri republic.

March 1992

2 · The Azeri town of Shusha incurs heavy shelling, damaging energy, water, and electricity resources. Both the CIS 366th regiment based in Stepanakert and Armenian forces deny a part in the shelling.

6 · Under strong pressure, Mutalibov resigns as Azeri president. Presidential powers are passed over the Supreme Soviet Chairman Yaqub Mamedov. The APF, under Elchibey, further demands the resignation of the whole republican leadership, charging the regime has performed poorly in the NKR conflict.

- The CIS 366th regiment, stationed in Stepanakert, is withdrawn. NKR leaders lobbied against the move as they believe the withdrawal provides the Azeri leadership the opportunity to wage full-scale warfare against NKR.

11 · Turkey and Iran announce interest in forming a peacekeeping division to resolve the conflict. Iranian Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Velayati proposes a multinational force be dispatched to the region while Tehran negotiates the conflict's solution. The Turkish plan, revealed in a memo from the Turkish Embassy in Moscow, envisages both Armenia and Azerbaijan inviting CSCE experts to examine the situation and assign a special ceasefire monitoring mission. Turkey asserts that both sides should pronounce intentions to settle the conflict peacefully.

19 · A ceasefire, brokered in Tehran talks between representatives of the warring sides, is announced. The agreement, effective 20 March, encompasses monitoring committees comprised of Iranians to be established in Baku, Yerevan, Stepanakert, and Shusha, provides for exchanging the dead, and lifts economic sanctions on the region. Iran's interest in the conflict's resolution is linked in part to Iranian efforts to become a major player in developing Caspian Sea oil reserves.

22 · Armenian-populated villages of Karachinar, Kharkhaput, and Manashit in the Shaumyan district come under heavy fire. Reports note Azeri troops amassing near other Armenian villages and residents begin to flee. Armenian officials say the shelling violates the recent ceasefire in effect since 20 March.

30 · An Iranian delegation arrives in Baku to implement stage two of the Islamic nation's efforts to arrive at a peace settlement. In meetings with Azeri leader Mamedov, Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister Mahmud Va'ezizadeh emphasizes the importance of a durable ceasefire, pledging additional Iranian units if needed. Va'ezizadeh also says Iran is prepared to intermediate the exchange of hostages.

· In a press interview, Turkish Ambassador to Russia Volkan Vural states Turkey considers the Karabakh region as an inseparable part of Azerbaijan and that the province must remain part of the Azerbaijani Republic. He notes Ankara's support, however, for a peaceful solution to the problem. Turkey has consistently supported Azerbaijan in lieu of its centuries old trading links and common Turkic origins. Like Iran, Turkey also seeks a prominent role in the Caspian Sea oil basin's development.

April 1992

1 · A CSCE delegation arrives in the NKR to meet with its leadership. Delegation head Jiri Dienstbier announces plans to hold an international conference on the NKR conflict within the CSCE framework. NKR leadership make clear that "Nagorno-Karabakh is a state formation, and its presence is obligatory in any process concerning the republic's interests."

7 · Azeri units upset relative calm in the NKR by opening massive rocket and gun fire on Stepanakert, violating the Iranian-brokered ceasefire. Attacks are also opened in the Armenian villages of Norachen, Berdashen, and Nurishen. The activities halt when Armenian defense forces fire a salvo into Azeri positions.

- Russian special envoy Vladimir Kazimirov meets with Va'ezi in Baku. The two discuss Russia's role in conjunction with Iranian mediation efforts and express support for UN and CSCE participation in maintaining the ceasefire.

12 · Azeri units launch massive missile and artillery bombardment on Stepanakert and SkhnaKh in the Askeran district. NKR defense committee reports transportation of ammunition for Grad rocket launchers; anti-aircraft and artillery pieces are delivered to Shusha, controlled presently by Azeri units.

14 · Artur Mkrtchyan, NKR Supreme Soviet chairman, is shot dead in his Stepanakert apartment. Acting NKR leader Georgiy Petrosyan reports the death was accidental, not a murder. The Azeri leadership deny any part in Mkrtchyan's death.

16 · Accusing the Russian military of supporting Armenian combat activity against Azeris in the NKR, Azerbaijan Defense Ministry calls for withdrawing of all Russian troops from its territory.

18 · Azerbaijan Defense Ministry issues statement to CIS member states charging Russia with inciting the conflict in Nagorno-Karabakh and continuing as the aggressor. The statement charges that Russia actively supplies arms and equipment to both sides and demands criminal proceedings be held against Russians serving in the CIS 4th Army. Extensive commentary purports that Russia supports Armenia to better its own chances of regaining a hegemonic role in the Caucasus.

25 · CSCE representatives arrive in Yerevan in preparation for arrival of a CSCE observer team in the NKR. The team's mandate should be approved in Helsinki by the CSCE Committee of Senior Officials. Jiri Dienstbier of the CSCE Council of Foreign Ministers dispatched a similar preparation mission to Baku.

30 · Russia and Azerbaijan agree on transferring all general-purpose troops stationed on Azeri territory to Azeri jurisdiction. The agreement nullifies previous arrangements to have joint Azeri-CIS control over the troops.

1 · Agreement is reached between representatives of the Russian and Azerbaijani Defense Ministries to withdraw all CIS Joint Armed Forces from Azeri territory by the end of 1993. Some of the unit's troops will be transferred to Azeri jurisdiction and others will join regiments in Russia.

2 · Turkish Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel addresses the Azerbaijani parliament saying Azerbaijan must do better to bring their case regarding the NKR to the world community and offered Turkish diplomacy in doing so. Demirel also recognized the dissolution of the USSR affords ethnic Turks new opportunities to restore their fraternal links.

· Intensive artillery shelling continues unabated on Stepanakert. Armenian defense forces have repelled Azeri troop advances but the shelling brings the capital to a critical situation with foodstuffs emptied, communication systems down, and city water and energy resources badly damaged.

4 · Armenian government organizes military call-up in line with the presidential decree signed last spring. The republic's Defense Ministry, military commissariat, executive committees of rayons and city soviets, the Interior Ministry, and the Ministry of Education are all involved in the conscription process which according to military commissar Col. Levon Stepanyan underlines the fact that the conscription is a national endeavor. Those born between 1970 and 1973 who have not yet served, and those born in 1974, are covered in the draft.

6 · Armenian Vice-President Gagik Arutyunyan announces all defense equipment belonging to the ex-USSR will be controlled by the Defense Ministry. The decision evolved out of a defense ministry meeting that sought a comprehensive solution to defend Armenia's border.

7 · Tripartite talks in Iran begin. The Armenian, Azerbaijani, and Iranian presidents sign a statement for a phased solution involving a permanent ceasefire, deployment of international observers, freeing transportation routes, exchanging prisoners, and ways to improve Armenian-Azeri bilateral relations. Commentators believe Iran's mediation, because of its clear neutrality, provides the best settlement opportunity.

8 · Tripartite participants in the Iran talks sign a ceasefire agreement and pledge lifting the embargo on Karabakh. Implementation is doubtful as several political organizations in Baku express skepticism over the agreement.

15 · A state of emergency is introduced in Baku as a result of internal power struggles between Mutalibov-who resigned in March and is being considered for reinstatement by parliament-and APF supporters. Clashes between these factions have threatened Azeri unity in defense of the NKR. As a result of the power struggle, Armenia has stepped up its campaign and CIS forces, at Russia's behest, have become active on the Armenian side.

18 · Azerbaijan Defense Ministry reports that CIS troops invaded the rayon center of Sadarak in the NKR, shelling the rayon and making way for Armenian defense formations to follow. Two CIS soldiers who deserted their units entered into Baku and spoke to journalists regarding CIS involvement, saying groups of thirty to forty men are being assembled from Georgia and sent to fight in Armenia against Azerbaijan.

21 · Armenian government urges the Nakhichevan leadership to request Iranian military observers to the autonomous republic to secure the region as a zone of stability. Increased fighting threatens stability on the Nakhichevan-Armenian border as CIS troops become more involved with the Armenian effort and as Turkish troops assemble on the region's border. Iran agrees in principle to the deployment, pending approval by appropriate leaders.

23 · A group of Iranian observers arrives in Nakhichevan.

June 1992

1 · CSCE-sponsored peace talks begin in Rome with eleven nations participating. Armenia and Azerbaijan send delegates but representatives from Karabakh refuse to participate without full diplomatic recognition. No agreements are reached.

3 · Azerbaijan blockades Armenia, crippling the Armenian economy. The natural gas pipeline to Armenia through Georgia is also shut down due to violence in South Ossetia. Industrial production in Armenia falls 51 percent for the first five months of 1992.

4 · President Ter-Petrosyan states Armenia will accept a peace settlement that has first been accepted by the NKR government.

7 · APF leader Abulfaz Elchibey wins presidential election. He vows to increase Azerbaijan's effort in prosecuting the war, to re-establish strong links with Turkey, and to resist Russian attempts to reinvigorate their control in the post-Soviet space. In connection with this, Russia steps up its support to Armenia and begins talks with Nakhichevan parliamentary leader Geydar Aliev, a former Politburo member who remains pro-Russian. Rift between Aliev and Elchibey increases as the two compete for support from Nakhichevan's people and over control of the autonomous republic.

7-12 · Azerbaijan launches counteroffensives to retake Armenian control of Karabakh, capturing fifteen villages in the Mardakert. Armenia alleges that Azerbaijan is trying to open a corridor to the Azerbaijani-populated Autonomous Region of Nakhichevan through Armenian territory. Artillery bombing is recorded on virtually the entire Armenian-Azerbaijani border.

14 · Armenian self-defense forces counterattack. The Armenian defenders retake the village of Kichan. Azerbaijan maintains air superiority and by day's end controls the Shahumyan district. Armenian villages, including Karachinar, Buzlukh, Erkech, Manashid, and Kharkhaput, are completely destroyed, forcing 10,000 people to flee southward.

16 · Armenian government threatens withdrawing from the CIS if member states fail to provide military assistance under the terms of mutual defense pact signed in May 1992.

18 · Armenia and Azerbaijan reach a preliminary agreement for a ceasefire at CSCE-sponsored talks in Rome.

- Armenia calls reservists under age thirty-five and declares a one-month state of emergency in Nagorno-Karabakh.

27 · Azerbaijani President Elchibey vows to “recapture within two months all territory in the NKR lost to Armenian forces” and rejects political autonomy for Armenians in Nagorno-Karabakh.

July 1992

5 · A large-scale Azerbaijani offensive is launched against the northern Mardakert district of Karabakh. The offensive seizes most of the district, forcing upward of 70,000 Armenian villagers to flee their homes.

- The Armenian delegation at the eleven-nation CSCE Rome peace talks walk out in protest of Azerbaijani aggression.

6 · The Rome CSCE session adjourns with no significant results.

7 · After several Azerbaijani victories against Armenian villages, the Azerbaijani delegate to the Rome CSCE talks, Araz Azimov, agrees to a July ceasefire.

8 · The Armenian Supreme Soviet resolves to support the rights of NKR and declares unacceptable any documents “referring to the Nagorno-Karabakh Republic as being within the Azerbaijani state structure.”

15 · The Armenian government announces that the delegations from Karabakh and Armenia will not be attending the scheduled CSCE Rome talks to protest recent Azeri attacks against the Armenians of Karabakh. The Armenian border district Goris is being shelled.

August 1992

2-4 · Azerbaijani and Turkish delegations to the CSCE talks in Rome walk out in protest against a reference recognizing the delegation from the Republic of Karabakh. To date, the Karabakh delegation has been limited to “interested party” status.

5 · Following talks in Moscow with the Armenian foreign minister, Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev proposes that new Karabakh peace talks be held in southern Russia aimed at reaching a preliminary ceasefire agreement. The Russian proposal also suggests a second stage involving the deployment of a UN- or CIS-sponsored peacekeeping detachment in Karabakh.

10 · An Azeri attack on Armenian territory around the village of Artsvashen in western Azerbaijan prompts President Levon Ter-Petrosyan to appeal to the signatories of the CIS Collective Security Treaty to “carry out their obligations” in coming to Armenia’s aid. Russian spokesman emphasizes that the treaty envisages negotiations before any military involvement.

21 · Armenian and Russian leadership agree in Moscow to Russian military support for Armenia and a legal status for Russian forces in Armenia. The Russian decision to side with Armenia reflects its displeasure with anti-Russian Azerbaijani President Elchibey.

24-27 · In a letter to the UN Security Council, Armenia requests the Security Council convene immediately to discuss the Karabakh situation. It calls for UN involvement to counter renewed Azeri offensives. CSCE mediator for the Karabakh conflict Mario Rafaeli presents his proposal for establishing a sixty-day ceasefire and deploying military observers to prevent escalation.

27 · Kazakh President Nazarbaev offers to mediate the conflict. Trilateral negotiations at Foreign Ministry level begin in the Kazakh capital, Alma-Ata, and produce a ceasefire agreement to begin 1 September. Azeri attacks continue, however.

September 1992

1-3 · Following Kazakh mediation attempts, Armenian and Azeri representatives meet in the Idzhevan border region, sign a protocol calling for the introduction of a ceasefire, and promise Armenian-Azeri dialogue. Despite the protocol, Azeri attacks continue against Armenian population centers, in violation of the ceasefire.

10 · The fifth round of the CSCE's Rome peace talks on Karabakh ends in stalemate as Azerbaijan continues to refuse to abide by the CSCE ceasefire proposal. American and French delegates to the talks condemn Azerbaijani aggression.

18 · The Azeri leadership calls on all Armenian forces to withdraw in return for a guarantee of safe passage from Karabakh through the Lochin corridor.

19 · Armenian, Azerbaijani, Georgian, and Russian defense ministers sign an agreement in Sochi calling for a ceasefire in Karabakh. The agreement also calls for the formation of a peacekeeping force composed of various CIS states and establishes a two-month moratorium on military activity, allowing for a phased withdrawal of military units in the region.

25 · The Russian-brokered ceasefire comes into effect.

It is accompanied by protocols on the withdrawal of arms, prisoner exchanges, and on stationing observers from CSCE.

October 1992

1-30 · Armenian and Azerbaijan fighting over Nagorno-Karabakh persists during October, despite the ceasefire agreements.

12 · Russia and Azerbaijan sign a treaty of “Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Security.”

31 · Moscow talks are scheduled for next week between the defense ministers of Russia, Azerbaijan, Armenia, and CIS Joint Armed Forces Commander-in-chief Shaposhnikov. Observers believe Russia and Armenia will press Azerbaijan to consent to dispatching Russian Armed Forces to Karabakh. Observers also believe no consent will be forthcoming as many Azeris believe a Russian presence aggravates the situation.

November 1992

6 · Ter-Petrosyan and NKR parliament chairman Georgiy Petrosyan announce their willingness to enter into a ceasefire without any preconditions. Azerbaijan, however, demands Armenia withdraw its forces from Shusha and Lochin before any agreements are discussed.

13 · Azerbaijani Defense Ministry reports renewed fighting after some calm in various rayons and towns. They claim Armenian units launched attacks against Azeri positions in Khodzhalinskiy, Gyunkyslakh, Seidlyar, and Kazanchi. The report indicates the offensives were repelled by Azeri forces, who made the units retreat after losing thirty men.

2 · As the Republic of Nagorno-Karabakh's parliamentary president Georgiy Petrosyan arrives in Yerevan to meet with Armenian officials, Azeri forces wage artillery attacks on the Karabakh capital of Stepanakert and the district of Askeran. Azeri bombing attacks by Su-25 combat aircraft then follow against the positions around the Lochin corridor connecting Nagorno-Karabakh to Armenia.

5 · Azeri combat aircraft conduct bombing attacks against Armenian villages and the regional center in Martuni district. Republic of Nagorno-Karabakh forces retake several strategic positions near the village of Marzilli.

6 · Armenia border villages in the Askeran and Martuni districts, as well as the capital Stepanakert, are subjected to heavy shelling by Azeri artillery units. Following bombing attacks by Azeri combat aircraft over Martuni, Republic of Nagorno-Karabakh forces shoot an Azeri Su-25 jet fighter and an Mi-24 assault helicopter. A later Azeri offensive against the Askeran district is repelled by Nagorno- Karabakh forces.

8 · Sporadic Azeri attacks against Republic of Nagorno-Karabakh positions around the vital Lochin corridor probe the defenses of the area in preparation for a possible wider attack.

11 · Azeri forces initiate bombing and GRAD multiplemissile artillery attacks on the Armenian districts of Goris and Gapan, killing six and wounding sixteen residents. Armenian Foreign Minister Arman Kirakosyan warns that due to the Turkish cancellation of the recent energy agreement coupled with the continuing Azeri-imposed blockade of Armenia, the Armenian government will be forced to consider reopening its 800-megawatt Medzamor nuclear power station. In Tiflis, an Armenian delegation signs an economic and energy transport agreement with Georgian officials.

13 · Azeri combat aircraft conduct bombing attacks over the Armenian district of Gapan and Azeri artillery units attack the Goris district, resulting in twenty-five residents killed and forty-six wounded.

15 · Azeri armored forces launch an offensive into Armenia, penetrating the border to attack the villages in Armenia's Gapan district. Soon thereafter, artillery attacks begin against Armenian villages in the Megri and Idzhevan districts.

16 · Azeri artillery units shell the districts of Askeran and Martuni. The regional center and villages of Vardashen and Charpaz in Martuni suffer particularly heavy damage. Reportedly, the Azeri attack on Askeran utilizes a new type of rocket, a ten-meter-long S-200 unguided surface-to-air missile, modified for longer-range artillery attacks and not believed to have been in the Azeri arsenal, indicating a recent acquisition. Clashes erupt in the Mardakert district and around the Lochin corridor.

21 · Armenian villages in the Goris and Megri districts are subjected to heavy artillery shelling by Azeri forces. Armenian Vice-President Gagik Arutyunyan heads a delegation meeting with Iranian officials in Tehran. Armenia formally requests that Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus dismiss all Armenian officers serving in their national armies. It is estimated that there are nearly 5,000 Armenian officers serving in these republics.

22 · Following heavy shelling, an Azeri force of tanks, armored vehicles, and combat aircraft launch an offensive in Armenia's Krasnoselsk district. The Azeri thrust penetrates 3.5 kilometers into Armenian territory before being repulsed by Armenian defenders.

23 · Azeri forces mass on the border of the Idzhevan district in preparation for attack. Azeri artillery shelling is resumed in the Gapan district, with heavy damage in the villages of Yekhvard and Agarak.

27 · The Armenian Foreign Ministry issues a statement protesting the Azeri "aggression against the Republic of Armenia and the encroachment on its sovereignty and territorial integrity."

29 · Armenian officials conclude an agreement with Turkmenistan calling for the daily shipment of 11 million cubic meters of natural gas. Armenia's daily basic minimum need is nearly 12 million cubic meters of natural gas. Responding to Armenia's appeal for energy, the Russian government promises to dispatch another 7 million cubic meters of natural gas once the pipeline through Georgia is repaired and operational.

29 · An Azeri offensive of armored vehicles and tanks is launched against the Idzhevan district of Armenia.

Azerbaijan and Iran conclude a barter-type agreement calling for the export of 250 million cubic meters of Iranian natural gas to Azerbaijan in exchange for an unspecified amount of Azeri petroleum-related products. The Azeris refuse an Iranian offer to mediate the Karabakh conflict.

30 · The Russian military command, following an earlier accord with Azerbaijan, cedes nineteen border posts to Azeri forces. The frontier posts include eleven in Lenkoran and eight in Prishib.

1993

3 · Following a general Azeri mobilization of forces and the Azeri imposition of a state of emergency in its Fizuli district, clashes erupt between Armenian forces in the Martuni district and Azeri positions in the bordering Fizuli district. Armenian villages of Gevorgavan and Yenokavan are heavily damaged. After halting the Azeri attacks, Armenian forces are able to hold their positions in the Martuni district. Armenian positions around the Lochin corridor connecting Karabakh to Armenia are also subject to Azeri attacks.

7 · Closed, unofficial “consultative” talks on Karabakh are convened in Moscow with Russian, Armenian, Azerbaijani, Turkish, and U.S. participation. No representation from Karabakh was present.

9 · Commenting on the joint Bush-Yeltsin statement on Karabakh, Parliamentary Chairman Georgiy Petrosyan welcomes the international involvement in the “aggression of Azerbaijan against Karabakh.” The Karabakh leader stresses that international recognition of the NKR will help the conflict’s settlement.

11 · Armenia’s “Snark” news agency publishes what it asserts is a top secret governmental report on Karabakh. The six-point document states Armenia is ready to negotiate without preconditions except for a refusal to enter agreements recognizing Karabakh as a part of Azerbaijan. The Armenian government’s position, according to the document, proposes “recognizing Karabakh as a territory without status” and calls for “negotiations to determine Karabakh’s status.”

15 · As the blockade intensifies the energy crisis in Armenia, Armenian Industry Minister orders all but seven essential industrial enterprises to close by 1 February. Public transportation shuts down, homes remain subject to severe heating and electricity rationing, and virtually all of the country's industries stand idle.

15 · Azeri government criticizes France, United States, and other Western countries for sending aid to Armenia, claiming it will "enable Armenia to continue its aggression against Azerbaijan."

21 · Azeri government blockades garrisons of Russian Lenkorani border detachments and prohibits Russian flights over Azerbaijan.

18 · NKR State Defense Committee Chairman Robert Kocharyan concludes meetings with Armenian officials in Yerevan, where participants reviewed the situation in Karabakh and discussed upcoming CSCE talks.

· Azeri artillery attacks escalate against positions around the Lochin corridor connecting Karabakh to Armenia. Azeri attacks are also launched against villages in the Martuni and Askeran districts.

25 · Nagorno-Karabakh forces retake the strategic village in the Mardakert district. As NKR forces push deeper into the Azeri-occupied district, a total of eleven Armenian villages are retaken.

February 1993

2 · NKR government announces it will introduce a citizenship program for all Karabakh residents including a plan to issue passports and identification papers.

22 · Nagorno-Karabakh forces liberate the village of Aterk, one of the largest in Mardakert, from Azeri units. Karabakh defense forces, following the consolidation of their positions in Mardakert, move to retake the strategic Sarsang hydroelectric and reservoir complex. Fighting spreads to the Azeri stronghold of Agdam with sporadic but intense battles.

25 · In a joint statement coinciding with the CSCE talks on Karabakh, Russia and the United States urge all parties in the Karabakh conflict to cease military action and to enter into peaceful negotiations. A NKR delegation participates in the eleven-nation CSCE talks on Karabakh, convened in Rome after a five-month break.

March 1993

2 · Azeri forces continue to retreat from positions in the Mardakert district of Karabakh. NKR self-defense forces, advancing almost daily on Azeri strongholds in the area, are seeking to regain the Armenian villages in the Mardakert district which were seized by Azeri forces in a major offensive last year.

· In Rome, Nagorno-Karabakh representatives participate in the CSCE talks. The participants reach an agreement to send an Advance Group of Observers to the area.

3 · To date, NKR forces have succeeded in recapturing nearly twenty-five Armenian villages in the Mardakert district of Nagorno-Karabakh.

17 · NKR units retake the Armenian villages of Tonashen, Gyulatag, and Dzhanyatag in the Mardakert district. Azeri units renew artillery attacks against the capital, Stepanakert.

18 · CSCE-sponsored talks resume in Geneva seeking a durable ceasefire agreement. The talks also encompass a new bilateral initiative by the Turkish and Russian foreign ministries but are stalemated due to non-inclusion of NKR representatives. The Rome talks included the democratically elected NKR government in a limited but participatory role.

April 1993

1-2 · Nagorno-Karabakh defense forces drive back Azeri troop attacks on the Lochin corridor to the outskirts of Kelbajar. The Kelbajar region for months has been a staging ground and munitions stockpile for attacks against the corridor. The Azeri president introduces a two-month state of emergency, effective for all of Azerbaijan, and initiates a mass mobilization of Azeri citizenry.

3-4 · Nagorno-Karabakh self-defense forces seize the district center of Kelbajar. More than five thousand Azeris are allowed safe passage from the area. Karabakh forces also advance on the Azeri stronghold of Fizuli, just southeast of Gadrut, and fifteen miles from the Iranian border. Sporadic Azeri attacks continue against Armenian positions defending the Lochin corridor.

5-6 · Turkish Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel states that Turkey “would not abandon” Azerbaijan and compared the situation to a chess match-“we must play our men carefully to ensure that both Turkey and Azerbaijan emerge victorious.” Fighting continues in the mountain passes north of Kelbajar and around Kubatly.

· Armenian forces launch a new offensive in Nagorno-Karabakh, capturing a large part of Azerbaijan territory. The Russian 7th Army, located in Armenia, actively supports Armenians in the battle.

7 · Azeri President Elchibey formally appeals for direct Turkish military assistance. In a telephone conversation with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Elchibey appeals for Israeli diplomatic support in condemning Armenia. To date, there has been no official Israeli position on the Karabakh conflict.

8 · Armenia aligns itself with foreign countries calling for cessation of combat activities in Karabakh conflict. The government emphasizes that all parties should realize NKR authorities control the situation and organize their self-defense independently, thus any talks require their participation.

- Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev brokers a ceasefire agreement, halting military operations by noon on Friday, 9 April. Further talks between the Armenian and Azeri prime ministers are scheduled for 13 April. Turkey deploys additional combat forces along its 156-mile (250km) border with Armenia and continues daily Turkish Air Force flights through Armenian airspace. Turkey dispatches 10.5 tons of aid to Azerbaijan and issues a strong protest that the United Nations Security Council's statement on the situation in Karabakh was too weak.

- Speaking at a press conference in Switzerland, Nagorno-Karabakh parliamentarian Zori Balayan defends recent actions by Nagorno-Karabakh forces in the Lochin corridor, arguing they were necessitated by continued Azeri military attacks. Baroness Caroline Cox, deputy speaker of Britain's House of Lords, states that Karabakh's action "was prompted by Azeri attempts to cut off the Lochin humanitarian corridor."

9 · Armenian forces seize the strategically important settlement of Govshatly, cutting off three neighboring regions of Azerbaijan (Kubatly, Zangelan, Jebrail) from the rest of the republic. Armenian forces concentrate large numbers of military hardware in the region.

· Armenian Defense Minister Vazgen Manukyan argues that the latest success of the Karabakh defense forces may bring Azerbaijan to negotiations. As for Karabakh's status, he does not imagine the Republic will remain part of Azerbaijan. Its own army is the only real guarantee of Karabakh's independence. As for the principle of inviolability of borders, the minister believes that the former borders inside the Union did not arise from natural processes but were drawn arbitrarily, hence they cannot be regarded as sacred. Touching upon statements by Baku on Armenia's aggression, he says the republic is not waging war and calls the Azerbaijani side the aggressor because of the blockade and shelling of Armenian border areas.

10-11 · Fighting continues around Fizuli. Nagorno-Karabakh self-defense forces consolidate their hold over eighteen villages and strategic mountain passes in southwestern Azerbaijan bordering Iran. Azeri armored forces kill thirteen and wound eight as they seize two Armenian villages in the Gapan district. Azeri Ambassador to Iran Nasib Nasibzade formally appeals to Iran for assistance and Azeri State Secretary Panakh Husseinov arrives in Tehran for meetings. A CSCE delegation arrives in the region, meeting with leaders in Baku and Yerevan.

12 · Yeltsin and Nazarbaev agree to coordinate their activities in connection with the conflict. They will also cooperate with the CSCE Minsk group.

13 · In Baku, Turkish President Turgut Ozal calls for complete and immediate withdrawal of Armenian forces from Azerbaijan, warning “no one should doubt Turkey’s support for Azerbaijan.” In the same trip, he proposes a formal Turkish-Azeri military alliance to fully ensure Azeri control over Nagorno-Karabakh.

14 · The Turkish Foreign Ministry reports Turkey is set to ratify the Turkish-Azeri “solidarity and cooperation” accord signed last November, said to contain a mutual defense clause giving “Turkey a legal basis for helping Azerbaijan.” This follows several recent reports in the Turkish press on the transfer of rocket launchers, ammunition, and assorted light weaponry from Turkey to Azerbaijan. The presence of Lt.-Gen. Erdogan Oznal, head of the Turkish Chief of Staff’s Special Warfare Unit, in the Oznal delegation fuels further speculation on Turkish military assistance to Azerbaijan.

16 · Armenian Defense Ministry charges Turkey with sending arms and troops to Azerbaijan via Nakhichevan, warning Armenia might shoot down Turkish transport planes crossing its air space.

17 · The Organization of the Islamic Conference assures Azerbaijani President Elchibey that its member states are ready to render “moral and material” help to Azerbaijan.

19 · A two-day ceasefire begins, allowing a visiting CSCE delegation to tour Nagorno-Karabakh and the Kelbajar district. The ten-member delegation will prepare for a 600member CSCE monitoring mission. NKR parliament confirms it will cooperate with all mediation attempts and urged a new framework of bilateral negotiations to overcome the deadlock.

21 · While in Ankara for Turkish President Turgut Ozal’s funeral, the presidents of Armenia and Azerbaijan meet. An agreement pledging the parties to fully participate in the CSCE mediation effort results. In Istanbul, the Turkish Export-Import Bank reports that it will grant $250 million in aid to Azerbaijan, $50 million dollars in trade credits and the remainder to support Turkish investment in Azeri industry. The Turkish parliament formally ratifies a previously negotiated consular and military agreement with Azerbaijan.

26 · The CSCE Committee of Senior Officials, responding to an Azeri request, convene an emergency session in Vienna to examine the situation in Karabakh. The meeting, chaired by Swedish diplomat Anders Bjurner, establishes a working group consisting of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Turkey, Russia, and the United States to work toward a durable ceasefire framework. U.S. delegate to the talks John Kornblum condemns the “seizure of Kelbajar by Armenian forces” and rejects the official Armenian position denying any official involvement in support of NKR defense forces. Azeri Ambassador to the United Nations Hasan Hasanov appeals to the UN Security Council to impose “all appropriate sanctions” against Armenia.

26 · In Moscow, Russian mediators arrange secret negotiations between Azeri officials and representatives of the NKR’s State Defense Committee. Although limited and secret in nature, the talks are the first direct Azeri-Karabakh talks and, as such, are a departure from the previous Azeri position of denying any recognition of the NKR. The legitimacy of the Nagorno-Karabakh delegation is in question, however, as it has no official authorization from NKR’s parliament.

27-28 · NKR self-defense forces initiate a partial withdrawal from their positions in the recently secured Kelbajar district between Armenia and Nagorno-Karabakh.

29 · United States, Turkey, and Russia draw up a new peace plan for Nagorno-Karabakh intended to restart the stalled CSCE-sponsored negotiations.

30 · UN Security Council unanimously passes resolution calling for immediate halting of hostilities and demands full withdrawal of “all occupying forces,” including “local Armenian forces,” from the Kelbajar district between Armenia and Nagorno-Karabakh.

May 1993

4 · In a press interview, Azeri presidential advisor Vafa Guluzade characterizes the UN resolution as a great victory for Azeri diplomacy. He hails the fact that for the first time, Armenia is finally recognized as an occupational force and should it refuse to withdraw from the captured regions of Azerbaijan, it is sure to do so under pressure from the United Nations.

7-15 · A series of gunfire exchanges take place, concentrated mostly around Nakhichevan and in the NKR rayons of Agderinskiy, Fizulininskiy, and Kubatlinakiy. Armenia says Azerbaijan initiated the fighting in seeking to safeguard its positions while Azeri officials declare Armenia wants to expand the zone of combat to better position itself for bargaining in negotiations.

June 1993

2 · Armenia and Azerbaijan agree to a mediatory initiative of Russia, United States, and Turkey.

7 · A newly revised CSCE plan on Karabakh is submitted to the Armenian, Azerbaijani, and Nagorno-Karabakh governments. The plan, based on UN Resolution 822, calls for an immediate ceasefire, a phased withdrawal of military forces from Kelbajar, and eventual lifting of the Azeri blockade.

10 · The Armenian and Azeri foreign ministries announce their acceptance of a CSCE-sponsored peace plan. The CSCE initiative is based on the 30 April UN Security Council resolution calling for a ceasefire, a withdrawal of forces, and the deployment of CSCE observers.

15 · Azerbaijan National Assembly elects Geydar Aliev as chairman of the country's Supreme Soviet (suspended since May 1992 after the Azerbaijani Popular Front came to power). Yeltsin approves, characterizing Aliev as "an experienced and authoritative politician" who would help improve Russia-Azerbaijani relations.

16 · Armenian forces in Nagorno-Karabakh take advantage of political chaos and unrest in Azerbaijan resulting from political infighting and launch a new attack.

22 · Newly installed acting parliamentary Chairman of NKR Karen Baburyan meets with the Armenian president and vice-president to review the situation and the recently endorsed CSCE plan. Speaking at a press conference, Baburyan states that Karabakh is following the foreign policy course set by its December 1991 national referendum, whereby the Karabakh population voted overwhelmingly to seek independence.

25-27 · Karabakh self-defense forces regain control of the regional center of Mardakert, seized by Azeri forces in a major offensive last year. Azeri artillery units respond by launching rocket attacks on Stepanakert.

30 · Azerbaijan National Assembly votes to appoint rebel Colonel Surat Husseinov as prime minister. Parliament Chairman Aliev says one of his principle tasks would be “to recapture Azerbaijan’s lands,” thus calling into question Azerbaijan’s commitment to the latest CSCE Karabakh peace plan.

· Advancing on Azeri positions around their stronghold of Agdam, Karabakh forces liberate all but a four-mile strip of land along Karabakh’s eastern border. The advance solidifies control over the strategic district seized by Azeri forces in last year’s offensive.

2 · The Armenian Communist Party Central Committee calls on the Armenian government to extend official diplomatic recognition to the Nagorno-Karabakh Republic and for the simultaneous signing of a bilateral treaty on friendship, cooperation, and mutual security with that republic.

5 · Kocharyan states his forces have no intention of occupying the Azeri stronghold of Agdam. Nagorno-Karabakh forces down an Azeri combat aircraft on a bombing raid of the Lochin humanitarian corridor connecting Nagorno- Karabakh to Armenia. The pilot is a Ukrainian mercenary. CSCE Special Envoy to Nagorno-Karabakh Mario Rafaeli postpones his scheduled tour of the region due to the escalation of fighting.

· Azeri Prime Minister Surat Husseinov arrives in Agdam with reinforcements consisting of over 2,500 infantry forces and several armored vehicles and tanks.

10 · CSCE envoy to Karabakh Mario Rafaeli arrives in Baku to advance the CSCE negotiated settlement. In a sign of growing internal discord, over five thousand people demonstrate in Baku in support of ousted President Elchibey. A strike of over fifty municipal government officials is also staged. The first direct flight from Baku to Tabriz (Iran) is inaugurated.

14-15 · Azeri artillery units violate an informal ceasefire arranged for a visit by CSCE envoy to Nagorno-Karabakh. The barrage includes attacks with S-200 surface-to-air longrange missiles.

23 · Karabakh forces backed by tanks take the strategic town of Agdam, advancing to within one kilometer of Fizuli.

24 · Aliiev calls on the United Nations to “restrain” Armenian aggression, arguing that “any references by the Armenian side to the fact that the armed forces fighting in Nagorno-Karabakh are not subordinate to the republic of Armenia are without foundation.”

· In a significant development, officials from the Republic of Nagorno-Karabakh and Azerbaijan speak by telephone and announce a three-day ceasefire effective at midnight. The discussion is the first high-level recognition of the NKR government by Azeri officials.

25 · The Turkish Foreign Ministry issues a statement that it will bring pressure to bear on the United Nations and other international bodies to secure a complete withdrawal of Armenian forces from all occupied Azerbaijani territory.

28 · Based on the successful discussions of 24 July, a meeting between Azeri and NKR officials is held along the border of the Mardakert region of NKR. The three-day ceasefire agreement is extended for another five to seven days and an agreement is reached to pursue further high-level talks between Nagorno-Karabakh Foreign Minister Gukasyan and Azeri Defense Ministry officials.

August 1993

3 · Azeri artillery units launch several attacks against population centers in Armenia's Noemberyan district and in the Askeran, Gadрут, and Martuni districts of the NKR. Kocharyan arrives in Yerevan for an official two-day visit and is scheduled to meet with officials of the Armenian government.

5 · Talks between Azeri Defense Ministry officials and NKR representatives lead to another extension of the current ceasefire agreement. Sporadic artillery attacks by Azeri forces, however, continue to threaten the durability of the ceasefire agreement.

11 · In an official statement by the government of the Republic of Nagorno-Karabakh, Stepanakert leaders call for the United Nations and the CSCE to dispatch independent observers and peacekeeping detachments to Karabakh in an effort to guarantee the safety of the population of the Republic. The statement further calls for direct bilateral talks with Azerbaijan as the proper avenue for initiating a durable mediation process.

18 · Attacks by Azeri combat aircraft over Armenian's Gapan district leave seven residents dead and thirty-four wounded. Further aircraft attacks are reported in Nagorno- Karabakh, with Azeri bombers dropping cluster bombs on Armenian villages in the Martuni district. Azeri shelling also intensifies in Armenia's Megri, Gapan, and Goris districts.

· Responding to the Turkish and Azeri requests for an urgent meeting of the UN Security Council, the Security Council issues a statement calling for an immediate, complete, and unconditional withdrawal of Nagorno-Karabakh forces from the recently seized areas of Azerbaijan. The UN Security Council further urges Armenia to “use its unique influence to this end.”

19 · Nagorno-Karabakh forces continue their advance on Azeri military positions, seizing the southern Azeri stronghold of Dzhebrail, 14 km from the Azeri-Iranian border. UN observers report the advance forced 30,000-50,000 Azeris to flee eastward into Azerbaijan and south toward Iran. Following a meeting in Moscow with his Armenian counterpart, Turkish Foreign Minister Hikmet Cetin threatens to push for UN sanctions against Armenia if Nagorno- Karabakh forces fail to withdraw from the recently seized areas of southwestern Azerbaijan.

· Republic of Nagorno-Karabakh and Azerbaijani officials agree to a new five-day ceasefire. The two sides also agree to hold a summit to discuss a long-term ceasefire as well as continue their peace talks.

21 · Russian special envoy on Nagorno-Karabakh Vladimir Kazimirov issues a statement criticizing the current CSCE Karabakh negotiation framework, labeling the plan ineffective and inadequate, and claiming that the CSCE lacks experience in large-scale peacekeeping operations.

24 · Tens of thousands of civilians continue to flee toward Iran to escape the ongoing fighting in the region of Dzhebrail.

26 · Negotiations between Azerbaijan Deputy Parliament Chairman Afiaddin Dzhalilov and Nagorno-Karabakh Foreign Ministry fail to arrive at a ceasefire agreement.

· Kazimirov travels to Nagorno-Karabakh at the suggestion of Aliev. After touring southwestern Azerbaijan, Kazimirov meets with officials in Stepanakert to discuss possibilities of resolving the conflict. On 27 August, he flies to Yerevan to meet with Armenian President Ter-Petrosyan and returns to Baku the following day.

September 1993

6 · Aliev and Yeltsin hold talks in Moscow on Nagorno-Karabakh situation, discussing basic principles for settling the conflict. Aliev also states that he gained permission from his parliament to explore the idea of joining the CIS. Grachev says Aliev requested that he use “the authority of the Russian Army, the Defense Ministry, and personal relations with the Armenian leadership” in solving the conflict.

9 · In a formal letter of protest, Armenia accuses Ukraine of supplying arms to Azerbaijan and asks for an explanation from Kiev. The note stresses that this action “runs counter to the efforts undertaken by the international community to resolve the Karabakh confrontation peacefully and violates Article 10 of UN Security Council Resolution 853.” Officials in Kiev deny the charge, saying Ukraine only assists Azerbaijan in equipment restoration.

15 · Ter-Petrosyan and Yeltsin meet in Moscow to review the regional ramifications of the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict and to discuss Armenian-Russian economic and trade relations. Sporadic artillery attacks by Azeri forces are reported in Armenia’s Noemberyan, Idzhevan, and Tavush districts along the border with Azerbaijan.

17 · A five-nation Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) interparliamentary delegation, empowered to mediate the Karabakh conflict, arrives in Yerevan to begin a tour of the region. The mediation group consists of parliamentarians from Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, and Tajikistan and was formally constituted under the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly. After meeting in Yerevan, they will fly to Baku to continue their peacemaking mission.

20 · After several postponements, the Azerbaijani National Assembly votes 31 to 13 for the renewal of Azerbaijan's membership of the CIS.

23 · Direct bilateral talks between Karabakh and Azerbaijan officials continues with a meeting in the Askeran border district. The two sides review economic needs of Karabakh and the bordering districts of Azerbaijan as well as lifting economic and transport blockades of Karabakh by Azeri forces. The current ceasefire agreement is scheduled to hold until 5 October.

25 · In Moscow for the CIS summit, Armenian President Ter-Petrosyan and Aliev hold a meeting to discuss the situation in Karabakh and the continuing blockade. The meeting, arranged by the Russian Foreign Ministry, is coordinated by Kazimirov.

October 1993

1 · The ceasefire agreement in effect since July between Karabakh and Azerbaijan is extended for another month following a meeting in Moscow between Aliev and Kocharyan.

2 · According to a report in a Moscow newspaper, Azerbaijan's agreement to become a member of the CIS will not have a significant impact on the Karabakh conflict. The article states that, "since Armenia conducts no military actions in Karabakh, the military situation there will, as it did before, depend on further progress in the direct talks opened between Stepanakert and Baku rather than on directives from Yerevan."

11 · Azeri officials announce their rejection of the latest CSCE-proposed timetable for the settlement of the Karabakh conflict. Their main reason for objecting to this schedule is the exclusion of the Lochin humanitarian corridor from the agreement. The deadline for responding to the schedule is extended beyond the previous 7 October date. Both Armenia and Nagorno-Karabakh had previously accepted the CSCE settlement by the original deadline.

12 · Addressing the UN General Assembly, Aliiev states that complete and unconditional withdrawal of Armenian forces from all occupied territory in Azerbaijan is an essential precondition for convening the CSCE Minsk conference on a settlement of the conflict.

14 · UN Security Council unanimously adopt Resolution 874, supporting the continuation of peaceful negotiations by the Minsk Group within the framework of the CSCE. According to a spokesperson for the Armenian Foreign Ministry, Armenia finds the resolution “acceptable,” but is concerned by certain references within the language of the text, specifically that Karabakh is mentioned as part of Azerbaijan, and references to preserving Azerbaijan’s territorial integrity.

18 · In response to a CSCE deadline for a formal reply to its proposed mediation timetable proposal, Azerbaijan rejects the CSCE plan. Armenia and Nagorno-Karabakh previously ratified the plan before the original 7 October deadline.

· Baburyan issues a statement to Boutros-Ghali expressing approval of Resolution 874. The message applauds UN support for direct negotiations between Karabakh and Azerbaijan as initiated by Russia, but expresses dismay over the specific language found in the text, including the use of the definition “Mountainous Karabakh district of Azerbaijan Republic.” 20 · Azerbaijan condemns UN Resolution 874, passed on 14 October, as “unacceptable,” offering no explanation.

23 · The ceasefire agreement in Karabakh is broken by Azerbaijani attacks against the southern Karabakh district of Gadрут and by fighting around Horadiz, Zangelan, and Kubatly. Kocharyan states Karabakh authorities had contacted Azeri and Russian officials demanding observance of the ceasefire agreement following Azerbaijan’s seizure of five defensive positions between Fizuli and Dzhebrail. Officials in Baku claim they have no control over various formations in southwestern Azerbaijan.

25 · Kozyrev blames Karabakh Armenians for recent ceasefire violations, urging them to cease their offensive and withdraw their forces.

26 · Russian negotiator Kazimirov, accompanying the CSCE delegation to Baku, seeks to counter local disillusionment with the CSCE mediation effort and warns both sides against attempting to scare each other with predictions of an internationalization of the conflict.

28 · A ceasefire is reestablished due in part to the mediation efforts of Iranian President Ali Akbar Rafsanjani. The Iranian Foreign Ministry previously stated its desire to avoid the conflict, but with Rafsanjani in Baku it once again sought the role of mediator. The negotiated truce is scheduled to commence at 7:00 P.M. local time.

2 · Western sources report that Azerbaijan enlisted a force of Afghan special forces, or mujahidin, to bolster its army.

5 · Karabakh Foreign Minister Arkadiy Gukasyan issues a statement on conditions for a true peace process listing three concerns: the political status of Karabakh, lifting the Azeri-imposed blockade of Armenia, and withdrawing Karabakh forces from Azerbaijan. Gukasyan further states that negotiations between Azeri and Karabakh officials remains the main instrument for peace, citing the bilateral talks as the only means to date of having brokered effective ceasefire agreements.

10 · President Yeltsin sends envoy Kazimirov to Stepanakert, Baku, and Yerevan to negotiate an end to the hostilities between Armenia and Azerbaijan. The Foreign Ministry also calls for the withdrawal of all Karabakh forces to their positions held before the violation of the 21 October ceasefire.

22 · Armenia accepts the latest version of the CSCE devised timetable for the Karabakh conflict. Azerbaijan rejects the terms of the mediation plan.

29 · Armed formations deployed in Azerbaijan's Beylagan region attack Armenian positions in Fizulinskiy rayon. NKR armed forces repel the attack and inflict a strong counterstrike. Despite relative calm in the conflict zone, the Azerbaijani side continues aggravating the situation daily, provoking in planned manner the Karabakh army to take countermeasures.

December 1993

1 · Rakhman Mustafa-Zadeh of the Azerbaijan president's press service says that the non-constructive posture of Armenia is the largest obstacle to the CSCE peace process. He makes it clear that Moscow can and must play a more active part in resolving the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict. He says that Baku recognizes Russia as a great power having special interests in the Transcaucasian region.

3 · Kocharyan states the NKR leadership agreed to the CSCE peace plan, hoping that Azerbaijan would reply in kind. He says Azerbaijan rejects not only the schedule endorsed by the United Nations and the CSCE, but also the very idea of the Minsk conference, the aim of which is the peaceful settlement of the Karabakh conflict. Despite the UN provision prohibiting arms supplies to the conflicting sides, Azerbaijan is purchasing tanks, military aircraft, and mercenaries.

14 · As Azeri attacks intensify against Karabakh forces in the Beylagan district, northeast of Fizuli, sporadic artillery attacks are launched against Armenian population centers in the Idzhevan and Kazakh districts of Armenia. Later Azeri artillery attacks are initiated from positions within Nakhichevan.

16 · Russian officials broker a ten-day ceasefire between Karabakh and Azeri forces. The ceasefire, following days of intense clashes in the district of Beylagan, allows for retrieving the dead and wounded. Violations occur the next day, however, when Azeri troops attack the Martuni region of Nagorno-Karabakh.

28 · Karabakh forces are forced to retreat from mountain positions surrounding Agdam, following fierce fighting that resulted in heavy casualties on both sides. The battle is attributed to the presence of Afghan mujahidin and Azeri orders to shoot deserters fleeing from the front line. Fighting is also continuing in Mardakert rayon.

30 · As the Azeri offensive continues, attacks erupt in Karabakh's Askeran, Martuni, and Mardakert districts. Azeri artillery attacks are further initiated against population centers in Armenia's districts of Idzhevan, Tavush, and Kazakh.

1994

4 · A relatively successful ceasefire along the Azerbaijani- Armenian border for the past several weeks is upset when Azeri artillery units launch attacks against the villages of Movses and Aygepar in the Tavush district.

12 · Nagorno-Karabakh military sources report a large buildup of Azerbaijani military forces along the southeastern Karabakh borders. Additional concentrations of Azerbaijani military units are reported in the northern district of Shahumyan and along the vulnerable district of Mardakert, a longtime target of Azeri artillery and armored attacks.

· The CSCE's working group on the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict, the "Minsk Group," convenes in Vienna without official representation from parties to the conflict. They review the increasingly tense situation in and prepare for a tour of the area by CSCE Minsk Group Chairman Anders Bjurner later in the month.

18 · In meeting with advisors, Aliiev reveals that the largescale military buildup of Azeri forces along its borders with Nagorno-Karabakh is aimed at exploiting the internal discord erupting in Armenia. Aliiev reportedly plans a military offensive to regain the political initiative from his opposition within Azerbaijan.

31 · Aliev rejects the latest Russian peace plan for Nagorno-Karabakh one day after Armenia accepted the plan, which provides for Russian troops to enforce a two- to three-week ceasefire starting 1 February. Aliev tells Kazimirov, plan architect, that he would not talk about a ceasefire while “the aggressor continues to occupy Azerbaijani territory.” Speculation is that Aliev is hesitant to halt hostilities while Azerbaijan is slowly regaining lost territory.

February 1994

2 · Newly released population statistics indicate the Karabakh population is steadily returning to its preconflict level. Chairman of the Karabakh Commission on Refugees and Humanitarian Aid Lenston Ghouljian reports that nearly 25,000 refugees returned to their homes in Nagorno- Karabakh for 1994. The birthrate also increased as housing is being reconstructed, living conditions improving, and the economic situation somewhat stabilizing.

2-9 · Continuing their massive offensive launched in mid- December, Azeri forces maintain coordinated attacks against the Mardakert and Martuni districts of Karabakh as well as the strategic Kelbajar district between Armenia and Karabakh. With the continued aid and training from Turkish military units, the Azeri army is increasingly mounting impressive tactical gains against Armenian positions defending Karabakh. The significant role of a detachment of 1,000 Afghan mujahidin greatly bolsters the Azeri military capabilities.

10 · A survey of Karabakh citizens reveals that 55.2 percent still favor independence for Karabakh. Some respondents opted for Karabakh's reunification with Armenia and some suggested Karabakh's entry into the Russian Federation.

18 · Organized by the Russian Foreign Ministry, defense ministers of Armenia and Azerbaijan meet in Moscow to negotiate a durable ceasefire agreement. Talks center on the Russian proposal for an immediate ceasefire, redeploying of all armed formations from the conflict zone, returning foreign mercenaries, and the eventual monitoring of the agreement by Russian forces.

· Karabakh forces repel Azeri attacks on the Armenian villages of Tonashen and Mataghis in the northeastern part of the Mardakert district in Karabakh. The Azeri offensive continues their advance against the Kelbajar district between Armenia and Karabakh. Heavy fighting is reported at the strategic Omar Pass, a vital mountain pass linking Kelbajar with Khanlar, which returns to full Armenian control following the complete consolidation of its mountainous heights.

March 1994

3 · A large-scale Azeri offensive is launched against Karabakh's southeastern border. The attacks, coinciding with the scheduled arrival of a CSCE delegation to the Karabakh capital Stepanakert, allow the Azeri troops to advance partially around the town of Fizuli. Artillery bombardments target Armenian population centers in other districts of Karabakh.

4 · A Moscow newspaper reports that the government of Azerbaijan has officially rejected the latest Russian-proposed peace plan. The plan would have called for the creation of a demilitarized zone between the front lines of the warring parties and for the introduction of military observers and international peacekeeping forces. The plan called for a simultaneous retreat of Armenian and Azerbaijani troops to establish this zone. Baku refused to pull back its troops, citing the occupation of Azeri territory by Karabakh troops.

9 · An unattributed radio commentary broadcast on Radio Baku International Service editorialized that Russia is eager to establish a military base in Azerbaijan and to have a hand in the resolution of the Karabakh conflict. Aliiev, however, opposes the idea and demands Moscow to comply with international agreements and laws prohibiting Moscow to act as an internationally sanctioned peacekeeper in the former Soviet Union.

15 · Kocharyan declares before the Ministers' Council that "The Republic of Mountainous Karabakh is still supporting immediate cessation of the bloodshed and peaceful negotiations on regulation of the Karabakh conflict. Based on this, the Karabakh side supported the recent peacemaking efforts of the CSCE and Russia, though not all of the topics were acceptable to the RMK." Kocharyan stresses a durable ceasefire can only be attained with international observers and peacekeeping forces.

· Baburyan condemns all peace initiatives to the conflict, stressing that only representatives of the democratically elected government of Karabakh are empowered to conduct negotiations. The statement clarifies Karabakh's hesitation over the Armenian-

Azeri meeting recently held between the parliamentary chairmen of the two countries.

17 · Kocharyan briefs Armenian officials in Yerevan on the latest Azeri attacks in Karabakh. Meanwhile, over Karabakh, an Iranian C- 130 “Hercules” military-transport plane crashes in mountainous terrain north of Stepanakert, killing all aboard. An Iranian delegation is immediately dispatched to investigate the circumstances of the crash. While Azeri officials charge that the plane, although seriously off course, may have been shot down by Karabakh forces, a number of contradictory reports emerge.

18 · Following a tour of Karabakh, Russian parliamentarian and leader of the Russian National-Republican Party Nikolay Lysenko urges Russia to recognize the independence of Karabakh and cites the common geopolitical interests of Armenia, Russia, and Karabakh.

25 · Talks in Moscow between representatives of Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Karabakh, under the auspices of the Russian Foreign Ministry, conclude with a review of a Russian draft ceasefire proposal. The Russian plan, based on the 18 February ceasefire agreement between the parties, is to be further revised and then submitted to each of the three parties' governments for ratification. The CSCE is also actively involved in this Russian mediation effort.

26 · Azeri forces escalate their attacks against Armenian villages around the southern town of Fizuli. Azeri artillery units initiate bombardments of the Armenian-held eastern town of Agdam, followed by Azeri air assaults on the area.

31 · A CIS interparliamentary delegation begins meetings with Azeri, Armenian, and Karabakh government officials. Previous CIS efforts have included a ceasefire agreement last September, which although violated by Azerbaijan, effectively established a durable peace for several weeks.

1 · The Republic of Nagorno-Karabakh and Azerbaijan State Commissions on Hostages and Prisoners of War organize and initiate an exchange of prisoners. Six Azeris are freed in exchange for one Armenian prisoner.

1-3 · A delegation of the Interparliamentary Assembly of the CIS begins touring the region in “search of a mechanism” to mediate the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict. The CIS delegation is to meet with various officials in Stepanakert, Yerevan, and Baku during their tour.

11 · A four-day meeting of the CSCE working group on Nagorno-Karabakh, chaired by negotiator Jan Eliasson, convenes in Prague. The meeting, with a Karabakh delegation participating, produces a twenty-three-point “confidencestrengthening” document of humanitarian measures including a call for the free passage of humanitarian aid to Armenia through neighboring Turkey.

· An Azeri attack against the village of Tonashen in the northern part of Karabakh’s Mardakert district results in several casualties. The Karabakh forces advance in their counterattack, retaking the village of Talysh in the Mardakert district and securing the village of Gulistan in the northern Shahumyan district.

19 · Armenian Parliamentary Chairman Babken Ararktsyan arrives in Stepanakert to meet with Nagorno-Karabakh officials. They review the latest Russian peace proposal and coordinate next month’s CIS interparliamentary meeting of Armenian and Azeri delegates.

23 · In a speech to the CIS heads of state, Aliiev urges CIS states to condemn Armenian aggression against Azerbaijan, and apply sanctions if it does not end. At the meeting CIS heads of state issue a statement asking the international community, including the CSCE and the United Nations, to support actions taken by the CIS to end the conflict.

25 · Meeting in Moscow to discuss the Russian mediation effort for Nagorno-Karabakh, Azeri Parliamentary Chairman Rasul Guliev and Kozyrev announce an agreement of “unspecified modifications” to the latest Russian peace plan. Kazimirov criticizes the Azeri position for its refusal to recognize Nagorno-Karabakh as an equal party in the peace plan. A further round of meetings between the Russian defense minister and the Azeri delegation seeks to reach some consensus on a preliminary agreement.

26 · Despite diplomatic progress, Azeri armored forces attack the southern Karabakh district of Martuni and nearby Fizuli and the northeastern Mardakert district. Karabakh self-defense forces hold their positions.

28 · Responding to the latest proposal of the Russian peace initiative, NKR authorities accept the plan, based on the 18 February accord reached among the defense ministers of Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Nagorno-Karabakh under Russian coordination. Karabakh’s acceptance follows yesterday’s announcement of Azerbaijani assent to the plan. According to the terms of the Russian proposal, a ceasefire is to enter into force on 29 April, followed by a staged withdrawal of armed combatants 20 km from the region, and the eventual creation of a “buffer zone” between the sides, to be enforced by a contingent of CIS peacekeepers. The next stage of the plan mandates a lifting of Azerbaijan’s blockade of Armenia and Karabakh and calls for the return of refugees to their homes. Negotiations over Karabakh's future political status is to take place during this third stage. This delay in addressing Karabakh's political standing, however, is a fundamental obstacle to achieving a durable resolution to the Karabakh problem, according to NKR representatives.

1 · Shelling and sporadic attacks by Azeri artillery units over the border in Nakhichevan follow a previous incident in late May which broke the relative calm along the Armenia-Nakhichevan border. Armenian border guards retaliate and destroy the newly formed Azeri base immediately across the border from the village of Gyounoupi.

7 · Grachev's ceasefire plan, entailing a predominantly Russian peacekeeping and monitoring force, is amended. According to reports, Russian troops will now constitute only about one-third of the CIS force. The troops will remain in Azerbaijan no longer than six months. Meanwhile, Britain offers to send a detachment of troops under CSCE auspices to monitor a ceasefire in Nagorno-Karabakh.

· Kazimirov completes a tour of Baku, Stepanakert, and Yerevan, where he negotiates with all three sides a peaceful settlement to the six-year war. Kazimirov blames the lack of progress on the inability of the parties to compromise and urges all sides to dispense with "maximalistic aspirations." As regards peacekeeping troops, Kazimirov states that the forces would be "observers with corresponding control and security bodies" and they "would not have disengagement functions."

8 · Guliev signs the Bishkek protocol at the IPA session, which formalizes the ceasefire and disengagement of forces. Azerbaijan originally refused to sign the Bishkek protocol in early May, but has abided by its conditions.

10 · Aliiev acknowledges that peacekeeping forces are necessary to achieve a lasting peace settlement of the Nagorno- Karabakh conflict. He insists, however, that all troops introduced as peacekeepers operate under the CSCE mandate.

14 · A meeting is held along the Armenia-Nakhichevan border in an attempt to resolve the recent border skirmishes and reach a peace agreement. Armenia proposes establishing a trade center along the border. The Azeri side refuses, arguing it is not possible while the two sides are at war.

18 · With meetings between the CSCE negotiator, Jan Eliasson, and Armenian officials under way in Yerevan, Azeri forces launch an artillery attack against Armenia's Noemberyan border district, violating the 15 May ceasefire agreement between the two countries. The Azeri forces follow with an attack against an Armenian border post near the village of Barekamavan, killing six border guards, injuring one, and kidnapping another.

24 · Six years of war, blockade, and economic collapse force many Armenians to seek relief. Russia's Ambassador to Armenia Vladimir Stupishin reports about 20 percent of Armenia's 3 million people have left the country in the last two years. Some 10,000 Armenians have registered with the Russian embassy signaling their desire to obtain Russian citizenship and emigrate to the Russian Federation.

25 · An Armenian-Greek center opens in Nagorno-Karabakh to unite and help the Greek residents of Karabakh. The center was founded by a Greek inhabitant of the Mardakert village of Mehmania, where Greeks have been living since the nineteenth century.

· Kazimirov holds talks with a senior Iranian official regarding Russia's peacekeeping initiative in the contested territory. The Iranian side reportedly approves Russia's plan as "close to the requirements of reality." Kazimirov also meets with Azerbaijani President Aliev in Baku. Aliev reaffirms his desire that the conflict be solved on a multilateral basis, combining the efforts of the CSCE, Russia, Iran, and Turkey.

28 · Kazimirov announces that the basis for the political settlement of the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict is practically ready, pending agreement on complicated wording necessary to assuage the conflicting parties. He reaffirms that the 12 May ceasefire in the conflict zone is holding.

3 · Azeri forces initiate an attack against the Armenian border village of Dara in the Vardenis district. The eighthour attack is eventually repulsed by Armenian border guards.

5 · Azeri artillery units resume with sporadic shelling against the Seisoulan and Talish villages in Karabakh's Mardakert district. Artillery attacks then target the villages of Shourabad and Shotlani in the Agdam district. The attacks violate the standing ceasefire agreement between both sides.

7 · Chief-of-staff of Turkey's armed forces Dogan Gures travels to Baku for talks with Aliev. Gures reaffirms his country's willingness to participate in a multinational peacekeeping force in Nagorno-Karabakh under the auspices of the United Nations or CSCE and denies Armenian press reports that Turkey is supplying arms to Azerbaijan.

8 · In response to Gures's offer, Russian Defense Minister Grachev says that Russia would oppose any unilateral move undertaken by Turkey in the Transcaucasus-a region of vital interest to Russia. A Russian Foreign Ministry official says that the deployment of Turkish peacekeepers would unnerve Armenia and thus serve to exacerbate tensions. Armenian President Ter-Petrosyan concurs, stating that only Russian peacekeeping troops could ensure stability in Karabakh. Turkey's ambassador to Azerbaijan, however, says that Baku retains the prerogative to decide which country to invite to send peacekeepers.

9 · NKR officially rejects Turkish troops from participating in the peacekeeping contingent since Turkey is not a neutral player in the conflict. Evidence of Turkey's active participation includes its blockade of Armenia, supply of weaponry and military training to Azerbaijan, and the existence of Turkish prisoners of war.

12 · Guliev says an understanding was reached on a potential settlement of the Karabakh conflict and a peace agreement could be signed by the end of July. The announcement came following a CSCE parliamentary session in Vienna where Guliev met with U.S. and Russian representatives and with the chairman of the CSCE Minsk Group.

15 · Ter-Petrosyan press secretary Levon Zurabyan says Karabakh Armenians offered to withdraw troops from all occupied lands, except the Lochin corridor in exchange for security guarantees for its population. Zurabyan also says that Armenia will reject Turkish participation in any peacekeeping or observation force as long as it remains a "party to the conflict by blockading Armenia."

19 · Kazimirov will visit Baku, Yerevan, and Stepanakert to consult on draft agreements for settling the conflict. Russia has prepared a fundamental draft agreement containing sixteen articles, a diversified set of addenda, and a time frame for troop withdrawal. According to Kazimirov, there is no alternative to the Russian draft, and attempts to create one (i.e., the CSCE Minsk Group) serve only to impede a resolution to the conflict.

26 · In Baku, Kazimirov states the latest Russian peace plan offers a more realistic settlement. He says the sixteen-point Russian plan, unlike the CSCE proposal, envisages establishing a secure demilitarized buffer zone and deployment of international observers and CIS peacekeeping forces to monitor a durable ceasefire.

27 · In a news conference, Vann Ovaysyan, member of the bureau of the opposition union of the Armenian Revolutionary Federation, commented positively on the creation of Russian military bases in Armenia. He rejects the possibility of Armenia's becoming a part of the USSR (in the event of its restoration) or any other such empire.

- Aliev staff member says Azerbaijan supports Russia's deployment of peacekeeping forces in Nagorno-Karabakh on the condition that Armenian forces withdraw from Lochin and Shusha and that a political settlement on the status of Nagorno-Karabakh is reached. The staff member envisioned a force of 3,000-6,000 troops, of which between 60 and 90 percent would be Russians, operating under a CSCE mandate.

- Defense ministers of Armenia and Azerbaijan and NKR military commander sign agreement legalizing the ceasefire accord reached in May. The three sides also pledge to work toward an agreement on the deployment of peacekeepers. In Nagorno-Karabakh officials reacted with lukewarm enthusiasm to the agreement, acknowledging that the document "creates effective preconditions for stopping the armed conflict,” but warning of the difficulty of maintaining peace without the presence of an international disengagement force.

August 1994

1 · Kazimirov attributes the relative success of the ceasefire to the realization by all parties of the rising human and economic costs of conducting war. He warns of certain forces in Armenia and Azerbaijan seeking to exploit the conflict for their own political gain, alluding to the power struggles being waged in Armenia and Azerbaijan. He also expresses his disgust for those “criminal Mafia structures who are getting fat on this war, making money from the sale of fuel, oil, and guns.”

3 · Azerbaijan receives deliveries of ammunition, including artillery shells and anti-tank mines, from Turkey. In addition, a new group of Turkish military instructors arrives in Azerbaijan to train recent Azeri recruits.

4 · Russia and Armenia are close to agreement on permanent Russian military bases in Armenia. A Russian Defense Ministry spokesman proclaims “it will be first Russian base on the territory of another state.” Russia’s 127th Motorized Infantry Division is currently stationed in Armenia. This group is expected to be supplemented with air combat forces, anti-aircraft defenses, and radar stations.

6 · A month-long Human Rights Watch mission to Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Nagorno-Karabakh found that regular military units subordinate to the government of Armenia played a significant role in the Karabakh Armenians’ offensive launched last spring.

According to HRW, the units in question often served to secure communication lines, thus freeing up Karabakh Armenian forces to continue the offensive.

- In a press interview, Hasan Hasanov highlights many obstacles to settling the conflict. The first is that many countries are unwilling to recognize Armenia as the aggressor. Armenia's true goals are the second obstacle. For example, Armenia has no intention of liberating all the territory occupied outside of Nagorno-Karabakh. It is refusing to liberate the Lochinskiy and Kelbadzharskiy districts. Armenia is unwilling to give back Shushinskiy district, which, although on the territory of Nagorno-Karabakh, was populated in the vast majority by Azeris.

9 · The major task of Russian foreign policy in the CIS countries-to form a common defense space-has met with stubborn Azerbaijani resistance as Azerbaijan is the only member of the CIS that does not have Russian soldiers on its territory. However, Russia will not leave Azerbaijan as easily as it did the Baltics. Since Aliiev will not sign the Russian peace plan for Karabakh, the ascension to power of people loyal to Moscow cannot be ruled out. Neither can the “Georgian version” be excluded, under which Russian troops would be greeted in Baku as saviors.

13 · Negotiations on a formal settlement end without significant progress made. Azerbaijan reportedly retracts an earlier pledge to recognize the Nagorno-Karabakh Republic as a party to the conflict. The Baku delegation continues to link negotiations on the future political status of Nagorno- Karabakh to the withdrawal of Armenian troops from Azerbaijan. Karabakh Armenians refuse to retreat from the strategic town of Lochin.

16 · Surat Husseinov says Azerbaijan will discuss political settlement for Nagorno-Karabakh if Armenia guarantees the safe return of the 200,000 Azerbaijani refugees to their native lands, currently occupied by Karabakh Armenians. He also called on the Armenian forces to vacate Shusha and Lochin. If these conditions are not met, “Azerbaijan will be ready to recover its own territory.”

20 · Negotiations between Russian and Azeri Defense Ministry officials end without an agreement on border security and the placement of frontier troops. Russia seeks to secure a joint presence of troops to enforce Azerbaijan’s increasingly vulnerable borders.

24 · Husseinov says in interview that the ceasefire will not last forever and that Azerbaijan should use this time to strengthen its army and improve military preparedness. He continues that Azerbaijan must first liberate its seized territory in order to achieve peace and that any concessions by Azerbaijan over the status of Nagorno-Karabakh would be “an extremely dangerous step.”

30 · Armenia and Karabakh will unite their monetary systems and the Armenian dram will be the sole legal tender in Nagorno-Karabakh. When asked if the agreement would provoke any negative political repercussions, the chairman of the Armenian Central Bank replied that it would not likely “affect politics.” However, an Azerbaijan foreign policy advisor denounced the agreement as “another provocation aimed at thwarting a peace settlement.”

September 1994

6 · Azeri units based in Nakhichevan launch artillery attacks against Armenian positions across the border. The shelling targets Armenian defensive positions in the area of Yeraskhavan and precedes another Azeri attack from within Azerbaijan against the village of Vahan in the Krasnoselsk district. The previous night, the Tavush district along the Armenian-Azerbaijani border was shelled by Azeri units.

8 · Armenia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs issues statement condemning the bombing of civilian targets in Armenia and places all responsibility on the Azerbaijani government. The ministry also links the bombing to Azerbaijan's recent hard-line stance on Nagorno-Karabakh negotiations.

9 · Regional government officials announce the return of 250 refugee families to their homes in Mardakert district villages. NKR government is providing these families with free transportation to the area, as well as food provisions for an initial period of their return.

12 · A meeting of the eleven-nation CSCE Minsk Group on Karabakh convenes in Vienna to review the situation and prepare for a larger summit in Prague. The CSCE criticizes the latest Russian mediation effort for failing to include a prominent role for the CSCE and accuses Russia of adopting a dangerous unilateral approach. The Russian delegation responds by boycotting the remainder of the session.

13 · Azeri artillery attacks are launched against the villages of Levonarkh and Shourabad in the Mardakert and Agdam districts. Units of the Turkish paramilitary "Grey Wolves," deployed in the region as part of Turkey's military aid to Azerbaijan, advance to Nagorno-Karabakh's eastern border.

14 · The CSCE's Committee of Senior Officials convenes in Prague to discuss the situation in Nagorno-Karabakh, criticizing the Russian mediation plan for contradicting the CSCE's own peace initiative. The Turkish delegation also criticizes the Russian plan and calls for the deployment of its own troops as part of an international peacekeeping contingent. Although pro-Azerbaijan, the Turkish delegation refuses to support any peace plan without Turkish military involvement.

22 · Ter-Petrosyan blames a power struggle between Russian and CSCE mediators for the delay in reaching a solution.

The mediators “seem less interested in the conflict than in the distribution of power after it is settled.”

26 · Azeri artillery units launch attacks against the villages of Aghabekalendg, Levonarkh, and Talish in Karabakh’s Mardakert district. It is also revealed that a new force of 200 armed members of the Grey Wolves organization has been dispatched from Turkey in preparation for a new Azeri offensive and to train units of the Azeri army. Nagorno- Karabakh officials warn this development, as well as Turkish assistance in continuing Azeri attacks, may greatly damage the current ceasefire in effect and hinder ongoing mediation efforts by Moscow and the CSCE.

28 · Ter-Petrosyan says Armenia neither occupies any Azerbaijani territory nor harbors any ambitions to do so. Rather, Ter-Petrosyan contends it is the Nagorno-Karabakh Armenians who, in the name of self-determination, prosecute the war with Azerbaijan.

29 · Aliev addresses UN General Assembly, calling on the world community to pressure Armenia into withdrawing from Azerbaijani territory. Aliev guaranteed the safety of the Armenian population of Nagorno-Karabakh and mentioned (unspecified) concessions on their status within Azerbaijan.

October 1994

6 · Kazimirov announces Russia’s frustration with the CSCE Minsk Group’s mediation efforts for Karabakh, claiming the CSCE is manipulated by some countries to legitimize their geopolitical interests in the region, rather than as a proper vehicle for true conflict resolution. The CSCE effort is also competing with a Russian mediation effort which is more in line with Russia's increasingly activist strategy for the states of the former Soviet Union, or "near abroad."

12 · A CSCE delegation led by Deputy Chairman of the Minsk Group Pierre Anderman arrives in Yerevan after holding a series of meetings in Baku. The group meets with Foreign Minister Vahan Papazyan to discuss the next steps in the peace process. Talks center on maintaining the current ceasefire, increasing the dialogue and trust between representatives of the conflicting parties, improving cooperation between Russian and CSCE negotiators, and addressing the logistics and make-up of a peacekeeping contingent.

19 · Following earlier meetings between the Russian and Armenian defense ministers, Russia announces deployment of a squadron of MiG-23 combat fighter-interceptor aircraft to Armenia. The deployment is part of the CIS collective defense treaty and seeks to solidify the regional air defense system. Russian officials are seeking to establish five military bases in the Transcaucasus: two bases in Armenia and three in Georgia.

24 · During the closed CSCE session in Vienna, Russian delegation head Vladimir Shustov demands the CSCE agree that Russia lead in handling the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict. Russia holds that the eleven-nation CSCE Minsk Group's performance has been dismal to date and the 1992 formation of the CSCE group empowered to handle the Karabakh question is flawed by its lack of legal standing.

31 · Aliev says Azerbaijan will negotiate the political status of Nagorno-Karabakh only after Armenian troops withdraw from Azeri territories. Aliev favors restoring the demographic situation in Nagorno-Karabakh that had existed in 1988. According to the official census reports there were about 70 percent Armenians in Nagorno-Karabakh. At present there is not a single Azerbaijani on the territory of the former autonomous region.

November 1994

7 · Armenia expresses willingness to open its railways for transportation loads from Azerbaijan to Nakhichevan and agrees to traffic humanitarian cargoes from Turkey destined for Azerbaijan, via Armenia. Azerbaijan has been blockading Armenia for over two years while Turkey has refused transportation of even humanitarian aid for Armenia for the past year and a half.

16 · In a meeting with CSCE Minsk Group Chairman Anders Bjurner, Aliev agrees to the CSCE proposal for the deployment of international peacekeepers to the region, but remains adamant about the necessity for retaking the Lochin humanitarian corridor connecting Karabakh to Armenia as well as the city of Shusha. To date, Karabakh officials have agreed to the deployment of CSCE peacekeepers to a limited area along the border between Karabakh and Azerbaijan.

17 · Yeltsin and Aliev discuss the Azeri position regarding Karabakh, as well as the complicated issue of the oil deal signed between Baku and a consortium of Western oil companies. Yeltsin stresses the urgent need for a political solution to the Karabakh conflict and informs Aliev that the NATO Partnership for Peace security group was seriously considering offering a peacekeeping force for the region, a proposal reported to be ready for the upcoming CSCE summit in Budapest.

December 1994

6 · According to the Armenian president, the conflict cannot be resolved until Karabakh is recognized as a sovereign country and before the disengagement forces are deployed in the conflict zone.

1 · Azerbaijan's Democratic Congress views Russian control of Azeri borders as "unjustified economic sanctions against Azerbaijan." The Congress views such actions aimed at CIS member states as indicative that Russia views the CIS as a "puppet organization" to pursue its neo-imperialist policy.

2 · Armenian Defense Minister Vazgen Sarkisyan expresses satisfaction over the republic's "close" military cooperation with Russia. Responding to comparisons of Chechnya with the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict, Sarkisyan said that it is "Russia's internal affair" though "Russia's actions toward Chechnya are similar to the steps once taken by Azerbaijan toward Karabakh and by Georgia toward Abkhazia."

3 · In Baku, Turan Abbas Ali Novrusov, commander of border troops in Azerbaijan, says "we are a sovereign state and there is no necessity for our borders to be guarded by the military men of other states" (referring to a Russian guard on the Azeri-Iranian border). He emphasizes "there can be only technical help by Russia for reliable guard of Azerbaijan's border."

· State Advisor for Foreign Politics Vafa Guluzade notes the "stumbling stone" of negotiations is Armenian liberation of Shusha and Lochin. The issue prevents signing of the Major Political Agreement (MPA), providing the schedule and mechanisms of liberation of the occupied Azeri territories. Armenia has refused to liberate Shusha and Lochin. OSCE's peacekeeping forces can be sent to the region only after signing the MPA.

4 · Azerbaijan's Democratic Congress states "Russia's position toward the Muslim conflicts in Nagorno-Karabakh, Bosnia, and now on the Northern Caucasus testifies to its religious intolerance and intention to turn these conflicts into religious confrontations."

6 · Kazimirov reiterates that for the beginning of the OSCE peacekeeping operation in the conflict zone, the MPA must be concluded, appropriate resolutions of the UN Security Council adopted, and the operation's planning, financing, and duration determined.

9 · Kocharyan signs a decree on 9 January creating an NKR Defense Ministry. Maj.-Gen. Samuel Papayan is appointed Defense Minister.

14 · An article in Moscow's Segodnya says an oil pipeline crossing through the Nagorno-Karabakh region could ease the conflict in Azerbaijan. Author Armen Valesyan notes the prospects for energy supplies and dividends paid for transit provides both Armenia and Nagorno-Karabakh with ample incentives for compromise. Valesyan also argues the pipeline could become a guarantee for future peace in the region, as Western companies with oil operations in the Caucasus would have a vested interest in political and social stability in the conflict zones and in the republics themselves.

15 · Azerbaijan's internal affairs minister orders disbanding of OMON (special purpose police unit), noting the unit has become uncontrollable. Personnel have been ordered to hand in their weapons to the authorities. The situation remains calm and unit members do not believe force will be used against them.*

· In Baku, Azerbaijani government troops surround OMON special police headquarters. Fighting between the two factions also breaks out elsewhere in the country as Deputy Interior Minister Rovshan Dzhavadov calls for the resignation of President Aliyev and the Azerbaijani government. Dzhavadov says Aliyev and the government have brought the country to the "verge of ruin."

20 · Government troops and Interior Ministry forces hold off a coup attempt, but dozens are killed and wounded. Aliyev implicates former President Ayaz Mutalibov and former Prime Minister Surat Huseynov as masterminds of the operation in which Aliyev was to be assassinated. Some two hundred arrests are made.

21 · A new organization forms in the NKR, "Democratia." The group will work to increase voter participation in elections and to ensure democratic elections. Through mass media and holding political dialogues with other organizations and political leaders, the group hopes to create a legal state in the NKR.

· The Azerbaijani special police apparently caused a deterioration in the republic when it seized the building of the Prosecutor-General's Office on 3 October 1994 and demanded the resignation of Prosecutor-General Ali Omarov, who was subsequently dismissed. The special police also demanded the resignation of Parliamentary Chairman Guliev and Interior Minister Usubov. As a result of the Baku events and an abortive attempt by OMON to remove the legitimate authorities in Gyandzhe, Prime Minister Surat Husseinov is removed from his post for charges of maintaining contacts with the rebels and aiding their efforts. Aliiev labels the events an attempted coup.

27 · Aliev says to OSCE officials that Azerbaijan will uphold the ceasefire. “Status-quo does not suit us, we are going to obtain full peace.” OSCE delegates Vladimir Kazimirov and Anders Bjurner, returning from meetings with Nagorno-Karabakh representative Arkadiy Gukasyan, tell Aliev it is necessary to keep the ceasefire and urge him to speed up the exchange of prisoners and hostages.

30 · Demonstrators in Yerevan seek immediate resignation of Armenian President Levon Ter-Petrosyan and the Armenian cabinet. The opposition proposes that a coalition government of national accord be formed until the Constitution is adopted and a government established following 5 July 1995 parliamentary elections.

April 1995

6 · In a press interview, NKR President Robert Kocharyan states his government is still pursuing international recognition for the NKR and doubts OSCE negotiations will be enough to solve the conflict, given Azerbaijan’s present stance. He also states the internal power struggle in Azerbaijan will do little to decrease its resolve to “preserve its territorial integrity” given it has changed leaders eight times since 1988 and its position on the NKR remains unaltered.

8 · An article in Baku’s Zerkalo editorializes that the recent Russian-Armenian treaties on friendship, economic cooperation, and Russian military bases in Armenia signals Russia is trying more than ever to regain its control over the Transcaucasus and that the military-political union the treaties forged between the two eliminates Russia as a neutral party in negotiations over the conflict's settlement.

11 · Russia's State Duma conducts hearings on the NKR conflict, held on the eve of the "Eightieth anniversary of the Genocide of Armenians." Armenian Ambassador to Russia Yuri Mkrtumian is present but his Azeri counterpart telegraphed the State Duma two days ago indicating his belief that the hearings would have a pro-Armenian tendency that Azerbaijan thus could not take part.

17 · In a press interview, Karabakh Supreme Council deputy Maksim Mirzoyan argues the oil contract "is the main obstacle" preventing NKR recognition by Azerbaijan. He holds that despite the fact that the contract is still "just a paper," it is a paper giving millions of dollars to the Dudaev, Gamsakhurdia, and Aliev regimes. Thus, Aliev continues fighting knowing Armenia will have to give if it expects concessions from the oil deal. Fellow Karabakh Supreme Council deputy Vasiliy Aghajanyan notes that "no Azeri oil tricks" will weaken the NKR's resolve to reach independence, noting it is not the Republic of Armenia who will determine the NKR fate but the people of Nagorno- Karabakh.

18 · Armenian government offers to withdraw its troops from the disputed territory in exchange for ending the Azeri blockade of Armenia. Azerbaijan Foreign Ministry welcomes the proposal but suggests agreements to exchange prisoners should solidify before withdrawal. Baku also announces its willingness to grant the NKR self-rule within Azerbaijan but NKR forces continue demanding full independence.

21 · Hasanov charges present OSCE Chairmen Vladimir Kazimirov and Anders Björner with being ineffective in resuming stalled talks. Beginning 21 April, Finnish diplomat Heikki Talvitie will assume the chairmanship of the OSCE Minsk Group, a move supported by Hasanov.

27 · NKR First Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Economy Spartak Tevosyan calculates $2.5 billion in damage to the NKR as a result of “Azeri aggression.” About 8,000 industrial, agricultural, and construction objects, 7,000 buildings, 172 educational, and 47 medical institutions suffered as a result of enemy shellings. In addition, several cultural monuments were destroyed, according to the minister.

3 · A Russian Federation delegation lead by Federation Council CIS Affairs Committee Chairman Vadim Gustov arrives in Yerevan for an eventual tour of the NKR conflict zone. Gustov says the delegation is to help the Russian parliament and the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly “define the roles they can play” in the conflict’s settlement, insisting that any Russian role will not favor a particular side.

· In meetings with Turkish Foreign Minister Erdal Inönü, Aliyev says Azerbaijan is leaning on Turkey to help bring the NKR conflict to an end. He hopes that Turkey will support Azerbaijan within the framework of the OSCE and in overcoming economic difficulties as a result of the war. Inönü responds favorably, saying Turkey advocates the withdrawal of Armenian troops, restoration of Azerbaijani territorial integrity and that Turkey will assume more responsibility for ensuring peace and security in the region.

- The CIS Affairs Committee delegation meet with Aliev. Aliev commends the group for their efforts and encourages them to promote continued talks on a settlement. The only issues remaining, according to both the NKR and Azerbaijan regarded the exchanging of prisoners, Armenian troop withdrawal from Shusha and Lochin, and the political status of the NKR. Aliev says mediation efforts should focus on bringing each side's positions closer.

12 · Marking the first anniversary of Karabakh-Azeri truce, Armenia releases twenty-seven Azeri prisoners who returned to Baku on an Armenian plane accompanied by an International Red Cross delegation. Aliiev responds by announcing Azerbaijan will unilaterally release all POWs in Azerbaijan and other grounds.

15 · Moscow-based OSCE negotiations fail to produce an ultimate resolution to the conflict. OSCE representative Rene Nyberg comments that the talks passed in a “businesslike and open atmosphere” but no radical progress was made. Key problems discussed during the talks remain an Armenian presence in Shusha and Lochin, unaccounted-for POWs, and the political status of the NKR. Armenian, NKR, and Azeri representatives fail to agree on the order in which these issues should be tackled.

25 · Armenian Foreign Ministry announces suspension of its activity in the OSCE Minsk Group in connection with an Armenian gas pipeline bombed a few days ago. Azeri State Advisor for Foreign Affairs Vafa Guluzade denies Azerbaijani involvement in the pipeline’s destruction, saying the suspension is an Armenian and Russian attempt to sabotage OSCE efforts that do not conform to Russian interests in the Caucasus. Another round of talks is scheduled for 15 June in Helsinki.

June 1995

2 · Armenia announces it is reentering the OSCE-sponsored talks. In Yerevan, Ter-Petrosyan holds talks with Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister Mahmud Va’ezi.

Va'ezhi expresses pleasure that talks will resume and underlines his country's opposition to resuming the war. Va'ezhi pledges his government will work to ensure a durable peace and return stability to the region.

· Azeri parliament lifts the state of emergency invoked 4 October 1994.

15 · OSCE-sponsored talks begin in Helsinki with delegations from Armenia, Azerbaijan, and the NKR present. Two draft approaches to settlement are introduced, one proposing a stage-by-stage process of withdrawal and the other envisaging an all-encompassing solution to be effected once all sides narrow key differences spelled out earlier. (See entry for 15-20 May.) Once agreement is reached on a settlement approach, peacekeeping operations will be launched.

23 · Armenian Deputy Foreign Minister Vardan Oskanyan labels the latest Helsinki talks as "constructive," saying that despite continued discord between Azerbaijan and Armenia over Karabakh security, the key problems were discussed in detail and the sides appear closer to agreement.

28 · Gulizade announces a major step was taken in the Helsinki talks when Azerbaijan and Armenia agreed in principle to previously disputed issues. "A major political agreement is not far off," hailed Gulizade. He highlights the fact that the NKR will assume special status within Azerbaijan and that the ultimate resolution agreement will be arranged so that no side will feel like the winner or the loser.

29 · Armenian press agencies report Azeri attacks in northeast Armenia, violating the ceasefire. The Armenian Defense Ministry say Armenian defensive positions were fired on around Verin-Champarak and Nerkin-Champarak in Krasnoselsk district by Azeri units hoping to draw Armenia into a wide-scale war. The NKR Public Information Office reported no incidents and said all sides were observing the ceasefire.

July 1995

5 · In a press briefing, Armenian Deputy Foreign Minister Vardab Oskanyan states the NKR has attained “de-facto self-determination” and is in “full control of the external and internal situation.” He says the main goal of the Minsk Group is to tackle the problem of NKR’s political status.

13 · NKR Press Secretary Semyon Afian charges Azerbaijan with making unrealistic demands before the MinskConference begins-demands unacceptable to the NKR and Armenia and thus preventing the talks from being held. Specifically, Afian says, Baku’s demands that peacekeeping forces be deployed between Armenia and Azerbaijan isolate the NKR from Armenia, its only source of food and other supplies. Baku also demands NKR forces withdraw from their positions before the conference begins. Afian asserts this would position Azeri units in “choice front lines” from which they could resume military operations against Karabakh forces. Azeri requests that Turkish troops take part in the international peacekeeping forces is also termed unacceptable by Afian because Turkey is decidedly pro- Azerbaijan.

· OSCE Minsk Group Co-chairmen Heikki Talvitie and Valentin Lozinskiy arrive in Baku for discussions with Aliev. They focus on the key problems noted in entry above, but according to both co-chairmen, no progress is made. Azeri Foreign Minister Hasanov says Azerbaijan will be ready to “sign a political agreement after Armenian forces withdraw and indigenous people return to their homes.”

· From Baku, the delegation went to the NKR for talks with its leadership. Delegation head Talvitie emphasized to Kocharyan that the conflicting sides “have no other way but to agree to compromises.” Talvitie says these compromises can be worked out in talks in Austria set for 24 July.

20 · Newly elected Chairman of the NKR Supreme Council Karen Baburyan announces the NKR will proceed on developing its statehood. The immediate goals of the new parliament include forming a strong army, creating a developed economy, and cultivating positive foreign relations with neighbors and abroad.

24 · Azeri-Armenian talks open in Baden, Austria. Aliev restricts the topics of the Azeri representative (FM Hasanov) to only the liberation of Lochin and Shusha and the return of refugees displaced from these regions.

August 1995

2 · In a press conference, NKR Foreign Minister Gukasyan discusses results of Baden talks, saying they revolved around two concerns. First, NKR security was discussed and the NKR delegation proposed an involved Armenian role by either giving Armenia a mandate to interfere in further Karabakh-Azeri conflicts or by stationing Armenian soldiers in the NKR. The second concern was raised by the Azeris and again dealt with liberating Shusha and Lochin. Gukasyan laments the talks produced little because the Azeris will not address any other issue until liberation is achieved. As to OSCE arrangements for a peacekeeping deployment, this will occur when the sides reach political consensus. More talks are scheduled in Moscow in late September, according to Kazimirov.

7 · Turkey appoints Kemal Ayhan-ex-Turkish ambassador to the USSR-as Turkish special envoy to the Karabakh talks. In discussions with Aliev, he vows to maintain Turkey's support for Azerbaijan in the conflict's settlement, saying "occupied Azeri territories must be liberated.... This is our principal position and we will not change it."

14 · Fighting continues along Armenia's northeast border with Azerbaijan in the Noemberyan region. Relative calm is reported on all other fronts.

20 · Hasanov claims Russian OSCE Minsk Group Cochairman Kazimirov "does not understand the tasks of the mediators." He criticizes him for again trying to "dodge the basic issues of the settlement, notably the liberation of occupied Azerbaijani lands."

31 · Armenian Deputy Foreign Minister Vardan Oskanyan says tensions are again rising as another round of talks is scheduled for 4 September in Moscow. The deputy minister says tensions always flare when talks are due to resume and indicates Azerbaijan is most unhappy with recent developments since settlement of the conflict is of "vital importance" for them. He predicts no groundbreaking results to occur given the sides' positions on Lochin and Shusha. For the Armenians, the future of Lochin is the "fundamental guarantee of the security in Nagorno-Karabakh," according to Oskanyan.

September 1995

4 · Moscow-based talks are held. Participants continue to discuss resolution of the Lochin and Shusha regions, still "occupied" by Armenian forces. The OSCE, the United States, Russia, and delegations from Armenia, Azerbaijan, and the NKR take part in the talks. Possible security alternatives to the NKR without Armenian control of Lochin were proposed.

5 · The OSCE announces plans to establish permanent representation in the NKR settlement proceedings. The decision comes after a visit to both Baku and Yerevan by OSCE special envoy Andre Erdesh. In talks with Ter-Petrosyan, Erdesh believes OSCE participation at this new level will make the overall peace initiative more effective.

12 · The U.S. Embassy in Azerbaijan clarifies the U.S. position regarding the conflict. In a statement sent to the Azeri leadership, the United States confirmed:

- the United States respects the territorial integrity of Azerbaijan;
- the United States does not recognize the self-proclaimed NKR;
- the United States does not recognize Kocharyan as the president of any institution;
- the U.S. mission is the restoration of peace in the region and will continue talks with those involved in the issue to further this process.

14 · Oskanyan holds a news conference to discuss results of the talks, which ended on 9 September. He indicates Armenia achieved a number of favorable provisions in agreements signed with Azerbaijan dealing with the geography of the confrontation zone, the disengagement of fighting units, and on disarmament procedures. He argues that the ceasefire has been holding up relatively well over the last year and a half, allowing for political conditions “quite conducive for the peaceful resolution of the problem.”

Summary at the End of 1995

The Azeri side persists in its refusal to discuss any political agreement until Armenian troops leave the Lochin and Shusha regions while the Armenians contend their presence in the territories is necessary to maintain food and material supplies to the NKR, isolated as a result of the Azeri blockade still in effect. Moreover, Armenia believes that Azerbaijan will resume intense military operations should these troops withdraw. Fighting still continues in many areas along the Azeri-Armenian border. Analysts predict some concessions may be forthcoming on the part of Azerbaijan as oil negotiations come closer to completion.

The Moldovan/Trans-Dniester Conflict

Background Note

Moldova is the only CIS state that has confronted a Russian army stationed on its territory and supporting a separatist Russian insurgency against its state. This insurgency has been in progress since the autumn of 1989, when the pro-Soviet, hard-line communist community of Russian patriots living on the left bank of the Dniester River in eastern Moldova proclaimed a "Trans-Dniester Soviet Socialist Republic." In 1991, the enclave renamed itself the "Trans-Dniester Democratic Republic" (TDR). In claiming its independence, the self-proclaimed republic appropriated 15 percent of Moldova's territory, and formed its own separate government and national guard. Following Moldova's declaration of independence on 27 August 1991, the TDR rejected Moldovan sovereignty, refusing to participate in the political processes of the country. This disagreement evolved into armed conflict in the late fall of 1991, and entered a critical stage in January 1992 over the control of Bendery, the TDR's largest industrial center. In July 1992, the Moldovan and Russian presidents formed a Joint Supervision Commission in the Dniester area to oversee an official ceasefire and negotiations on the issue of the withdrawal of Russian troops from Moldova. Today, the fighting has slowed to a trickle, but the political status of the TDR is still being contested by Moscow, Moldova, and the president of the TDR, Igor Smirnov.

Moldavia was annexed by Russia from Romania in 1812 and again in 1940. Many Moldovans still speak Romanian and Moldovan nationalists, including the pro-Romanian Popular Front, sympathize with the political goal of reunification with Bucharest. Following the demise of the Soviet Union, Trans-Dniester secessionists feared that Moldova might be swallowed up by a "greater Romania." To forestall this possibility, they imposed linguistic and cultural Russification policies on the region under their control, and proclaimed the political goal of becoming part of a restored Soviet Union or a Greater Russia.

The postcommunist Russian government preserved the Gorbachev regime's policy of privately supporting the separatist ambitions of the TDR, mainly because it considered the region a useful base for the 14th Army. Beyond this, however, many deputies in Russia's Supreme Soviet, including Vice-President Aleksandr Rutskoy, openly extended political and economic support to the secessionists in 1991, identifying TDR inhabitants as a Russian minority whose rights required defending. Notwithstanding its behind-the-scenes assistance and support, however, the Russian government stopped short of officially recognizing the independence of the self-declared republic. The former Soviet Union's 14th Army in Moldova, made up of more than 10,000 troops, has played an active role in the TDR's insurgency movement. Created for possible action in the Balkan peninsula in 1945, under the command of the Southwestern Military Theater, the 14th Army was once a formidable combined force composed of armored, artillery, tactical, missile, air defense, Spetsnaz, chemical, air reconnaissance, and engineering units. Under the former Soviet Union's command, the army was stationed partly in Ukraine, partly in Moldova, and was a component of the USSR's Odessa Military District. When the USSR fell, Ukraine was able to assume control of its portion of the 14th Army. Moldova, on the other hand, was not as forceful. In February 1992, Russia unilaterally announced its control of the Moldovan units.

With the help of the 14th Army, the Trans-Dniester insurgents also formed and trained separate paid forces of their own, calling them a "Republican Guard." Numbering about 8,000 men, this unit is actually an army of experienced, skilled veterans of the USSR armed forces. Its officers come mostly from the 14th Army under "loan" or "transfer" arrangements. (It is easy to imagine how difficult it could be to arrange a genuine "withdrawal" of Russia's 14th Army when many soldiers could conveniently transfer into the Trans-Dniester "Republican Guard.")

Over and above the guard units, Russia has posted a Spetsnaz (special forces) unit, several internal security troops, and "border troops" in eastern Moldova. Added to these are several thousand Cossacks and other veterans of the USSR armed forces who came to Moldova in 1992 to oppose the new government and to make sure that Moldova did not join Romania. These recruits have been provided with residences and are being called “local inhabitants” by the TDR authorities.

The TDR has an economy designed to support military activities. It is an important producer of defense-related products, once forming an important sector of Moldova’s economy. Working in the defense factories are highly skilled military reservists, numbering in the thousands, many of whom have combat experience gained in Afghanistan.

The commander of the 14th Army in Moldova for two years was General Aleksandr Lebed. Lebed established firm control over the Trans-Dniester Republic, in effect reestablishing Russia’s influence over the entire country. Though Moscow frequently denies that Lebed was following Moscow’s orders, Lebed maintained control while Moscow sought to legalize the troops’ presence in the TDR by pressuring Chisinau to “host” the troops on its territory. In June 1993, Moldova was first on Moscow’s list of newly independent states in which Russia sought basing rights, a demand which President Mircea Snegur rejected out of hand.

From 1992 to 1995, while Russia did not reject outright Moldova’s demands for withdrawal of its troops from the TDR, it stalled the withdrawal by stipulating conditions to which Chisinau could not agree. Principally, it called for granting the TDR “special” political status, which Chisinau accepts, but the two have not been able to agree on how to define this status.

Russia refuses to withdraw its troops until a political solution broadly acceptable to the TDR is found.

A “Russian-speaking” enclave on the left bank of the Dniester, which remained pro-Soviet and pro-Union after the collapse of the USSR and which is supported by Russian ultranationalists, is of particular concern to Ukraine. Like Bucharest, Kiev has every reason to try to prevent the formation of an independent Trans-Dniester state. In September 1995, when Presidents Snegur and Smirnov met to discuss the political status of the TDR, the Ukrainians participated as mediators. Romania, however, was excluded due to sharp objections on the part of the TDR.

In sum, the protracted Trans-Dniester conflict is about much more than the protection of minority Russian rights in Moldova. The 14th Army also has a much longer and more complex history than merely that of a unit of “peacekeeping troops” in a troubled area of the newly independent states. Russia’s perceived national security interests are partly at stake, as are those of the new states of Moldova and Ukraine. The following chronology explores, month by month, the remarkable political interplay between the political leaders and officials of Chisinau, Tiraspol, Moscow, Bucharest, and Kiev.

3 · Slavic separatist forces in Trans-Dniester seize the Ministry of National Security in Bendery.

8 · “Dniester Republic” paramilitary forces fire on the headquarters of the Bendery police. The Bendery city soviet (now under the control of communist forces) announces the formation of its own military to oppose the Moldovan police.

9 · “Dniester Republic” Supreme Soviet resolves to subordinate all ex-USSR troops stationed there (about 20,000) to “Dniester Republic” authority, to triple officers’ salaries, to institute an oath of allegiance to the “Dniester Republic” and introduce military conscription.

· “Dniester Republic” paramilitary forces attack a Moldovan convoy, seizing equipment and armaments of a former Soviet MVD battalion which Moldova was transporting back to Chisinau. Moldovan soldiers are beaten and tied up, under orders not to return fire.

10 · In a meeting with FSU troop commanders of FSU troops in Moldova, Snegur reasserts his country’s aim to form a 12,000-man republican army. He emphasizes that all officers and non-commissioned officers, regardless of nationality, are welcome to join, and offers full social guarantees. Only those wishing to serve in the Moldovan army will take an oath of loyalty.

12 · At a demonstration in Moscow sponsored by Russian nationalist and communists, several hundred marchers break down the gate of Moldova’s mission, overrun the compound and chant slogans in favor of the “Dniester Republic.” Snegur cables Yeltsin complaining of a “violation of diplomatic immunity ... by adversaries of the Alma-Ata accords.” Despite the incident, Snegur pledges to promote CIS relations and closer Moldovan-Russian relations.

13 · According to the Hungarian Foreign Ministry, Moldova is in full compliance with international standards in observing the rights of ethnic minorities.

· Snegur cables Yeltsin again to complain about Russian mercenaries “taking part in armed raids” with the “Dniester Republic” armed guard. Snegur notes that the “Dniester Republic” is a “bridgehead of the reactionary forces of the former USSR which oppose the Alma-Ata accords, try to preserve the empire, and seek revenge for their defeat in the August 1991 putsch.”

15 · In his inaugural address, Snegur announces that the cornerstone of his policies will be “the observance of human rights.” He pledges to build a government “capable of ensuring cooperation of all political forces” in the country.

16 · The “Dniester Republic” issues several laws on defense, which serve to maintain the existing force structure of the army units on its territory, financing them from its budget and employ the officers and NCOs on contract to the “Dniester Republic,” with significant pay increases.

· Deputy Commander-in-Chief of the CIS Armed Forces Col.-Gen. Boris Pyankov meets with Moldovan officials in Chisinau to discuss the status of the 14th Army in Moldova. He rejects Moldova’s demands that the 14th Army command be disciplined for its participation in the bloody events in the “Dniester Republic.” He also asserts that Moldova has no juridical rights over left-bank FSU units (i.e., the 14th Army), only over those on the right bank.

20 · During a meeting of the All-Army Officers Assembly, CIS Commander-in-Chief Shaposhnikov announces that the 14th Army has been subordinated to the Ground Forces and that Col.-Gen. Boris Gromov, perceived as a reactionary leader in the armed forces, has been named its commander.

- Minister of Internal Affairs Ion Costas issues an appeal to the International Helsinki Federation accusing the “Dniester Republic” leaders of “trying to artificially create a confrontation between the Moldovan and Russian-speaking population,” through “armed provocations” against Moldovan authorities and their families. The appeal claims the “Dniester Republic” leaders “are talking in the language of force and ultimatums,” and are supported and armed by “reactionary circles in Moscow.” The minister pleads for international attention to the events on the left bank.

- “Dniester Republic” guards once again seize CIS military equipment due to be transferred to Moldovan control. CIS officers and soldiers make no attempt to interfere with the seizure.

22 · Snegur reports to a visiting international delegation that Yeltsin has failed to respond to both cable requests that the Russian President intervene to curb the Russian-sponsored insurgency in eastern Moldova. Snegur said that Chisinau would appeal to the United Nations and other international NGOs to intervene in Moldova if Yeltsin refuses to help.

23 · Moldova’s parliament votes to introduce the country’s own currency, the Moldovan leu, to replace the ruble.

25 · One day after a joint Moldovan-Romanian “Council of Union” issued a proclamation calling for the restoration of the “Romanian national unity state,” Snegur meets with his Romanian counterpart, Ion Iliescu, on the Moldovan side of the border. The topic of reunification is not broached; rather the two announce that a “treaty of friendship and cooperation” will be signed in March.

26 · In an interview, Snegur reasserts that a “large majority of Moldovans prefer independence after centuries of control by Russians, Turks, and even the Romanians.” Snegur said that the thought of reunification remains “a very long time away.”

31 · Moldovan police in Bendery are beat by Russian crowds and “Dniester Republic” guards.

1 · A Moldovan kolkhoz chairman from the left bank is shot and killed by “Dniester Republic” “border guards” near Dubasari. Two days later a Moldovan police officer is killed by these same border forces in Dubasari.

11 · Prime Minister Muravschi announces that Moldova will not contribute financially to the CIS general-purpose forces, rather only to those forces on Moldovan territory that have pledged support for the republic. He also states that the future status of the 14th Army will be decided in talks between Moldova and CIS military.

12 · The chairman of the “Dniester Republic” Defense Committee states that in the event of an attack by Chisinau, the “Dniester Republic” would commandeer the large arsenal in the area (i.e., from the 14th Army) in order to “arm the entire adult population ... and prepare an Afghanistan here.”

18 · The United States and Moldova formally establish diplomatic relations.

21 · According to Moldova’s defense minister, Ion Costas, the Moldovan army is to be created from the remnants of the 14th Army located on the right bank of the Dniester. Units located on the left bank will be given the status of an army on the territory of an independent state, and will be withdrawn to Russian territory in eighteen to twenty-four months. According to Costas, this was a preliminary agreement of talks with CIS Deputy Defense Minister Boris Pyankov in Chisinau.

24 · Snegur signs a decree stating that all residents of Moldova would be offered Moldovan citizenship regardless of ethnicity or Romanian language ability.

25 · The Moldovan MFA sends a note to the Russian MFA protesting the presence of Russian Cossacks in the “Dniester Republic.”

March 1992

2 · Dniester guardsmen and Russian Cossacks surround the Dubasari district Police Department demanding the personnel to abandon or face destruction. The district police is staffed mainly by Moldovans who would be asked to assist the Moldovan government in resisting separatist fighting. The guardsmen and Cossacks, backed by armored personnel carriers, capture the building and take positions on all bridges and roads on the left bank of the Dniester. Late in the day, Smirnov imposes a state of emergency in Dubasari. Snegur describes the event as a “provocation aimed at disrupting Moldova’s admission to the United Nations and the CSCE.”

3-15 · Fighting intensifies as TDR guardsmen and Russian Cossacks seek to solidify their positions in and around Dubasari and in controlling all roads and bridges to the left bank of Dniester. Moldovan government forces and security units sought to repel the Dniester advances and retain control of lost areas. Heavy fighting occurred in Dubasari and attacks on legitimate power structures, terror against civilians, and repeated bombing incidents blowing up bridges occur throughout Dniester. Both sides, TDR forces and Moldovan government forces, repeatedly try to capture 14th Army weapon and equipment caches near Tiraspol but are mostly held in check by CIS forces.

6 · Snegur telegrams Yeltsin to again firmly protest against Russian Cossacks' support of TDR separatists. Another telegram is sent to Ruslan Khasbulatov, Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation chairman, challenging Khasbulatov's proposals that Russian committees and commissions be formed to discuss the TDR situation. Snegur says such deliberations violate the Alma-Ata Declaration pledging signatories to abide by the principles of observing sovereignty, equality, and non-interference in internal affairs.

13 · In a Moscow meeting with CIS government heads, Moldovan Prime Minister Muravschi denounces TDR leaders for having isolated the left bank of the Dniester from the rest of the republic and for "refusing to have contacts with the Moldovan leadership." He proposes a resolution of the conflict by forming a single province of all left-bank rayons in Dniester and awarding the new province the status of free economic zone.

15 · Moldovan government demands all armed formations in the Dniester left bank "voluntarily surrender their arms to the authorities." Should armed groups not comply, Moldova will take the required measures "to protect citizens ... from banditry." The groups are given forty-eight hours to comply.

20 · Snegur says Moldova will appeal to Romania for support should the danger of civil war not drastically diminish. TDR separatists, fighting especially against greater integration between Romania and Moldova, believe the move would further polarize the situation and fighting would grow more intense.

23 · A quadripartite group is formed in Helsinki talks. The group is composed of experts from the Romanian, Russian, Ukrainian, and Moldovan foreign ministries established to coordinate efforts to seek a settlement to the conflict.

31 · In remarks to the Moldovan parliament, Snegur laments the fact that TDR leaders are unwilling to resolve the conflict by peaceful means. He says that in rejecting Moldovan proposals for meetings, a ceasefire, and for free economic zone status, the TDR leadership has “chosen the road of bloodshed.”

April 1992

1-3 · As fighting continues, the quadripartite group holds talks, labeled by one Romanian official as “productive.” The group issues a communiqué whereby the opposing sides vow to settle the conflict exclusively by political means, stress the importance of human rights, and recommend steps to prevent the escalation of bloodshed.

1 · TDR Supreme Soviet declares illegal Snegur’s imposition of a state of emergency that includes Dniester. The deputies also “instruct” Smirnov and other government leaders to appeal to the officers of the 14th Army that they act as “guarantor of the Dniester region.” Moldovan officials increasingly question the 14th Army’s neutrality as detachments from the army repeatedly violate Moldovan airspace, preparing for CIS aircraft landing in Tiraspol military fields. Frequent visits to Tiraspol by Russian generals without notifying the Moldovan Defense Ministry further alarm the Moldovan government.

4 · Snegur warns that 14th Army involvement in the Dniester conflict “would be a catastrophe on a scale hard to predict.” Army Assistant Commander Vladimir Baranov says the army is not defending left-bank separatists but assumes the role of safeguarding the weapons dumps and army installations, necessary because of the massive supply of arms and equipments left over from Soviet rule. Baranov stresses, however, that many officers, NCOs, and servicemen’s families are being attacked and “when their fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters ... beg them to defend their native land, it is hard to restrain people.”

6 · Romanian Minister of National Defense says that although Romania is not involved in the Dniester conflict and is not supplying arms and matériel to Snegur’s government, “if Moldova puts the request to us, we will undoubtedly meet it.” He emphasizes such a request would be perfectly legal since Moldova is a UN member and takes part in the Helsinki process and thus could buy supplies to “defend its territorial integrity.”

· At the urging of Russian Vice-President Aleksandr Rutskoy, the Sixth Congress of Russian People’s Deputies adopts resolution “on assistance to ensure human rights in the Dniester area.” In his remarks, Rutskoy stresses that Russia must protect Russians wherever they live and alluded to the Dniester conflict as an area where ethnic Russians were suffering from discrimination. He urged Russia to guard against these abuses and suggests employing Russian military resolve to such end.

7 · Snegur and Moldovan Parliament Chairman

Aleksandr Mosanu individually telegram the Russian leadership protesting Rutskoy's message and charging him with "slander." Both believe the speech was aimed to assure Dniester separatists that they would enjoy support from Russian communist parliamentarians and also signals renewed Russia's intentions to rebuild its former empire which "should put the sovereign and independent states on the alert." The telegrams were sent to Yeltsin, Khasbulatov, the Sixth Congress of People's Deputies, and CIS heads of states and parliaments.

8 · In a press interview, former Moldovan Prime Minister and Christian-Democratic Front of Moldova Chairman Mircea Druc speak favorably about Romanian-Moldovan unification, saying "we can do anything to make Romania whole again, on the condition it is something constructive and creative." He also discusses the simple aims of the National Council for the Union (which he chairs): "Our role is to convince as many people as possible to demand the union." Druc laments the fact that the "great powers" may not want to see a united Romania with 300,000 inhabitants "in the center of Europe and at the mouth of the Danube."

9 · Moldovan protests against the Russian resolution continue. Moldovan Vice-President Victor Puskas charges the Russian position is a "gross interference in the domestic affairs of an independent and sovereign state, ... a fruitless attempt to continue the old policy of the imperial center vis—vis the formerly rightless national fringelands." Many note that Rutskoy's statements encouraged Russophobia and in fact make the 14th Army an occupational force. Massive meetings and demonstrations take place, escalating tensions and hostility.

10-15 · Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev holds a series of meetings with Ukrainian, Moldovan, and Dniester leaders. Talks centered mostly on a Russian peacekeeping role in the Dniester conflict. Kozyrev defends the Russian position that only Russian peacekeeping forces alone can level the conflict and that the 14th Army already in Moldova has served this function. Moldovan and Ukrainian representatives espouse different views than Kozyrev in talks, mainly challenging Russian neutrality and viewing the process in Moldova as “orchestrated by conservative forces from Moscow.” Snegur asserts that the Russians intend “to create a reliable outpost in Ukraine’s rear” for use should Ukrainian and Russian relations enter serious conflict.

20 · Smirnov forms a Dniester army by presidential decree, inviting in particular ex-officers of the 14th Army to join the 12,000-man-strong force.

21 · In a press interview, TDR Vice-President Aleksandr Karaman argues that events in the Dniester region are preventing the unification of Moldova and Romania and thus serve to preserve Dniester’s autonomous status. He clarifies that the Dniester region would agree to federation status in the republic of Moldova with equal rights, but since key governmental posts in Moldova are held by representatives of the People’s Front—which advocates Romanian- Moldovan unification—the TDR must remain on guard.

23 · In a press interview, Ukrainian National Assembly member Dmitriy Korchinskiy reveals that a small paramilitary organization under National Assembly auspices is fighting in the Dniester conflict on the Dniester side. Korchinskiy says the group supports the “ideological and moral motives” of Ukrainians in Dniester.

28 · Conflict settlement talks deadlock in Chisinau as Moldova rejects a Dniester proposal to make Dubasari a peace zone and to withdraw armed formations there. No date is set to resume talks. The quadripartite commission begins work on establishing ceasefire monitoring units to be dispatched along the conflict zone.

2 · Heavy fighting continues and four Cossacks are killed in Cosnita from a mine explosion. Smirnov declares the TDR will observe the ceasefire but seeks the status of an independent state for Dniester. The quadripartite commission (Moldova, Romania, Ukraine, and Russia) also pieces together a conciliatory commission composed of representatives from Moldova's and Dniester's parliaments and governments with talks set for 5 May.

· Pressures on Snegur to hold a referendum on unification with Romania continue as 3,000 Moldovan soldiers appeal to Snegur to hold such vote. The appeal, published by various media sources, says not holding the referendum contradicts Moldovan national interests.

5 · The conciliatory commission holds talks in Bendery. The Moldovan side is represented by First Deputy Prime Minister Konstantin Oborok, who maintains Moldova simply seeks to preserve its independence and territorial integrity. The Dniester side, led by TDR Vice-President Aleksandr Karaman, holds that nothing can be discussed until all armed formations are withdrawn from the Dniester region. Some third-party participants believed both sides should first focus on solidifying the ceasefire and in separating the combatants. Both of these goals have been achieved in Bendery and in Dubasari, where fighting has indeed been minimized and seven ceasefire monitoring posts have been established.

8 · A new ceasefire agreement is signed in Bendery by conciliatory commission representatives. The document imposes an all encompassing ceasefire in all of Dniester, provides guaranteed control of the armistice, phases disengagement of armed forces, and provides observers to establish more monitoring posts in heavy combat zones.

12 · Responding to new evidence that the 14th Army continues its support for Dniester separatists, Snegur again telegrams Yeltsin in protest. Dniester paramilitary formations are heavily equipped with 14th Army weapons, equipment, ammunition, telecommunications, and other military hardware. Snegur believes the Russian decision to unilaterally place the 14th Army in the Dniester region under Russian jurisdiction negatively affected the Dniester situation as separatists continue fighting because they know support is forthcoming from Moscow.

13 · The TDR plans to open missions in Moscow and Kiev, despite a proclamation by the Moldovan parliament that this is unconstitutional. TDR officials moved forward with the plan after recent trips to both capitals by Dniester parliamentarians. The Russian Foreign Ministry says no such thing “would happen at the official level.”

15 · The first wave of eighty military observers arrives in Bendery. The group is composed of twenty observers from each commission member (Russian, Romania, Ukraine, and Moldova) and will focus on meeting the goals of the 8 May ceasefire agreement. Fighting heats up in Bendery and Dubasari, two areas where tension had subsided.

16 · In a press conference after visiting the conflict area, Moldovan parliament president Alexandru Mosanu argues the conflict “could be settled peacefully if chauvinistic and pro-imperial forces.... did not interfere in our domestic affairs,” referring to Russian hard-liners who consistently argue for a Russian presence in Dniester and are believed to support Dniester separatists through the 14th Army. Moldovan government continues its calls for withdrawing the army.

20 · In a press interview, Dniester Supreme Soviet Chairman Marakutsa argues the Dniester maintains its guard to ensure the region does not become part of a “Greater Romania.” He notes his understanding of those Moldovans wanting unification but that a referendum in Dniester clearly reveals opposition to unification and to remain autonomous. Marakutsa laments the fact that all the options offered to Dniester-cultural autonomy, free economic zone, special status within Moldova-do not afford Dniester (or Gagauz) the right not to join Romania.

23 · Snegur telegrams Boutros-Ghali saying the Republic of Moldova faces “serious danger and its security, independence, and territorial integrity is challenged by the brutal and violent involvement... of the 14th Russian Army.” He notes the whole territory on the left bank of the Dniester is “occupied” by 14th Army forces who have been blatantly part of combat operations. Snegur terms this involvement as “an act of military aggression, an undeclared war,” and that the Russian government bears all responsibility for its consequences. Snegur urges Boutros-Ghali to distribute copies of the telegram to UN Security Council members in order that they be briefed on the situation.

25 · Addressing a closed-door parliamentary session, Snegur asserts parliamentarians have two options: to stop military operations in Dniester or to declare a state of war with Russia. In his address, Snegur opposes the first option, revealing his frustration with the Russian leadership and what course he favors.

2 · Moldova's foreign minister claims: "Russia is attempting to exclude Ukraine and Romania from the process of regulating the conflict in the Trans-Dniester region and to conduct the negotiations with Moldova on a bilateral basis.”

· In a national address, Snegur denounces “those who are trying to make Moldova into a base for continuing the imperial games of the former Union and its legal successor, Russia.” Moldova and other former republics “regarded the CIS as a means for discarding the former Soviet empire in a peaceful and civilized way; Moscow seeks to use the CIS as a new form of the USSR and to install pro-Moscow governments..., resenting our independent course ... Moscow uses separatist movements as a means for pressing Moldova into changing its course and for installing a pro-Moscow regime in Chisinau.”

3 · A meeting of the newly formed Russian Security Council convenes to discuss the problems facing ethnic Russians in the “near abroad,” and particularly in “Dniester Republic.” The Security Council calls for the protection of Russian interests in the “Dniester Republic.”

· Grachev issues another warning to Chisinau, stating that should military action against the “Dniester Republic” be undertaken, he could not guarantee the restraint of the 14th Army.

4 · Moldovan Foreign Minister Tiu meets his Ukrainian counterpart, Zlenko. Both sides agree that Ukrainian-Moldovan relations represent an important factor in maintaining regional stability. Tiu stresses that his “government appreciates the neutral stance taken by Ukraine and that distrust for Russia remained high.”

- Moldovan Defense Minister Costas releases intelligence information documenting transfer of arms and ammunition to the “Dniester Republic” forces by the 14th Army.

- Snegur says that he would resign and lead a “national liberation movement” if a federation settlement is imposed on Moldova.

7 · In an interview with Le Monde, Kozyrev is asked whether Moldova’s Dniester region “would some day become part of Russia.” Kozyrev responded that he “would not rule that out.” He suggests that Moldova create a region with a special status and “very close links, privileged links, with Russia.”

8 · A majority of the Moldovan government resigns.

11 · Left-bank deputies, most of whom are Russian or Ukrainian, interrupt their parliamentary boycott to join their right-bank counterparts and vote for a list of six principles for a political settlement of the conflict in eastern Moldova. The points represent Chisinau’s views more closely than they do Tiraspol’s. In Tiraspol, leaders of the “Dniester Republic” reject any settlement short of “republican” status for the region. Meanwhile on an unofficial visit to Moscow, Smirnov calls on Russia to guarantee the would-be republic’s independence.

12 · In a report drafted by the quadripartite Joint Group of Military Observers, practically all ceasefire violations in eastern Moldova are blamed on “Dniester Republic” forces. The joint group is comprised of twenty-five officers each from Ukraine, Russia, Romania, and Moldova with each side rotating the chairmanship of the group.

18 · The “Dniester Republic” announces that former Deputy Chief of Staff of the 14th Army, Col. Stefan Kitsak, has been promoted to major-general, appointed “defense minister,” and formally been instructed to “form a Dniester army.” Kitsak is an ethnic Romanian, native to Northern Bukovina, and participated in the invasions of Hungary in 1956, Czechoslovakia in 1968, and Afghanistan in 1979.

19 · Dniester forces using APCs attack the lone remaining Moldovan police station in Bendery. In response, Moldovan police reinforcements and units of Moldova’s nascent army counterattack, seizing control of much of Bendery at the cost of five dead.

20 · In a cable to the Russian government, Snegur implores that it stop the 14th Army from intervening “against the defenders of the Republic of Moldova.” Snegur warns that any intervention “would mean that the Russian Federation is starting a war against Moldova.”

· In a surprise attack, spearheaded by “tanks and soldiers of the 14th Army,” Russian forces drive out Moldovan defenders from Bendery.

22 · Kravchuk shifts gears and calls for the breakaway “Dniester Republic” to be given the status of an autonomous republic within Moldova. Previously Kravchuk did not openly support the “Dniester Republic” separatist aspirations. But Snegur and Shevardnadze issue a joint communiqué that reads: “the NIS are faced with a recurrence of Russian imperial thinking” and that “conflicts develop precisely in the area where Russian troops are located.” “Russia supports authoritarian and neo-communist forces [within the republics], a course of action that endangers Russia itself.”

23 · Moldovan Foreign Ministry official warns instability in Trans-Dniester and lack of international support may force Chisinau to shift toward Romania, marking “the collapse of its policy of independence.”

· In an article in the Russian government’s Rossiiskaya

gazeta, Presidential Counselor Sergey Stankevich calls on the 14th Army to defend the Slavic minority, thus protecting “a thousand years of history [and] legitimate interests.”

- Snegur vows to resist the destruction of “our state ... by the Russian military, Cossacks, and mercenaries.... I will not be frightened and will not bow my head to the Russian leadership’s threats.” This last statement is in response to statements by Yeltsin and Ruskoy denouncing “Moldovan aggression” in the “Dniester Republic” region.

- Issuing an appeal to “governments, parliaments and peoples of the world,” the Moldovan parliament’s Presidium implores all states to help arrest “the armed aggression against Moldova.” The UN secretary-general responds by dispatching a three-member team to Moldova to ascertain the situation of human and ethnic rights in the republic.

24 · Russian military and government officials admit that soldiers of the 14th Army did participate in military operations against Moldovan forces on 20-21 June. Furthermore, officials report that whole battalions of 14th Army troops have been transferred to the “Dniester guard.” At this time however, the question of who gave the orders remains unclear.

- Senior Moldovan government and parliament officials refute “the myth concerning Moldova’s alleged desire to become part of Romania. That is completely untrue ... Moldovans want complete independence and freedom. At most 5 percent of our population have an interest in an association with Romania.... Moldova struggled for its independence and will never give it away to anyone.” The officials claim that “unification propaganda” originates from imperialistic Romanians and from Moscow’s “disinformation campaign designed to mislead Russians and justify outside intervention in Moldova.”

25 · The presidents of Russia, Moldova, Ukraine, and Romania meet in Istanbul and issue a communiqué on the conflict in Moldova. The communiqué calls for: (1) an immediate and unconditional ceasefire; (2) the neutrality of Russia’s 14th Army; (3) Russian-Moldovan talks on the status of the 14th Army and the terms of its withdrawal; and (4) a “political status” to be granted by Moldova to its eastern area.

27 · The Russian Foreign Ministry delivers Moldova a protest note over “the actions undertaken by Moldova’s forces in the Dniester area.” The note accuses Moldova of “using the most modern armaments,” “placing the 14th Army in a difficult situation,” and showing “a persistent unwillingness to look for a peaceful settlement of the problem.” Citing potential “highly adverse consequences for regional peace,” the Russian MFA warns that “the leadership of the Russian Federation cannot stand idly by” in the conflict. It demands that Moldova “not permit further bloodshed” and “enter into constructive negotiations for settling the situation around the Dniester region.”

28 · Moldova’s Foreign Ministry replies that the escalation of the conflict stems from the “Dniester Republic” use of tanks and artillery supplied by Russia’s 14th Army and that “Dniester Republic” forces were using those weapons to bombard localities remote from the area of conflict.

- Maj.-Gen. Aleksandr Lebed replaces Nekachev as commander of the 14th Army in Moldova. Lebed announces that the 14th Army will maintain a stance of "armed neutrality."

- Russian State Secretary Gennadiy Burbulis says that Russia is prepared to apply "economic sanctions" to force Moldova to agree to the creation of a "Dniester Republic." Indeed, Snegur expresses concern about Russia's "incipient economic blockade" of Moldova, including a slowdown in the delivery of goods as well as a toleration of the "Dniester Republic's" recent closure of a Russian gas pipeline to Moldova. Snegur states, however, that "we are not going to put up our hands in surrender."

29 · The UN fact-finding mission dispatched to Moldova is prevented from inspecting Bendery by Russian insurgents who open fire on the delegation, forcing the UN group along with accompanying Moldovan government officials and the U.S. envoy to Moldova to seek refuge in the last Moldovan-controlled police station in Bendery. The group remains under fire for three hours.

30 · Snegur nominates Andrey Sangheli as prime minister of Moldova, replacing Muravschi who resigned along with most of the cabinet on 8 June. Between late 1990 and early 1992, Sangheli chaired the conciliation commission which negotiated with the breakaway "Dniester Republic." In his acceptance speech, Sangheli pledges to actively seek a political settlement with the left-bank Russians.

1 · Lebed, in his first news conference, terms the rightbank city of Bendery “an inalienable part of the Dniester Republic” and “the Dniester Republic itself a small part of Russia.” He calls the CIS “an assemblage of abnormal states,” and considers that his appointment in Moldova “is connected to a massive shift in the policy of the Russian government.” One observer notes that the “Dniester Republic” could become “the ideal testing ground for the new policy.”

· In response to alleged Moldovan attacks, Russia’s acting Prime Minister Gaydar issues an order authorizing Russian forces to open fire in response to attacks.

3 · Yeltsin and Snegur meet in Moscow and agree in principle on the following sequence for settling the conflict: a ceasefire; creation of a demarcated corridor between the forces; introduction of "neutral" peacekeeping forces; granting of "political status" to the "Dniester Republic"; and finally, bilateral negotiations on withdrawing the 14th Army. Yeltsin agrees to resume normal shipments of goods to Moldova. The two presidents also establish a "hotline."

4 · Lebed criticizes Russia's policy of "going with an outstretched hand to the world's cabinets, instead of building up a great power capable of imposing its will." He calls for an end to "political blathering and begging for aid around the world." Lebed saves some venom for the Moldovan government, which he accuses of "committing genocide on the border of Moldova and the Dniester Republic."

6 · The CIS heads of state agree in principle to create joint peacekeeping forces and deploy them within the next few weeks to eastern Moldova. The forces, which may number between 2,000 and 10,000 soldiers, will be comprised of troops from Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, and Romania and Bulgaria-two non-CIS states. The Russian contingent will be over and above the 14th Army. Yeltsin states that Snegur requested the deployment. Moldova will cover the expenses borne by the peacekeeping troops.

7 · A formal ceasefire is signed by Moldova's defense minister, the "Dniester Republic" military commander, and the commander of the Russian Federation's land forces. The agreement provides for an immediate and unconditional ceasefire, the redeployment of all heavy weaponry, and the creation of trilateral monitoring groups.

9 · Russia's Supreme Soviet adopts a resolution advocating the use of the Russian army "to separate the parties in conflict before the CIS peacekeeping forces go into action." The resolution also proposes that Moldova's CSCE membership be challenged on the grounds that Moldova "has committed genocide."

- Just two days after the signing of the ceasefire agreement, the commission of Russian, Moldovan, and Dniester military observers found "Dniester Republic" forces in violation of the accord. Moldovan forces were found in full compliance.

- In his speech to the CSCE summit in Helsinki, Snegur calls for the use of CSCE peacekeeping mechanisms in Moldova. Moldovan officials signal that this appeal supersedes the earlier consent to the CIS plan.

11 · The CIS plan for deployment of CIS peacekeepers to Moldova collapses as Belarus, Romania, and Bulgaria all rescind pledges to participate and call for the use of CSCE mechanisms. Meanwhile, Russia fails to obtain a CSCE mandate for the peacekeeping operation in Moldova.

14 · The "Dniester Republic" Supreme Soviet refuses an offer from Chisinau to include four TDR representatives in the Moldovan government. Furthermore, left-bank deputies decide against returning to the Moldovan parliament. The Supreme Soviet calls on Russia and Ukraine to assume the functions of "protecting powers" and to represent the interests of the "Dniester Republic." Marakutsa further states that “the continuation of the war is the only real course in relations with Moldova.”

16 · Snegur appeals to all democratic forces in the CIS, warning against “nationalist-chauvinist forces still hoping to restore the empire. These forces threaten the independence of all newly independent states.”

21 · Yeltsin and Snegur sign an armistice agreement ending hostilities in eastern Moldova. Smirnov is present but does not sign. The agreement reiterates the provision that should Moldova’s statehood status change, the Dniester area would have the right to decide its own fate.

24 · The number of refugees fleeing from the left-bank conflict is estimated to be over 50,000.

29 · Peacekeeping forces, authorized by the 21 July armistice, begin taking up positions in the conflict zone. Russia contributes six battalions while Moldova and “Dniester Republic” forces provide three battalions each.

31 · Snegur appeals to UN Sec.-Gen. Boutros Boutros-Ghali to send a team of UN observers to oversee the implementation of the Russian-Moldovan convention of 3 July on the principles for peaceful settlement of the conflict in eastern Moldova. Snegur writes that “destructive forces” are violating the terms of the convention, “causing profound concern and raising doubts about the other sides’ sincerity.”

August 1992

4 · In an article critical of the Russian government for being too hesitant in aiding the insurgent “Dniester Republic,” the journal Sobesednik describes the aid so far rendered: “Aid is being given behind the scenes. Employees of Russia’s Ministry of Internal Affairs are serving in the Dniester Battalion, the OMON’s equivalent in the Dniester Republic. The Russian government pretends not to see when Russian factories sell firearms and military vehicles to Tiraspol written off as part of conversion. The Dniester banks are connected to the outside through accounts in the Russian Central Bank. Volunteers from Russia-and not only Cossacks-are fighting in various armed formations.”

· Describing the 14th Army as “local,” Lebed claims that “the Dniester people have a right to the army.” He also reiterates his recognition of”the Dniester Republic and the legal organs of power of this republic on whose territory the 14th Army is based.” Lebed sees three possibilities for the future of the “Dniester Republic”: either its accession to Russia (akin to Kaliningrad); in the event of Ukraine reuniting with Russia, the “Dniester Republic” could unite with this new state; or it should become independent but with close economic links to Ukraine and Russia. Lebed extends the scope of the “Dniester Republic” to also include any right-bank peoples who wish to secede from Moldova.

7 · In meetings with new Prime Minister Sangheli, Gaydar states that Russia is “satisfied with the new Moldovan government’s constructive approach to the whole range of issues in Russian-Moldovan relations, its moderation and realism, and the evident wish to work toward stability of the situation in the region.”

10 · Moldova observes a national day of mourning for the victims of the war. Snegur condemns “the senseless and barbaric war which has been imposed upon this peaceful land.” Meanwhile, the ceasefire holds and no casualties have been reported since 1 August.

11 · A Moldovan delegation led by Sangheli leaves for the United States. Moldovan officials will sign documents associated with Moldova's admission to the IMF and World Bank, and will seek U.S. private investment for the agricultural and food-processing sectors of the Moldovan economy.

12 · Moldovan and Russian delegates begin the first round of talks on "the status of Russia's troops [in Moldova] and a time-table for their withdrawal." The talks, mandated by the Sangheli-Gaydar communiqué of 7 August, will deal with both the 14th Army, based in Tiraspol, and the 300th paratroop regiment in Chisinau.

14 · Troop withdrawal talks adjourn. The Russian Foreign Ministry describes them as "preliminary and exploratory." The MFA announces that the talks covered "not only the status of Russian troops and their stage-by-stage withdrawal," but also "the prospects of military cooperation among the two states," which is necessitated by the "fundamental changes to the defense system of the former USSR that would result from the withdrawal of troops in that sector."

· Concomitant with the staging of a military parade in Tiraspol, Smirnov announces that the "Dniester Republic" intends to form its own army. Lebed further states that the 14th Army would assist in the undertaking.

19 · Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovskiy calls for reducing Moldova and the Baltic states "to the size of Liechtenstein" as part of a general change of borders in favor of Russia.

24 · The "Dniester Republic" Supreme Soviet debates a draft "law on languages" that would reimpose the Russian alphabet for the “Moldovan language” (i.e., Romanian). Moldovan schools in the left bank reinstated the Latin alphabet in 1989 and have resisted “Dniester Republic” authorities’ orders to switch to Cyrillic.

26 · Moldovan Ambassador to Russia, Petru Lucinschi, warns of “a situation on the Yugoslav model in which Moldova’s eastern area would be cut off” from the rest of the country. According to Lucinschi, the TDR forces are using the current ceasefire, coupled with the presence of the Russian peacekeepers, to consolidate their gains and strengthen their state.

September 1992

1 · Grachev issues written instructions to Lebed on “the impermissibility of [making] political statements.” This marks the second such request to Lebed. Ambassador Lucinschi complained to Grachev about Lebed’s recent statements calling the Moldovan government “fascist” and Lebed’s pledge of continued Russian support, including military assistance, to the TDR. According to Lucinschi, this type of rhetoric undermines Yeltsin’s policy, contravenes CIS commitments, fuels anti-Russian sentiment, and exacerbates “an explosive situation” in Moldova.

· Yeltsin and Snegur meet for the fourth time in two months. Yeltsin offers to serve as intermediary between Chisinau and Tiraspol concerning the political fate of the TDR. Snegur welcomes Yeltsin’s offer and confirms that Moldova is prepared to grant the right-bank city of Bendery the status of a free economic zone and to negotiate the political status of the left bank “provided that the territorial integrity of our state is maintained.”

2 · The TDR marks the second anniversary of the proclamation of the “Dniester Soviet Socialist Republic.” Smirnov tells the gathered crowd that “the republic has survived only thanks to Russia and the 14th Army.” Smirnov also announces that Russia agreed to provide 2 billion rubles of credit to Tiraspol for the purchase of foodstuffs.

· The aforementioned fear of a “Yugoslav scenario” in Moldova may have prompted officials there to assume a soft policy on the status of Russian troops. Lucinschi states that “unlike the Baltic states, Moldova does not insist on an immediate withdrawal of Russian troops and is prepared to reach agreement on the conditions of their temporary presence on Moldovan territory.”

· Snegur political adviser predicts that should Moldova not grant a political status to the TDR, “there will be a renewed conflict followed by a Russian economic blockade of Moldova, the deterioration of the Moldovan economy, and the threat of a political coup.” He admits “many of Moldova’s problems can only be resolved through Moscow’s mediation.”

8 · The TDR Supreme Soviet approves a language law requiring the use of the Russian alphabet for “all situations in which the Moldovan language is used.” The legislative body also officially approved the formation of the TDR air force consisting of “airplanes and helicopters based on its territory.” Some aircraft have already been turned over to the TDR by the 14th Army.

9 · A team of Moscow-based human rights observers from “Memorial” return from a fact-finding trip to Moldova and refute allegations that the Moldovan side had committed widespread abuses during the fighting.

11 · Tiraspol continues to develop state structures of its own. Smirnov signs a decree establishing “Dniester border guards,” subordinated to the newly formed “Dniester Ministry of National Security.” Tiraspol also boasts of creating the TDR's own banking system, fully separate from Moldova's.

- A CSCE fact-finding delegation assesses that the conflict in eastern Moldova is "a political, not an interethnic conflict." This assessment directly contradicts the claims of the Tiraspol and Moscow authorities who maintain that the conflict arose from ethnic discrimination against Russians in eastern Moldova.

- The TDR decides to establish a customs service, another in a series of steps, facilitated by the ceasefire and presence of Russian troops, toward establishing a fully functioning state apparatus in Tiraspol.

13 · Romania's Foreign Minister Adrian Nastase states that the question of unification with Moldova should be settled in and by Moldova, but regrets "we do not receive signals from [Chisinau]." He adds that Moldova must remain in Romania's "sphere of influence."

14 · TDR authorities announce their intention to introduce TDR citizenship. Not surprisingly, officials in Moldova express concern that the "presence of the peacekeeping forces is being used by the Tiraspol leaders to consolidate illegal state structures in the Dniester area."

16 · Marakutsa states that "Russia's support for the Dniester region is not only moral and political, but also material and military." He reports that he was recently received in Moscow by Yeltsin and Gaydar, where he learned that the Russian leadership planned to condition the 14th Army's withdrawal on Moldova's acceptance of a political status for the TDR. According to Marakutsa, the Russian government also pledged credits to Tiraspol and will soon conclude an economic agreement with the separatist region.

17 · The second round of bilateral troop withdrawal talks ends “without any results.” Lucinschi told the Russian delegation that Moldova would accept a 1994 target date for the withdrawal but the Russian delegation refused to discuss specific dates. Snegur assured the Russians that all 14th Army officers and NCOs would be welcome to join the Moldovan army. Snegur also urged that the Dniester leadership be involved in the talks since their acceptance of any deal is de facto required.

18 · Yeltsin promotes Lebed to Lieutenant-General.

30 · Snegur states that “Moldova’s independence is the choice of its people and no one has the right to conduct a policy opposing that choice.... The existence of a Moldovan independent state is in the interest of all its neighbors, including Romania.”

October 1992

1 · In an address to the United Nations’ General Assembly, Moldovan Foreign Minister Nicolae Tiu urges the United Nations to send ceasefire and human rights observers to the TDR, where “pro-communist imperial forces, the military-industrial complex, and the upper ranks of the ex- Soviet army have launched a veritable war.” Tiu supports a proposed UN resolution on the Russian troop withdrawal from the Baltic states and asks that the issue of Russian troops in Moldova be added to the debate.

2 · Colonel Stanislau Khazheev is appointed the TDR’s first “Minister of Defense.” Khazheev inherits 35,000 troops to comprise his forces, according to TDR estimates. These troops are being supplied by continuing arms procurement, according to Smirnov.

- On the occasion of the 200th anniversary of the founding of Tiraspol (ironically as a military settlement of the Russian empire) Kozyrev and Ruskoy both send congratulatory messages to the leaders of the TDR.

15 · Grachev states that the withdrawal of the 14th Army will only be possible when the conflict in the region is settled. He claims that 14th Army units are staffed by personnel from the region and that they would refuse to withdraw unless the conflict was over.

16 · Snegur outlines Moldova's policy on the "Dniester" question to a group of Russian journalists. Snegur maintains that Moldova will continue to resist its transformation into a "federation of republics" and the creation of a Dniester Republic with its own army and security apparatus. Chisinau is ready, Snegur continues, to grant Tiraspol "self-government" with political, economic, and cultural autonomy, but only within an "integral and indivisible" Moldova.

22 · Smirnov announces new conditions on negotiations with Moldova toward a settlement of the conflict, namely that Moldova must adhere to the CIS and the ruble zone. Smirnov reiterates Tiraspol's demand that Moldova become a confederation in which the TDR would have full-fledged state structures and its own armed forces.

25 · Moldova's Foreign Minister Tiu issues another appeal to UN Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali protesting Russia's "interference in the internal affairs" of Moldova "on the pretext of defending the rights of ethnic Russians." The message claims that Russia's policy exacerbates destabilizing trends in Moldova.

3 · Lebed denounces the Dniester leadership's proposals to Chisinau on the delimitation of powers which would in effect “confederalize” Moldova. Lebed terms this stance as “servile.” He further charges that the TDR leadership is becoming bureaucratized and was allowing its military force to “die a slow death.”

7 · The TDR celebrates the anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution with rallies and demonstrations. Smirnov praises Soviet achievements and chastises those who renounce them. The Dniester press agency comments that the “TDR’s very existence strengthens the political forces in Moscow that seek to restore a ‘Greater Russia.’ ” Leaflets distributed at the rallies proclaim that “Dniester’s struggle against Snegur” reflects a “determination to restore the USSR.”

9 · Snegur military adviser Nicolae Chirtoaca briefs NATO’s Political and Military Committees on the current situation in the TDR. Chirtoaca asks NATO to send observers to the region to monitor the implementation of the ceasefire accords and the troop withdrawal negotiations. Since Moldova agreed to accept a bilateral negotiating framework, under Russian economic and military pressures, Chisinau has sought to enlarge the framework and has made repeated appeals to the CSCE and the United Nations to involve themselves in the process.

14 · According to Moldovan presidential adviser Vaslu Malakhov, Kiev is concerned over the possible secession of the TDR from Moldova. Ukraine views the TDR as “a forward base for Russian aggression” and has concluded that its own interests require it to support Moldova’s territorial integrity.

16 · Novoe Vremya concludes, based on interviews with Moldovan officials, that Chisinau sees Austria’s relationship with Germany-two separate states despite the identity of the language as the model for Moldova's own relationship with Romania. The latest Moldovan opinion survey shows that only 9 percent of Moldovans desire reunification with Romania. The multiethnic composition of Moldova can help shape a Moldovan national consciousness distinct from the Romanian.

17 · On the occasion of the Russian army's "Conscript Day," Lebed addresses a gathering of local draftees who were conscripted into the 14th Army. Lebed instructs them to defend the Russian homeland and peace on the Dniester. It is reported that of the 1,500 new conscripts, 80 percent will serve in the 14th Army and 20 percent in the Dniester guard.

20 · The third round of negotiations on the withdrawal of the 14th Army ends at an impasse. The Russian side reportedly proposes disbanding the army and transferring its assets to the "local authorities" (i.e., the TDR). Chisinau rejects this proposal and protests against the continued transfer of 14th Army equipment and personnel to the TDR forces. Russia's chief delegate to the talks, Col.-Gen. Eduard Vorobev, causes a stir by warning that disputed issues will ultimately be "settled by Russia on its own." The Moldovans term this statement "yet another demonstration of disrespect for Moldova's independence and territorial integrity."

29 · The TDR security minister, hitherto known as Vadim Shevstsov, acknowledges that he is in fact Vladimir Antyufeev, a former high-ranking official of Soviet Latvia's KGB and OMON in Riga. He states that he and others of his ilk have been assigned "by Russian democratic forces" to beef up the TDR security forces. Antyufeev refutes allegations of corruption leveled against him by Col. Mikhail Bergman, military commander for Tiraspol. He also denies Bergman's charge that the State Secretary of the TDR, Valeriy Litskay, is a former KGB officer involved in corruption. The next day, however, Lebed appears at a press conference and produces Litskay's KGB personnel file. These events highlight the increasingly hostile relations between 14th Army officials and the TDR authorities.

December 1992

3 · Noting continued and intensified equipment and personnel transfers from the 14th Army to the TDR guard, Snegur's military adviser Chirtoaca states that the transfers may make any withdrawal agreement "symbolic and purely formal" because the army would simply undergo a new change from "Russian" to "Dniester." Chirtoaca reiterates that only participation by international organizations can lend credibility to the troop withdrawal negotiations.

· Moldova's delegate to the UN General Assembly's Third Committee, Vitalu Snegur, lambastes what he terms the "screen of silence" that has been drawn over the situation in the TDR. Snegur outlines the large-scale violations of human rights of the indigenous population by the TDR authorities. He lists: the banning of the Latin script; the reintroduction of Russian communist textbooks in place of Moldovan ones; the closure of Moldovan schools and universities; the elimination of all Moldovan language newspapers; the jamming of Chisinau radio and TV broadcasts; the introduction of conscription into the 14th Army; and the widespread purges and arrests of Moldovans who oppose the TDR. Snegur reiterates Moldova's plea for UN observers in the area.

7 · Snegur states that "with every passing day, from one meeting of the heads of [CIS member] states to the next, the desire of certain states' leaders to return to the organization of the former USSR is becoming increasingly apparent.”

1993

January 1993

3 · Mihai Gonta, chairman of Chisinau State University, writes “pro-imperial forces try by all means to keep their influence and even restore former political geography of the USSR under a new name: the CIS, confederation, joint economic space, and so on.” He says a referendum on independence would serve Russian interests, cooling relations between Moldova and Romania.

5 · Russian 14th Army Commander Lebed says Russia will open consular office in TDR, which will grant Russian citizenship to anyone who desires it.

· Lebed accuses United States of conducting “an imperialist policy vis—vis Russia and the TDR.” 7 · Snegur offers to grant TDR status of “self-governing territory” with a free economic zone. Smirnov insists on recognition of the TDR, that it have its own government and army, and enter into confederation with Moldova.

14 · Mircea Druc, chairman of the rump Popular Front and former prime minister, accuses some Moldovan politicians of aspiring to form a “Greater Moldova” (a union of Moldova with northern Romanian provinces). This area forms the historic Moldovan principality. Druc, who supports unification with all of Romania, moves his base of operations to Romania.

15 · Public opinion poll shows 46 percent feel Moldova is headed in wrong direction. A majority reject joining the CIS or Romania; 65 percent accept idea of referendum on Moldova's future and would support the "Republic of Moldova."

19 · Moldovan deputy minister of foreign trade outlines reasons why Moldova should not reunify with Romania: (a) new "economic center" would control investments, credits, and technical assistance; (b) Moldovans would be secondclass citizens; (c) "Trans-Dniestrian Republic" (TDR) probably would dissolve, alienating Russian citizens; (c) tensions would rise in Transylvania, making Romania a major source of primitive tension and chaos in Europe. He calls for consolidation of Moldovan statehood.

25 · Abkhaz delegation signs Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with "TDR"-the first known agreement between insurgent movements in CIS states, both reportedly supported by the Russian military.

· Commander of 14th Army, Lebed, advocates accession of TDR to Russia in arrangement similar to Finland and Tsarist Russia. This strongly implies that Moldova's independence is fleeting and he predicts the current Moldovan leadership will face criminal prosecution.

27 · Parliamentary presidium approves Snegur's proposal to call a referendum confirming the country's independence.

February 1993

4 · Petru Lucinschi is elected president of the Moldovan parliament. He stresses his immediate concerns are the settlement of the Dniester conflict and adopting a new constitution. Dniester parliamentary speaker Marakutsa describes Lucinschi as “bright, flexible, and cunning politician who can look for compromises.”

9 · Talks between Yeltsin and Snegur fail to produce agreement on withdrawal of 14th Army from Moldova.

Yeltsin insists on linking the withdrawal with the political status of Dniester area.

17 · In meetings with Dniester parliamentarians, Lucinschi reveals his government is prepared to make “major concessions and compromises” on the TDR’s status. He contends, however, that despite changes in Moldova’s parliament sure to increase settlement possibilities, meaningful dialogue between Chisinau and Tiraspol is prevented by Dniester leaders insisting on making Moldova a federal state.

6 · Moldovan Foreign Ministry issues a press release expressing concern over statements made by Yeltsin in February where he said the time is right for organizations with “international authority, including the United Nations, to offer Russia special power in her quality of guaranteeing the peace and security on the territory of the former USSR.” The statement highlights the fact that any state’s desire to act as peacemaker when not given a mandate by the state(s) concerned is inconsistent with international norms and rejects any attempt of interference in its domestic affairs.

9 · The Democratic Party of the Dniester region issues a statement condemning Russian “nationalists and pro-communists” for their role in the Dniester conflict. The statement claims such forces are to blame for the impasse in settlement talks and their continued activity is sure to prevent a peaceful and dignified resolution.

10 · Negotiations in Moscow between Chisinau and Tiraspol representatives agree only on the inviolability of Moldovan borders. Serious differences remain over the administrative-territorial division as Dniester insists on having republic status within a federated Moldova and that existing TDR power structures be kept largely intact.

20 · Settlement talks take a new level as Moldovan Parliamentary Chairman Petru Lucinschi and Prime Minister Andre Sangheli meet with Smirnov and Marakutsa in Chisinau. They continue discussions of the Dniester region's status and began to address socio-political and economic problems resulting from the conflict. The men informed journalists they agreed only to hold talks regularly and to prevent another escalation of fighting.

8 · In meetings with Swiss ambassador to Moldova, Snegur indicates his willingness to demilitarize the Dniester region and pledges his firm support to resolve the conflict "only by political means." He later discounts assertions that Moldova is equipping its armed forces with modern weaponry and is seeking close relations with NATO because they plan a new offensive, instead saying 1993 is the year for peacefully settling the conflict.

9 · A fourth round of talks takes place in Chisinau on the withdrawal of the 14th Army. Two main issues are discussed, one focusing on the legal status of the 14th Army troops and the other focusing on a timetable and conditions for withdrawal. The first is hindered by the fact that should the 14th Army's legal status be agreed to, it would constitute foreign troops on Moldova's territory against its will. This would have grave international implications. The second issue involves Russian insistence that a political settlement be reached before withdrawal, rejected by Moldova because such a plan leads to “political pressure on the Moldovan leadership for the adoption of decisions in the interests of separatists, anti-constitutional forces.” Fourteenth Army Commander Lebed voices his belief that troops should not withdraw until the socio-political situation levels and until the logistics of withdrawal are clarified. Says Lebed, the biggest problem “is that there is no place to go.”

15 · Moscow offers citizenship to all TDR inhabitants. Representatives of the Russian Embassy’s Consulting Section in Chisinau will begin providing the necessary services to all interested persons on 22 April.

17 · In a press conference, Moldovan Deputy Foreign Minister Ion Botnaru explains that Russia’s insistence on arriving at a political settlement before withdrawal of the 14th Army “provoke riddles and anxiety” and that such a condition was never envisioned by the quadripartite group. He declares Russia’s interest in settling the conflict through this mechanism has declined and that it is apparent Russia wants unilateral control over settlement talks and peacekeeping forces. Such being the case, Botnaru declares “we will endeavor to settle the situation in Dniester by three states-Romania, Ukraine, and Moldova.”

12 · Moldova signs a memorandum with CSCE Moldovan mission head Timothy Williams outlining the mission’s activity in settling the conflict. Involving the CSCE gives Moldova the opportunity to internationalize the conflict and to mitigate against Russian pressures to dominate the settlement process.

17 · Snegur endorses the Russian-dominated peacekeeping mechanism and the “linking issue,” both major concessions necessitated by the lack of international attention and support for Moldova.

3 · TDR leaders demand that Moldova rescind parts of the 1991 declaration of independence, join the CIS, and renounce its national army.

8 · Moldovan Defense Minister Creanga charges “the Russian side’s intention to resolve the whole range of military issues unilaterally is a serious flaw, reflecting contempt toward a small state and an erroneous assessment of the real situation in Moldova. Russia is of course a great state, but this does not entitle it to abuse its power and unilaterally resolve issues affecting this or that other state.”

10 · Marakutsa declares that Dniester has good relations with representatives of executive and legislative powers from Russia, and that it will permit the acquisition of fuel and cereals from Russia. He also states that Russia helps TDR by providing hard cash.

16 · Moldova’s Foreign Ministry rejects as “unacceptable under any circumstances” the proposals made by Yeltsin for establishing military bases in Moldova and other newly independent states under agreements with their governments.”

22 · Snegur states Moldova’s interest in creating a European collective security system under CSCE auspices based on NATO structures.

25 · Troop talks deadlock for the sixth time. Russia rejects Moldova’s proposal to invite CSCE observers to the session. Moldova “expressed more clearly its position” in refusing political conditions, called for troops to withdraw by the second half of 1994, rejected basing rights, and offered to build housing in Russia for 14th Army officers.

July 1993

5 · TDR leaders claim the Crimea, Donbass, and Odessa regions of Ukraine support them and believe their cooperation will lead to the formation of “Novorossiia.”

· Lucinschi observes that if Russia recognizes Moldova as a state, it ought to abide by “appropriate norms.” He criticizes Russia’s continued political and military involvement, arguing such a policy “violates all international rules.” He asks whether Russian policy seeks to help Moldova’s Russian minority through cultural and educational programs or “with the gun.” “We do not ask for much,” he says. “Only that we be respected as a state.”

9 · Moldova redoubles efforts to internationalize negotiations with Russia on the Dniester conflict and the 14th Army. Lucinschi says Moldova’s leadership wants UN and CSCE participation in resolving the conflict.

August 1993

3 · Yeltsin sends message to Snegur reemphasizing Russia’s commitment to the 21 July 1992 agreement. He indicates he wants to help negotiate a settlement “through Russia’s mediation,” something unacceptable to Chisinau because it places the TDR on equal footing with Moldova and lets Russia claim the role of arbitrator in Moldovan affairs.

5 · Moldovan parliament fails to ratify the CIS economic treaty.

9 · A walk-out by TDR delegates to the parliament results in the rump Popular Front-whose members comprise only 10 percent of the parliament-attaining veto power over legislation.

18 · For the second time in two months, a NATO delegation is visiting Moldova. The Moldovans asked for political support from NATO and its member states in securing the withdrawal of the 14th Army and for securing an independent and neutral Moldova. According to alliance spokesman, NATO is interested in stability in the region and seeks closer cooperation with Moldova, adding that Moldova needs a military to uphold its neutrality.

24 · Snegur complains to Yeltsin of activities by “reactionary forces in Russia working against Moldova’s independence and territorial integrity” by supporting the TDR. He urges Yeltsin to help “increase the level of confidence” in Russian-Moldovan relations and build “bilateral relations up to contemporary standards and free from prejudice.”

· Lebed says Moscow authorized him to execute certain political functions. “I have taken on, and strive to vigorously fulfill, the roles of peacekeeper, diplomat and neutral party. I have asked for some kind of diplomatic confirmation since I am simultaneously the commander, ambassador, adviserdelegate and military attache. This request has now been granted.”

27 · Lebed accepts to run for the TDR Supreme Soviet.

September 1993

3 · Hard-line Russians, including Viktor Alksnis, attend anniversary rallies for the TDR. They call for the restoration of the USSR and the prosecution of Yeltsin and other NIS leaders.

7 · Lebed says his army is based in “Dniester territory” and expressed confidence that he “will serve there for a long time to come.”

9 · A session of the Gagauz Supreme Soviet appeals to the CIS states to recognize the “Gagauz Republic” as an independent state and member of the CIS. They also resolve to hold a joint session of the Gagauz and Dniester Supreme Soviets to call for recognition and accession to the CIS political and economic agreements, adding more pressure for Moldova accede to the CIS.

10 · Moldovan government issues a statement accusing Russian deputies of encouraging secessionist tendencies in the Gagauz and Dniester areas. Such incitement is seen as an effort “to blackmail Moldova and keep it within the former empire’s zone.”

October 1993

8 · In a UN speech, Moldovan Foreign Minister Nicolae Tiu criticizes the presence of Russian troops on Moldovan territory, and accuses them of encouraging separatists of the Dniester Republic. He declares “we consider unacceptable Russia’s insistent proposals to be entrusted with a UN mandate for peacekeeping operations in conflict zones in the former USSR. It is clear that these efforts are aimed at justifying a continuing military presence on the territories of independent states. The final goal is obviously the revival of the former imperial structures with the blessing of the international community.”

13 · Moldova appeals to United Nations for support in troop removal.

15 · Lebed resigns his parliamentary seat in the Dniester Republic Supreme Soviet after receiving 88 percent of votes.

22 · Taking exception to a speech made at the UN by Moldova’s foreign minister, Russia issues a statement which claims that the troop talks are proceeding “constructively” and that no outside help is required or desired.

26 · Nicolae Andronica, chairman of the Moldovan parliament’s commission for legal affairs and chief delegate to talks with Tiraspol, indicates that an “autonomous formation” in TDR is “acceptable” and points to the Social Democrats’ proposals for a new constitution that “would not rule out a federal structure” for Moldova. Vice-chairman of the Agrarian Party (Moldova’s largest) says TDR should be granted “economic independence and local self-government” and urges that “we should not be afraid of words” such as “federation.”

27 · CSCE commends Moldovan leaders for their efforts to settle the armed conflict in the TDR. The CSCE promises to step up the organization’s activity in Moldova and will monitor the February parliamentary elections in which leftbank Moldovans may be prevented from participating.

November 1993

4 · Moldova accuses Russia of breeches in the ceasefire agreement. Specific complaints include (1) allowing penetration of additional forces into the security zone; (2) blocking inspection of suspected illegal arms stockpiles in Bendery; (3) tolerating aggressive picketing of the last Moldovan police station by TDR Russian communist groups.

8 · Moldovan President Snegur visits the left-bank area still belonging to Moldova. He vows the Trans-Dniester will never be given up and denounces “those who played the game of Russian reactionary circles and, through the force of the former Soviet army, created a phantom republic here.”

10 · The CSCE mission in Moldova is extended another six months. Snegur assures the mission chief Timothy Williams that Chisinau agrees on granting the TDR a special legal status “entailing a high degree of local self-government.” The CSCE mission has thus far been unable to facilitate the withdrawal of Russian troops and the brokering of a political settlement of the TDR conflict.

December 1993

16 · Russian Ambassador to Moldova Vladimir Plechko announces an agreement on the 14th Army’s withdrawal has been reached. The only issue remaining is the exact timing of the withdrawal. He says the army’s presence in the region has been a stabilizing factor.

1994

January 1994

14 · Moldova’s acting Foreign Minister Ion Botnaru rejects Russian proposals for dual citizenship for Russians in Moldova, stating that while it may be a stabilizing factor in Turkmenistan, it could “boomerang” elsewhere. He also urges that official Russian statements about Russians living abroad be “specific, not inflammatory.”

15 · Leaders of the Dniester Republic accuse Russian 14th Army commander General Lebed of starting a “civil war” in order to install a new leadership.

19 · The Dniester Republic’s President and Supreme Soviet announce a ban on participation of its residents in the upcoming Moldovan parliamentary elections, and declare a state of emergency. Meanwhile, Gen. Lebed continues his anti-corruption crusade against the “hard-line communist” Dniester leadership, who in turn asked for sanctions against Lebed. It is unclear whether Lebed has Moscow’s support.

20 · Smirnov and the Supreme Soviet on 19 January forbade the holding of Moldova’s parliamentary election in the territory under their control and declared a state of emergency until 1 March, banning public gatherings, imposing restrictions on the media, and stipulating criminal prosecution of persons engaged in electoral activities.

21 · Moldova’s Foreign Ministry requests in a diplomatic note that Moscow denounce a statement by Vladimir Zhirinovskiy calling for the 14th Army to remain in Moldova, and stating that the Dniester Republic would soon become part of Russia through political, diplomatic, economic, and military means. The note expresses concern that Zhirinovskiy, through such propaganda, could jeopardize negotiations concerning Russian troop withdrawal, as well as exacerbate the Dniester conflict and make a political settlement more difficult.

26 · Round eight of negotiations between the Russian and Moldovan governments on the 14th Army is postponed, allegedly because of Russian insistence on special political status for the region. Supreme Soviet Chairman of the “Dniester Republic” Marakutsa announces the same day that Moldova ought to be divided into a confederation of three states: rump-Moldova, Dniester, and Gagauz.

26 · In a press interview, Zosim Bodiu, chairman of the Executive Committee of the Agrarian Democratic Party, says his party will work toward turning Moldova into a “demilitarized zone.” The idea, contemplated until now only privately among the leadership of the Agrarian Democrats and some other political parties entails disbanding Moldova’s still nascent army and pledging the country’s neutrality.

28 · Ignoring objections of the pro-Romanian opposition, the Moldovan parliament’s Presidium approves Snegur’s proposal to call a referendum on the country’s independence. Labeled a “popular consultation” in an apparent reference to the 1991 referendums held in the Baltics, the poll will be conducted simultaneously with the anticipated legislative elections on 27 February. Snegur and the parliamentary majority had urged such a referendum since 1991 but earlier the pro-Romanian minority used its veto power.

February 1994

1 · Moldova’s acting foreign minister, Ion Botnaru, says that the CSCE plan for settling the Trans-Dniester conflict “has been examined and accepted at the highest level as the basis for negotiation.” The CSCE plan, endorsed by the CSCE meeting in Rome, proposes considerable autonomy for the “Dniester Republic.”

2 · Rossiyskie Vesti dismisses the notion that Gen. Lebed acted independent of Moscow when he unleashed the 14th Army on Moldova in 1992. This corroborates earlier statements to that effect by Yeltsin advisor Sergey Stankevich and other Russian officials. The article stated: “Only now, summing up all the facts, we have come to understand every step of that Army’s commander was authorized by the hierarchy of Russia’s Ministry of Defense.” Had the 14th Army pulled out of Moldova, it “would have meant incurring the anger of millions of compatriots and losing a valuable strategic outpost oriented toward the Balkans.”

· Russian-Moldovan troops remain in stalemate. However, General Lebed reportedly tells an officers’ assembly that the 14th Army is to be reorganized this year, either as a force based abroad or as an “operational group,” with Lebed still in command.

11 · Smirnov announces all travelers between the republic and rump-Moldova (as well as any other states) will have to pass through customs and checkpoints at their border. Dniestrian border troops will man the points.

16-17 · Russian Deputy Defense Minister Col.-Gen. Georgiy Kondratev, responsible for Russian peacekeeping troops, visits Russian troops in Moldova “to determine their needs.” He meets with the Russian-dominated armistice commission (composed of representatives from Trans- Dniester, Moldova, and Russia), and political and military leaders of the “Dniester Republic.” He concedes that peacekeepers cannot remain there forever, but he calls for Russian-Moldovan “military cooperation on a bilateral basis” and for giving Russia’s 14th Army the status of an “operational army group” with basing rights at Tiraspol and two other Moldovan cities.

20 · Senior Dniester Republic official Aleksandr Porozhan reveals that thirty new graduates of the Russian military academies in St. Petersburg and Moscow will be “returning” to Dubasari (in the Dniester Republic) soon. Moldovan Defense Ministry officials dismiss the idea that they were from Dubasari as a cover for an attempt to transfer the men to the Dniestrian military forces. Security officials in Tiraspol were reported to have said that forty officers from Russia’s revamped Ministry of National Security had joined the Dniestrian ministries of State Security and Internal Affairs, both of which already have on staff former KGB and MVD officers from Russia.

25 · President Snegur reiterates his acceptance of the CSCE plan for the conflict’s resolution. Plans are formulating which allow for maximum administrative autonomy for the “Dniester Republic,” but require a single constitution and single army for the whole country. Secessionists, however, demand full-scale statehood.

1 · Zavtra publishes a dialogue between leading Russian ultra-nationalists Aleksandr Nevzorov and Aleksandr Prokhanov. The two men describe the Dniester Republic as “our favorite child” and praise Lebed for having led the 14th Army in “masterful operations which threw out Romanians [i.e., Moldovans] from all their positions.”

· Yeltsin sends a letter to Smirnov outlining a political settlement. Particulars include: “a wide autonomy for the Dniester region as part of the Republic of Moldova”; a single army, security service, and financial system; a “role for Russia together with other countries” in guaranteeing the eventual settlement.

4 · In a press interview, Lebed states the 14th Army’s manpower level is at 85 percent of statutory level, high for the Russian military today. This is possible because of recruiting soldiers on contract both in Russia and locally. Local recruits become citizens of Russia and take the Russian military oath and pledge to obey Russian law, an act in blatant violation of international law.

17 · Yeltsin special envoy to Moldova Vladlen Vasev arrives in Chisinau to confer with Snegur and Smirnov. Vasev proposes a settlement guaranteeing Moldovan territorial integrity, but also granting the TDR considerable autonomy. Moscow has viewed the division of Moldova into two federated republics as consistent with preserving its territorial integrity.

· Yeltsin states that Russia will accept the CSCE settlement proposal, which Moldova already accepted. Chisinau remains concerned, however, that Russian troops encouraging Dniesterian separatism could delay settlement of the conflict and undermine the CSCE plan.

21 · Vasev says that “Russia has geostrategic interests in Moldova and also means to defend the Russian-speaking population.” This is the first such statement by a Russian official, and it is expected to be followed by increased pressure for military bases in Moldova. Moldova has rejected Russia’s use of the term “Russian-speakers” because it comprises 35 percent of Moldova's population, rather than the 13 percent who are ethnic Russians.

8 · The Moldovan parliament ratifies Moldova's membership in the CIS, with reservations, as well as accession to the economic union. The reservations were that Moldova would not participate in any military pacts or the ruble zone. The Trans-Dniestrian state secretary says that this would enable talks on the resolution of the conflict between Tiraspol and Chisinau to resume at a new level.

9 · Moldovan President Snegur and Trans-Dniestrian leader Igor Smirnov hold renewed talks on determining the legal status of Trans-Dniestria. The talks were moderated by the CSCE mission and Russia, and the basis of a proposed agreement is one prepared by the CSCE which clearly delineates the division of powers between Chisinau and Tiraspol, giving considerable autonomy to the latter.

28 · Snegur, Smirnov, Russian mediator Vladlen Vasev, and CSCE chief of mission in Chisinau sign political document providing for future negotiations on defining the future status of "Trans-Dniester Republic's statehood under law."

14 · Moldova's new foreign minister, Mihai Popov, says Moldova seeks to "cooperate with a democratic Russia which should see in Moldova a responsible and correct partner.... Any political and economic pressure should be excluded from this relationship. We do not accept statements suggesting that near abroad states must become satellites of Russia.”

18 · Press reports reveal the Russian side of troop withdrawal talks insists on securing basing rights for the 14th Army in Moldova. Lebed corroborates the report, indicating that to “persuade” Moldova to grant basing rights, it is not necessary to openly use force; economic measures are enough.

23 · The power struggle between Russia's 14th Army and the leadership of the self-styled republic continues as the army issued a statement revealing that the top leadership of the "Dniester Republic" applied for and received Russian Federation citizenship.

25 · Russian government blocks the shipment of "Dniester" rubles (printed in Russia's mint) despite a ruling by Russia's State Arbitration board authorizing release of the "Dniester Republic's" new currency. Smirnov indicates the delay causes a destabilizing economic situation in the republic. He lambastes the decision, charging that "certain circles in Russia and Moldova seek to blackmail the Dniester Republic into concessions on matters related to the withdrawal ... of the 14th Army."

8 · In a press interview, "Dniester Republic" Supreme Soviet chairman Grigoriy Marakutsa says Trans-Dniestria was "an inalienable part of the Russian state's southern region, [which] also includes Crimea, Odessa oblast, and a number of other [Ukrainian] oblasts, [and is] known as Novorossiia."

13 · Moldovan Foreign Minister Mihai Popov dispels notion that Chisinau resigned to a permanent 14th Army presence on Moldova's territory. He reasserts the 14th Army withdrawal from Moldova "without any linkage to any other issues."

· The commanding officers of the "Dniester" guards announce that if Russia and Moldova reach an accord on the withdrawal of the 14th Army, the "Dniester Republic” will claim all of the 14th Army’s equipment. The “Dniester Republic’s” Supreme Soviet passed an edict to this effect.

14 · Kozyrev says that “Russia clearly understands that there must be no foreign troops in a sovereign state,” but that a withdrawal of the 14th Army is “complicated” and will take time. Moldova’s foreign minister says that Russian troops were a “Soviet legacy” for which “Moldova does not blame Russia.”

21 · An international conference on peacekeeping in CIS states, organized by Russia’s State Duma and various Russian government ministries, was addressed by “Dniester Republic” President Igor Smirnov, who told a large Western audience that Russian peacekeeping in Moldova responded to the wishes of the conflicting parties and did not entail any political interference or pressure upon the parties.

23 · “Dniester Republic” President Igor Smirnov says the 14th Army’s reluctance to withdraw from Moldova rests on monetary, not patriotic considerations. Inordinately high pay and the relative low prices in the area combine to make 14th Army soldiers economically better off than their compatriots in Russia.

24 · Lebed says the “Dniester Republic” has no future with its current leadership and calls for early, comprehensive, and internationally monitored elections. According to Lebed, without significant political change, “the Trans-Dniestrian people will only be facing more disasters and finally Trans- Dniestria as a republic will decay from its roots with no external interference.”

12 · Troop withdrawal talks deadlock as the two sides disagree on linkage between the 14th Army's withdrawal and a political settlement for the "Dniester Republic." Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Sergey Krylov says withdrawal is being "impeded by the undefined nature of Trans-Dniester's status." The two sides did agree to initiate negotiations with Ukraine regarding the transit of 14th Army convoys through Ukraine in the event of a withdrawal settlement.

· Basapress reports "Dniester Republic" forces illegally occupy a military outpost in the right-bank (western Moldova) town of Bendery, the scene of major fighting in July 1992.

13 · The Joint Control Commission meets to address violations of the 1992 armistice. The Commission concludes that "Dniester Republic" forces repeatedly entered the security zone entrusted to Russian peacekeepers, set up border posts there, illegally stopped and checked Moldovan peacekeepers and vehicles on patrol, and blocked access to military observers on inspection.

16 · At an international conference on security in Central Europe held in Romania, Russian State Duma First Deputy Speaker Mikhail Mityukov, a member of Russia's Choice, says a settlement of the "Dniester" conflict must respect Moldova's sovereignty and integrity, while "granting to the Dniester region . . . state status." He says that the 14th Army guarantees peace in Moldova and that its withdrawal is a bilateral matter between Moldova and Russia.

27 · "Dniester" forces set up a "customs station" outside the right-bank city of Bendery to establish a “border” that would separate the “Dniester Republic” from the rest of Moldova. Representative of the Russian side of the Joint Control Commission says the Russian peacemaking command authorized the decision. An armed standoff ensued, but the Moldovan side withdrew. The Bendery “customs station” is the third of its kind established by “Dniester” forces on the right bank, a violation of the July 1992 armistice convention.

· Vladimir Solonar, the leader of Moldova’s Socialist Unity Bloc, the second largest parliamentary grouping, advocated the “unification [of the NIS] at least in the form of a confederation,” and the accession of Moldova to a “military-political union with the other republics of the CIS.” He defined the bloc as “pro-Union ... and pro-Russian because Russia would form the [confederation’s] center.... Russia is more than just the former RSFSR.... One way or another, our entire state was Russian.”

August 1994

3 · The 14th Army will undergo restructuring. Certain command structures would be dissolved, some personnel will be demobilized, and the reduced force will become an “operational group” of the 59th Motorized Infantry Division. The restructuring is to be completed by 1 September.

8 · Moscow’s announced intention to recall its peacekeeping forces from Moldova, placing Chisinau in the unenviable position of requesting that Russian troops remain in Moldova, temporarily. Unwilling to face the superior “Dniester” forces without a disengagement force, Moldova’s co-chairman of the Joint Control Commission, Maj.-Gen. Victor Catana, says that under the terms of the armistice, withdrawal of the peacekeeping force requires the consent of both antagonists.

- An assembly of 14th Army officers drafts a message to Grachev strongly urging Lebed be retained as commander of the 14th Army. According to the officers' assembly, "only the authority of Aleksandr Lebed can induce the officers and servicemen to fulfill their mission."

10 · Moldova and Russia initial an "agreement on the legal status, procedure, and timetable of the withdrawal of Russian military units temporarily located on the territory of Moldova." The announcement came during the tenth round of negotiations in Chisinau. The withdrawal is to be completed within three years and "will be synchronized with the political settlement of the Dniester conflict and the determination of the special status of the Dniester region of Moldova."

14 · Lebed attacks the 10 August troop withdrawal agreement and the decision to restructure the 14th Army. He warns that "Dniester Republic" authorities sit poised to commandeer arms and ammunition from army stockpiles, a move according to Lebed "guaranteed to destabilize the situation."

15 · Yeltsin effusively praises the 14th Army, Lebed in particular, for "defusing the conflict and halting violence in 1992" and for "controlling the situation" since the armistice was signed in July 1992. Yeltsin warned against "any hasty actions or decisions" that could serve to renew tensions in the region.

16 · According to a commentary in Krasnaya Zvezda, the "number one" advantage to the recently signed troop withdrawal agreement is that "it removes the poisonous accusations about Russia's alleged 'imperial ways' in keeping its army on the territory of sovereign Moldova without a legal status and allegedly refusing to withdraw it."

18 · Russian Defense Ministry officials say they do not doubt the 14th Army will be kept in Trans-Dniester but under a different name. Russian Federation Council Deputy Chairman, Valerian Viktorov, cautions it will take at least six months for the Russian government to "draft and sign" the agreement to withdraw the troops from Moldova.

23 · Khazeev says the breakaway region maintains an armed force of "no less than that of the 14th Army" in aggregate manpower (around 10,000). "Dniester" military doctrine and legislation, organization, and uniforms mirror Russia's, "otherwise it would be difficult to reunite with it."

· Lebed says that the cost of transporting the 14th Army's massive weapons stockpiles from Moldova to Russia would be prohibitive and predicts Russia would not pay for the withdrawal. Lebed believes that since Moldova also cannot pay for the withdrawal, "we should come to an agreement on the conditions for keeping the troops here."

26 · Grachev meets with Lebed, saying the 14th Army's structure will remain as is, less a 20 percent cut in the command staff. Lebed seemingly saved his job as commander of the 14th Army.

September 1994

7 · Russian officials continue to distance themselves from the 10 August troop withdrawal agreement. The deal, termed “idiotic” by Lebed, has met with near-constant criticism. Deputy Foreign Minister Sergey Krylov argues that because the issue of withdrawal was agreed upon and linked to a political solution in the Trans-Dniester, “the 14th Army’s presence in Moldova is therefore legitimate.” He praised Lebed and his minions for “stabilizing” the region.

17 · Moldova’s Helsinki Committee issues appeal to international organizations and human rights watch groups, decrying the state of human rights in the separatist Trans-Dniester region. The appeals note that Dniester authorities have embarked on a campaign of linguistic apartheid. Although Trans-Dniester's population is 40 percent Moldovan, 28 percent Ukrainian, and 25.5 percent Russian, only 20 percent of schools teach in Moldovan (and of those only three schools teach in Latin script). The state of Ukrainian language education is even more appalling-only 0.5 percent of the schools teach in Ukrainian, while 77 percent teach in Russian.

20 · Lebed's continued service as commander of the 14th Army gains unexpected support from Snegur. Snegur says Lebed "knows how to maintain order in the army. This is very important as the army has huge amounts of armaments which must not fall into the hands of separatists." Snegur welcomed Lebed's efforts to fight corruption in the breakaway region.

28 · Talks open in Tiraspol on establishing a "special status" for the separatist region within Moldova. Russian special envoy Vadim Vlasov predicts long and contentious discussions.

29 · Addressing the UN General Assembly, Snegur calls for international support to secure the removal of Russian troops from Moldova. He highlights Moldova's "geopolitical and cultural affiliation to the European democratic space" and voices concern that "isolation from that space would face us with the reemergence of those influences from which we have suffered in the recent past."

October 1994

7 · Moldovan officials accuse Russia of violating the 1992 armistice convention by unilaterally withdrawing a peacekeeping battalion from the security zone on the left bank, allowing TDR units to infiltrate other areas of the security zone. Chisinau fears that further reductions in the peacekeeping force would permit the heavily armed Dniester forces to launch “provocations” against Moldova, a pretext to keep the Russian 14th Army in Moldova as “stabilizers.”

12 · The status of the 10 August troop withdrawal agreement remains unclear following three days of talks between Moldovan and Russian officials in Chisinau. Editorial changes to the agreement appear to weaken the linkages sought by Russia between the troop withdrawal and a satisfactory political solution in the TDR.

November 1994

3 · Snegur reconfirms his position that the Army of Moldova and armed units of the Trans-Dniester should be subordinate to a single Moldovan command.

7 · Marakutsa states the Dniester region can coexist with Moldova as a single state within Moldova’s current borders if the eastern district receives a special juridical status.

11 · The Moldovan delegation within the joint control commission on resolving the conflict in Trans-Dniester says that it is against reducing the peacekeeping contingent in the region without coordinating the issue beforehand. Apparently, Russia is going to reduce its peacekeeping forces from four to two battalions before 19-28 November.

19 · Nicolae Chirtoaca, former presidential military counselor in Moldova, says Russia's decision to reduce peacekeeping forces in the Dniester conflict area might have unpredictable consequences. After signing the 14th Army's withdrawal agreement, a fragile balance was set in Dniester.

22 · Russia begins downsizing TDR peacekeeping forces. Four battalions of the 27th Motorized Infantry Division are to be replaced by two other battalions of the same division. The decision is explained by a relative stabilization in the region.

28 · Russian Deputy Defense Minister Col.-Gen. Georgiy Kondratev urges the 14th Army personnel to continue service in Trans-Dniester. He says that since no mechanism for withdrawal exists, the soldiers should engage in their planned activities.

January 1995

6 · Lebed tells a delegation of CIS MPs that, on the question of the 14th Army's withdrawal, "this would be General Lebed's departure, a briefcase in hand," while the rest of the troops would stay in Moldova because the army is mostly staffed with locals. Lt.-Gen. Lebed, the most popular officer in the Russian Army, has been an outspoken critic of the war in Chechnya. Lebed is regarded as a hero to soldiers because his actions give voice to the feelings of bitterness and betrayal in an army fallen on hard times since the Soviet empire's collapse. Although Lebed claims to have no presidential aspirations, "Russia's long history shows clearly that the ones who come out on top in political disputes are the ones who have the army on their sides," the newspaper Kommersant Daily observed.

· Valeriy Viktorov, deputy speaker of the Russian Federation Council, stated that the Russian-Moldovan agreement providing for the withdrawal of the 14th Army from the territory of Moldova within three years “has so far been producing more questions than answers.” The deputy speaker noted that a key obstacle to finalizing the agreement is the problem of transporting arms and equipment across the territory of Ukraine. Viktorov admitted that Lt.-Gen. Lebed has a very high prestige among the population of Trans- Dniester and is also respected by the Moldovan leadership.

· In Deputy Speaker Viktorov’s opinion, Moldova’s adherence to all CIS structures might facilitate the Dniester conflict settlement. He also said that the 14th Army’s transformation into a Russian military base “in principle, is not rejected by the Moldovan leadership, though it invokes Moldovan Constitutional provisions according to which on Moldovan territory no foreign military formation should be deployed.”

9 · According to Chisinau Radio, a special commission of the Russian Ministry of Defense will soon arrive in Tiraspol vested with the authority to dismiss Lt.-Gen. Lebed from his post as commander of the 14th Army. The dismissal would supposedly be in reaction to Lebed’s stern criticism of President Yeltsin’s policies in Chechnya. Asked what he will do if the commission dismisses him, Lebed said “Let them sack me and you will see what I will do.” Lt.-Gen. Lebed recently met with Ernest Muehlemann, Council of Europe rapporteur on Russia, where allegedly they spoke about the contingency of Russia’s acceptance into the Council of Europe on the withdrawal of the 14th Army from Moldova. Lebed’s comment was that the scheduling of such a withdrawal was the key, and that the key factor is that 90 percent of the army's forces consist of local inhabitants. The fate of these people must be "guaranteed."

12 · Moldovan Parliamentary Chairman Petru Lucinschi commented on the political integration of the CIS republics. He feels that the lawmaking synchronizing process within the Commonwealth, the proposal of a common CIS social charter, the strengthening of the Interparliamentary Assembly (IPA) to that of the European Parliament (in terms of dealing with the economy, budget, legal codes, and a resolution for the Dniester and Gagauz problems) would assure Moldova's integrity.

- Smirnov wants Russia and the OSCE to act as the guarantors of the non-use of force in a demilitarized zone in Moldova.

- The next Russian/Moldovan summit on the status of Trans-Dniester is scheduled for 15 February 1995.

13 · At the invitation of Moldova's parliament, a peacekeeping group of the CIS IPA, headed by Valeriy Viktorov, had a number of meetings connected with the problem of settling the Dniester conflict. The IPA's peacekeeping efforts have encompassed other "hot spots," including the Tajik-Afghan border, Abkhazia, and Karabakh. All this attests to the strengthening of the IPA's role within the CIS.

March 1995

14 · Moldova's Parliament Chairman Petr Lucinschi calls for removing arms and equipment belonging to Russia's 14th Army from the Dniester region before troops pull out. Lucinschi says that Tiraspol leaders' strong views on the region's special status conform with Moldova's constitution. Kishinev intends to ask the public to decide whether its peace plan is acceptable.

18 · In an interview with Sovetskaya Rossiya, Dniester's Security Minister Vadim Shevtsov states that Dniester is the object of a geopolitical struggle which includes Russia, the Baltics, and the Western states. He says the Dniester Republic complicates the plan for establishing the Black Sea-Baltic Confederation started by Poland's resident CIA officer in 1990. "Dniester leaders consider themselves Russians," says Shevtsov, "and we are defending the southern borders of the Slavic state. The separation of Ukrainians and Russians is nonsense and will end sometime soon." Shevtsov claims his republic's formation prevented Romania from swallowing up Moldova in 1992. He also claims that Moldova would have committed "genocide" against its 500,000 Russian-speaking people had the republic not been formed.

· Regarding the 14th Army, Shevtsov says Lt.-Gen. Lebed shrank the army from 10,500 to 3,500 and demoted it to a unit which guards military property yet to be sold. He goes on to defend the Dniester region's right to this property. He criticizes Lebed as an enemy of the current Dniester "president," Smirnov, who is preparing to dissolve the republic from within, doing Russia's bidding. He accuses Lebed of coming to Dniester in order to keep the 14th Army from joining with the people of the Dniester region, which he says was not Russia's plan. He denounces Lebed as a Russian government puppet, on a mission to preserve Russia's interests in the region while ignoring the interests of the Dniester people.

April 1995

4 · Russian Federation Council Speaker Vladimir Shumeyko calls for withdrawing Russia's 14th Army from the Dniester region, saying "the experience of the Chechen conflict shows that weapons should be urgently withdrawn from hot spots." Shumeyko says plans by Russian and Moldovan defense authorities already have a draft plan for the withdrawal.

17 · A European parliament delegation headed by Elisabeth Schrodter visits Moldova and the Trans-Dniester region. Schrodter says the 14th Army's withdrawal should be internationally monitored but, after meeting with Lt.-Gen. Lebed, receives the impression the withdrawal will not be a rapid one. Trans-Dniester leaders make clear to Schrodter their insistence on preserving the region as an independent state but would agree to a confederation with Moldova.

19 · Russian Lt.-Gen. Aleksandr Lebed says given the current economic and political situation, withdrawing the 14th Army from the Dniester region within three years is "impossible." In addition to the economic and political concerns, Lebed also notes the Army Withdrawal Agreement's provision to simultaneously settle the conflict and remove the army adds to the difficulties.

26 · Russia's State Duma adopts resolution opposing plans to remove the 14th Army from the Dniester region in Moldova, 267 to 0 with two abstentions. The resolution, although non-binding, says the troop pullout could increase tension in the region, noting the 14th Army was a strong stability factor.

28 · TDR parliamentary Speaker Marakutsa warns the Snegur initiative to constitutionally change the official Moldovan language to Romanian is sure to further complicate relations between Chisinau and Tiraspol. Snegur recently ruled out closer integration with Romania but his initiative reveals that pro-Romanian forces are influencing his policy decisions.

4 · Commentary continues over the consequences of the 14th Army reorganization and Lebed's imminent dismissal. Many believe tensions will increase should Lebed depart as army commander because he was instrumental in safeguarding the weapons and equipment garrisoned in the region. TDR activists under Smirnov, who claim the equipment belongs to them, are expected to take to the streets in support of their claims. Moldovan parliamentarian Nikolay Andronik says the army's withdrawal is a Russian matter damaging Russia's prestige, not Moldova's.

10 · In Victory Day rallies in Tiraspol, Smirnov urges Moldova and the TDR "to build their relationship the way equal-right states usually do.... The sooner Chisinau recognizes Dniester as a separate state," he says, "the sooner we restore relations in all spheres."

22 · Talks between Snegur and Smirnov are slated for 7 June. In meetings with State Duma CIS affairs committee chairman Konstantin Zatulin, Moldovan Prime Minister Andrei Sangheli says he believes the stage is set for the conflict's resolution and that a mechanism for the 14th Army's withdrawal will soon be found. He praises Lebed for his contribution in maintaining stability in the region and asks that he not be removed and commander.

23 · OSCE representatives arrive in Chisinau for settlement talks. Negotiations have been stalled since the parties disagree on two important elements: withdrawal of the 14th Army, which Tiraspol rejects because of possible destabilization; and subordination of TDR power structures to the TDR government, rejected by Chisinau as it implies statehood. According to Lebed, negotiations are futile and the only “machinery capable of solving any task is the 14th Army command.”

25 · Lebed reportedly tenders his resignation, which awaits Yeltsin’s signature, to Russian Defense Minister Grachev.

June 1995

2 · Fourteenth Army officers appeal in writing to Yeltsin not to dismiss Lebed and to impose a moratorium on further reductions in the army’s personnel. The note indicates rising pro-Romanian and anti-Tiraspol activities in Chisinau that may reignite armed conflict, especially in Lebed’s absence. This renewed fighting, the appeal warns, may spill into neighboring regions.

7 · Snegur and Smirnov meet in Snegur’s residence to discuss the TDR situation and a draft decree on special status for the TDR region. OSCE Chairman of the permanent mission in Moldova Mikheal Whitgent and Russian special envoy Laslo Kova attend the meeting. Snegur and Smirnov agree that talks thus far have served to eliminate a new outbreak of war but have done little for an actual settlement. Snegur also advances Moldova’s proposal, endorsed by the OSCE, for a special autonomous status of the TDR within a united Moldova. Smirnov counters with a proposal to first delineate responsibilities between Tiraspol and Chisinau and from there talk about the region’s legal status. Snegur rejects the proposal as unacceptable since it proceeds to build relations on an interstate basis. The two decide to continue talks in early July.

13 · Basapress in Chisinau reveals that a ranking Russian official in Moldova informs them that the current deployment of Russian peacekeepers in Trans-Dniester “would not be able to guard the 14th Army depositories should the need arise.” The informant says the peacekeeping force simply does not have the technical facilities for such a task.

16 · New Russian General of the 14th Army Valeriy Yevenich arrives in Trans-Dniester joined by Deputy Commander of Russian Land Forces Col.-Gen. Anatoliy. The two are forced to land 40 km outside Tiraspol as demonstrators, organized by the Union of Trans-Dniester Women, blocked the runway. (The group protested Lebed’s dismissal, and the disturbance was calmed only when Lebed arrived on the scene.) Yevenich is an ethnic Russian who has served in the armed forces since 1968. He graduated from the Ryazan Higher Airborne Command College in 1972 and from the General Staff Military Academy in 1992.

· Asked what type of advice he has for his successor, Lebed answers “No pieces of advice.” He does express anxiety over the massive arms and equipment cache garrisoned in the TDR, saying no political solution has yet been agreed to and that they are sure to be plundered by central Moldovan government forces and local TDR forces. He labels the region “a delayed time bomb” and praises the 14th Army’s efforts for saving thousands of lives. Regarding settlement, Lebed stands “for a legitimate, civilized solution of the problem,” vowing to continue his effort in the settlement process. Fourteenth Army officers lodge an official protest to the Russian Supreme Command over Lebed’s removal.

20 · Russian Defense Ministry officials tour the TDR region, meeting with junior and senior Russian troop officers. The ministry officials focused on determining who will protect Russian Federation citizens in the TDR and Moldova and on plans to prevent a Baltic-like situation where people divided up according to nationality after Russian troops withdrew.

21 · The Russian Duma passes a document imposing a moratorium on the Defense Ministry's decision to downgrade the 14th Army and withdraw heavily from Dniester until the conflict has been solved politically. Moldovan Foreign Affairs Ministry issues statement that the Duma's stance interferes in the internal affairs of a sovereign nation, accusing the body of hindering "the positive peace process backed by the international community, in particular the OSCE."

23 · In a press interview, Smirnov announces a document is now being prepared on governing interrelations between Tiraspol and Chisinau, predicting the document will be signed by Snegur and himself and that both republics' parliaments will approve the plan. He says the recent Duma decision (noted above) was "useless and did not change the situation."

26 · Grachev arrives in Tiraspol to examine the situation, meeting with Russian servicemen and their families regarding their fate. He meets later with Snegur in Chisinau to discuss the issue of Russian troops on Moldovan territory and what to do with the weapons and equipment. Grachev reminds Snegur of the emerging European security structure and Russia's role as a "stabilizing factor" in the region. He also stresses no staff reductions are envisioned before a political agreement is reached.

3 · In Chisinau, Snegur informs U.S. diplomats that OSCE efforts were successful in scheduling a new round of settlement talks “to continue in a constructive fashion.” Regarding Russian proposals for military bases in the republic, Snegur reiterates his republic’s constitutional banning of foreign military deployment on its territory. Further talks are scheduled for 5 July.

5 · Discussions between Snegur and Smirnov produce no political agreement. Nevertheless, the sides do approve a number of proposals regarding economic cooperation and pledges not to use force against one another or enter into alliances against one another. More complete settlement hinges on the political status of the TDR. TDR leaders demand the region be accorded statehood while Moldova agrees only to extensive autonomy within the framework of the Moldovan constitution, viewing the TDR proposal as counter to their constitution and to international practice. Both sides, however, encouraged Ukrainian participation in the settlement process, in negotiations and as part of international peacekeepers.

18 · In a conference with TDR leaders, public organization heads, industry managers, and media representatives, Smirnov again emphasizes talks between the TDR and Moldovan officials aimed at strengthening TDR statehood and securing recognition as an independent state by Chisinau.

20 · Yevnevich confirms destruction of 14th Army’s weaponry is being carried out. The destruction is taking place 25 km from the town of Rybnitsiy, where no disturbances to neighboring Ukraine would occur. Yevnevich also says that rumors regarding preparations for renewed fighting in the Trans-Dniester are unfounded. “The situation is calm,” he says. “Those who come here on a visit say it is a resort here. This is indeed true.”

31 · A Dniester representative announces the two sides have agreed on the legal status of the TDR. No details were released but the representative said the groundwork is being laid for a meeting between Snegur and Smirnov set for 13 September.

August 1995

2 · Smirnov addresses a meeting of TDR officials, saying the fact that the Russian peacekeepers are still here and have been for over three years “proves that the military clash was an open aggression on the behalf of Moldova.” He praises the agreement between Tiraspol and Chisinau on non-aggression and believes the TDR increased defense capabilities ensure the conflict will not reignite. As to a political solution, Smirnov remains adamant that “one way or another, Moldova will have to recognize our statehood.”

10 · In a press interview, Marakutsa warns that the internal political developments in Moldova may lead to a deterioration of the talks between the two sides. He refers to the collapse of the Moldovan Agrarian Party when Snegur and eleven parliamentary deputies left the party to create a new presidential party, Moldova’s Revival and Accord. The new group seems intent on continuing Moldovan-Romanian integration and further “Romanization” of Moldova. Marakutsa made clear the Tiraspol leadership categorically rejects such a move and this “will not promote settling the conflict in Trans-Dniester.”

17 · The Tiraspol City Council calls for the resignation of Marakutsa and Vyacheslav Zagryadskiy, chairman of the Dniester Republican Bank, for “being under the Moldovan leadership’s thumbs” by supporting the introduction of the Moldovan leu. TDR officials argue such a move would “in the final analysis, [mean] the absorption of Dniester by Moldova.”

September 1995

1 · In a press interview, Smirnov discusses the status of the Dniester Republic upon reaching its fifth year of independence. He says the remarkable thing is that the republic has been formed and is assuming the attribute of statehood. He acknowledges that the Dniester people are experiencing difficulty, just as all people in the FSU are, and to speak of achievements would be an exaggeration. He praises the fact that the republic was formed as a counterbalance to nationalism and that the TDR “guarantees everyone who lives here an opportunity to speak in their native language and rules out any interethnic conflict.” As to whether the TDR will survive in the face of economic and political isolation, Smirnov answers with an emphatic yes.

7 · Snegur continues to express optimism that a political solution will be found to the conflict which maintains Moldova’s territorial unity. In a press interview, he indicates the Moldovan leadership will be patient and persistent in talks with Tiraspol for as long as “necessary for them to comprehend that their intentions to found a confederation are fruitless.”

Summary at the End of 1995

Both leaders remain steadfast in their positions and no political solution seems possible in the near future. While fighting has been quelled for quite some time by Russian peacekeeping forces and the 14th Army armaments depots are effectively controlled, tensions remain. Ukraine has increasingly become involved in the settlement process (nearly 40 percent of the Dniester citizens are Ukrainian). Moreover, relations between the Chisinau and Tiraspol are governed by a series of bilateral agreements and protocols documented in the lines above and the Dniester Republic has not been recognized by any international institution or individual country. Snegur has repeatedly expressed the intent to grant the Dniester region the status of an autonomous republic within Moldova. Dniester leaders reject the idea and will settle for nothing less than the republic's complete sovereignty.

The Tajikistan Conflict

Background Note

The conflict in Tajikistan is more than an interethnic struggle between Slavs and Muslims, although a Muslim awakening did occur in the late 1980s, influenced by Gorbachev's policy of glasnost. Politically, the new awareness of the Muslims gave rise to the Islamic Renaissance Party (IRP), which holds broad appeal in rural parts of the country. The party's leadership claims not to be fundamentalist, although it has received financial and other assistance from fundamentalist Islamic groups in Afghanistan and Iran. As evidence of its secular persuasion, the IRP has called for a secular, democratic Tajikistani government, and its leaders formed an oppositionist coalition with leaders of the much smaller "Democratic Party"-composed mainly of a weak but vociferous Tajikistani intelligentsia. However, the real, underlying source of conflict in Tajikistan is a complex web of interclan rivalries, Muslim pretensions, and the external efforts of Uzbekistan and Russia to frustrate Tajikistan's emergence as a viable sovereign state.

Internally, the IRP-DP coalition opposes the ruling communist majority in Dushanbe, which has continued to hold power since the USSR's demise. The Tajikistani Communist Party, however, was never the ruling majority's main power base. The communists never managed to overshadow entirely the country's clan structure. The strongest clans, in fact, provided Tajikistan's communist leaders, often fighting among themselves for supremacy within the Communist Party. The 1990-91 movement by the Soviet republics toward greater political and economic autonomy led to the rise of one clan, the Khodjenti of Leninabad, to parliament and the presidency in the October 1991 elections.

In contrast, however, with the easy hold on power maintained by the communists of other post-Soviet Central Asian republics, Rakhmon Nabiev, one of the Khodjenti clan's leaders, faced strong opposition demonstrations by the IRP-DP anti-communist opposition coalition. To counter this coalition, Nabiev formed his own coalition government, which included democrats, Islamists, and others. Instead of producing peace, however, this volatile mixture led to the outbreak of fighting in May 1992 between Nabiev and the opposition.

In the ensuing unstable situation, the southern Kulyabi clan began to vie for more political power, ostensibly out of resentment of concessions Nabiev made to the Islamists. Kulyabi leader Sangak Safarov created a military organization with which to fight both Nabiev's government and the IRP-DP coalition forces, gaining the upper hand in late 1992. To complicate matters, external parties were involved. Saudi Arabia, Iran, and Pakistan were said to be sending aid to the Islamic Renaissance Party and Uzbekistan came to the aid of the Kulyabi clan. Further, because the government made a Muslim leader of the Pamiri clan acting President in September (in an attempt to mollify the IRP), the Kulyabis were able to accuse it (probably erroneously) of trying to install an Islamic regime. On gaining power in the 1992, however, the victorious Kulyabis abolished the office of President and appointed one of their leaders, Emomali Rakhmonov (who remains in power today), as head of both parliament and state. Thus, the Kulyabi clan prevailed over the Khodjenti, the Pamiris, and the opposition coalition.

Subsequently, other Muslim clans in the eastern and southeastern regions of Tajikistan began to fight the government. In self-defense, Dushanbe, joined by other Central Asian states, Uzbekistan in particular (and later Russia), pointed to the Islamic component of the opposition as justification for their intervention to support the communist elite.

Where does Russia come into all this? In 1992, Russia confined its interest to Russian border troops, which remained stationed in Tajikistan patrolling the Afghan border, and the 201st Motorized Infantry Division in Dushanbe afforded Russia quick access to Tajikistan's internal political affairs. Moreover, the CIS, under Marshal Shaposhnikov, attempted to tie Tajikistan into a "single CIS strategic space," conveniently neglecting to acknowledge the political sovereignty of the country.

Ironically, the Russians at first missed the Islamic content of the struggle, with democrat Evgeniy Ambartsumov, former Chairman of the State Duma's Foreign Affairs Committee, calling for Russian support of the IRP and its allies. In the summer of 1993, the situation underwent an abrupt change. At that time, fighters from Afghanistan crossed the border and killed more than twenty Russian border guards, which catalyzed a far more active Russian interest in Tajikistani affairs. Defense Minister Pavel Grachev flew to the country and Boris Yeltsin told Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev to coordinate a Russian policy on Tajikistan. A Russian-Tajik treaty was hastily drafted, signed, and ratified in a two-week period. Russia henceforth asserted the right to defend both the border and the entire region. The chronology that follows provides a clear sense of Russia's rapid takeover of Tajikistan's government, army, and territory. Boris Yeltsin was quite easily able to obtain approval for its hegemonic actions from other Central Asian countries by presenting the problem as the need to contain Muslim radicalism.

Uzbekistan, especially, favored Russia's intervention in Tajikistan and support for the pro-communist Tajikistani regime. Uzbekistani President Karimov understandably feared the spillover effect which could result if a democratic and Islamic-allied government were installed in Tajikistan. Karimov, in fact, was issuing warnings to international organizations such as the United Nations and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) about “Islamic fundamentalism” in Tajikistan as early as March 1992. Karimov’s position can partially be explained by the fact that Uzbekistan has a large Tajik minority, both republics having been formed from territory of Turkestan and Bukhara in the 1920s. For its part, Tajikistan has harbored strong resentment toward Uzbekistan for keeping the administratively and culturally important cities of Samarkand and Bukhara. Karimov hopes to silence the Islamic and secular opposition in both Tajikistan and Uzbekistan and to promote his agenda for a greater Turkestan. He made this agenda known when he invited the leaders of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan to a summit in Tashkent in January 1993, which resulted in the creation of a Commonwealth of Asian States.

It was partially in order to thwart Karimov's ambitions that Russia reasserted its interests in Central Asia in 1993. When Karimov tried to form a Central Asian Union in 1994, only Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan responded. Even then, Nazarbaev and Akaev sided clearly with the integration movement within the CIS, which was the opposite of Karimov's intentions.

In sum, the key developments set forth in the following chronology illustrate the timing and increasing intensity of Russia's peacekeeping operations in Tajikistan, which afford Russia a strategic regional outpost near both Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan in addition to giving it a favorable vantage point from which to involve itself in the affairs of Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Iran.

Chronology of Key Events

February 1992

7 · Tajik President Rakhmon Nabiev calls on all political parties and movements to unite and promote national concord, saying such action is necessary on the "eve of the anniversary of the February tragedy." Here, he refers to February 1990 riots in Dushanbe, sparked by rumors that Armenian refugees would receive housing before Tajiks. The incident triggered a wave of political factionalism and opposition activity.

- Nabiev meets with CIS border troop Commander-in-chief Kalinichenko to discuss securing Tajik border. Afghan mujahidin fighters continually attempt to cross into Tajik lands to support religiously-based opposition parties.

28 · Tajik Supreme Soviet prepares a constitutional amendment precluding the establishment of an Islamic theocracy in Tajikistan by parliamentary means. The Islamic Renaissance Party, legalized in 1991, has gained considerable influence in Tajik political and social life, especially in the south.

March 1992

18 · CSCE representatives arrive in Tajikistan to review its ability to uphold CSCE obligations. In meetings with opposition leaders, the CSCE delegates are told that human rights and international law standards are repeatedly being violated by the current regime, which is establishing anti-democratic rule.

22 · Demonstrations take place in Dushanbe against the “pro-communist dictatorship,” organized by the Democratic Party of Tajikistan and the Rastokhez Popular Movement; 1,500 to 2,000 participants are involved.

April 1992

2 · Demonstrations continue in Dushanbe. Opposition leaders demand the resignation of parliament leaders including chairman Safarali Kendzhaev, a new constitution, and elections for new parliamentarians on a multiparty basis. In talks with Nabiev, the opposition says that should “softened demands” not be met and political persecution continue, a National Congress of the Tajik people will form to challenge official bodies. Hundreds of thousands of Muslims are reportedly en route to Dushanbe in support of the opposition.

6 · The government of Tajikistan appeals to the demonstrators to return to their families and work. They note that all “economic and social aspects of life ... are in a severe crisis..., held hostage to political games.” The appeal says all issues should be resolved through peaceful means. Despite the call, opposition leaders only increase their demands on the government, adding a call for the resignation of Nabiev and his government. Rallies continue around the clock.

12 · Tajik Supreme Soviet decides to meet opposition demands. Presidium leaders and Parliament Chairman Kendzhaev will resign, drafting of a new constitution will be accelerated, and parliamentary elections will be held once the new constitution passes. Talks resume between opposition and government leaders, with many political observers noting that the conflict is near its end.

14 · As rallies continue, the opposition insists the Supreme Soviet convene to address its demands. Leaders of the Democratic Party, the Popular Movement Rastokhez, and the Islamic Renaissance Party send an appeal to the president and the parliament, declaring that if demands are not met swiftly, they will not be responsible for actions taken by rally participants. During the transaction, a column of armored personnel carriers passes through main streets, signaling impending armed conflict.

20 · Deputy head of the Islamic Renaissance Party issues ultimatum to Tajik parliament, giving the body until noon 21 April to meet its demands. Deputies refuse to accept the ultimatum but agree to hold talks with opposition leaders.

21-24 · Opposition leaders organize armed detachments and surround the Supreme Soviet building. Some deputies are taken hostage and armed protesters make their way to the front of the parliamentary building. Kendzhaev resigns and Nabiev says no protesters taking part in the hostage-taking will be prosecuted until after the 24th. Opposition leaders promise to end the rallies on the 24th and they do end because opposition leaders agree that the demands have been met.

23 · Nabiev appoints Kendzhaev Chairman of the National Security Committee. The Supreme Soviet announces no prosecution actions will be taken against rally participants.

25 · Tensions flare as new demonstrations in Dushanbe take place. Supporters of the government arrive from the Kulyab region, demanding Kendzhaev be reinstated and that the Supreme Soviet resolutions meeting opposition demands be abrogated. Opposition supporters again start to amass in the city, threatening serious conflict.

29 · Clashes break out in the southern region of Kulyab, a communist stronghold where government supporters dominate. Tajik Islamic leader Akbar Turadzhonzoda says communist supporters launched a campaign of open terror against his people and against Islamic Renaissance Party members. In Dushanbe, riots threaten as government supporters chant slogans such as “Down with Islam! Down with Democracy which split the Soviet Union!” and “Long live Safarali Kendzhaev!” Despite talks between opposition and government leaders, the country is on the brink of civil war.

May 1992

1 · Tajik parliament imposes presidential rule, giving Nabiev powers to control the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of the republic, powers to suspend all political parties and movements, and to impose a moratorium on rallies and demonstrations.

· Tajik parliament forms trilateral commission composed of government officials, opposition spokesmen and representatives of government support groups. The commission aims to prevent further deterioration of the situation and to work out a plan of national reconciliation.

2 · Nabiev issues a decree to form battalions and incorporate them in a special brigade. The Tajik Defense Committee is charged with organizing the battalion which, according to battalion commander Col. Burikhon Dzhabirov, will act as a national guard corps.

7 · Nabiev announces establishment of a National Reconciliation Government (NRG) involving current government leaders, opposition parties, and religious movements. The body will have broad powers and authority and pledges to ensure equal rights and political coexistence, denouncing further armed conflict. In a press interview, Nabiev says the main political figures of the NRG would form a “coalition council,” but declares “not to renounce the powers given to me by the people.” Government supporters and oppositionists continue their rallies, many becoming heavily armed. Clashes escalate.

14 · In a press interview, Tajik defense officials, noting mujahidin formations on the Tajik-Afghan border, reveal that CIS troops stationed in Tajikistan will assist in controlling the border situation. Intelligence reports indicate Tajik opposition fighters have appeared in Afghanistan in search of weapons and support.

June 1992

28 · Fighting continues in the Kurgan-Tyube oblast between supporters and opponents of the new coalition government. Rallies in Dushanbe, organized by the “united bloc of democratic forces” (the opposition parties included in the government coalition), demand Nabiev’s resignation, charging him with ineptitude. Opposition parties accuse Nabiev of holding talks in Khodzhent and Kulyab with former Vice-President Narzullo Dustov and former Supreme Soviet Chair Kendzhaev, both deposed in May and opposed to cooperating with the opposition. Nabiev denies the charges.

July 1992

8 · Amnesty is granted to participants in the April and May rallies that foreshadowed the conflict in Tajikistan.

27 · A peace agreement is signed by representatives of political parties, government, religious leaders, and security service representatives. The agreement commits signatories to exchange hostages, lift roadblocks, disband armed formations, and hand over illegal weapons by 3 August. Nabiev does not attend the signing ceremony.

2 · In a press conference, Tajik democratic leader Shodmon Yusup charges Russia with domestic interference and calls for the immediate withdrawal of Russian troops stationed in Tajikistan. Russia's 201st Motorized Infantry Division was involved in July fighting incidents in the Kurgan-Tyube oblast, but, according to Lt.-Col. Nikolay Surkin, the division maintains a neutral position. Says Surkin, CIS troops are the only real troops in the republic and have acted to separate the opposing sides and to confiscate weapons in accordance with the 27 July Khorog agreement.

4 · Tajik Deputy Prime Minister Usmon Davlat laments the fact that few firearms were surrendered when the date set to do so came on 3 August. Only 19 out of an estimated 17,000 firearms were turned into surrendering stations set up by officials. Despite this, Davlat says implementation of the Khorog agreement is "gaining momentum" since the arrival of commission members and opposition representatives to the conflict zones.

10 · The executive committee of the Kurgan-Tyube oblast, where fighting has been most intense, reports that over 300 people were killed and over 350 are missing as a result of June-July fighting.

19 · In televised address, Tajik Internal Affairs Minister Mamadaez Navzhuvanov says the Khorog agreement has failed, factions are amassing weapons, and deaths continue mounting-over 1,000 thus far. He says no paramilitary group intends to surrender weapons and that Commonwealth countries and Afghanistan illegally arm the warring sides. Tens of thousands of refugees have resulted.

26-28 · In a meeting with Tajik military experts, CIS Joint Armed Forces Commander-in-chief Shaposhnikov proposes introducing CIS “Blue Helmets” into Tajikistan. He says such troops could be successful at disengaging combatants after a ceasefire agreement. Shaposhnikov will tour the conflict zones over the next few days. On the 28th, he signed agreements with Nabiev to deploy military forces where the political situation is most tense.

September 1992

1 · Military observers from the CIS states of Russia, Kazakhstan, and Kyrgyzstan arrive in Dushanbe, headed by Russian General Shamilov. Speaking to journalists, Shamilov says the group will take ten days to assess the situation in the various conflict zones, stressing the group will not take sides.

7 · Cornered by opposition forces at the Dushanbe airport, Nabiev resigns as president “with aim of further stabilizing the situation and ending the fratricide.” Presidential powers were transferred to Supreme Soviet Chairman Akbarsho Iskandarov.

8 · In a press interview, Uzbek President Islam Karimov speaks of the dangers for Uzbekistan caused by the Tajik civil war. He laments that the Afghan-Tajik border is virtually non-existent, that weapons and drugs are constantly transported across it, and that the country is entirely in the hands of fundamentalists-an alarming development. He expresses deep concern for the 1.3 million Uzbeks living in Tajikistan.

10 · One thousand troops arrive from the republics of Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Russia to assist in controlling the Tajik-Afghan 2,000-kilometer border zone. Border violations have significantly increased over the last few months as combatants search for weapons, supplies, and training grounds.

9 · The Bishkek CIS summit fails to produce an agreement on sending peacekeeping forces to Tajikistan.

14 · Preparations to send Kyrgyz peacekeeping troops into Tajikistan are suspended as the Kyrgyz Supreme Soviet votes to cancel the contingent, fearing for the safety of Kyrgyz servicemen.

25 · Rebel forces control Dushanbe briefly but are driven out by government forces. While the rebels control broadcasting facilities, former Supreme Soviet Chairman Safarali Kendzhaev, an ally of Nabiev's, claims himself President, and appeals to non-Tajiks not to leave, denouncing the "Islamic fundamentalism" of the current leadership. During the attack, Russian troops in Dushanbe remain neutral, but retain control of the airport and main railway stations.

November 1992

10 · Acting President Akbarsho Iskandarov and his coalition government resign, calling for a ceasefire as pro-communist militias lay siege to Dushanbe and occupy much of Tajikistan. Iskandarov said that he was resigning to save the country from destruction.

19 · The Supreme Soviet elects Emomali Rakhmonov, a former communist and chairman of the executive committee in the southern Kulyab region, as speaker of parliament (the de facto president).

26 · Parliament exempts conflict participants from criminal prosecution and decides to mark 26 November as an annual Day of Peace. Communist militias lift the blockade of Dushanbe and open the road between the capital and Kurgan- Tyube region.

8 · Deputy Commander-in-chief of CIS armed forces Col.-Gen. Boris Pyankov says up to 5,000 CIS peacekeeping troops will be deployed to Tajikistan as heavy fighting continues despite the ceasefire.

December 1992

10 · After five days of fighting, pro-government forces take control of the capital.

12 · The former communist Emomali Rakhmonov, chairman of the Tajik Supreme Soviet since the collapse of a pro-Islamic coalition government (in November), opens peace talks with Islamic opposition forces. However, continuing heavy fighting is reported near Kafarnihan, the Islamic forces headquarters 25 km east of the capital, and fighting also continues in Dushanbe.

15 · More than 100,000 refugees are stranded on the banks of the Oxus River, between Tajikistan and Afghanistan. People are dying of cold in the freezing conditions. Some 5,000 people a day are entering Afghanistan, braving an icy river crossing. The fighting displaces 10 percent of the republic's 5,000,000 people.

20 · Government forces take Kafarnihan after three days of heavy fighting. Clashes continue when opposition forces retreat.

January 1993

4 · Tajik and Uzbek leaders meet for the first time to discuss Tajik conflict.

8 · A state of emergency is declared. Russia's 201st Motorized Infantry Division is activated, and curfews imposed.

9 · Relative calm results from the introduction of a curfew.

· CIS states send food aid to mountainous areas of Tajikistan, where people are dying of malnutrition (Pamir, Garm).

12 · Tajik leader Emomali Rakhmonov meets with Russian Border Troops Command staff to discuss provision of Russian troops and matériel. He says he sees Russian troops in Tajikistan as a “stabilizing factor” for CIS southern border.

21 · Unofficial talks between Yeltsin and Rakhmonov end with Russian promises to provide food, medicine, and fuel and 200 billion rubles in technical credits.

22 · The United Nations announces it will provide $20 million in humanitarian aid to Tajikistan; $1 million is earmarked for housing the 40,000 refugees in the region.

· CIS Minsk summit resolves to send four battalions of Commonwealth peacekeeping forces (mostly Russian) to Tajikistan in order to patrol the Afghan border. Rakhmonov welcomes the decision, saying it would demonstrate “Tajikistan is not alone and all CIS countries are working together to protect the borders.”

25 · Tajik government troops attack last centers of armed opposition (Romit Gorge-70 km from Dushanbe). The government hopes to quell all opposition before CIS peacekeeping forces move in.

26 · UN representatives visit Tajikistan, expressing support for CIS Minsk summit decision to send peacekeeping forces to end the conflict.

- Russian border guard units go on alert due to planned oppositionist attacks from Afghanistan.

27 · Foreign Minister Rashid Alimov receives U.S. Ambassador to Tajikistan Stanley Escudero to discuss bilateral relations. Escudero reports that aid will arrive in next few days.

- High-ranking officers from Supreme Command of the CIS Joint Armed Forces, headed by First Deputy Chief Vladimir Krivonogikh, visit Tajikistan to assist with organization of the Tajikistan Ministry of Defense and creation of a national Tajik Army.

29 · A state of emergency is declared along the Afghan border.

February 1993

4 · In Dushanbe, Grachev holds a talk with Rakhmonov, saying thirty-one representatives of the Russian Defense Ministry will remain in Tajikistan to help form a local army. He emphasizes that in keeping with the CIS collective security treaty, Tajikistan should be included in the joint air defense system. The Russian 201st Division will also remain in Tajikistan and will be under Russia's command. In an address to the Russian troops, Grachev declares that the region is strategically important to Moscow, and that the Russian troops serve as a bulwark against Islamic fundamentalism.

21 · Government forces retake Romit Gorge and open up access to the Pamir region by gaining control of Garm, Komsomolabad, Novabad, and Tajikabad. Government forces also capture the strategic rebel stronghold of Tavildara, 200 km east of Dushanbe.

March 1993

3 · CIS peacekeeping forces from Kyrgyzstan arrive in Tajikistan and are stationed on the Tajik-Afghan border. Uzbekistan has already delivered a battalion, and troops from Russia and Kazakhstan are expected soon. Each battalion consists of 500 soldiers.

12 · Three hundred thousand persons who became refugees during the Tajik civil war are reported to have returned to their homes. The conservative government in Dushanbe is using the refugees' return as a measure of the normalization achieved in Tajikistan.

30 · Kyrgyzstan withdraws its battalion of 500 border troops from Tajikistan.

2 · According to the National Security Council, there are about 500 Afghan mujahidin on Tajik territory waiting for orders from the opposition to begin combat operations.

4 · Opposition militants constantly try to invade Tajikistan from Afghanistan but are stopped by border guards. The Tajikistan Foreign Ministry protests to Afghanistan, saying that this is “giving reasons to doubt the sincerity of the repeated assurances by the leadership of Afghanistan that it would take all necessary measures to prevent such acts.”

15 · To slow migration of the Russian-speaking population out of Tajikistan, the leadership considers revising the law on the state language to give Russian equal status with Tajik.

27 · Kozyrev describes Tajikistan as a region of particular interest for the Russian Federation because of the presence of a Russian-speaking population of more than 200,000. (Many of the Russian speakers have fled to escape the civil war, but large-scale out-migration of the Russian-speaking population had begun already in 1990.)

18 · UN experts are prepared to help Tajikistan draw up a new constitution and to help draft laws on elections and other legal documents.

25 · Yeltsin and Rakhmonov sign a treaty on friendship, cooperation, and military assistance plus seven other agreements on economic, scientific, and technical cooperation and on the status of Russian frontier troops in Tajikistan.

28 · Talks between the official Tajik authorities and leaders of military formations of the Gorno-Badakhshan autonomous region in the Pamirs take place. The Pamir delegation advances the terms on which the opposition is ready to end resistance. They include: strict observance of the Tajik Supreme Soviet's amnesty decree, which, in their opinion, is not always honored; the organized return of refugees from the Pamirs and their guaranteed personal safety in places of permanent residence; the reorganization of so-called Pamir self-defense detachments into government battalions of the national army and the interior ministry; and the quick opening of the Osh-Khorog humanitarian corridor.

29 · Afghan and Tajik rebels attack a Russian border post.

June 1993

3 · Units of the Tajik Ministry of Internal Affairs reinforce the Tajik-Afghan border due to renewed threats of military provocations by Tajik opposition formations based along the border.

8 · The Afghan army has been actively organizing and arming Tajik opposition forces. Tajikistan warns that such actions are fraught with serious consequences, and reserves the right to involve CIS collective security treaty members in combating the Afghans.

21 · CIS troops in Tajikistan shell the border areas in Afghanistan's Qunduz province. The attack reportedly causes heavy loss of life. CIS forces have been frustrated in their attempts to stop the insurgents without attacking the rebels' bases in Afghanistan.

July 1993

10 · Rakhmonov announces creation of a multilateral commission with representatives from Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, Russia, and Afghanistan to deal with the Tajik-Afghan border situation.

15 · The Russian parliament approves a Foreign Ministry order to take "all necessary measures to protect and ensure the safety" of Russian border guards in Tajikistan. It also ratifies a treaty with Tajikistan signed on 5 May 1993 creating a legal basis for Russian troops to engage in combat operations. Citing “a threat to the national security of the Russian Federation,” Yeltsin threatens unilateral action if parliament does not act quickly. Deputy Defense Minister Konstantin Kobets implies that Russian forces, now authorized to use aircraft and missiles, might attack bases in Afghanistan; he says that Russian troops would take action on the entire territory of the conflict, acknowledging that “most of the weapon stockpiles and terrorist training camps are in Afghanistan.”

16 · Grachev and a high military delegation tour Tajikistan and the border area where twenty-four Russian soldiers were killed on 13 July. Calling the cross-border attacks “an undeclared war against Russia,” he promises to punish those who led the attack and to strengthen Russian forces in Tajikistan. Tajik and Russian military officials criticize other CIS leaders, especially in Central Asia, for not contributing enough.

21 · Saber-rattling over the Tajik-Afghan border crisis continues. The Chief-of-Staff of the Russian Security Ministry Viktor Barannikov states that “the border guards have received an order to open fire... even across the border,” and underlines that Russian troops have “the moral right to raid Afghan territory if violations of the border do not stop.” Emotional debates are going on in the Russian and Kazakh parliaments over their respective roles in Tajikistan, with some deputies in both states expressing fears of repeating the Soviet experience in Afghanistan.

31 · Kazakh President Nazarbaev states his support for proposals which call for the use of UN observers, and appeals to the leaders of Pakistan, Iran, Afghanistan, Turkey, and Saudi Arabia to formulate a solution for peace.

August 1993

1 · The Russian government issues a threat to launch a preemptive strike on the Tajik-Afghan border if Tajik opposition forces and their Afghan supporters continue to concentrate along the Afghan side of the border.

· Evgeniy Primakov, acting as special envoy for Yeltsin, meets with Iranian leaders in Tehran to discuss the ongoing crisis on the Tajik-Afghan border. The two nations agree the crisis should be resolved by negotiations between the government and the opposition. In Tajikistan, Primakov emphasizes the importance of Iran's role in negotiations.

4 · According to Kozyrev, Russia's national interests dictate that it play a forceful role in Tajikistan. Russia's presence there is aimed at preventing the renewal of civil war, providing security for the multinational population there, developing Tajik democracy, and ensuring that the entire region does not fall prey to political extremism.

5 · Tajik Deputy Prime Minister Abdujalil Samadov states that Tajikistan's government refuses to accede to Kozyrev's appeal that it negotiate with opposition leaders in order to end the fighting in Tajikistan.

7 · The Kazakh, Kyrgyz, and Tajik heads of state meet with Yeltsin to seek a solution to the Tajik-Afghan border conflict. The participants decide to increase the number of troops guarding the border; to increase humanitarian, military, and economic aid to Tajikistan; and to retaliate if outside attacks on the border continue. The declaration also calls for a political solution to the conflict.

15 · The foreign ministers of Tajikistan and Afghanistan conclude several days of negotiations with a communiqué in which the Afghans say they will try to stop attacks on Tajikistan from Afghani territory, and the Tajiks say they would not allow attacks on Afghanistan except in cases of self-defense.

September 1993

9 · Kozyrev meets with Tajik leaders in Dushanbe after telling the press that Russia is to send several thousand more troops to the area to reinforce the approximately 15,000 that are already there. He urges the leadership to begin a dialogue with the armed opposition which has set up a government-in-exile just across the border in Afghanistan. The Tajik foreign minister says that he would have nothing to do with those “criminals.”

October 1993

5 · Kazakh Foreign Minister Tuleitai Suleymenov asks the United Nations to formally recognize the CIS peacekeeping troops guarding the Tajik-Afghan border as UN peacekeeping forces. These troops currently comprise units from Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, and Uzbekistan.

22 · The commander-in-chief of the CIS peacekeeping forces, Boris Pyankov, meets with leaders of the self-ruled Gorno-Badakhshan region in the Pamir mountains, urging them to cooperate with the CIS forces’ leadership.

25 · CIS coalition forces in Tajikistan inflict their first assault on what they refer to as the “Islamic opposition.” It is a combined air and artillery strike on guerrillas as they attempt to cross the border from Afghanistan.

26 · The government of Tajikistan regains control of Dushanbe from opposition fighters from Kulyab.

November 1993

5 · The Tajik-Afghan border is cited as the most difficult hot spot in the CIS. The opposition is reportedly regrouping on the Afghan side for operations in the winter.

9 · The heads of the security agencies of Tajikistan, Russia, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan meet to discuss setting up a joint force to protect the Tajik-Afghan border and normalize the situation in Afghanistan. The agreement differs from an earlier one signed by them in that it refers to interference in Tajikistan's internal affairs.

16 · CIS joint peacekeeping forces launch war games in Tajikistan to test their combat capabilities in mountain and desert terrain. Military sources say that the training is in preparation for a potential full-scale invasion of Tajikistan by the opposition rebels training in Afghanistan.

18 · Kozyrev, spending two days in Dushanbe, signs a treaty of friendship and cooperation with Tajikistan. Kozyrev announces his satisfaction with the talks with the Tajik government on the stabilization of the conflict and the securing of the Tajik-Afghan border.

December 1993

6 · Tajik First Deputy Supreme Soviet Chairman Abdumadzhid Dostiev states that Tajikistan's leadership has not and does not intend to negotiate with the armed Tajik opposition because the opposition has no support within the country.

15 · The head of Russia's border troops states that CIS peacekeeping forces in Tajikistan may need strengthening before the spring, when they expect renewed attacks. He also suggests that it may be in Russia's interest to extend the CIS agreement, to provide military support to the Tajik government, which is due to expire at the end of December.

22 · The commander of CIS forces in Tajikistan, Russian General Boris Pyankov, states that troop reinforcements will not be needed, but that earlier CIS resolutions calling for troops from Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan have not yet been met and are needed. The question of whether to put these troops under the control of the CSCE or the United Nations has not been resolved, partly because the United States raises the question of Russia's ability to remain neutral as a peacekeeping force.

21 · Tajik Islamic Renaissance Party chairman Muhammadsharif Himmatzoda says his party is now willing to share power with the present "neo-communist" government. He says continued fighting only plays into the hands of Russian national extremists.

January 1994

4 · A Russian Orthodox priest is killed shortly after conducting a service for members of Russia's 201st Motorized Infantry Division, the core of the CIS peacekeeping troops in Tajikistan. Tajik authorities report that the killing is in connection with a robbery.

12 · The Supreme Council Presidium of Tajikistan extends the state of emergency for six months.

14 · The foreign ministers of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, and Russia meet in Dushanbe to discuss the situation in Tajikistan, where they have all committed troops.

· Tajik Foreign Minister Rashid Alimov reports that the Tajik government has requested the UN Security Council to recognize CIS troops on its soil as a UN peacekeeping force.

24 · The CIS military command holds its first set of joint exercises in Tajikistan not far from the border with Afghanistan. Press reports that the exercises included mock attack aircraft, tanks, and helicopters, which is unusual because the primary threat in the area comes from Tajik rebels who do not have air and armor support.

6 · Rakhmonov concludes two days of talks with top Russian leaders in Moscow. According to the communique issued at the end of the visit, the alleviation of Tajikistan's severe economic crisis and a resolution of the Tajik civil war dominated the agenda. Rakhmonov urges accelerating the unification of the Russian and Tajik monetary systems.

7 · Russia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs issues a warning that Russia will use any necessary measures to secure the Tajik-Afghan border. Russia accuses the Tajik Islamic opposition of planning a spring offensive.

31 · A lieutenant-colonel of the Russian border guards in Tajikistan is killed in Dushanbe. Not long afterward, three more Russian officers are found dead. The rash of killing may be related to the forthcoming peace talks in Tehran. While certain Tajik officials may seek to derail the talks, others in the Tajik government want Russia to take a harder line against the Tajik opposition, which, not surprisingly was blamed for the deaths.

6 · The number of Russian officers killed in Tajikistan in the last ten days rises to seven. Russian officials say the attacks are an attempt to undermine Russia's commitment to stay in Tajikistan. The Tajik opposition in exile rejects charges that it was responsible for the killings, blaming instead those "forces which are not interested in resolving the conflict peacefully." The opposition also calls on Russia to adopt a more neutral stance, otherwise its legitimacy as mediator in the conflict would be diminished.

9 · Russian forces along the Tajik-Afghan border shell suspected Tajik rebel bases in Afghanistan in response to rocket attacks by rebel forces. Commander of Russian border guards in Tajikistan Anatoliy Chechulin reiterates that Russia will use any means necessary to protect Russian servicemen deployed in Tajikistan. He states that increased rebel activities across the border signals a prelude to a larger summer offensive being planned by the rebels.

15 · Tajik Deputy Defense Minister Ramazan Radzhabov and his five bodyguards are killed near the town of Garm, 150 km from Dushanbe. No group claims responsibility for the killings, but the region is considered an opposition stronghold. Despite the killings, UN-sponsored peace talks are still scheduled to begin on 18 June in Tehran. Representatives of the Tajik government, the Tajik opposition, and the Iranian, Russian, and Pakistani governments will participate along with UN mediators.

16 · Tajik government and opposition representatives to the Tehran peace talks outline their positions in interviews with Interfax. According to the government negotiator, the Tajik government seeks a ceasefire, the repatriation of refugees, and the creation of a constitutional system. The opposition for its part also stresses the need for peaceful settlement and issues a warning (intended for the Russians) that failure to reach an accord could lead to Afghan-like conditions. He emphasizes that the Tajik opposition must be consulted before any new constitution can be ratified.

17 · Approximately 2,000 Russians and other Slavs reportedly migrate from Tajikistan every month. Overall, only 120,000 Slavs remain in the republic, a substantial decline from the 600,000 that lived there in the Soviet era. (The report did not indicate whether the new figure includes the 20,000 Russian troops currently stationed in Tajikistan). The emigration continues apace despite far-reaching concessions to the Russianspeaking population, including the right to hold dual citizenship. The report cites bleak economic prospects, in addition to the obvious security concerns, as causes for the exodus.

18 · UN-sponsored peace talks begin in Tehran. UN special envoy for Tajikistan Ramiro Piriz-Ballon states that a ceasefire is a prerequisite for the difficult task of finding a lasting peace settlement. Piriz-Ballon also announces that the United Nations stands prepared to “immediately send its representatives to Tajikistan” to verify compliance with any agreement. Despite a status quo that favors the government’s forces, the Tajik opposition announces its willingness to agree to a ceasefire along the Tajik-Afghan border.

21 · In a move that could derail the ongoing peace talks, Tajikistan's armed forces launch attacks against suspected rebel strongholds within Tajikistan, killing sixteen people and confiscating a large cache of arms.

23 · The UN-sponsored peace talks in Tehran yield no positive steps toward ending the civil war in Tajikistan. Tajik opposition demands that the Tajik government release political prisoners, legalize all political parties, and grant the right to publish newspapers. On the question of disarmament, the opposition proposes a bilateral disarmament under the supervision of the United Nations, CSCE, Russia, Iran, Afghanistan, and Kazakhstan. The government counters with a demand that the opposition disarm unilaterally.

26 · The Tehran talks fail to produce even a temporary ceasefire agreement as each side blames the other for lack of progress in the talks. However, a Russian observer indicates that the opposition may drop its demands linking any ceasefire agreement with a release of political prisoners, the restoration of a free press, and the legalization of political parties.

27 · Talks in Tehran conclude without agreement on a ceasefire, according to Russian news agencies. Despite this failure, both sides express optimism that the next round of talks, scheduled for the end of July in Islamabad, will lead to an end to the conflict and a normalization of the political situation in the beleaguered country. The opposition proposes a ceasefire, effective 1 August, conditioned on the release of political prisoners held by the Tajik government. Government representatives countered that a minimum of four months was needed to prepare the release and amnesty of the opposition forces currently incarcerated.

28 · Representatives of the Tajik government and Tajikopposition forces issue ajoint declaration supporting a ceasefire and national reconciliation, although no timetable for a cessation of hostilities is set. UN mediator Ramiro Piriz-Ballon says that the two sides made considerable progress and that the Tajik government committed itself to prepare to free political prisoners and grant amnesty to opposition leaders.

1 · Underscoring the sense of optimism that emerged from the Tehran peace talks, Tajik Labor Minister Shukhurdzon Zukhorov, who led the government delegation, announces that the majority of ministers and the Tajik head of state, Rakhmonov, believed that the opposition's demands could be met, but not immediately.

14 · Tajik refugees have begun to return home from Afghanistan. According to the Tajik Foreign Ministry, there are about 20,000 Tajik refugees in Afghanistan. The Tajik opposition claims 100,000.

19 · Tajik First Deputy Interior Minister Gennadiy Blinov says that a state of emergency in Dushanbe and regions adjacent to the Afghan border has been prolonged in order to secure these areas against incursions by “uncontrolled armed opposition groupings.”

· Despite evidence indicating a decrease in border incidents by two-thirds from previous years, commander of the CIS peacekeeping forces Col.-Gen. Valeriy Patrikeev says that the current deployment of 7,500 soldiers is inadequate, calling for a twofold increase in troop strength. He appeals to the governments of Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan to provide considerably more peacekeeping troops for the area.

22 · According to chief-of-staff of the Collective Peacemaking forces of the CIS, Col.-Gen. Bessmertniy, the situation is deteriorating in the republic and no improvement has been recorded in the past month. He also notes that the second round of intra-Tajik negotiations in Tehran has no constructive effect and there are more frequent cases of crossing the state border both from Afghanistan into Tajikistan and in the opposite direction.

- Opposition forces attack Tajik government forces east of Dushanbe, capturing fifty-six soldiers and major equipment. The attack represents the largest operation within the country since the end of the civil war.

26 · CIS and Tajik government forces launch attacks at rebel positions. Su-25 planes destroy equipment commandeered by the rebel forces, but prisoners' whereabouts remain unknown. General Patrikeev says his forces were conducting searches and were negotiating with local rebel leaders-activities in clear violation of Russia's oft-stated mission only to protect the Tajik-Afghan border, not to interfere in the internal imbroglio in Tajikistan.

28 · Rakhmonov meets with defense, interior, and security ministers, commanding them to destroy the rebels. The command of Russia's 201st Motorized Infantry Division stationed in southern Tajikistan had refused "for the time being" requests from the Tajik government to intervene on its behalf against the rebels. Moreover, Russian media reports that CIS border forces turned back attempts by armed opposition groups to cross the Tajik-Afghan border. Russian Defense Minister Grachev uses the degradation of the Tajik situation to lobby for effective, centralized command of border guards and armed forces in the CIS. Meanwhile, thirty of the fifty-six missing soldiers did defect to the rebels, according to a Tajik Defense Ministry spokesman.

August 1994

3 · General Patrikeev is convinced no alternative to the Russian presence exists. If Russian troops leave Tajikistan, the country will turn into a “burning torch.” The only way to restore peace in the republic is to strengthen Russia’s role.

9 · Tajik parliament prepares an amnesty decree releasing political prisoners, meeting one of the opposition demands.

11 · Russia’s First Deputy Foreign Minister Anatoliy Adamishin blames the Tajik opposition for driving the country to the brink of its second civil war in two years. Adamishin says that the opposition, having failed to achieve its goals of democratization and power-sharing, is resorting to violence to advance its agenda. He urges the opposition to cooperate with the United Nations, the West, and Russia as an alternative to bloodshed. Despite this plea, Adamishin criticized the UN’s apparent bias in favor of the Tajik opposition.

17 · Despite the conflict’s escalation, the Dushanbe government decides not to renew the state of emergency imposed at the end of 1992. Tajik Deputy Minister of National Security Anatoliy Kuptsov states that the state of emergency was allowed to elapse due to the 25 September presidential election and referendum on a new constitution.

19 · Heavy fighting resumes on the Tajik-Afghan border, resulting in the deaths of at least fifty Tajik opposition fighters and seven Russian border guards.

The attack is jointly coordinated by opposition forces on the border as well as opposition forces within Tajikistan. Russian troops were forced to call in helicopter gunships and Su-27 bombers to repel the attack.

24 · Tajik opposition leader Akbar Turadzhonzoda* says that the opposition considers the upcoming presidential elections illegal and is calling for an election-day boycott. He also says that the opposition forces would resume their offensive on the border, claiming that it is the only way to unseat the Dushanbe government.

31 · Interfax reports that nearly all the Tajik refugees who wanted to return home have done so. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees in Central Asia, Philippe Labreveux, estimates that over one million people left the country as a result of the civil war. About 350,000, mostly ethnic Russians, have not returned and it is highly unlikely that they will in the future.

September 1994

1 · Rakhmonov announces that an amnesty decreed by the Presidium of Tajikistan's Supreme Soviet would include some members of the Tajik opposition who are accused of inciting the 1992 civil war.

2 · In a statement circulated at the UN Security Council, Rakhmonov protests the use of mercenaries by the Tajik opposition and warns that these "soldiers of fortune" are contributing to an escalation of the conflict threatening instability in all of Central Asia. The complaint names Algeria, Afghanistan, and Sudan as states supplying fighters to the Tajik opposition. Rakhmonov appeals to those states and others to support the peaceful resolution of the conflict and cease the flow of mercenaries to the region.

7 · Tajikistan's Supreme Soviet votes to postpone the presidential election and referendum on a new constitution until 6 November. The decision is made in hopes that the Tajik opposition could be persuaded to participate. Rakhmonov comments, "The opposition must also be given a chance to nominate its own candidates.”

10 · Tajik government troops incur additional losses in two days of fighting east of Dushanbe. The opposition forces captured the town of Taval-Dara, effectively cutting off the capital from the southern and eastern parts of the country. Government losses are reported to be high. Opposition sources said that government troops are offering little resistance due to shortages of fuel and ammunition. Russian troops reportedly have stayed “in their barracks” and do not appear willing to involve themselves in the internal fighting in Tajikistan: they maintain that their sole function is monitoring the Afghan-Tajik border.

12 · In the wake of reported military setbacks, a Tajik government delegation travels to Tehran to hold talks with the Tajik opposition in exile and representatives of the Russian Foreign Ministry. The talks were characterized as preparatory discussions for the resumption of formal negotiations later this month.

13 · Tajik government forces launch a counteroffensive in an attempt to retake the Taval-Dara rayon east of Dushanbe. The Tajik air force, which days earlier was grounded due to fuel shortages, strikes against opposition positions, forcing residents of several villages to flee.

· Grachev advocates tougher measures to deal with the situation in Tajikistan. He calls for a stronger group of forces and for the CIS Border Forces along the Tajik-Afghan border to be integrated with the army to form a “powerful fist.” He predicts the situation in the war-torn country will become “more acute.”

· A key opposition faction, the Democratic Party, considers participating in upcoming presidential elections. The party, along with the nationalist Rastokhez movement and the Islamic Renaissance Party, was blamed for instigating Tajikistan's civil war in 1992 and was outlawed in 1993. Reports from the talks in Tehran also indicate that the Rastokhez Movement may be willing to take part in the elections. The Islamic Renaissance Party refuses to recognize the legitimacy of current election results.

17 · UN-Russian-Iranian sponsored negotiations between the Tajik government and opposition result in the agreement on a temporary ceasefire. It will become effective as soon as UN monitors can be deployed to the area. It is scheduled to last until 5 November. Both sides also agreed to release political and war prisoners.

21 · Citing Tajikistan's inability to monitor its own border with Afghanistan, Patrikeev says that Russian border and peacekeeping troops would remain in the republic for another year or two.

23 · Russian border and peacekeeping troops braced for stepped-up combat operations by the Tajik opposition along the Tajik-Afghan border as well as inside the Tajik republic. The Tajik opposition wants to gain advantageous positions before the arrival of UN observers and with them the implementation of a ceasefire. The observers are expected by 28 September.

October 1994

19 · Talks between the Tajik government and the Tajik opposition resume in Islamabad, Pakistan. The head of the Tajik government's delegation, First Deputy Chairman of the Tajik parliament Abdumajid Dostiev, says that the talks would cover a permanent ceasefire, repatriation of refugees from Afghanistan, and the future system of government in Tajikistan. Dostiev also said that he would encourage the participation of the opposition in the 6 November presidential elections and referendum on a new constitution. Meanwhile, eleven UN monitors arrive in Dushanbe to observe compliance of the temporary ceasefire.

20 · The talks hit a potential snag when the Tajik Islamic opposition leader Turadzhonzoda accuses the government of murdering two political prisoners. The accusation followed a Helsinki Watch report which stated that the Tajik government reneged on its promise to release twenty-seven political prisoners, one of the opposition's preconditions for resumption of the talks.

November 1994

8 · The Council of CIS Heads of State extends the mandate of the CIS joint peacekeeping forces in Tajikistan until 30 June 1995 and broadens the powers of the commander of these forces, Maj.-Gen. V. Yakushev.

12 · The Tajik armed opposition ignores the agreement on ceasefire along the Tajik-Afghan border, trying to cross into Tajikistan from Afghanistan. Concentrations of these forces are spotted near the border in the Afghan provinces of Tahor and Badakhshan. Armaments are being delivered there. Instructors from several Arab states are known to have arrived in the area.

17 · Opposition leader Akbar Turadzhonzoda charges the Russians with violating the ceasefire agreement. Under the Islamabad truce agreement, all the parties in the conflict have no right to regroup, let alone engage in combat. He says that the CIS troops fired heavy artillery shells and helicopterborne missiles at opposition troops near the village of Olur. Lt.-Gen.

Chechulin says that there has been no ceasefire on the Tajik-Afghan border and that since the ceasefire agreement came into force on 20 October, Russian border guards have stopped twenty-nine attempts by armed groups to cross the border and were subjected to seventeen attacks by opposition militants.

December 1994

5 · According to the Tajik Foreign Ministry, 38,000 Tajik refugees returned home from Afghanistan and 21,000 remain there. According to the Tajik opposition, about 80,000 refugees from Tajikistan remain in Afghanistan.

6 · Patrikeev reports that the situation at the Tajik-Afghan border took a slight turn for the better compared with August- September. He praises the inter-Tajik ceasefire agreement reached in Islamabad and control over its implementation on the part of international bodies, particularly the United Nations, which sent a group of military experts to Tajikistan. He also describes first steps aimed at disarming illegal militant units in the Gorno-Badakhshan region as “encouraging.” He says that inhabitants of several districts began to surrender arms. On the other hand, the general situation in Gorno- Badakhshan region is complicated because there are several scores of pro-opposition groupings in the region and they possess about 2,000 firearms.

January 1995

4 · Press reports reveal the Foreign Ministry of Tajikistan sent a letter to CIS leaders containing an urgent request to introduce additional measures to reinforce and protect the Tajik-Afghan border in line with the May 1992 CIS collective security treaty signed in Tashkent.

6 · According to the commander of the armed wing of MIRT (the Movement for Islamic Revival of Tajikistan), Rizvon Sadirov, now that Russia has “launched an aggression against Muslim Chechnya,” he has declared a holy war (jihad) on the Russian servicemen in Tajikistan.

9 · In Novaya Ezhednevnyaya Gazeta, Dodo Atovullo, a Tajik refugee, condemns the fact that the war of over two years has gone virtually “unnoticed” despite the fact that the number of victims is greater than in the Yugoslavian, Abkhazian, or Karabakh wars.

· Rakhmonov declares that the government of Tajikistan needs Russian border guard services, a clear appeal to the border guards to safeguard Tajikistan’s border. Otherwise, the regime feels it could not remain in power for even a day.

11 · Tajik Deputy Foreign Minister Rakhmatollahov calls on the Islamic Republic of Iran to use its influence to facilitate the convening of the fourth round of Tajik peace talks. Moreover, he expresses Tajikistan’s readiness to participate in these talks.

12 · UN military observers meet with Rakhmatollahov to deal with issues relating to the implication of the Tehran and Islamabad inter-Tajik agreements and the preparations for the regular round of the inter-Tajik talks in Moscow.

14 · Tajikistan’s foreign policy priority is still to strengthen ties with Russia and other CIS countries, according to Talbak Nazarov, Tajikistan's new foreign minister. He notes that his department will continue the dialogue with the opposition.

March 1995

13 · In a press interview, First Deputy Director of the Russian Federal Frontier Force Col.-Gen. Aleksandr Tymko says fighters from MIRT launched a spring offensive, with between 6,000 and 8,000 members standing poised across the Tajik border ready to challenge the frontier guards. Although Tymko does not rule out a major breakthrough attempt, he notes that the Islamic fighters are employing a tactic of "quiet infiltration." Tymko claims that the frontier guards possess sufficient manpower and equipment to repel a major attempted breakthrough, saying "I don't think the fighters across the border have enough strength to oust Russia's frontier guards."

15 · MIRT leader Abdullo Nuri, a major component in the Tajik opposition, expresses willingness to talk "at any time and at any place" to UN military observer head Gen. Hassan Abasa. Nuri says the opposition will not initiate a spring offensive, but border skirmishes between Russian-Tajik border guards and Tajik opposition groups continue.

28 · Russian Federal Border Service Director Andrey Nikolaev reports that the armed Tajik opposition is increasing attacks on the Tajik-Afghan border under MIRT leadership. Nikolaev notes that the opposition has obtained massive military supplies including small arms, mortars, multiple rocket launchers, and choppers in preparation for a May offensive. Nikolaev says that while the opposition has ample weaponry and forces, the likelihood of rebel-induced destabilization in Tajikistan is receding because the opposition "has lost influence and initiative."

1 · Grachev announces his opposition to reinforcement of Russian forces in Tajikistan, saying he believes the Tajik leadership is not “fully using its own means of settling the conflict.” Grachev also comments that to stake the settlement of the conflict solely on force in “unpromising.”

3 · Uzbek President Karimov meets with Tajik opposition leaders in Tashkent. The participants exchange views on ensuring regional security and establishing peace in Tajikistan. Karimov calls on the leaders to renounce military means of attaining their goals and encourages them to accept CIS, United Nations, and CSCE roles in the conflict’s settlement. While hailing the meeting as constructive, the Tajik leadership is “troubled” over the fact that they were not informed of the meeting.

8 · A major offensive is launched against Russian border guards from the Afghan border in the Pamir mountains. Russian Commander Chechulin describes the incident as the beginning of a “large-scale spring-summer combat operation by the irreconcilable Tajik opposition.” Chechulin further asserts that, given MIRT’s commitment to a political settlement through talks, they are either “phony words or they do not control their field commanders.” Because of the casualties suffered by the border guards (ten), the Tajik government should take a more active role in the Pamir section of the border.

10 · Russian aircraft fire missiles on the border post in Dashti-Yangul settlement to quell Islamic militant activity in the area. Russian border service reports that its border guards now completely control the situation.

17 · Emerging from talks in Moscow, Tajik Prime Minister Dzhamsheed Karimov declares “we are fully in favor of a close alliance with the Russian Federation” and announces Russia will provide the republic with “concrete military aid.” Karimov also notes plans for other types of cooperation but that special emphasis was placed on deepening economic and military integration.

19-22 · In Moscow talks with Tajik opposition leaders and government officials, Kozyrev stresses Russia will not “tolerate the death of its servicemen on the Tajik-Afghan border” and “will use all means available to ensure a political and democratic process.” Kozyrev also indicates Russia’s support for a greater UN role as well as other international organization involvement in the conflict’s settlement. His comments draw strong protest from opposition leaders, saying he used “individual estimation” in characterizing events in the Pamir region. Despite the protest, talks went as scheduled, with both sides agreeing to hold a fourth round of direct, inter-Tajik talks. Rakhmonov and MIRT leader Nuri pledge to meet again.

29 · Russian Duma deputies arrive in Dushanbe to exchange views on the situation with Rakhmonov, and to establish further cooperation between Tajikistan and Russia.

May 1995

5 · Russian frontier guard troop commander Anatoliy Chechulin reports a concentration of over 300 militants on the Tajik-Afghan border. He says the frontier forces have enough resources to repel an armed invasion but their presence is troubling.

11 · Lt.-Gen. Pavel Tarasenko replaces Chechulin as commander of Russian border troops in Tajikistan.

12 · In a press interview, Rakhmonov discusses settlement prospects at the upcoming talks in Kabul. He says his true aim is to achieve a truce with the opposition and he believes they want this as well. He expresses hope that “common sense and reason will prevail over political ambitions,” indicating no military solution is viable. Rakhmonov also notes his appreciation of the UN and Russian roles in the conflict, saying both sides agree on a continued Russian presence to monitor the Tajik-Afghan border.

16-19 · Rakhmonov and Nuri hold talks in Kabul, discussing implementation of ceasefire agreements, confirm the inviolability of the border, and agree to repatriate refugees to their homes. MIRT’s deputy chairman Turadzhonzoda agrees that progress was made and the fact “that the recent political antagonists have reached out to each other ... inspires hope for a peaceful future in Tajikistan.” In a joint statement, Nuri and Rakhmonov describe the meeting as beneficial and say talks will continue between their representatives in Alma-Ata on 22 May to hammer out differences. The statement also expresses their gratitude to the United Nations, neighboring countries, and to Afghan President Rabbani for the role of each in the conflict’s settlement.

22 · The fourth round of inter-Tajik talks, stalled for three months, open in Alma-Ata. UN mediator Piriz-Ballon praises the Kabul meeting between Nuri and Rakhmonov as providing the positive context for current discussions. A major topic to be discussed involves introducing roughly 2,000 blue helmets to the conflict zone-half of which will be Russian. Says deputy head of the opposition delegation Otakhon Latifi, such a plan will “kill two birds with one stone.

First, it will restore peace in Tajikistan ... and second, it will remove from Russia suspicion of imperial tactics.”

24 · Piriz-Ballon expresses pessimism over the outcome of the inter-Tajik Alma-Ata talks. Opposition leaders demand another revision of the constitution and call for a coalition government with new presidential and parliamentary elections. The new demands further polarize the positions of the two sides. In a press interview, Rakhmonov categorically rejects the opposition’s demands, saying “I have sworn an oath that I will use all my knowledge and skill, experience and power to defend the constitution, the fundamental law, and will keep it sacred.” Opposition delegation head to the talks, Turadzhonzoda, says he will take the opposition’s case to Kyrgyz President Akaev and will press him to bring up the matter at the CIS Minsk summit. Talks are suspended with agreements to extend the ceasefire to another three months, to exchange POWs, and to build relations on the basis of mutual trust. Talks are to resume in Alma-Ata on 25 July.

June 1995

11 · In a press interview, Nuri discusses his pleasure with Rakhmonov and in the meeting they had in mid-May, saying he considers Rakhmonov’s “approach and his meeting with officials representing the refugees to be a good omen.” He laments the violence caused by the war and speaks of the need to provide stability for the children’s future, their need to “study sciences, be artisans, and prepare themselves for the future of the country.” He urges Tajiks to forgive one another, to give up claims of office, regionalism, egotism, revenge, and hostility, and to unite in creating a country able to meet all the republic’s needs.

12 · UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali terms the recent talks in Alma-Ata “insignificant” and proposes extending the UN observer mission mandate and to exert UN control over north Afghanistan. His comments appear in a report to the UN Security Council on the situation in Tajikistan.

19 · Tajik government draws up a list of political war prisoners to be exchanged on a “one-to-one” basis spelled out in the Alma-Ata agreements signed in mid-May. The list includes opposition supporters active since 1992. Tensions between the opposition and government officials mount as the Tajik government announces that those involved in killing civilians, policemen, and Tajik and Russian soldiers will be tried as criminals, not as fighters defending an ideal. Their fate rests in the Tajik Supreme Court. The opposition declares the charges were concocted to discredit the opposition.

28 · Border clashes erupt as a group of twenty-two militants tries to cross the border from Afghanistan into Tajikistan. Russian border guards issue warnings and the group opens fire. The border troops return fire, preventing the group from succeeding.

· In a press interview, Tajik Foreign Minister Talbak Nazarov describes Russia as Tajikistan’s “chief partner and ally.” He acknowledges Russia’s geopolitical interests in the region, Tajikistan in particular.

2-5 · Nuri holds an opposition conference in Talukan, Afghanistan, where a resolution to increase attacks on Tajik government officials and military positions is passed. A 200-man rebel force, under Commander Salam Mukhabbatov, is reportedly infiltrating the Garm region from which it will launch a terrorist campaign.

3 · Nuri issues a statement adopted by MIRT declaring that the opposition forms an inseparable part of Tajikistan. He says opposition policy is to promote friendly relations and notes the important favorable change in Uzbek policy toward the opposition and its leadership.

4-6 · Rakhmonov visits the southern Khatlon region, scene of the most intense fighting. Local clans engage in constant gun battles as they try to re-carve their spheres of influence. Rakhmonov gives a series of addresses criticizing the fact that “all posts at enterprises are occupied by people put there through force or nepotism.” As regards the dire economic conditions besetting the region, Rakhmonov says governmental funds have been plentiful and while much progress has been made in rebuilding businesses, industries, learning centers, and hospitals, he points the finger at the local Kulyab when asking where most of the money went.

11 · In a news conference, First Deputy Prime Minister Makhmadsaid Ubaydulloev discusses settlement issues and the status of opposition activities. He says much more focus has been placed on refugees, POWs, and disengagement matters and immediate provision of secure living conditions. He promises his government’s resources to achieve these aims and invites international support in resolving the conflict and providing humanitarian aid. Ubaydulloev speaks harshly of recent opposition activity, noting in particular a more radicalized Nuri faction forging stronger ties with the Afghan elite and waging a campaign of terror. He announces another amnesty decree issued by Rakhmonov, but the environment for talks, in his view, is worsening.

13 · Opposition groups charge that in certain districts outside Dushanbe, Tajik security police are “rounding up scores of Muslims” for interrogation, killing many in the process. Opposition representative Zafar Rakhmonov says opposition members have been pulled out of their homes by masked security officers.

19 · Talks are held in Tehran, hosted by Iranian President Rafsanjani at the presidential palace. Rakhmonov, his foreign minister, labor minister, and vice-president make up the Tajik delegation and Nuri, MIRT first deputy Turadzhonzoda, and other deputies represent the opposition. Opening the talks, Iranian Foreign Minister Velayati underlines his country's desire to see the conflict settled and pledges Iran's commitment to finding common ground. The minister cautions participants on the danger of the Tajik conflict evolving into a Cambodia or Vietnam and calls on both Nuri and Rakhmonov to see that this does not happen. Some press reports believe Iran has brought pressure to bear on the opposition and this meeting is a result. During the visit, the Tajik (Rakhmonov) delegation signs twelve intergovernmental agreements covering economic and cultural relations with Iran.

22 · No major progress is reported as talks in Tehran end. Observers note the important fact that Rakhmonov even agreed to hold discussions during his state visit to the Iranian capital, indicating that the president seriously desires resolution. The next (fifth) round of talks, according to Tajik presidential spokesman Davlatali Davlatov, will focus on the composition of the Congress of Peoples of Tajikistan.

24 · MIRT spokesman Akbar Turadzhonzoda announces in an Iranian newspaper interview that the Tajik opposition does not want control over executive power but wants 40 percent representation in parliament. "We believe that in order to achieve a sustainable peace in Tajikistan, we should declare a two-year transition stage with Rakhmonov's leadership and with the participation of a National Reconciliation Council."

August 1995

1 · Rakhmonov receives Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Albert Chernyshev in Dushanbe for consultation on the conflict. Both agree that the inter-Tajik talks should proceed in the same direction since no alternative exists. Rakhmonov confirms his desire to settle the conflict peacefully and says that the immediate aims of talks remain: establishing a truce, return of all refugees, and the elimination of tensions in the Central Asian region. Mechanisms are now in place for displaced persons to return safely and the process is already under way in the Gorno-Badakhshan region and in some districts of Dushanbe.

2 · In a news conference, commander of Russian border troops in Tajikistan Tarasenko says the situation on the Tajik-Afghan border is alarming. He says the Russian command has identified a large buildup of militants in many border districts who they believe seek to cross into Tajik territory for operations against the Tajik government. He notes certain forces in Afghanistan and in certain circles in Tajikistan do not wish to see the situation stabilized, in particular black market operatives and drug dealers.

10 · Iranian Foreign Minister Velayati meets with UN representative in Tajikistan, Ramiro Piriz-Ballon. The two discuss Iran's positive role in bringing the sides closer to agreement and providing the impetus for continuation of talks. The officials also discuss the role of the United Nations and other international agencies capable of affecting some resolution, with Piriz-Ballon highlighting the necessity of continued Iranian participation in settlement proceedings.

14 · Piriz-Ballon meets with Tajik opposition leader Nuri. He tells Nuri that the United Nations does not wish the fifth round of talks to take place unless the leaders are sure significant progress will be made. Nuri says the opposition will persist in its demands for increased participation in political affairs and for more representation in the political machinery throughout Tajikistan.

17 · Nuri signs a protocol on achieving peace in Tajikistan. Piriz-Ballon is present at the signing, held at the Afghan Foreign Ministry. The protocol, already approved by Tajik authorities, extends the current ceasefire for another six months and provides for talks to continue in a peaceful atmosphere. Nuri complements Afghan president Rabbani for his work in the Tajik peace process.

18 · The Russian border command and Tajik rebels operating on the Afghan-Tajik border agree to dismantle firing positions in the Gorno-Badakhshan region.

23 · Despite the above agreement, clashes and mortar fire continue on the Tajik-Afghan border. The exchange occurs primarily in Khorog region. A Russian border command spokesman terms the incident a unilateral violation of the ceasefire extension and charges that the Tajik opposition leaders are “either reluctant or unable to keep their militants under control.” In a related statement, Nuri charges the Russian border troops with blame for the incident. Nuri says that, because the opposition forces are not required to disengage until a “full political settlement is achieved,” the Russians try to provoke the opposition and are thus met with “fierce resistance.”

30 · CIS Commander of the joint peacekeeping forces in Tajikistan Valentin Bobryshev reports that the Tajik opposition has been strengthening its forces in the Garm region and the Obikhingou valley. Over the last three months, the commander says their military presence has been complemented by 2,000 to 2,500 more troops and mercenaries. He believes the purpose of buildup is to continue assaults from the Afghan border in order to “keep the country’s leadership tense” and to force concessions at the next round of talks.

September 1995

18 · Inter-Tajik talks are canceled because of conflicting views over where the talks should be held. The Tajik leadership prefers Ashkhabad while the opposition pushes for Tehran or even the Afghan capital.

19 · The Russian foreign minister is in Dushanbe for talks with the Tajik leadership. The minister indicates that the purpose of his trip is to ascertain the steps needed for implementing agreements reached in Moscow between Russia and Rakhmonov.

Summary at the End of 1995

Fighting continues on the Afghan-Tajik border as militants continually launch attacks. The opposition refuses to change its demands and the Tajik leadership refuses to heed them, especially demands for changing the constitution and for overturning the last elections. Plans for forming a National Reconciliation government composed of representatives from all factions guide the talks when they are held. The Movement for Islamic Revival continues to accuse Russia of hegemonic ambitions in Tajikistan, and to pursue its secular aims for a more balanced representation of the political, ethnic, and clan elements of the country’s society. The United (IRP-DP)

Opposition continues to oppose the Kulyabi clan's hold on power through Rakhmonov, the former communist party, and Russia.

Chronologies of Key CIS Developments, 1992-1995

Political, Economic, Security

Introductory Notes

When the Soviet empire collapsed in December 1991, the twelve former republics that became signatories of the Belovezh Forest agreement creating the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) were unprepared and ill equipped for statehood. They lacked experienced legislatures, constitutions, and independent social institutions. More important, they were each tied (purposefully) into a highly centralized and controlled Soviet budget, monetary system, transportation and communications system, electricity grid, energy supply system, defense system, and industrial production and distribution system. No republic was economically self-sufficient. Nor could any republic even begin to create a banking or monetary system without first creating a national currency and divorcing itself from the Russian ruble. Each one was dependent on monetary emissions from the Central Bank of Russia for budgetary activities and state sector salaries, which made up the lion's share of each republic's economy.

Carving out statehood from the remnants of empire will mean first of all disengagement from the Soviet economic, political, and military networks over which Russia assumed control, followed by a diversification of the links binding these states to the imperial “center” (Moscow). New bilateral and multilateral linkages will have to be formed in and outside each one’s own region of the huge former Soviet space. The ultimate success of this state-building process will depend to a large extent on how well each former republic can balance its own vulnerabilities to Russia’s bilateral demands and pressures with its autonomous national political, economic, and security goals. Diversification is made all the more difficult, however, by the fact that the national-patriotic elements of Russia’s political elite have taken control of Russia’s foreign policy agenda—with respect to both the CIS and countries outside the CIS.

As discussed in Chapter 3, the Russian national-patriots comprise several distinct sectors of Russian society, including the former Communist Party nomenklatura, the Slavacists, the KGB and other security services, the Eurasianists, and many of the pragmatic “industrial managers” and “financiers.” Many members of these groups simply refused to accept the collapse of the Soviet Union and the validity of the Commonwealth of Independent States. In mid-1992, in fact, the Communist Party of the Russian Federation declared the Belovezh agreement illegal, in deference to the March 1991 Soviet referendum upholding the retention of a Union government. The nationalists, national-patriots, and communists elected to the Russian parliament in 1993, as seen in previous chapters, virulently opposed and spoke out against the Yeltsin/Kozyrev foreign policy orientation toward Western democracies from the very beginning of the CIS. These groups have been entirely effective in enlisting the attention and the sympathies of the Russian population.

The following chronologies detail who the players formulating and implementing Russia's CIS policy are, how they think and interact with players from the non-Russian republics, and how they articulate their professed goals and strategies for the CIS. The reader can judge how sincere Russian politicians and governments officials are when they address Russia's overall socio-political, economic, and collective security agendas. The chronologies begin with Andrey Kozyrev and end with Kozyrev's dismissal and the appointment of Evgeniy Primakov, former chief of the Russian Foreign Intelligence Agency, as Russian foreign minister on 10 January 1996. Primakov's appointment could well mark the end of the foreign policy debate inside Russia and the beginning of an era of attempted restoration of the Russian imperial state. The extracts in the chronology provide liberal quotations, which epitomize the “rights of ethnic Russians” and “Eurasian space” rhetoric used by Russian government officials, and record the carefully guarded, but unmistakably anti-imperial remarks of the non-Russian CIS elites when talking with the press or writing in political journals.

The future of the CIS will depend on how the non-Russian states react, how Russian youth reacts, and how the West reacts to Russian imperial-oriented tendencies. Under Primakov, the KGB will undoubtedly become more active in holding the CIS together, and Russia will try to use the CIS to counteract the West’s “unipolar” world plan- Primakov’s shorthand for the emergence of the United States as the world’s sole superpower. Under Primakov, Russia’s foreign policy will be in the hands of a master Eurasionist, whose ultimate goal will be to spread Russia’s influence throughout the Caucasus, Central Asia, and the Middle East. In such a case, the Commonwealth will cease to be the vehicle for independent state-building in the former Soviet territory and will become the vehicle for carrying out Russia’s post-cold war hegemonic ambitions.

Economic

5 · Vneshnekonombank Vice-Chairman Tomas Alibegov announces that the CIS hopes to derive some $30 billion from selling the debts owed to the former USSR by socialist partners and Third World countries at a discount on secondary credit markets.

30 · Italy makes available $2.3 billion in credit for the non-Russian republics.

Political

31 · In a press interview, Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev speaks favorably on CIS prospects. He says coordinating bodies have been established to assure the “Commonwealth will eventually operate smoothly and relations between the member states will be settled.” Asked about Western aid, Nazarbaev urges the CIS states to rely only on their own strengths as “genuine aid cannot be ensured to 300 million.”

Security

5 · CIS Commander-in-chief Evgeniy Shaposhnikov discloses that only Russia, Kazakhstan, Armenia, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan are interested in maintaining a unified command over former Soviet general purpose forces.

8 · According to Ukrainian President Kravchuk, telecommunications between himself, Yeltsin, Shushkevich, and Nazarbaev are reliable enough to prevent a unilateral nuclear launch.

10 · Ukraine cuts defense communications with the CIS command due to its dispute with Russia over nuclear weapons.

16 · CIS leaders hold a summit in Moscow to discuss military affairs, coordinate CIS foreign policy, and establish an organizational group to prepare future meetings of CIS heads of state and government. The presidents of Uzbekistan, Moldova, and Turkmenistan are absent, but delegations from these states participate.

- Transcaucasus Military District Commander Patrikeev states that the district should be placed under Russian command.

17 · Over 5,000 ex-Soviet officers meet in Moscow to discuss the future of the armed forces. The officers urge retention of unified armed forces and improved social guarantees for servicemen.

21 · Commander of the Northwestern Group of Forces Col.-Gen. Valeriy Mironov says his forces have been transferred from Soviet to Russian jurisdiction.

22 · CIS military affairs spokesman Lt.-Col. Leonid Ivashov announces that Russia will assume 62.3 percent of the CIS military budget in 1992. Ukraine will pay 17.3 percent and Kazakhstan 5.1 percent. The nine other members will contribute the remaining 15.3 percent.

24 · Russian sources claim that 286,000 CIS servicemen and their families are homeless.

28 · In Russia, Head of the General Staff Academy Col.- Gen. Igor Rodionov calls for his academy to become the training center for CIS officers. He argues that the academy should be under Russian supervision.

29 · Yeltsin announces CIS and Russian arms cuts. He states that 600 strategic land and sea missiles have been taken off alert status and proposes eliminating 130 land-based missile silos and halting production of heavy bombers and cruise missiles.

February 1992

Economic

14 · At the CIS Heads of State summit in Minsk, leaders sign an economic document which seeks to regulate trade and economic cooperation, and calls for the ruble to remain the sole monetary unit of the CIS.

Political

3 · The National Public Opinion Studies Center in Moscow conducts a poll in Russia, Ukraine, and Kazakhstan on whether individuals in these nations believe the CIS has a future. The results:

	Kazakhs	Russians	Ukrainians
predict deeper integration	28%	8%	7%
predict worsening conflict	10%	20%	20%
predict difficulties in reaching accord	28%	39%	29%
predict breakup of union	16%	16%	22%

The study polled 1,597 Russians, 517 Ukrainians, and 240 Kazakhs and reports a 3 percent margin of error. The Center concludes that ordinary Russians and Kazakhs are more optimistic about the future of the Commonwealth than Ukrainians are.

· Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk discusses Ukraine's independence and relations with Russia with the Ukrainian press. He states first of all that Ukraine will be a non-nuclear state and will abide by all international agreements regarding disarmament signed by the former USSR, adding that all ex-Soviet republics should honor such agreements. He argues against the popular notion in some Russian circles that Ukraine is simply a “small Russia” and says that Ukraine will adamantly work toward consolidating its independence. As for an impending Ukrainian-Russian conflict, Kravchuk says the prophets are wrong, citing several referenda conducted in Ukraine revealing the extent to which the Ukrainian people support independent Ukraine, including a number of ethnic Russians in the country.

· In Moldova, President Mircea Snegur argues that the CIS will last into the “near future” and will work to ease the economic strain on the former Soviet republics, but believes the republics will leave the body once they are integrated into Western economic structures. Asked about possible reunification with Romania, an issue gaining in popularity since independence, Snegur warns against implementing such a union without consulting the people first.

6 · In Azerbaijan, Prime Minister Hasan Hasanov Azeri says Russia could become Azerbaijan’s political enemy. Hasanov argues that Russia’s recent support to Armenia will mobilize political forces in Azerbaijan against Russia.

8 · A CIS Heads of Government summit opens in Moscow. Every republican prime minister participates except for the Ukrainian prime minister, Vitold Fokin. They discuss ecological cooperation, coordination of interstate power engineering and hydrometeorological services, food and agricultural materials, and economic interrelations. Economic issues dominate because many factories throughout the CIS stand idle and receive no deliveries of production materials and energy supplies.

The delegates draft an eleven-point plan addressing economic concerns and agree to name Russia as legal “successor to and guarantor of the foreign credit agreements of the Commonwealth member states.” Ukraine argues that each republic should maintain separate and direct communications with creditors, and Russian Deputy Prime Minister Gaydar does not object. Five additional documents are signed addressing economic interaction, but leave many issues unsettled. The Russian delegation accuses Ukraine of hindering many agreements. The fact that Ukraine is represented by a deputy economic minister indicates it is retreating from the community.

15 · A CIS Heads of State summit is held in Minsk. All leaders attend (though a few leave unexpectedly). Security issues dominate discussions, in particular creation of Joint CIS Forces (see chronology under Security, 15 February 1992). Commentators note the meeting’s political significance in that the leaders have learned they have made progress and communicate effectively despite widespread differences. Twenty documents are signed, focusing on military and economic issues.

18 · In Ukraine, Kravchuk responds to allegations that Ukraine seeks association in a “triangle” union among Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia, saying Ukraine “will not abandon one treaty for another.” He says, however, that while Ukraine is not searching for such an alliance at the state level, the country does want to pursue cooperation with all countries. He argues that, in the end, Ukraine must cooperate with the CIS states to “strengthen its independence.”

· In Russia, President Yeltsin meets with U.S. President

Bush requesting Western assistance to help Russia's and the former Soviet republics' economies. Some Western states, principally Germany and Britain, support establishing a fund to aid the Soviet successor states and Russia but the United States has objected, arguing the new states should first join international economic bodies such as the IMF to help strengthen their economic discipline. Experts believe $5-$12 billion will be needed for the stabilization fund to be effective.

- A struggle is building for control over the Central Asian republics, according to Interfax. Middle Eastern countries have been increasing their humanitarian aid to the Central Asian states and Central Asian officials have participated recently in a Tehran summit of the Organization for Economic Cooperation, where the main topic was feasibility of an Islamic Common Market. While most of the Central Asian officials at the summit recognize some merit in playing the “Islamic card,” they realize the dangers inherent in doing so. Should Islamic fundamentalism take root in Central Asia, reformist forces would recede, turning the “region into a source of global danger.”

19 · Belarusian parliamentary head Shushkevich tells Interfax that the CIS is viable, citing as evidence the recent Heads of State meeting in Minsk. He says the CIS permanent working center in Minsk will sustain CIS existence and that the “fears regarding the instability of the Commonwealth and its coordinating organs are in my view unfounded.”

25 · In an address to the Council of Europe in Strasbourg, Russian parliamentary speaker Ruslan Khasbulatov argues that the CIS is not, contrary to prevailing opinion, in a crisis. He defends the slow progress of the organization by saying “no one should have expected the new Commonwealth to start to live in full-blooded life as soon as it was proclaimed. ... [But] to speak of a crisis ... is frivolous and superficial. It is simply being born in conditions of crisis.”

27 · In Russia, republican Supreme Soviet chairmen hold a conference to discuss documents adopted in Minsk. Members debate creation of a Council of Heads of Parliament, but the idea is rejected by the Ukrainian delegation, which argues that the two existing councils, the Heads of State and the Heads of Government, are sufficient to debate and carry out CIS initiatives. All participants (with the exceptions of Moldova and Uzbekistan) sign the following documents:

- Agreement on Interparliamentary Cooperation in the Legal Sphere;

- Agreement on Consultative Conferences of Representatives of Supreme Soviets;

- Protocol on Interparliamentary Information and Reference Service;

- Protocol on the Elaboration of Multilateral Acts.

Security

3 · During a visit to the United States, Russian Maj.-Gen. Nikolay Stolyarov states that tension in CIS armed forces is growing, particularly in Ukraine. He cites the pressures to swear more than one military oath as a major centrifugal force splitting the armed forces.

4 · Lt.-Gen. Vasiliy Vorobev announces that Russia is the only CIS member to allocate funding for the first quarter of the 1992 CIS budget.

10 · Ukrainian President Kravchuk asserts that the gravest danger to the CIS is the maintenance of a unified armed force. Nazarbaev dissents and urges a unified CIS army.

11 · CIS defense ministers meet in Minsk to discuss the army's future. Meanwhile, Moldovan Prime Minister Valeriy Muravschy announces that his country will not contribute to the CIS armed forces budget.

12 · Ukraine and Belarus refuse to sign military preparatory documents for the CIS summit in Minsk due to disagreement on the composition and redistribution of CIS forces among the commonwealth states.

14 · The CIS Heads of State meet in Minsk. The military accords are minor and few members sign all documents. Moldova does not sign an agreement on strategic forces and Belarus does not sign an agreement on general purpose forces.

· Russian air crews “defect,” with six Su-24 bombers, from Ukraine to Russia, having refused to swear an oath of allegiance to Ukraine.

15 · Shaposhnikov is confirmed as commander-in-chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces.

18 · Shaposhnikov predicts that the armed forces of the USSR will split into national armies.

28 · Azeri President Ayaz Mutalibov announces that Baku has agreed to subordinate general purpose forces to both the Azeri president and the CIS military command.

March 1992

Economic

13 · The CIS Council of Heads of Government agrees to accept joint responsibility for repaying the USSR’s debt. Russia will repay about 61 percent, Ukraine 16 percent, and the remaining six members split the rest.

Political

3 · Azerbaijan, Tajikistan, Moldova, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Armenia, and Turkmenistan are admitted to the United Nations. The General Assembly vote is unanimous.

- Sazhi Umalatova, head of an organizing committee to convene an emergency Sixth Congress of USSR People's Deputies, argues in a press interview that the disbandment of the USSR Supreme Soviet is illegal. Umalatova's activities spark widespread debate, with some arguing for a body "capable of building a powerful and prosperous multinational state" and others believing a renewed Congress of USSR Deputies will lead to a "war of governments." Says Umalatova, "there is no reviving the old Union, and the objective of the Congress is to set up a body around which the republics, regions, and districts of the former Soviet Union will unite on a new basis."

6 · In talks with Turkish Foreign Minister Hikmet Cetin, Ukrainian President Kravchuk criticizes Russia's recent actions regarding CIS relations. He identifies dangers for the CIS should Russia continue to try to impose its will on other CIS states without consultation and compromise. Kravchuk is especially critical of Russia's decision to cut off gas supplies to Ukraine and raise energy prices for certain CIS states. In such an environment, says Kravchuk, "it is very difficult to establish friendly ties."

8 · In a press interview, Gorbachev discusses CIS prospects. While objecting to any association short of preserving the Union, he says he supports the efforts of republican leaders to make the newly independent states viable. Given the degree of republican interdependence, he notes the need for coordinating mechanisms and increased political interactions. However, he criticizes the CIS for not fulfilling these needs. "Policy must be coordinated. Corresponding bodies must be established."

10 · In a press interview, Kazakh president Nazarbaev asserts that supranational coordinating structures are needed within the CIS. Nazarbaev especially believes economic coordinating bodies are necessary to "shape a common market of a new type" and ensure newly independent states "gradually enter the mainstream of contemporary civilization." In the absence of such bodies, Nazarbaev believes the CIS "will be an empty sound, a beautiful form that is filled with no real content." As to Western involvement in the CIS, Nazarbaev believes aid should be directed toward the individual republics making up the CIS, as it “is naive to try to reform the entire social giant at once. It would be better to form islets of developed economy and democracy which would have a tendency to expand.”

11 · Azerbaijan’s main political opposition party-the Popular Front of Azerbaijan (PFA)-declares the republic is not officially a CIS member because the republic’s Supreme Soviet and national council have not yet ratified the Commonwealth Charter. Political infighting over membership in the CIS is intense, with the PFA lobbying against and former communists (former President Mutalibov, Supreme Soviet chairman Mamedov, and Prime Minister Hasan Hasanov) supporting membership in the body.

13 · In Moscow, the Council of Heads of CIS Governments convenes. Armenia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine are each represented by a prime minister, and Russia, Belarus, Turkmenistan, and Tajikistan send plenipotentiary representatives. Azerbaijan sends an official not empowered to sign documents. The attendees sign documents on sixteen of the eighteen issues on the agenda. Most entail economic affairs such as payment of pensions due, tax policies, principles of a customs union, and a host of questions dealing with the organization of economic ties. Of major significance is the settlement of the USSR’s lingering external debt and foreign holdings issue. Ukraine favors collective responsibility. Two major items on the agenda dealing with commerce and railway transport are not resolved. Commentary notes the calm atmosphere in which the meeting takes place, as distinct from the volatile aura of past discussions. The following agreements are adopted:

- Agreement on Scientific Ties;
- Agreement on Standardization;
- Agreement on Taxation Policy;
- Agreement on Pension Provision;
- Agreement on Plenipotentiary Missions;
- Protocol on Price Setting;
- Scientific-Technical Facilities Joint Use;
- Interstate Protocol on Railways;
- Agreement on Scientific Personnel;
- Food Import Commission Protocol;
- Foreign Debt Agreement;
- Protocol on Internationalist Soldiers;
- Scientific-Technical Cooperation;
- Agreement on Customs Policy Principles;
- Agreement on USSR's Internal Debt;
- Interstate Protocol on Banking.

17 · In Russia, a Sixth Congress of USSR Deputies is held in Podolsk. Umalatova is elected Presidium head; a fourteenperson committee and the participants approve documents declaring the Commonwealth of Independent States illegal and recognizing the Soviet Union as a “geographical reality.” Participants also plan a future meeting to chart a campaign for restoration of the Union, revival of communist ideology, and resignation of the Russian government. Most former republican leaders denounce the work of the Congress and believe the body has no legal or legitimate basis for existing. The Supreme Soviets of many republics also claim the Congress's actions were illegal.

20 · In Kiev, CIS heads of state convene for the second CIS summit. Uzbek President Islam Karimov chairs the meeting. The leaders are to select key CIS military posts. In his remarks, Ukrainian President Kravchuk criticizes the organization, saying the body has failed resolutely as “not a single military, political, or economic issue has been resolved within the framework of the CIS.” Kravchuk also notes the tense situations in Moldova and Azerbaijan, which further complicate CIS relations. Despite the pessimism, the following agreements are signed:

- Appeal to the United Nations for help with Chernobyl;
- Declaration of the Non-Use of Force or Threat of Force in Relations between CIS Members;

26 · Writing in La Stampa, ex-Soviet President Gorbachev warns that the CIS is headed for disaster should political leaders fail to erect coordinating mechanisms. He criticizes Yeltsin for failing to reform the multiethnic USSR and hints that its demise was largely Yeltsin's fault. Relations among the former Soviet republics will continue to disintegrate, he says, because the CIS is not designed to encompass the former republics in a sincere organization.

27 · A CIS interparliamentary conference ends in Alma-Ata. Seven CIS states sign an agreement on the creation of an Interparliamentary Assembly (Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan). Ukraine opposes the new body, believing it will create a "third tier" of suprastate structures.

· In Ukraine, economic advisor to President Kravchuk Lionel Stoleru indicates Ukraine sees no future in the CIS and wishes to integrate into the European Community. Stoleru says the whole of Ukraine's "economic program is oriented toward leaving Russia, to cutting the links, including the link of the currency, without cutting trade."

14 · CIS Deputy Commander-in-chief General Boris Pyankov claims that all nuclear weapons have been removed from the Transcaucasus.

20 · CIS heads of state meet in Kiev. Opinions differ over military issues. An agreement on a CIS peacekeeping force is among seventeen documents signed, rejected only by Armenia and Azerbaijan. Kravchuk and Yeltsin exchange harsh words over the question of Russian domination of CIS military and political structures. The Council, however, confirms the appointments of CIS Armed Forces Chief of the General Staff Col.-Gen. Viktor Samsonov, CIS Strategic Forces Commander-in-chief Yuriy Maksimov, and CIS General Purpose Armed Forces Commander-in-chief Vladimir Semyonov.

2 · Kyrgyz President Askar Akaev tells the press that the recent Kiev summit of CIS heads of state produced radical results only in the military field, but failed in the most important area, economics. Akaev believes that until a “strong foundation for economic cooperation” is achieved, the CIS will remain a fragile body. “Free trade, free provision of services, free movement of people without customs or barriers, and the free movement of capital around the countries of the Commonwealth,” according the Akaev, are the requirements for an effective organization. Akaev also believes no additional suprastate structures are needed and that existing councils are sufficient coordinating bodies to achieve the above tasks. Concluding his interview, Akaev says the most important element for a successful Commonwealth “is to find more mutual confidence with each other.”

- In Azerbaijan, a news conference is held with the theme “The Slavic Card in Russia’s Caucasian Policy.” Public organizations, Azeri journalists, and some political officials attend the conference, which highlights the fact that all former Soviet republics experiencing ethnic strife and political conflict turn to Russia for assistance, only to have Russia manipulate the situation for its own interests. Many participants note this phenomenon in Russia’s handling of the conflict in Nagorno-Karabakh, and that the Russian press fails to report accurately on developments in the conflict.

- In Georgia, Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev holds talks with Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze. The two lay the groundwork for a “big treaty” which will provide a contractual and legal basis for relations between the two countries. Kozyrev tells journalists the main element of his trip is to ensure successful relations under the new conditions.

6 · CIS intelligence service representatives agree to coordinate their efforts. The agreement, according to Kazakh KGB Chairman Bulat Baekenov, more clearly defines the tactics and strategies of the intelligence services.

8 · Eduard Shevardnadze states that he is “not optimistic about the future of the CIS.” He believes that since the body originated with little preparation, circumstances will deteriorate and the body will be unable to function because of disagreement and political infighting.

9 · In Ukraine, the National Assembly adopts a statement viewing a Yeltsin decree that transfers the Black Sea Fleet (BSF) to Russia’s jurisdiction as a “declaration of war.” The statement gives the Assembly’s full support to President Kravchuk’s decree on building a Ukrainian armed forces that envisions the Black Sea Fleet as part of the military.

10 · Belarusian parliament head Stanislav Shushkevich defends the CIS during a visit to France. He tells French journalists: “Nowadays, it has become unpopular to defend the concept of the CIS, but, for as long as the Commonwealth has existed, my position has not altered. I am still an ardent supporter of a just Commonwealth of truly independent states.” Along these lines, Shushkevich argues that a deteriorated CIS will mean the economic collapse of most of the republics “that is not only detrimental to them, but it is very unprofitable for the West.” He also touches on organizational issues critical for an effective CIS, the consequences of inaction by outsiders in many of the conflict zones in the former Soviet Union, and on the ways in which the global powers could assist the CIS and its members.

13 · In Bishkek, a meeting of the Central Asian republics is held. Kazakh President Nazarbaev speaks of the negative consequences of ethnic division and the conflicts now raging in some republics. He also warns of the friction developing in Ukrainian-Russian relations and points out that these two countries “bear too much responsibility for the destiny of all [CIS] peoples,” something he asks all the leaders to consider. He asks the Central Asian republics to take steps to combat this trend.

14 · Georgian President Shevardnadze rules out joining the CIS, saying Georgia “will not have anything in common with the CIS.” He indicates, however, that the republic needs help from Russia and advocates equal relations with it.

15 · CIS representatives meet in Kiev to discuss USSR property issues. Experts focus on shares of property due to each republic— A draft agreement is drawn up that will be presented to the Council of CIS Heads of State.

22 · Moscow columnist Anatoliy Karpychev, writing in Kuranty, warns that Russia should not engage in hard-line politics when crafting CIS policy. He points out the negative mindset of many CIS republican leaders created by Russia's "imperial policies" and the disintegrative effects such a policy has even if it is only in rhetoric. He writes that a hard-line policy will not solidify the CIS but ensure its demise and, contrary to the view of many Russian politicians, "would not be Russia's strength but its weakness."

23 · In Moldova, President Snegur meets with Moldovan Democratic Party (MDP) representatives who question joining the CIS. In particular, the MDP leadership argues that "independent Moldova cannot reconcile itself with the pressure of another independent state," referring to the secessionist movement in Trans-Dniester.

24 · In Alma-Ata, CIS interior ministers meet to discuss crime prevention. The participants all note an increase in organized crime that "recognizes no borders," especially when many Commonwealth borders are poorly patrolled. They note the destabilizing effects such crime has on the political, social, and economic well-being of their countries and people and agree to establish specific cooperation measures to combat such activity.

· Central Asian leaders (less Tajik President Nabiev) again meet in Bishkek. Participants focus on creation of a Turkic-Asiatic economic and political space, with Uzbekistan's Karimov arguing that the national wealth of the Central Asian states should first and foremost benefit the people in the region and secondly be used for its neighbors (hinting at Russia). Kyrgyzstan's Akaev reminds all that Russia remains a very reliable partner for the republic and cautions against ignoring Russia. According to some commentators, the meeting consolidated the region's desire for forming a Turkic-Asian community and for using such a policy to sever the traditional Russian role in Central Asia, but without negative economic consequences for the republics.

29 · In Ukraine, Russia and Ukraine begin talks on Black Sea Fleet (BSF) issues. Reports highlight the secrecy of the talks. The Ukrainian Defense Ministry's chief naval expert Anatoliy Katalov says the talks will focus on reaching a common approach to dividing BSF equipment, personnel, and bases. Ukraine views the BSF as the fleet of the former USSR, while Russia considers it part of the CIS.

30 · Ukrainian and Russian negotiators sign a "communiqué on progress" pledging that both sides will "adhere to a moratorium on any unilateral actions complicating the situation around the Black Sea Fleet."

· Representatives of ten oblasts from Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine meet in Chernigov. They sign an agreement at the local oblast level outlining the main directions for cooperation during their transition to market economies. Also stipulated in the agreement are provisions for cooperation in science, culture, and public health.

2 · Former commander of the Northern Fleet Admiral Feliks Gromov is promoted to CIS Naval Forces first deputy commander-in-chief, replacing the retired Admiral Ivan Kapitanets.

7 · CIS defense ministers sign ten out of eleven draft CIS military agreements. Ukraine and Azerbaijan do not initial documents concerning the creation of CIS common defense structures.

15 · Azerbaijan and the CIS main naval staff reach agreement on the division of the Caspian Sea Flotilla. The two sides agree that Azerbaijan and Russia will retain control of one-quarter of the ships and facilities of the flotilla. The fate of the remaining 50 percent is to be determined during negotiations with Kazakhstan and Turkmenistan.

9 · CIS economic experts reach agreement on a working document establishing national currencies in the former republics. Those creating their own monies will function outside the “ruble zone.”

29 · The Ukrainian deputy prime minister and economics minister, Vladimir Lanovoy, states that the CIS has no future “on the economic level.”

Political

1 · In Kiev, the Ukrainian Republican Party (URP)-an influential faction of 12,000 members-holds a third congress. The body votes for Ukraine to leave the CIS, considering that the “main mission of the CIS-the civilized self-liquidation of the empire-has been completed.”

6 · In Moldova, the Moldovan Christian-Democratic Popular Front urges the republic to completely secede from the CIS, consolidate its independence from Russia, and reorient its economy toward cooperation with the West. The chairman of the party’s Executive Committee, Yuriy Roshka, says Moldova must take these steps to strengthen its independence and sovereignty. Other measures advocated by the faction include introduction of a national currency, secession from the ruble zone, and a friendship and cooperation agreement with Romania. Roshka also calls for labeling the Russian 14th Army in Moldova an “occupation force.”

10-12 · In Ashkhabad, seven Central Asian leaders hold talks (Turkmenistan, Iran, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Pakistan, Uzbekistan, and Turkey). The participants focus on promotion of economic cooperation and deepening ties among them. A number of documents are signed, of which Turkmen President Niyazov assures that none collide with CIS member states' interests and in fact may prove beneficial to some republics. The agreements signed are left open for other interested parties.

14 · In Moscow, Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev says the future of the CIS is "very obscure," believing that "mutual threats will lead to a deadlock not only in relations between neighboring states but the [CIS] as a whole." He stresses that Kazakhstan will continue to build "equal, good-neighborly" relations with Russia, a policy "vital for Kazakhstan."

· The EC Commission holds a seminar in Maastricht attended by CIS officials. The seminar is organized to provide information on European integration they might find useful in CIS development. Armenian Vice Premier G. Aresyan says the EC experience can be helpful in this regard. He notes that the impulse for European integration stemmed from the "need to prevent wars, . . . to halt Europe's economic decline."

17 · Yeltsin tells press he is satisfied with the Tashkent summit, describing it as "useful and fruitful." He assures listeners that the CIS is "a live and growing organism and I believe in its productivity." Of the thirteen documents adopted, Yeltsin hails the Treaty on Collective Security, signed by Russia, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Armenia, and Tajikistan as the most important. The treaty is left open for other CIS members.

13 · In Tashkent, CIS defense ministers meet to draft an appeal to the heads of state urging them to preserve the joint armed forces.

15 · The CIS heads of state meet in Tashkent. Only Russia, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Belarus, and Armenia are represented by heads of state; the other five by heads of government. Ukraine, Belarus, Azerbaijan, and Turkmenistan reject the Collective Security Treaty. Other agreements include the manning and financing of frontier troops, the formation of CIS peacekeeping forces, and fulfilling the USSR's obligations on chemical weapons control.

18 · While traveling to Washington, Nazarbaev announces that his government will allow Russia to base its nuclear missiles on Kazakh territory.

25 · Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Moldova, Russia, and Ukraine inform NATO of their plan for complying with the treaty on Conventional Forces in Europe. Russia will maintain 54 percent of the allotted troops and hardware, Ukraine 27 percent, and Belarus 12 percent. Armenia, Georgia, Moldova, and Azerbaijan split the remaining 7 percent.

26 · CIS defense ministers meet in Moscow and agree on the composition of the CIS Strategic Forces. They will consist of the Strategic Rocket Forces, nuclear components from the air force and the navy, the ballistic-missile warning system, anti-missile defense systems, and space forces.

Economic

17 · On 26 June CIS prime ministers will meet to discuss a wide range of economic issues. Coordinator of CIS's working group Ivan Korotchenya tells reporters "the economic agenda will be vast as usual." The prime ministers will discuss, in particular, ways to protect the interests of states belonging to the ruble zone in the event of new national currencies being introduced in some other states.

· In Bishkek, all fifteen former Soviet republics sign a protocol stipulating that by 1 September states will agree on volumes of trade for 1993 based on free-market prices.

18 · The exchange rate of the Ukrainian coupon is falling rapidly against the ruble and is now worth less than one ruble. Early in July Ukraine expects to withdraw from the ruble zone and later introduce its own currency, the hryvna.

19 · Russia's Central Bank proposes to the Russian parliament that it declare insolvent several central banks of other CIS members, including Ukraine's. The action would represent a "penalty" for failing to fulfill agreements on the coordination of credit and monetary policies within the ruble zone. With many billions in debt to Russia, Ukraine has still decided to issue 300 billion rubles in credits to Ukrainian enterprises. The enterprises will use this money to settle accounts with Russian enterprises, dealing a heavy inflationary blow to Russia's economy. The Central Bank also recommends that the government set strict limits on supplies for Ukraine from Russian enterprises.

20 · Ukraine cuts the flow of Russian oil through the Druzhba pipeline to Hungary and the Czech Republic by 25 percent. The decision seeks to force Russia to pay $5.5 million in past-due transit fees.

25 · In Minsk, CIS representatives talk inconclusively on currency issues. (Moldova and Azerbaijan send only observers.) Russia, planning to standardize its internal ruble exchange rates from 1 July, needs specific agreements on which states would stay within the ruble zone, and on procedures for the introduction of separate currencies by certain republics. Russia, which controls ruble printing, is currently forced to extend credit to other republics. Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Moldova, Kazakhstan, Russia, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan agree to introduce standardized customs tariffs and categorize foreign trade lists.

- The leaders of eleven Black Sea states meet in Istanbul to sign a Declaration of Black Sea Economic Cooperation. The states include: Russia, Turkey, Bulgaria, Greece, Azerbaijan, Armenia, Ukraine, Moldova, Georgia, Romania, and Albania. The document states that the Black Sea region must become a sea of peace, stability, and prosperity.

- Presidents Kravchuk and Shevardnadze confirm intentions to sign major interstate economic and political agreements.

Political

2 · The Ukrainian parliament rejects Russia's 21 May Supreme Soviet vote annulling the 1954 decree transferring the Crimea from Russia to Ukraine.

10 · Russia and Kyrgyzstan sign a friendship treaty.

23 · Boris Yeltsin and Leonid Kravchuk meet in Dagomys to work on a comprehensive political treaty "reflecting the new quality of their relationship." They discuss transferring ex-Soviet property abroad to Ukraine and methods to introduce a Ukrainian currency.

30 · The Ukrainian parliament passes constitutional amendments on the status of the Crimea. These include Crimean autonomy and new citizenship provisions which read: “each citizen of the Republic of Crimea is simultaneously a citizen of Ukraine.”

Security

2 · Boris Yeltsin announces an immediate strengthening of surveillance along Russia’s border with other CIS states. Formal border controls with Azerbaijan, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and Ukraine and a customs border with Georgia will be established. According to an Izvestiya article, visafree regimes recently introduced in some CIS states have been allowing “criminals and spies” to enter Russia through transparent ex-Soviet internal borders.

11 · Kazakh soldiers mutiny in Arkhangelsk oblast, Russia, objecting to “serving in a foreign state.”

13 · The former Soviet Turkestan military district will be disbanded by 30 June 1992. Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan fall within the district’s jurisdiction.

July 1992

Economic

6 · The CIS heads of state meet in Moscow. Agreement is reached on creating a CIS Economic Court, dividing USSR property, and coordinating new currencies when member states depart from the ruble zone.

9 · In Ukraine, Vice-President and Minister of Economics Vladimir Lanovoy declares that he will resign because “intimidation has set in.” He tells Nezavisimaya Gazeta that he is “sick and tired of playing the role of mimic .... I would like to engage in reforms, not support their mimicry.” Asked whether he received the Ukrainian president's support in his independent economic reform positions, he replies: "I did not receive the president's support." Lanovoy calls the program for privatizing state property a restoration of neo-socialism through collective forms.

10 · Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Russia, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan establish the Interstate Economic Committee and the Interstate Ecological Fund. Ukraine attends the meeting but does not sign. Azerbaijan, Moldova, and Turkmenistan do not attend.

14 · Vice-President Aleksandr Rutskoy visits Moldova to engage in “civilized dialogue.” State advisor to the Moldovan president Cheslav Chobanu emphasizes the need to shift attention from the political to the economic sphere.” “Russia is our largest partner and we always maintain traditionally beneficial relations,” he notes.

28 · A detailed article in Rossiyskie Vesti analyzes Russia’s “special economic relations” with former Soviet republics. These represent a combination of economic and geopolitical interests plus a concern for Russians living abroad. The author says it is “impossible to separate these three groups of interests from one another .... We would like to retain deep integration with all the former republics of the USSR making no exception for anyone ...” The model of integration lies in “a single economic area, including a common monetary and credit system; non-restrictions on the shipment of goods, services, and capital; free movement of peoples; a coordinated socio-economic policy; and a common line toward third countries. ”

Political

6 · The Council of CIS Heads of State meets in Moscow. (Azerbaijan does not participate.) The main result is an agreement to establish joint peacemaking forces to intervene in CIS conflicts. Also, an economic court is established, with headquarters in Minsk. Kyrgyz President Akaev describes it as “a mechanism for the resolution of disputes concerning economic cooperation and ... for exclusive discipline over economic obligations.” A proposal by Kazakh

President Nursultan Nazarbaev to establish a consultative economic coordination council and a military coordinating council is met with general approval. Nazarbaev points to OPEC and NATO as models for the putative councils. Three documents are signed on issues of legal succession to the USSR regarding treaties, property, archives, debts, and assets. A second group of issues, on which a protocol is signed, concerns collective security, including missile early-warning systems, space control, anti-aircraft defense, a collective security council, the composition of CIS strategic forces, leadership of the CIS joint armed forces and the protection of state borders. The four states with nuclear weapons on their territory agree to meet separately to discuss transferring these weapons to Russia. The question of interim control over nuclear weapons in Ukraine had been removed from the agenda, as it was felt that there was no likelihood of an agreement at the summit. Ukraine has insisted on retaining operational control over long-range nuclear weapons deployed on its territory. The participants warn that by next summit, states which have not ratified their membership in the CIS (Azerbaijan and Moldova) should do so. The concept of a statute for the CIS was mooted and met with general agreement, even from Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk, who had previously opposed the creation of CIS bodies.

9 · The Crimean Supreme Soviet votes against holding the referendum on independence planned for 2 August.

11 · Kasatonov and Ukrainian Naval Commander-in-chief Boris Khozhin meet in Sevastopol to sign an agreement that neither side will take unilateral actions with regard to the Black Sea Fleet (BSF). Nevertheless, a BSF naval infantry unit seizes the military commandant's office of the Sevastopol garrison and forcibly removes the Ukrainian commander.

17 · Armenia and Georgia establish diplomatic relations.

26 · Except in the Black Sea Fleet and the Caspian Sea Flotilla, CIS naval ships begin to fly the Russian naval flag.

Security

2-3 · CIS defense ministers meet in Moscow. Although the meeting fails to remove tensions between Ukraine and Russia over administrative controls of nuclear weapons in Ukraine, CIS agreements are signed on anti-missile defense and control over space projects, air defense, and on a council of collective security.

6 · The CIS heads of state meet in Moscow. They agree in principle to create peacekeeping forces numbering between 2,000 and 10,000 with the first deployment to monitor the ceasefire in Moldova. The question of the administrative control of Ukraine's nuclear weapons remains unsolved. The participants agree to restructure the CIS Border Forces by establishing a CIS Council of Commanders of Border Forces. Finally, Col.-Gen. Boris Pyankov is confirmed as CIS deputy commander.

· Shaposhnikov announces that the main functions of the CIS command are centralized control over strategic nuclear arms, coordination of military doctrines and military reforms of CIS member states, and the settling of armed conflicts both inside and along the periphery of the CIS. The CIS command will have 300 military and 100 civilian employees and will be subordinate to the CIS heads of state. The CIS command will also manage the meetings of the CIS Defense Ministers' Council. That council will have a committee for coordinating nuclear strategy and a secretariat.

10 · Director of the CIS Naval Press Service Novikov warns that CIS naval personnel are upset over delays in receiving their pay. R1.5 billion have yet to be distributed.

16 · CIS defense and foreign ministers meet in Tashkent to discuss deployment of peacekeeping forces within the CIS.

27 · CIS Naval Commander-in-chief Admiral Vladimir Chernavin becomes Russian naval commander-in-chief and a member of the Russian Ministry of Defense Collegium. He asserts that the Baltic Fleet will remain in the Baltic, and that the fleet command hopes to secure bases in Tallinn, Estonia, and in Liepaja, Latvia.

15 · Azerbaijan announces its intention to assume its $1.63 million share of the former USSR's foreign debt.

28 · Russia is able to pay only $2 billion of its external debt in 1992, according to Acting Prime Minister Egor Gaydar. Russia and the CIS were to have paid $9.8 billion of the former USSR's debts, but as of 27 July Russia had paid approximately $1 billion.

28 · In Russia, Aleksei Mamontov, chief of the Currency Marketing Department at the Moscow Interbank Currency Exchange, calls the fall in the dollar rate of the ruble the result of a true "panic" in currency trading. Inflationary expectation is so high that speculation is running rampant. (The rate stood at $1 for 205 rubles on 27 August.) The Gaydar government is surrendering one position after another and monetarism is falling. According to one reporter, "the Central Bank's new leadership has, for all intents and purposes, rejected the stabilization of the ruble and embarked on the tried and true path of printing money. Rubles will become more plentiful and goods more scarce."

31 · Russia and Belarus sign an agreement under which Russia will pay the Belarusian share of the total foreign

1 · A senior banker from the Central Bank of Russia (CBR) admits to an ITAR-TASS reporter that the CBR exceeded its authority when it instructed Russian enterprises to curb shipments to Commonwealth states because of their debts to Russia. “We did not take into account the commitments of the Commonwealth members and tried to protect only our own interests,” Chief Administrator Sergey Panov told TASS. The new leadership of the bank canceled the order.

8 · Russia concludes agreements with Belarus, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan according to which Russia will assume these republics’ share of the former Soviet Union’s foreign debt in return for their portion of the Soviet Union’s assets.

· Georgia issues a decree which restricts imports and exports of goods on Georgian territory, irrespective of the form of ownership. The decree sets quotas and authorizes rules and regulations for Georgian trade.

14 · Moscow television reports that as the first congress of industrialists opens in Kazakhstan, a list of economic woes is compiled. Since the beginning of 1992, 80,000 people have lost their jobs. More than 300 factories have ceased part or all of their production activities. Prices are skyrocketing, but there is nothing to buy. Laws and economic decrees are issued, but ignored, and people are becoming catastrophically impoverished.

20 · In Belarus, the government bans free sales of hard currency, and suggests assessing exporters a tax on hard currency profits of 10 percent of the contract price. If the tax is not paid within thirty days of receipt of profits the penalty will be 100 percent of the unpaid amount.

22 · In Russia, the Central Bank suspends indefinitely financial transactions between Russia and Ukraine, on orders from the Russian government. Transactions will resume when the two governments settle mutual payments for goods supplied. Russia contends that Ukraine is exporting inflation to it when Ukrainian enterprises purchase Russian goods with credits issued by Ukraine. Although Russia has the monopoly on printing money, all former Soviet republics can issue credits to their industries.

24 · In an exclusive interview with Interfax, Chairman of the Belarusian parliament Stanislav Shushkevich speaks in favor of reintroducing elements of economic planning. The prime minister's chief economic advisor, Yevsey Makhlin, shares the view that a general and detailed plan for economic development in Belarus "for several years ahead, taking into account political and economic shifts eventually taking place" is needed. Makhlin says that economic plans can be and are always amended to take account of "unexpected realities."

27 · Kazakhstan and Japan agree to form a Kazakh-Japanese coordinating structure for economic cooperation.

· President Sapamurad Niyazov says that Turkmenistan plans to build a democratic and secular state with diverse forms of ownership. He expresses confidence that the country can ease the pain of economic transition through sales of oil, gas, cotton, and related processed products.

16 · The first Interparliamentary Assembly of CIS member states is held in Bishkek. Participating are delegations from Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, and Tajikistan-six of the seven states which had agreed to an interparliamentary assembly in April. Uzbekistan sends no delegation. Ruslan Khasbulatov, chairman of the Russian Supreme Soviet, is elected for a one-year term as chairman of the Assembly, whose seat would be in St. Petersburg. He speaks strongly in favor of increased cooperation among CIS states, mentioning a “supranational parliament” and common citizenship.

· The CIS summit meeting scheduled for 25 September is postponed until 9 October to allow more time for finalizing the working documents for discussion at the meeting. The delay apparently stems from disagreement between Russia and Ukraine over control of the nuclear weapons stationed in Ukraine.

25 · Crimean Republic’s Supreme Soviet adopts amendments to rectify the “defects” in the constitution adopted in May. It confirms that the Crimean Republic is “a legal, democratic, secular state within the structure of Ukraine,” whose jurisdiction “is determined by its constitution and the law of Ukraine on the delimitation of powers between the bodies of power of Ukraine and the Crimean Republic.”

1 · Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan sign a treaty on friendship and cooperation and conclude a trade and economic treaty for 1993. Included in the friendship treaty is a defense cooperation agreement, covering material provisions for the armed forces and officer training.

9 · The CIS Council of Heads of State meets in Bishkek. (No delegation from Azerbaijan is present.) Agreement is reached on a number of economic issues. A “consultative working commission” will be set up “under the Councils of Heads of State and Government”-a watered-down version of a proposed permanent Consultative and Coordinating Economic Council-on convergence of the economic laws of commonwealth states. The establishment of an interstate bank to coordinate fiscal policy in the ruble zone was agreed to in principle by six member states-Belarus, Russia, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and Armenia. Military matters discussed at the summit include the situation in Tajikistan, the general concept of military security in the CIS, and the status of strategic and nuclear weapons in CIS member states. Agreement is reached on sending humanitarian assistance to Tajikistan and on reinforcing military units present in the republics, but not on sending peacekeeping units. A statute on the CIS joint armed forces high command is also signed, which according to Commander-in-chief of the CIS forces Evgeniy Shaposhnikov will “allow the basis of military policy and the collective defense of CIS states to be determined” and “put an end to uncertainty.” Regarding strategic and nuclear forces, Shaposhnikov claims that the situation remains essentially unchanged, with Russia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, and Ukraine in the process of negotiating bilateral agreements. Ukraine, however, remains reluctant to relinquish control over the nuclear missiles on its territory.

6-7 · CIS defense ministers meet in Bishkek.

8-9 · A joint session of the Councils of Heads of State and Government convenes in Bishkek. All ten members participate and Georgia and Azerbaijan send observers. The parties agree to cooperate in ensuring the stability of the Commonwealth's external frontiers. On the issue of nuclear weapons control, Belarus and Kazakhstan agree to turn over their launch codes to Russia and to dismantle their weapons within three years. Ukraine refuses to go along. A CIS draft treaty on defense and collective security is signed except for Ukraine and Moldova. It calls for members to defend each other from external threats. Yuriy Maksimov is removed from the position of CIS commander-in-chief for strategic rocket forces. No replacement is named.

16 · The CIS High Command expresses concern over the disintegration of the former Soviet air defense system in Central Asia and the Caucasus. Radar stations continue to close as military specialists flee ethnic fighting.

December 1992

Economic

6 · In Armenia, a dramatic energy crisis evolves. The republic is receiving less than 4,000,000 cubic meters of gas per day, as compared to requirement of 7,500,000. The shortages are primarily a consequence of a blockade by Azerbaijan-itself a result of the dispute over Nagorno- Karabakh-which has forced the closure of pipelines bringing Turkmen gas to Armenia via Azerbaijan. Supplies from Russia via Georgia are down by one-third, due to a combination of pressure from Azerbaijan, pilfering, and local disruption as a result of fighting in the area. Azeri pressure is also said to be behind Turkey's decision not to go ahead with scheduled daily deliveries of 30-35 Kw of electricity to Armenia, due to begin on 1 December.

7 · CIS agricultural figures are released. Total grain production rises 18 percent primarily from Kazakhstan's record harvest. State procurement of potatoes and processed sugar has dropped all around. Meat production falls 14 percent and milk, 12 percent.

17 · The World Bank estimates the former Soviet external debt at $75.4 billion in mid-1992. Repayment arrears at that time amounted to $9.4 billion. Nearly 52 percent of the total debt is due for repayment within the next three years.

Security

11 · At the 7th Russian Congress of People's Deputies, Shaposhnikov calls for "strong coordinating bodies" between Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and Armenia. He states that Turkmenistan and Belarus favor closer integration into a NATO-type security system.

16 · The Belarusian parliament votes by an overwhelming majority not to join the CIS Collective Security Treaty concluded in Tashkent on 15 May.

21 · Shaposhnikov meets with CIS representatives. He complains that the CIS Collective Security Treaty and arrangements on peacekeeping forces have failed to work. Moreover, he states that a recent inspection of the strategic nuclear forces revealed security violations.

28 · Shaposhnikov expresses concern about the combat readiness of the CIS forces.

January 1993

Economic

1 · Ivan Korotchenya, coordinator of the CIS staff in Minsk, says the CIS is just a system of “units,” not an integral structure. He characterizes “The Economic Court, the Coordination Economic Council, as conceived but not yet born....”

· The Moldovan first deputy minister of economics, Deakonu, says it is better for Moldova to be part of a single economic space (buying petrol at 1.2 times the domestic price) than to face the plight of the Baltics, buying resources at 3-3.5 times domestic prices. He notes the economic crisis in Moldova during the first eleven months of 1991 (industrial production fell 25 percent from same period in 1990; trade shrank by 50 percent; investment by 30 percent).

4 · The Central Asian states hold a major regional summit where the governments declare a Central Asian Economic Union, but claim it does not compete with the CIS Economic Union. Moscow regards the summit as a definite challenge to its authority and leadership within the CIS.

5 · Prime Minister Kuchma tells Ukrainian reporters that “First and foremost, Ukraine is dependent on Russia.” He points to fascination with sovereignty as the cause of the breakdown in former Soviet economic supply networks. “Every state wants to make everything for itself,” he says.

6 · In an interview preceding a bilateral summit with Yeltsin, President Kravchuk says, “I’m in bed with an elephant. This is a nightmare—I’m afraid that I might wake him up.” He says that Ukraine is primarily interested in an energy agreement, and is dependent on a single “Russian pipe.” He is sure that Russia will have an energy quota in mind, but Ukraine will present its own “quota list.” (Ukraine produces 90 percent of aeroengines in the CIS, and most sugar and sunflower oil.) He adds that Ukraine and Russia must start to reform absurd “unbreakable ties,” and initiate new and mutually advantageous ones.

· In Belarus, the independent paper Belarusian Businessman forecasts that as a result of disrupted CIS interenterprise payments and high taxes for social protection, the GNP will not grow in 1993.

7 · Russia and Kazakhstan conclude an agreement under which Kazakhstan will supply 14 million tons of oil to Russian refineries while Russia will supply more than 12 million tons of oil from western Siberia to Kazakhstan, in order to save on transportation costs.

· Ukrainian Deputy Prime Minister Viktor Penzenyk discusses Ukraine’s share of the former Soviet debt to foreign banks and governments, which is 16.4 percent. Ukraine and Russia were to sign an agreement on the debt before the end of 1992, but failed.

10 · Several Ukrainian political parties call for an end to the country’s isolationist policy, which they say is “leading Ukraine into a blind alley.” They protest Ukraine’s withdrawing from the CIS, claiming that separation will lead to mass poverty and destruction.

11 · The Ukrainian government decides not to give

Russia authority over administering its portion of the former Soviet debt.

12 · Ukrainian Prime Minister Kuchma threatens to resign because of Russia's new policy to raise energy prices, and the Russian Central Bank's refusal to pay Russian state enterprise debts to Ukraine.

(Gerashchenko says the Russian state is not responsible for its enterprises' actions.) In response, Kuchma tells Ukrainian enterprises to require prepayment from Russian customers.

- In Turkmenistan, President Niyazov states that he believes the country's new currency, the manat, will be stable because the economic potential of the country is strong. Turkmenistan possesses indigenous supplies of oil and gas, ores, and mineral salts (including iodine).

- In Russia, Arkadiy Volskiy, president of the Russian Union of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs, says an agreement to step up economic links between the CIS republics is essential. He says priority should be given to agro-industrial and pharmaceutical sectors, because agricultural processing, storage, and transport are in such lamentable condition that only 50 percent of the harvest reaches the shops. He adds that $5 billion worth of grain and $2 billion of other foodstuffs are procured abroad. If only half of these funds were directed toward the infrastructure, the situation would improve dramatically. Russia has only 60 percent of the medicines it needs, he continues. "Economics are a far greater danger to democracy than the issue of a referendum on the constitution." On reforms, he says "price liberalization is not a panacea. It should be the final stage of reform, whereas we are still in the initial stage."

- CIS-wide data from the State Committee for Cooperation shows that the volume of industrial production in the Commonwealth countries dropped 18-20 percent in 1992 in comparison with 1991, while the GNP declined by 20 percent. Real monetary incomes of the population decreased twofold. Prices rose fourteen times, wages increased approximately seven times. Trade turnover among CIS member states decreased 50 percent.

14 · In Tajikistan, the minister of economics says regions of country have lost their workforce due to fierce fighting. (The exodus of Russian citizens from Tajikistan has been very heavy-50,000 in the last few months of 1992.)

· In Georgia, Deputy Prime Minister Roman Gotsiridze, returning from Moscow, supports economic cooperation with Russia in exchange for Russian subsidies in the amount of "tens of billions of rubles." The Georgian parliament issues a strong rebuke of Gotsiridze's recommendations and demands withdrawal from the CIS.

15 · The Georgian government signs an agreement to join the single monetary "ruble zone." Russian pressure in the form of withholding 15 billion rubles from the Georgian budget in December 1991, combined with total denial of transfers in January 1992, is a critical factor in the decision.

18 · In Kyrgyzstan, President Akaev says the Russian changeover to world pricing with CIS states bears witness to the impossibility of achieving constructive economic relations within the CIS framework. He calls for use of Kyrgyz "trump cards" at the 22 January Minsk summit.

· The CIS working group announces that it will consider forming a consortium to build an automobile factory in Elabuga, Tatarstan. Tatarstan would hold a 25 percent share; Ukraine—15 percent; Belarus-10 percent; Uzbekistan- 10 percent; and Kyrgyzstan-5 percent. Components would be manufactured in the republics entering the concern. Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin is the originator of the concept. The factory in Elabuga was started in the 1970s, but was suspended for lack of funds.

- In Ukraine, President Kravchuk holds a news conference on the upcoming Moscow meeting. He says an economic policy must be built on links between states that are needed, but some links are not needed by any state. He notes that meeting international standards of production, quality, and accounting would provide an alternative to tight integration among CIS states.

19 · Also in Ukraine, several Donbass mining associations say the economic survival of all CIS states is possible only under conditions of restoring the ties established by the former USSR.

- In Kazakhstan, visiting President Ter-Petrosyan arranges natural gas deliveries to Armenia. All industry has stopped in Armenia due to the energy shortage.

- Kazakh President Nazarbaev tells journalists that economic liberalization rules dictated by Russia “have not justified themselves”-but then calls for a revival of state planning.

21 · In Ukraine, the government announces that it will pay its share of the former Soviet debt (16.4 percent), but will also retain its share of former Soviet assets.

- Ukrainian Prime Minister Kuchma says the Ukrainian economic crisis is a result of “disintegration” and the “decolonization” of the economy. He says that under conditions of political stability, Ukraine and Russia could sign mutually advantageous treaties of economic “partnership.”

22 · The second CIS summit is held in Minsk. A document creating a CIS Interstate Bank is signed by seven members. Russian CIS delegates describe this as a major achievement. (The Bank is never implemented.)

· Igor Shichanin, Russian chief of CIS affairs, says the CIS was formed to ensure a unified national economy. He says quite a few sectoral coordinating organs have been set up-in railroad transport, fuel, energy-and that the level of integration in the CIS is much higher than in the EC, although the comparison is not justified.

25 · In Belarus, President Shushkevich discusses the CIS summit of 22 January, saying that the economic agreements are the most important. He wants the CIS to adopt strict financial and credit rules. He also desires a strong Interstate Bank in which Russia has 50 percent of votes.

26 · In Russia, the Customs Committee toughens customs regulations on borders with other CIS states, citing too many exports of staples under the guise of “barter” deals.

· The three largest commercial banks of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus (Promstroybank, Prominvestbank, and Belpromstroybank, respectively) sign an agreement to coordinate banking activity.

27 · At a World Economic Forum in Davos, Belarusian Shushkevich says: “the two major European economic groups will be the EEC and the East European Economic Community (EEEC), which means that the CIS, and the two will begin drawing closer-perhaps as early as 2000-to form a “common European home.”

Political

1 · In Belarus, President Shushkevich calls the CIS a “historic inevitability,” and says “every other variant would have been worse.” He places his faith in the Interparliamentary Assembly for determining the approach to integration. He thinks it is too early for a confederation, as Russia wishes, but not for a “real common market, currency, and common charter.”

3-4 · The summit of Central Asian states in Tashkent erects a system of bilateral and multilateral treaties, which they will call the “Central Asian Commonwealth.” (Attendees: Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkestan, Uzbekistan.) Uzbek president Karimov says each state wants guarantees that it is free to develop the way it deems correct. Kazakh president Nazarbaev says steps are being taken to start a Central Asian common market, with common taxation rates, customs, pricing, investment, and export policies. He adds that the five would like to preserve the ruble zone-but on a principle of equality with Russia. The participants reconfirm their commitment to the CIS in general, but complain of being seen by some as “younger brothers” within the CIS. Awareness of the shortcomings of the CIS is widely seen as the motivating force behind the decision to set up some form of regional association.

4 · In Ukraine, President Kravchuk says that before his government will sign the draft CIS Charter, it must conclude large-scale economic agreements and interstate treaties with Russia and other CIS member states. He argues that the emphasis must lie on wider bilateral and multilateral cooperation within the CIS. In his opinion, any integration process must first resolve economic problems, then address political problems. Most Ukrainian political leaders oppose the charter-arguing that it would upset the principle of voluntary membership in the CIS, violating the declarations signed in Minsk and Alma-Ata.

5 · In Turkmenistan, President Niyazov says the CIS is developing on the basis of bilateral agreements. He says every CIS state needs to develop its own sovereignty.

· In Ukraine, President Kravchuk says the CIS draft charter does not serve Ukraine’s national interests. He says Ukraine will not participate in the CIS as an associate or observer. In his view, Ukraine might consider some documents on the agenda, but these could take decades to work out. “I held a post in the CPSU when the USSR existed as an empire. Now I’ll spare no efforts to oppose attempts to return to an empire.” “Russia pursues a policy which meets its interests, but as a member of the UN and the CSCE, Russia should be guided by international norms and principles.”

- In Kyrgyzstan, President Akaev says the CIS does not meet the needs of its members in its present form. He calls for a three-tier arrangement consisting of: (a) a “corps” of member states; (b) associate members; and (c) observers.

- In Ukraine, commenting on the CIS Charter, President Kravchuk says: “who needs a statute? ... those who want to return to a unified state, and to turn the Commonwealth into a union.... as for why Russia wants the CIS, it is because Russia has never abandoned its intentions to be a superstate and a leading force in the CIS and beyond the boundaries of the CIS.”

6 · On the question of dual citizenship ( 1 million Ukrainian citizens are of Russian origin and 5 million of Ukrainian origin), President Kravchuk says: “It is difficult for me to explain why a Russian in Ukraine is free to choose his language, school, theater, cultural environment, ... when a Ukrainian in Russia is not.... Nowhere in Russia will you see a single newspaper nor hear a single broadcast in Ukrainian-even in Yakutia.”

- In Belarus, the state radio proposes that all future CIS sessions be held in Minsk. CIS presidents will vote on this proposal on 22 January, where the CIS is expected to be “given a second wind.” The headquarters of the CIS Coordinating Office are already in Minsk, but summits are moved from capital to capital.

- In Russia, Izvestiya calls the Central Asian summit a complete surprise. However, it denies the existence of a “Slavic bloc” and says Russia has problems similar to those of its southern neighbors. It adds that Russia and Central Asia have very major long-term interests in common-economic and geopolitical.

- In Ukraine, the Ukrainian National Assembly publicly alleges that “pro-imperial forces” are pushing Ukraine to sign the CIS Charter.

- Mikhail Horyn, Ivan Drach, and Dmitriy Pavlychko say that Ukraine must not sign the CIS Charter on 22 January.

Vyacheslav Chernovil says Rukh advocates Ukraine’s secession from the CIS. Stepan Khmara concurs with Rukh.

- The Ukrainian National Assembly rejects the Russian-Ukrainian Agreement on “Good Neighborly Relations, Cooperation, and Partnership” until the Russian Supreme Soviet rescinds its decision calling the 1954 transfer of Crimea to Ukraine illegal, and also the December 1992 resolution to give Russia control of Sevastopol.

7 · In Ukraine, President Kravchuk advises the authors of the CIS Charter to “get down to work and spend 10 years on it.” 10 · In Ukraine, Naval Commander Borys Kozhyn registers opposition to the Ukrainian-Russian Yalta agreement on the Black Sea Fleet. He says his task is to transfer the disputed navy to the Ukrainian Deputy of Defense’s jurisdiction without waiting for the political solution envisaged by the Yalta agreement.

11 · The Ukrainian deputy minister of defense, Ivan

Bizhan, says Ukraine is not taking control of its strategic nuclear forces. He notes that the administration of strategic weapons is still unified under the CIS Alma-Ata Agreement of 1991. However, he says the Ukrainian president wants the power to block the launching of strategic missiles.

14 · The Central Asian nations sign an international relations treaty in Bishkek, which Kyrgyz President Akaev says is needed to ensure the inviolability of existing borders. Territorial disputes among Central Asian states, which began in 1989 when the Soviet Union collapsed, have not yet been resolved. The treaty establishes diplomatic relations and embassies within the region.

· In Russia, First Deputy Prime Minister Vladimir Shumeyko says the future of the Commonwealth will depend to a great extent on the results of the upcoming summit in Minsk. He refuses to make forecasts, but assesses the effectiveness of the CIS economic mechanism as “something between bad and unsatisfactory.” He says bilateral cooperation within the CIS framework is more promising.

- An article in Rossiyskaya Gazeta investigates the possibility of the rise of a united “Turkestan” in the wake of the Tashkent summit of 4 January. It mentions a book by Lev Gumilev-“Millennium Around the Caspian,” which has appeared in Baku this year.

- In Ukraine, disaffected Donetsk political representatives appeal to President Kravchuk not to withdraw from the CIS, expressing the dominant views of miners in eastern Ukraine. (One day later they call for Kravchuk’s resignation.)

17 · In Crimea, the All-Crimea Movement organizes a rally in Sevastopol-calling for recreation of the USSR and shouting slogans of “Back to Russia.” O. Kruglov, chairman of the Sevastopol Committee of the National Salvation Front, says the city must become Russian even if a Slavic confederation is formed.

20 · In Russia, Andrey Kozyrev says Yeltsin will put forward a “solid package of principled ideas to strengthen the Commonwealth.” “Maybe this would be a CIS Doctrine,” he continues.

- Following a pre-summit meeting of CIS Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, it is announced that Ukraine and Turkmenistan are opposed to the CIS draft charter.

22 · On the day of the summit, in Tashkent, Kravchuk announces that “We oppose creation of any rigid suprastate structures with a center of any kind. Any problem within the so-called single space can be solved on the basis of bilateral relations.”

- Yeltsin tells reporters before flying to Minsk that a charter must be signed, noting that “to sign the charter without Ukraine would be undesirable.” He emphasizes that the five Central Asian nations should be prevented from sudden secession.

- In Minsk, after a day of debate, there is only partial agreement on a charter for closer political and economic integration. The charter is signed by seven of the ten attending states. (Georgia and Azerbaijan do not attend.) Only Russia and Kazakhstan express full support for the original draft charter, with Belarus expressing doubts about collective security arrangements, and Uzbekistan objecting to clauses covering human rights. Ukraine, Moldova, and Turkmenistan refuse to sign; all three will remain members of the CIS while they consider their positions. The ten republics reach an agreement on the creation of an interstate bank, to act as a clearinghouse for trade among them and to coordinate monetary, credit, and budgetary policy for those republics which remain in the ruble zone. The summit rejects Russia’s proposal to take control of nuclear weapons in Ukraine, Belarus, and Kazakhstan. Russian President Boris Yeltsin says a door had been left open, giving the dissenting republics three months to sign the charter. Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk says that the charter framework is too binding, but acknowledges that refusal to sign the charter does not mean that his republic is leaving the CIS.

- The CIS summit ends. Members deeply disagree over the outcome, especially on the form of relations (i.e., bilateral or suprastate authority given to coordinating bodies).

· In Ukraine, on the day of the summit, the speaker of the Ukrainian parliament, Ivan Plyushch, sends a letter to Ruslan Khasbulatov, head of the Russian parliament, accusing the Russian Supreme Soviet, in its latest decree on Sevastopol, of "a relapse into the past, an attempt to subdue Ukraine, and an attempt to set the two nations against one another and lead them to bloodshed."

23 · President Kravchuk says an all-Ukrainian referendum would be required to change the administrative status of Sevastopol. Russia will not resolve the problem without Ukraine, regardless of decrees or decisions adopted. He warns people not to yield to provocations.

24 · In Belarus, President Shushkevich is asked whether some former Soviet republics were forced to sign the CIS charter. He answers that: "Nobody signed the charter. Nobody, not a single side. A memorandum on the attitude to the charter was signed. The charter is very flexible because it can hardly be otherwise." He concludes: "There is no pressure here. There is a door which is kindly opened: Come in, please. What pressure is exerted on states which did not join the charter? Or what pressure is exerted on Belarus because we do not participate in the collective defense system? No pressure at all. There is no big brother here."

25 · In Georgia, a third round of Russian-Georgian talks on a treaty of friendship and cooperation begins in Tbilisi. Talks will address a trade and consultative agreement. According to the Russian ambassador to Georgia, Vladimir Zemskiy, Georgian officials intend to sign an agreement drawn up by the Russian side. Opposition voices in parliament accuse Shevardnadze of “pro-Russian political orientation”-to which Shevardnadze replies that his priority is to orient Georgia toward Germany and the United States.

- In Ukraine, Defense Minister Morozov says a large number of officers who took loyalty oaths to Ukraine did so expecting that the CIS armed forces would be united, and that housing and wages would be provided. He calls for their resignation saying: “It is impossible to serve in the army of a sovereign state while submitting to ideas about violating its sovereignty.”

26 · A Nezavisimaya Gazeta article says a gradual but steady disintegration of the integrational core is occurring in the CIS.

- In Georgia, International Policy Advisor to President Shevardnadze Vafa Guluzade thinks the CIS cannot be preserved in its present form, and may only become a consultative organ. He says the Minsk summit was “without results,” and West thinks this also. He adds that Baku thinks Azerbaijan should only participate in CIS as an observer, and has decided not to join.

27 · In Crimea, the new commander-in-chief of the Black Sea Fleet, Eduard Baltin (appointed 15 January as a result of an agreement between Yeltsin and Kravchuk), arrives in Sevastopol.

28 · In Ukraine, Leonid Smolyakov, Russian ambassador to Ukraine, says Russia plans to open consulates-general in Odessa, Lvov, and Sevastopol. He says Ukraine may open consulates in St. Petersburg, Tyumen, and Vladivostok.

Security

1 · In Belarus, the government establishes its own National Armed Forces, a Defense Ministry, and a law on the “Status of Servicemen,” which includes privatization of housing for servicemen.

5 · Russian General Leonid Ivashov of CIS Defense Ministers’ Council says a CIS unified armed forces would consist of nuclear weapons, collective peacekeeping forces, and a contingent for the prevention of conflicts. He says the CIS states are divided on the numbers of troops to commit to any future unified force. Ukraine is at particularly sharp odds on strategic force strength. (Ukraine’s unilateral decision to take administrative control of the nuclear arms deployed on its territory will be on the agenda of the 22 January summit in Minsk.) The CIS commander-in-chief insists he alone must be in charge of CIS nuclear forces.

· Russian Rear Admiral Ivan Semenov discusses the fate of the Baltic and Black Sea fleets. He says that the navy's shore infrastructures, built up over centuries, suddenly turn out to be situated on the shores of various countries. He says more than 90 percent of all base facilities and combat personnel of the Black Sea Fleet are concentrated in Odessa, Nikolaev, and Kherson oblasts. Ukraine claims the entire system of bases as its own without a word about compensating Russia for real estate, bases, and technical and logistical facilities. If Russia concedes, the fleet will be deprived of bases, not only for ships, but for aircraft and shore forces. A new system of bases would have to be built for Russia's share of the fleet. Likewise, four of five former USSR naval bases on the Baltic Sea are in Estonia, Latvia, or Lithuania. The Russian navy has kept Baltiysk, but Semenov says that 50 percent of the surface forces, all of the Baltic Fleet submarines, and 15 percent of all naval aircraft were based in the Baltic and will remain there temporarily. It would cost R22 billion to build a new Baltic Fleet base and take five to six years. To rebuild the Black Sea Fleet would cost R1 trillion, and take ten to twelve years.

9 · In Russia, Aviation Marshal Evgeniy Shaposhnikov discusses the failure of the Treaty on Collective Security, signed by only six states in Tashkent in May 1992. In a little more than six months, the Treaty has been ratified by only three parliaments-those of Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan. Shaposhnikov says he will work more with the parliaments of the CIS states in 1993. He adds: "For some time I thought, and even now I would like to think, that the Commonwealth will be more than just a word. But I can see how the situation is also changing. The sovereignization syndrome is creeping into the CIS countries' military departments."

10 · In Belarus, the armed forces give oath of allegiance to the new Belarusian state. Col.-Gen. Pavel Kozlovskiy says officers wishing to return to any other republic of the CIS are free to do so.

15 · In Georgia, National Security Advisor Tedo Japaridze says joining the CIS is out of the question for Georgia, and "it is about time someone explained the meaning of this Commonwealth." Asked if Georgia misses Western aid going to the CIS, he replies, "I doubt that any of the CIS republics besides Russia gets anything. That is why the West also realizes now that it has to make its allocations separately to each country so all the aid is not sucked into the Russian black hole."

20 · The CIS Council of Defense Ministers meets in Minsk on the eve of the summit: discusses national armies, position of career servicemen, future of nuclear arms of former USSR. Council Secretary Leonid Ivashov says, "The politicians have managed to divide the manpower and hardware of the former USSR.... So far, the combat readiness of the armies of independent countries ... is rather doubtful. A standard, well-oiled machine of army control has been ruined. Research into new types of military hardware, material supply of ground forces and navy, manning policies, everything has been ruined."

22 · In Belarus, at the Minsk summit, Ukraine refuses to sign a nuclear arms accord. Kravchuk announces that Ukraine will form its own nuclear arms control center. Marshal Shaposhnikov responds that Ukraine lacks appropriate mechanisms. Russia and Ukraine agree to hold bilateral talks on terms of dismantlement and transportation of nuclear ammunition. Belarus agrees that its nuclear weapons should be controlled by Russia. Kazakhstan supports the supreme command of the combined forces of the CIS on what is to be included in the strategic forces.

25 · CIS Supreme Commander Marshal Shaposhnikov says Russia is the undisputed heir to Soviet nuclear potential and that all her demands are justified. Belarus and Kazakhstan agree to this without material compensation. Ukraine demands compensation, which the marshal says should be resolved in one month.

February 1993

Economic

2 · In Ukraine, President Leonid Kravchuk says the reason Ukraine left the ruble zone is partly because the ruble is inflationary. He adds: "If Russia had the dollar, everyone would stay in that zone."

· In Uzbekistan, President Karimov states that although Uzbekistan has an economic base of cotton and gold to support its own currency, it will stay in the ruble zone unless Russia switches to its own currency.

6 · In Ukraine, Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma says that Ukraine has embarked on a course that will end the economic war with Russia. He attributes Ukraine's leaving the ruble zone to Russia's actions to block Ukrainian financial and banking transactions. His conclusion is that "there can be no single ruble area" and that every former union republic will introduce its own currency in the near future.

Political

3 · In Baku, Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze arrives for a meeting with Azeri President Abulfaz Elchibey. Detailed discussions are held on a prospective "treaty of friendship, good neighborliness and mutual security" and a bilateral treaty is signed which envisages an expansion in trade and economic relations.

Both leaders express the hope that the treaty will improve the political climate in the Transcaucasus and will act as a stepping stone to a summit between Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Armenia.

6 · An argument breaks out between Russia and Ukraine on border troops. The press service of Ukraine's border troops refutes a statement by Lt.-Gen. Anatoliy Parakhin, deputy commander of the Russian Federation border troops, saying that the initiative to establish a Ukrainian-Russian boundary comes from Ukraine.

Security

3 · Belarus plans to organize two border customs posts and a subunit of patrol boats on the border with Ukraine in response to Ukraine's decision to open a customs post at the border.

March 1993

Economic

2 · In Moldova, economic experts say energy resources for Moldova are dependent on the unpredictable Russian price policy and the energy war between Russia and Ukraine. That war started as a result of an ultimatum delivered by the Russian gas concern Gazprom. Price increases on gas from Ukraine to Europe and from Russia to Ukraine have occurred because Ukraine refuses to pay for lubricants at world prices. Observers state that the energy crisis could spell catastrophe for Moldova. A 16-20 percent reduction in required deliveries to Moldova is expected. Experts reveal that only 40-50 percent of lubricants needed for the economy are being received. Gasoline usage for the last few years has been reduced by two to five times, diesel-oil and coal by two times, fuel oil by 1.7 times. Russia will also introduce customs duties on the export of natural gas. The Moldovan government intends to build a port at Giurgiulesti which will open a door to energy resources from the West. Moldova will also participate in building an atomic power generator in Cernavoda/Romania.

· Representatives from twelve former Soviet republics meet and sign an agreement to form an intergovernmental council on oil and gas. Latvia and Turkmenistan are not represented and the Estonian delegation has only observer status. The agreement seeks to ensure adequate production and supplies among its members, but will not seek to influence world markets. It provides for three institutional levels of cooperation: a council of heads of government on oil and gas; a similar ministerial structure; and a permanent secretariat to be located in Tyumen. No multilateral agreement is reached on prices, nor do the Russian and Ukrainian delegations resolve their dispute over the price of Russian gas supplies. The Russian Fuel and Energy Minister Yuriy Shafranik believes that the agreement will lay the foundation to restore Russia's coordinating role in the fuel and energy complex of the former USSR.

4 · Russia and Ukraine fail to agree on fuel prices and debt payments. According to Viktor Yushchenko, chairman of the board of the Ukrainian National Bank, the debt owed by Russian economic structures to their Ukrainian partners amounts to 600-650 billion rubles, as compared to 100 billion owed by Ukraine.

8 · The Belarusian National Bank stops paying for goods delivered by Ukraine, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Georgia, calling these goods repayment of debts which those states owe to Belarus.

9 · Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze appeals to Russia to honor an agreement made in Bishkek in October 1992, when Russia agreed to provide Georgia's cash needs. Georgia has not received funds for four months.

· The Belarusian Association of Independent Trade Unions calls for the restoration of a single economic space within the CIS.

18 · Belarus, Russia, Kazakhstan, and Ukraine discuss formation of an Economic Union. Belarusian Prime Minister

Vyacheslav Kebich calls it essential to set up a CIS Economic Union. It would incorporate fiscal, credit, and monetary policies as well as a joint external customs policy. "Harsh sanctions" would be imposed on any state which ignored the agreements. He emphasizes that the Interstate Economic Court, which is being created, must be given adequate power to take action.

31 · In Kazakhstan, President Nazarbaev initiates a conference during which Russia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Ukraine, Moldova, Georgia, Azerbaijan, Armenia, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan sign a draft agreement on interstate cooperation in agrarian-industrial relations. The agreement will also stipulate unification of investment, interbank, and scientific-technical policies.

Political

3 · The Russian delegation to the UN formally requests that international organizations, including the United Nations, grant Russia special powers as a guarantor of peace and stability in the regions of the former USSR. To achieve its goal, the delegation presents the UN with a document: "Participation of Russia in Peacemaking Operations in Ex- Soviet Countries." The paper argues that Russian participation in peacemaking operations is required to ensure Russia's security. It also makes the claim that Russia's awareness of its special responsibility for stability and human rights in the former Soviet Union calls for a response to appeals from other CIS countries. The paper says that the legal basis for Commonwealth peacekeeping operations is laid out in the “Agreement on Military Observers and Collective Peacekeeping Forces in the CIS,” signed at the Kiev summit on March 20, 1992. According to that agreement, decisions on sending in peacekeeping forces are made by the Council of the Heads of State when a request is submitted by each conflicting side, or if a ceasefire is arranged before the peacekeeping force can be sent in. The main tasks of the peacekeeping forces resemble functions of UN peacemaking forces. They include: “supervision over the fulfillment of terms of ceasefire, disengagement of the warring parties, creation of demilitarized zones and humanitarian corridors, creation of conditions for negotiations on the peaceful settlement of conflicts, suppressing mass disorders, and assisting in ensuring human rights.”

- In Ukraine, the Foreign Ministry protests against Russia’s demand in the United Nations for special peacekeeping powers, stating that Russia was not authorized by the CIS to make such a request. The delegation of such powers would be a blatant violation of all existing international legal norms, including principles of the UN Charter and the main CSCE documents. Russia’s claim carries the unconcealed threat of conveying “police” functions to one CIS state. This would inevitably lead to dictat and interference in internal affairs of other CIS members, constituting a threat to Ukraine’s sovereignty and territorial integrity. Ukraine vows never to agree with Russia’s position.

- In Ukraine, Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma charges that: “the CIS is simply some kind of cover and nothing more.” At the same time he disagrees with President Kravchuk, saying he does not consider signing the CIS Charter “a great tragedy.” He believes that signing the charter may take the advantage away from “all the politicians trying to set Russia and Ukraine at odds.”

· Ukraine’s Supreme Council attacks the questionnaire circulated on 25 December 1992 among the people’s deputies of the Republic of Crimea at the initiative of the Russian parliament’s provisional working commission on the status of the City of Sevastopol. The Council states that the Russian parliament has no grounds for questioning the current status of the Republic of Crimea and the City of Sevastopol. The Council’s statement reads: “The fact that the highest legislative bodies of the Russian Federation would raise the issue of the status of the City of Sevastopol before the Russian Supreme Soviet, and would consider establishing confederative relations among Russia, Ukraine, and the Republic of Crimea, and holding a referendum on Crimean independence constitutes open interference in Ukraine’s internal affairs, and encroachment on the territorial integrity of a sovereign state which is a UN member and a CSCE participant.” The Presidium also calls it a violation of the CIS Minsk Agreement, which contains obligations to respect the territorial integrity and inviolability of existing state borders.

12 · In Moscow, delegates from all member states, plus Azerbaijan, with observer status, participate in the CIS Heads of Government summit. They sign agreements on forming an interstate council for the protection of industrial property, forming a coordination council for the interstate broadcasting company, use of military satellite communication systems, forming an interstate commission for military and technological cooperation within the CIS. Commenting on the meeting, Ukrainian

Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma says he favors “one economic union and the sooner it emerges, the better.”

17 · Boris Yeltsin appeals to CIS leaders for closer cooperation among the states, particularly in creating collective peacekeeping forces; coordinating foreign policy; joint diplomacy and defense; joint protection of human rights (i.e., for Russians outside Russia); setting up transnational associations in branches of industry, agriculture, electric power, transport, and services; joint activity in production and investment; formation of joint custom systems; shaping a single economic space; and moving toward a common market.

18 · President Nursultan Nazarbaev supports Yeltsin's call for strengthening the CIS. He proposes joint actions on several fronts, including a collective security treaty, a single currency, an interstate economic committee, which would be responsible for all economic policy in the member countries. He sends a letter to all CIS states that have signed the charter.

· Presidents Mircea SnegurofMoldova and Saparmurad Niyazov of Turkmenistan meet briefly and express a common view on the CIS. In their estimation the CIS mechanism does not provide for stable cooperation among its members. Efforts to create a rigid structure within the CIS only lead to further fragmentation. Snegur describes Moldova's membership in the CIS as that of an "associate member, non-signatory of the charter." He notes that Moldova does not want the CIS transformed into a political and military organization.

30 · Representatives of CIS governments meet to discuss the statute of the Commonwealth Coordinating and Consultative Committee (CCC), which is to be the CIS executive body. This committee is expected to replace the existing Working Group which consists of Heads of State and Heads of Government. According to Alexander Shokhin, the Russian draft proposal for a CCC is based on the European Community model. Sessions would be presided over in turn by each CIS state. He says that "such a model would encourage Ukraine, Moldova, and Turkmenistan to approach the CIS in a more pragmatic fashion."

31 · The Kazakh parliament ratifies the CIS Charter. President Nursultan Nazarbaev notes that the seven states which have already signed the Charter have four major tasks: to create a unified bank with a coordinated currency-credit policy; to create an economic committee to supervise signed agreements; to create a single defense area; to define CIS policy toward former Soviet states which have not signed the Charter.

2 · Despite claims of neutrality, Belarus appears willing to cooperate on the military side within the CIS.

Myacheslav Hryb, chief counselor to the head of parliament on defense issues, states that Belarus may join the CIS Collective Security Agreement as an associate member. It would sign on three conditions: (1) Belarus would not be obliged to send troops to foreign countries; (2) the Belarusian army would not be taking part in any combat operation beyond its borders; (3) arms and military equipment from Belarus would never be used in any armed conflicts between other parties.

17 · CIS heads of state discuss the Collective Security Pact, focusing mainly on the need to create a joint security zone as a counterbalance to the nearby regional powers of China, Japan, Iran, and Western Europe.

20 · Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev stresses the importance of the Northern Fleet, given Russia's loss of operational positions in the Baltic and the Black Sea. Russia's sea strategy will be based on two concepts: a peacetime concept, based on naval containment of potential adversaries; and a wartime concept, providing for the organization of an adequate defense of the coast and sea communications and stopping potential aggression. Priority will be given to the construction of a new generation of submarines. Within the next two years, the fleet will be cut by 20 percent. Quality is to prevail over quantity. Grachev emphasizes the necessity of arming the navy with aircraft carriers for strategic tasks. Each of the four Russian fleets should have at least three such ships. At present, there are only four of them.

24 · There is speculation on why Belarus changes its position on the Collective Security Treaty. Non-official sources say that Commander-in-chief of the CIS Joint Armed Forces Evgeniy Shaposhnikov gave Belarus an ultimatum: join the collective security system, or the military and technical supplies to the Armed Forces will stop. Belarusian army has no means to manage without Russian supplies. Supreme Soviet Chairman Stanislav Shushkevich disagrees with Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich and reaffirms the republic's need for neutrality.

28 · At the meeting of CIS Council of Heads of Government in Minsk, the Statute of the Coordination and Consultative Committee is adopted. This committee will be made up of vice-premiers of all CIS states, and will be entrusted with supervising the implementation of decisions adopted within the CIS, especially economic ones. The purpose of the committee is to strengthen economic ties within the CIS. Russian Premier Viktor Chernomyrdin comments: "We are finally starting to really move toward a close economic alliance."

Political

8 · Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev on relations with Russia: “Today close relations between Russia and Kazakhstan create a stabilizing factor throughout the entire Eurasian area .... Our republics are objectively tied to each other by economic and military-political relations, which have roots in the deep past and are directed into the future.” He advocates the strengthening of the Russian state as the guarantor of stability in Eurasia, and links the prosperity of Kazakhstan with the prosperity of Russia. He states that the strategic task of the Armed Forces of Kazakhstan is to cooperate with the Russian Army.

10 · A regional summit of the Central Asian heads of state scheduled for 22 April is canceled. Turkmen President Saparmurad Niyazov expresses doubts about the importance or usefulness of a regional common market, preferring bilateral relations as a basis for foreign policy.

13 · Ukraine and Georgia formalize a treaty of friendship, cooperation, and mutual assistance. Both sides sign twenty agreements covering all types of bilateral cooperation. Both parties observe that Georgia could have long since solved the problem of Abkhazia through peaceful negotiation but a “third force” constantly builds up tension in the region (referring to Russia).

14 · The parliament of Kazakhstan ratifies the CIS Charter.

15 · The parliament of Russia ratifies the CIS Charter.

16 · In Minsk, an emergency CIS summit takes place. The main result is general support for democratic reforms in Russia, and for Yeltsin. No documents are signed at the summit, which is devoted to general discussion on strengthening the Commonwealth. Yeltsin and Nursultan Nazarbaev call for CIS states that have not signed the CIS Charter to decide finally whether they wish to be members or not. Yeltsin states that non-signatories “would in effect remain outside the main channel of cooperation within the framework of the CIS, with all the consequences that stem from that.”

6 · The CIS military command proposes to standardize defense-related legislation throughout the CIS, especially with regard to social protection for servicemen and their families, and coordinate activities among the security organs of CIS member states. Commander-in-chief Evgeniy Shaposhnikov says it is time to put an end to “unlimited sovereignty” in the CIS, and to promote greater economic and military integration.

9 · Russia’s Defense Ministry rejects Ukrainian accusations that Russia has taken unilateral actions with respect to the Black Sea Fleet in violation of the Yalta agreement. The ministry makes the counter-accusation that the Ukrainians are trying to avoid responsibility for delaying negotiations on the question of the Black Sea Fleet as well as for the policy adopted by Ukraine’s Defense Ministry aimed at breaking up the fleet and changing its structure. The Russian Defense Ministry accuses the Ukrainians of systematic violation of the Yalta agreement by trying to take command of the fleet and bypassing the Russian and Ukrainian presidents.

27 · The Russian parliament ratifies a bilateral security treaty with Belarus.

18 · Uzbekistan retaliates against Kyrgyz currency reform by threatening to cut off its entire energy supply. The Uzbeks fear that Kyrgyzstan will not be able to retire its outstanding debts.

· Russian Deputy Prime Minister Shokhin states that the CIS economic union should benefit Russia because it is the largest and wealthiest economic partner in the CIS. He also acknowledges that an economic union would entail a partial loss in political, as well as economic, sovereignty for all of the successor states of the Soviet Union.

19 · Uzbekistan reconsiders the previous day's threat against Kyrgyzstan and restores the energy supplies that had been partially cut off.

· A “high-speed clearinghouse” is created by the CIS and joined by more than thirty commercial banks from major industrial regions in the CIS and Baltic states. Its purpose is to speed up interrepublican payments which may take anywhere from a week to a month to clear.

30 · The second regular session of the CIS Council of Leaders of Foreign Economic Departments begins in Alma-Ata. Participants include: Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, and Ukraine. Nazarbaev expresses his discontent with the situation in CIS markets, calling for more integration and a more professional approach to business. The session results in a protocol on general principles for improving tariff and non-tariff regulations within the framework of a free trade regime, and agreements on setting up a CIS Council for Export Control and agreements on information exchange in the field of foreign economic activities.

Political

23 · The third plenary sitting of the Interparliamentary Assembly takes place in St. Petersburg. The following states are represented by members of their Supreme Soviets: Belarus, Armenia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, and Tajikistan. Azerbaijan, Moldova, and Ukraine send observers. The Assembly adopts resolutions on harmonizing the legislation of member states in the fields of information, foreign investment, and military affairs. Chairman Ruslan Khasbulatov stresses that the path of isolated development and the hope of painlessly overcoming political, economic, military, and other difficulties are becoming increasingly illusory and unrealistic for CIS states. Lyudmila Fomicheva of ITAR-TASS says that the “main result of today’s session is perhaps the obvious integrational processes that are now visible among not only CIS member countries, but also [other] republics that were part of the FSU.”

Security

14 · CIS defense ministers meet and most agree on the urgent need for an integrated defense system.

18 · CIS Joint Armed Forces Commander Shaposhnikov states that Russia and Uzbekistan support the creation of a collective security system for the CIS, but have “their own approaches to the problem.” Uzbekistan prefers a joint command, with every CIS defense minister having a veto over defense decisions.

26 · The first deputy chairman of the Ukrainian parliament reiterates that it is opposed to allowing Russia to maintain a naval base at Sevastopol.

28 · Evgeniy Shaposhnikov recommends the creation of three new integrated military commands: (1) “Yug” [South] air defense system, which would include assets from Russia, Kazakhstan, and southern Central Asia; (2) “Kavkaz” [Caucasus] air defense system, which would include Russia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia; (3) “Zapad” [West] unified command of anti-missile and air defense assets.

· Shaposhnikov warns that failure to increase defense cooperation in the CIS could lead to instability and the creation of security blocs in the former Soviet space, as countries on Russia’s periphery gravitate toward their non- CIS neighbor states.

Economic

1 · The first CIS Coordinating and Consultative Committee session is held to discuss cooperation in a wide variety of areas between CIS states. Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksandr Shokhin is elected to a six-month term as chairman of this committee. The CCC sets 30 June as the date for consideration of the first draft of the Treaty on Economic Union. Georgia's Deputy Prime Minister Avtandil Margiani confirms his country's intention to participate in the Economic Union, even though Georgia is not a formal member of the CIS.

10 · The five Central Asian states and Azerbaijan reportedly will become members of the Asian Development Bank, providing another source for loans apart from the IMF, EBRD, and World Bank. It is thought that the ADB will be more lenient on requiring clean human rights records than the other lending institutions.

14 · Azerbaijan decides to leave the ruble zone, following Kyrgyzstan's example. As of 15 June, the manat will be the only legal tender. The ruble will be removed from circulation on 20 June. Until then, Azerbaijani citizens may exchange their currency at a rate of 10 rubles per manat.

15 · Russia sets stringent conditions for Belarus to continue to receive rubles. Acceptance of the conditions would allow Belarus to continue to receive rubles until 1 October 1993. A spokesman for the Belarusian National Bank says that the conditions are unacceptable.

17 · CIS member states are urged by CCC Chairman Shokhin to expedite the introduction of national currencies so that IMF standby loans will be released (the loans are tied to inflation rates, interest rates, and the issuance of credits). He also states that Russian credits to former Soviet republics will soon be reduced, and that Russia intends to double natural gas prices to the republics as well as to domestic customers.

21 · The Crimean parliament issues a resolution introducing a free economic regime on the peninsula. Although this is portrayed by the mass media as an attempt to leave Ukraine, parliamentary chairman Mykol Bagrov says Crimea and Ukraine would overcome their economic crisis together. It is important to note, however, that on the peninsula there is significant support for separation from Ukraine.

22 · Kazakh Prime Minister Tereshchenko says trade relations with Russia have sharply deteriorated. He says that in the latest round of trade negotiations, Russia has insisted that Kazakhstan's total trade deficit with Russia should be transformed into "sovereign debt" with conditions analogous to Western loans. He claims that Russia's tough stance is intended to push Kazakhstan out of the ruble zone. He states that Russian negotiators have even gone so far as to suggest that Kazakhstan introduce its own currency.

23 · The CIS Intergovernmental Council for oil and gas suggests to the governments and parliaments of CIS countries that they introduce order to the system of mutual accounting between suppliers and consumers of energy. "Essentially it is a case of the restoration of the union of sovereign states within the framework of the fuel and energy complex” (Rossiiskaya Gazeta). There is reason to be pessimistic about such an agreement, though, because most republics are behind in payments as well as deliveries.

24 · A session of the CIS Interstate Committee on Agro- Industrial Complex finishes today. The representatives of the CIS states sign a number of agreements on economic cooperation, such as creating an interstate scientific-technical center. Essentially this is yet another meeting in which CIS representatives express their desire to reintegrate their economies after two years of devastation caused by the dissolution of the Union, but will probably fail to implement the agreement.

- A St. Petersburg conference on legislative and economic activities of CIS enterprises opens today. It is held under the auspices of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly and is being attended by economists, political leaders, bankers, and engineers from all CIS states except Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan. Even representatives of Azerbaijan attend. Rector of St. Petersburg University Tarasevich tells ITAR-TASS that he thinks the high level of representation should ensure progress in solving the problems of paralysis of many enterprises caused by the collapse of the USSR.

- A Deutsche Bank spokesman says interest payments on the estimated US$25 billion commercial debt owed by the Soviet successor states will for the seventh time be delayed by ninety days. Russia has assumed responsibility for the FSU's government and commercial debts which currently total approximately US$88 billion.

- An official for the CCC says member states must decide by 1 July whether they wish to remain in the ruble zone. Those former republics that have issued their own currencies have been asked to return all rubles to Russia.

Political

17 · In addition to the Black Sea Fleet agreement, Yeltsin and Kravchuk agree to: “intensify work on a comprehensive political treaty between Russia and Ukraine; accelerate the process of reaching an agreement on dual citizenship; cooperatively solve fuel and energy problems; and draft an agreement on jointly selling shares in Ukrainian and Russian enterprises.”

Yeltsin also confirms Russia’s readiness to offer Ukraine security guarantees that would come into force after the Ukrainian parliament ratifies START I and adheres to NPT.

26 · The Tajik parliament ratifies a treaty of friendship, cooperation, and mutual assistance between Tajikistan and Russia, which was signed by Rakhmonov and Yeltsin on 25 May 1993.

- The next CIS summit meeting scheduled for 16 July in Yerevan is postponed because the Treaty on Economic Union is not ready, and it is the most important item on the agenda. An agreement is expected by the end of the summer.

- The acting president of Azerbaijan, Geydar Aliev, is granted power by parliament at the end of June. He is a former KGB general, “ruthless” former Communist Party chairman of the republic, and former member of the Soviet Politburo. Some in Russia think that the rise to power of a former comrade might soon be followed with Azerbaijan’s accession to the CIS Charter.

Security

1 · Over 200 Black Sea Fleet ships raise the Russian naval ensign (St. Andrew’s flag), although reports confirm that no combat ships have done so. The support ships are manned and controlled mostly by Ukrainians. The protest is motivated by economic concerns: the men want higher wages and feel that Russia can provide them.

· Ukrainian Defense Minister Konstantin Morozov accuses anti-Ukrainian groups in the Crimea of instigating the strike for higher wages on the Black Sea Fleet support ships.

2 · Ukrainian Prime Minister Kuchma suggests that Ukraine lease the base at Sevastopol to Russia, reasoning that the Russians will be there a long time anyway, so they may as well pay for the base. Ukrainian nationalists oppose this idea as a violation of Ukraine's sovereignty, but Rukh leader Vyacheslav Chernovil says that it could be workable.

3 · In a letter dated 28 May and sent to the seven current signatories of the Collective Security Treaty, Belarus Supreme Soviet Chairman Shushkevich clarifies the republic's position on the pact. The letter states that the use of Belarusian troops beyond the country's borders is only permissible through a decision by the republic's Supreme Soviet. Furthermore, Belarus has the right to discontinue its participation in the collective security system the moment all Russian military and strategic forces have been removed from its territory (RFE/RL).

10 · Yeltsin says Russia should adopt military basing practices similar to those of the United States in order to maintain a military presence in Georgia, Moldova, Armenia, and Central Asia. He calls for the conclusion of intergovernmental agreements to formalize the Russian military presence in those areas.

14 · Yeltsin unexpectedly names CIS Commander-in-chief Shaposhnikov to the post of secretary of the Russian Security Council. Yeltsin suggests that Shaposhnikov has become available because as the CIS states build their own armies, Shaposhnikov's responsibilities are shrinking.

15 · The Council of CIS Defense Ministers disbands the unified armed forces command, replacing it with a "united headquarters for coordinating military cooperation."

· Shaposhnikov is replaced by a less influential officer, Col.-Gen. Viktor Samsonov. The collapse of the unified forces leaves unresolved the pressing issue of strategic nuclear forces in Ukraine and Kazakhstan.

16 · "There are no CIS combined forces today, and their creation in the future is problematic.... We are doomed to cooperation, but that will be in the future," says ex-CIS Joint Armed Forces Commander-in-chief Evgeniy Shaposhnikov.

18 · CIS Commander-in-chief Shaposhnikov tells Izvestiya that although he is no longer head of the CIS Joint Armed Forces, he still holds the codes to the nuclear arms on FSU territory.

28 · Izvestiya reports that Ukraine and Russia are ready to sign an agreement on the dismantling of Ukraine's warheads and missiles. This agreement was apparently drafted while Chernomyrdin was visiting Ukraine, but not signed before his departure on 28 June. The agreement would state that both sides are to share responsibility for the dismantlement and share the proceeds from the sale of fissile nuclear materials in them. According to this report, the dismantlement must be complete by 1995, which represents a big concession by Ukraine.

30 · Ukrainian Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Tarasiuk contradicts the Russian press, saying that Russian sources are exaggerating the progress of the negotiations. It is, however, likely that an agreement on ICBM maintenance is ready, although not yet signed.

- Evgeniy Shaposhnikov is appointed secretary to the Russian Federation Security Council in the wake of the dissolution of the CIS Joint Armed Forces and therefore as their commander-in-chief. The "nuclear button" is still in Shaposhnikov's possession, although he says it will probably soon be transferred to someone else, most likely the country's defense minister, Pavel Grachev.

- Ostankino television reports that Shaposhnikov's appointment to the position of secretary to the Security Council is rejected by the Russian parliament. Khasbulatov declares the vote invalid, so a second one will take place, but the initial vote suggests that Shaposhnikov will have a hard time with the confirmation.

Economic

10 · The prime ministers of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus meet outside Moscow to implement increased economic integration. They pledge to prepare a draft agreement before 1 September, and announce that the agreement is “likely” to be open to other countries, under certain, unspecified conditions. The proposed agreement goes further than the Economic Union Treaty signed in mid-May. Kuchma is the most circumspect among the participating prime ministers: he emphasizes that the agreement will not lead to the restoration of the Union. The statement addresses urgent measures to deepen economic integration and the intention of the three countries to participate in the development of the treaty on the creation of the CIS Economic Union. They propose lifting tariffs and non-tariff barriers to trade, and creating a customs union. The prime ministers stress that the document does not presuppose the breakup of the CIS and should not introduce separatism within the CIS. Nonetheless, Kazakh Prime Minister Tereshchenko expresses dismay at the proposed “Slavic Monetary Union” because President Nazarbaev had been one of the most vocal of the CIS member state leaders in support of further economic integration. He questions the deliberate exclusion of Kazakhstan from the proposed union.

10 · Relations between Russia and Kazakhstan worsen markedly following the formation of a pan-Slavic economic union. Although the three Slavic states say the union is open to newcomers, they reserve the right to accept or reject applicants.

- The Russian media accuses Kazakhstan of not paying its bills and not honoring delivery agreements.

Kazakhstan, meanwhile, accuses Russia of trying to push it out of the ruble zone. The Russian radio notes that “it has become standard practice in Kazakhstan to blame every shortcoming in the republic’s economy on Russia.”

- Uzbekistan’s first deputy prime minister states that the country is being forced to introduce its own currency (the “som”) due to Russia’s uncompromising monetary policies. Apparently Russia has stopped supplying banknotes and has begun to replace old rubles with new ones meant for use only inside Russia. Kazakhstan, too, has complained about the withdrawal of old rubles, and many enterprises are reported to be in pre-strike position due to cash shortages. There are reports of the imminent introduction of a Kazakh national currency.

- Russia and Ukraine agree on oil prices: Russia is to sell 20 million tons to Ukraine in 1993 at a price of $80 per ton, and as of December the price will rise to $100 per ton. (The current world price for oil is $120 per ton.)

13 · Russian Deputy Prime Minister Shokhin tells the newly independent states that have joined the Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO) that they must choose to either stay in the organization or join the newly formed union between Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus. The Central Asian republics and Azerbaijan have recently participated in an ECO conference in Istanbul, at which they agreed on further measures of economic integration. The pan-Slavic agreement is seen in Central Asia as an effort to push them out of the ruble zone and as a possible first step toward the dissolution of the CIS, to which the ECO is seen as a possible alternative.

- The Erk Democratic Party of Uzbekistan spokesman declares that the three Slavic states want to push Central Asia out of the CIS, and “whatever happens, the funeral of the CIS is being held.”

14 · Narodnaya Gazeta carries an article by CIS Executive Secretary Ivan Korotchenya on the Central Asian and Slavic economic unions, in which he queries: “Does this mean that the economic union of nine states has been rejected and that the idea behind its creation has mimicked the fate of many useful but unimplemented CIS projects? Is the existence of the CIS not threatened by the fact that its members are overtly grouped in accordance with their Muslim or Slav origins? ... Would it not be better to gather at a common table and resolve all the problems of the day? ... Arguments used by the signatories to the ‘tripartite union’ in order to justify this determined step seem unconvincing to me. They said there was no chance to create an economic union of nine states, because CIS members have been lacking accord ... and there was no hope left for the situation to change in the near future. However, the prime ministers must have known that virtually all the disputable issues had been resolved at the 1 July Coordinating and Consultative Council session.”

20 · Russia and Tajikistan sign three economic agreements stipulating: (1) that Tajikistan’s R49 billion trade debt will be converted into sovereign debt, to be repaid over a fiveyear period beginning in 1996; (2) that Russia will extend to Tajikistan a R60 billion loan, with which it may purchase Russian imports; and (3) that Tajikistan agrees to the conditions required by Russia for remaining in the ruble zone, which presumably means that the Tajiks have agreed to concede some of their sovereignty in monetary policy to Russia.

24 · The Russian Central Bank releases a statement saying that ruble notes issued before 1993 will no longer be valid in Russia. This is apparently an attempt to curb inflation both domestically and in the “near abroad,” by invalidating the ruble overhang. Another goal may be to eliminate the membership of the former Soviet republics that remain in the ruble zone. The reactions in the ruble zone are not consistent with the Bank’s plan, however, to say nothing of the domestic turmoil the action caused. Belarus, Kazakhstan, and Uzbekistan are generally supportive, saying that they would stay in the ruble zone for now, and would phase out old rubles less quickly than Russia. Armenia reminds Russia that it has an agreement calling for a six-month warning on any changes in currency, and subsequently states that it will continue to use the old rubles indefinitely. Azerbaijan states that it will hasten the replacement of its rubles with the manat. Georgia gives its citizens one week to exchange their rubles for the national coupon. Moldova plans to accelerate the introduction of the leu, withdrawing large-denomination ruble notes on 26 July, but retaining notes of 200 rubles or less to circulate beside the national coupons.

26 · Yeltsin modifies the currency reform on 26 July, allowing Russian citizens to exchange up to 100,000 rubles in old banknotes, and extending the timeframe in which they are allowed to do this to 31 August. This is in response to widespread criticism both at home and from foreign ministers of the other CIS states.

· The Russian Finance Ministry sharply opposes the recall of old rubles, and releases a statement which includes the following: “The exchange will have an extremely adverse impact on mutual relations with former USSR republics, which still to varying extents use rubles as cash. Old banknotes are circulating in these countries, many of which are not yet ready to introduce their own currencies. The exchange has caused chaos in these countries, and worsens their attitude toward Russia as a trustworthy partner. Moreover, questions over the future of the ruble zone have not been resolved, as a result of which a new spiral of inflation in Russia is inevitable as gratis deliveries of Russian cash continue to flow into the former Soviet republics because banks have ceased to issue money equivalent to Russian money since July 1992.”

· The U.S. Journal of Commerce reports that in 1993 Russian oil exports (for the first six months of the year) to other members of the CIS had fallen by 40 percent of what they were for the same period in 1992. Natural gas deliveries have fallen by some 50 percent.

30 · Russia has cut off oil deliveries to Ukraine because of outstanding payments due. Apparently Ukraine owes Russia about 250 billion rubles for oil delivered since 1992. On 9 August, Russian TV reported that deliveries had resumed, and that an agreement had been reached on back payments and unit prices. On 7 August, Russia suspended shipments to Azerbaijan because of a failure to deliver a promised $10 million in barter goods.

Political

18 · In Russia, political scientist Igor Klyamkin states that reintegration of the post-Soviet republics will soon be put on the top of the political agenda; he cites the Civic Union as the instigator of this move.

22 · CIS Executive Secretary Korotchenya and chairman of the Secretariat of the Council of the CIS

Inter-Parliamentary Assembly Mikhail Krotaw have signed an agreement on the interaction of the organs of which they are heads. The document “establishes the legal basis for the already existing good relations between the working collectives of these CIS organs.”

28 · The presidents of Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan issue an appeal to other CIS heads of state to hold an emergency summit in the beginning of August. The two cite the following reasons for their urgent appeal: “regional separatism, the isolationism of individual states, and their desire to get out of the crisis on their own or at the expense of the economic interests of neighboring states,” and that these concerns are taking the place of economic integration. Their concerns have been sparked by the currency fiasco and the Slavic Economic Union.

Security

2 · The Ukrainian parliament votes to claim jurisdiction over the nuclear weapons on its territory. The amendment adopted does not assert Ukraine’s right to operational control over the weapons.

7 · Parliamentary Chairman Shushkevich agrees at a Parliamentary hearing to postpone until the fall a referendum on Belarus adhering to the CIS Collective Security Treaty.

· Russian Defense Minister Grachev and the chairman of Kyrgyzstan’s State Committee on Defense, Umetaliyev, sign two agreements on military cooperation. One provides for either country to lease land on the territory of the other, in exchange for equipment and training. The other maintains supply systems for military units and for equipment with local industries. The agreements also cover the issue of protection for military personnel situated on either party’s territory, as well as the provision of housing.

9 · In Ukraine, the Foreign Ministry tries to reassure its international partners by declaring an ambiguous status with regard to its nuclear weapons: “Ukraine has a unique status: the republic is not a nuclear state, but it has nuclear weapons,” said Yuriy Serheev, leader of the Foreign Ministry’s Press Service. He adds that “Parliament should ratify START I along with the Lisbon Protocol to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.” (The Ukrainian Supreme Soviet takes a different view and its position usually prevails.-Ed.)

14 · The Russian government has approved a draft agreement on nuclear weapons elimination that will be proposed to Ukraine: Russia would reprocess the highly enriched uranium from weapons into reactor fuel for Ukrainian power plants, and Russia would assume responsibility for the longterm storage of the other weapons components. The agreement does not appear to contain any security guarantees or recognition of Ukrainian ownership of the weapons, two conditions Ukraine is likely to attach to any agreement.

15 · The removal of five ICBMs from Pervomaysk base in Ukraine had begun, in accordance with an agreement between Russia and Ukraine to deactivate some nuclear weapons.

22 · ITAR-TASS reports that Russian Defense Minister Grachev accuses Ukraine of moving to acquire operational control of the nuclear weapons located on its territory by issuing orders canceling all Russian directives concerning the weapons, and subordinating the special units guarding the weapons to the Ukrainian military establishment. The loyalties of the troops guarding the weapons has been ambiguous until this point, and Ukraine’s move to take operational control appears designed to clarify the issue. Grachev supposedly possesses the launching codes for the nuclear weapons on former Soviet territory, which Komsomolskaya Pravda reported were given to him by Shaposhnikov shortly after he stepped down from his position as CIS commander-in-chief.

23 · Ukrainian Defense Minister Morozov apparently suggests that Ukraine may try to join the NPT with the special status of a “transition country” with nuclear weapons. This would assume that Ukraine has weapons on its territory, but that they are in the process of being destroyed, after which their special status will be removed. This conciliatory move can be seen as an attempt to placate hardliners who do not want to sign the treaty, and the international community who wants them to accede. The parliament has the power to accept or reject the treaty; in the case of a rejection, relations with Russia could be worsened to a point at which prospects for implementation of START could be hurt.

· Belarus formally accedes to the NPT, and receives the promise of $59 million in U.S. aid. The fifty SS-25s on Belarusian territory are to be removed by the end of 1994.

27 · Defense Minister Morozov claims that Ukraine has begun the process of dismantling ten SS-19s located at Pervomaysk. U.S. officials respond by saying they will begin to provide some of the Nunn-Lugar assistance that has been promised for nuclear dismantling.

Morozov announces that Ukraine will eventually dismantle all of its SS-19s, but refuses to discuss a schedule for dismantling SS-24s. Subsequently, Ukrainian officials note that elimination of the SS-24s is not necessary in order to comply with START I, implying that they are not planning to get rid of them in the near future.

August 1993

Economic

1 · Nazarbaev issues a decree increasing state control over financial transactions with other successor states of the former Soviet Union. All Kazakh enterprises are to close bank accounts in other countries of the region and henceforth conduct business only within the CIS through Kazakh banks. The chairman of the Supreme Soviet of Kazakhstan announces that Kazakhstan will introduce its national currency, the tenge, by the end of the year.

2 · In Uzbekistan, the government announces that it will indefinitely delay the exchange of old ruble notes for 1993 ruble notes due to a shortage of the new notes. A Russian Central Bank official also notes that only 5 percent of Uzbekistan's currency requirements will be met with new notes, and those transferred will be given to Uzbeks making trips to Russia.

· In Georgia, the government officially withdraws from the ruble zone in response to the Russian Central Bank's invalidation of old rubles. Georgia's national currency, the "lari," will be introduced once the economic situation has stabilized in the country, until which time the only legal tender will be the interim coupon, introduced in April, the value of which is plummeting.

4 · In Ukraine, Prime Minister Kuchma announces that the Ukrainian government's past fears of being pushed out of the ruble zone by Russia have been vindicated by the Russian Central Bank's ruble exchange. He also repeats calls for an economic union with Russia, as long as it will not compromise Ukrainian sovereignty.

6 · Kazakhstan, Russia, and Uzbekistan agree in principle to form a ruble monetary union. A formal pact is to be presented to the three national parliaments within about a month. The arrangement is open to other states as well. This does not preclude the eventual introduction of their own national currencies.

11 · Prime ministers Chernomyrdin and Kuchma sign a draft agreement in Moscow on 11 August on the supply of Russian oil and gas to Ukraine. Ukraine is to pay in dollars for the fuel, the price of which will rise to world levels by early 1994. Amounts to be delivered are to remain at the current level of 30 million tons of oil and 60 billion cubic meters of gas. Any reexport of the imports will require Moscow's permission.

- Belarus is to formally introduce its new currency, the zaichik, by 15 August, and it will reportedly be the only legal tender by the end of the week. This is apparently because Russia is not providing Belarus with enough rubles to meet demand or to replace purchasing power.

15 · Russia cuts gas deliveries to Belarus because of payment arrears. Belarus owes Russia 100 billion rubles. Gas is apparently being supplied only to homes, bakeries, dairies, and some other important enterprises, from the republic's reserves.

16 · Russia increases gas deliveries a small amount when it is shown that Belarus has paid off 10 percent of its debt.

- In Ukraine, the government declares the value of the karbovanets will no longer be determined by the Central Bank, but rather by trading against other currencies in the Kiev currency exchange. Within a week its value plummets from 6,000 to the dollar to 19,000 to the dollar (on 19 August). The government announces that the introduction of the hryvna is not yet possible because the government cannot set up a hard currency fund to stabilize it.

18 · The Asian Development Bank (ADB) admits Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan, bringing its total membership to fifty-six. Member states are already members of the EBRD, but membership in the ADB gives them access to more concessional development loans. Last year Azerbaijan, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan indicated interest in joining the bank, and it was reported in the 10 June 1993 issue of the Guardian that all five Central Asian states and Azerbaijan would soon join it.

19 · In Belarus, Shushkevich and Yeltsin meet and appear to agree on the transformation of technical credits issued by the Russian Central Bank into sovereign debt owed to Russia by Belarus. This agreement, it is hoped, will stabilize the value of the Belarusian ruble next to the Russian ruble, and open new credit lines for purchasing gas and oil from Russia. Russia has reached similar bilateral agreements with the governments of Armenia, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Ukraine, and Uzbekistan within the last few days.

- The vice-president of the Moldovan Parliament holds a meeting with a delegation from Ukraine in which he notes that 22 percent of Moldovan foreign trade is conducted with Ukraine. The head of the IMF mission to Moldova says Moldova must establish close economic links with other CIS member states if it is to emerge from its economic crisis.

20 · In Turkmenistan, President Niyazov announces that his country will fully replace the ruble with its national currency, the manat, by 1 November. The initial rate of exchange is to be one manat to the dollar. The exchange of rubles for manats is to begin on 1 September, at a rate of 1,000 rubles per manat, and citizens are allowed to change up to 30,000 rubles. Niyazov contends that Russia's introduction of new rubles hastened the decision to introduce the manat.

- Ukrainian parliamentary speaker Ivan Plyusch expresses his opposition to any economic union between Russia and Ukraine, stating that the republic is opposed to the creation of "a new superstate." He views the economic union as the first step in this direction: "an attempt to restore not only a single economic space, but also a single citizenship, and a single state administration," which would be "absolutely unacceptable" in this country. On the same day, a round table of communist and pro-communist parties is held in Kiev. Members urge that Ukraine form an economic union with its Slavic neighbors.

22 · Reuters reports that Japan wants to build a massive oil and gas pipeline from Central Asia through China which would deliver fuel to the Pacific Rim countries. Apparently, Japan will ask Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan to participate in the project, which envisions a 6,000-km pipeline. The Japanese government will soon conduct a feasibility study, which will be followed by the formation of a promotional organization with leading trading establishments and oil companies. Japan is already helping in the construction of a refinery in Bukhara.

23 · “A new type of ruble zone” is agreed upon by representatives of Armenia, Kazakhstan, Russia, and Uzbekistan. Although no details are provided, the agreement seems to imply the eventual merging of monetary, fiscal, and trade policies.

24 · A report in Moskovskie Novosti discusses Russian monetary policy: “the Russian Central Bank has bluntly demanded that the newly independent countries make up their minds as to how they want to use the Russian ruble: by converting their national banks into the Russian Central Bank’s branches, or by introducing their own currencies.” The article goes on to state that the Central Asian countries will use their bargaining chips (nuclear test grounds, the Tajik problem, and “the threat of Islamic fundamentalism”) in order to obtain better monetary conditions from Russia.

26 · A session of the Coordinating and Consultative Committee (CCC) is held in Minsk, during which the principles of the CIS economic union are finalized. CIS economic integration is to be based on the principles of the European Community, and to take place in stages, the first of which will be the creation of a free trade association. The second will be the creation of a customs union, and the third a single market of goods, services, and capital. This draft treaty will be ready for signing at the 7 September Heads of State meeting.

Political

3-5 · The Moldovan parliament holds a special session to consider the ratification of Moldova's membership in the CIS, and other CIS commitments which President Snegur has signed, mostly economic. Moldova has consistently denied joining CIS political and military agreements. Both the president and the prime minister urge ratification of the CIS Charter, citing the economic situation as requiring continued union with the CIS states.

4 · The Moldovan parliament is five votes short of ratifying participation in the CIS. Majority leaders then call for dissolution of the legislature and rule by presidential decree. The opposition, which is pro-Romanian, campaigns against ratification, saying that the CIS is a tool being used by Russia to reestablish domination over former Soviet republics.

18 · A CIS Human Rights Commission is discussed at a meeting of experts in Minsk, as envisaged in Article 33 of the CIS Charter. A draft statute on the commission is presented by Russia, which has been the driving force behind the commission. A Russian Foreign Ministry official says the talks are difficult because some countries view human rights as a purely internal matter.

23 · The meeting of the Council of Heads of Government scheduled for 27 August in Minsk is postponed until 7 September.

24 · During talks in Ashkhabad, Armenian President Ter-Petrosyan and Turkmen President Niyazov sign bilateral agreements on economic and cultural cooperation, including one ensuring the restoration of crucial gas deliveries to Armenia. A friendship treaty is also signed.

27 · Representatives of the communist parties of Belarus, Russia, and Ukraine meet in Minsk and bemoan the fate of the USSR, saying that at least Belarus, Kazakhstan, Russia, and Ukraine ought to be restored as Soviet republics.

Security

3 · Russian and Ukrainian officials criticize U.S. plans for airstrikes on the Bosnian Serbs. The Ukrainians fear for the UN peacekeeping troops which would be left hostage to the warring sides, and contend that airstrikes would be accompanied by large-scale ground troop deployments. Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Kolokolov tells parliament that Russia has been committed to resolving the crisis by political means, and refers to military intervention as inadmissible under current UN resolutions.

· The Russian Foreign Ministry criticizes Ukraine's assertion that Kiev will hold onto the forty-six SS-24s on its territory, even after the ratification of START 1, and says that Russia cannot accept Ukraine's status as a temporary nuclear power.

4 · The Russian government releases a statement criticizing Ukraine's handling of the nuclear weapons on its territory, charging that recent Ukrainian actions violate a number of international agreements, especially the NPT, and threaten world stability. The statement also holds that Ukraine's inability independently to maintain the weapons on its territory increases the likelihood of a nuclear accident.

5 · The Clinton administration is reportedly close to adopting a policy which allows the United States to intervene diplomatically in regional and ethnic conflicts on the territory of the former USSR. The plan's aims are to broker settlements to disputes before they become armed conflicts which could prove destabilizing for Yeltsin, and for the CIS's already conflict-ridden southern tier, or provide a context for Russian troop involvement.

· In Russia, it is noted in Krasnaya Zvezda (4 August) that the accession of Russia to the CIS Collective Security Treaty was prompted by the escalation of the Tajik-Afghan conflict. With its accession, Russia's participation in conflicts along its southern tier becomes legitimized.

- A Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman tries to allay what he refers to as Washington's exaggerated fears of becoming involved in conflicts in the former Soviet Union.

10 · The head of the directorate for arms control and disarmament of the Ukrainian Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Konstantin Hryshchenko, denounces Russian assumption of control over the weapons in Ukraine, and notes that under CIS agreements and international law, Ukraine is entitled to ownership of the weapons. Moreover, Ukraine has ceded control of the weapons to the CIS command, and although it was dissolved in June, any decision adopted by the CIS can be repealed only by those who adopted it, not by one party.

11 · Yeltsin reportedly promises Kuchma that Russia will compensate Ukraine for nuclear weapons transferred to Russia. Kuchma denies that the Ukrainian government is trying to obtain operational control of the weapons, but says the Defense Ministry might be doing so.

12 · Ukraine's Foreign Ministry reasserts its contention that the SS-24s on its territory are not covered by START I, but apparently Defense Minister Morozov, while in Washington, said that the dismantling of SS-24s would not begin until after the ratification of START I, implying that they are covered by the treaty.

17 · German Defense Minister Volker Ruehe, during his visit to Ukraine, confirms that Germany will offer financial assistance to Ukraine for the dismantlement of nuclear arms. The offer is contingent upon Ukraine's adhering to START I and NPT.

19 · The Ukrainian government releases a statement that asserts that the fate of the nuclear weapons in Ukraine will be decided by parliament. The statement also outlines the government's interpretation of START I and the Lisbon protocol as requiring only a 36 percent reduction in the nuclear forces of Ukraine. The Lisbon protocol, meanwhile, holds that Ukraine will join the NPT as soon as possible.

20 · Col.-Gen. German Burutin discusses the mission and structure of the CIS defense forces in an article in Rossiyskaya Gazeta, in which he states that a "coalition rapid response force" is needed. He goes on to outline what he thinks ought to be the three basic components of the CIS Joint Armed Forces as they are outlined in an agreement adopted at Bishkek on 9 October 1992:

- groups of military observers and a collective force to maintain peace in the CIS;

- a force to prevent local conflicts on the external borders of the CIS;

- contingents of forces to wage combat actions in largescale armed conflicts.

22 · The Council of CIS Defense Ministers is scheduled to meet for two days in Moscow starting 23 August. Key issues to be discussed are said to be the Tajik-Afghan border situation and reorganization of the CIS command structure. Defense Minister Grachev is to chair the meeting.

- The Council appears to have made little progress in its search for a mechanism that will coordinate CIS members' defense policies. Russia's unwillingness to underwrite the costs of maintaining a permanent joint command appears to be the major obstacle to reaching an agreement. ITAR-TASS reports that Grachev has urged the Council of Defense Ministers to reorganize into a working body that would coordinate military cooperation. The chief command during the transitional period will be headed by Col.-Gen. Viktor Samsonov, chief of staff of the CIS Joint Armed Forces.

· Before the meeting, Grachev says that until such a joint military body could be set up, CIS states ought to establish temporary "coalition" groups of forces to deal with specific security problems, such as the Tajik-Afghan border conflict. Tajik Defense Minister Shishlyannikov concurs, and suggests that Kazakh, Kyrgyz, Russian, and Uzbek troops take part. Grachev repeats his position that Russia prefers a political solution to the crisis, and notes that the Russian 201st division, already in Tajikistan, is trying to set up coalition forces.

September 1993

Economic

3 · While in Massandra with Kravchuk, Yeltsin announces that the CIS summit scheduled for 7 September will be postponed until 24 September. Apparently the delay was at the request of Kravchuk, who wants to allow the Ukrainian parliament to discuss the proposed economic union. RFE/RL reports that interest in some form of economic reconciliation is so important to some of the republics that even Moldovan President Snegur and Azeri parliament leader Aliiev have decided that they will attend, even though their countries “are no longer members of the CIS.”

Shevardnadze, as of 3 September, had not yet responded to an invitation to attend.

6 · In Kyrgyzstan, Prime Minister Tursunbek says that his country will “fearlessly join the CIS Economic Union,” and that Kyrgyz independence is not in danger, thanks to the “timely introduction of their own national currency.”

7 · Representatives of the governments and national banks of Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Russia, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan sign an agreement detailing measures for the creation of a new ruble zone. The agreement is to be accompanied by bilateral documents between Russia and the others outlining measures by which the countries would unify monetary, fiscal, banking, and customs policies. The strictly regulated circulation of national currencies (other than the ruble) will be permitted during a transitional period. The agreement is open to other countries.

- Russia and Kazakhstan have agreed that Russia will assume responsibility for Kazakhstan's share of the FSU's foreign debt in exchange for transferring FSU assets on Kazakh territory to Russia. Yeltsin and Nazarbaev meet on 7 September to prepare for the signing of the new "ruble zone" agreement among several CIS states.

- Russia also agrees to assume Armenia's share of the FSU's foreign debt in exchange for assets on Armenian territory. Russian Deputy Prime Minister Shokhin signs a similar arrangement with Azerbaijan.

8 · Prime Ministers Chernomyrdin and Kuchma reach an energy deal in which a Swiss holding company will purchase Russian oil and sell it to Ukraine, then sell Ukrainian goods throughout the FSU as its repayment. Ukraine will end up 8 million tons short of the 40 million it needs for the winter, but at least this way, according to Kuchma, Ukraine will be able to complete its harvest.

- Prime ministers Chernomyrdin and Kebich sign an agreement uniting the economic systems of Russia and Belarus. The agreement resolves the problem of gas prices and transport costs, and places the Belarusian gas transport system under the Russian state gas monopoly, Gazprom. Belarus also agrees to remain in the ruble zone as one of six former Soviet republics who agreed to do so the day before. A representative of the Belarusian National Bank hails what he refers to as not just a monetary union, but also an economic union.

11 · Segodnya hails the equity-for-debt arrangement between Russia and Belarus as a model for former Soviet states with mounting debts to Russia. The Belarusian agreement raises none of the political outcry raised by Ukraine against the fleet-for-debt swap proposal.

16 · Kuchma apparently tells Ukrainian TV viewers that because Ukrainian-Russian ties are so interwoven, the only way out of Ukraine's current economic crisis is through economic union with Russia. He argues that Ukrainian politicians must devise a way for economic union not to impinge on political sovereignty.

17 · At the fiftieth anniversary celebration of the liberation of Bryansk from the Germans, Prime Minister Chernomyrdin observes that: "All borders must be eliminated between Russia, the Ukraine, and Belarus. All customs and customs posts must be eliminated as soon as possible" (ITAR-TASS).

24 · The prime ministers of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan initial an Economic Union Treaty during a meeting of the Council of CIS Heads of Government. The new agreement seems to supersede the tripartite/Slavic economic union concluded earlier. Turkmenistan and Ukraine announce that they will probably only take out associate membership in the union. Chernomyrdin acknowledges Ukraine's position and says that an effort will be made to alleviate Ukraine's concerns in the hopes that it will eventually join. The Georgian prime minister attends as an observer. The Economic Union Treaty is still only a framework document, however, which provides for the free-flow of commodities, services, capital, and work force; coordinated fiscal, budget, tax, price, and foreign economic policies.

25 · At a news conference in Moscow following the signing of the Economic Union agreement, senior Moldovan officials explain why Moldova, which is not a member of the CIS, signed the agreement. Most of the journalists present view the signing of the agreements as de facto adherence to the CIS. The officials justify it because of Moldova's need to regain its former position in CIS markets, especially Russia. Cezar Ciobanu, President Snegur's economic advisor, stresses that the document is strictly economic, and will be of help in economic reform.

26 · The leaders of Rukh and Ukrainian nationalists adamantly oppose the CIS Economic Union. The leader of the Nationwide Movement of Ukraine, Larysa Skoryk, says that although the treaty contains a number of provisions that are not in Ukraine's interests, Kiev has the right not to fulfill those articles as an associate member.

· Belarusian Prime Minister Kebich expresses pessimism about prospects for implementing the Economic Union Treaty, noting that: "Now it is necessary to work out about thirty-five individual agreements so that this union works. I am more than convinced that it will be very difficult to work them out .. ."

28 · An article in Pravda on the significance of the Economic Union states that its formation is “undoubtedly the most significant event in the CIS’s entire brief, chaotic history.... The new independent states, barely having broken away from mother Russia and feeling the awkwardness of their position, have once again rushed to cling to its breast, where there are preferential credits, understated prices well below those on the world market, and energy sources delivered without set dates of payment.... It is quite possible that the Economic Union will be a prototype for a “Union of the Peoples.”

30 · The Crimean parliament emphatically disagrees with Ukraine’s associate membership in the new Economic Union. It says that it is in Ukraine’s national interest to have full membership. It accuses Kiev of conceding to forces bent on isolationism.

Political

6 · Aliev and Yeltsin hold talks in Moscow on Nagorno-Karabakh. Aliev agrees on principles for settling the conflict. It is unclear whether these principles call for the deployment of Russian “peacekeeping” troops in the area. Aliev also states that he will attend the 24 September CIS summit in Moscow, and has permission from his parliament to explore the idea of joining the CIS.

7 · Russia suspends taxes and customs duties on Moldovan imports from 1 August until 1 November, giving Moldova more time to decide whether it will join the CIS, in which case these measures will be permanently lifted. Russian markets are by far Moldova’s largest, and the taxes raise prices of Moldovan goods in Russia to an uncompetitive level. Moldovan leadership favors accession to the CIS and its economic community, but the parliamentary minority is opposed and holds a de facto veto. The leadership therefore wants to extend this deadline to 1 January, in order to allow for multiparty elections to parliament, hoping the new parliament will vote for accession to the CIS.

· Lt.-Gen. Aleksandr Lebed, commander of Russia’s 14th Army in Moldova, is running as candidate for the Supreme Soviet of the Dniester Republic, which he claims will join Russia on a federative or a confederative basis in the foreseeable future. This is not the first time Lebed has called for the republic’s accession to Russia, but it is the first time he has done so as part of a political platform.

8 · Both the chairman of the Belarusian Supreme Soviet, Shushkevich, and the prime minister of Belarus, Kebich, call for closer economic ties with Russia as the only way to maintain independence. With no reform program of its own, even Belarusian nationalists have been calling for closer cooperation with Russia. Belarus has been hard hit by Russia's raising of its export prices to near-world market levels in an effort to force the republics that benefit from its subsidies out of the ruble zone.

8-9 · A session of the Gagauz Supreme Soviet appeals to the CIS states to recognize the "Gagauz Republic" as an independent state and member of the CIS. They also resolve to hold a joint session of the Gagauz and Dniester Supreme Soviets to call for recognition and accession to the CIS political and economic agreements. This adds to already strong demands by Russia and the Dniester Republic that Moldova accede to the CIS.

10 · The Moldovan government issues a statement accusing Russian deputies who recently visited Moldovan regions of Gagauz and Dniester of encouraging their secessionist tendencies in an effort to recreate the Soviet Union. The fueling of these secessionist demands is seen as an effort "to blackmail Moldova and keep it within the former empire's zone."

14 · Russian parliamentary chairman Khasbulatov, who is also chairman of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly (IPA), proposes that the IPA hold joint elections by CIS member states. He adds that the joint parliament could form a common CIS government. The IPA has been "one of the more effective CIS institutions to date and could have an important role to play in harmonizing the legislation of CIS member states if a CIS Economic Union gets off the ground.”

15 · Tajikistan and Russia sign an agreement merging their monetary systems. This bilateral agreement follows the 7 September agreement creating a new ruble zone. “These steps embrace the banking, budget, and customs spheres, and the pricing policy, in other words, the entire set of measures necessary to make the ruble’s worth in Tajikistan on a par with that in Russia.”

17 · Khasbulatov writes to the parliaments of the CIS nations suggesting that they delegate certain unspecified powers to a supranational parliament that would coordinate their political, economic, and military activities. Khasbulatov is expected to raise this proposal with the IPA at its next scheduled meeting, on 25 September.

· The Moldovan government appeals to the Council of Europe to help fend off Russian deputies whom they hold responsible for inciting the Gagauz and Dniester republics to attempt to secede and join a Russian Confederation.

18 · ITAR-TASS reports that Vice-President Rutskoy, who has been at least temporarily stripped of his duties, has called for the recreation of the Soviet empire. This he said while speaking at a regional conference convened by Khasbulatov, apparently in an effort to counter the first meeting of the Council of the Federation, called by Yeltsin. Rutskoy claims that Russian foreign policy is dictated by the United States, and the people must resist Yeltsin’s policies.

20 · The Azerbaijan National Assembly, or its rump parliament, votes to renew its membership in the CIS. Chairman Aliev reassures parliament members that the vote will in no way compromise Azerbaijan's independence. Besides becoming party to the CIS charter, Azerbaijan decides to accede to the Treaty on Collective Security and the National Assembly will join the IPA. "It is also envisaged that at the forthcoming September Commonwealth summit meeting Azerbaijan will sign a treaty on an Economic Union" (ITAR-TASS).

21 · As a result of Yeltsin's decree stating that Russian deputies are allowed to take part in the IPA only with his explicit permission, Khasbulatov will no longer head the Assembly. The IPA's press center says that the consultative meeting of the CIS heads of parliament is unlikely to take place as scheduled on 25 September.

24 · Thousands of members of the Azeri Popular Front party in Nakhichevan, an Azeri region separated from Azerbaijan proper by a swath of Armenian territory, protests the signing by parliamentary chairman Aliiev of the papers committing Azerbaijan to CIS membership. Former Azeri President Elchibey, who was ousted in July after his Popular Front's support experienced a steady decline, has taken refuge in Nakhichevan.

· President Yeltsin says at the CIS summit in Moscow that "the Commonwealth has a realistic prospect of becoming one of the most powerful integrated unions in the world." This is broadcast on a Moscow Ostankino television program entitled "The CIS: From Strife to Accord." The program also airs images of two major oil refineries in Ukraine operating at 10-15 percent of their capacity because of the lack of oil ... the mayor of Donetsk is then shown stating that "we will not survive in isolation." Kravchuk, filmed for the program, says, "I am convinced that the most vehement opponents of Economic Union will see that it is good for us," in reference to the Economic Union.

Security

9 · Belarusian Defense Minister Kazlouski reiterates terms under which Belarusian troops would participate in CIS peacekeeping operations, saying as well that he agrees in principle with the Collective Security Treaty's goals. Belarusian troops would not be permitted to participate in operations in FSU "hotspots," but rather in conflicts on the republic's perimeter. Shushkevich, however, will still not sign the treaty which parliament voted to join last fall, ostensibly because it is a betrayal of national sovereignty.

29 · Col.-Gen. Boris Pyankov, commander of Collective Peacekeeping Forces of the CIS, is interviewed on the new forces by a Krasnaya Zvezda correspondent, in which he states that although there has been a lot of talk about the creation of Joint Armed Forces, they “have simply not been created.” In light of that, and of the rising extremism in the CIS, it was seen as necessary to take on the task of creating the Collective Peacekeeping Forces. They are to number approximately 25,000, and their mission will be to “stabilize the situation in Tajikistan, and maintain peace.”

Economic

8 · Gazprom is apparently planning to forgive Ukraine its oil-delivery debts in exchange for long-term leases on Ukrainian gas distribution facilities at Kiev, Uzhhorod, and Mykolaiv; storage facilities in western Ukraine; and some port facilities at Illichivsk and Odessa. Gazprom reports that Ukraine’s debt now totals 710.5 billion rubles. Gazprom also accuses Ukraine of siphoning off oil destined for Western Europe from pipelines that travel through Ukraine. Gazprom has apparently had to pay $10 million in breach-of-contract fees for this.

11 · Belarus is hoping that Russia’s decision to transport gas through Belarus rather than Ukraine will provide Belarus with an opportunity to buy Russian gas more cheaply. Yeltsin and Walesa signed an agreement in August on gas transport that would divert 80 billion cubic meters of gas through Belarus (approximately four times the amount that now goes through Belarus).

Ukrainian officials label the agreement as anti-Ukrainian, as Belarus's increase would come directly from gas now transported through Ukraine.

14 · The karbovanets loses 25 percent of its value vis—vis the U.S. dollar in one day on the Ukrainian Interbank Currency Exchange. Speculation as to why points to the persistence of the low fixed exchange rate for the mandatory sale of 50 percent of hard currency earnings in Ukraine. The new prime minister, Zvyahilsky, as well as the new finance minister, Pyatachenko, apparently oppose the removal of the law. Former Economics Minister Pynzenyk called the law “an illegal, absurd, and criminal decision.” The same day, the Belarusian zaichik loses 50 percent of its value vis—vis the dollar on Belarusian exchange markets. A spokesman for the Belarusian National Bank cites the halt in the Bank's selling of rubles to Belarusian enterprises at a discounted rate as the reason.

19 · Vladimir Mashchits, chairman of the State Committee for Economic Cooperation with Commonwealth States, says that the overall debt of the CIS states to Russia amounts to about 3 trillion rubles. He adds that the CIS states have no way of paying this back to Russia in 1994, and that although Russia, too, owes money to some CIS states, its debt to them is significantly smaller.

· The Russian government's Commission on Operative Questions expresses dissatisfaction over the trade problems afflicting suppliers in the Russian Federation. Apparently the suppliers are owed the equivalent of $2.5 billion by other members of the CIS. The Commission proposes speeding up the creation of the CIS Economic Court, as well as increasing penalties against delinquent payments and simplifying customs procedures, as ways to help in alleviating this problem.

- Moldovan President Snegur and Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin sign an agreement which stipulates that Russia will take over Moldova's share of the FSU's foreign debt in exchange for Moldova's share of the FSU's property outside Moldova. Russia also agrees to continue beyond 1 November to exempt Moldovan imports from duties and quotas to which other non-CIS countries' imports are subject. This concession by the Russians is made in the hope that Moldova will soon join the CIS, and that Snegur just needs a little time to convince the parliament of the economic benefits associated with joining the CIS.

· Moldovan Prime Minister Sangheli tells reporters that Moldova will introduce its national currency, the leu, in November. The arrival of the leu has been long anticipated by the international lending institutions; it will be pegged to the Russian ruble.

22 · Belarusian Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich states that Belarus cannot not survive economically, or politically, without close cooperation with Russia. An article in Rossiyskaya Gazeta stressed that the states of the CIS need to integrate through the strengthening of the Economic Union and the implementation of many other agreements on “finance, duties, and the movement of goods.” This would, according to the article, stave off further declines in production and unfulfilled delivery contracts. The article also notes that to reduce their relationships to solely commercial matters would only make matters worse, because none of them has enough hard currency reserves to sustain such a relationship.

27 · Russian Deputy Prime Minister Shokhin expresses reservations over the feasibility of the ruble zone at a press conference. He is particularly concerned that the legal system the zone will require is very complex and will take time to formulate. He advises the other five republics who signed the 7 September agreement to clarify what it is that they expect from the zone.

Political

22 · Commonwealth experts are said to be preparing a draft decision to start a CIS newspaper, which will be entitled Sodruzhestvo Nezavisimyykh Gosudarstv-Obshchiy Rynok (Commonwealth of Independent States-Common Market). Its initial print run is expected to be 100,000 copies, run in early 1994, and appearing as a supplement to Egor Yakovlev's Obshchaya Gazeta. Nine hundred fifty million rubles and $200,000 from the Commonwealth budget are expected to be allocated to its publication.

Security

1 · Belarusian TV reports that Russian troops are to be completely withdrawn from Belarus by 1996, when the remainder of the nuclear arms located on Belarusian territory are scheduled to be removed. Originally, Russian troops, whose numbers in Belarus are between 35,000 and 40,000, were not scheduled to be out until 1998. The Russian and Belarusian parliaments still have to ratify the new timetable. Problems could arise in Russia due to the housing shortage for returning troops, the reason many of the troops are in Belarus in the first place; most of them were on route from Eastern Europe to Russia when told to remain in Belarus until they could be accommodated in Russia.

8 · Foreign Minister Kozyrev expands on Russia's assumed role in the "near abroad" during an interview with Izvestiya: Russia will strive to create effective peacekeeping forces for the conflict areas of the FSU, as well as in other areas of the world. He highlights Russia's danger of "losing geopolitical positions that took centuries to conquer." He says that Russians should worry about Asians meddling in the area, not Americans: "we have plenty of neighbors in Asia who are prepared to send soldiers and weapons into the former Soviet republics, even under the guise of peacekeeping forces.” Kozyrev therefore ominously establishes a connection between peacekeeping in the “near abroad” and maintaining spheres of influence.

12 · Anatoliy Zlenko, foreign minister of Ukraine, says that Russia’s seeking of special UN status for its troops participating in the “near abroad” is unacceptable. Zlenko says that Ukraine favors peacekeeping in the territory of the FSU only on the basis of a decision by the UN Security Council. A Ukrainian TV broadcast characterizes Russian involvement in the Georgian/Abkhaz conflict as the manifestation of Russia’s old “imperial” ambitions.

13 · The defense minister of Turkmenistan, Danatar Kopekov, denies Russian press reports that planes from the Afghan airforce have bombed Turkmen territory on 11 October. Kopekov refers to the reports as “disinformation of a provocative nature,” and the Turkmen press publishes a statement by Afghanistan’s ambassador to Turkmenistan declaring the Turkmen-Afghan border is a “line of friendship and accord.”

20 · Deputy parliamentary speaker of Ukraine Vasil Durdynets apparently tells Western reporters that the debate over accession to START I will finally take place in November. Following their closed debate on Ukraine’s military doctrine, however, various officials appear to view Ukraine’s obligations under START I and the Lisbon protocol differently: According to Kravchuk, after ratification all Ukrainian SS-19s would be scrapped; according to Dmytro Pavlychko, chair of the parliamentary committee on foreign relations, only 36 percent of Ukraine’s delivery vehicles would be dismantled (this is based on the assumption that the limits required under START I will be applied equally and proportionately in all the nuclear republics of the FSU).

- Kravchuk's statements following the meeting also raise the question of who controls the weapons. He states that they will be taken off alert and de-targeted. The former was already thought to have been done, and the latter (targeting) was previously controlled by the CIS Joint Armed Forces, and is now thought to be in Russia's control.

Thus Kravchuk's statements imply that Ukraine has much more control over the weapons than mere veto power over a launch.

- A train carrying potentially leaky nuclear weapons from Ukraine to Russia has apparently been stopped at the border because Ukraine wants guarantees that it will be compensated for the material inside the warheads. The Russian Federation's Defense Ministry issues a statement accusing Ukraine of "misconduct," of not realizing the imminent danger posed by the damaged weapons, and of being distracted by "disorder in supreme power echelons."

25 · Ivan Plyushch, chairman of the Ukrainian parliament, states that if Russia, Ukraine, and the United States were to sign a collective security agreement, parliament might be persuaded to ratify START I. He notes that Ukraine's relations with Russia were damaged by the Russian parliament's claim to Sevastopol and the proposal by the Shakhray/Stankevich bloc, Party of Russian Unity and Concord, to make Russia the center of a new confederation. These statements, Plyushch says, "may influence Ukraine's position on its nuclear-free status."

27 · A military delegation from Belarus visits Ukraine in order to discuss military relations in 1994. They meet with Ukrainian defense minister Radetskiy, and deputy defense ministers Bizhan and Oliinyk.

- In response to a question asking that he describe Russia's relationship with the former Soviet republics, Yeltsin aide Sergey Karaganov says that: "Most of the former Soviet republics, apart from the Baltic ones, start to understand that it is extremely hard for them to survive politically and economically, especially economically, without the might of Russia. So basically all of them are, in one way or another . . . returning. That doesn't mean, however, that Russia wants to get them all back, and to take over politically."

Economic

2 · Russia's requirement that all members of the ruble zone have enough gold or hard currency with which to buy Russian rubles virtually precludes Kazakhstan from joining the zone. This new condition ruins the basis for the agreement unifying the Russian and Kazakh monetary systems. Russia has said it will provide Kazakhstan with the technical assistance necessary to develop its own monetary system and to introduce its own currency.

- Russian Deputy Finance Minister Andrey Kazmin notes that the debate over the new ruble zone has gone from one of a technical nature to that of a political nature. The key issue is Russia's willingness to give members of the zone new rubles. Kazmin now says Russia is willing to help other states set up their own interim currencies instead of the immediate creation of a ruble zone. Russian policy calls for alignment of states' monetary policies before it will supply new rubles because of the inflationary effects of last year's transfers to the former Soviet republics.

- The Uzbek government announces it is literally being pushed out of the ruble zone by the stringent terms of Moscow's Government and Finance Ministry. Officials say that even if Uzbekistan was able to meet the conditions, Russia would simply introduce new ones. The ruble zone is, at least for the time being, not an option for Uzbekistan either. Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan plan to introduce a common currency for economic interaction between the two states, which now use the ruble.

4 · Russia may again cut off, or dramatically reduce, natural gas and oil shipments to Belarus in retaliation for payment arrears. Russia delivered only 430,000 tons of oil to Belarus in October, in contrast to the usual 1 million tons. Rozkontrakt said it would supply only 200,000 tons in the month of November.

· Moldova has lost as much income due to Russia's imposition of duties on imports from Moldova as it did because of last year's drought, which forced Moldova to seek international aid. The duties have the further effect of pressuring Moldova to join the CIS Economic Union, and to sign the CIS Charter. As a result of lost exports, Moldova will most likely have to slow down its pace of economic reform.

5 · Uzbek Deputy Prime Minister Khamidov says Russia's new conditions for membership in the ruble zone place in doubt its sincerity about creating a unified economic space. The new conditions were not previously agreed upon, and none of the republics have the hard currency or gold deposits required to meet them. Some have gone as far as to say that a crisis in the CIS has resulted from Moscow's requirements (Pravda, 4 November). For example, huge amounts of old ruble notes have been flooding Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, causing shortages and hoarding, and creating destabilizing situations in those countries.

- In an attempt to monitor the inflow of rubles from the other former Soviet republics, President Nazarbaev of Kazakhstan will require that banks set up special accounts in which pre-1993 rubles are to be deposited. The Council of Ministers passes a subsequent decree stipulating that the deposit of old rubles received in payment for consumer goods and some basic services will not be subject to the deposit requirement.

8 · Belarusian Chairman of the Supreme Soviet Shushkevich says the economic relationship with Russia is one of the most important issues facing Belarus today. He stresses that it is crucial for Belarus to remain in the ruble zone and to form a customs union with Russia in order to remain competitive on Russian markets. The Belarusian government advises the parliament to ratify the treaty creating a monetary union with Russia.

10 · In Alma-Ata, the Kazakh and Uzbek presidents sign an agreement outlining the simultaneous introduction of new national currencies in the republics, although no date is specified. The move is designed to prevent the flooding of one republic with old rubles in the event one of them changes currencies first. The coordination of policy will delay currency reform in Kazakhstan, however, because Uzbekistan is not prepared for immediate change.

11 · Russia and Tajikistan will discuss the creation of a new type of ruble zone. Although Tajikistan may introduce its own currency, it will remain in the ruble zone, as will Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan.

12 · Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan introduce their new currencies: the tenge and the som. Despite the coordination of policies, Uzbekistan's slower approach, involving the continued use of rubles, will probably invite an inflationary inflow of old rubles from neighboring republics. Kazakhstan, on the other hand, plans a brief stage during which old rubles will be phased out, and by 25 November the tenge is to be the exclusive legal tender in Kazakhstan.

15 · Russia may require that the nations of the former Soviet Union pay off all accumulated debt and pay in advance for new oil shipments before any oil/gas will be delivered for the rest of the year. The Russian Committee for Economic Cooperation with CIS Countries reported last month that payments in arrears amount to 386 billion rubles owed Russia. Apparently the Russian government also plans to investigate whether these countries have been reexporting oil received from Russia, and if so, this will be taken into account in future negotiations.

16 · Russian Deputy Prime Minister Shokhin publishes an article in Izvestiya in which he notes that some former Soviet republics unhappy with Russia's new ruble policies have threatened that ethnic Russians living in these republics would be in for a hard time. He says this type of blackmail cannot be taken seriously, but should not be overlooked. The article continues: "First, it is absurd to use ultimatums when talking to Russia; second, Russia has adequate levers and means to oppose the methods of marauding 'people's diplomacy,' to ensure that the architects of this policy regret it. And the old ideological litany about 'imperial practice' should not be hyped up-Russia is able to defend its current interests."

17 · Belarus, Moldova, and Armenia prepare to leave the ruble zone by the end of November. Only Tajikistan remains committed to the ruble zone agreement, which all six, plus Russia, signed in September.

18 · The introduction of the tenge and som has not gone smoothly: the new national currencies are difficult to come by in Alma-Ata and Tashkent. As a result, in Alma-Ata, panic buying is reported and many shops were closed. In Tashkent, many are scrambling to exchange new high-denomination ruble notes for old and low-denomination ruble notes (up to and including 1,000 ruble notes), which are to circulate beside the som, at least until the end of the year.

- Russian Deputy Prime Minister Shokhin meets with Ukrainian officials to discuss mounting Ukrainian debt and future oil deliveries from Russia. Although a previous debt-equity swap arrangement reached at Massandra was rejected by the Ukrainian parliament, Shokhin expresses optimism after this first round of talks. He says the Ukrainians appear close to accepting the exchange of Ukrainian assets (presumably pipelines through which Russian gas and oil travel to Western Europe) for debt relief. The Ukrainian debt is now estimated to be near 500 billion rubles. It appears the Ukrainian government will have to make a deal, because Shokhin indicates that if Russian credits are to continue, the Ukrainian debt will have to be significantly lowered.

- The Belarusian parliament ratifies the CIS Economic Union and a monetary union agreement with Russia. Belarus must now subordinate its monetary and fiscal policies to the Russian Central Bank. The chairman of the Belarusian Central Bank says that Russia still refuses to subsidize Belarus. Many of the deputies who are in favor of the agreements think the result of acceding to the Economic Union will be Russia's continued subsidization of Belarus. However, Shushkevich cautions against ratification of the economic agreements.

20 · The Ukrainian government, in an attempt to mitigate the effects of rising costs of Russian oil and gas, relieves Ukrainian enterprises of export duties imposed on goods destined for Russia's gas and oil ventures, including Gazprom and Rosneft. According to Interfax, Ukraine's debt to Russia amounted to 714.6 billion rubles on 15 November, which includes 490.7 billion for gas, 206.3 billion for oil, and 17.6 billion for other petroleum products. Ukraine's gas debt to Turkmenistan is also significant: 85.8 billion rubles.

22 · Tajik citizens are reacting to the flood of old Soviet rubles from neighboring republics who have introduced their own currencies by hoarding goods, which causes shortages and fuels inflation. Tajikistan is the only post-Soviet republic which still uses the old rubles, and has stated that it will remain in the ruble zone with Russia, and will not introduce a national currency to function beside the ruble.

· Uzbekistan has threatened to cut off vital oil supplies to Kyrgyzstan if the Kyrgyz government does not pay its $9 million debt within three days. Kyrgyzstan has asked the IMF to help.

- Armenia introduces its national currency, the dram, because of its inability to meet Russia's conditions for remaining in the ruble zone. In Yerevan, only U.S. dollars and 1993 rubles are being accepted in stores, and the dram has lost half of its value vis—vis the ruble, although it was only found to be officially exchangeable with U.S. dollars. Nagorno-Karabakh also decided to switch to the dram.

- Russian Deputy Prime Minister Shokhin expects the 3 trillion rubles owed by other republics to Russia for energy debts to be transferred into promissory notes and floated on the CIS financial markets. Shokhin calls for the republics to start paying in advance for gas and oil deliveries, for the opening of the CIS Interstate Bank to be hastened, and for the introduction of convertible national currencies on the territories of the former republics. Shokhin questions the feasibility of debt-equity swaps in the CIS, citing as a hindrance the relative inexperience with property commercialization.

23 · Russia and Tajikistan sign an intergovernment agreement whereby Russia is to grant Tajikistan a cash credit worth 1 billion Russian rubles. Tajikistan plans to exchange pre-1992 bank notes currently circulating in Tajikistan for the credits. The prime minister of Tajikistan notes that with this first step, Tajikistan is now a member of the ruble zone.

- Belarus exhausts its fuel supplies and starts running on reserves, which can be expected to last only one week, according to the energy minister. Belarus is at least 140 billion rubles in debt for energy supplies, 28 billion of which is owed to Russia.

25 · Moldovan President Snegur introduces the leu as the national currency of Moldova. His decree states that all rubles will have to be exchanged by 2 December 1993, at a rate of 1 leu per 1,000 rubles. After 2 December, the leu will be the only legal means of payment.

26 · Ukraine cuts off electricity exports, and ceases to transport Russian energy supplies through its territory to Eastern Europe, due to its domestic energy crisis.

Political

11 · Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev states that he favors linking other CIS states' acceptance of Russia's proposals on dual citizenship with Russia's economic aid to the former republics and with progress on CIS re-integration.

15 · The head of the Russian presidential Commission for Citizenship says all Russians living in the "near abroad" should be guaranteed identical rights to the citizens of those countries, and that in fact they ought to be granted dual citizenship. He says that if dual citizenship were to be institutionalized, it would be a path toward mutual trust among the states.

22 · A member of a Ukrainian delegation to the CIS (of which Ukraine is not a member), who wishes to remain anonymous, states that: "more than two hundred agreements adopted during the CIS period of existence have not made it an efficient organization because it lacked appropriate structures that would guarantee implementation of law-abiding acts. A real delimitation on the basis of national independence, ownership rights, and a national currency had not taken place in order to later unite on a new basis” (UNIAN).

26 · TASS reports that Kazakh President Nazarbaev says he would never want to jeopardize relations with Russia, but he had to note that some of the campaign rhetoric being used in Russia is disturbing even to him. Especially disturbing are statements about the need to “protect” Russians in the “near abroad.” An earlier statement by Nazarbaev provoked a protest from the Russian government: he said the policy is analogous to Hitler’s policy protecting Sudeten Germans in Czechoslovakia.

· Chairman of the Moldovan parliament Petr Lucinschi states that “no one, not even the representatives of the opposition, feels any doubt now that Moldova must be a part of the CIS and maintain ‘good, warm’ relations with the Russian Federation” (Rossiyskie Vesti).

30 · The missions and embassies of nine countries of the former Soviet Union lodge a complaint with the Moscow mayor for his introduction of a “special order of residence” in the city, whereby citizens of all former Soviet countries have to register to remain in the city, calling it humiliating to citizens of their countries. (Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Ukraine, and Uzbekistan lodge the complaint.)

Security

2 · Russia has suggested that the UN create a voluntary fund which would support peacemaking operations on the territory of the former USSR. At this time, according to a Ministry of Defense official, Russia has been the only former Soviet state involved in all of the peacekeeping operations, and largely finances them on its own.

3 · Ukrainian Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Tarasyuk announces that Ukraine will not turn over any deactivated SS-19s to Russia until Ukraine, Russia, and the United States resolve the question of Ukraine's compensation for surrendering the weapons.

5 · The council of CIS commanders of border troops meets in Minsk to discuss operations, cooperation, equipment provision, finances, and the training of personnel. Only Georgia, Moldova, and Tajikistan neglect to send representatives.

· Upon returning from a trip to Washington, Belarusian Defense Minister Pavel Kazlouski says that Belarus is entitled to half of a fund of $400 million set aside by the U.S. government to help former republics of the Soviet Union disarm. He justifies his claim by citing Belarus's surrender of its nuclear arms. To date, Belarus has received $59 million from the United States to help pay for the dismantlement.

· The Japanese government agrees to aid Belarus with the disposal of its nuclear arms. Earlier in the year, Japan pledged $100 million to all the former Soviet republics for this purpose. They scheduled a first joint Japanese/Belarusian disarmament committee meeting for 9 November.

10 · The Ukrainian Defense Ministry repudiates claims by Izvestiya that it is planning troop cuts to 250,000 troops by the end of 1995. The Ukrainian Defense Ministry says that after reductions, the army is planned to be 450,000 strong.

16 · CIS joint peacekeeping forces launch wargames in Tajikistan to test their combat capabilities in mountain and desert terrain. Military sources say the training will prepare the troops for a potential full-scale invasion of Tajikistan by opposition rebels training in Afghanistan.

18 · A 600-page report entitled "Security Through Cooperation," on the state of CIS defense capabilities, and particularly its Collective Security Treaty, is published in Moscow. The document is supposed to circulate without restriction.

· Sevodnya reports that three versions of the document are available for purchase with hard currency: an 80-page short version, US$299; a 150-page abridged version, US$299; and the full-length document, US$1,675. Parts of the paper were published in Izvestiya on 20 November. These extracts mostly comprised data on the composition of the armed forces of each of the member-states of the CIS; little of a doctrinal nature was in these excerpts.

· The Ukrainian parliament votes on 17 November to ratify the START I Treaty, but attaches so many conditions that prospects for its implementation in the near future are very dim: Parliament reserves the right not to adhere to Article 5, which would require that Ukraine accede to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty; it demands compensation for the tactical nuclear weapons removed in 1992, foreign financial assistance for the dismantlement, and security guarantees recognizing the inviolability of Ukraine's borders. Parliament also reaffirms Ukraine's ownership and administrative control of the weapons. The resolution, which stipulates dismantlement of only 36 percent of the launchers, and 42 percent of the warheads, will be implemented only if financial assistance is received.

19 · Ukraine's permanent envoy to the United Nations, Viktor Batyuk, states that the ratification of START I by Ukraine is a historic achievement, but goes on to say that unfortunately, a solution has not been found to the problems associated with disarmament, namely security guarantees and compensation. He indicates that only when these problems are solved will the treaty be implemented. Batyuk estimates that it will take about seven years for START to be honored.

19-20 · The Russian and U.S. governments react negatively to Ukraine's conditional ratification of the START I Treaty, accusing the Ukrainian parliament of reneging on previous statements. However, they leave open the possibility of future negotiations, saying that the resolution does not necessarily reflect the positions of the Ukrainian government or President Kravchuk. Kravchuk is also critical of the resolution, saying that he would resubmit the treaty for ratification in March, after the new parliament has been elected. However, Kravchuk's sincerity is questioned by many analysts. Ukrainian Deputy Prime Minister Shmarov releases figures on financing the START I treaty accession [the Ukrainian interpretation] at $1.6-1.8 billion. He says that to disarm completely would cost $3.8 billion (if accurate, $1 billion higher than previous estimates).

23 · Russian officials allegedly hint they will use economic pressure in order to get Ukraine to give up its nuclear weapons.

30 · At CSCE meetings in Rome, Russia's proposal to lead peacekeeping operations in the former Soviet space are debated. None of the Western powers, the EU, or NATO are willing to take on the role themselves, but are also unwilling to let Russia have the job. The Baltic states and Ukraine express strong reservations about the proposal. Whereas most Western delegates strongly criticize Ukraine, Canada's foreign minister offers to mediate between Russia and Ukraine. Foreign Minister Zlenko accuses Russia of mobilizing the criticism, adding that: "Russia has the nuclear button and that's where the threat comes from." Kozyrev asks for the support of the CSCE for Russian peacekeeping in the former Soviet Union, and suggests that the political coordination of all peacekeeping operations undertaken by NATO, NACC, WEU, and CIS be taken over by the CSCE. Later, Kozyrev acknowledges that Russia's peacekeeping proposal stands scant chance of acceptance.

- At a conference on Black Sea cooperation, President Kravchuk refers to Ukraine's nuclear weapons as "material wealth," and demands that Ukraine be compensated for them when they are given up.
- The Washington Times reports that Ukraine is trying to take operational control of its weapons, and may succeed by 1994. The allegation is later denied by Kravchuk.

December 1993

1 · An updated chart on levels of radiation contamination in Belarus, Russia, and Ukraine is released by specialists in Russia: percentages of land in which contamination levels are one curie per square kilometer or higher are as follows:

Belarus:	23 percent
Russia:	0.6 percent
Ukraine:	5.2 percent

· Belarusian Prime Minister Kebich meets with Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin to discuss economic ties, including Belarus's entry into the ruble zone, its debt to Russia, and its energy crisis. Deputy Russian Prime Minister Gaydar has set new conditions on the monetary union with Belarus, which include legislation allowing the creation of a common market for land, other property, and securities.

7 · A Kommersant-Daily article says oil debts in the former Soviet Union serve to promote the integration of CIS as well as non-CIS countries, such as Ukraine. It explains that the necessity to repay debts lays the groundwork for setting up multilateral financial institutions in the former Soviet space.

9 · The eleven member states of the Black Sea Economic Cooperation Parliamentary Assembly (BSEC) agree to create a joint bank to facilitate regional trade and industrial projects, to be called the Bank for Black Sea Trade and Development, based in Thessaloniki, Greece. Bulgarian President Zhelev issues a statement which calls for the countries of the area to overcome ethnic and religious hatreds, so as to facilitate the development of a prosperous region. A Russian, Evgeniy Kotovoy, is elected to chair the BSEC secretariat.

17 · A joint Belarusian-Russian commission, meeting in Minsk, orders the Belarusian Finance Ministry and National Bank to prepare the monetary and fiscal conditions of the country for the imminent economic union with Russia.

· Armenia, Moldova, and Ukraine apply for membership in the GATT, and are formally accepted. Working groups are established to accomplish their accession.

18 · The CIS Interstate Bank is officially established and ten CIS member states commit five billion rubles as start-up capital, with each member's contribution based on its proportion of inter-CIS trade. The purpose of the Bank is to facilitate multilateral clearing of trade transactions within the CIS. Viktor Gerashchenko, head of Russia's Central Bank, is elected chairman.

23 · A Segodnya article suggests that Ukraine's share of the Black Sea Fleet be used as collateral to back Ukraine's energy debt to Russia.

29 · The Russian Information Agency reports that Uzbekistan plans to reduce oil and petroleum product imports from CIS countries by at least 15 percent next year in an apparent effort to become more economically independent.

Political

3 · Georgia becomes a full member of the CIS, the last of the ex-Soviet republics (excluding the Baltic states) to do so. (Moldova and Ukraine are “Associate Members.”)

4 · The Lviv city council reacts to Moscow’s requirement for all citizens of former Soviet republics to register with Russian authorities by introducing a tax on Russian residents of Lviv. The Russian Foreign Ministry is apparently negotiating to change the law.

7 · The secretary general of the CIS, Ivan Korotchenya, speaks before Belinform on the second anniversary of the formation of the CIS. Korotchenya cites the failure to implement multilateral agreements as the greatest obstacle to the integration of the CIS, but predicts that the creation of the Coordinating and Consultative Committee will alleviate this problem.

· On the same subject, Nezavisimaya Gazeta editorializes that the CIS has expanded within 1993 to coincide with the boundaries of the former Soviet Union. However, “if Russia fails to convince the other ex-Soviet republics that its intentions have a logical boundary and that its pressure will not spread beyond mutually acceptable limits, next year may well witness the conversion of the CIS into an association of integrated foes.”

10 · Interfax reports that Moldova plans to become a full member of the CIS, and will apply following its parliamentary elections. The charter stipulates that for an ex-republic to become a full member of the CIS, the charter must be ratified by 22 January 1994, but Moldova requests an exception to the rule because, it argues, ratification will not be possible until after elections scheduled for 28 December.

13 · Ukrainians express alarm at the gains made by the Liberal Democratic Party and the Communists in the Russian parliamentary elections of 12 December. The opposition party, Rukh, intensifies its campaign against Ukraine's unconditionally giving up all of its nuclear weapons. The leader of the Democratic Party of Ukraine compares Zhirinovskiy to Hitler. Volodymyr Yavorivskiy, another democratic leader, warns Ukrainian democrats of the need to form a united front in order to prevent the same thing from happening in Ukraine. Belarusian Parliamentary Chairman Shushkevich also expresses concern over the Russian election results, noting that if the democratic parties do not form a unified front with which to counter Zhirinovskiy's rising power, he will begin his campaign to recreate the Russian empire. Some in the liberal minority in Belarus welcome the destabilizing results, which, they point out, may make Russia concentrate more on its own problems than on dominating the affairs of Belarus. Moldovan Prime Minister Snegur is also wary, noting that during the campaign Zhirinovskiy referred to Moldova as a province of Russia, whose governor-general is 14th Army Commander Aleksandr Lebed.

- Presidents Kravchuk and Snegur sign bilateral cooperation accords in which they pledged to respect each other's territorial sovereignty and increase cooperation in the legal and economic spheres.
- President Nazarbaev, a staunch supporter of reintegrating the ex-Soviet republics, modifies his views. In an interview with Profil (Vienna), Nazarbaev states that: "There was a time, after the Soviet Union disintegrated, when we were very romantic. We thought we could reunite. I, too, was wrong in that respect. Now I know that every state needs a chance to live and balance its own independence. Unfortunately, certain Russian politicians still have a Soviet way of thinking, which prevents such unification."

15 · Iranian President Rafsanjani calls for increasing his country's ties with all countries of the CIS, especially economic ones.

25 · CIS summit: Although many agreements are signed at the Ashkhabad summit on 24 December, there is little evidence of the CIS's increased viability. It was agreed that implementation of the Economic Union should begin even though some of the members' parliaments have not yet ratified the agreement. A Russian draft accord on minority human rights is not signed because of stiff opposition from a number of CIS states. Apparently, a number of bilateral meetings which do not include Russia take place in Ashkhabad. Boris Yeltsin is re-elected chairman of the CIS for a six-month period, and Russian diplomat Gennadiy Shabannikov is elected General Secretary of the CIS Collective Security Council, even though the Treaty on Collective Security has not been implemented. ITAR-TASS reports that the CIS members have decided to request that the UN grant the CIS status as an international organization. Support from the international community is perceived by Russia as legitimization.

27 · Georgian President Shevardnadze, in a radio interview, expresses confidence in the longevity and viability of the CIS, provided Russia follows a democratic course. Conceding Russia's predominant influence and importance, he says, "And still, the center of the CIS, the magnetic pole and the initiator is Russia, and the fate of the CIS's future will depend on Russia and the processes under way in Russia ... if Russia does not follow the path of democracy, then, of course, the CIS will disintegrate."

28 · Ukrainian television broadcasts a discussion among Ukrainian officials in the wake of the Ashkhabad summit. Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Tarasyuk notes that Ukraine had signed 21 agreements, including a political declaration which stipulates that members will honor each other's territorial integrity and refrain from using force against one another. Political observer

Valeriy Zhyhun notes that the CIS charter is to come into effect on 22 January, and that only those states which have ratified it at that time will be members. Thus, Ukraine has to decide whether it wants to integrate more closely with the CIS, or “seek ways to abandon it.” Tarasyuk states that a two-tiered CIS may emerge, one tier of signatories to the charter, and a second tier of associates.

31 · Kazakh Foreign Minister Suleymenov praises the pledge made by CIS member states not to interfere in each others’ internal affairs and to respect one another’s territorial sovereignty. He stresses the importance of the Economic Union, saying, “we should follow the example set by Western countries,” and eventually establish a transnational currency.

Security

1 · The Black Sea Economic Cooperation Parliamentary Assembly opens its second conference in Kiev.

Participating delegations are from Albania, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Moldova, Romania, Turkey, and Ukraine (Russia was not mentioned). Greece sends an observation team. Kravchuk puts forward a number of proposals on security cooperation in the Black Sea area, including detailed naval training activities, the adoption of a declaration on the inviolability of naval borders, and a declaration stipulating that members would not use their naval forces against one another.

2 · A Moscow News article carries a warning from the deputy chief of staff of the Russian Defense Ministry’s Main Directorate for Nuclear Weapons, Vitaliy Yakovlev, explaining that if Ukraine’s nuclear weapons have exceeded their six-year service life, attempts to dismantle them might be dangerous, if not impossible. Yakovlev also warns that the weapons could be made into radiological weapons, in which the radioactive material could be dispersed over a target area. These statements contribute to what appears to be a new Russian campaign to pressure Ukraine into giving up its nuclear weapons.

7 · A Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman says the nuclear arms issue in Ukraine has reached a new level of urgency, and that Ukraine should heed the mounting international consensus that it must relinquish the weapons.

· A majority of CSCE members advocate a peaceful solution to the Dniester conflict, and the unconditional withdrawal of the 14th Russian Army from Moldova.

15 · The head of Russia's border troops states that CIS peacekeeping forces in Tajikistan may need reinforcements before spring, when they expect renewed attacks from the opposition based in Afghanistan. He suggests that it may be in Russia's interests to extend the CIS agreement, which is due to expire at the end of the month, providing for military support to the Tajik government.

- Representatives of the U.S. State Department and National Security Council who visit Dushanbe are reportedly studying the legality of CIS peacekeeping forces in the country. Russia and Tajikistan have applied to have these forces converted to the status of UN peacekeeping forces.

- Following the success of the Liberal Democratic Party in Russia's parliamentary elections, Belarusian first Deputy State Secretary for National Security says that the republic will continue to send its weapons to Russia. He says that he believes the president and prime minister to be guarantors of Belarusian security and that even if the LDP gains control of the parliament, he believes the "button" would remain with the executive. Opposition leaders asserted that Belarus should follow Ukraine's example and halt the transfer of weapons to Russia because of the instability there.

- Yeltsin's first public statement on the Ukrainian parliament's ratification of START is carried by Interfax. Yeltsin accuses Ukraine of cheating and deception in its nuclear weapons policies, calling its approach "evil." Ukrainian officials dismiss these charges.

16 · The head of Rukh, Vyacheslav Chernovil, calls Yeltsin's comments diversionary tactics, an attempt to shift world attention away from the "crashing defeat of democracy" in the Russian elections and onto Ukraine. The leader of the Ukrainian Social Democratic Party observes that Yeltsin's statements signify he has "begun to respond to the new balance of power in Russia."

17 · Premature reports appear in the Western press claiming that an agreement has been reached regarding compensation to Ukraine for dangerous nuclear fissile material removed from its warheads. Despite substantial discussions between U.S. Deputy Defense Secretary William Perry, U.S. Ambassador-at-Large Strobe Talbott, Russian Deputy Defense Minister Georgiy Mamedov, Ukrainian presidential advisor Anatoliy Buteiko, and Ukrainian Deputy Prime Minister Valeriy Shmarov, no final agreement appears to have been reached.

21 · Trilateral negotiations among the United States, Russia, and Ukraine appear to be leading to a debt-equity swap (nuclear weapons for energy debt), along the lines of the earlier Massandra agreement.

22 · The commander of CIS forces in Tajikistan, Russian General Boris Pyankov, states that troop reinforcements will not be needed, but that earlier CIS resolutions calling for troops from Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan have not yet been met, and are needed. The question of whether to put these troops under the control of the CSCE or the United Nations has not been resolved, partly because the United States raises the question of Russia's ability to remain neutral as a peacekeeping force.

- According to the Belarusian Defense Ministry, twentyseven of its eighty-one strategic SS-25s have been sent to Russia, with the rest to follow by January 1996.
- Ukrainian Defense Minister Vitaliy Radetskiy announces that Ukraine will form a working relationship with CIS military bodies, and particularly with the Russian military. The Ukrainian parliament refutes Radetskiy's words, saying they express his own opinion only.

23 · The CIS defense ministers meet in Ashkhabad, Turkmenistan (which is not a member of the CIS), and decide to transform the Joint Military Command into the CIS Joint Staff Committee, which will be smaller and will execute orders issued by the CIS Council of Defense Ministers. Col.-Gen. Samsonov will continue to head the committee. The formation of a joint staff has reportedly been agreed upon, with Russia to pay for half the costs. Col.-Gen. Pyankov urges Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan to fulfill their commitments to the operation. Russian and Ukrainian Defense Ministers Grachev and Radetskiy apparently hold a productive meeting in which they agree on many issues, reflecting improved relations between the two defense ministries after extensive personnel changes in Ukraine's Defense Ministry. "Our views coincide almost entirely," Radetskiy said. Prior to the meeting, Turkmen President Niyazov states that "if the interests of independence are not infringed in any respect, and if Turkmenistan's proposals for an economic alliance are taken into account, then Turkmenistan does not rule out the possibility of becoming a full member."

28 · Kazakh Defense Minister Nurmagametov

advocates closer military ties with Russia, calling the treaty of friendship and cooperation between Kazakhstan and Russia the legal basis for such ties.

· First Deputy Defense Minister of Ukraine Ivan Bizhan denies that Ukraine has agreed to join the CIS Council of Defense Ministers. He reminds the press that Ukraine did not sign a single document at the Ashkhabad summit, and that any decision to join any arm of the CIS could only be decided by the president and the parliament. These two parties are deciding whether to send their representatives to the CIS Joint Armed Forces and the Council of Defense Ministers. Bizhan's comments appear to be calculated to discredit Radetskiy, who is considered by many to be too pro-Russia and pro-CIS.

29 · Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Tarasyuk announces that Ukraine will deactivate twenty SS-19s and twenty SS-24s, although the timing of the deactivation remains unclear.

January 1994

Economic

1 · In Azerbaijan, the manat becomes the only legal tender as of 1 January. The exchange rate is to be 1 manat per 10 rubles.

5 · President Yeltsin meets with CIS Executive Secretary Korotchenya to discuss strengthening the CIS. They focus on the problems associated with the Economic Union, especially the fact that there is still no legal basis for the union. Korotchenya asks Yeltsin to set forth measures which would create supranational interstate structures such as a payments union, and a free trade area.

· Russia and Belarus decide to merge their monetary systems by mid-January, and to make the Russian ruble the only legal tender in the two republics.

8 · Tajikistan replaces all pre-1993 Soviet and Russian rubles with new Russian rubles, which are to be the country's only legal tender. The move is in keeping with the November 1993 agreement between Tajikistan and Russia, which subordinated Tajik economic policy to Russian authority in exchange for Russian support of the failing Tajik economy.

11 · Reuters reports that Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan have agreed to create a common market by the year 2000, by abolishing all tariffs, quotas, licenses, and other trade barriers between the two countries. Kazakh

President Nazarbaev says the agreement abolishes borders between his country and Uzbekistan.

- A representative of Russia's Ministry of Fuel and Energy, Vladimir Trofimov, announces that Russia has been strictly observing the schedule of oil deliveries to Ukraine. He also notes that Ukraine and Russia have settled on the price of oil at $80/ton rather than the previously announced $ 100/ton (the world-market price).
- Russia extends to Georgia a long-term credit of 10 billion rubles in order to revive its faltering economy. According to a Georgian embassy official in Moscow, the Georgian power supply is to be reintegrated into the southern Russian power grid.
- Izvestiya reports that Goskomsotrudnichestvo (the State Committee for Cooperation with Commonwealth Members) confirmed that Russia has transferred 30 billion rubles to Tajikistan in order to help it reenter the ruble zone. Apparently a total of 60 billion rubles has been earmarked for Tajikistan's reconstruction. Russian officials give Tajikistan six months to fulfill the requirements for membership in the "ruble zone," including subordination of its central bank to Russia's, coordination of tax, budget, and customs policies, and the implementation of economic reforms.
- Russia's Finance Ministry subsequently contradicts the report that Tajikistan will join the ruble zone, but confirms the extension of Russian credits.

12 · Belarusian parliamentary chairman Shushkevich and Boris Yeltsin issue a joint communiqué calling for a new treaty on friendship and cooperation. Ostankino

TV reports that the talks removed barriers between “what is essentially a single people.”

- Two remaining disagreements are the rate of exchange between Belarusian and Russian rubles, and the price of oil in Belarus, which Moscow wants to raise above Russia’s.

13 · The Russian government outlines requirements Georgia must meet in order to rejoin the ruble zone. They include adopting all the economic laws of Russia, merging Georgian customs laws with Russia’s, refraining from all independent credit emissions, and appointing a Russian to one of the vice-presidencies of the National Bank of Georgia.

- The Russian Foreign Ministry requests consultations between the Azeri and Russian governments concerning the creation of a free economic zone in Azerbaijan and Dagestan. Such an arrangement would in effect eliminate the borders between Azerbaijan and the Russian Federation republic of Dagestan. An advisor at Russia’s Baku Embassy observes that “The creation of a free economic zone serves to maintain historical and cultural relations between the two people.....”

- An agreement on economic trade and cooperation between Ukraine and Georgia takes effect, with a list of goods that will be traded duty-free under the framework of the agreement.

16 · Kyrgyzstan and Uzbekistan sign a number of agreements defining prospects for the further development of bilateral economic relations, most importantly an agreement which will permit the entry of Kyrgyzstan into the nascent Kazakh-Uzbek economic union.

17 · In apparent response to former Russian First Deputy Prime Minister Gaydar's resignation, Belarusian Prime Minister Kebich and First Deputy Prime Minister Myasnikovich defend the economic merger between Russia and Belarus, which Gaydar opposed. Kebich asserts that Belarus's entry into the ruble zone will not cause the ruble to decline in value; rather, it will have the long-term effect of stabilizing it. Myasnikovich praises the final agreement, stating that Gaydar's view was not that of the Russian government.

20 · After meeting in Kiev with President Kravchuk, Kazakh President Nazarbaev proposes the creation of a single currency unit in the CIS, the “altyn.” No reactions to the proposal are noted in the press.

25 · Deputy Prime Minister Valentin Landyk states that Ukraine will accede to the CIS Economic Union at the CIS summit in March. The Ukrainian leader stresses that his republic should rely primarily on relations with the states of the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe in order to improve the economic situation in the country.

26 · The Russian Ministry for Cooperation with CIS States reports that shortfalls in energy product deliveries to CIS states amount to 16.8 million tons of crude oil and oil products and 16.4 billion cubic meters of natural gas.

· Uzbek President Karimov addresses an international congress of industrialists and entrepreneurs in Tashkent, where he states that Uzbekistan’s future is inconceivable without Russia. He unequivocally favors restoring economic ties among the CIS states and Eastern Europe, but emphasizes not all interstate ties should be resurrected, pointing out that Russia “continues to play the role of dictator” in the former Soviet states.

27 · Belarusian Prime Minister Kebich reassures Russia that the ouster of Parliament Speaker Shushkevich will not affect the planned signing of agreements on monetary union between the two countries.

· A UNIAN correspondent reports research results on the likely impact of Ukraine's not signing the economic union. The Cabinet of Ministers estimates annual costs to Ukraine would be $4.6 billion, and therefore recommends Ukraine's cooperation with the Economic Union as an associate member.

Political

1 · In Russia delivering his New Year's Eve broadcast, President Yeltsin pledges to defend the interests of Russians living abroad, implying those in states of the former Soviet Union. He says that "on the basis of law and solidarity, we defend and will defend our common interests."

4 · In Tajikistan, authorities do not release information about the killings of a Russian Orthodox priest and nine Russian Baptists, and reports that the killings are linked with a robbery are unconvincing. They attribute the reluctance to explain the killings to a fear that it will scare Russians living in Tajikistan and result in greater Russian interference in Tajik internal affairs. The priest was killed shortly after conducting a service for members of the Russian 201 st Motor-Rifle Division, the core of the CIS peacekeeping troops in Tajikistan.

7 · In Kyrgyzstan, President Akaev proposes that Russians in Kyrgyzstan be given at least temporary dual citizenship as a way to rally their support behind him. A concession was reportedly necessary because the Russian-speaking industrial workers have been hardest hit by Kyrgyzstan's economic decline. He also hints that the state language law might be reconsidered. The Kyrgyz nationalist party Asaba immediately attacked the proposals.

10 · In Georgia, President Shevardnadze rejects parliament speaker Goguadze's statement claiming the situation in Georgia is so dire that Russian economic and military aid is the only solution. Shevardnadze concedes that the adoption of the coupon last year had been a mistake, but he said that Georgia needed many more months before it could be decided to rejoin the ruble zone. Within a year, the Georgian coupon fell from a ratio of 1:1 with the Russian ruble to 100:1.

- On the issue of Russian troops being used to enforce law and order in Georgia, Shevardnadze states that "a country which could not instill law and order on its own does not deserve independence."

12 · At a Moscow news conference, representatives of several human rights organizations report that Russian troops in the NIS committed brutal acts on civilians. Helsinki Watch, present at the press conference, places much blame on the Russian government for not preventing the escalation of human rights abuses, particularly in Moldova. Apparently, rather than those responsible for such abuses being disciplined, some were even promoted or awarded medals.

- The Bureau to Coordinate the Fight against Organized Crime and other Dangerous Forms of Crime on CIS Territory starts work in Moscow. The participants agree that criminal formations have "spread out" across the whole of the former union. Criminal activities include "illegal" businesses which export raw materials, large-scale bank fraud, automobile theft, drug and firearm import and distribution, and foreign currency dealings.

- A Moldovan newspaper prints a document submitted by Russia at the Ashkhabad CIS summit last month which calls for Russians living in the "near abroad" to be granted dual citizenship. While Moldova avoided the issue at Ashkhabad, officials there appear to be weakening in their resolve to oppose such a move.

13 · In Minsk, negotiators from ten CIS states concluded talks on migrant labor. They are to sign an intergovernmental agreement in March. Specific issues which arose due to the collapse of the USSR are pension rights, medical coverage, and safety standards for migrant workers. Currently, Russia has a labor agreement only with Ukraine, but that is not preventing the emigration of thousands of workers from Ukraine to Russia searching for higher wages.

14 · Moldova's acting Foreign Minister Ion Botnaru rejects Russian proposals for dual citizenship for Russians in

Moldova, stating that while it may be a stabilizing factor in Turkmenistan, it could “boomerang” elsewhere. He also urges that official Russian statements about Russians abroad be “specific, not inflammatory.”

- Botnaru also rejects Russia’s claim that the railroads from Moldova to Russia would not be able to handle the evacuation of Russia’s 14th Army stationed there. He says that Moldova would internationalize the troop withdrawal and peace settlement negotiations if the deadlock is not broken.

19 · During a meeting with U.S. Ambassador to Russia Thomas Pickering, Foreign Minister Kozyrev states that if Russia does not maintain a role in the “near abroad,” the result will be chaos and Russia will be flooded with refugees. He also says that Russian troops will remain in neighboring countries only under the terms of bilateral agreements, as in Tajikistan. These statements are to clarify remarks made on 18 January, which caused alarm in many former Soviet republics, especially the Baltics.

- Apparently, Kozyrev also rejects the use of force or ultimatums against other states in the “near abroad” over Russian minorities living there, but, he says, the question of Russian minority rights cannot be ignored.

- Kozyrev responds sternly to continued criticisms of his statements, saying that Russia would not sit idly by if the rights of its minorities in the near abroad were violated. He says that Russia would use stronger means to protect these minorities if international legal norms were violated. (No evidence of such violations has been found by international human rights organizations.)

20 · In Kiev, Kazakh President Nazarbaev meets with Kravchuk, where they sign eight agreements, including one on mutual indebtedness, as well as a Treaty on Friendship and Cooperation. They assert that the NATO Partnerships for Peace program has great positive potential, and express concern over attempts to destabilize the NIS from the outside and the rising tide of ethnic conflict. Moreover, the two leaders express their negative attitudes to the idea of dual citizenship. The two reiterate intentions to develop stronger bilateral relations.

21 · Moldova's Foreign Ministry asks Russia, in a diplomatic note, to distance itself from a statement by Vladimir Zhirinovskiy in which he states the 14th Army ought to remain in the Moldova, and that the Dniester Republic would soon become part of Russia through political, diplomatic, economic, and military means. The remarks are broadcast on Dniester Republic TV. The note expresses concern that Zhirinovskiy, through such propaganda, could jeopardize the delicate negotiations under way concerning Russian troop withdrawal, as well as exacerbate the Dniester conflict, making it impossible to arrive at a political settlement.

23 · In Kyrgyzstan, Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev discusses the Russian-speaking minority issue with republican leaders. Kyrgyzstan has been under pressure for the past year to offer dual citizenship.

27 · In an interview with Rome RAI Due Television, Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Anatoliy Adamishin states the following about Russia's evolving foreign policy: “In what direction is it changing? It is becoming more pragmatic-let us say, more interested in the defense of our national interests.... Sometimes it is said that in these [former Soviet] republics we are going back to imperialist ways, that we want to rebuild the Soviet Union. It is not true. We have seen, we have established, that unless Russia plays an active role, it is very difficult to have stability, security, and tranquility on our border. The former republics want Russia’s active role; they want it.”

Security

3 · In Belarus, Belarusian parliament speaker Stanislav Shushkevich signs the CIS Collective Security Treaty. Even after the conservative Belarusian parliament voted to sign the treaty in April last year, Shushkevich declined to sign it, on the grounds that it compromised Belarusian sovereignty. The report implies that Belarus’s harsh economic reality is forcing Shushkevich to allow for more conciliatory relations with Moscow and the CIS, and that Shushkevich may even be planning to meet with Yeltsin soon.

5 · Shushkevich sends a letter to the CIS secretariat confirming his signing of the Collective Security Treaty. He notes, however, conditions that no Belarusian troops will be used on the territory of other CIS states, and that no other state’s troops shall be placed or used on Belarusian territory without the express permission of the Belarusian parliament.

8 · In Ukraine, Ukrainian parliamentary member and leader of the Rukh party Les Tanyuk accuses President Kravchuk of withholding documents apparently signed at the CIS Ashkhabad summit. The allegations heighten suspicion regarding what he actually did sign there.

9 · Western press agencies report that the trilateral agreement between Ukraine, the United States, and Russia on the disarmament of Ukraine was imminent. The complicated agreement, crucial parts of which were kept secret, involves the sale of highly enriched uranium from the weapons of the former Soviet states to the U.S. government and U.S. energy agencies. Some of the uranium will be reprocessed and returned to Ukraine for use in its nuclear energy program, and Russia will cancel some or all of Ukraine's energy debt to Russia.

· The deal also reportedly includes formal recognition by Russia and the United States of Ukraine's borders and sovereignty. However, the issue of security guarantees, required by the parliament before they ratify any disarmament agreement, has not yet been clarified, although reports hold that no security guarantees will be given until NPT is ratified.

- The agreement is designed in such a way as not to require parliamentary approval in Ukraine, a process that would most likely hold up the process indefinitely. It is not certain, however, that Kravchuk will be able to proceed with such a sensitive issue exclusively by executive order.

- In Ukraine, reports surface that the republic will be a non-nuclear state within three years. Other reports stipulate that no timetable was set because it might anger the parliament, in which case a seven-year period is envisioned, in keeping with the START I deadline.

10 · In Ashkhabad, the Council of the CIS Border Troop Commanders meet to discuss illegal migration and drug trafficking across external borders of the Commonwealth. Also on the agenda are principles of cooperation in logistic supplies to troops.

14 · Presidents Clinton, Kravchuk, and Yeltsin sign the Trilateral Agreement in Moscow. Clinton says at a press conference that Ukraine's SS-24s will be deactivated within ten months. Radio Mayak, on the other hand, reports that the agreement does not include a timetable, but does indicate that they will be dismantled within "the shortest time possible." According to RFE/RL, the timetable will not be made public, even when completed.

- Russia will deliver 100 tones of nuclear fuel to Ukraine in exchange for approximately 200 warheads.
- In Ukraine, Kravchuk is not quick to announce the above agreement. His parliamentary opponents have been voicing their opposition to a deal arrived at largely behind their backs; Rukh leader Chernovil charges him with “shameful capitulation.”

15 · In Baku, Russian Border Troops Commander-in-chief and Federal Border Service head Andrey Nikolaev meets with President Aliev. Nikolaev states that Russia is not concerned with the border between Azerbaijan and Armenia, but rather with Azerbaijan’s “external” borders.

- Ukrainian Foreign Minister Zlenko and Defense Minister Radetskiy state the Trilateral Agreement does not need ratification by parliament because it is an agreement, not a treaty; moreover, it does not introduce new issues, but rather addresses parliament’s reservations which were manifested in the START I conditional ratification.

17 · Nikolaev states that in 1994, Russian border troops would continue to guard the “external” borders of several CIS states including Armenia, Georgia, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan. Nikolaev argues, “I agree that cooperation in defending the border, when sovereign independent states cooperate in defending the border, is a completely new thing.... You understand, two years have gone by, and we finally realized that it is very important to have not only rights in the CIS, but probably obligations as well.”

18 · Foreign Minister Kozyrev, at a meeting of Russian ambassadors to the NIS, states that it is necessary for Russia to keep its military presence in the former Soviet republics in order to prevent forces hostile to Russia from filling the “security vacuum.”

· In Minsk, military delegations from Belarus and Ukraine sign an agreement on military cooperation. Belarusian Deputy Defense Minister Maj.-Gen. Vasiliy Dzyamidzik and Ukrainian Deputy Defense Minister of Armaments Col.- Gen. Ivan Olinyk fashion the agreement for military cooperation in 1994 similar to one the two countries signed in December 1992.

19 · In Ukraine, Deputy Foreign Minister Tarasyuk says a detailed agreement concerning the disassembly and transport of missiles has not been concluded, and he dismisses Russian assertions that all missiles could be transferred to Russia within one or two years. Tarasyuk says such a move would create unsafe conditions in Russian nuclear arms storage areas.

20 · Ostankino reported that a political battle is brewing in Ukraine over the Trilateral Agreement. Parliament, which opened today, is scheduled to debate the treaty at this session.

· In Kiev, the Ukrainian and Uzbek defense ministers sign military cooperation agreements, signaling the deepening of ties.

21 · Belarusian Foreign Minister Aleksandr Stychev states at a meeting with the West European Union that Belarus has now transferred 34 of its 81 strategic missiles to Russia, in addition to the short- and medium-range missiles transferred earlier. He continues to say that Belarus hopes to be a nuclear-free state by the end of 1996, and that the West ought to grant more aid to dismantle its conventional weapons.

22 · Izvestiya reports that Kazakh President Nazarbaev sent requests for US$1 billion to dismantle its nuclear arsenals. Apparently, after Kazakhstan's missiles have been dismantled and the warheads transferred to Russia, Russia will sell the uranium contents to a U.S. firm.

25 · The Ukrainian parliament puts off debating the Trilateral Agreement, as well as Kravchuk's proposal to ratify NPT. The influential speaker of the parliament, Ivan Plyushch, has come out backing Kravchuk on both deals, which may bode well for their passage.

28 · The defense ministers of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan spend two days meeting in Bishkek, where they discuss the coordination of air defense systems, technology exchanges, and scientific research work. As reported by ITAR-TASS, a protocol on military cooperation is signed by Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan.

- Belarusian parliament elects a new leader, Myachoslav Hryb, who has said that his foreign policy will not differ much from that of his predecessor, Stanislav Shushkevich. However, while Shushkevich was against Belarus's signing of the CIS Collective Security Treaty, Hryb has always supported it.

29 · Krasnaya Zvezda editorializes that recent moves by officers of the Strategic Rocket Forces to declare allegiance to Ukraine represent steps to complete Ukraine's takeover of nuclear weapons on its territory.

- The article also continues the barrage of accusations that the nuclear weapons on Ukraine's territory are not in safe hands: it claims that 60 percent of rocket force units in Ukraine are not combat ready because of personnel shortages and that there are approximately 500 warheads located in the Pervomaysk storage facility which is six to eight times the amount previously estimated. Because only up to 320 warheads have been removed in 1993, the figure of 500 suggests that either more missiles have been deactivated, or that there are some "spare" warheads, previously unaccounted for in Ukraine.

February 1994

Economic

1 · Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan remove customs on their common borders in the first step toward their previously agreed-upon economic union.

4 · Gazprom reduces gas shipments to Ukraine because of Kiev's failure to pay its gas debt to Russia, which is estimated at over 1 trillion rubles. Ukraine has made no payments on the debt for the past few months.

8 · The prime ministers of Moldova and Russia sign an economic cooperation and trade agreement.

Chernomyrdin says the balance of trade between the two republics is "shaping up fine," with Moldova paying for all imports from Russia except fuel.

9 · The Russian government demands 20 to 40 percent of revenues from Kazakh oil exports transited through Russian pipelines.

14 · Belarusian Prime Minister Kebich states that the imminent monetary union between Russia and Belarus is not a political-economic union, and that Belarus will forge its own path to a market economy. In Russia, the union has come under attack as being too costly for the Federation. Documents for the union are being prepared in anticipation of Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin's upcoming visit to Belarus.

16 · Russia may increase gas supplies to Ukraine and Belarus in the first quarter of 1994. Accumulations of surplus gas and oil in pipelines due to withholding forces Russia to ship it. Storage facilities are insufficient to allow a complete cut-off of energy supplies to Russia's debtors.

· A Russian parliamentary group, called the "Union of 12 December," opposes monetary union with Belarus, saying that it would be too costly for Russia and would result in a 5 percent increase in inflation. They do, however, support close political and military ties.

- Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin and his Armenian counterpart Bagratyan sign a trade and economic cooperation agreement, according to which Russia will annually supply Armenia with US$141.3 million worth of goods and a continuing supply of energy. The agreement does not provide for Russian credits to Armenia.

- Russian First Deputy Prime Minister Soskovets and Minister Bagratyan also agree that Russia will supply equipment and specialists to help reactivate the Armenian nuclear power plant at Medzamor. Armenia will reportedly finance the operation.

22 · Turkmen officials claim they will halt gas supplies to Ukraine if its debt is not paid. Ukraine has paid only $3.4 million of a $154.1 million debt to Turkmenistan for gas supplied in 1994. Bills for 1993 remain unpaid.

23 · Nikolay Gonchar, chairman of the Council of the Russian Federation Budget Committee, calls in Rossiyskaya Gazeta for an economic union of Ukraine and Russia. “In Crimea they have already understood,” he says, that there is “no alternative” to such a union, and that the “parade of sovereignties has had negative consequences.” Gonchar warns that “in Ukraine, things are so bad” economically that “at any moment there could be an explosion,” which would reverberate beyond Ukraine’s borders.

26 · Turkmenistan says it will resume gas shipments to Ukraine in exchange for shipments of food and other consumer goods. The Turkmen government says that Ukraine has already begun to pay off some of its debt in convertible currency.

Political

3 · President Boris Yeltsin and Eduard Shevardnadze sign a bilateral treaty on friendship and cooperation and twentyfour other agreements on trade and economic ties, scientific and cultural cooperation, the status of Russian border guards in Georgia, and military basing rights. They also discuss Georgia's possible reentry into the ruble zone. Shevardnadze characterizes the agreements and the visit as vital to establishing peace and stability throughout the Caucasus.

8 · The Russian Federation Council chairman, Vladimir

Shumeyko, is elected chairman of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly. He is the second Russian to hold this position; Ruslan Khasbulatov was the first.

9 · Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev and President Nazarbaev meet to discuss tensions between their two countries, over dual citizenship, military cooperation, and the fate of the Baykonur space complex. Although Kozyrev avers concurrence on all issues, Nazarbaev later reiterates his opposition to dual citizenship in an interview with Komsomolskaya Pravda.

12 · General Mikhail Dmitriev, chief of the Analytical Administration of Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service (SVR), tells journalists that he is responsible for preparing psychological profiles for the Russian leadership on foreign leaders, including those of the CIS states. Dmitriev points out that all of the work is done from Russia, and there is no need therefore to engage in spying.

15 · The Moldovan ambassador to Ukraine, Ion Borsevici, one of President Snegur's right-hand men, says: "Ukraine's wish to defend its independence plays an exceptionally important role for the defense of our own country's interests... . Ukrainian-Moldovan good neighborly relations transcend the framework of state-to-state relations .... Ukraine provides an umbrella against those forces which want to bring us into a neo-Soviet brotherhood."

· Uzbekistan interrupts the broadcast of Russian TV for one day due to unpaid debts to the Uzbek Ministry of Communications.

17 · The CIS statistics committee reports that CIS populations are declining, due to decreasing birth rates. It also reports that Belarus, Russia, and Ukraine are experiencing intensive aging of their populations.

20 · Ukraine's deputy foreign minister, Boris Tarasyuk, says the violation of Ukrainian rights in Crimea should be a matter for concern. He states that despite cries from Moscow that ethnic Russians' rights are being violated, the opposite is actually happening in Crimea, where Ukrainians make up only 25 percent of the population. The Ukrainians there complain that Russian authorities have opposed opening Ukrainian schools and newspapers, have censored Ukrainian radio and TV broadcasts from Kiev, and have issued "anti- Ukrainian propaganda."

22 · The Ukrainian minister for nationalities and migration, Oleksandr Yemets, accuses Russia of ignoring the rights of its largest minority, the Ukrainians. He says he has received complaints from Ukrainians in Russia about authorities who are openly hostile about establishing Ukrainian schools, even where Ukrainians live compactly. The 1989 census puts the number of Ukrainians in Russia at 4.4 million, but Yemets claims there are between 6 and 10 million Ukrainians in Russia.

· Kyrgyz President Akaev meets with Yeltsin in Moscow to discuss Russian-Kyrgyz relations. The press writes that Akaev has been under pressure to allow for dual Russian-Kyrgyz citizenship, but has said he will not allow it without parliamentary approval. He is eager to stop the flow of Russians leaving Kyrgyzstan (reports estimate that 100,000 Russian-speakers have left Kyrgyzstan since the collapse of the Union), and while in Moscow he allegedly unveils a series of proposals designed to make Kyrgyzstan more appealing for Russians. He is susceptible to Russian pressure because of the economy's dependence on Russia.

- Akaev recommends his own code for interethnic relations. The provisions are as follows: (i) adequate representation of national minorities in the state administration system; (ii) refusal to countenance discrimination against persons who do not speak the national languages of the NIS; (iii) a solution to the problem of dual citizenship.

- Uzbek President Karimov meets with the chairman of the Tajik Supreme Soviet Rakhmonov in Tashkent, where they sign a trade and economic agreement on economic aid which Uzbekistan will provide its neighbor, including: fuel, agricultural machinery, fertilizers, and seeds which will save spring planting. Karimov announces that Tajikistan will not be allowed to join the Uzbek-Kyrgyz-Kazakh economic union until its border with Afghanistan is calm.

Security

- 1 · The Ukrainian Foreign Ministry, in its weekly press briefing, condemns the “hardening” of Russia’s policy toward the newly independent states of the former USSR. The head of the ministry’s information department, Yuriy Serheev, says that Ukraine categorically opposes linking the protection of minority rights with the presence of foreign troops in CIS states.

- Serheev notes that at the December CSCE conference in Rome, Russia is told to evacuate all troops from Moldova and the Baltics. Russia has been exacerbating tensions in these states by provoking intolerance among ethnic Russians there, and “in essence the ideology of great-state chauvinism is being revived.”

2 · Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev, on a visit to Tbilisi, announces that Russia would like to open three military bases in Georgia and two more in other parts of the Caucasus, within the framework of the CIS Collective Security Treaty. The current agreement between Russia and Georgia allows Russian troops to stay until 1995. The proposed bases would give the Russians approximately 23,000 men in the Caucasus.

· A group of Russian parliamentary deputies, including State Duma Chairman Ivan Rybkin and Egor Gaydar, send a letter to Yeltsin cautioning that signing a treaty with Georgia prematurely could destabilize the entire Transcaucasus.

3 · The Ukrainian parliament votes overwhelmingly to ratify, with reservations, the START I Treaty and the Lisbon protocol following a speech by President Kravchuk which stresses that Ukraine must denuclearize in order to avoid international isolation. U.S. President Clinton pledged to double economic aid to Ukraine if it ratified the treaty.

· The Trilateral Agreement can allegedly be put into effect, under which 200 weapons will be transferred from Ukraine to Russia in ten months. However, crucial issues must be resolved, including compensation of Ukraine for the earlier removal of tactical nuclear weapons, and a timetable for the Trilateral Agreement.

8 · Ukrainian parliamentary deputy Sergey Holovaty charges that the official text of the Trilateral Agreement which was published publicly is not, in fact, what was passed in parliament. He claims that an amendment to the treaty stipulated that no warheads would be transferred until compensation and security guarantees were signed. This partially explains the confusion expressed by some deputies after passage of the resolution.

· During talks in Kiev on the Trilateral Agreement, Yuriy Dubinin, head of Russia's delegation, asks for clarification of whether parliament voted for complete or partial denuclearization.

10 · President Clinton announces that he expects U.S. aid to Ukraine for the dismantlement of nuclear weapons to be doubled, and that he will convey the message to President Kravchuk in March. He also says that upon accession to the NPT, the United States will offer Ukraine security guarantees, as provided for in the Trilateral Agreement (RFE/RL).

- Turan (Baku) reports that the signing of a military pact between Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan comes as a surprise to Moscow. The Russian ambassador to Kyrgyzstan meets with the Kyrgyz defense minister, who expresses his readiness to sign a bilateral treaty with Russia. Preparation of treaty documents will begin immediately, and will be ready when Chernomyrdin visits Bishkek later in the month.

14 · The Russian Foreign Ministry objects to Ukraine's "misinterpretation" of the CSCE foreign ministers' statement calling for the withdrawal of the 14th Army from Moldova. The Ukrainians were responding to Foreign Minister Kozyrev's claim of Russia's right to station troops in the "near abroad."

23 · Grachev claims that Russia now has approximately 16,000 peacekeeping troops in the "near" and "far" abroad, and that Russia is the only state in the FSU to have constructed a viable, if not yet fully effective, armed forces.

- Kozyrev states that Russia does not wish to act alone in peacekeeping operations in Bosnia or other former Soviet states, then expresses Russia's desire for "serious help." In an article in New Times, No. 4, Kozyrev writes that no international "legislation" of Russian peacekeeping operations is necessary because Russia's deployments are already fully legal. He stresses that "a UN mandate and the presence of UN observers confirms the impartial character of Russian peacemaking missions.”

24 · CIS defense ministers meet in Moscow and discuss the following issues: transforming the CIS joint armed forces command into a headquarters for the coordination of military activities; defining the extent of interaction among signatories of the Collective Security Treaty; the Tajik-Afghan border conflict; and peacekeeping on the territory of the post-Soviet states. Of the twelve former Soviet republics, only Moldova fails to send a delegation. ITAR-TASS reports suggest that centrifugal tendencies in CIS military cooperation have been arrested.

25 · Moskovskiy Komsomolets reports that the armed forces of CIS countries lost 3,000 officers to the Russian military in 1993. The report estimates that over 1,000 officers have left the Kazakh armed forces, 800 left Belarus, and 1,000 left Ukraine, for higher wages offered to officers in Russia. The report predicts increased military migrations in 1994.

28 · The chief of the Russian General Staff, Mikhail Kolesnikov, states that Russia expects to establish about thirty Russian military bases in states of the former Soviet Union under bilateral treaties. He says bases in Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Tajikistan will be set up with troops already stationed in these countries, and in all of the other former Soviet republics, except Ukraine and the Baltics, Russia will build bases with its own forces.

· Russia’s chief of staff for coordinating military action among CIS member states, Col.-Gen. Viktor Samsonov, says CIS forces now guarding the Tajik-Afghan border are inadequate to hold back stepped-up strikes in spring and summer. Every CIS state, except Ukraine, Belarus, and Moldova, has signed a treaty pledging to send peacekeeping troops to the region.

March 1994

Economic

1 · The CIS Coordinating and Consultative Committee (CCC) meets in Moscow to discuss the Economic Union, and specifically mechanisms for Ukraine's participation in the union.

· The Russian minister of economics, Shokhin, says the CCC has approved the draft agreement for Ukraine to join the Treaty on Economic Union, and that Ukraine might change its policy and become a full member of the economic union.

- Shokhin notes that: “Ukraine’s associate status is a temporary situation.”

- Ukrainian Deputy Prime Minister Valentin Landyk tells journalists in Moscow that Ukraine will remain an associate member of the CIS Economic Union. He says Ukraine wishes to remain free to cultivate relations with non-CIS states.

2 · Gazprom, in another attempt to extract payment from Belarus, Moldova, and Ukraine, threatens to cut off gas supplies. The company accuses Ukraine of siphoning off gas destined for Europe, a charge Kiev denies. A senior official in the Ukrainian gas company Ukrazprom warns, however, that Ukraine may be forced to tap gas transit lines in the future if its own supplies are cut.

- Uzbek President Islam Karimov and Boris Yeltsin conclude an agreement on economic integration. The agreement provides for coordination on economic reform and fiscal policies, and encourages interstate ties between enterprises. Karimov says the introduction of dual citizenship in Uzbekistan might be detrimental for Russia, implying that a huge outward migration could take place from Uzbekistan to Russia.

4 · Belarus guarantees the transit of gas exports from Russia to Western Europe across its territory, despite Russian cuts in gas deliveries to Belarus itself.

4-6 · Russian and Western news agencies report further cuts in natural gas supplies to Ukraine, bringing deliveries down to about one-fifth the normal level by March 6. Supplies are not terminated, as warned, despite Ukraine's continued failure to repay its 1.5 trillion ruble debt.

5 · Trud states that Ukraine's admission to the CIS Economic Union as associate member is troublesome. While Ukraine's embassy in Moscow implies that the issue has been resolved, Ivan Korotchenya, executive secretary of the Coordinating and Consultative Committee, says: "At the moment it is too complex to admit Ukraine. The republic has not signed that Economic Union Charter."

· Nevertheless, Committee Chairman Aleksandr Shokhin states that the basic idea of Ukraine's joining has been accepted and the timing is up to Ukraine.

7 · Russia says it will continue to provide Ukraine with 40 million cubic meters of natural gas daily, at least until talks on Ukraine's debt resume in Moscow on 10 March. Gazprom charges that Ukraine is daily siphoning off another 40 million cubic meters of gas on its way to Western Europe.

-Belarus is receiving 40 million cubic meters of gas from Russia daily since it initiated payment on some of its arrears.

-Moldova is receiving partial shipment, in the amount of 11 million cubic meters daily, because it has started to pay off its debt, mostly with agricultural goods.

8 · The Russian Ministry of Economics may ask Ukraine to compensate Russia for its $500,000-a-day loss, allegedly due to the gas Ukraine has been siphoning off. Russia says it will accept payment for Ukraine's arrears in the form of property rights to Ukrainian pipelines and oil installations.

- Gas deliveries to Belarus increase when Belarus makes a 30 billion ruble payment on its 400 billion ruble debt.

9 · Ukraine makes a $9 million payment on its $900 million debt to Russia on the eve of scheduled talks in Moscow. The deputy economics minister of Ukraine again hints that a debt-equity swap may be in the works.

- Belarusian National Bank Chairman Stanislav Bahdankevich says that Belarus will not enter into a monetary union with Russia under the terms thus far proposed. Belarus hopes for the exchange of its weaker currency on a one-to-one basis with the Russian ruble and domestic Russian prices for oil and gas. Russia is apparently demanding that the National Bank of Belarus be replaced by a branch of the Russian Central Bank in Minsk, and that a single government budget be formed for Russia and Belarus. Russia is also unwilling to lower energy prices for Belarus. Bahdankevich says that under these terms the economic situation in Belarus could only worsen.

10 · Gazprom decides that Ukraine's debt for 1993 will be paid half in cash, half in equipment, and payments for 1994 will be made in rubles or hard currency. The two parties agree in principle on joint management of Ukrainian pipelines (to be privatized soon), and of underground storage facilities, in exchange for partial debt forgiveness.

- An Uzbek delegation signs an agreement with Belarus in Minsk on economic cooperation and trade. Uzbek officials acknowledge their country's $13.98 million debt to Belarus, which they will start to repay in January 1995.

11 · Moldova agrees to pay promptly its 126 billion ruble debt to Russia. Ninety-six billion will allegedly be borrowed from international financial institutions, and another 30 billion worth of high-quality agricultural goods will be shipped to Russia to cover the remainder.

· Moldova's arrears are partly the result of prohibitive customs duties and excise taxes imposed on Moldova for failing to ratify CIS documents in August 1993. Moldovan President Snegur tells Gazprom that in order to prevent this from happening in the future, all trade restrictions between CIS countries should be removed.

14 · Kazakh President Nazarbaev and Uzbek President Islam Karimov create a "common economic zone." Trade between Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan has risen dramatically since January.

· Gazprom reduces gas deliveries to Belarus by 10 million cubic meters daily. A Gazprom official puts the Belarusian debt at 400 billion rubles, or $230 million, and says that Belarus is in no hurry to pay it back.

16 · According to Reuters, the Russian Fuel and Energy Ministry indicates that debtor nations that cannot pay back energy bills to Russia may be asked to transfer property rights instead.

21 · Belarusian Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich says that Moscow has reduced the price of gas for Belarus from $80 per 1,000 cubic meters to $50, dated retroactively to January 1994. As a result, Belarus's debt to its Russian suppliers decreases by 150 billion rubles. The opposition in Minsk is skeptical: "the only thing for free is cheese in the mousetrap," said People's Deputy Sergey Naumchuk.

22 · Gazprom warns Ukraine that it will stop delivery of natural gas if Ukraine does not live up to its end of the 10 March bilateral agreement. The agreement stipulates that Ukraine must pay $100 million of its $900 million debt by 1 April, and it must turn over an unspecified amount of shares in Ukrhazprom, the Ukrainian gas concern. Officials from Gazprom states that officials in Kiev have yet to draw up a list of enterprises in which Gazprom would receive shares, and to determine the interest rate Gazprom will receive.

23 · The press secretary to Belarusian Prime Minister Kebich, Ulyadimir Zamyatalin, states that arrangements for the monetary union between Belarus and Russia are nearly complete. Zamyatalin states

(contrary to earlier reports) that officials from the two countries have agreed on identical prices for fuel; a 1:1 exchange rate for the two countries' currencies; and making the National Bank of Belarus the main bank of a sovereign Belarus. Each country will maintain its own budget. The Russian Duma is scheduled to begin debating the monetary union on 24 March.

- Terms outlined by Zamyatalin are not favorably received in the Russian Duma, where some say that an official currency can have only one master. They feel Belarus must cede sovereignty over its monetary and credit policy to Russia. Russian Deputy Minister of Economics Sergey Ignyatyev says that Belarus will have to relinquish some of its political sovereignty.

25 · The chairman of the Russian State Duma's Committee for CIS Affairs, Konstantin Zatulin, blames the delay in Russian-Belarusian talks on monetary union for raising tension in other spheres of Russian/Belarusian relations. Serious differences between Belarus and Russia are becoming glaringly apparent. Zatulin suggests resolving the issue by public referendum. The leader of Russia's Choice, Egor Gaydar, says a customs union is much more important than a monetary union.

30 · A private corporation called Respublika, in Kiev, has bought the portion of Ukraine's gas debt which is owed to Turkmenistan. Apparently Respublika will take over the 1993 debt of $671,900,000 and the 1994 debt of up to $500,000,000. The deal stipulates that 35 percent of the debt will be paid in cash, and the rest in Ukrainian goods.

1 · After a stormy debate, the Georgian parliament votes by 121 in favor, 47 against, and 4 abstentions, to ratify Georgia's membership in the CIS. When Shevardnadze approved accession to the CIS in early October last year, the parliament was not in session.

· Yeltsin sends a letter to the leader of the "Dniester Republic," Igor Smirnov, in which he outlines, in a tone highly deferential to Smirnov, a framework for the political settlement of the region's conflict. He calls for "broad autonomy for the Dniester region as part of the Republic of Moldova; a unified army, security service, and financial system; and a role for Russia together with other countries" in guaranteeing the eventual settlement.

· President Snegur says that the newly elected Moldovan parliament must approve a new constitution and join the Economic Union of the CIS. He denies advising that any CIS agreements other than economic be joined. "We take part in integration on the issues that do not infringe upon our independence," he says.

3 · Yeltsin and Uzbek President Karimov conclude a Russian-Uzbek Agreement which notes a mutual interest in developing bilateral links. Conspicuously absent from the document, according to Izvestiya of 3 March, is reference to the issue of dual citizenship. Karimov assures Yeltsin that he will not tolerate any human rights infringements on ethnic grounds.

4 · The Russian Foreign Ministry holds a seminar on Russians and Russian speakers in the CIS and the Baltics. A top official at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Leonid Drachevskiy, says that integration within the CIS is the only way to defuse the controversy surrounding the issue of Russian speakers in the former Soviet republics. Gennadiy Mozhaev, who represents the Association for Ties with Foreign Compatriots, states that Russia's strategic task is to "keep all Eurasian territory of the former Soviet Union if not under control, then under strong influence.... From this point of view it's an advantage for us to have a big number of Russians in the near abroad."

· Interfax reports that Aleksandr Denisov, identified as Russia's senior advisor to the United Nations, says: "The Russians must stay wherever they are historically strong [and not migrate back to Russia] and need only economic support."

· Opposition in Georgia to President Shevardnadze and his decision to accede to the CIS is increasing.

Komsomolskaya Pravda and the Georgian Iberia news agency report that at least sixteen parties have united to oppose Shevardnadze and joining the Commonwealth in a powerful statement to that effect published on 4 March.

9 · An unattributed radio commentary broadcast on Radio Baku International Service editorializes that Russia is eager to establish a military base in Azerbaijan and to have a hand in the resolution of the Karabakh conflict. President Aliev, however, opposes the idea, and Baku has requested that Moscow comply with international agreements and laws that do not allow Moscow to act as internationally sanctioned peacekeeper in the former USSR.

10 · The CIS Heads of State meeting scheduled to be held at the end of March is postponed until 15 April at the request of Kazakh President Nazarbaev.

· Dumitriu Motpan, leader of the winning party in Moldova's legislative elections, says he will form a singleparty government. His platform includes the following: full independence from Romania and Russia; rejection of Russia's demands for military bases on Moldovan territory; insistence on the withdrawal of Russian troops; turning Moldova into a demilitarized zone; Moldovan participation in economic, but not political or military, agreements of the CIS.

16 · The Council of CIS Foreign Ministers meets in Moscow to discuss CIS coordination of major foreign policy issues. The foreign ministers of Azerbaijan, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and Russia, as well as ministry officials from Armenia, Belarus, Moldova, Turkmenistan, and Ukraine, attend the session.

- After the meeting, Kozyrev says the Council discussed ways to protect CIS external borders. They decided to form a consultative commission in which they would peaceably solve interstate disputes. Kozyrev says a consensus was reached among the participants to apply for the status of an international organization at the United Nations.

- During a joint meeting of CIS defense and foreign ministers, Kozyrev says that Russia has a historic duty to guard the Tajik-Afghan border because “it is a frontier of the CIS ... and ... it is clear that except for us, no one can solve these issues.” He also says that peacekeeping activities do not require international approval.

- The Ukrainian Ministry of Foreign Affairs releases a statement prior to the meeting which reads: “[Ukraine] does not join military and political unions, blocs, or groupings. The Ukrainian Ministry of Foreign Affairs told participants that the creation of a security system parallel to NATO is dangerous and inexpedient. Ukraine is in favor of global collective security on the territory of Europe.”

18 · A Georgian parliamentary deputy, Irina Sarishvili, delivers a statement to parliament asserting that Georgian membership in the CIS is illegal. As a result, international experts have been called to Georgia to determine the validity of Georgian membership.

Sarishvili equates joining the Commonwealth with joining Russia.

21 · Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Anatoliy Adamishin tells a group of Russian and French journalists that Russia has neither the will nor the power to conduct an imperialist foreign policy, and it supports the political independence of the other states of the former Soviet Union, especially Ukraine. He says that if Ukraine as a state breaks apart, it would have grave consequences for Russia, and Russia is trying to prevent such a development “by all means.” He asserts that Crimea should remain part of Ukraine, and Russia has no territorial claims against Ukraine.

23 · On the second day of his official visit to London, Kazakh President Nazarbaev rules out the possibility of Kazakhstan rejoining the ruble zone. He also advocates modifying the CIS to form a smaller grouping named the “Eurasian Union” which would be a “belt of stability and security” and from which countries engaged in military hostilities would be excluded.

· In Moscow less than one week later, Nazarbaev elaborated on this proposal, saying that the new “Eurasian Union” would coordinate the economic, military, and foreign policies of its members. Nazarbaev also suggests that Russia and Kazakhstan could form the union on their own if other states are not interested.

26 · Turkmen President Niyazov sends a message to Yeltsin supporting the agenda of the next CIS summit, but also stating that Turkmenistan will not join any of the new CIS structures. Turkmenistan is party to some CIS agreements, but has not acceded to the charter, and therefore is not a full member of the Commonwealth.

- The Georgian Security Ministry reports that in accordance with information recently obtained, some 95 percent of the Georgian population is in favor of joining the CIS.

29 · The Russian chairman of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly, Vladimir Shumeyko, says the time has come to raise the issue of closer integration within the CIS. Shumeyko says that “supranational bodies” may be needed to turn the CIS into “a kind of union.” He adds that the union should not be similar to the Soviet Union, and that the sovereignty of each of the additional states should be preserved.

- In a meeting with CSCE Commissioner for Ethnic Minorities Max van der Stoep, Russian Minister for Nationalities Sergey Shakhrai says that over the past few years 356,000 ethnic Russians have emigrated from Central Asia to Russia. Shakhrai cites statistics showing that 28 percent of those who returned did so “with the real threat of violence or persecution,” and 19 percent with “insult and humiliation to national dignity.”

- In Moscow, head of the Russian Fund for Constitutional Reforms Oleg Rummyantsev suggests that Crimean citizens be given dual Russian-Ukrainian citizenship, which would be used as a test case for the idea across the entire ex-Soviet Union.

- The same day, Konstantin Zatulin, chairman of the committee in charge of relations with the CIS states, says that in order to avoid a conflict with Crimea, Ukraine must give it considerable economic autonomy. “To put pressure on Ukraine could cause an explosion. For Ukraine there is only one outcome, that is to offer Crimea the widest possible scope in the economic domain.... Zatulin said, “Russia has never played and will never play the Crimean card, [but] it is impossible not to take into account Russia’s special interests in Crimea.”

30 · On his last day in Moscow, Nazarbaev tells journalists that his “Eurasian Union” proposal was inspired by the European Union, and was not meant as a formal proposal, but rather was meant to provoke discussion.

- Nazarbaev’s proposal is, nevertheless, very well received by some in Moscow. An article in Krasnaya Zvezda praises and expands the idea: “The union must have a common parliament. This is to make it possible to bring together the laws of the states in the union. The Economic Union needs an interstate executive secretariat.... Even the currency could be common and supranational. ... It is perfectly within our power to create a union on totally new principles, without the former imperial aroma....”

- Yeltsin receives the unexpected idea with cautious optimism, and says that he will take time out to consider it. He also says that the CIS already embodies many of the EU ideas, and he sees no point in replacing one good idea with another.

Security

3 · Moscow Russian Television Network runs a program that states that the CIS Defense Ministers’ Council has been reassigned as the main consultative body on military matters of the Collective Security Council. It is proposed that the Council be composed of 250 people, half of whom are Russian.

4 · Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev sends a letter to every CIS foreign minister emphasizing the importance of gaining observer status as an international organization at the United Nations. He urges that efforts be made for the CIS to gain recognition as a regional organization by the EU and CSCE.

- These efforts appear to be part of new Russian campaign to obtain international organization status for the CIS, which will impart greater legitimacy to CIS peacekeeping efforts.

- The head of Russia’s delegation to the CSCE, Vladimir Shustov, argues that Article 52 of the UN Charter allows regional organizations to take action to maintain peace and security, and that therefore there is no need for Russia to seek approval for its peacekeeping efforts in the CIS.

- Russian and Kyrgyz officials conclude an agreement which regulates the service of Russians in the Kyrgyz armed forces. Russian citizens apparently make up a large portion of Kyrgyzstan's officer corps. The agreement provides for Russians to have individual contracts with the Kyrgyz Ministry of Defense. After the contracts expire, the Kyrgyz ministry will have to buy the Russians housing anywhere in Russia, except Moscow or St. Petersburg, or, if they choose not to leave Kyrgyzstan, give to the Russians the housing they currently occupy at the time their service ends.

- The Chief of General Staff for military cooperation among CIS states, Col.-Gen. Viktor Samsonov, meets with Georgian Prime Minister Otar Patsatsia in Moscow. Samsonov says that the collective security of the Commonwealth states is being strengthened, especially in view of the Russian-Georgian Treaty on Friendship, Neighborliness, and Cooperation signed in February. ITAR-TASS reports that this treaty "reflects the intentions of each side to facilitate the temporary stay of Russian military formations on the territory of Georgia, and assistance with the creation of a Georgian Armed Forces...."

- Press agencies report that President Kravchuk has announced that a train carrying sixty warheads from ICBMs has departed for a dismantling site in Russia. Delays in shipping the warheads allegedly resulted from Russia's delinquency in making nuclear fuel deliveries. The New York Times publishes Kravchuk's warning that further warhead shipments are contingent on Russia's actions, particularly natural gas deliveries to Ukraine.

10 · Krasnaya Zvezda's Sergey Prokopenko reports that the newly independent states are clearly unable to afford independent armies. He writes that "national armies are becoming a national disaster for the independent states of the post-Union space," and that "one cannot expect economic progress and a corresponding easing of the crisis in these armed formations in the foreseeable future."

11 · ITAR-TASS reports that a five-year treaty on coordinating military activities has been signed by Belarus and Russia. The treaty includes the following provisions: they will cooperate in the military sphere, consult each other in the event of an attack, maintain links in military production spheres, and jointly train military cadres. The treaty is signed by the Belarusian First Deputy Foreign Minister Grigoriy Tarazevich and the Russian ambassador to Belarus.

13 · Before leaving for his meeting with Warren Christopher in Vladivostok, Foreign Minister Kozyrev tells reporters that he sees “no opportunity for the use of peacekeeping forces from Western countries for operations in Georgia” (RFE/RL). He is apparently responding to Clinton’s statement of 7 March: “The United States would be inclined to support a UN peacekeeping operation in Georgia, an operation that would not involve U.S. military units.”

14 · The foreign ministers of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, and Russia met in Dushanbe to confer on the situation in Tajikistan, where they have all committed troops to defend the Tajik-Afghan border.

- Tajik Foreign Minister Rashid Alimov reports that the Tajik government has requested the UN Security Council to recognize CIS troops on its soil as a UN peacekeeping force.

- Reuters and Interfax report that Russian Border Troops Commander Andrey Nikolaev has signed an agreement in Tbilisi which provides for Georgian troops to serve in Russian units guarding the Georgian-Turkish border. Nikolaev signs a similar agreement in Yerevan the next day which provides for Armenian troops to participate in Russian border units.

19 · After Ukraine ratifies START 1, Russian parliamentarians begin informally to debate START II. Already some have voiced the concern that the treaty leaves Russia at a disadvantage, a signal that a contentious debate is in the works. Apparently the Duma has not yet set a date for formal discussion of the treaty.

- U.S. Defense Secretary William Perry receives assurances from Kazakh President Nazarbaev that all of the SS-18s in Kazakhstan would be shipped to Russia for dismantling. RFE/RL reports, however, that the warheads were not sent with the missiles of strategic bombers already removed to Russia. Nazarbaev states that an agreement will soon be reached on compensation for the highly enriched uranium contained therein, which would facilitate transfer of the warheads.

20 · Defense Secretary Perry signs an agreement in Kiev which provides for an additional $100 million of Nunn-Lugar aid to be given to Ukraine, in addition to $135 million already pledged, to aid in its nuclear disarmament program.

21 · Ukrainian officials confirm that a second shipment of sixty nuclear warheads is en route to Russia even though, as Deputy Prime Minister Valeriy Shmarov notes, Ukraine has not yet received any reactor fuel in exchange. Shmarov also says that the United States has not paid Russia the $60 million it is owed under the terms of the Trilateral Agreement. The Washington Post reports that U.S. officials have downplayed this issue, stating that the Russians are having no problem implementing the agreement.

- The United States and Ukraine sign another agreement whereby American nuclear weapons will no longer be targeted at Ukraine. Ukraine reportedly cannot do likewise because control of its weapons remains in Russian hands.

- Krasnaya Zvezda reports that two missile regiments have started to withdraw from Belarus to Russia. They are part of a grouping of strategic military forces which comprises eight missile regiments in possession of road-mobile missile complexes containing a total of seventy-two missile launchers. Under this year's jointly agreed-to timetable, half of these forces will be withdrawn this year, and the rest by the end of next year.

22 · Col.-Gen. Georgiy Kondratiev, Russian military commander in charge of peacekeeping operations, announces that Russia will increase recruits for peacekeeping operations because Russians are the only ones capable of "separating warring factions" in the CIS. Reuters reports that Kondratiev says Russia will still seek an international mandate and financing for its peacekeeping operations in the former Soviet Union.

- Kondratiev notes that Russia has over 9,000 peacekeeping troops in the region, stationed as follows: 6,000 in Tajikistan, 2,000 in the Trans-Dniester region, and 1,500 in Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Kondratiev says that Russia has spent 26 billion rubles out of its own budget in 1993 to finance the operations.

24 · The CIS military command holds its first set of joint exercises in Tajikistan not far from the border with Afghanistan. RFE/RL reports that the exercises include mock attack aircraft, tanks, and helicopters, which is unusual because the primary threat in the area comes from Tajik rebels who do not have air and armored support. Ostankino reports that the exercises were in no way carried out to intimidate Afghanistan.

25 · Vladislav Petrov, a spokesman for the Russian Ministry of Atomic Energy, criticizes the United States for not giving Russia a $60 million advance payment for the nuclear fuel it will ship to Ukraine, as provided for in the Trilateral Agreement.

26 · At the 48th session of the UN General Assembly, the Ukrainian representative to the United Nations, Vladimir Khandogiy, resolutely rejects the notion of the CIS becoming a subject of international law and a regional organization which could conduct peacekeeping operations in the region. His words take Russian representative Yuriy Vorontsov, who is actively campaigning to obtain such status for the CIS, by surprise. Vorontsov attributes Ukraine's stance to "its being insufficiently informed on the character of the Commonwealth and the agreements between its neighbors.” He says that the treaty, which is the legal basis of the CIS’s peacekeeping activity, was signed by CIS members, including Ukraine, on 20 March 1992, in Kiev.

- Izvestiya notes that the CIS obtained observer status in the UN by a resolution of the General Assembly, without a vote.

April 1994

Economic

1 · Ukrainian Deputy Prime Minister Valentin Landyk tells Interfax that Ukraine has paid Gazprom $100 million, and that a joint-stock company will be set up through which Gazprom will receive its promised shares in the Ukrainian gas industry.

- Talks are scheduled to resume on 10 April.

8 · Western and Russian intelligence sources say that Turkmenistan has cut off its natural gas supply to Azerbaijan, which makes up about half of Azerbaijan’s supply, due to delinquent payments. Baku TV reports that Azerbaijan is unable to keep its end of a deal under which it is to pay for the gas with oil industry equipment and other products.

12 · Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin and Belarusian Prime Minister Kebich finally signed their agreement on monetary union. The agreement outlines two stages in forging the union: the first will begin on 1 May with the lifting of trade and customs barriers, at which time Russia will also be permitted to use strategic arms installations in Belarus; the second stage, which has yet to be approved by the Russian and Belarusian parliaments, envisions setting the exchange rate of the Belarusian ruble to the Russian ruble at a 1:1 rate, after which the Russian central bank will be the sole issuer of rubles, and will conduct the monetary policy, in both countries. The chairman of the National Bank of Belarus, Stanislav Bahdankevich, who has been opposed to this last condition for some time, declined to sign the agreement.

- Ukraine and Russia reportedly reach an agreement which will guarantee a Russian supply of gas through the summer. Ukraine has paid Russia $87 million, not quite the $100 million they agreed to pay by 10 April. They have now agreed to pay another $600 million in cash and shares in Ukhrazprom by June. Ukraine's total debt has been estimated at $900 million. The next round of meetings is scheduled for 10 May in Kiev.

- Moldovan Prime Minister Sangheli categorically rejects Moldovan entry into the ruble zone, calling it "a bluff." He says, "today it is unrealistic to talk about the unification of monetary systems. On the contrary, it is necessary to accelerate the process of stabilization of national currencies in all former Soviet republics."

13 · Tajikistan's Prime Minister Abduzhalil Samadov announced that Tajikistan intends to join the CIS Economic Union and the ruble zone, so far composed only of Belarus and Russia. After meeting with Chernomyrdin, they announce that they have reached a preliminary agreement on the unification of Tajik and Russian monetary systems, Interfax reports. They also sign an agreement providing for a Russian loan of 80 billion rubles to Tajikistan.

· Belarusian National Bank chairman Bahdankevich has called the monetary union between Belarus and Russia unconstitutional. He says that because the union gives Russia the sole right to issue rubles in Belarus, it gives a foreign power the right to impose its rule on Belarus. Some Russians still fear the inflationary effect on Russia that could result from the 1:1 exchange rate of the weaker Belarusian ruble to the Russian ruble. The Belarusian ruble currently stands at 18,600 to one Russian ruble. Interfax reports, however, that since individuals could exchange only up to 200,000 Belarusian rubles, the inflationary effect will be limited. To date, neither parliament has ratified the agreement, and all of the details have not been worked out.

19 · At an EBRD meeting in St. Petersburg, Russian and Belarusian representatives disagree over the terms of the monetary union signed a week earlier. Specifically, Belarus seems to be rethinking the issue of subordinating its monetary policy and national bank to those of Russia.

20 · Turkmen officials agree with representatives of Georgia on a settlement of the latter's gas debt, which is estimated at $200 million. Georgia will pay Turkmenistan in the form of consumer goods. Turkmenistan had threatened to cut off supplies on 1 May if the arrears are not paid.

21 · CIS countries owe Russia "hundreds of billions of rubles for telephone and postal services," an ITAR-TASS correspondent reported. The problem stems from the fact that while Russia pays other CIS countries for such services, payments by the latter, when they have the money, are held up at the border while their national currencies are changed into rubles.

· Moldovan Prime Minister Andrey Sangheli says that the republic will pay off its gas debt to Gazprom by the end of May. ITAR-TASS reports that last week Gazprom cut off gas supplies to Moldova by a third and threatened to cut them off completely if payment was not made. The report says that Moldova has already begun to make payments but the 108million-ruble outstanding debt is largely owed by consumers in the Trans-Dniester region, which is suffering severe economic difficulties.

26 · Ukrainian President Kravchuk says that although there are no real differences between “full” and “associate” membership in the CIS Economic Union, Ukraine must join as associate member because the parliament made some “comments and stipulations” when it signed the Treaty on the Formation of the CIS which he cannot ignore. He says that Ukraine will nonetheless play a full and active role in the union.

28 · Interfax reports that Armenian Prime Minister Grant Bagratyan has reiterated an earlier proposal to create a CIS currency to be used beside CIS members’ national currencies in order to facilitate interstate financial transactions. Bagratyan argues that such a currency would help to stabilize local currencies and slow the growth of debts owed to Russia by other CIS states. He says the idea is based on the European Union’s ECU.

29 · The presidents of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan hold a closed-door summit in Cholpon-Ata near Lake Issyk-Kul, during which Kyrgyzstan became a formal member of the Economic Union which was set up by Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan in January. The communiqué issued after the meeting stresses the need for increased cooperation in the spheres of politics, culture, and especially economics. They offer the new Central Asian Economic Union as a basis for a CIS Economic Union, and invite all CIS states to join.

Political

8 · ITAR-TASS reports that the Moldovan parliament has ratified Moldova’s membership in the CIS, with reservations, as well as accession to the Economic Union. The reservations are that Moldova will not participate in any military pacts or the ruble zone. The state secretary of “Trans-Dniester” says that this would enable talks on the resolution of the conflict between Tiraspol and Chisinau to resume at a new level.

- Moldovan Prime Minister Andrey Sangheli reiterates that his country has not joined any CIS security or militarypolitical cooperation agreements, and will only participate in economic agreements.

9 · Moldovan President Snegur and Trans-Dniester leader Igor Smirnov hold renewed talks on determining the legal status of Trans-Dniester. The talks are moderated by the CSCE mission and Russia, and the basis of a proposed agreement is one prepared by the CSCE that clearly delineates the division of powers between Chisinau and Tiraspol, and gives considerable autonomy to the latter.

12 · The pilot issue of the first official CIS weekly publication SNG. Obshchiy Rynok (CIS: Common Market) appears. It is financed by contributions from all the CIS member states, and contains articles from all of them, including policy statements.

13 · A Russian journalist who has been reporting on the situation in the Taldy-Kurgan oblast in northern Kazakhstan is arrested by Kazakhstani authorities. They had charged him with inciting interethnic discord in July 1993, but he ignored the charge and continued to act as spokesperson for Russians in Kazakhstan. Siberian Cossack leader Viktor Ochkasov predicts that the arrest will further heighten tensions in the region.

14 · Reuters reports that the Foreign Ministry of Romania has criticized Moldova for joining the CIS: “... the natural place of the republic of Moldova as an independent and sovereign state is in the big family of European nations, and by no means in Euro-Asian structures .... The foreign policy acts by the parliament of Moldova seem to show a tendency toward the latter.”

- President Saparmurad Niyazov of Turkmenistan says that his country is against tough structures within the Commonwealth. He says the countries of the CIS “have efficient bilateral structures, but the strengthening of independence should not be interfered with by tough new structures.”

- The Council of CIS Foreign Ministers meets in Moscow to discuss signing a treaty on members’ sovereignty, territorial integrity, and the inviolability of their borders. Russian news agencies says that Armenia has written and proposed an alternative draft.

- Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev says that the declaration is “a useful document giving lie to speculations that the CIS is some kind of neo-imperialist club.”

- The foreign ministers fail to reach agreement on the rights of national minorities. Significant controversy arises while discussing a document to that effect, some CIS members voicing fear that the document would give Russia carte blanche to use force for the “protection” of Russian minorities in their states.

- The foreign ministers agreed on what Kozyrev describe as a UN-type flag, which will be proposed to the heads of state when they meet on 15 April. The flag is a yellow circle on a blue background.

15 · The heads of the twelve CIS states meet in Moscow to discuss a wide array of issues. Significantly absent from the summit is Kazakh President Nazarbaev, who claims he has the flu. He is also apparently upset that his idea of creating a Eurasian Union to succeed the CIS was rejected by Moscow. The Russian media suggests that Nazarbaev had a “diplomatic disease.” Also absent is Sergey Shakhrai, Russian deputy prime minister, who has taken to Nazarbaev’s idea and even drafted a confederacy agreement.

- The Moldovan delegation for the first time includes a representative from the “Trans-Dniester Republic,” Deputy Prime Minister Viktor Sinev, which resulted from the recent talks between Trans-Dniester leader Smirnov and Moldovan President Snegur.

- The leaders sign a document on territorial integrity, sovereignty, and inviolability of borders proposed by the foreign ministers, which Ukrainian Deputy Foreign Minister Tarasyuk says will prevent any of the economic agreements from being threatening to Ukrainian independence.

- The meetings are somewhat overshadowed by renewed tensions between Russia and Ukraine over the Black Sea Fleet.

19 · An interview with Georgian President Shevardnadze on the results of the CIS summit is published in Izvestiya. He says: “Our meeting in Moscow has undoubtedly revealed an increasingly deepening trend toward the formation of new ties between the independent states within the framework of the Commonwealth, accompanied by strict consideration of and respect for their national and state interests.”

26 · ITAR-TASS reports that the Moldovan parliament has ratified the CIS Charter, which President Snegur had signed at the Heads of State meeting in Moscow on 15 April.

- Kazakhstan’s ambassador to Russia, Tair Mansurov, explains his president’s idea of a Eurasian Union to replace the CIS, proposed weeks ago, but jettisoned by Russia.

- It is hard to call the CIS a Commonwealth. In the three years of its existence, over 400 joint documents have been adopted, but more than half of them have not been ratified by the national parliaments, and those that have been ratified are not operating. In addition, some members of the CIS are in a state of open war and many are waging economic battles against one another. In these conditions it is hard to talk about the mutual aid and support characteristic of a truly integrated association.

27 · Moscow headquarters of ITAR-TASS hold a meeting of CIS states' news agencies, which is attended by representatives from Armenia, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Ukraine, and Uzbekistan. The participants are invited to participate more actively in cooperation and to make full use of the technical potential of ITAR-TASS. ITAR-TASS director-general Vitaliy Ignatienko says, "The task of preserving and developing the unified information expanse is equally important for all republics of the former USSR in the conditions of the establishment of their political and economic independence."

28 · Moldovan President Mircea Snegur, Trans-Dniester leader Igor Smirnov, Russian mediator Vladlen Vasev, and CSCE chief of mission in Chisinau meet near Tiraspol and sign a political document providing for future negotiations on defining the future status of "Trans-Dniester Republic's statehood under law" under Russian mediation and taking into account Russian and CSCE views, neither of which have advocated statehood for the republic. RFE/RL reports that Moldovan officials have stated that the concession was made in an effort to facilitate an accord.

29 · President Yeltsin, in a speech to leaders of Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service, emphasizes his intention to pursue a more assertive foreign policy vis—vis both the “near abroad” and the West. He dismisses concerns voiced in the West about Russian neo-imperialism, stressing that Russia views the states of the former Soviet Union as areas of vital interest, and Russia will step up its efforts to integrate them with Russia. Yeltsin also says that forces in the West and the “near abroad” who charge Russia with a neo-imperialist policy are attempting to exacerbate relations between Russia and these states.

1 · Russian Minister of Atomic Energy Viktor Mikhailov states that 60 nuclear fuel rods had been sent to Ukraine in exchange for the 120 warheads received from Ukraine. He also complains that the United States still has not lived up to its side of the Trilateral Agreement which, at this point, requires the United States to transfer $60 million to Russia. Mikhailov says that future shipments are contingent upon U.S. transfers of money and Ukrainian shipments of more warheads.

5 · The Russian ministries of defense and foreign affairs issue a joint statement expressing Moscow’s frustration with what it considers unfair criticism of its “near-abroad” peacekeeping operations. This comes after the United Nations fails to extend support to Russian peacekeeping operations in the former Soviet space. The statement is carried in Rossiyskie Vesti.

6 · ITAR-TASS reports that President Yeltsin has signed a directive endorsing a Defense Ministry proposal to establish thirty military bases on the territory of CIS states and Latvia which would serve the purpose of bolstering Russian security and serve as grounds for weapons testing.

- Officials from the foreign affairs and defense ministries attribute the misguided directive to “technical errors,” suggesting that it might have simply been an outdated document that Yeltsin signed. Others contend that Yeltsin may have intended to confirm a plan outlined on 28 February by Russia’s General Staff Chief stipulating that Russia would establish thirty military bases in the “near abroad” on the basis of bilateral agreements with those states. Foreign Minister Kozyrev says that he does not know where the document came from, nor with whom it was agreed. The abundance of explanations and confusion point to the disarray within Moscow’s government circles, especially where foreign policy is concerned. Radio Rossii reports that Kozyrev has said it was an attempt to set the president, government, Foreign Ministry, and Defense Ministry at loggerheads.
- Boris Miroshnikov, chief of counterintelligence operations at the Federal Counterintelligence Service, reportedly told ITAR-TASS that the states of the FSU have developed their own intelligence centers and have started active intelligence and subversive operations against the Russian Federation. Miroshnikov says that they are exacerbating instability in the hot spots of the “near abroad” and using Islam and other forms of aggressive nationalism to do this.

10 · Interfax reports that spokesmen from Armenia and Georgia say their countries’ leaders have no objection to the continued presence of Russian military bases on their territory under the guidelines of existing agreements. An aide to Azeri President Aliev says that the issue no longer concerns Azerbaijan because there are no more Russian troops stationed on its territory. However, the aide also says that negotiations are continuing about the leasing to Russia of Gaballa radar station in northern Azerbaijan, which, he says, is a military installation and not an army base.

· Moldovan Deputy Defense Minister Brig.-Gen. Tudor Dabija tells Interfax that Russia will never be allowed to have army bases in Moldova, and that the only thing the two countries could negotiate is the full withdrawal of the 14th Army from the Dniester region.

· Kazakh Deputy Foreign Minister Bulat Nurgaliev also speaks with Interfax on this issue, saying that the Kazakhstani-Russian treaty on friendship and cooperation, signed on 23 May 1992, provides for the “joint use, in mutual interests and in mutual agreement, of army bases, shooting ranges, and other defensive facilities on their territories.”

14 · Representatives from the defense ministries of eleven CIS states (Moldova is not present) meet in Moscow, where they adopt documents establishing the “Common Security Council.” Delegations whose states are signatories to the Collective Security Treaty (CST) also adopt a declaration that provides for increased defense cooperation and affirms their participation in NATO’s Partnership for Peace program (PFP). The declaration allegedly describes PFP as a real alternative to the enlargement of NATO, and describes the CST as a permanent part of what will eventually be an integrated European security system, and a similar security system in Asia.

15 · The CIS heads of state adopt a resolution whereby Russia will send its peacekeepers to the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict area, where there are already CSCE and UN observers, according to ITAR-TASS.

19 · ITAR-TASS reports that Moldovan and Russian representatives sign an agreement coordinating their efforts to combat terrorism and organized crime and drug trafficking through their foreign and national intelligence services. Russia has already signed such agreements with Armenia, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Ukraine, and Uzbekistan.

20 · At a signing ceremony on military and technological cooperation with Turkey, Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev says that Russia will set up military bases in CIS countries with their consent. He specifies that Russia will have three bases in Georgia and two in Armenia as well as a missile warning facility in Azerbaijan at Gaballa.

28 · A UNIAN correspondent reports that Russian

Defense Minister Pavel Grachev has issued instructions for all officers of Ukrainian descent to be removed from the Russian army. The order allegedly follows the failed talks on the Black Sea Fleet on 22 April, when Grachev is reported to have stormed out of the negotiations and flown back to Moscow without informing the Ukrainians or even his own entourage.

29 · Segodnya reports that Yeltsin and Nazarbaev have signed an agreement on the disposition of the nuclear arms in Kazakhstan under which Russia would assume jurisdiction over the strategic forces, and all warheads would be removed within fourteen months.

Kazakhstan's silos and missiles are to be destroyed within three years. No more information is made available on the dismantling process or the issue of compensation for highly enriched uranium contained within the warheads.

· Rossiyskaya Gazeta publishes the text of a directive signed by Yeltsin on 10 April calling for the creation of Russian military bases in countries of the former Soviet Union on the basis of bilateral agreements. Unnamed Russian Foreign Ministry personnel suggest that this is part of a plan to create a "zone of stability" on Russia's borders and a way of protecting Russia's interests in its "near abroad." No Baltic states are mentioned in this directive, and Russian officials claim that an earlier directive's mentioning of Latvia as a possible host for a Russian military installation was a mistake, and maybe even a deliberate provocation.

30 · Ukrainian Strategic Forces commander Col.-Gen. Igor Sergeev says that Ukraine is fulfilling its responsibility under the Tripartite Agreement and transferring warheads to Russia, in exchange for which Ukraine is receiving deliveries of fuel for its nuclear power stations. Sergeev reported that Ukraine has delivered 180 warheads to Russia so far (Kiev Radio Ukraine).

5 · In an interview with Komsomolskaya Pravda, Grigoriy Yavlinskiy, leader of the moderate-reform bloc Yabloko, says that he regards the collapse of interrepublican economic ties as the main culprit in the overall economic decline of the former Soviet Union. He indicates that the wholesale replacement of the political elite is necessary to begin the process of reintegration.

16 · Belarusian Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich announces that the Russian ruble may replace the Belarusian currency in two months. Kebich reiterates the need for economic union with Russia to save Belarus's flagging economy. He is confident that the economic situation will improve significantly shortly after the implementation of an Russian-Belarusian economic union (ITAR-TASS).

17 · During a state visit to Japan, Uzbek president Islam Karimov calls for genuine integration among the republics of the former Soviet Union. He called the CIS "a screen" behind which certain politicians "carry on their affairs." Karimov says that the agreement signed by Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan on the creation of a single economic space is open to Russia and the other republics of the ex-Soviet Union.

· Karimov issues a warning to Moscow that "Russia is losing Uzbekistan's market... [and] does not realize that [it] could be squeezed out of Uzbekistan as a result of intensifying international competition for the emergent market in our republic." Karimov stresses that his country wants "to retain former links with Russia, but on a new basis." He points to the fact that not one Russian-Uzbek joint-venture exists, as proof of a lack of cooperation.

· Interfax reports that Russia and Ukraine have reached agreement on a payment schedule for Kiev's 1.4 trillion ruble energy debt. The negotiations, characterized as “businesslike and friendly,” end with Ukraine agreeing to pay Russia $125 million by the end of May.

23 · In a meeting with Britain’s energy minister, Timothy Eggar, Azeri President Aliev says that his country “intends to look into the problem of expanding cooperation with foreign companies in the development of oil” reserves. Aliev, who recently completed a visit to Great Britain, praises the level of cooperation between Baku and London, and expresses optimism that the cooperation will be deepened. Eggar, visiting Baku in connection with an international exhibition devoted to oil and gas extraction in the Caspian Sea, said that his country fully realizes the potential benefits of cooperation with Azerbaijan.

24 · Interfax reports that as of 1 June the Belarusian ruble will be the only legal tender in Belarus until the monetary union, signed 12 April, goes into effect. Realization of the monetary union (which the Belarusian National Bank chairman described as “stillborn”) hangs in the balance as both sides continue to flesh out the exact terms of the agreement. Nevertheless, Belarusian radio reported that Russia will extend to Belarus a R150 billion credit for the first half of 1994.

31 · The Financial Times reports that the Russian government has informed the British embassy in Moscow that Russia is demanding the right to veto Caspian Sea oil projects, jeopardizing foreign activities in Kazakhstan and Azerbaijan.

4 · Kyrgyz President Askar Akaev meets with Russian Federation Council Chairman Vladimir Shumeyko to speak about strengthening the Russian population in Kyrgyzstan in order to stem the tide of Russian emigration. They discuss Russian aid to Kyrgyzstan, especially to its regions, which have “suffered from many disasters,” according to Shumeyko. Akaev said that Russia is Kyrgyzstan’s major partner and ally, and needs Russia’s aid.

5 · Rossiyskaya Gazeta reports that parliamentarians of Russia and Kyrgyzstan have met in Bishkek and signed an agreement which calls for the promotion of all forms of relations between the two countries, essentially supporting what Akaev and Yeltsin called for the day before.

· Nezavisimaya Gazeta publishes an interview with the chairman of the Duma’s Committee for CIS Affairs, Konstantin Zatulin. Zatulin, who professes to be “an admirer of empire,” said that “policy toward CIS is Russia’s internal policy” and called for “special treaties that would codify the special relationship” between the “near-abroad” states and Russia. He added that “the special status of regions inhabited by ethnic minorities [in the “near abroad”] must be backed by Moscow’s guarantees.” Specifically, he mentioned the “Dniester Republic” in Moldova, eastern Ukraine, Crimea, and northern Kazakhstan. Zatulin advocated the signing of bilateral treaties along the lines of the recently signed Russian-Georgian pact.

18 · Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman Grigoriy Karasin announces that the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs has produced a draft set of guidelines on supporting Russians in the other Soviet successor states. The stated aim of the new guidelines is to facilitate the integration of Russians into the life of the host state while preserving the Russians' cultural identity. The guidelines call for greater cooperation among government ministries, parliamentary committees, and public organizations concerned with ethnic Russians in the former USSR.

- In a speech to the Russian Duma, Aleksandr Lukashenka, one of the front runners in the presidential race in Belarus, calls for the reunification of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus into a single state, ITAR-TASS reported. Lukashenka also calls the creation of the CIS "a mistake." Chairman of the Duma's Committee for CIS Affairs Zatulin attempts to distance the Duma from Lukashenka's views, and asks that the record indicate that Lukashenka's speech "in no way reflects the State Duma's position."

19 · Interfax reports the creation of a new coordinating body within Russia's Ministry for Cooperation with the CIS (created in January 1994). The new organ will be tasked with implementing Russia's economic strategy vis—vis the other CIS states. The body will also serve in an advisory capacity to the Russian government. Its members will include, among others, representatives of the Central Bank of Russia and the directors of large Russian state-owned and private companies.

23 · During a three-day visit to Russia, Britain's foreign secretary, Douglas Hurd, says that Russia has the right to carry out peacekeeping operations in the former USSR, granted that these operations are requested by the governments involved in the conflicts and that the missions are conducted in the spirit of United Nations and CSCE documents.

24 · In remarks to his NATO counterparts, Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev attempts to reassure his audience that Russia's mediation and peacekeeping efforts in the "near abroad" are not fueled by imperialist aspirations. He stressed the need to find political, not military, solutions to the problems at hand in the former Soviet republics. Reuters reports that NATO continues to object to Moscow's request that the CFE Treaty be amended to allow Russia a larger force in the Caucasus than originally permitted.

27 · The Council for Foreign and Defense Policy (SVOP), an ex officio foreign policy advisory board comprised of leading academics, publishes its second set of theses on Russian foreign policy in Nezavisimaya Gazeta. The report calls for the creation of a system of political, military, and economic cooperation, in the form of a new union on the territory of the FSU, that would support the interests of Russia in the “near abroad.”

31 · In a meeting with CIS Executive Secretary Ivan Korotchenya, Kazakhstan’s President Nursultan Nazarbaev reportedly agrees to send troops to Abkhazia as part of a CIS peacekeeping force. Korotchenya, who completed a tour of the Central Asian states (except Turkmenistan), indicated that Nazarbaev’s concept of a Eurasian Union would be the main item on the agenda at the CIS summit scheduled for September. Korotchenya also meets with UN Deputy Secretary-General Goulding in Dushanbe. The talks focus on coordinating United Nations and CIS efforts to end the civil war in Tajikistan.

4 · Kazakh Defense Minister Sagadat Nurmagambetov says that military cooperation with Russia is the cornerstone of Kazakhstani strategic policy, and he sees increasingly close cooperation between the two countries’ military establishments. Interfax reports that these statements are made in conjunction with the anniversary of the creation of Kazakhstan’s own armed forces. The minister also says that the strategic forces in Kazakhstan are to be removed by the year 2000.

· Vladimir Shumeyko, chairman of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly, urges the CIS to create a contingent of peacekeeping forces from CIS countries, a Postfaktum correspondent reports. This contingent, he said, “should solve the internal problems of the CIS.”

5 · RFE/RL reports that the secretary of the CIS Council of Defense Ministers, Lt.-Gen. Leonid Ivashov, says that the CIS military command plans to propose that cooperation between the CIS and NATO as two defense alliances be part of the Partnership for Peace plan (PFP). Ivashov and other CIS military leaders just returned from meetings with NATO leaders in Brussels, where they discussed Bosnia and PFP. ITAR-TASS reports that Ivashov expressed concern that the CIS countries are not adequately protected by NATO’s PFP, and it does not solve the security problems in the CIS, especially the issue of peacekeeping. These remarks of Ivashov can be regarded as another in a series of attempts by Russian officials to obtain for the CIS recognition on an international level as a legitimate regional organization.

14 · According to President Leonid Kravchuk, 180 nuclear warheads have been removed from Ukraine to Russia, fulfilling Ukraine’s obligations under the Trilateral Agreement signed in January. He says that all 49 SS-24 strategic missiles in Ukraine have been deactivated and that none of the 176 missiles remaining in Ukraine is targeted at the United States.

16 · According to Defense Minister Radetskiy, all nuclear warheads will be withdrawn from Ukraine in three to four years. Since the Trilateral Agreement in January, Ukraine has transferred approximately 60 warheads per month to Russia. Radetskiy indicated that this pace would be maintained. Ukraine is believed to possess about 1,800 nuclear warheads.

1 · Belarusians will go to the polls on 23 June to elect that country's first president. Seven candidates have been registered, including Vasil Novikau, the leader of the Party of Communists of Belarus (PCB). Novikau's platform, according to Belarusian radio, includes social protection and consumer subsidies. He reportedly favors a restoration of the former USSR. The PCB says it will cooperate with two other leftist candidates, parliamentary speaker Kebich and Aleksandr Lukashenka (who last week, in an address before the Russian Duma, called for the creation of a union of Slavic states, if either becomes president).

6 · Russia's deputy prime minister, Aleksandr Shokhin, indicates that the outcome of Belarus's presidential election will significantly affect the pace of monetary union between the two countries. According to Shokhin, the new president, armed with a fresh mandate, will have to initiate the constitutional changes necessary for the agreement to be implemented.

Presumably, a victory by one of the leftist candidates (Kebich, Lukashenka, Novikau) would accelerate the pace of implementation, whereas an electoral victory by one of the more nationalistic candidates, Shushkevich or Paznyak, may necessitate further negotiations on the provisions of the agreement.

7 · At a press briefing in Moscow, Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesman Grigoriy Karasin states that Russia has nothing against cooperation between Caspian littoral states (Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, Russia, and Iran) and interested third parties to undertake exploratory work and resource development on Caspian territory. Karasin later qualifies his statement, saying that there are serious limitations on unilateral action because of the vulnerability of the Caspian's ecosystem and due to the fact that the territorial demarcation of the Caspian seabed has not been resolved. Thus, Russia claims a de facto veto over any deal made between a Caspian state and a third party. Not surprisingly, the Russian foreign minister sent a letter of protest to the British embassy in Moscow over the signing of a British-Azeri memorandum on cooperation in prospecting for oil and gas in the Caspian Sea, according to RFE/RL and the Financial Times.

· Interfax reports that the World Bank will extend a $1.5 billion loan to Kyrgyzstan for the implementation of a threeyear program for economic restructuring. In 1994-95 Kyrgyzstan will also receive $550 million to cover a balanceof-payments deficit and social programs.

8 · The Tajik economics and planning minister, Rustam Mirzoem, stated that a “full merger of the Russian and Tajik monetary systems can be achieved no sooner than by the end of this year,” ITAR-TASS reports. Mirzoem stresses, however, that the causes for the delay stem from technical and organizational, and not political, problems. He says that Tajikistan faces severe cash shortages and that the remaining tranche of a 120-billion-ruble credit from Russia will not even cover pensions and social outlays in the war-torn country.

9 · According to Izvestiya, Ukraine has agreed to construct 145,000 square meters of housing in the gas-producing region of northern Russia as partial payment for Kiev’s reported $800 million gas debt. Increasingly, Ukraine is relying on non-monetary payments, including ownership transfer of domestic energy infrastructure, to reduce its expanding energy debt to Russia.

22 · Interfax, quoting Ukraine’s deputy finance minister, Boris Sobolev, reports that Ukraine’s debt to the countries of the former Soviet Union exceeds $4.3 billion. These debts, Sobolev says, are not being regularly repaid due to continuing disputes over the division of the former USSR's assets and liabilities. Overall, Sobolev estimates Ukraine's debt to be about $6 billion, but stresses that Kiev promptly repays its debts to Western creditors.

24 · The Financial Times reports that Russia has signed a $10 billion oil and gas deal with a Western consortium to develop energy reserves off Russia's Sakhalin Island.

28 · According to Interfax, Uzbekistan's President Islam Karimov issues a decree on 27 June making Uzbekistan's new currency, the som, the only legal tender as of 1 July. The som will replace the temporary coupons issued in November 1993 when Uzbekistan withdrew from the ruble zone citing Russia's excessive demands for membership. Uzbek citizens can begin to exchange their coupons for soms on 28 June.

· According to Kazakhstan's new minister of the oil industry, Ravil Sharshabaev, Russia began cutting off almost all of Kazakhstan's oil exports in May, causing a near-complete shutdown of Kazakhstan's production and refining facilities, the Financial Times reports. Currently, the only export pipelines available for use by Kazakhstan traverse Russia, and many observers believe that Russia is using this leverage to gain shares in the abundant gas and oil fields of Kazakhstan. Russian officials refute this interpretation, complaining rather that Russia loses about $300 million per year by transporting other countries' products through its pipelines.

29 · World Bank officials announce that the bank will extend an additional $500 million loan to Russia to upgrade production in the oil industry, where production continues to fall (12 percent in 1993) due to outdated equipment and neglected facilities. The new funds are reportedly earmarked for pipeline improvement and environmental protection measures. Over the last two years Russia has received over $1 billion from the World Bank to upgrade its oil sector.

8 · Nezavisimaya Gazeta publishes the full text of Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev's project for the formation of a Eurasian Union. Nazarbaev initially proposed the idea for a new union last spring and was met with ambivalence from other CIS leaders. In recent weeks, however, the concept has resurfaced amid talk of the need for greater integration of the states of the former Soviet Union. The plan calls for the drafting of a new treaty forming the legal and organizational prerequisites “for deepening integration with the purpose of forming an economic, currency, and political union.” Associate membership in the Eurasian Union would not be permitted under Nazarbaev’s plan. A cessation of hostilities between CIS member states would be a prerequisite for membership. The preamble to the plan states that the existing structure of CIS bodies has not exploited fully the potential for integration. Nazarbaev contends that the Eurasian Union would act only as an additional integration structure, and not an alternative to the CIS.

· In a 11 June interview with Nezavisimaya Gazeta, Nazarbaev claims that “it is generally believed that common sovereignty is superior to each separate sovereignty of a particular state, and that it is more useful.” Nazarbaev also said that “no one can be content with the CIS that we have today. Some 400 documents are not being implemented. I am not saying that the CIS is not serving its purposes and that it must be disbanded. It is good to have something rather than nothing. But the CIS is moving in one direction, and life in another.”

9 · Federation Council speaker Vladimir Shumeyko believes that the processes of integration in the former Soviet Union will lead to the creation of a federative, if not confederative, state. He says that the restoration of the Soviet Union is impossible because the USSR rested on the ideological pillar of the CPSU. Shumeyko’s comments came at a session of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly (IPA) in St. Petersburg.

14 · Kyrgyz President Askar Akaev laments the continuing emigration of ethnic Russians from his republic, calling it a potential “ethnic Chernobyl” for Kyrgyzstan and Russia. According to the president, 170,000 of the 918,000 Russians living in the republic in 1990 have emigrated; Russians now account for 17 percent of the population, compared with 21 percent in 1990. Akaev blames general economic collapse for the exodus, but also specifically cites the declaration of Kyrgyz as the official language of the republic and the preferential treatment accorded to ethnic Kyrgyz. Akaev calls for the adoption of Russian as a parallel state language and for the granting of dual citizenship to ethnic Russians. Both of these measures would require amending the Kyrgyz constitution, an action the Kyrgyz parliament would be reluctant to do.

· RFE/RL reports that Russian representatives at a CSCE conference in Prague have rejected conditions proposed by the CSCE for international recognition of Russian peacekeeping operations in the CIS. The draft proposal stipulates that all sides in a conflict must agree to the introduction of peacekeepers and specifies that peacekeeping troops should not be deployed indefinitely. In spite of the disagreement, CSCE observers report favorably on the conduct of Russian peacekeepers in South Ossetia.

15 · Speaking at a meeting of high-level CIS functionaries, CIS executive secretary Ivan Korotchenya says that “Regarding the reasons why many agreements within the CIS framework do not work or work rather feebly, they are of an objective nature. First, every country lives according to its own laws. Second, many agreements have been signed only by some CIS members. Finally, there are difficulties with the ratification of adopted documents by the parliaments of the CIS countries.”

- In an interview with Rossiyskaya Gazeta, Azeri President Aliiev says that “energetic measures” are needed to enable the CIS to function properly. Aliiev observes that “during the meetings of heads of state, which last a day and a half or two days, the CIS exists, but in the intervals between meetings it does not.” He defends his decision to bring Azerbaijan into the CIS in September 1993, saying that “it was a necessary and important step, and Azerbaijan should remain in the CIS in the future.”

- Segodnya reports that, according to an observer of ethnic Russian migration, as many as six million “forced migrants” may arrive in Russia in the next two years. Dmitriy Rogozin, leader of the Congress of Russian Communities organization, further points out that, according to a government directive of 1 May 1994, each refugee should be issued 1 million rubles from state budget funds for resettlement (6 trillion rubles or $30 billion).

16 · Interfax reports that at the end of June Russian President Yeltsin intends to announce a comprehensive program of aid to ethnic Russians living abroad in the former Soviet republics. The program reaffirms Russia’s adherence to the notion of dual citizenship and its desire that Russian be made a parallel official language in the ex-Soviet space.

- On the same day Interfax reports on Andrey Kozyrev’s comments to a session of the Council on Foreign Policy in Moscow. Kozyrev says that Russia will unequivocally support the desire of any former Soviet republic to set up a confederation, or even a union. He praises Russia's "strength to avoid confrontation and bloodshed." He says that it is "necessary to advance toward setting up a real commonwealth rather than a neutral community."

· Kozyrev deals a subtle blow to Nazarbaev's Eurasian Union concept when he says that although Russia is as "ready for integration as our partners are.... we would like to avoid a situation in which the proposal and discussion of such promising ideas [for closer integration] hinders us in resolving concrete pressing problems, or distracts our attention away from them," ITAR-TASS reports. Russia, Kozyrev says, should remain the "locomotive of reform," and the stronger Russia is, economically and politically, the greater the benefits for the rest of the CIS.

17 · According to Interfax, Uzbekistan's Foreign Minister Saydmukhtar Saydkasymov says that Nazarbaev's Eurasian Union proposal is an attempt to return to the past and restore the former USSR. He believes that the CIS has not exhausted its possibilities, but that Uzbekistan "links its future with the sovereignty" acquired upon the dissolution of the Soviet Union.

21 · An international conference on peacekeeping in CIS states, organized by Russia's State Duma and various Russian government ministries, is addressed by "Dniester Republic" President Igor Smirnov, who tells a large Western audience that Russian peacekeeping in Moldova responds to the wishes of the conflicting parties and does not entail any political interference or pressure upon the parties. He indicates that the conflicting parties appreciate Russia's role "far more than that of the United Nations."

· Russia's State Duma chairman Ivan Rybkin holds talks with a Belarusian parliamentary delegation headed by First Deputy Chairman Vyacheslav Kuznyatsov. Rybkin states that, in order to facilitate greater integration, the CIS member states must work harder for unified, standardized legislation. He also says that the Russian State Duma supports the idea of a parliamentary meeting of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus to discuss the results of the 1991 agreement forming the CIS.

28 · An editorial in Nezavisimaya Gazeta characterizes Lukashenka as a Belarusian Zhirinovskiy and warns that an electoral victory by Lukashenka will bolster the right-wing forces in Russia who favor a dictatorship and the restoration of the borders of the former USSR.

- According to Interfax, the CIS Committee in the Russian Duma will conduct hearings on the future development of the CIS on 5 July. Committee chairman Konstantin Zatulin expresses his hope that these hearings will dispel any notion of rescinding the Minsk accords, the death knell of the USSR.

2 · Anton Buteiko, a senior foreign policy advisor to Kravchuk, says that accession to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty is “not of great urgency” and that economic reform retains a much higher priority on the legislative agenda. Buteiko downplays the importance of formal accession to NPT, pointing out that the denuclearization of Ukraine is proceeding according to schedule. RFE/RL points out, however, that many of the security assurances provided to Ukraine under the Trilateral Agreement signed in January depend on Ukraine’s accession to the NPT.

28 · In an address to graduates of the Russian military academies, Russian President Boris Yeltsin states that “nobody and nothing can free Russia from the political and moral responsibility for the fate of countries and peoples, which for centuries have moved forward together with the Russian state.”

- The outcome of Ukraine’s presidential election on 10 July could have an impact on how quickly, if at all, that country accedes to the NPT. According to ITAR-TASS, President Kravchuk indicates that he will call on parliament to immediately accede to the NPT “with certain provisos” if elected. Interfax and Reuters quote Leonid Kuchma as saying that NPT accession is a low priority and that $1 billion for denuclearization from the United States is required before he will lobby parliament to join the NPT.

- On the same day, Ukraine's parliament votes to reopen discussion on the question of continued transference of nuclear warheads to Russia as part of the Trilateral Agreement signed by Ukraine, Russia, and the United States, Intelnews reports. The item was proposed by the leader of the nationalist UNA/UNSO faction, Oleg Vitovich, who believes that Ukraine's national security is jeopardized by the agreement. The issue will be considered by the defense and national security committees, which will produce recommendations for the full chamber of parliament.

2 · Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin meets with his Belarusian counterpart, Vyacheslav Kebich, to discuss implementation of the agreement on monetary union between Russia and Belarus. Chernomyrdin indicates that several provisions of the agreement need to be amended before the Russian State Duma will approve the accord. RFE/RL speculates that Russia wants the National Bank of Belarus to be subordinated to the Russian Central Bank before the agreement is adopted.

- Reuters reports that the two parties agree to iron out all the remaining details of the agreement within a month, but little progress is observed on the crucial issues of the future of the Belarusian central bank and the rate of exchange of Belarusian coupons to Russian rubles. Belarusian head of state Myachoslav Hryb indicates his skepticism that progress on these and other issues could be worked out in a month. He contends that more than thirty agreements need to be finalized before monetary union becomes a reality.

8 · According to Izvestiya, Gazprom, Russia's state gas concern, is acquiring shares in its Moldovan counterpart, Moldgas, as payment for a 168 billion rubles ($84 million) debt for Russian gas. However, according to RFE/RL, nearly half of the 168 billion is owed by industrial consumers in the "Dniester Republic," currently outside the control of Chisinau, where local authorities have already begun to transfer assets to Russian state companies. Similar asset transfers have been used in Ukraine, which is reported to owe Russia as much as 1.5 trillion rubles ($750 million).

6 · In an interview with Novosti, Kuchma accuses the government of lacking a realistic foreign policy. He argues that the Ukrainian Foreign Ministry relies too heavily on relations with the United States to the detriment of relations with Germany and other European partners. Kuchma also says that Ukraine's policy in the field of nuclear disarmament had been "insufficiently tough."

· Konstantin Zatulin, chairman of the State Duma's CIS Committee, says that the committee has debated four possible procedures for reintegrating the former Soviet republics: an economic union; bilateral integration with Russia (e.g., Belarus); a Slavic Union; and a Eurasian Union, as proposed by Kazakhstan's President Nazarbaev. Zatulin denies that his committee unanimously endorses Nazarbaev's plan, noting several shortcomings that need to be addressed.

· According to Russian news agencies, Kazakhstan's Supreme Soviet votes to move the country's capital to Akmola (formally Tselinograd) in the northern part of Kazakhstan. President Nursultan Nazarbaev has long advocated the move, claiming that the current capital, Almaty, is overcrowded and unable to expand. Other observers cite Almaty's proximity to China as the principle reason behind the move. Kazakh intellectuals have suggested that the move will help reinforce Kazakhstan's hold on the largely Russian northern oblasts.

7 · In the final debate between the two candidates, Kravchuk says that he has no intention of dissolving parliament but indicates that he will not allow that body to trim his powers if reelected. As regards the economy, Kravchuk says that the failure to proceed with reforms was due to a lack of consensus on the general concepts of economic change. Kuchma uses the opportunity as an attempt to clarify his position on relations with Russia. "Economic union with Russia means equal, good neighborly cooperation. In the Soviet era we developed together," he says.

8 · The leaders of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan agree to form a defense and economic union, UPI and Interfax report. Under the terms of the agreement, an interstate council of heads of state will be created to help coordinate the standardization of legislation. In addition, there will be councils for foreign affairs and defense, and a Central Asian Bank for Cooperation and Development (with $3 million in start-up capital from each state). The three leaders emphasize that the new union is not meant to become a replacement for the CIS, but most observers believe that it resembles a micro version of Kazakh President Nazarbaev's Eurasian Union concept. Uzbek president Karimov says, "We are acting within the framework of the CIS, but we want to call on all countries of the commonwealth to move from declaration and inaction toward concrete deeds, like our Central Asian Union."

· In a televised debate, Lukashenka accuses Kebich of contributing to the breakup of the USSR and of lethargically implementing monetary union with Russia. Lukashenka provides viewers with a basic outline of his platform: stop inflation, fight corruption, crush crime, and restore ties to the former Soviet republics. Kebich denies any complicity in destruction of the USSR, and stresses that he was working diligently to restore close ties with Russia. He promises to lower prices on staple goods and increase social protection.

11 · International press agencies report that Aleksandr Lukashenka wins a resounding victory over Prime Minister Kebich to become Belarus's first president. Preliminary reports give Lukashenka nearly 80 percent of the vote, while Kebich receives only 14 percent. Seventy percent of the eligible voters participate in the election, thereby validating the results.

- Not unexpectedly, Prime Minister Kebich tenders his resignation immediately following announcement of the election results.

- Russian and Western press agencies report that former prime minister Leonid Kuchma was pronounced the winner of Ukraine's presidential election by the Central Election Commission. Almost 70 percent of eligible voters took part in Sunday's run-off election, far above the 50 percent necessary to validate the results. Mr. Kuchma won 52 percent of the vote compared with 45 percent for the incumbent President Kravchuk. Regionally, the election followed the pattern established in the 26 June elections, with Kuchma capturing huge majorities in the east and Crimea, and Kravchuk dominating in the more nationalistic west. The swing oblasts appear to have been in the central regions (e.g., in Poltava, Kuchma outpolled Kravchuk 59 percent to 37 percent, whereas in the first round Kravchuk edged out Kuchma 29 percent to 27 percent).

26 · According to UNIAN, an international conference will be held in Kiev to establish a League of Parties of the Baltic-Black Sea Region. The organizers, who include representatives of Ukraine's Republican, Democratic, and Green parties, expect parties from Ukraine, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Poland, Belarus, Moldova, Romania, and Bulgaria to attend. Organizers envision the formation of a "Baltic-Black Sea Bloc of free peoples" as an alternative to integration through the CIS or "Eurasian Union."

· (Postscript: The conference closed on 30 July. A statement on the creation of "the League of Parties of Countries Between the Seas" was signed by representatives from every country except Romania and Bulgaria, whose delegates claimed a lack of authority to sign. However, with many other delegates professing a similar lack of authority to adopt concrete measures, the conference failed to produce a declaration of basic principles and program of action for the League.)

- In an interview with Kievskie Vedomosti, Vyacheslav Igrunov, deputy chairman of the Russian State Duma Committee for CIS Affairs, says that Russia “would welcome a slow and gradual correction in Ukraine’s course” with regard to integration within the CIS. Igrunov warns that civil unrest in Ukraine will invariably spill over into Russia. He also says that, “for Russia, quicker integration means quicker deterioration of its economic situation.... Russia will integrate with Ukraine very carefully.” When asked to what degree Ukraine should trust Russia, given the failed “partnerships” of 1654 and 1922, Igrunov replies that times are different and “Russia is simply not able to restore the empire.”

- Kuchma, in a speech to strategic missile forces, says that the erroneous policies of the former leadership have resulted in self-isolation of Ukraine from Russia and other CIS member states. Kuchma expresses confidence that relations with Russia will improve and numerous problems will be resolved.

27 · In an interview with Rossiyskie Vesti, Azeri President Aliev says that after having attended three CIS summits, “I cannot say that the CIS is an organization which fully meets its purpose.... I cannot regard the Commonwealth’s work as satisfactory, although I am convinced that the organization is necessary.”

28 · Vladimir Shumeiko, speaker of Russia’s Federation Council and chairman of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly, calls for closer integration among former Soviet republics and the transformation of the CIS into a “confederation . . . a single community with a single goal and a single program . . . on the territory of the CIS.” The path to “political unity” is marked by economic integration, he says. He rejects the notion that such a system would “violate the sovereignty of independent states.”

29 · CIS Executive Secretary Ivan Korotchenya tells Interfax he will propose to UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali that a fund be established to support peacekeeping operations and provide assistance for the repatriation of refugees in the CIS. Korotchenya says that the world community should fund a portion of the CIS peacekeeping operations “because all states are vitally interested in peace and security in this region.”

Security

4 · The joint staff for coordinating military cooperation among the states of the CIS meets in Moscow to discuss prospects for forming a collective security system and a coalition force within the CIS. Lt.-Gen. Leonid Ivashov, the secretary of the CIS Council of Defense Ministers, says that the participants of the meeting recognize the existence of a military threat to individual CIS countries and to the CIS as a whole. Ivashov reportedly introduces a proposal outlining the creation of a military-political union of CIS countries under a supranational joint command which would be subordinated to the Collective Security Council. Ivashov admits that there are obstacles to the formation of such a military union, but reportedly suggests that closer military integration might be achieved by signatories to the CIS Collective Security Treaty, with non-signatories joining solely on matters of air defense and defense production.

26 · Kazakhstan signs an agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), which will allow IAEA inspectors to monitor Almaty's adherence to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty (NPT) which it signed in December 1993. IAEA Director Hans Blix says that the agreement hopefully decreases the likelihood that plutonium or other substances from Kazakhstan's 104 SS-18s could be smuggled. Blix also says that preliminary investigations find no unusual levels of radiation around the former Soviet nuclear test site at Semipalatinsk. Blix acknowledges that higher levels could have been recorded earlier, and that underground radiation levels could be higher as well.

28 · According to a Belarusian Defense Ministry spokesman, Belarus is keeping to the timetable for the withdrawal of Russian troops from the country, despite requests by Moscow to maintain some Russian military installations in Belarus. Ostensibly, Russian forces will be withdrawn from Belarus when the last long-range nuclear missiles are removed in 1998. Russia, however, maintains that certain installations in Belarus are of vital strategic interest to Russia, including a radar station in Hantsevich and a communications center for Baltic Fleet warships in Vileika. The issue will be discussed by the two countries' leaders at the summit on 3 August.

29 · At a meeting of the Council of the CIS Border Troop Commanders in St. Petersburg, representatives of eleven CIS countries sign agreements aimed at strengthening the border regime on the external borders of the former Soviet Union. Ukraine, officially not a member of the Council, does not sign the agreements, but indicates that the documents would be forwarded to Kiev for further study.

· Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Russia also announce the signing of a “three plus one” agreement on cooperation to protect the CIS external borders in the area of the Amu Darya.

August 1994

Economic

2 · The economies of the CIS member states continue to decline in the first half of 1994, according to the CIS statistical committee. Belarus experiences the sharpest decline in GDP, a 31 percent drop compared to the same period in 1993. Kazakhstan's GDP declines by 27 percent, Ukraine's by 26.5 percent, and Russia's by 17 percent. Overall CIS gross domestic product declines 20 percent over the same period in 1993.

- Inflation rates for June show a great disparity within the CIS. According to the CIS statistical committee, inflation remains low in Ukraine (1 percent), Russia, Kyrgyzstan, and Moldova (3-5 percent), but is high in Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan (20 percent), Azerbaijan and Belarus (30 percent), and Kazakhstan and Armenia (40 percent).

- In the energy sector, all the oil-producing republics except Uzbekistan (where production rose 37 percent) witness a decline in production in the first half of 1994 (Russia down 14 percent, Kazakhstan 16 percent, and Turkmenistan 9 percent). The four states register increases in the production of natural gas, however. In Russia production rises 2 percent, in Kazakhstan 37 percent, in Turkmenistan 45 percent, and in Uzbekistan 9 percent.

- Official unemployment figures remain surprisingly low throughout the CIS. A total of 2.1 million people in the CIS have applied for unemployment compensation in the first half of 1994. Over half of the 2.1 million unemployed reside in Russia (1.26 million). Many economists dismiss the “official” unemployment rate, and claim that the rate of “hidden” or structural employment is much greater.

- Most CIS countries report a positive balance of trade with partners outside the former Soviet Union during the first half of 1994, raising exports 9 percent compared with the same period last year. According to the CIS Statistical Committee, the bulk of the CIS’s exports consisted of raw materials (40 percent), while machinery and industrial goods accounted for only 10 percent.

- Moldovan President Snegur tells Interfax that he favors a common economic space, with transparent economic borders and without customs barriers, on the territory of the CIS. According to Snegur, the creation of such a system should be the singular focus of the CIS heads of state.

3 · Belarusian President Aleksandr Lukashenka announces following a summit meeting with Russian President Yeltsin that the two sides have agreed to forestall monetary union until the two economies are better suited to meld together. Lukashenka cites the inflation rate disparity as one example of the incompatibility of the two economies. Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin offers Belarus a 150 billion ruble credit in addition to advice on implementing economic reform: “We know our mistakes and tell you what must not be done.”

- Lukashenka reports that Yeltsin and Chernomyrdin will travel to Minsk in mid-autumn to sign a Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with Belarus.

· On the functioning of the CIS, Lukashenka says: “Our countries have no alternative. But we must fill CIS declarations with more concrete contents. The time of simple letters of intent is over.” 5 · ITAR-TASS reports that the prime ministers of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan met to discuss the further economic integration of their countries. An interstate council will coordinate the work of the economic ministries, including better alignment of laws on economic matters in the three republics.

9 · Gazprom warns Belarus and Ukraine that natural gas supplies will be cut off in September if payments are not made on their debts. According to Gazprom, Ukraine owes about 2 trillion rubles (about $1 billion), and Belarus owes 700 billion rubles (about $350 million). Gazprom also complains that Ukraine has failed to privatize pipeline facilities promised to Gazprom in exchange for debt relief.

· According to a Basapress report of 29 July, Moldova’s energy debt to other CIS countries equals 1,170 lei ($286 million), about 60 percent of which is owed to Russia. However, according to the Economics Ministry in Chisinau, Moldova is being charged up to 20 percent above the world price for its natural gas by CIS suppliers. A ministry spokesman says that Moldova hopes to secure a 200-billion-ruble loan from Russia to help pay its debts.

· Gazprom claims that overall the former Soviet republics’ gas debt equals 3 trillion rubles ($3 billion).

13 · According to Kommersant, Russia’s state oil concern, Lukoil, secured a 10 percent share in the oil field development project to be signed by a consortium of Western oil companies and the Republic of Azerbaijan.

16 · On the heels of concluding a troop withdrawal agreement on 10 August, Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin meets with his Moldovan counterpart, Andrey Sangheli. The Russian side agrees to extend a 70-billionruble credit to Moldova to help that country pay its energy debts to Gazprom for past deliveries. Sangheli calls on the Russian parliament to ratify the Russian-Moldovan treaty signed in 1990. He indicates that Moldova's parliament has nearly completed a draft law on the special status for Moldova's Trans-Dniester region. The law would provide the separatist region with broad economic and cultural autonomy while preserving Moldova's territorial integrity.

· Despite the credit, Moldgaz, Moldova's state gas concern, will conduct negotiations later in the month regarding a transfer of assets to Gazprom. Under the preliminary agreement reached in early July, Gazprom would acquire approximately 35 percent of the shares in Moldgaz.

17 · Gazprom's windfall grows as Ukraine agrees to pay 20-25 percent of its reported $1.5 billion debt between August and October (Ukraine's net energy debt is actually smaller because Gazprom owes Ukraine close to $400 million in transit fees). The two sides also agree on means to improve the payment mechanism for Russian gas, and also to allow Gazprom to contract directly with individual gas consumers in Ukraine.

18 · Gazprom completes negotiations with Belarus on repayment of Belarus's gas debt, which reportedly stands at $425 million. The agreement signed by Belarusian Prime Minister Mikhail Chyhir calls for total repayment of the debt by 1 April 1995. Despite the aforementioned agreements, Gazprom reiterates its threat to cut off gas supplies to Russia's western littoral should those countries delay the repayment of their debts.

19 · Due in part to the growing debt problem, Russia's energy exports to CIS countries drop significantly during the first seven months of 1994 compared to the same period last year. Oil exports fall 33 percent, while natural gas deliveries drop 10 percent. Not surprisingly, exports to "far abroad" countries witness an increase of 15 percent for natural gas and 12 percent for oil.

· Ukrainian officials meet with a delegation from Turkmenistan to discuss the resumption of natural gas supplies to Ukraine. Turkmenistan cut off gas shipments to Ukraine in February due to Kiev's $700 million debt. Since then Ukraine has managed to reduce that figure to a reported $279 million. The two sides reach a tentative agreement on the price of natural gas and the means of payment. The relevant documents will be submitted to the two governments for approval.

25 · Izvestiya publishes details of proposals drafted by Russian officials to be submitted to the CIS Council of Heads of Government meeting in September. One proposal calls for the creation of a Payments Union, with mutually convertible national currencies. Such a system could "become the basis for establishing a Currency Union." Another proposal would turn the existing Consultative and Coordinating Committee (CCC) into the Intergovernmental Economic Committee (IEC) as a "controlling and decision-making" body, issuing "binding decisions in transnational spheres: transport, communications, oil and gas pipelines." Participant-states would be expected to "renounce some of their national prerogatives and turn them over to the supranational body." According to Izvestiya, the authors of the proposals expect only four or five states to join the IEC initially.

30 · According to Interfax, Kazakhstan, apparently succumbing to months of pressure, has agreed to establish a working group with Russia to draft agreements on the development of the Karachaganak natural gas field in northwestern Kazakhstan. In 1992 an international competition for the right to develop the deposits was held and British Petrol (BP) and Italy's AGIP were chosen. However, in tactics reminiscent of similar deals in Azerbaijan, the Russian government has lobbied intensively for Russian firms, in particular Gazprom, to have a share in the project.

Political

1 · Negotiations at CIS headquarters in Minsk are under way to discuss amendments to the CIS Charter, which was signed in the Belarusian capital on 22 January 1993. The CIS Executive Secretariat press service attributes the amendments to new realities that have emerged in the Commonwealth.

· Belarusian Foreign Minister Vladimir Senko says that the development of relations with Russia, Belarus's primary economic partner, is the priority of Minsk's foreign policy. Senko points out that over 70 percent of Belarusian exports go to Russia.

3 · A commission of Russian, Belarusian, Ukrainian, and Kazakhstani intellectuals has been established to promote closer integration of the four republics. The commission's major objective, according to the chairman of the State Duma's CIS Committee and one of the commission's initiators, Konstantin Zatulin, is to convince people of the need for closer integration. Zatulin believes that apprehension about integration stems from misunderstandings that it will be based on "elder brother-younger partner" mentality.

4 · President Yeltsin issues a statement condemning Latvia's newly adopted citizenship law, and adds an explicit warning to other former Soviet republics to take "responsibility for the provision of the civil, political, economic, social, and cultural rights of [ethnic Russians]." The statement continues: "Russia cannot be reconciled to the fact that hundreds of thousands of ethnic Russians in a neighboring country are put in what is essentially a humiliating situation. We are proceeding from the fact that they have a right to remain in those states where they were born or where they have lived for many years... . I, as president of the Russian Federation, state that the Russian Federation will give all the support it can to our fellow countrymen living abroad and confirm the readiness of our state to grant Russian citizenship without impediment to our fellow countrymen who so desire . . . and also to defend and offer protection to all ethnic Russians in Latvia and outside Russia generally.”

· The leaders of Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan meet in Almaty and sign an agreement on the creation of a Central Asian Union. According to Kyrgyz president Akaev, the agreement “is a breakthrough on the integration front politically, economically, and culturally. The tripartite agreement ... should be a good incentive for other CIS countries [who] realize that it is far easier to solve complex problems together than in isolation.... This is probably a true step toward a confederation, a step toward the creation of a Eurasian alliance” proposed by Nazarbaev. All three presidents stress that membership in the Union is open to any interested country.

10 · On an official visit to Ukraine, Kazakh President Nazarbaev urges Kiev to support his idea for a Eurasian Union. Nazarbaev calls the CIS ineffective because it lacks a common policy on anything. Nazarbaev stresses that the Eurasian Union would not represent a resurrection of the USSR. Kuchma assured Nazarbaev that his administration would thoroughly study the Eurasian Union plan in preparation for the October CIS Heads of State summit.

16 · According to UNIAN, a Ukrainian Foreign Ministry delegation visits the Central Asian states of Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and Kyrgyzstan to discuss official positions on cooperation in the CIS. Ukraine will reportedly focus its discussions on issues of inter-CIS trade and economic relations, and mechanisms for implementation of interstate treaties and agreements.

· According to Interfax, 80 percent of the text of the Russian-Ukrainian Partnership, Friendship, and Cooperation Treaty is now complete. The final text of the treaty is to be coordinated with relevant ministries and parliament committees. Further negotiations are scheduled for mid-September. The Ukrainian side apparently has dropped its insistence that the issue of the Black Sea Fleet be resolved before a comprehensive bilateral treaty could be signed. Rather, a Ukrainian delegation spokesman says, “this treaty provides solutions for the general political and economic problems between Ukraine and Russia and if every separate political issue is to be included in the treaty, it will never be signed.” Concerning the sensitive issue of dual citizenship, Interfax quotes unnamed sources as saying that the two sides have reached a compromise whereby dual Ukrainian-Russian citizenship could be granted on a case-by-case system by an act of the Ukrainian parliament.

18 · According to Valerian Viktorov, deputy chairman of Russia’s Federation Council, CIS member states are “fed up with their sovereignty” and predicted the formation within one or two years of a “tough” CIS in which “the republics will resolve jointly all economic and social problems.” He says that currently Russia is “the locomotive capable of pulling [the republics] out of crisis.” Finally, Viktorov advocates the creation of “a legislative body to determine the rules of the game for the CIS countries.” Significantly, Viktorov did not mention the need to “resolve jointly” military and security problems.

24 · According to Kazakhstan’s President Nursultan Nazarbaev, the proposal to create a Eurasian Union has been registered for consideration by CIS leaders at the upcoming October summit, Interfax reports. The Eurasian Union would entail a single customs and defense space, single borders, and coordination in foreign policy and trade for all its members. The official language of the Union, Nazarbaev says, would be Russian. Nazarbaev reiterates that states currently engaged in armed conflict would be permitted to join. He points out that since 1989 “ten times more people than the Afghan war-almost 150,000-have been killed” in armed conflicts on the territory of the former USSR.

28 · According to Oleg Rummyantsev, chairman of Russia’s Fund for Constitutional Reforms and a long-time democrat, the integration processes within the CIS “should result in the formation of a new single state, [which would be] neither the Soviet Union nor the Russian empire [but] a union state,” which might be called the “Russian Union.” The new Union, Rummyantsev tells Interfax, would have both federal and confederal features and would meld together “Russian territories and other former Soviet republics” including “most of Ukraine.”

· Calling the Russian people “the older brother” of Belarusians, Belarusian President Aleksandr Lukashenka appears on national television and calls for the unification of Russia and Belarus, and indeed of all Slavic countries, Interfax reports. “The Belarusian people sincerely stand for reunification with Russia,” he says. This marks the first occasion since the election that Lukashenka, who ran on a unification platform, supports the notion publicly. Previously, he cautioned that any attempt to recreate the USSR was unrealistic and that each republic’s sovereignty must be respected. Lukashenka’s statement, coupled with the remarks by Sergey Karaganov, a close Yeltsin aide (see below), casts doubt on the longevity of an independent Republic of Belarus.

Security

1 · Russia and Ukraine sign an agreement on the joint protection of their 1,500-km border. According to the commander of the Russian Border Guards, Andrey Nikolaev, the Russian-Ukrainian border will be divided into sections which will be guarded by either Russian or Ukrainian guards, but not both. The agreement, which has “no precedent in world practice,” reportedly represents a reduction of tensions between the two countries, and is viewed as a cost-saving mechanism for both. Currently, 2,500 Ukrainian and 2,000 Russian border guards patrol the frontier.

3 · According to Clinton administration officials, Vice-President Al Gore secured “no specific promises” from Ukraine’s President Kuchma that Kiev would accede to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Nevertheless, Gore remains optimistic that Ukraine will agree to sign the NPT.

· One Ukrainian member of parliament does not share Gore’s rosy outlook. Nikolay Porovskiy, a member of the Defense and State Security Committee, tells Interfax that Ukraine’s accession to the NPT will be a lengthy process. He argues that Ukraine needs $6 billion to dismantle the nuclear weapons on its territory, and that aid from the United States has been woefully delinquent. He advocates the cessation of missile dismantlement provided for under the terms of the Trilateral Accords signed in January. Ukraine’s nuclear systems, he says, need to serve as a deterrent while the country is establishing its statehood. He notes that his views are shared by numerous members of the Ukrainian parliament.

4 · According to the director of the Russian space agency, Yuriy Koptev, at least 28,000 Russian troops are needed to maintain the Baykonur space station in Kazakhstan. Koptev argues that any fewer soldiers could lead to an “irreversible collapse” of the facilities; four years ago 70,000 troops were based at the facility.

8 · According to Interfax, the Kazakhstani and Turkish defense ministers sign a “preliminary” agreement on bilateral military cooperation. Initially, cooperation will be developed in the realm of arms production.

Kazakhstan’s defense minister, Sagadat Nurmagambetov, rejects the notion that the Kazakhstani-Turkish agreement conflicts with Kazakhstan’s CIS military obligations.

19 · Ukraine’s President Kuchma eschews his past ambiguity concerning the NPT and emerges firmly in favor of joining the non-nuclear regime. Kuchma tells Moloda Ukraina that he will submit the pact to parliament for approval in October. He expresses confidence that they will pass it. Kuchma’s move may be seen as an attempt to pave the way for a successful visit to the United States in late November. In a transparent criticism of the West’s policy of linking economic aid to Ukraine’s accession to the NPT Kuchma says: “A single problem remains between us and the United States-the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. It must be signed.... Then we’ll see whether the West again will put conditions on aid to Ukraine.”

· In response, however, parliamentary speaker Oleksandr Moroz says Ukraine’s nuclear dismantlement was a mistake, and that parliament will assiduously study the document to determine whether Ukraine’s interests would be served by acceding. Moroz also shows his disdain, not only for the U.S. policy of linking aid to the NPT, but also for the slow pace of aid disbursements to Ukraine, stating that “we will get rid of the nuclear weapons, as soon as those countries which are interested in it make corresponding steps ... measured in real money, for the reduction in our nuclear arsenal.”

22 · Labeling the present CIS collective security system a “failure,” Maj.-Gen. Vasiliy Volkov, representing the staff of the Council of CIS Defense Ministers, tells Interfax that so far only Russia has been able to “control” regional tensions and conflicts within the CIS. He advocates a restructuring of the present system with one promoting greater coordination and cooperation. One step Volkov mentions is to make the Russian president chairman of the CIS Security Council. Volkov also advocates an “interested party” system by which states could participate in certain areas of special interest but withhold from areas deemed not vital to that particular state; Volkov’s proposal closely resembles the current state of CIS collective security—a system he condemns as ineffectual.

24 · According to Ukraine’s deputy prime minister, Valeriy Shmarov, plans are nearly complete to transfer strategic bombers from Ukraine to Russia. Shmarov says that the long-range Tu-160 and Tu-95 bombers have no role in Ukraine’s military doctrine. Russia and Ukraine are likely to reach an agreement on compensation for the forty-one planes shortly, Interfax reports.

26 · Ukraine’s President Kuchma continues a government housecleaning by removing Vitaliy Radetskiy from the post of defense minister and replacing him with Shmarov, who will become Ukraine’s first civilian defense minister. Mr. Shmarov indicates that he does not plan any changes to Ukraine’s military doctrine. He says that he does support Ukraine’s accession to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation regime.

· In an interview with Segodnya, foreign policy expert and member of the Presidential Council Sergey Karaganov argues against NATO's eastward expansion and advocates a 1,500 km "buffer zone" between Western Europe and Russia. But Karaganov cautions against hastily reintegrating Ukraine into a military alliance with Russia as it would alarm the West. Karaganov, however, states that "Belarus is an absolutely crucial country for us.... Once we are in close alliance with Belarus, the problem of Ukraine will virtually be solved."

31 · Russian Foreign Intelligence (SVR) spokesman Yuriy Kobaladze told ITAR-TASS that his agency is not "working against" the former Soviet republics, but is closely monitoring events there.

September 1994

Economic

7 · The CIS Coordinating and Consultative Committee meets in Moscow and agrees in principle to Russia's proposals to create an Interstate Economic Committee (IEC) as the first supranational body of the CIS. The IEC will be endowed with executive and managerial powers and participating states will transfer certain national prerogatives. The IEC will assume jurisdiction over certain "transnational systems" (such as power grids, gas and oil pipelines, transport, and communications) and over "CIS property" or "jointly owned assets of member states" (such as industrial and financial corporations). The IEC will also be responsible for developing a payments union (which could be transformed into a monetary union), and a CIS free trade zone and eventual customs union which would theoretically guarantee a free flow of goods, capital, and labor within the CIS. Russia will provide 50 percent of the financing for the IEC and will obtain 50 percent of the votes in the IEC; the remaining 50 percent are still to be apportioned among the remaining eleven CIS member states, presuming, of course, that all 11 decide to participate. (According to Interfax, should all the CIS member states participate, the vote distribution would be as follows: Ukraine, 14 percent; Belarus, Kazakhstan, and Uzbekistan, 5 percent each; and the remaining seven states, 3 percent each.)

8 · Ukraine's Finance Ministry releases figures on that country's debts to other CIS states. In total, Ukraine's debt to the former republics is $3.4 billion. The bulk of the debt-$2.7 billion-is owed to Russia. Ukraine also owes Turkmenistan $671 million, Moldova $28 million, and Kazakhstan $1.3 million. According to Ukraine's head of the foreign debts department in the Ministry of Finance, Aleksiy Berezhnoy, Kiev has signed bilateral debt repayment agreements with all of its creditor nations. Ukraine will pay Russia back in 3-5 years, Moldova in 3 years, Turkmenistan in 2 years, and Kazakhstan in 1 year.

9 · The Council of CIS Heads of Government approves in principle the aforementioned creation of the Interstate Economic Committee (IEC). The agreement seems to include certain safeguards to prevent Russian dominance over the IEC. Decisions made by the IEC that involve "substantial" expenditures will require a consensus, while lesser issues require an 80 percent majority (of which Russia is entitled to 50 percent). The Presidium and Collegium of the IEC will be based in Moscow. Further discussions on the extent of the IEC's power will be held at the upcoming CIS Heads of State summit. Azerbaijan and Turkmenistan abstain from signing the document on the creation of the IEC, reserving judgment until the summit. Ukraine voices reservations regarding the notion of creating supranational bodies in the CIS.

- Interfax reports that, on written instructions from President Leonid Kuchma, the Ukrainian delegation makes it clear that Ukraine's participation in the IEC will be limited to matters of interest to Ukraine. The Kiev representatives also object to institutions which "limit our sovereignty."

- According to RFE/RL, Belarus, Armenia, and Georgia emerge as the main proponents of economic integration. Yerevan and Minsk also reportedly advocate the creation of a CIS citizenship.

- Russia's apparent disappointment with the outcome of the session manifests itself in Moscow's decision to maintain certain tariff barriers on goods imported from CIS countries. Chernomyrdin says that the barriers will remain until "the necessary preconditions" are met.

10 · Stating that Belarus must reach Russia's economic level before a monetary union between the two is feasible, Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin rules out any such union for the near future, Interfax and ITAR-TASS reports. Belarusian income and inflation rates, for example, are disproportionate to corresponding rates in Russia. Although economic disparity is given as the primary reason to postpone monetary union, the real reason may lie in Belarus's unwillingness to cede its entire economic sovereignty to Russia. Newly elected President Aleksandr Lukashenka, an ardent supporter of union during his campaign, has objected to handing over control of monetary policy and emission to Russia.

19 · The prime ministers of Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and Kyrgyzstan, the three countries which form the Central Asian Union, will meet in Tashkent in mid-October to discuss further economic integration. The leaders will discuss mechanisms to accelerate the implementation of agreements and means to make them compulsory for the signatories.

20 · The government of Azerbaijan and a consortium of oil companies from the United States, Britain, Norway, Turkey, and Russia sign an agreement to develop three oil fields on Azerbaijan's Caspian Sea shelf. According to RFE/RL, the Western companies will own the majority share in the project (the Russian firm, Lukoil, will own 10 percent), but about 80 percent of the profits will go the Azerbaijan-a potential windfall, according to Azeri President Aliev, of $34 billion over the next thirty years. Negotiations on transport of the oil were postponed. Currently no secure overland pipeline exists to export the product.

- In line with previous statements (including a letter to the British embassy), the Russian Foreign Ministry announces that the Russian government will not recognize the legitimacy of the deal. Russia's objections are ostensibly rooted in concern over the ecological impact of any development project in the Caspian.

- The next day, Russia's Foreign Minister Kozyrev reiterates that the Russian MFA had "expressed ... Russia's official view" on the matter. Kozyrev's statement is precipitated by reactions of disbelief from officials in Russia's oil industry that Russia would object to the deal.

- Russia will soon request a $500 million loan from the World Bank to rehabilitate and modernize West Siberian oil fields, Interfax reports. In 1993 Russia obtained a $610 million loan from the Bank.

21 · The Azeri government indicates that it will ignore Russia's objections to the recently signed Caspian Sea development agreement. An unnamed Azeri source tells Interfax that the deposits covered by the agreement are located on the Azeri section of the Caspian shelf "which we have been using for decades." The source also claims that Russia's ambassador to Azerbaijan has joined Russia's Fuel and Energy Ministry and Lukoil in approving the contract.

26 · According to ITAR-TASS, Russia's energy minister, Yuriy Shafranik, proposes the creation of a multinational coordinating committee to oversee the development of offshore oil deposits in the Caspian Sea. In addition to Russia, participants will include Turkmenistan, Kazakhstan, and Azerbaijan. Shafranik says that Turkmenistan and Kazakhstan have already given their assent to such a committee. Eventual Iranian membership in the committee is also proposed.

According to the draft proposal on creating the committee, each state will be given sovereign rights over territorial waters up to ten miles from its coastline. The committee would supervise the exploitation of mineral resources on the Caspian shelf.

4 · Negotiations on a Russian-Ukrainian Friendship and Cooperation Treaty stall when Russia objects to Ukraine's wording on the question of inviolability of borders. According to Intelnews, the Ukrainian version of Article 2 of the treaty reads: "the parties accept existing borders between the two countries and pledge that they do not have now, nor will have, any territorial claims against each other." Russian negotiators reject this wording, arguing that nationalists in the parliament (which must ratify any treaty) would object to such an article. Rather, Russia proposes the more ambiguous wording: "the parties respect their territorial integrity and the unchangeable nature of their borders in accordance with the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe's [CSCE] 'Final Act.'" The treaty will reportedly also contain a proviso, insisted upon by Russia, that forbids Ukraine from joining any military blocs or unions without Moscow's approval. Belarus concludes a similar agreement with Russia.

6 · Reuters reports that U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Madeleine Albright having concluded her tour of CIS conflict zones (Moldova, Georgia, and Nagorno-Karabakh), travels to Moscow where she gives her tacit approval of unilateral Russian peacekeeping in the former Soviet republics, but cautions Moscow that the international community would pay very close attention to Russia's actions: "The burden of proof is on Russia to prove its commitment to accepted international principles, to the sovereignty of the newly independent states, and to adopting a neutral stance in ethnic conflicts.” Albright adds that UN observers in Abkhazia have determined that the Russians “have now become a neutral force.”

7 · Russian media reports the creation of the Assembly of Russian Compatriots in the “near abroad.” The organization, whose founders include the ministries of foreign affairs and finance, representatives of the presidential administration, centrist State Duma deputies, and prelates of the Russian Orthodox Church, targets “all those who regard Russian as their native language” (emphasis added). Russia has often claimed its rights to protect ethnic Russians in the so-called “near abroad.” However, the use of “Russian-speakers” as a criteria greatly expands the purview of Russian protection. According to reports, the Assembly will provide emergency economic relief to Russians in the former Soviet space. The Assembly justifies its activities on the stated assumption that Russians in the former Soviet Union are treated as “secondclass people.” The founding congress of the Assembly will be held this autumn.

13 · Interfax reports that the Standing Commission of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly (IPA) issued a statement criticizing the new rules for the transit of the Turkish Bosphorus Straits. The rules, enacted in January and enforced as of 1 July, call for twenty-four hours’ notice to be given before the passage of oil tankers, and special permits for the transit of nuclear waste or chemicals. Russia has long protested that the new rules contravene the 1936 Montreux Convention governing the straits, but the protest by the IPA may signal a more united front by the CIS oil-producing states.

- The IPA statement is preceded by an agreement, signed between Gazprom, the Russian state gas concern, and a Greek consortium, that seeks to circumvent the transit of the Turkish straits. The Financial Times of 12 September reports that a 350 km pipeline is to be built through Bulgaria to the northeastern coast of Greece. The pipeline, which will reportedly carry Russian, Kazakh, and Azeri oil, could move 20-40 million tons of oil annually, and will take three years to construct, at a cost of $600 million.

14 · At a meeting of the CSCE's Committee of Senior Officials in Prague, Russia offers a new proposal for a CSCE framework for Russia's peacekeeping operations in the CIS. The previous proposal allows for significant CSCE monitoring and mediation in the settlement of conflicts in exchange for political endorsement and CSCE financial support for the Russian operations. The new proposal, according to NATO and non-NATO observers, dilutes the CSCE's role and broadens Russia's opportunities to act unilaterally in the CIS, but with CSCE financing. The new proposal is tabled by the meeting's delegates.

· Interfax reports, however, that Yeltsin and Kozyrev will raise the issue of peacekeeping in the CIS at the forthcoming session of the UN General Assembly. A Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman says that Russia seeks both UN acceptance of the CIS as a framework for regional peacekeeping and "an optimum balance of political and financial responsibility."

15 · Kazakhstan's ambassador to Russia, Tair Mansurov, reignites debate on the creation of a "Eurasian Union." Mansurov labels the proposal a more advanced form of integration among CIS states. The Union's functions would include: coordination of economic policy; adoption and mandatory implementation of joint reform programs; creation of common political institutions including a central "consultative-deliberative" parliament; and "an agreed approach" to military and border tasks.

17 · Nazarbaev further elaborates his proposal, saying that it is linked to the Russian ideology of "Eurasianism."

19 · Russia's ambassador to the Court of St. James, Anatoliy Adamishin, says that one of Yeltsin's main objectives during the upcoming London summit will be to secure London's understanding of "Russia's foreign policy priorities, such as the organization of the post-Soviet space, the settlement of conflicts on former Soviet borders, and Russian peacekeeping." Adamishin uses the "rights of ethnic Russians" rhetoric by complaining that "a new iron curtain" is being raised, this time to keep out "an inflow of people from Russia..... The difference between the rights of Britons in Russia and of Russians in Britain cannot be tolerated much longer; no country can tolerate such discrimination," he complains.

20 · The secretary general of the Council of Europe, Daniel Tarschys, announces that Ukraine and Belarus need to overcome "legal difficulties" before joining the thirty-two-member Council. For Ukraine, Tarschys says, the adoption of a new constitution is necessary for membership. For Belarus, the issue is parliamentary elections. Nine former Soviet bloc countries have already been admitted to the European Council and seven more await acceptance-Albania, Belarus, Croatia, Latvia, Moldova, Russia, and Ukraine.

· Tarschys meets with Moldovan President Mircea Snegur and expresses satisfaction with Moldova's recent parliamentary elections and new constitution. These two factors, he says, should accelerate Moldova's accession to the Council of Europe. On the issue of Moldova's separatist problem, Tarschys labels the "Dniester Republic" as "absolutely illegitimate."

· (Brief Analysis): The Russian Foreign Intelligence Service (SVR) has issued a report entitled “Russia-CIS: Does the Western Position Need Correction?” which states that all major political forces in Russia and the CIS support reintegration of the post-Soviet “Eurasian space,” and that this “natural, historical trend” is not a manifestation of Russian neo-imperialism. Rather, the document contends, the process of reintegration serves to hinder the rise of nationalist forces in Russia. The spokesperson for SVR Director Evgeniy Primakov says the report intends to clarify the Russian position on this issue on the eve of the U.S.-Russian summit.

The report envisions CIS development along three possible paths. The first holds that centripetal tendencies will create conditions for the formation of a single economic and security space, and eventually forming a voluntary confederation. Because of the “democratic” nature of this scenario of reintegration, the new and improved CIS would not result in a return to confrontation with the West, the SVR concludes.

The second scenario assumes those forces within the CIS who advocate “isolated” development will emerge victorious, with direct or indirect “external” support. In such a scenario, “a lurch toward nationalism is likely to be accompanied by growing authoritarian and anti-democratic tendencies,” the report says. The report blames “isolated” (i.e., independent) development for Islamic extremism in Central Asia, and for the reversal of reforms in Russia.

The third scenario envisions one of the other CIS countries (not Russia) assuming the “unification” function. The resultant non-Russian bloc of CIS countries could follow either of the first two paths.

- Russia and Ukraine continue their dispute over language in a draft Friendship, Cooperation, and Partnership Treaty. Russia continues to propose language from the CSCE Final Act. Kiev considers that language too ambiguous (it permits peaceful, negotiated border changes) and wants Russia to renounce territorial claims on Ukraine.

- Kozyrev calls Russia and Ukraine “twin brothers” (but “brothers” just the same). The commander of the Black Sea Fleet offers as a solution to tensions between the RF and Ukraine the “economic, political, and military drawing together of the two Slavic states.” He calls on Ukraine’s new leadership “to subdue the ambitions of ‘national-patriots.’ “

- President Leonid Kuchma offers reassurances that Ukraine's national interests remain his top priority in signing a treaty with Russia. He maintains, however, that "the treaty must be signed, as Russia remains our main partner."

- Belarusian President Aleksandr Lukashenka tells Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung he has no intention of ceding Belarus's political or economic sovereignty to Russia. He says he will attempt to cooperate with Russia on the same basis as with other Western countries.

- The following day, Lukashenka blames Russia's energy prices for unpopular economic measures undertaken by the Belarusian government (e.g., lifting of some food subsidies).

21 · Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev says the United States should expand bilateral economic relations with Russia in order to help create "stability and prosperity" in the CIS. Kozyrev says Russia envisions the CIS as a European Union-like structure, and "not a centralized state or a new USSR." He claims a "lack of any imperial ambitions in Moscow."

- Nazarbaev's Eurasian Union proposal receives support from several prominent Russian politicians at a conference in Alma-Ata. The Russian State Duma's CIS affairs committee chairman Konstantin Zatulin and Russian Communist Party leader Gennadiy Zyuganov endorse the proposal, but disclaim any intent to reconstruct the USSR. The conference, attended by representatives of eight former republics, resolves to establish a non-governmental organization to promote the Eurasian Union “and other integration projects.”

26 · In his address to the UN General Assembly, Boris Yeltsin says the CIS states constitute “Russia’s foreign policy priority.” Ties with these states “exceed those of mere neighborliness. This is rather a blood relationship,” Yeltsin says.

28 · Dmitriy Rurikov, who is in Kiev for talks on the draft state treaty, insists that the document must provide for dual citizenship in order to “facilitate the legal defense” of ethnic Russians in Ukraine and to “offer an additional guarantee to persons who don’t want to break links with Russia.” Rurikov indicates that dual citizenship “is a basic position of Russia’s policy not only toward Ukraine, but also toward the other CIS states.”

9 · An opinion poll measuring political views of Russian military officers highlights trends of growing political restlessness within Russia’s armed forces. The results, published in Der Spiegel, show that 62 percent of the respondents believe that Russia requires “authoritarian rule” to solve its problems; less than half support market reforms and privatization; 80 percent seek “Russia’s restoration as a great power respected in the entire world;” and absolute majorities “do not want Yeltsin as president” or Grachev as defense minister. The survey finds Lt.-Gen. Aleksandr Lebed is the clear choice among the officers to institute “a strong-arm policy” or “a Bonapartist solution.”

12 · Russia lobbies for changes to the 1990 Conventional Forces in Europe (CFE) treaty. The Russian Defense Ministry would allow Russia to reinforce its flank regions-the Leningrad and North Caucasus Military Districts-to levels greater than the treaty permits. Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev announces Russia would be prepared to withdraw a considerable number of troops and arms from the Kaliningrad oblast should CFE flank limitations be readjusted.

15 · Ukrainian parliamentary speaker Oleksandr Moroz proposes an international conference in Kiev in 1995 to discuss Ukraine's accession to the NPT. Action on the treaty is unlikely before the end of the year. The proposal deals a blow to President Kuchma who had hoped to present a ratified NPT as a "gift" to President Clinton when the two meet in Washington in November. The United States considers Ukraine's accession to the non-proliferation regime an issue of paramount importance in relations between the two countries.

20 · Nezavisimaya Gazeta reports that, according to Pavel Grachev, servicemen are humiliated and some are in "a strongly revanchist mood."

October 1994

Economic

6 · Deputy Prime Minister Aleksandr Shokhin, Russia's representative to the IMF, World Bank, and EBRD meetings in Madrid, proposes that Western credits to other CIS states be used to pay the recipient country's debt to Russia. Shokhin also implicitly links repayment of CIS debt to Russia with Moscow's ability to repay Western creditors.

· Citing the failure of the CIS to promote economic integration within the FSU, parliament deputies from Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, and Kazakhstan form four factional deputies' groups into an "Economic Union," Nezavisimaya Gazeta reports. Rather than wait for an effective CIS legislature to develop, the four country groups will introduce legislation in their respective legislatures that has been coordinated at the drafting stage. Members of the "Economic Union" faction in the Russian parliament include Deputy Prime Minister Sergey Shakray and Yabloko co-chairman Yuriy Boldyrev.

9 · Ukraine's President Leonid Kuchma admits that his country is incapable of paying its share of the former USSR debt ($13.6 billion with annual servicing of $700-800 million) and indicates that Ukraine would have been better off had it joined the other republics in ceding its share of the debt to Russia in exchange for former Soviet assets abroad (the so-called “zero-option”). Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin insists that Ukraine pay its energy debt to Russia ($1.5 billion) and presents a plan to Kuchma that would transfer control of strategic Ukrainian energy facilities to Ukrainian-Russian joint-stock companies and joint energy ventures in exchange for partial debt relief.

12 · The collapse of the Russian ruble on 10 October sends economic shock waves throughout most former Soviet republics, where the relatively stable ruble (relative to the local currency) is considered almost a hard currency. In Moldova, Finance Minister Leonid Talmaci reports that companies dealing with Russia lost up to 40 percent of expected revenues as a result of “Black Tuesday.” In Uzbekistan, Azerbaijan, and Armenia the value of local currencies immediately plunges 20 percent, suggesting strong links to the ruble. In Georgia, Finance Minister David Yakobitze simply states “we are completely dependent on Russia as concerns this question.... The masses will suffer.”

Political

7 · The fiftieth anniversary of Ukraine’s liberation from Nazi forces provides the setting for talks between Chernomyrdin and Kuchma. The two discuss progress on the comprehensive bilateral treaty and the Black Sea Fleet negotiations.

· Belarusian President Lukashenka and Moldovan

President Snegur also attend the liberation commemoration and meet briefly with Kuchma. Afterward, Lukashenka says that should the next CIS summit fail (as the previous ones have) to address the major issues haunting the post-Soviet space, Belarus “will draw more attention to establishing bilateral relations.”

- A reorganization in Azerbaijan following an abortive coup attempt against President Aliev (on 5 October) continues with First Deputy Prime Minister Fuad Guliev named as interim prime minister, replacing Surat Huseinov, who was implicated as one of the coup plotters.

9 · Following several days of Russian-Iranian consultations concerning the recent oil deal between Azerbaijan and a Western consortium, Iran opposes the deal, “fearing a strengthening of Western influence in the Caspian region.” The Iranian delegation flies to Moscow for a meeting of Caspian littoral states to discuss future development of the Caspian basin.

- Russia circulates a document at the United Nations outlining its position on the Azeri oil project and future development of Caspian basin resources. The document reasserts Russia’s claim that any “unilateral steps” by Caspian states in developing maritime resources violates the Soviet-Iranian agreements of 1921 and 1940, which called for joint use of the sea’s resources by states bordering the sea. The document repeats the Russian position that the norms of international maritime law do not apply to the Caspian, and calls on Caspian littoral states to adopt new documents (prepared by Russia and Iran) updating the prewar agreements. The document concludes that Russia “reserves the right to take such measures as needed, at a suitable time, to restore the legal order and eliminate the consequences of unilateral steps .... All responsibility for possible material damage rests on those who take the unilateral steps.”

10 · Preliminary discussions in preparation for the CSCE meeting in Budapest illustrate a growing rift between Russia and most other members over security issues in the former Soviet Union. Russia continues to seek political and financial support for its peacekeeping operations in the “near abroad.” In addition, Russia’s proposals to renegotiate CFE flank sublimits in the Caucasus and northwestern Russia have drawn negative reaction from other CSCE states. Finally, Russia proposes at the last minute that the CSCE suspension of rump Yugoslavia be lifted. For its part, the CSCE has insisted that before Russian peacekeeping operations receive a mandate, CSCE monitors must be in place and specific time constraints be placed on the deployment of Russian troops. Additionally, CSCE officials insist political negotiations in CIS “hot spots” be placed solely under CSCE auspices and reject Russia’s undermining of the CSCE peace settlement in Nagorno-Karabakh.

· Despite acknowledgement that it is “clinically dead,” Russian officials submit a proposal for reorganizing the CSCE into a “pan-European security body” with a broadly defined “coordinating” role over regional associations such as NATO and the CIS. The United States and the EU reaffirm their opposition to the proposal. Germany, which holds the rotating EU presidency, counters that the CSCE should be used as the “first resort” in regional crisis management.

- Aliev imposes a sixty-day state of emergency in Ganje where supporters of the former prime minister reportedly tried to seize power. Baku radio reports names of nine other government ministers slated for sacking in the wake of the attempted coup. In addition, fifty-six officials of the National Security Ministry are also fired for alleged involvement in the events.

- Yuriy Ushakov, Russia's chief delegate to CSCE, says Russia would welcome the support, but not "supervision," of the CSCE for its peacekeeping operations. By support, Ushakov indicates that Russia seeks logistical, financial, and other "material" assistance for operations, in addition to CSCE support for Russian mediation efforts in these areas.

11 · The third round of Ukrainian-Russian negotiations on the draft Treaty on Friendship, Cooperation, and Partnership ends without resolution of two key sticking points: dual citizenship and inviolability of borders. Russia continues to insist that dual citizenship be available for Ukraine's 11 million-strong ethnic Russian minority as a means to improve their lives in Ukraine (no mention of dual citizenship for the 4-6 million Ukrainians living in Russia, however). On the border question, Ukrainian officials seek a "recognition" of state borders, while Russia is willing to concede mere "respect" for the present frontier.

- A conference of the Caspian littoral states opens in Moscow, with Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman Grigoriy Karasin calling for an agreement on a regional cooperation organization, modeled after the Caspian Sea Cooperation Council (created in February 1992).

- Kazakhstan's President Nursultan Nazarbaev requests resignation of his government, led by Prime Minister Sergey Tereshchenko, citing its inability to implement economic reform. Nazarbaev's request reverses an earlier pledge to give Tereshchenko until the end of 1995 to demonstrate substantial economic progress. Nazarbaev nominates (and the parliament subsequently confirms) Akezhan Kazhegeldin for the post of prime minister. Kazhegeldin, who was deputy prime minister in the Tereshchenko government, drafted the most recent economic reform program.

12 · Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev tells the Moscow conference of Caspian littoral states that he has spoken with Azeri President Aliev, who agrees that the Caspian is an asset to be shared by all littoral states.

- Azeri parliamentary speaker Rasul Guliev promises at least a one-month discussion of the ratification of the oil contract with the Western consortium.

13 · Two Russian newspaper articles seek to debunk the myth that all 25 million ethnic Russians in the “near abroad” are potential refugees. In Segodnya, ethnographer Vladimir Kozlov condemns “alarmist” trends in the Russian media concerning the refugee issue. According to Kozlov, nearly 70 percent of the current “Russian refugees” fled war-torn countries like Georgia or Tajikistan, while only 1.5 percent came from Estonia and Latvia, which are accused of institutional discrimination in the Russian press. Furthermore, Kozlov maintains that most refugees are highly educated, urbanized Russian-speakers capable of making significant contributions to Russia’s economic transition. In the other article, appearing in the Russian Obshchaya Gazeta, Andrey Fadin concludes that the plight of ethnic Russians in the “near abroad” is being used as an instrument, a “fifth column,” by the authorities to further their goal of restoring the empire.

- Azeri parliament votes to arrest former Prime Minister Huseinov on charges of treason. At the time of the decision, Huseinov’s whereabouts are unknown. The agriculture and security ministers are also placed under arrest.

18 · A meeting of heads of state of the Turkic-speaking countries (Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkey, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan) commences in Istanbul. The gathering focuses on strengthening and deepening economic and cultural integration of the Turkic-speaking world.

At the conclusion of the summit the following day, leaders sign a document calling for closer political, cultural, and economic cooperation. The heads of state also signal their support for plans to construct pipelines to transport oil and gas from Central Asia to Europe via Turkey. In the post-summit press conference, Turkey's President Demirel objects to the Russian Foreign Ministry's warning to participants not to engage in "pan-Turkic rhetoric."

19 · Belarus and Russia complete a draft Treaty on Friendship and Cooperation meant to prevent future misunderstandings and to deepen cultural and economic relations. Belarusian Deputy Foreign Minister Pyotr Byalyaeu stresses that the document does not diminish Belarusian sovereignty, stating that close ties to Russia strengthen Belarus.

20 · According to Dmytro Tabachnyk, head of Ukraine's presidential staff, Russia agrees to remove references to the dual citizenship question from the text of the Ukrainian-Russian friendship treaty. The issue of language regarding the inviolability of borders remains a key sticking point.

21 · The whereabouts of Azerbaijan's former prime minister, and current Enemy Number One, Surat Huseinov, remain a mystery even as he issues a statement to the international community asserting his innocence and accusing Aliiev of conducting a Soviet-like purge of his opponents. Huseinov claims Aliiev has appropriated money from the oil deal for his family's use.

Security

5 · Ukraine's President Kuchma submits a letter to parliament urging it to accede to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) before the treaty comes up for renewal next year. Presidential spokesman Mykhailo Doroshenko says the letter makes "good on his promise to the international community ... that Ukraine should join the NPT." Ukraine's foreign minister, Gennadiy Udovenko, says Ukraine still wants "guarantees of national security," but indicates that Kiev would not link NPT accession to such guarantees.

6 · The dire financial straits of the Russian army are highlighted when several Russian oil companies refuse to supply fuel to the army due to unpaid bills. Russian Defense Minister Grachev informs the Cabinet that only 38 percent of the year's defense budget has been dispersed; barely enough to cover salaries, Interfax reports. Grachev says the army's debt for weapons, food, and other supplies exceeds $1 billion, a fifth of which is owed for energy supplies alone.

7 · Russian and Belarusian border guard commanders sign a protocol on expanding bilateral cooperation on border defense. Under protocol, the two states agree to “coordinate actions” of the border troops on Russia's and Belarus's borders with Ukraine. The two sides also agree to develop by 30 October a concept for a “single regime for the defense of Russia's and Belarus's borders with” Poland, Latvia, and Lithuania.

11 · Following meetings with Russian Federation Council speaker Vladimir Shumeyko, Armenian President Levon Ter- Petrosyan announces that an agreement on the status of Russian military bases in Armenia will be signed soon in Moscow. For his part Shumeyko characterizes Russia's relations with Armenia as “closer than with any other CIS country.” The two states “have practically the same view” on the future development of the CIS and on bilateral economic, trade, and military relations. Earlier in the visit, Shumeyko pledges 110 billion rubles in credits as the first tranche of a comprehensive aid package to Armenia. Sixty billion rubles is earmarked for reconstruction of Armenia's idle nuclear power station. Shumeyko, however, denies that a Russian- Armenian confederation has developed.

· The IMF agrees to extend Armenia a $500 million loan on the condition that the Armenian government implement tough economic reform measures. Previously, the IMF refused to grant credit to Armenia, claiming that the funds could be used to purchase arms for the Karabakh conflict.

15 · A Russian Defense Ministry source informs Interfax that lack of funds for weapons disposal could lead to serious accidents in Russia. For example, eighty-five decommissioned nuclear submarines remain at their bases because there is no money to dismantle them. According to the source, the Finance Ministry “owes” the military 9 trillion rubles.

16 · Ukraine’s Deputy Foreign Minister Boris Tarasyuk says his country’s accession to NPT still depends on security guarantees from other nuclear powers.

17 · The draft proposal for CIS Collective Security is removed from the upcoming CIS summit agenda, at Russian request. The draft security framework was initialed on 20 June by eight of nine CIS signatory countries to the CIS Collective Security Treaty. Ukraine, which is not party to CST, continues to object to tightened military cooperation among CIS states.

19 · Russian Defense Minister Grachev announces that Russia will dispatch a squadron of fighter aircraft to Armenia to provide air defense for Armenia and to protect Russian troops stationed there.

November 1994

Economic

8 · At talks between Turkmen and Ukrainian presidents, Turkmenistan gives Ukraine a seven-year deferral in payment of the $700 million debt for gas. This sum is to be transformed into a credit at 8 percent annually.

10 · Kazakhstan and Russia agree to establish an interstate industrial finance consortium (Sotrudnichestvo) on a parity basis.

12 · Ukraine and Uzbekistan sign the Declaration on the Main Trends in Economic Cooperation, Agreement on Avoiding Double Taxation of Incomes and Property, Agreement on the Trade and Economic Cooperation for the Year 1995. Uzbek President Islam Karimov says that he is in favor of intensifying economic ties within CIS, but against the creation of single parliament and government of the CIS and against the Eurasian Union. Leonid Kuchma supports his view.

15 · A contract between the Western consortium and the Azeri State Oil company last September on joint development of three Caspian oil deposits is ratified by the Azeri parliament. The document provokes a negative reaction from the Russian Foreign Ministry, which refuses to recognize the agreement provisions. RF Foreign Ministry spokesman Grigoriy Karasin threatens political consequences if the 1921 and 1940 Soviet-Iranian treaties are ignored. Baku observers note a possible Russian-Iranian alliance to protect Transcaucasian geopolitical interests.

16 · Russia cuts the gas supply to Belarus by 50 percent due to the republic's failure to repay debts to Gazprom. Vladimir Kurenkov, Belarus's gas industry minister, says the reduced gas shipment could prove truly disastrous for industry.

18 · Gazprom resumes full-scale natural gas supplies to Belarus, after Belarus pledges regular payments.

19 · Russian state oil company, Rosneft, agrees to exchange oil with Kazakhstan oil company to keep refineries of both countries fully occupied. Russia will supply hydrocarbon raw materials to Chimkent and Pavlodar plants and Kazakhstan will supply the Samara plant as was done during the USSR period. Annually each side will supply around 4 million tons of oil.

The possible cooperation is not limited to this. The Russians expressed an interest in buying Kazakh coal, corn, and non-ferrous metals. Rosneft can pay for these goods in oil and petroleum products. This proposal will arouse the interest of the Kazakh side. Rosneft is also looking for a new market in Kazakhstan which is less saturated than the Russian market. The company intends to sell about 4 million tons of various petroleum products in Kazakhstan annually. The Russian oil industry workers who have free technical and personnel resources also offered the Kazakh side their assistance in the capital repair of oil wells and in the exploitation of one to two oil deposits. Kazakhstan is ready to propose that the Russians participate in joint oil prospecting on the Caspian Sea shelf.

Political

1 · Moldova, like other CIS states, is not ready to accept the political integration concepts of the Eurasian Union project proposed by Kazakhstan's President Nursultan Nazarbaev, says Moldova's permanent envoy to the CIS, Jacob Mogoryanu. He says "this option could be of tragic consequence under present conditions, when most CIS countries are forming their own statehood and democratic institutions."

3 · The Supreme Council of Crimea debates the situation after the Supreme Council of Ukraine's resolution "On the political and legal position of the Crimean Autonomous Republic" of 22 October is passed. The Crimean Supreme Council Presidium proposes to return to the September 1992 constitution. Parliament Chairman Sergey Tsekov believes that the main problem in relations between Crimea and Ukraine is Ukraine's unitary structure which, in his view, gives rise to an abnormal situation in which Crimea's parliament must follow Ukraine and change the peninsula's constitution for the fourth time in two and a half years. Tsekov believes that "the key to settling problems between Ukraine and Russia is in Simferopol,” hoping that Kiev will renounce its policy of ultimatums and threat.

Deputy Anushevan Danelyan feels that any resolution should be coordinated with a Ukrainian delegation. He proposes to continue the process of negotiation.

- Crimea’s Russia-Unity group puts forward a motion to hold a Crimea-wide referendum to determine whether the Crimean constitution should be brought into line with that of Ukraine.

5 · According to the Ukrainian Military Department chief, Moscow’s stance at the bilateral negotiations on the Black Sea Fleet remains rather tough. According to the official, neither president will agree to radical concessions in the near future, because “such steps could be suicidal for both Kuchma and Yeltsin.”

- Crimean Supreme Soviet Presidium adopts an appeal to the presidium and parliament of Ukraine expressing its inability to eliminate contradictions between the constitutions of Ukraine and Crimea because of the exceptionally difficult political and socio-economic situation in Crimea. Deputies include in the appeal a call for wisdom, restraint, and political perspicacity and ask Ukraine to refrain from taking any radical measures to resolve the problem.

- Andrey Senchenko, deputy prime minister of Crimea, points out that “The only justification for Crimea’s statehood is its desire to reform its economy.”

16 · Ukrainian parliament ratifies the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, with reservation.

24 · According to a top-ranking official from the Russian Foreign Ministry, Russia, the United States, and Great Britain will grant security guarantees to Ukraine only if ratification documents on Ukraine's joining the NPT do not contain "reservations or ambiguities." Ukraine's Supreme Soviet resolution on joining the NPT gives rise to many questions. It is not clear in what status, as a non-nuclear or as a kind of semi-nuclear power, Ukraine will join the NPT. Russia will not be satisfied with Ukraine's "semi-nuclear" status.

25 · Kazakhstan's Foreign Minister Kasymzhomat Tokaev says that dual citizenship in Kazakhstan may be a serious source of instability and entail heavy consequences.

Security

2 · The Tajiks, Uzbeks, and Russians sign agreement on strengthening the southern borders of the CIS. The border along the Pyanj and Amu Darya rivers will be strengthened, not only by the border guard but also by the river navy. This should decrease the border provocations and prevent the smuggling of narcotics and weapons.

12 · Following meetings with the visiting head of the Russian Border Guard Service, Azeri officials agree to a bilateral treaty with Russia on border protection and enforcement, including cooperation in immigration and customs.

17 · The council of border troop commanders of CIS members agree jointly to defend CIS external borders. Thus a single system of defending CIS external borders is created. Ukraine does not sign the agreement, because it is not a full member of the Council, taking part in it only as an observer.

December 1994

Economic

1 · The CIS Intergovernmental Council sets up an operating working group on the agro-industrial sector and an intergovernmental science and technology center, as a move to promote economic cooperation among the CIS states.

2 · Turkmenistan reaches an agreement with Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia, according to which it will sell gas to these states in 1995. Natural gas is Turkmenistan's main source of income.

7 · Moldovan government begins to restore economic ties within the CIS. Three joint economic commissions—Moldovan-Russian, Moldovan-Ukrainian, and Moldovan-Belarusia—have been set up in order to strengthen the integration process. Moldova intends to set up a joint venture with Russia to service the main gas pipeline along which “Rosgaz” exports gas to Romania, Bulgaria, and Turkey. According to the government, Moldova “gets 95 percent of its energy sources from CIS countries—mainly Russia ... [and] 70 percent of Moldovan output is exported eastward as well.” Moldova is aware that it is more advantageous to restore its lost positions in the Eastern market than to work its fingers to the bone to make a breakthrough into the Western market. Consequently, while striving to raise Western loans, the republic is looking Eastward with hope.

9 · Viktor Chernomyrdin, addressing the meeting of the Council of CIS Heads of Government in Moscow, announces that Russia will be forced to introduce the principle of advance payment in trade and economic agreements and contracts for the supply of commodities. Financial penalties for failure to pay on time will become a mandatory condition of such agreements. He says that Russia has gone as far as it can and cannot make any further concessions. This is the umpteenth time that the question of the debts owed to the Russian fuel and energy sector by CIS countries has been brought up. On 1 November 1994, these debts amounted to 7.5 billion rubles, with almost 6.6 billion rubles of the total for gas. Since establishment of the CIS, the Russian government has granted state credits to those countries worth $5.6 billion, in order to make it easier for partners to adjust to the new conditions of economic cooperation. Credits, however, have only exacerbated the debt situation. The settlement of these debts is proceeding extremely unsatisfactorily.

16 · Kazakh Prime Minister Akezhan Kazhegeldin meets with the chairman of the State Committee of Kazakhstan, Sarybay Kalmurzaev, in Moscow to consult on Kazakhstan's plans for privatizing several of its defense enterprises, including the Khimvolokno Association in Qostanay, the enterprise in Stepnyak in Qoqshetau oblast, the Stepnogorsk plant in Aqmoly oblast, and many others. Russian officials have indicated their willingness to discuss the list through diplomatic channels. The Russian State Property Committee will recommend investors after "the appropriate appraisals have been made." During meetings between the State Property Committees of Russia and Kazakhstan, an agreement is reached to exchange documents on the practice and main problems of privatization in the two countries.

· Addressing the nature of economic reform in each state, Kazakh Prime Minister Kazhegeldin observes: "We were out of synch in implementation of economic reforms. This is the only reason, I believe, that prompted Russia to push its former allies out of the ruble zone." In Kazhegeldin's opinion, the Kazakh model of economic reform is in principle no different from the Russian model-but lacks the law on private ownership of land, with only an edict permitting the purchase, transfer, or mortgage of a plot of land for farm centers or plants. The legal basis of this edict needs to be adjusted, and this needs to be done quickly, because people are afraid of waiting. He continues, “Although the Russian government failed last fall to refrain from certain steps that led in October to madness on the currency market, we need, on the whole, to catch up with Russia and this will, perhaps, facilitate our task of reform of the economy—the use of Russia’s example.”

20 · Russian and Ukrainian representatives of the “Interstate Euro-Asiatic Coal and Metal Association” meet in Donetsk to discuss pricing of railroad services to the coal and metal industries of the two countries. It is disclosed at the meeting that a 1-ruble increase in the price of a unit of raw material increases the price of a consumer good by 4-6 rubles. Therefore, there is concern by CIS companies about the monopolist position of the Russian Railway Ministry, and concern by the Railway Ministry about non-payment for rail service. Many CIS countries have common problems in this area. A decision is adopted at the meeting to send the problem of railway tariffs and payments for coal and metal transport to the CIS Interstate Economic Committee (which was formed in October 1994) for resolution.

1 · Supreme Council of Crimea adopts an appeal to the State Duma of the Russian Federation and Russia’s Federation Council, noting that they should guarantee Crimea’s statehood.

5 · An agreement on percentage staff of the CSCE peacekeeping forces on CIS territory is adopted by the heads of the CSCE member states. Russian forces are to make up 30 percent of total forces.

8 · An intergovernmental Russia-Crimea protocol is signed on trade and economic cooperation in 1995; it does not include Russia's obligations for delivering Russian goods to Crimea. The situation for Crimea could change for the better if Sevastopol becomes Russia's naval base. Whether the Russian navy will receive the whole of Sevastopol as a naval base or only its harbor depends on political decisions in Kiev and Moscow.

9 · Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, outlining priority directions in the economic development of CIS countries, says an agreement on the creation of a free trade zone in the CIS and the implementation of joint investment programs should be given priority in CIS activities. Ivan

Korotchenya, executive secretary of the CIS council, says that the future of CIS depends on the Interstate Economic Committee. The summit of CIS Heads of Government meeting in Moscow approves twenty documents predominantly connected with the creation of an economic union. Ukraine refuses to sign agreements on military affairs because it is not a member of the CIS Defense Council. Ukraine signs a document on the CIS accident and disaster quick response corps. Under the agreement, the force will incorporate national accident relief subunits subordinated to a single intergovernmental command which will be on call to fly to emergency areas.

- Russia and Ukraine conclude an agreement on the “zero option,” regarding the division of the former USSR’s assets and liabilities. Russia will retain all the assets and in return it will pay the interest charges on the Ukrainian share of the former USSR’s debts to foreign creditors.

14 · Andrey Kortunov, head of Russia’s Academy of Sciences Department of Foreign Policy of the United States, predicts that electoral victory for the U.S. Republican Party will worsen U.S.-Russian relations. He complains that more Republicans see Russia’s foreign policy as a manifestation of neo-imperialism and an aspiration to revive the Soviet Union in some oblique form. In addressing Russia’s policies toward the “near abroad,” he writes:

“This does not mean, of course, that Russian policy does not at the level of specific foreign policy actions in particular regions suffer from neo-imperial ambitions. I would like to add, in addition, that with respect to its so-called near abroad, our problem is further exacerbated by the fact that each department has its own 'policy.' Mr. Kozyrev has 'his,' which does not coincide entirely with the policy of Chernomyrdin. We saw this for ourselves when the treaty with Azerbaijan was signed; Mr. Grachev has 'his,' which, in turn, differs appreciably from the policy of Mr. Lebed. And so forth. Speaking of some unified strategy is out of the question. And this, of course, is causing perfectly justified concern both in the CIS and beyond. America included."

1 · In Moscow during the meeting of the Council of CIS Defense Ministers, Pavel Grachev explains the issue of the increasing the powers of the commander of the CIS collective peacekeeping forces in Tajikistan. The main purpose of additional powers is that if an emergency situation arises in a particular section in Tajikistan, Lt.-Gen. Valeriy Patrikeev may decide autonomously to use peacekeeping forces and then submit a report to the defense ministers of the states whose peacekeeping forces are used. The second objective is to introduce organizational and manning level changes to the management structure of the peacekeeping forces and to allow the commander to recommend the appointment or dismissal of officers and generals. The ministers support the proposal.

· Grachev calls the meeting one of the most productive and points to the increasing military and technical integration among CIS states. Speaking on the peacekeeping operation in the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict area, he says that all participants of the meeting express their intention to assist in its implementation. He says Ukraine does not rule out the possibility of sending its peacekeeping unit to the conflict area, as well.

5 · Ukraine signs the NPT in exchange for guarantees on its security from the United States, Russia, and Britain. Under the assurances, the parties recognize the territorial integrity of Ukraine and the nuclear parties commit not to attack a non-nuclear state.

5 · Evgeniy Marchuk, Ukrainian deputy prime minister, announces that Russia and Ukraine want to conclude a political treaty, containing more than twenty agreements on cooperation in various fields. Marchuk emphasizes the weakness of Ukraine's position in the treaty talks, given its debt to Russia of more than $5 billion.

8 · Yuriy Yarov, Russian deputy prime minister, is appointed chairman of the Collegium of the CIS Interstate Economic Committee by CIS presidents.

9 · Since May 1994, a group of twenty Russian banking experts from major Russian banks has been working with the Russian "Ministry for Cooperation with Member States of the CIS" (MCMS) to design a blueprint for a common accounting system. In October 1994 an Agreement on Creation of a Payments Union was adopted. According to the evolving blueprint, the Payments Union will consist of a set of rules instead of an organization, which will define the mutual convertibility of national currencies. The rules will adhere to the model Belarus/Russian bilateral agreement, entitled: “On Measures to Guarantee Mutual Convertibility and the Stabilization of the Exchange Rate of the Russian Ruble and the Belarusian Ruble.”

· According to Adrian Budyanu, chief of the Russian Ministry for Cooperation with Member States of the CIS, Russia is now owed about R8 trillion by the other CIS member states. Much of this is energy debt. Russia proposes partial payment in property shares belonging to the indebted enterprises.

10 · Uzbekistan takes a leap forward in its reform plans for 1995. Pravda Vostoka outlines a new mandate from the state committee for managing state property and supporting enterprise. The priorities for the new year will be:

1. Moving the center of gravity for implementing privatization to the territorial branches of the State Property Committee.
2. Demonopolizing existing management structures.
3. Denationalizing the mining, fuel, and energy complex and cotton processing industry.
4. Faster privatizing of large enterprises.
5. Changing priorities to denationalization, transferring property to private ownership, regardless of the sphere of activity and area of industry the enterprise is in.
6. Encouraging foreign investment. There are already more than 1,300 joint-stock ventures registered in Uzbekistan. Among them are such well-known firms as Newmont, Coca-Cola, Pepsi-Cola, Rank Xerox, Mercedes Benz, Daewoo, Bursel, and Buller.

11 · The 19-25 December (1994) issue of Delovoy Mir summarizes a report issued by the newly formed (1994)“Institute of Economic Analysis,” whose board is represented by well-known Russians including Abel Aganbegyan, Aleksandr Granberg, Stanislav Shatalin, Egor Gaydar, and Boris Fedorov, and foreigners Richard Layard, Anders Aslund, and Jeffrey Sacks. The report analyzes Russia’s 1994 economic policies, concluding that it was a “lost year.” Contrary to Viktor Chernomyrdin’s beginning-of-the-year commitment to “combat inflation through nonmonetary methods,” and “not to allow shock therapy in the future,” the prime minister drastically reversed course in October (following the “Black Tuesday” collapse of the Russian ruble)-instituting a new shock “therapy” based on monetary principles.

- The 19-25 December(1994) issue of Delovoy Mir also contains an analysis of the economic impact of migrant workers entering and leaving the Russian Federation. The article concludes that between 1995 and 2000 an approximate parity will be reached between incoming migrants from the “far” and “near” abroad. Workers entering Russia from the “far abroad” (non-CIS) are led by the Chinese, followed by Turks, Bulgarians, North Koreans, Macedonians, and Germans. Their numbers are expected to make up 40 percent of the workers entering Russia between now and the year 2000, with the CIS accounting for the remaining 60 percent. The article predicts that the number of illegal immigrant workers will grow, due in part to what it calls “super-liberal migration legislation” in Russia’s near abroad. The report estimates there were 1.63 million illegal immigrant workers in Russia by mid-1994, concentrated within major cities and the Far Eastern region of the Russian Federation. The future, the article concludes, will depend on migration legislation which is currently being formulated, alluding to possible Russian intervention on CIS border policies.

4 · Writing in Rotterdam's Algemeen Dagblad, Kazakh President Nazarbaev views the Eurasian Union as a "partnership among equal, independent states that must defend the national interests of individual member states." Nazarbaev believes his plan for a Eurasian Union will succeed after general agreement with its principles at the October 1994 Heads of State summit. He supports the CIS, but says it has no means to implement its decisions and agreements. Nazarbaev adamantly supports supranational bodies, saying they form the crux of his Eurasian Union proposal.

10 · Uzbek advisor to the Russian Foreign Ministry speaks of the Uzbek notion of creating a "greater Uzbekistan." He says the idea, bandied about by Central Asian politicians, "does not reflect real tendencies of the Central Asian region" and even the Uzbek "leadership does not share the idea." Competition among the prospective countries-Turkey, Azerbaijan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and Kyrgyzstan-over land and water resources, export markets, and foreign investments, in the expert's opinion, will continue to divide the Turkic community, preventing unity, at least for now.

11 · Prime Minister Aleksey Bolshakov indicates that Kazakhstan may join the Customs and Payments Union among Slavic states. Kazakhstan had sought to forge closer links with Turkey but, while not abandoning such links, does not feel this course will ultimately succeed.

13 · The CIS Interparliamentary Assembly adopts a declaration on self-government, which is supposed to ensure local democratic control by citizens over their own affairs. (In other East European governments self-government has referred to government control through appointed, subsidized membership organizations in the private sector.

14 · Talbak Nazarov, Tajik foreign minister, says Tajikistan's foreign policy will focus on Russia, Uzbekistan, and the CIS. Nazarov believes strengthening ties with these countries will aid with reconstruction following the civil war.

18 · Konstantin Zatulin, chairman of Russia's State Committee for Relations with CIS Member States, says that since

Russia's invasion of Chechnya, certain CIS members have tried to distance themselves from Russia, complicating integration prospects. According to Zatulin, "One can speak of integration seriously only with reference to Belarus."

23 · Kazakh President Nazarbaev previews the upcoming CIS Heads of State summit scheduled for mid-February in Alma-Ata. He says closer integration among CIS members is "imminent." He speaks of increased ties among Russia, Belarus, and Kazakhstan-forged as a result of the new customs union, and how this union will serve as a model for CIS members. Nazarbaev argues that bilateral CIS agreements will grow into multilateral structures. He notes that the February summit participants will consider a draft Peace and Accord Act, something that "would be a blessing for all peoples in the post-Soviet area."

28 · CIS Executive Secretary Ivan Korotchenya, writing in Rossiyskaya Gazeta, points to recent progress in laying the groundwork for long-term CIS integration. He praises the development of the Economic Union Treaty, which provides for various levels of membership, and notes that most of the committees associated with the Union are ready to function. He doggedly expresses optimism for the survival of the CIS.

1 · The chief of the Main Department on Military Budget and Financing, Col.-Gen. Vasilii Vorobev, announces that the defense budget of 44 trillion rubles proposed for 1995 fails to meet even the minimum needs of the Russian army and fleet.

6 · President Yeltsin sends New Year's greetings to servicemen in Chechnya: "I know how important it is to know that you are remembered and believed and people's hopes are vested in you when you are so far away from home, performing a responsible and dangerous combat duty." He goes on to say that "your relatives and friends will live in a more tranquil and safer country thanks to your heroic military labor. ... I am convinced that the people of Chechnya will understand the importance of what you are doing in the name of preserving the homeland, the united and indivisible Russia."

7 · Interfax reports that the Russian defense complex suffers from a decrease in production, which has seriously undermined defense capabilities. Cuts in allocations for research and design and for the purchase of arms and military equipment have led to cancellation of the production of 175 types of military equipment. The country's defense complex will soon be incapable of building new generations of arms.

· If the space industry declines any further, Interfax reports, all defense programs in space for 1996-97 will be canceled. The share of modern weapons in Russia's armed forces could fall to 10 percent by the year 2000, compared with 60-70 percent in the armies of industrialized Western countries.

10 · In a letter to Belarusian President Aleksandr Lukashenka, Russian President Yeltsin expresses a wish for greater cooperation between their two countries. Belarus has agreed to lease two military bases-the phased-array ballistic-missile early warning radar under construction at Baranavichy and the Russian submarine communications center in Vileika, near Minsk-to Russia for twenty-five years for a nominal sum covering the maintenance of the bases. In return, Belarus will be given free access to the military information Russia will collect at Baranavichy and to Russian air defense missile ranges.

2 · The Crimean Supreme Council urges Ukraine to join the Russian/Belarus Customs Union, believing such a move would raise prospects for both Ukraine and Crimea to emerge from their economic crises. In a statement issued by the Supreme Council, it is argued a Customs Union will “restore the severed links, and remove the artificial barriers between the republics.”

7 · In Ukraine, the director of the Foreign Ministry department for CIS problems, Aleksandr Danilchenko, says Ukraine favors CIS integration. In a press interview, he forecasts that the upcoming Heads of State meeting will consider forming a scientific information union, something President Kuchma has been pushing for. This indicates, says Danilchenko, “that the CIS leaders want to design mechanisms to activate cooperation within the CIS.” He did note, however, that increased ties should proceed horizontally and that Russia remains a priority for Ukraine.

· After several months of tense relations, Russian First Deputy Prime Minister Oleg Soskovets says, “Ukrainian- Russian relations have become civilized, and it is now possible to expand and consolidate economic and political ties between the two states.” A Russian delegation is now in Ukraine seeking to resolve outstanding issues; Black Sea Fleet issues, payment of debts, and energy deliveries are a few. Soskovets and his Ukrainian counterpart, Evgeniy Marchuk, both speak of positive developments in their relations and tell journalists that a number of documents are near completion that would resolve some of these contentious issues.

· Moldova’s Prime Minister Andrey Sangheli clarifies that his government is “vitally interested in the Economic Union ... working at full capacity.” Sangheli says both he and Moldovan President Snegur agree that measures to increase and make more efficient economic activity among the republics are needed and it is right that this topic be a high priority on the 10 February summit agenda.

8 · Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev denies allegations that Russian policy is geared toward “swallowing up” Belarus. He says the large, interstate treaty promoting integration between the two “has nothing to do with imperial policy” and indicated Russia would like to see relations with Ukraine develop similar to those of Russia and Belarus.

- Soskovets and Marchuk initial a friendship, cooperation, and partnership treaty in Kiev. Other documents are signed relating to the Black Sea Fleet base, which will be in Sevastopol, and on deliveries of military hardware.

9 · In an appeal to President Kuchma, the Council of Democratic Parties of Ukraine urges the republic’s withdrawal from the CIS. The appeal notes that the CIS is “acquiring an ever more immoral character and threatening Ukrainian sovereignty.” The Council particularly criticizes the events in Chechnya as grounds for Ukraine’s leaving the Commonwealth.

- Central Asian political analyst Kenes Akhmetov addresses the issues of Central Asian integration, concluding that a Central Asian Union as an alternative to the CIS is “impossible.” Akhmetov argues that, despite the joint declaration in Istanbul of five “Turkic” leaders indicating their intentions to form a “pan-Turkic” union, developments in the region and the economic realities of the individual republics show that such a desire is “more than anything else, an object of theoretical analysis.” The critical factor is Russia. Akhmetov argues that Russia is the region’s only security guarantor given the “threats of religious fundamentalism, tribalism, and the military and economic expansion of China.” Furthermore, as trade statistics show, none of the republics could survive without strong ties to the Russian economy. Kazakhstan also poses difficulties as it increasingly has shown its desire to augment, at a minimum, trade relations with Iran and China, creating competition in its markets with Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan. For these reasons, Akhmetov believes “pan-Turkic” integration is a long way from reality.

10 · The CIS Heads of State summit opens in Alma-Ata. In his opening remarks, Yeltsin expresses dissatisfaction with developments in 1994. In a tone suggesting Russia’s frustration with the non-implementation of agreements, Yeltsin says, “I deem it necessary to state most frankly that the results of the past year were unsatisfactory. We have agreements on cooperation but they are not being implemented.” Yeltsin argues that there is no alternative “to a policy of integration and consolidation of the CIS.” His chairmanship of the Council of CIS Heads of State is extended for another year, as Azeri President Aliiev’s candidacy is rejected due to the war in Nagorno-Karabakh.

· The summit produces ten documents. Of major significance is a memorandum “On the Maintenance of Peace and Stability in the Commonwealth of Independent States,” pledging that the republics will not use political, economic, or military pressure on other CIS members to achieve foreign or domestic goals.

11 · Belarusian President Lukashenko, acknowledging the achievement of major goals, nevertheless expresses pessimism about ever implementing the agreements concluded. “I am not quite assured that these documents will be implemented, because all of them were signed either with reservations or with some other considerations,” he warns.

· Russia’s State Duma Committee on CIS Affairs argues that the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly needs reform. Committee chairman Zatulin notes that the numerical composition of the body gives some republics the advantage over others. Zatulin points to the European parliament as an example the IPA may follow to ensure objectivity and fairness in debating resolutions and in adopting CIS-wide decisions.

13 · In Moldova, Foreign Minister Mikhail Popov reveals that the central thesis of Moldovan foreign policy is the development of bilateral relations with CIS countries, in particular Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus. Popov indicates that active cooperation with these countries offers Chisinau the best hopes of emerging from the present economic crisis. Of great importance also, notes Popov, is developing its relations with Romania, the United States, Germany, France, Britain, Italy, and Canada. Engaging in multilateral, international institutions, while a separate concept, is also a priority in Moldova’s diplomacy.

· Armenian President Ter-Petrosyan comments on the Alma-Ata summit. He criticizes the peace and stability memorandum, which, in his view, conflicts seriously “with the norms of international law, particularly as regards human rights and the rights of national minorities.”

14 · Vladimir Shumeyko is reelected IPA chairman, having received unanimous support at a closed door session in St. Petersburg. Shumeyko comments on IPA development. He says the body has now been recognized as an interstate cooperative body. In this regard, Shumeyko places the IPA on equal footing with the Council of CIS Heads of State and the Council of CIS Heads of Government. Shumeyko believes the next stage for the IPA will be to transform the body into a parliamentary rather than interparliamentary assembly, thus giving it more authority to make binding decisions. Eventually, he argues, the CIS will see an independent parliament with representatives elected along the lines of the European parliament.

15 · Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, and Uzbekistan form an Interstate Council to continue integration trends among their republics.

16 · Belarusian Supreme Soviet chairman Myacheslav Hryb believes the proposals by Shumeyko to expand the powers of the IPA are “ill-timed.” Hryb says the body should not be turned into a “supranational representative body of the Commonwealth similar to the USSR Supreme Soviet.”

21 · Yeltsin and a Russian delegation arrive in Minsk for talks. Yeltsin and Belarusian President Lukashenka sign a treaty on friendship, good-neighborliness, and cooperation and other agreements on the joint Customs Union and on joint protection of borders. In a joint news conference, the two presidents speak of their relationship as a model worthy of emulation. One political observer notes that the “Slav brothers are showing other partners in the CIS quite a realistic model of two countries’ cooperative integration.”

22 · In an interview with the German radio station Deutsche Welle, Lukashenka says Belarus will not seek NATO membership but will continue to remain under the political influence of Russia.

23 · Officials of five agrarian parties from Russia, Ukraine, Moldova, and Armenia meet in Moscow to discuss restoring ties. Ukrainian Agrarian Party Chairman Sergey Dovgan emphasizes that if a referendum on the attitude to the USSR were held in the CIS countries today, it would produce the same results as on 17 March 1991, when the overwhelming majority of the voters favored retaining the Union.

25 · Nazarbaev predicts a Eurasian Union by the year 2000, by which he means a new version of the Soviet Union. Formation of the new Union will start with an Economic and Customs Union and plans to settle citizenship and language questions.

27 · Agreement is struck between the State Duma's LDPR (Liberal-Democratic Party of Russia) faction (whose leader is V. Zhirinovskiy) and the Crimean Supreme Soviet. The parties claim they will combine efforts to work out and implement joint political programs that will draw Crimea closer to Russia.

1 · Addressing a veterans group in the House of Officers, Belarusian President Lukashenka says military security is "one of the most important sectors of our state system." While noting the republic's efforts to constitutionally make Belarus a non-nuclear state and assume a neutral state status, he highlights the difficulties of these goals given the geopolitics of the region.

· Improved relations with Russia have made Georgia's population more receptive to Russian troops in the Transcaucasus, says a joint statement by the Georgian Procurator's Office, the Security Service, the Ministry of Defense, and the Ministry of Internal Affairs. Despite terrorist acts carried out in Georgia and abroad by destructive forces in the republic that do not want to see improved Georgia-Russian relations, the report says, Russian servicemen and the Georgian people should "not yield to provocations."

9 · Armenians oppose the CIS peace pact and will not sign the document in Alma-Ata if their remarks are not taken into account. Foreign Minister Vagan Papazyan says the document ignores human rights principles and the right of national self-determination.

14 · During the Alma-Ata summit Ukraine adopts the rigid stance that protection of external borders means former Soviet borders. Azeri Foreign Minister Hasanov objects that using such a definition, Azerbaijan would lack a mechanism for safeguarding its frontiers with Armenia. Hasanov confirms Azerbaijan's intention to press for amendments to the CIS Treaty on Collective Security.

17 · Colonel-General Viktor Prudnikov will assume command of the CIS allied air defense system. The joint system is agreed to by CIS members (excluding Moldova and Azerbaijan) at the Alma-Ata summit. Prudnikov tells journalists that the air defense force will concentrate on air surveillance and exchange of information. He stresses that the agreement excludes anti-aircraft rocket launchers and fighter jets from the joint force, and makes clear that the agreement is strictly circumscribed to broad cooperation. Most CIS states will be supplied the hardware necessary to implement the agreement through bilateral agreements with Russia.

21 · Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev indicates that it is too early to speak of a "coalition" of armed forces with Belarus, but does not reject the idea in principle. He stipulates that "well-equipped and modern troops are needed to create joint armed forces and that therefore the time has not come for such a military coalition.” He confirms that the Belarusian early warning facilities in Baranovichy and Veleika will be under Russian jurisdiction.

23 · CIS land forces Commander Semenov says that a joint CIS or Eurasian Union armed forces will eventually be set up. He reiterates that both a Commonwealth defense area and a Commonwealth economic area are vital needs, arguing that the CIS member states must adopt the same defense strategy, tactics, and structure. Semenov asserts that joint peacekeeping forces will significantly contribute to military integration, but that Russia is a lone figure in carrying out peace missions at this time. He doubts that a truly joint CIS air defense system will be set up any time soon, mainly because “everything is in shambles” in Transcaucasia where the air defense force used to be stationed. Tremendous expenditure will be needed to restore the system, he says.

· A joint Russian/Belarusian draft agreement containing thirty clauses-one of which elaborates a customs union, another of which establishes joint financial and production groups-is ratified by the Belarusian parliament. In a somewhat defensive statement to his Cabinet of Ministers, President Lukashenka says: “The constitution is not being violated today in any respect. It would be good if we had a chance in these difficult times to work more or less evenly and to move the economy. This is what concerns me most of all.”

28 · Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev says: “Russia will have no professional Army under current economic conditions. It is necessary to raise the salaries of contractual servicemen by five to seven times in order to have professional troops.” He uses events in Chechnya to illustrate that servicemen “cannot show their worth,” and urges the revival of the army and more attention to the armed forces on the part of society and all power structures. “The army is sick,” he says, “and must be cured by common efforts.”

Economic

2 · Financial expert for Moscow’s Finansovye Izvestiya Evgeniy Vasilchuk warns of CIS disintegration should the economic crisis throughout the region continue. He attributes the economic crisis to the “absence of an effective mechanism [for] multilateral cooperation.” Despite plans to create an economic union, Vasilchuk says economic integration of the CIS as a whole is prevented by the following factors:

1. The Interstate Economic Committee and the joint official accounting-payment institutes are not in full operation.
2. Certain Commonwealth states block the unified conception and organization for protection of the Commonwealth boundaries, hindering efforts to create an effective customs union.
3. Western refusal to help Russia regain the lead role in post-Soviet geopolitical/geoeconomic space, giving rise to nationalistic forces destructive to integration.

Vasilchuk believes that “the indecisiveness of politicians and their disregard for the strategic benefits of multilateral economic cooperation threatens the Commonwealth with historical non-existence.”

16 · The Turkmen company Turkmenelektro says it may resume delivery of oil supplies to Ukraine in exchange for manufactured goods. Kiev still owes Ashkhabad over $1 billion for previous gas and oil deliveries.

· A draft copy of a report entitled “Guidelines for International Economic Activity” prepared by the Ukrainian Ministry of Foreign Economic Activity gives cooperation with CIS and Baltic countries top priority. Enhancing relations with the European Union is priority number two, with a goal to achieve associated member status in the organization within the next six years. Other notable aspects of the draft include:

- increased investment in mining industries within the CIS;
- creation of international/multinational corporations;
- increased bilateral relations in regions within Russian Federation;
- continued participation in CIS economic structure.

20 · In Tajikistan, businessmen call for accelerating integration programs within the CIS and for building an economic union of CIS countries. Appealing to CIS heads of state, prime ministers, and parliaments, the business groups believe the new political situation “holds out a hope for equitable and comprehensive cooperation” between Tajikistan and CIS countries.

27 · The World Bank considers four separate loans totaling $150 million to Azerbaijan. Sixty-five million dollars is to redress balance of payments problems; $45 million to modernize Baku’s water supply system; $20 million to develop market infrastructure; and $20 million to update the oil industry.

Political

3 · In Ukraine, the Council of the Interregional Reform Bloc (MBR) issues a statement on Ukrainian-Russian relations, which categorically rejects the neo-communist call to restore the USSR and declares that the Reform Bloc intends to cooperate with Russian democratic forces.

6 · According to Deputy Prime Minister Sergey Shakhrai, the Russian government, backed by a presidential decision, will develop a state program to support the Russian community abroad in political, economic, and cultural spheres. Shakhrai admits, however, that the lack of funds may halt the project. Meanwhile, a related commission debates the guidelines for higher education policy in the CIS and the Baltics, the urgency of creating a single educational space in the former Soviet Union, and the need to preserve the Russian language.

9 · Responding to the British press on questions about NATO's eastward expansion, Belarus President Lukashenko asks: "How would Great Britain feel if Russian tanks were deployed in France along the Channel coast? But in my country's case, NATO tanks would only be a few meters away. Belarus is very concerned.” He asserts Russia knows quite well that NATO is trying to advance, not only to Belarus’s frontier but to Russia’s as well. He also mentions that Russia is “being provoked,” and that “Belarus does not want her people to be trapped between two opposing blocs. Why should anybody want to crush a small state like ours? The West’s policy has already led to instability in Russia.”

10 · In Georgia, the Supreme Soviet and Council of Ministers of the Abkhaz Autonomous Republic issue a protest statement against the Russian State Duma’s recommendation that the Russian-Georgian border along the river Psou be opened in order to alleviate the acute shortage of foodstuffs and vital necessities in Abkhazia. Opening the border would cause even greater socio-political destabilization in the region and make it easy for illegal armed formations to enter the autonomous republic from the North Caucasus and vice versa. The statement notes the Russian State Duma’s contradiction of a CIS Heads of State decision which stresses the permanence of borders and the territorial integrity of Georgia.

· In Uzbekistan, President Islam Karimov works to increase Uzbekistan’s international status. He hopes to attract world attention to the Aral Sea problem and the need for peace and tranquility in Uzbekistan so that he may garner international aid.

11 · Russia’s Counterintelligence Service signs a cooperation agreement with the Georgia Security Service, ostensibly aimed at combating crime and terrorism. The agreement provides for building a joint “data base on criminal gangs.”

13 · The Russian Foreign Ministry views Kazakhstan’s parliamentary crisis as a phase of “internal development,” and voices hope that the crisis will be overcome by constitutional means and that the next legislative elections will adhere strictly to law and recognized democratic norms.

15 · In Moscow, CIS secret service chiefs meet to discuss joint crime fighting measures and agree to establish a formal organization to coordinate their activities. The head of the Federal Counterintelligence Service department, Yuri Demin, hopes the conference will produce an alliance among the secret services of CIS countries, dismissing the notion that such an alliance is a resurrection of the KGB. Demin says joint activities would focus solely on crimes threatening national security such as terrorism, money laundering, corruption, smuggling, and sabotage of strategic installations, but assured that each service would retain its independence.

· In Belarus, Social Democratic leader Hramada Aleh Trusau opposes Russian-Belarusian agreements on a customs union and military bases, saying he hopes parliament has the “common sense” not to ratify the agreements. Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksey Bolshakov threatens to reimpose customs duties if the agreements are not ratified but Trusau says it’s a bluff, noting Russia would be the loser if customs duties were introduced.

16 · In Russia, President Yeltsin meets with Foreign Ministry officials to tell them they will remain the country's main coordinators of foreign policy, thus preserving the role of Andrey Kozyrev. Yeltsin's decision neutralizes his threat to establish a special organ within the presidential staff devoted to foreign policy, something he proposed earlier to the Federal Assembly.

20 · Russian First Deputy Prime Minister Oleg Soskovets says the main goals of a Russian delegation in Kiev are to determine Russia's share of the Black Sea Fleet and to secure a debt agreement covering money owed by Ukraine to Russia for energy deliveries. Soskovets notes that "considerable progress" was made on both issues, which smooths the way for speedy resolution.

21 · In Belarus, President Aleksandr Lukashenka proposes new legislative elections and a republic-wide referendum on economic union with Russia on 14 May. He includes in the referendum some questions regarding the status of the Russian language in Belarus and some privatization in the republic.

22 · An article in Moscow's Literaturnaya Gazeta highlights the rising trend of Kazakh nationalism. Author Aleksandr Samoylenko cites as evidence a "secret letter" sent to President Nazarbaev by ninety-nine deputies of Kazakhstan's parliament threatening a three-year moratorium on amendments to the constitution, a move initiated by a wing in Kazakhstan's Communist Party. Samoylenko argues that this wing, now organized under the banner of "national-patriotism," fears that other nationalities will rule Kazakhstan. National-patriotism leader Kuanshalin says introducing state bilingualism, and private ownership, equals "cutting off the Kazakhs' tongue and giving the land to foreigners.” Commercial firms and banks, fearful of national-patriotism’s views, call for a nationwide referendum on private ownership and the nature of the state-which Samoylenko offers as proof of the growing concern over nationalist sentiments.

23 · In Georgia, Shevardnadze speaks with Tbilisi radio on ties with Russia and defends the recent Treaty on Military Cooperation with Russia. He acknowledges that while the presence of foreign troops on one’s own territory is never desired, Georgia needs Russia for political and territorial security -a vital component of Georgia’s long-term independence. Shevardnadze clarifies the fact that he has approached several other capitals seeking military support for Georgia, but “not a single country offered help.”

27 · In Russia, several Duma deputies criticize First Deputy Prime Minister Oleg Soskovets, charging he does not understand the political situation in Ukraine and thus betrays

Russia's interests in negotiations with Ukraine. Led by Konstantin Zatulin, chairman of the State Duma Committee on CIS Affairs, several Russian deputies call for a reassessment of Russian-Ukrainian relations, urging a tougher Russian line. Soskovets says Russia must acknowledge Ukraine's independence and its right to run its own internal affairs, regardless of who occupies the Kremlin.

29 · Mikhail Shchipanov writes in Rossiyskaya Gazeta about a rising trend toward the formation of interest groups within the CIS. He notes an increase in the number of bilateral agreements which may lead to greater cohesion in CIS relations. Russia and Ukraine continue to narrow their differences but political and military disputes (Black Sea Fleet issues, Crimea, dual citizenship) prevent conclusion of an interstate Treaty on Friendship and Cooperation. Shchipanov also notes the dangerous nature of CIS plans to build an oil and gas pipeline from Northern Kazakhstan to a Russian port on the Black Sea coast. The plan could destroy much of the general transportation system within the CIS-a system which "undoubtedly" makes the post-Soviet area more cohesive.

31 · In Uzbekistan, President Islam Karimov tells diplomats and foreign journalists that any alternative to the CIS is "absolutely untenable." Karimov points to Russia as an "important strategic partner and great power."

· Moldovan President Mircea Snegur and Uzbek President Islam Karimov sign a bilateral friendship and cooperation treaty. The document includes seventeen agreements on specific trade, economic, and cultural issues. In a news conference, Snegur says he hopes that the treaty will become a “firm basis for joint activities in the United Nations, OSCE, CIS, and other international organizations.” Karimov says he favors “mutually beneficial” economic cooperation, but objects strongly to establishing transnational political structures in the CIS framework.

2 · More than 3,000 Black Sea Fleet workers appeal to the Russian State Duma to alleviate the wretched conditions of fleet facilities. The appeal asserts that Russia is intentionally withholding funds to ruin the fleet and calls for immediate funding for materials through Russia’s Defense Ministry and for Russia to repay debts as soon as possible.

3 · In Armenia, President Levon Ter-Petrosyan discusses implementation of the CIS air defense system with CIS Air Defense Committee chairman Col.-Gen. Viktor Prudnikov.

4 · In Georgia, Shevardnadze and Prudnikov discuss the CIS air defense system. They agree to establish a group of experts to examine Georgia’s current system and a coordinating committee to work out a plan of action.

· Russian sailors remain hostile as they depart from their posts in the Black Sea Fleet facilities, now occupied solely by the Ukrainian navy. Following the wartime credo “nothing should be left for the enemy,” the sailors remove all portable objects, destroy communication links, and dismantle surveillance systems.

- Kazakhstan pushes actively for renewed cooperation in defense industries with Russia. Kazakhstan still has delivery obligations to the Russian army and navy but Russian finances prevent payments to Kazakhstan, thus jeopardizing the Kazakh defense industry.

7 · The former Riga OMON (Special Purpose Militia Detachment) in the Dniester region is redeployed to Moscow. The military commander of the “Dniester Republic,” Mikhail Bergman, says Russian generals will manage the redeployment, but does not know what new duties the forces have been assigned.

8 · Ukraine makes official inquiry into the nature of remarks made by Russian navy commander Feliks Gromov in a meeting with Ukrainian officials. Gromov apparently voiced opposition to the joint deployment of the Ukrainian and Russian fleets in Sevastopol.

10 · Izvestiya carries an interview with Russian Air Defense commander-in-chief Viktor Prudnikov, who says a CIS joint air defense system will preserve existing CIS countries’ systems and integrate them into a single complex. He says the task remains difficult because many CIS countries’ systems (such as Georgia’s and Armenia’s) are destroyed. Other difficulties include funding for rendering all state systems combat-ready. Prudnikov also stresses that, as stipulated in the Almaty agreement, the joint system’s mission is only to enable participants to monitor CIS airspace. Reactions to air space violations or attacks will still be controlled at the state level. Prudnikov will travel to CIS capitals to assess each state’s requirements for hardware and specialists.

- In Kazakhstan, Kaztag interviews Chairman of the Committee for the Defense Industry Kadyr Baekenov. Baekenov describes economic, scientific, and technological agreements which the two nations have signed in the defense sector. The Kazkontrakt joint-stock company and Oboronresurs, a state-owned enterprise, will ensure that Russian and Kazakh defense industries provide each other with supplies, material resources, and components. Baekenov suggests creating an interstate structure for cooperation among all CIS defense industries.

12 · In Belarus, members of the Popular Front continue to collect signatures from Belarusian citizens to be submitted to the president and the Supreme Soviet. The appeal, now with over 40,000 signatures, protests against “the participation of Belarusian servicemen in any military conflicts of other states, against locating Russian bases or troops on Belarusian territory, and against the participation of Belarus in the CIS collective security system.”

13 · Ukrainian President Kuchma and Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Yuriy Dibinin discuss Black Seas Fleet issues in Kiev. Kuchma says the Black Sea Fleet is the “only stumbling block in Ukrainian-Russian relations” and that the issue should be resolved before Yeltsin’s upcoming trip to Kiev.

16 · Russian Strategic Missile Forces chief Vladimir Krivomazov says the remaining SS-25 “Topel” ICBMs will be withdrawn from Belarus by 25 July.

20 · In Moldova, parliament approves the first version of the republic’s military doctrine. The doctrine declares Moldova a neutral state that will build its security through preventive diplomacy, and building good neighborly relations with other defense departments in the region. The doctrine also foresees creating a military force “adequate for the protection of its territory and citizens.”

21 · In Russia, Commander-in-chief of Russian ground forces Vladimir Semenov says troops should be brought up to full strength and “manned with the best soldiers.” He notes that of the 300,000 new recruits needed to meet full strength status, only 10 percent have been recruited, leaving many military districts grossly understaffed. Semenov also calls for the ground forces portion of the armed forces to be brought up to 50 percent, saying the unreasonably small share of the ground forces at present “is very dangerous in the current situation.”

- Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev arrives in Tbilisi for talks with Shevardnadze and Defense Minister Vardinko Nadibaidze on military and technical cooperation, a CIS Collective Security Treaty, and a proposal for a treaty on military bases for Russia.

22 · Addressing CIS heads and parliamentary leaders, Black Sea Fleet Air Force commanders warn that the fleet is threatened by a reduction in units and logistical support bases and by political rivalry between nationalist-separatists and reformers in Ukraine and Russia. The commanders express dismay with the United States, who they claim “is spreading its interests eastward,” so that Ukraine and Russia become weaker militarily. The group urges CIS lawmakers to lay aside grievances and mistrust concerning collective defense to rest, strengthen the unity of the Red Banner Black Sea navy, and form a single center to coordinate national air force actions.

24 · In Russia, navy Commander Felix Gromov says a “single Black Sea Fleet under erratic [dual] command will be a strange structure.” Speaking before the Duma, Gromov argues that the fleet must be based in Sevastopol and “must fly the flag of one state, whose interests it represents and whose political tool it is.”

25 · Russian army General Pavel Grachev and Georgian leader Shevardnadze initial a Treaty on Military Cooperation, granting Russia four military bases in Georgia for a twenty-five-year period. Shevardnadze views the accords as an important factor in Georgia’s stability.

27 · Shevardnadze says he appreciates the Russian military presence in Georgia but warns that Georgia's parliament is free to declare the military base agreement "null and void" should relations with Russia deteriorate.

· Georgia's parliament remains split over the defense accords. While a majority supports Shevardnadze's policy of strengthening relations with Russia, the "Republicans" in parliament regard the accords as interference in domestic affairs, and call for Defense Minister Vardiko Nadibaidze's release, and for terminating the Russian peacekeeping presence in Abkhazia after 15 May, when its mandate expires.

30 · In Armenia, more than 1,500 soldiers take part in joint Armenian-Russian military exercises. Deputy Commander of Russian troops in the Transcaucasus Pavel Labutin credits the exercises with exhibiting a high degree of training and level of understanding between commanders and personnel of both armies.

3 · The Central Asian Bank for Cooperation and Development grants its first loan-to the joint-stock company Sayam. Serik Primbetov, chairman of the executive committee of the intergovernmental council, notes the importance for the region of the electrical project Sayam will undertake. Primbetov comments that funds for other projects in Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan are under review and that the bank will soon prove its worth.

10 · The CIS Interstate Economic Committee (IEC)

presidium meets to discuss a CIS customs union. Ukraine's Deputy Prime Minister refuses to sign, commenting that it is too early for such a broad agreement on free trade. He says the bilateral Russian-Ukrainian economic cooperation agreement will suffice and will be a test of such cooperation. At the same meeting, representatives adopt a resolution to advise CIS Heads of State to form an Interstate Currency Committee (ICC), which would work to promote cooperation in currency exchange policies within the CIS, and promote currency emission control. According to press accounts, the structure of the ICC is being "discussed behind closed doors."

- The Russian Ministry for Cooperation with Commonwealth Member States reports that in the first two months of 1995, Russia reduced its oil exports to other CIS members to 3.2 million tons, which is 42 percent of its deliveries in the same two months of 1994.

13 · The agreement between Russia and Kazakhstan to create a free flow of goods across borders through uniform customs controls has failed. The Kazakh Ministry of Finance has been the principal spoiler. Belarus and Russia are progressing toward agreement on the removal of border controls, but the tripartite idea has come to an impasse.

14 · Article by Georgiy Bovot says that without peace between Armenia and Azerbaijan, there will be no multibillion-dollar contract to develop the Caspian oil fields. Bovot examines the geopolitical game swirling around the two countries-a game that is much larger than the struggle for Nagorno-Karabakh. Namely, he analyzes the strategic economic contest among Russia, Iran, Turkey, and the West for oil. The article summarizes Azerbaijan's position, asserting that by signing a contract with a Western consortium, it has established the precedent of distributing Caspian Sea resources unilaterally. Now, the issue is the route the Caspian oil will take to Western markets. Moscow continues to insist that the oil cross Russia, more precisely Dagestan, and the ill-fated Chechnya, to terminals in Novorossisk. The article also discusses the positions of all major players in the game, including Washington, DC, the European Union, Iran, and Turkey, concluding that there is much less economics than politics involved.

· In Ukraine, Shevardnadze and Kuchma sign a treaty which provides for Ukrainian assistance to Georgia with developing petroleum plants and coal mining. Ukraine will also construct hydroelectric power stations and sell electricity to Georgia at “reasonable rates.” Press account says the plan for a “Euro-Asiatic” corridor for transporting Azerbaijani oil products across Georgia to Ukraine is gaining visibility. The plan will allow Ukraine to “straighten out its energy transport route” and Georgia to “earn transport taxes for its budget.”

25 · At a meeting in Bishkek, the prime ministers of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan approve a fiveyear economic integration program. The program gives priority over the next two years to cooperative production of small electrical engines, gas meters, medicines, and fertilizers.

27 · In Russia, Finance Minister Vladimir Panskov denies charges that Russia underwrites over half of the other CIS countries’ economies, saying the Russian government provides credits only to Belarus, Tajikistan, and Armenia. Russian economic and financial aid to other CIS countries, he says, is “very insubstantial.”

28 · Azerbaijani oil from the Caspian is to be transported to Europe through one of four variant pipelines. One provides for transportation to Turkey via Iran, which is unacceptable to the international consortium that signed an agreement on the joint development of three Caspian oil deposits in September 1994. Another would build a pipeline via Armenia to a Turkish Black Sea port, but can only be fulfilled if Armenia and Azerbaijan reach a political agreement on the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict. A third variant is to build a line through the Northern Caucasus to Novorossisk in Russia, in which Russia is interested. The fourth would cross Georgia and wind up in Batumi. In this case, the transportation mode might be railroad. The consortium will meet in London on 3-4 May to discuss construction of the pipeline. Oil extraction is scheduled to begin in eighteen months.

29 · Sergei Primbetov, chairman of the Intergovernmental Council of the Republics of Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan, states that the Central Asian countries should form a regional economic union like the GATT. The region is economically interdependent; Kazakhstan depends on Uzbekistan for gas and on Kyrgyzstan for electricity. Uzbekistan is pursuing a strategy toward a self-sufficient economy, but is simultaneously integrating its economy on a regional basis.

Political

3 · Leaders from the agrarian parties of Russia, Belarus, Moldova, Armenia, and Ukraine's Peasant Party issue a declaration calling for the reintegration of the people of the former Soviet Union. Noting the suffering and deprivation caused by the USSR's break-up, the members call for recognition of the common historical roots and traditions shared by the people in the post-Soviet republics and claim that only through unity can the populations of the republics enjoy social and economic well-being.

· In a related story, representatives of the agrarian parties agree at a meeting in Moscow to create an International Association of Agrarian Parties to influence governments and work to cultivate the integration they desire.

7 · In talks with U.S. Defense Secretary William Perry, Islam Karimov urges increased U.S. participation in Central Asia, a presence he terms a “guarantee of security.” Karimov lists three factors threatening Uzbekistan’s independence: (1) imperialist ambitions in Russia, which intensify daily; (2) the fundamentalist threat from the south; and (3) the problem of irreversibility of certain systems from the past.

18 · Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev announces that Moscow reserves the right to intervene militarily to protect the rights of ethnic Russians living in former Soviet republics. Kozyrev notes that some 240,000 Russians have emigrated from CIS states to Russia, calling it evidence of the harsh treatment they are subject to.

23 · In Belarus, President Lukashenka rejects a Russian proposal, signed by Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin, calling for stationing 100 Russian customs officers on the Belarusian-Ukrainian border. (Ukraine has refused to join the customs union with Kazakhstan.) Lukashenka says Belarus can control its Ukrainian border by itself and asks Russia to “trust Belarus.”

28 · Armenian Prime Minister Grant Bagratyan denounces recent calls, made chiefly by communists, for an Armenian- Russian confederation. Bagratyan argues for Armenia to preserve its sovereignty and independence and criticizes those who “try to cash in on today’s hardship and spread defeatism in order to win political capital and seize power.” He notes the country’s reforms have now begun to yield “positive results.”

29 · The Council of CIS Heads of State appeals to peoples of the former Soviet Union to pool their efforts to prevent war. Striving “to consolidate world peace,” the leaders urge all peoples “to resist new threats to peaceful life ... and to eliminate existing and avert potential conflicts.”

Security

12 · In Ukraine, Deputy Prime Minister and Defense Minister Valeriy Shmarov argues against swift entry into NATO, calling instead for a gradual entry into European political structures and participation in the Partnership for Peace. He comments that quick admission into NATO would be a “hasty step disturbing the European balance of power, resulting in a new confrontation.”

19 · In Russia, Defense Minister Pavel Grachev receives support from the Foreign Ministry for his statements indicating that Russia might not fulfill certain CFE treaty provisions. Foreign Ministry spokesman Gregory Karasin says that although his ministry tended to support full compliance with CFE in the past, he hopes the United States and other nations “will understand our position and take account of the Russian Federation’s interests.”

21 · CIS foreign and defense ministers agree to extend the mandate for peacekeeping operations in Tajikistan and Abkhazia until the end of 1995. The extension plan still awaits approval by CIS Heads of State who are due to convene on 26 May.

· In Tajikistan, Lt.-Gen. Valentin Bobryshev is named the new commander of Russian border forces, replacing Colonel-General Patrikeev.

22 · In Ukraine, acting Prime Minister Evgeniy Marchuk says Ukraine “will never allow the Black Sea Fleet to be headquartered de facto-much less de jure-in Sevastopol,” saying the presidential agreements on the Black Sea Fleet “make no sense.”

26 · Russian Strategic Missile Forces Chief-of-staff Col.- Gen. Viktor Yesin reports that all Soviet-era nuclear warheads have been transferred from Kazakhstan to Russia. (Kazakhstan possessed 104 giant SS- 18 ICBMs, each loaded with ten nuclear weapons.)

· Secretary of the CIS Council of Defense Ministers Lt.- Gen. Leonid Ivashov says that the CIS defense ministers plan to establish a Joint Chiefs of Staff Committee of the CIS armed forces. The committee will include chiefs of the General Staffs of the CIS national forces.

27 · In Ukraine, President Leonid Kuchma tells citizens that Ukraine must adopt a new military doctrine as soon as possible. “After a new doctrine has been adopted, we should organize our armed forces in accordance with it ... and not leave our army to deal with its problems on its own.”

30 · President Boris Yeltsin signs into law the Duma bill that increases service in the army by two years.

May 1995

Economic

3 · In a quarterly report on the CIS economies, Kommersant-Daily says that in comparison with 1989, the last year in which some growth was observed in the Russian economy, the gross domestic product and national income will decline 54 and 57 percent respectively in 1995. It predicts similar declines for 1996. According to current forecasts, inflation will not fall below 200 percent. The structural and technical degradation of Russian industry will also continue.

· In Russia, head of the Ministry for Cooperation with CIS Member States Valeriy Serov says Russia will continue to conduct talks on restructuring CIS states' debts on a bilateral basis. Only one bilateral agreement has been signed to date-with Ukraine on 20 March 1995. Kiev is allowed to defer its debts, which were in default in 1994. Ukraine will give Russia promissory notes, denominated in U.S. dollars, for the remainder of the debt. Because the Russian federal budget does not provide for granting state credits to the CIS countries in 1995. Several other CIS countries have asked Russia to restructure their debts, including Kyrgyzstan, Georgia, Moldova, Uzbekistan, and Turkmenistan. In preparation, the International Economic Committee has prepared proposals for creating an International Currency Committee, which will be considered when the Heads of Government meet at the end of May.

· Kommersant-Daily reports that the agreement on rescheduling CIS countries' debts sounds good in principle, but in detail has a long way to go. The CIS ruble zone died in March 1995, the article's author states, when Tajikistan decided to introduce its own national currency. Thus, the hope that a ruble zone would annul all debts evaporated also. Now, the members are coming to grips with a payments agreement, but so far progress has only been pursued at bilateral levels. Not surprisingly, at the CIS level, Russia's Ministry for Cooperation with CIS Member States is playing the lead role.

4 · Phase one of the Belarus-Russia customs union ends on 9 May. During this phase, Belarus has simplified regulations for rail and air transport across the Belarusian-Russian border, but all cargoes and the routes they will take must still be declared. The Belarusian State Customs Committee announces that "it will take some time to create a customs union."

· An article in Vechirniy Kyyiy by Mykola Mykhalchenko, president of the Ukrainian Academy of Political Sciences, warns against continuing the current line in Ukrainian-Russian relations. The author is pessimistic about democratization in Russia and says Russia is following a "neo-imperial foreign policy." He criticizes Russia's economic policy toward the newly independent states, saying that Russia has appropriated all former Soviet reserves of precious metals and stones, and other material treasures of the former empire, leaving Ukraine with the rundown mines of Donbass, which would have ruined Russia financially had it tried to modernize them. He is firmly critical of the outlook in Ukraine that Ukraine's only economic course is to reintegrate its economy with Russia. He says "this viewpoint has nothing in common with scientific studies." He calls economic "integration" a policy of strengthening economic dependence on Russia, which is the opposite of what Ukraine needs. Russia's attitude toward Ukraine, he says, is already a traditional one of an imperial center toward a province. For this to change, Russian government must institute the following principles:

- an unconditional acknowledgement of Ukraine's territorial integrity and decisive restraint from entering pro-Russian separatists' activities;
- rejection of using economic levers to exert pressure on Ukraine;
- termination of psychological and informational warfare with Ukraine;
- conducting balanced policies to resolve the old problems (in particular, that of the Black Sea Fleet).

5 · In Belarus, leaders from nineteen Russian, Ukrainian, and Belarusian oblasts hold a three-day meeting in the city of Homel devoted to issues of economic integration, including direct business and trade ties. The leaders issue an appeal to their governments to step up the process of economic integration among their countries.

· Rossiyskaya Gazeta publishes contents of the tripartite Customs Union Agreement among Russia, Belarus, and Kazakhstan. The agreement supplements the Customs Union Agreement between the Russian Federation and Belarus of 6 January 1995.

6 · In Russia, the Ministry of Foreign Economic Affairs introduces a bill to restore restrictions on exports and imports. The Duma passes its own bill, which is very similar to the ministerial draft. A State Duma committee on economic policy is also formed, which is dominated by “etatists” who favor a return to nontariff regulations on trade as soon as the IMF loosens its hold over Russian economic policy.

· Kazakhstanskaya Pravda carries an article that warns of the dangerous state of Kazakhstan’s nuclear plants which are all plants of the Chernobyl type-“Aleksandrov boilers” (named after academician Aleksandrov who designed them). Kazakhstan contains 40 percent of the world’s known uranium reserves-but the expense of developing safe nuclear plants and burying the waste is far too great for the new state at this time, the article argues.

12 · In order to pay Ukraine’s gas debt to Russia, the Ukrainian government announces that it will cut off gas supplies to those Ukrainian companies and residents that do not pay the government during the summer.

13 · In Belarus, Respublika reports President Lukashenka’s statement that debts to Russia hang over the republic like a sword of Damocles. The debts for oil and gas, valued at world prices, are especially onerous. By the end of 1994, Belarus’s debt to Russia for energy amounted to $460 million; $420 million for gas and $40 million for oil. The debts have been partially caused by the unwillingness of consumers to pay for energy supplies, as well as an attitude that “we can live off of Russia.” The Russian government has demanded repayment in the form of shares in Belarusian companies, which if adopted as a solution could put Belarus’s best companies in Russian hands, according to the article. The article goes on to criticize Russia for unjustly distributing the former Soviet Union’s property, keeping all oil and gas complexes located in Russia as its own monopolistic property. The author suggests that each new state should have received a share in the oil and gas resources equal to its share in the former USSR's national income. In conclusion, however, the author states that Belarus must unify its economy with Russia's and receive energy for below-world-market prices.

15 · In Kyrgyzstan, President Askar Akaev receives a Consultative Council on Labor, Migration, and Social Security of the CIS States. He says that all CIS states should adopt this council's recommendations, giving priority to solving social problems from which all former Soviet republics suffer.

16 · Azeri and Georgian representatives hold a joint press conference discussing prospects and benefits of transporting Caspian Sea oil through Georgia.

· In Uzbekistan, Savdogar (Tashkent) reports on President Karimov's speech at a conference of Central Asian states, calling for a single "moral, economic, and political zone in Central Asia." The prospects for future cooperation were outlined at a meeting on 14 April 1995 in Shymkent, which noted that the foundations for a union of Central Asian states now exist. The author of the article notes that the public movement "Turkestan-Our Common Home" is growing.

17 · In Kazakhstan, a conference on the Caspian Sea in Alma-Ata ends. The participants were Russia, Azerbaijan, Iran, Turkmenistan, and Kazakhstan.

18 · The CIS summit in Minsk on 25-26 May will consider the accession of other countries to the customs union agreement. Yuriy Kravchenko, chairman of the State Customs Committee of Ukraine, announces that Ukraine will not join the union because of the lack of economic and political parity among the CIS states.

23 · Vo Slavu Rodinu reports that customs control at the "Kozlovichy" and "Mokrany" border passes will be conducted jointly by Belarus and Russia in the near future. Russian customs officers arrived in Brest on 16 May 1995.

25 · The third assembly of the International Congress of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs is held in Chisinau on 25 May. President Mircea Snegur hosts the congress, which includes CIS states and businessmen and managers from Central European countries and China.

· In Belarus, CIS heads of government and heads of state meet to discuss economic issues, including restructuring of interstate accounts from 1992 to 1993.

· In Ukraine, a Supreme Council deputy, Yu. Boldyrev, writing in Donetskiy Kryazh (19-25 May), reviews the terms of a $1.5 billion IMF credit to Ukraine. The credit will allow Ukraine to pay for gas imports from Russia and Turkmenistan and to support the value of the karbovanets. According to the agreement, Ukraine must pay for gas in hard currency. If one payment is missed, the agreement on debt restructuring becomes void. Boldyrev criticizes the IMF for acting on behalf of creditor countries, not recipient countries. The author states that $1.5 billion paid to the Russians will have a negligible impact on the Ukrainian economy, which needs $20 billion in one lump payment. In his opinion, the former Soviet states should reunite on a new basis. Without Russia, Ukraine is a “banana republic,” he says. His opinions echo those of many deputies in the Supreme Council who support the formation of a new Slavic union.

30 · Boris Yeltsin and Viktor Chernomyrdin point to the “conclusion of the first stage” of forming a customs union as the main achievement of the CIS summit of 25-26 May. On other questions, such as “CIS borders,” Ukraine’s Leonid Kuchma argues that CIS member states would not accept the idea of external borders, only borders of independent states.

· Russian border troops suspend railway traffic between Azerbaijan and Russia, alleging that Azeri cargoes contain arms and drugs.

Political

3 · In Belarus, President Lukashenka says he believes that Belarus “is prepared for the closest possible integration with Russia.” He predicts that in the 14 May referendum, 80-90 percent of Belarusians will support increased integration and making Russian the state language. Asked whether the world will recognize the merging of the three Slavic states- Ukraine, Belarus, and Russia-Lukashenka says he believes this will depend on the peoples of these countries.

6 · In Ukraine, Kuchma updates journalists on Black Sea Fleet talks, saying Ukraine is prepared “to hand over practically the whole infrastructure of Sevastopol for stationing the Black Sea Fleet. [However], Sevastopol cannot be handed over to Russia as a naval base.” Kuchma highlights the problem as the only remaining one in Ukrainian-Russian relations. He places much hope in his proposal to establish joint customs and frontier posts on the Russian-Ukrainian border as a means to resolve the Black Sea Fleet issue but says Russia has not responded.

13 · The CIS IPA holds its sixth plenary session. All members less Uzbekistan send delegations to discuss coordination of lawmaking in the CIS states. The Assembly approves eleven documents covering such areas a migration of labor, consumer rights, protection of citizens, and the rights of prisoners of war. Most delegates support continued work on unifying the civil legislations of the CIS countries and believe that the IPA should receive a higher stature in governing CIS affairs. In his address, Chairman Shumeyko laments that the body’s potential “is not fully used.”

· The Council of the IPA decides to turn the body into an interstate organization. The new body would parallel in stature the Council of CIS Heads of State and the Council of CIS Heads of Government. The draft document outlining the IPA's new role will be submitted for approval at the 26 May heads of state meeting in Minsk and, once accepted, forwarded to the individual republics for parliamentary ratification.

17 · In Russia, Foreign Minister Kozyrev says Russia favors an energetic “foreign policy which will be firm and even aggressive but not in a military sense.” Kozyrev was quick to point out that Russia will not pursue a policy that is “nationalist in the sense of being xenophobic, imperial, or chauvinist,” saying Russia’s foreign policy priorities will not allow these elements. Overall, he says Russia will transform its ideologically driven policy into a policy that meets national needs.

18 · While in Russia for talks on bilateral relations, Turkmen President Niyazov signs accords with Yeltsin. Both agree to protect the Russian ethnic minority in Turkmenistan and Turkmen nationals residing in Russia. A number of other agreements are reached in the defense sphere, including a strategic partnership agreement that will last until the year 2000, the first of its kind in CIS relations.

20 · In Kazakhstan, President Nazarbaev forms a working committee to promote CIS cooperation. Khaliq Abdullaev will chair the new body, named the State Committee of the Republic of Kazakhstan for Cooperation with CIS Countries.

23 · The CIS executive office in Minsk releases the agenda for the 26 May CIS summit. The Council of Heads of State is expected to review eight issues, the main ones being creation of an interstate currency committee, an extension of the peacekeeping mandate in Tajikistan and Abkhazia, and procedural issues connected with the Collective Security Treaty. Another fourteen issues are to be tackled by the Council of Heads of Government. Observers forecast fierce debate over drafting of a convention on human rights and freedoms.

25 · Uzbek President Karimov talks about the CIS in a press interview, explaining that Uzbekistan regards the CIS's main role as economic, along the lines of the EU. He expresses his hope that the CIS-like the EU-will soon have free movement of goods, capital, and people.

26 · At the CIS summit in Minsk, as expected, there was disagreement on a number of issues. Only four republics (Russia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, and Kyrgyzstan) approve a unified border security system and most republics judge the Convention on Human Rights as premature. Agreement is reached on Russia's proposal to establish a regional currency committee and on the shipment of special and military-related cargoes. At Georgian leader Shevardnadze's urging, the CIS leaders extend the peacekeeping mandate in Abkhazia and Tajikistan. While Yeltsin and Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin view the meeting as success, others are not so enthusiastic. Belarusian President Lukashenka believes the summits are increasingly addressing questions of secondary importance instead of dealing with economic matters which will "unravel all the knots." Uzbek's Karimov agrees.

29 · Tajik President Rakhmonov applauds developments between Russia and Belarus, saying that in the future, "all obstacles in relations between Russia and Tajikistan will also be removed."

Security

1 · In Uzbekistan, President Karimov creates a National Security Council tasked with drafting a law, "On National Security," in coordination with the Ministry of Defense. The council reports directly to the president, in a fashion similar to the Russian president's Security Council.

4 · In Belarus, Defense Minister Anatoliy Kostenko writes that the republic will follow a policy of "minimum defense sufficiency," thus abandoning the neutrality doctrine. The policy includes rearming the troops with state-of-the-art weapons systems and creating a superior training program at all levels. In 1995, he says Belarus plans to disband 54 formations, units, and institutions, and reform 228, as a result of which the armed forces will be reduced by 16,000 men, and by 1 January 1996 total numerical strength will be 100,000 (Krasnaya Zvezda, 4 May).

- In Azerbaijan, President Geydar Aliev announces on television that Azerbaijan will cooperate with NATO under the auspices of the Partnership for Peace by providing information on compliance with the CFE (Conventional Forces in Europe) Treaty in the Caucasus. Azerbaijan has new ambassadors in Brussels and Vienna, which Aliev hopes will help Azerbaijan “consolidate its ties with NATO.” Aliev notes that Russian armed forces have been based in Armenia and Georgia, while Azerbaijan has only its own armed forces to defend its borders.

- Turkish Foreign Minister Erdal Inonu says Turkey will continue to provide “friendly” military assistance to Azerbaijan. In the same statement, he mentions Turkey’s desire to have a pipeline for the export of Azerbaijani oil through Turkey, but Azerbaijani Foreign Minister Hasan Hasanov says the possibility of having the pipeline run through Armenia on its way to Turkey is simply “not on the agenda.”

7 · In Russia, Defense Minister Pavel Grachev reviews prospects for the Russian army on the occasion of its third anniversary. He reminds officers that 700,000 servicemen and 45,000 pieces of combat hardware have been redeployed to Russia from “Eastern” Europe and the Commonwealth countries over the past few years, the largest any country has experienced. He says Russia’s strategic nuclear forces remain Russia’s chief deterrent, but that the armed forces are equally important.

17 · Presidents Boris Yeltsin and Sapamurad Niyazov tell journalists that Turkmenistan and Russia now have a “strategic partnership” through the year 2000.

Turkmenistan is the first CIS member nation with which Russia has established this relationship, Yeltsin asserts. He adds that the two presidents exchanged views on counterbalancing “Islamization” of Central Asia with CIS coordination, emphasizing that Islamization could have dire consequences and pointing out Russia’s problems with Afghanistan.

· In Kyrgyzstan, Supreme Council deputies ratify a military cooperation treaty between the Kyrgyz Republic and Russia and another on how and when the Kyrgyz government may use Russian military facilities on its territory and one on the status of servicemen.

15 · In Ukraine, the secretary of the National Security Council, Vladimir Gorbulin, tells journalists that a thoroughly balanced approach must be adopted toward NATO, stating that: “it cannot be only NATO and Russia, or NATO and Ukraine, or Russia and Ukraine.” He adds that Ukraine has proposed a new model for NATO’s relations with other states.

19 · In Georgia, the chairman of the Supreme Council of the Autonomous Republic of Abkhazia and deputy prime minister of Georgia, Tamaz Nadareishvili, addresses the Georgian parliament. Nadareishvili harshly criticizes Russian peacekeeping troops in the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict zone, noting that they have merely demarcated the border between Georgia and Abkhazia. In his words, refugees from the zone will be unable to return to Abkhazia as long as Abkhaz leader Ardzinba stays in power, implying that Russian troops are aiding the leader. He says that 700,000 mines have been laid in the Gali district alone. Moreover, he notes that some Russian troops have no right to be part of a peacekeeping action (referring to forces of the airborne assault regiment No. 345 which participated in the storming of Sukhumi). Another deputy reads aloud a petition signed by 70,000 Abkhazian refugees calling on the Georgian government to refuse Russian participation in peacekeeping operations and demanding that Russia withdraw its contingent from the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict zone.

24 · In Ukraine, Deputy Defense Minister Vasiliy Sobkov says Ukraine will offer two military training ranges (Privko near Lvov and Shirokiy Lan in the Odessa military district) for lease to Western troops. Germany, France, and Britain currently send their troops to Canada for training.

25 · Director of Russia's Federal Border Service Andrey Nikolaev says that a single system for defending the borders of the Commonwealth is the next step after signing the Treaty on Joint Guarding of the External Borders of CIS. Seven CIS heads of state have initialed the treaty. Ukraine, Turkmenistan, Azerbaijan, and Moldova are refusing to sign. This will make it possible to establish a "single border regime" on CIS territory. The situation now, he remarks, is that each state has its own vision of collective security and guarding of borders. Touching on the most complicated "common borders" issue, Nikolaev says CIS states need to coordinate their "positions" toward powers near the border, using the example of China, with which Russia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan and Uzbekistan each has its own relations. "On the one hand, this is correct," he says, "but on the other hand, it would be sensible to link the foreign policy lines of all the CIS countries."

· At the Minsk session of the Council of CIS Heads of State (26 May 1995) military issues will dominate the agenda, while, atypically, economic ones take a back seat. Uzbek President Islam Karimov remarks on Uzbek television, "I do not like the way this agenda is formed. I think that the CIS was above all created to resolve economic issues." Karimov explains that most of the heads of state are against the CIS's becoming a subject of international law, or turning into the former Soviet Union. In his view, the European Union is held together by the resolution of economic matters, and that is what ought to form the basis of the CIS. He would like the free movement of all goods and people across member-state lines.

26 · In Russia, Boris Yeltsin submits to the lower chamber of the Russian parliament several agreements with Kazakhstan on the status of army units temporarily deployed on Kazakh territory, and on the Russian citizens under contract in the armed forces of Kazakhstan. He tells parliament that the agreements meet the interests of the Russian Federation, “creating a legal basis for the deployment of Russian army units on the territory of Kazakhstan .. .” President Nazarbaev is also working for ratification of the agreements on Russian citizens under contract in the armed forces of Kazakhstan, on which he issued a decree on 24 May.

30 · Russian special envoy and chief negotiator in talks with Georgia Feliks Kovalev tells reporters that at the Minsk CIS summit of heads of state, the mandate of CIS peacekeepers in the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict zone was “clarified.” “The CIS leaders signed a document which says that CIS peacekeepers will more actively carry out their peacekeeping job,” said Kovalev.

Economic

3 · In Armenia, transportation ministers of Armenia, Iran, and Turkmenistan sign a cooperation agreement in Yerevan for Armenia to treat the use of Turkmen transport facilities as repayment for gas supplied to Yerevan. Armenia has experienced serious energy shortages due to the Azerbaijani and Turkish blockades. The agreement facilitates Turkmenistan's ties with Armenia through Iran.

- Moldova's foreign trade turnover increases 21 percent during the first four months of 1995 over the same period in 1994, with exports to the West up by 72 percent. Western countries, unlike CIS members, do not apply excise and other taxes on Moldovan exports. Moldovan goods are not competitive in the CIS due to their high prices, which result from the high share of energy costs in production. In 1994, prices in Moldova averaged 2.4 times those in Russia, due to the incompatibility between the leu and the ruble.

5 · In Russia, news agencies report the surprising strengthening of the ruble against the dollar, which is beginning to crowd dollars out of circulation and create ruble “shortages.” Russia’s currency reserves are growing (now topping $8 billion according to some reports) due to the reductions in credits issued by the Central Bank and the policies of its forty-five-year-old leader, Tatyana Paramonova.

· Ukrinform reports on the creation of a Russian-Ukrainian joint-stock gas-transporting society—Gaz Transit. The Russian monopoly gas firm, Gazprom, is to contribute its share of the company in the form of “retired” penalty payments on Ukraine’s delayed payments in 1994 for gas supplies. Ukraine is to supply two gas storage facilities- Bilche-Volytsko-Uherske and Bohorodchanske. However, Russia has valued these facilities at $23.6 million and $82.2 million, respectively, while Arthur D. Little says they are worth $9.7 billion and $958 million, respectively.

8 · In Moldova, parliament ratifies the CIS agreement on the formation of the Interstate Economic Committee (IEC) within the CIS Economic Union and the Agreement on Establishment of the CIS Payment Union.

13 · Ukraine will receive $1.5 billion from the IMF in five tranches over a period of twelve months. It has already received the first tranche of $70 million. Each subsequent tranche will be granted after a review of Ukraine’s 1995 economic reform. (In October 1994, Ukraine received an STF credit of about $700 million from the IMF. On 1 June 1995, Ukraine received a credit of 85 million ECU from the European Union.)

The Ukrainian government has pledged to privatize within the first six months of 1995 about 1,000 medium and large businesses, as well as to liquidate five bankrupt enterprises and to lift grain export quotas.

14 · Kommersant-Daily reports that the Russian firm Lukoil has formed a new oil consortium in Azerbaijan, in which it will take the largest share (35 percent), while the Italian firm Agip and the U.S. firm Penzoi take 30 percent each. The Azerbaijani state oil company is given a 5 percent share in the consortium. The oil will come from the “Karabakh” oil deposit in the Azerbaijani sector of the Caspian shelf.

- In Ukraine, the government imposes a 15 percent import duty on imports of gasoline, coal, and diesel oil. In addition, VAT exemptions, excise tax exemptions, import duty exemptions, and customs duty exemptions are all being eliminated. Proceeds from the new duties will be used to create a stabilization fund for the fuel and energy complex.

15 · Georgia owes Turkmenistan $394 million for gas delivered during 1993 and 1994. As a consequence, Turkmenistan has reduced gas deliveries from Turkmenistan to Georgia from 4.3 million cu. meters to 1 million cu. meters per day.

16 · In Georgia, Abkhazia protests Russian peacekeeping forces in Abkhazia, in connection with the take-over of the Inguri hydroelectric station. Abkhaz separatists can no longer pressure the Georgians by limits on electricity supplies.

- The steady fall of the dollar against the ruble continues as $500 million are sold and the Central Bank of Russia buys $300 million. A major panic seems to be setting in. Some politicians delight in the “de-dollarization” of the Russian economy. Others say the end result will have no lasting effect on the economy and that measures should be taken to stabilize the dollar’s value and halt the decline.

· In Russia, Aragil Electronic News Bulletin (in English) writes that Russian armed forces gain control of the Shatoy and Nozhay-Yurt settlements in Chechnya, which removes the last obstacles to building a Baku-Groznyy oil pipeline. Moscow and Baku are to build this line to the port of Novorossiysk. Aragil speculates that the Russian government presented Aliiev with an ultimatum on the pipeline, probably offering something in return linked with the Karabakh war. Aragil says that it is hard to predict what sort of pressure Moscow will apply on Armenia, but Russia will probably keep the Republic of Mountainous Karabakh army in place as long as possible to keep the pressure on Azerbaijan.

19 · Russia and Kazakhstan complete the first phase of accords to create a customs union between Belarus, Kazakhstan, and Russia, to regulate and structure payments between economic entities in the three republics, and to govern the leasing of Baykonur space launch site.

20 · Izvestiya reports that in the first six months of 1995, Russia paid the London Club (of Western bankers) $350 million, enough to cover the interest on the 1992-93 debt. Total Russian debt to the London Club amounts to $25 billion, which Russia intends to pay in the last half of 1995, along with interest on the 1994 debt. This will bring total Russian payments in 1995 to $1 billion. Total payments in 1995 on Russia's overall debt, which now stands at $120 billion, will amount to $6 billion.

- In Uzbekistan, Ukrainian President Kuchma and President Karimov discuss economic cooperation-in gold, cotton, gas, aviation, and other areas. The two countries have increased trade to about $90 million-not very high, given the compatibility of political goals held by both presidents in the CIS arena. An obstacle to greater trade is that the two parliaments have not ratified a free-trade agreement signed during Islam Karimov's visit to Ukraine in 1994. Ten documents exist, including one on economic integration, and others in the fields of health care, tourism, and information exchange between foreign ministries. The increase in numbers of agreements, comments Ukrayina Moloda (23 June 1995), is beginning to look like a “strategic partnership.” Two days prior to Kuchma’s visit, President Karimov repeatedly spoke on the future of the CIS, each time more radically asserting the inviolability of Uzbek borders and not agreeing to a unified CIS command.

26 · Russia’s State Duma once again fails to adopt a Land Code. (On 14 June, 105 deputies voted against the code.) The opponents include a large faction of communists (particularly the Agrarian Party) who insist that private land ownership be removed from the draft code altogether. But Valentin Kornilov, aide to State Duma deputy Mikhail Lapshin, comments: “Today millions of people possess documents affirming their right to own land, and taking that land away from them would be the same as declaring a civil war.”

27 · In Georgia, President Shevardnadze announces that Tbilisi is ready to eliminate all obstacles to routing Azerbaijani oil across Georgia to the Black Sea port of Batumi.

30 · A Rossiyskaya Gazeta article examines IMF policies in the CIS states. It criticizes the division of CIS states into groups, saying that these groups create payments problems among the states. The article claims that Russia is owed $6 billion by former Soviet republics, but that the IMF will not allow it to repay outstanding debts to non-CIS states by calling in these debts. The IMF has asked Russia to restructure and even in some cases to “suspend” these debts. The author calls for a CIS strategy for dealing with the IMF, including the creation of a clearinghouse payments union based on the country's own economic structures.

Political

2 · In Azerbaijan, President Aliiev delivers his usual double message concerning the CIS. He says the Azeri state is convinced the Commonwealth must develop and be strengthened, but stresses that the organization must not develop into a new center of a single state similar to the Soviet Union. He explains that all republics base their participation in the CIS to the extent that it helps consolidate their independence and sovereignty.

· IPA General Secretary Andrey Vermishev praises the results of the CIS Minsk Summit. He believes the meeting “demonstrates that the time for the formation of the Commonwealth as a single organism is nearly over,” emphasizing he has no doubts that the body “is moving toward a grand Eurasian alliance like that proposed by [Nazarbaev].” Like IPA Chairman Shumeyko, Vermishev believes the increased powers of the IPA will greatly enhance implementation of approved CIS agreements and documents.

3 · Turkmenistan and Armenia enter into transportation cooperation agreements with Iran. The transportation, energy, and trade ministers of each republic, after meeting in Yerevan, announce the agreement, which establishes a joint venture for transportation services to be headquartered in Ashkhabad.

5 · In Armenia, Foreign Minister Vagan Papazyan indicates that unless the CIS develops equal economic links, there will be no future for the body. Papazyan believes the organization was necessary in the aftermath of the USSR's dissolution but notes that relations must develop in a positive way, not to any one member's or bloc's advantage.

6 · Speaking to an international conference on regional cooperation, Kyrgyz President Akaev believes “cardinal reform” to establish a working Central Asian cooperation system is needed. He speaks of creating a special regional administration that draws from political, economic, and social institutions. Such a body, once established, he believes, will provide a framework for preventing economic, political and military conflicts.

7 · In Moldova, parliament ratifies two CIS agreements, the Agreement on the Establishment of the Interstate Economic Committee of the CIS Economic Union and the Agreement on Establishment of the CIS Payment Union. (President Snegur signed these documents on 21 October 1994.)

10 · Yeltsin and Kuchma sign an agreement on the Black Sea Fleet (BSF), both believing it meets the interests of Russia and Ukraine. The agreement acknowledges that the Russian BSF and the Ukrainian navy are to be formed out of the former Soviet BSF. The Russians will base their share in Sevastopol and will use the Crimea for additional basing of ship, troops, and material supplies. Russia is to take ownership of 81.7 percent of the fleet's ships and vessels and Ukraine the remainder. An important part of the agreement stipulates that Russia will invest in the socio-economic development of Sevastopol and other areas used by the Russian part of the BSF. Talks will continue to narrow remaining differences and the agreement provides the Ukrainian and Russian naval officers the power to make ad hoc decisions. Russian officials, in particular BSF commander Admiral Eduard Baltin, voiced displeasure with the agreement, which they say reduces the fleet's personnel by one-third and hands over to Ukraine equipment and material they are not capable of managing. In Ukraine, views were mixed, with more nationalist-minded politicians denouncing the agreement, saying Ukraine "sold out." Others, like Foreign Minister Udovenko, believe the agreement provides the framework for increased cooperation regarding the BSF and lays the groundwork for improved Russian-Ukrainian relations, hampered for the last few years because of BSF disagreements.

14 · In Russia, the State Duma rejects a resolution submitted by Russian communists charging that the CIS has produced “extremely negative political and economic effects.” The communists call for reintegrating the republics, and specifically demand all Duma committees to develop a conceptual framework for economic, political, financial, and military union between the Russian Federation and Belarus that other CIS states can join. The resolution receives 197 positive votes, needing 226 for full passage.

· In Georgia, Shevardnadze meets with CIS interior ministers. He speaks of the dangers associated with increased organized crime, noting that the problem is not international in scope.

20 · In meetings in Tashkent, Ukrainian President Kuchma and Uzbek President Karimov sign bilateral documents pledging expanded cooperation. A treaty on economic integrations, specifying cooperation in science, technology, education, public health, tourism, and sports, is also signed.

30 · An article in Moscow’s Kommersant-Daily discusses the effects of increased nationalism on Russians living in Kazakhstan. Kazakhs are irate that they are left looking for work while Russians, Tajiks, and Uzbeks fill many state and private employment positions. Additionally, state coffers are being drawn down by social subsidies that provide the minimum necessities of life to incoming refugees from neighboring “hot spots,” like Tajikistan and Nagorno-Karabakh. This, concludes the article, is why Kazakh movements to drive many Russians and other foreigners out are increasing in numbers and strength.

Security

1 · Eleven heads of CIS state security bodies report that as a result of a two-day meeting they have agreed to join forces to combat organized crime in their states. Specifics of the agreement include creating a joint database, engaging in technical cooperation, and providing joint training and exchange of personnel.

2 · Boris Yeltsin sends an official letter to the chairman of the Russian Federation Council renewing the mandate of CIS peacekeeping forces in Abkhazia until the end of 1995. CIS peacekeeping forces in Abkhazia, Nagorno-Karabakh, and Tajikistan so far consist entirely of Russian troops, because no other CIS state has “volunteered” to deploy troops to the conflict zones.

5 · An article in Demokratychna Ukrayina analyzes Russia’s geopolitical goals in its so-called “near abroad.” It emphasizes Russia’s inability to resolve serious disputes other than by force, economic coercion, and political manipulation, which exacerbates tensions and instability in the former Soviet republics. One particularly insightful passage from the article says: “In addition to well-tested means for assembling the three Slavic republics around it as the foundation for its future as a renewed superpower-interference in events in the Crimea, the foot-dragging in dividing the Black Sea Fleet, and the use of oil and gas dependence—there exist other ways, such as persistent attempts to draw Ukraine into military-political formations, pressure to establish a joint “external” CIS border, make "internal borders porous," change customs regulations to the Russian Federation's advantage, renew economic cooperation, including in the sphere of manufacturing weapons, and so on." The paper offers an articulate analysis of the important strategic tasks of NATO in banning the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction in this region, and in helping to create a new collective security structure for the region.

8 · Addressing the UN disarmament conference, President Nursultan Nazarbaev says that a vertical, "geopolitical" zone of nations has emerged in Eurasia, which belongs to "neither the West nor the East" in terms of security interests. He defines the zone as containing Russia, Central Asia, Iran, Pakistan, and India. Despite their differences, Nazarbaev says, these states form an "integral group in terms of their potential influence on the balance of forces in Eurasia." He says security in Europe and Asia largely depends on the orientation of these states. And insofar as Russia is the largest and most powerful, its actions "will determine the stability and changes in Eurasia."

16 · Ivan Zayets, the deputy chairman of Ukraine's parliamentary Commission on Foreign Affairs and Relations with CIS Countries, tells an interviewer that the question of Ukraine joining NATO rests on three choices. The first is for Ukraine to become a member of the collective security system of the CIS, that is, the Tashkent military bloc. The second is for Ukraine to agree to special terms with NATO, and remain between the two blocs. The third is for Ukraine to become an equal, full member of NATO. He calls the Tashkent Treaty a "purely military bloc structure," which would contravene Ukrainian legislation. He notes that this bloc unites politically and militarily unstable countries. “Ukraine’s membership in this bloc would distance it from Europe and from the Ukrainian peoples’ choice on 1 December 1991” (Kievskie Vedomosti, 16 June 1995).

21 · In Uzbekistan, visiting Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma stresses Uzbekistan’s important geopolitical position in Central Asia, and says Ukraine looks upon it as a reliable strategic partner. He says he is prepared to raise Ukrainian-Uzbek relations to a higher level. President Karimov tells reporters that “political experts believe that developments in the post-Soviet space will largely depend on the development of relations between Ukraine and Uzbekistan.” He adds that he fully shares that opinion.

22 · General Vasiliy Yakushev, commander of Russian peacekeeping troops in the Georgia-Abkhaz conflict zone, tells reporters that Russia has fulfilled all its commitments under the agreement signed on 14 May 1994 for sending Russian troops into the zone. He says that peace has been established (although he admits it is a rather fragile peace); all armed formations of both warring sides have been withdrawn and peacekeepers have created conditions for the organized return of refugees to their homes. He says that though Russian troops have been criticized for inactivity, he will not use “his boys” as policemen, asserting that “bandits” and “gangs” (not terrorists or combatants) are carrying out “raids” on the peaceful population. His position is that Russian soldiers cannot guarantee the safety of Georgian- Abkhazian citizens because they are there to “stop armed conflict,” not settle “disputes” among “citizens,” which he says must be carried out by political means.

Economic

1 · Trud describes the harsh effects of the Russian economic blockade against Abkhazia, which was supposed to be temporary—six months ago. The article concludes that Abkhazia has only one hope-Turkey—but even the sea routes between Sukhumi, Trebizond, and Istanbul could be cut off, it says. Moscow closed the border with Abkhazia because Chechen gunmen were penetrating it to obtain medical and food supplies. Meanwhile, some deputies in the Russian Duma have initiated discussion on annexing Abkhazia.

5 · An economic integration plan-“Turkestan Is Our Home”- designed to join the five Central Asian states into an economic system has been completed in line with President Islam Karimov’s May initiative. Central Asia accounts for 20 percent of the coal, 18 percent of the gold, and 92 percent of the cotton produced in the former Soviet Union. The plan will attempt to spur economic reforms and speed up the regional industrial and agricultural development of the most competitive areas of the five states’ economies. Great attention has been paid in the plan to unemployment, which is the highest in the CIS states. The total population of the Central Asian nations is about 56 million, which grows at an average annual rate of 1.7 percent.

· Russia reduces its deliveries of gold to Armenia by half and deliveries of silver to less than a third. Platinum and a number of other metals will be reduced due to late payments by Armenian enterprises. The precious and semi-precious metals are used in Armenia’s jewelry industry (Kommersant-Daily, 5 July 1995, p. 4).

6 · Andrey Kozyrev addresses a conference of Russian ambassadors to the CIS states in Moscow saying that integration is based on the principles of “multi-speed” and “multi-option” development. During the speech, he said the CIS customs union was open to any state wishing to join, but reminded the ambassadors that economic integration would require “ever increasing transparency of internal borders.”

7 · The Council of CIS Heads of Government issues a decision recommending the settlement of CIS interstate payments on a bilateral basis, in dollar equivalent terms, employing the value of the ruble in relation to the U.S. dollar on the date payments are made, or as agreed by the parties. It recommends sending disputes to the Economic Court of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

11 · Finansovye Izvestiya, No. 48, p. 3, analyzes the financial status of Armenia and Azerbaijan. In 1995, the budget deficit for Armenia is set for 12 percent of GDP. The Bank of Armenia has announced that it intends to be guided by Western currencies, and that “the Russian ruble is something which we must fight and which must be ousted from domestic monetary turnover.” Currency circulation is highly saturated with dollars. According to some estimates, total dollar capital is three times greater than the volume of money supply in the national currency. The Azerbaijani manat underwent drastic devaluation in 1994, while prices rose by 2,831 percent. The Bank envisions reducing the budget deficit to 4.7 percent of GDP in 1995. Most of the deficit will be covered by bonuses from foreign oil companies on oil contracts and international finance organizations.

12 · Russia and Belarus sign an accord on currency and export regulation. One of the goals is to detect criminal activity in the economic sphere.

13 · Ukraine and Uzbekistan conclude economic exchange agreements (Uzbek gas for Ukrainian machinery and pipes) intended to further reduce both countries’ dependence on Russia. An article in Kommersant Daily (23 June 1995) describes Uzbekistan’s “Turkestan” model of development, oriented toward Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan. In this relationship, Uzbekistan dominates in terms of population and real economic might (it is one of the world's leading producers of gold, cotton, and fuels). The article adds that ethnic Uzbek communities in southern Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan exert a real socio-political and economic influence.

- Turkish private companies have invested about $1.5 billion in Turkmenistan, and Turkey is very interested in building a Turkmenistan-Iran-Turkey-Europe gas pipeline. An interstate council session on prospects for cooperation with Turkmenistan will be held in September.

14 · Rossiyskaya Gazeta publishes the provisions of the CIS Interstate Currency Committee (MVK) Statute, which was signed by the Council of CIS Heads of Government on 26 May. The Committee is a standing body of the CIS, with its own statute under the Agreement on Creation of a Payments Union. The stated goal of the Committee is to develop a system of mutual quotas for soft CIS currencies and the principle for their conversion. To date, the Committee has overseen the signing of bilateral agreements between Russia and Belarus, and Kazakhstan and Turkmenistan.

· An Izvestiya article (20 June 1995) describes the costs of joining the CIS customs union for former USSR republics. Armenia, for instance, calculates that its entry into this union would incur losses of $50 million a year. Other Caucasus states also react coolly to the idea. Georgia, for instance, is considering pegging its currency to the U.S. dollar. However, Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan support the customs union. Trade is hampered by huge indebtedness to Russia. To pay off these debts, the non-Russian states are attracted to markets in the “far abroad” and not to potentially risky institutions such as a payments union or a customs union, which would be dominated by Russia, say the authors.

17 · In Ukraine, President Kuchma announces his support for joining the customs union between Belarus and Kazakhstan. However, he says a free trade agreement needs to be signed first so the two countries may “get accustomed to each other and see how to develop their relations.” He says trade between Belarus and Ukraine has declined, with the main reason being the breakup of relations following the collapse of the USSR. However, he says, “to restore relations is much more difficult than to break them.”

18 · CIS interstate committees have been established on statistical standardization, anti-monopoly laws, aviation, and a number of other economic questions, totaling fifty in all. The Interstate Economic Committee (MEK) has the right to decide how these committees will operate. However, to date they do not work and the Russian deputy minister for CIS Cooperation says “real integration in the CIS is not yet taking place.”

19 · The Georgian journal Mimomkhilveli reports that the “Secret War for Caspian Oil Enters a New Phase.” The war between Russia and Turkey for acquisition of the transport route for Caspian oil has taken on strategic meaning for the United States, which must balance Russia’s influence in the “Eurasian corridor.”

25 · Yerevan hosts a CIS agricultural council session among eight CIS countries. The council will study the Armenian experience of land privatization. Armenia is the only former republic which has fully carried out an extensive land privatization program.

· Russia and Ukraine proceed with plans for re-integrating their economies. Experts agree to create transnational corporations in several industries, including: prospecting, mining, energy resource processing, gas pipeline construction, pipe production, and aluminum production. Four agreements will be signed, the goal of which is to “restore the earlier lost economic ties between the two republics of the former USSR.” Ties will be reforged in machine-building, non-ferrous metals, extraction of oil and gas, and cooperation in the space industry. Ukrainian producers, who have capacity but few raw materials, will receive stable channels of supply while Russia will be spared from building expensive processing enterprises.

- The U.S.-Ukrainian Joint Commission on Trade and Investment meets, in accordance with an agreement signed in May by President Bill Clinton and Leonid Kuchma. Commission experts say the United States supports Ukraine's efforts to join GATT/WTO, and will increase aid to Ukraine for these purposes.

27 · In Russia, First Deputy Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov denies reports of Russia's intentions to apply economic pressure on Azerbaijan to stop its planned development of Caspian Sea oil reserves.

- Ukrainian Prime Minister Evgeniy Marchuk announces that Russia has for the third year in a row restructured its gas debt. Ukraine's gas debt for 1995 totals $1.014 billion, with $100 million owed for natural gas for the winter of 1995. Debts for 1994 total $1.5 billion and for 1993, $2.5 billion.

28 · Kiev Radio reports on Evgeniy Marchuk's trip to Moscow on 25-26 July. Prime Minister Marchuk says four agreements were signed. One provides for joint operation and upkeep of Ukraine's 1,100-kilometer pipeline across Ukraine, which he says is "almost not functioning." He says "this is not a transfer of ownership, but mutual use of the pipeline by Ukraine and Russia." A framework agreement was also signed on principles for establishing Russian- Ukrainian financial-industrial groups. He says that in the near future it is planned to launch at least ten financial-industrial groups, transnational corporations, and joint ventures. One financial-industrial group is already producing aircraft engines.

· Kommersant Daily reports on an authoritative article in Ukrayina Moloda charging Russia with circulating the outline for a plan to discourage the British firm JKC from investing in Ukrainian liquid gas fields located in the Crimea and the adjoining shelf of the Black Sea. The plans are categorically denied by Russian officials. The author is impressed by the expertise and plausibility of the charges, given Russia's potential loss of political influence over Ukraine if significant amounts of British capital were to be invested in Ukrainian gas.

Political

10 · In Strasburg, the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe vote to make Moldova and Albania the thirtyfifth and thirty-sixth members of the Council of Europe. Official recognition of the two will be made at a ceremony on 13 July.

11 · Vladimir Shumeyko, chairman of Russia's Federation Council, visits Georgia in order to sign an interparliamentary cooperation agreement. He stresses that protection of Georgia's territorial integrity is part of Russia's strategic interests. He also promises 10 billion rubles in Russian aid to Georgia to be used for delivery of foodstuffs to Abkhazian citizens. In delivering the aid to Georgia, he stresses that Russia is abiding by international law and does not intend to bypass Georgian authorities.

· The Council of CIS Foreign Ministers meets in Bishkek. Delegations from Russia, Armenia, Ukraine, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, Moldova, and Kyrgyzstan discuss European security, relations with NATO, and strengthening OSCE effectiveness. In a press conference after the meeting, Kyrgyz Foreign Minister Otunbaeva says that although all the ministers desire closer relations with the OSCE, not all agree on CIS foreign policy objectives. The needs of Ukraine, Belarus, and Moldova are different from those of the Central Asian republics and hence require different strategies.

12 · First Deputy Commander-in-chief of the Russian navy Igor Kasatonov criticizes Ukraine for its nonobservance of the Sochi Agreement, which supposedly resolved the Black Sea Fleet issue. President Yeltsin sends a letter to Kuchma urging him to “attentively consider” Russia’s interests, reminding him that the Sochi Agreement calls for a settlement of the issue “as quickly as possible.”

- Nazarbaev and Yeltsin sign a treaty on joint border protection. The treaty provides for a united command for the frontier troops which will guard the external borders of Russia and Kazakhstan.

13 · In Azerbaijan, Russian Federation Council Chairman Vladimir Shumeyko discusses events in the Caucasus while visiting Azeri President Aliiev. He says President Yeltsin has urged him to organize a conference on problems in the Caucasus.

18 · A Kommersant Daily article (24 June 1995) by Professor Anatoliy Kolodkin, president of the Russian International Law Association, discusses the legal status of the Caspian Sea. Kolodkin writes that the 20 November 1993 agreement between Azerbaijan and Russia “On Cooperation in Prospecting and Developing Oil and Gas on the Territory of the Azerbaijan Republic” erroneously implies that the Caspian Sea can be cut up into territorial sectors—a practice he associates with medieval times when a monarch extended his land into bodies of water.

21 · In talks with Austrian Foreign Minister Wolfgang Schalenberg, Moldovan President Snegur reveals that Chisinau’s foreign policy will be directed toward full integration into European structures. He unveils plans for executing this policy and recaps some of the agreements Moldova has already signed working toward this end. Snegur has increasingly expressed his dissatisfaction with Russia and CIS, viewing the body as a vehicle for Russian imperialism.

25 · In a meeting with EU officials in Tashkent, Uzbek President Karimov says his republic desires closer relations with Europe in order to achieve quick integration in the world economy. The parties discuss the geopolitical situation in Central Asia, requirements for transition to a market economy, and ways the republic can lay the groundwork for eventual EU membership.

27 · In Uzbekistan, Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin discusses debt problems with President Karimov, the treatment of the Russian diaspora in Uzbekistan, and the situation in Tajikistan and Afghanistan. Both express the need for a political settlement to the Tajik civil war and Chernomyrdin assures Karimov that Yeltsin will use Russian resolve to aid in this matter. Both express a desire to strengthen bilateral relations.

28 · Following his meeting with Chernomyrdin, President Karimov says Uzbekistan needs Russia, but a “democratic Russia which accepts us as an equal in an all-round way, which welcomes our successes and is ready to hold out its hand and help us.... This is the kind of Russia we consider close to us.” He praises Chernomyrdin for his efforts in helping to consolidate relations between the two, saying if leaders of the Russian Federation “are like [him], then in my personal opinion our cooperation will be consolidated and we will have a good future.”

4 · In Russia, Yeltsin decrees the formation of the “Russian Military Brotherhood.” The goal of the Brotherhood is to strengthen Russian statehood and defense capability, and to foster “military-patriotic education and extrabudgetary funding for military social programs.” Article one of Yeltsin’s edict reads: “1. The Russian Federation Government will examine the Statute on the Russian Military Brotherhood and provide it with comprehensive assistance in its activity” (Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 4 July 1995, p. 5).

6 · In a speech to Russian ambassadors to CIS member states, Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev calls the CIS an important “instrument of stability in the post-Soviet space.” He says the peacemaking burden in the CIS has spread to Georgia, Tajikistan, and Nagorno-Karabakh, and calls on the world community, including the OSCE and the United Nations, to share the load.

· In Russia, Foreign Minister Kozyrev speaks of the need for Russian military bases throughout the CIS, arguing that many CIS states are threatened from the abroad which in turn threatens the security of the Russian Federation. Echoing the thoughts of President Yeltsin, Kozyrev says there is no more important element in Russian foreign policy than to continue integration within the CIS. This, says Kozyrev, “is prompted by life itself.” Kozyrev makes clear that this is not an imperial policy and, indeed, such Russian initiatives are desired in many of the former Soviet republics.

14 · In Georgia, Abkhaz leader Vladislav Ardzinba sends a letter to President Boris Yeltsin protesting a change made at the 26 May summit in the CIS mandate for peacekeeping troops in the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict zone. He especially objects to new items in the mandate which stipulate: the “creation of conditions for the secure and dignified return of (Georgian) refugees and the disbandment and withdrawal of all voluntary formations.” He calls both of these items “interference” in the affairs of local bodies, and that the item on the safe return of refugees is “questionable.”

15 · In Ukraine, Leonid Osavolyuk of the State Committee for the Defense of Ukrainian Borders tells reporters that Russia has still not consented to begin negotiations on the legal delimitation of joint borders. He adds that if Russia continues to drag its feet, Ukraine may unilaterally begin the delimitation of the Ukrainian-Russian border.

· A meeting of the Ukrainian-Moldovan border commission produces a protocol on border delimitation. As an example of problems that must be overcome, Aurelian Danila, head of the Moldovan delegation, reports that Moldovan officials are less ready than their Ukrainian colleagues to discuss the transfer to Ukraine of Moldovan railway assets and infrastructure, based on Ukrainian territorial rights. These problems will be discussed again in October.

18 · Col.-Gen. Dmitriy Volkogonov, prominent historian, says in Krasnaya Zvezda (18 July 1995) that “combat operations in Chechnya have undoubtedly complicated the entire reform process in Russia. The recent conflict between the legislative and executive branches is an added proof of that. The most regrettable thing is that many forces from the Right and Left quite often make use of Chechnya for their own narrow political ends.”

26 · A platoon and a group of officers from the Kyrgyz Republic will take part in NATO exercises in the United States 6-28 August. Kyrgyzstan joined the Partnership for Peace in June 1994. The leadership considers expanding direct contacts between Kyrgyz army units and NATO troops an “imperative of the times.” However, the republic ultimately prefers non-alignment, and its contacts with NATO are only of a “peacekeeping nature,” say Krasnaya Zvezda editors.

28 · A Moskovskie Novosti article examines the potential for a regional security system in Central Asia, led by Russia. The two main problems for Russia are instability in the region resulting from the Tajik conflict and Central Asian leaders' desire to diversify their security contacts. Although all five Central Asian states recognize Russia's special role and interests in the region, not all agree on the real intentions behind Russia's military presence in these states. The article notes that discussions are taking place on the idea of convening a conference in Tashkent on security and confidence measures, with participation of the five Central Asian states, Russia, Afghanistan, Pakistan, India, Iran, and China, under the aegis of the United Nations and with participation by the major international organizations (Moskovskie Novosti, 18- 25 June 1995).

· Lt.-Col. V. Shevchenko, a Ukrainian Supreme Council deputy and member of the Commission on Issues of Defense and State Security, analyzes in Molody Ukrainy the risks for Ukraine of signing the CIS Treaty on a Unified Air Defense System. His concerns are heightened by Belarus's virtual annexation by Russia. He points to the November 1993 Russian Military Doctrine and its influence on Russia's interpretation of the Treaty as another serious concern.

Economic

1 · Russia and Kazakhstan sign an agreement on basic principles of trade and economic cooperation, emphasizing the principle of "equality" in the form of direct contracts between companies. Intergovernment agreements will control how payments are to be made, however. The agreements forbid use of non-tariff barriers to trade, except for products subject to international obligations. According to Russia's Ministry on Cooperation with CIS Member States, Russia has now signed bilateral trade agreements with every CIS country except Azerbaijan.

2 · CIS countries announce they intend to “restore Soviet construction might” through collective construction agreements reached on 2 August entitled “Agreement on Creation of a Common Research and Technological Zone” and “On the Main Principles of Organizing Cooperation Between CIS States.” The CIS countries have reduced their construction outside the former USSR by a factor of four since 1992. Earnings from construction have dropped overall from $4 billion to $1 billion. Experts estimate there is huge potential to recapture these earnings, which number in the thousands, by maintaining and reconstructing facilities already built abroad.

8 · An article in Problemy Teorii i Praktiki Upravleniya provides a detailed analysis of the problems and trends of foreign investment in the CIS. It criticizes foreign investors who concentrate on building assembly plants, and import the parts from their own countries.

15 · Ukraine announces it will develop oil and gas found in the Black Sea shelf, in what it terms “its own economic zone.” It estimates that 1,240 billion cubic meters of gas and 215 million tons of oil are available off Ukraine’s Black Sea coastline. However, current technology owned by Ukraine is incapable of boring deep enough to recover the fuel. Ukraine has therefore announced an international tender to the right to prospect for and process oil and gas on the shelf.

17 · In Russia, an agreement on commercial, economic, and trade cooperation is signed between Moscow and the Gagauz Autonomous Republic.

18 · In Ukraine, the poor condition of the electricity-generating industry may force the country to limit consumption to between four and six hours of power per day. The crisis is due to a lack of fossil fuels for non-nuclear electrical plants. Only two out of eight power units are working, and even that is at reduced capacity. Only with Russia’s help has Ukraine maintained a 49.5 power grid frequency. “If Russia pulls out,” says Deputy Energy Minister Yuriy

Nasedkin, “the automatic system controls will start switching off consumers.”

23 · The Intergovernment Bank (IB) set up to service settlements within the CIS may be granted the right to invest its assets in securities of the countries that invested in the bank’s incorporation capital. IB Council Chairman Tatyana Paramonova (also acting chairman of the RF Central Bank) has pointed out that the IB’s charter should be amended so the bank can widen its powers.

25 · In Russia, an interbank crisis is caused by the insolvency of several banks. The Moscow interbank market stops all operations on 24 August for the first time since the beginning of Russia’s market reforms. The Central Bank is being called upon by unnamed Russian banking representatives to use available financial reserves to prevent a bank crash. Exchange rate restrictions have been extended until the new year in an effort to prevent the dollar’s fall to below 4,400 rubles to the dollar.

· Konstantin Borovoy, leader of the Economic Liberty Party, blames the Russian government’s credit and monetary policy for triggering the banking crisis. In Borovoy’s opinion, the CBR should have lowered its refinancing rate (currently 180 percent per year) long ago and taken measures to bring down the ruble rate. In addition, artificial restrictions on the ruble exchange rate caused economic instability.

26 · An article in Segodnya (26 August 1995, p. 4) reviews the economic crisis in the Dniester region, blaming its lack of statehood status for its poor economic condition.

28 · Foreign investment in Ukraine for the first half-year (1995) increases by $116.3 million over the same period in 1994, totaling $566.4 million. This includes $35.9 million in investment by CIS and Baltic states (6.3 percent of the total).

- Ukraine begins to procure fuel supplies for the winter. A tough winter is predicted, and the state is unprepared. Natural gas supplies are particularly low.

UkrGazProm's accumulated debts to Russia's GazProm stand at US$228 million. Ukrainian economist Volodymyr Chernyak said miscalculations on fuel and energy demand and supply could lead to catastrophic consequences, culminating in a number of oblasts and regional enterprises being disconnected from the energy supply.

- A Belarusian delegation to the IMF blames President Lukashenka's economic policies for the IMF's delay in providing promised loans. Points made by the delegation include: (1) Three years ago Belarus received $100 million; the money disappeared while economic conditions continued to deteriorate; (2) One year ago, the newly established government drafted a reform program, yet almost none of the program's points were accomplished.

29 · In Turkmenistan, the Ministry of Gas and Oil is authorized to accept construction work performed by Ukrainian building companies as payment for gas arrears. Total value of the construction work is US$23.7 million, almost half of Ukraine's gas debt to Turkmenistan.

- In Ukraine, Deputy Prime Minister Viktor Penzenik makes the sensational announcement that "the unique moment” for introducing the national currency-the hryvna has arrived. The opportunity is made possible by a $2 billion reserve stabilization fund and the fact that the country has virtually paid for the gas it uses. He claims the hryvna will be exchanged at a rate of 100,000 karbovantsy to 1 hryvna. The dollar will be hypothetically worth 1.5 hryvna.

- Ukraine will pay GazProm in bonds for past natural gas debts. According to the Russian-Ukrainian agreement on restructuring Ukraine’s debts for natural gas signed 18 March 1995, the bonds may be cashed in twelve years, although Ukraine should begin buying them back in 1997. The Russian bank Natsionalnyy Kredit has been selected as the authorized depositor and payments agent in dealing with loans to Ukraine.

30 · Uzbekistan’s inflation rate is eight times lower than in 1992, and the budget deficit is below the limit coordinated with the IMF. He says the country is capable of becoming self-sufficient in grain and oil production and can eliminate large grain imports.

Political

2 · In Moldova, the chairman of the parliamentary Commission on Human Rights and National Minorities, Vladimir Solonari, argues against joining NATO or the CIS defense system. He says Moldova “cannot go around Kiev,” referring to Ukraine’s position of balanced openness and neutrality, and confirming that Moldova will follow its lead.

3 · In talks between Ukraine and Russia on the Black Sea Fleet, negotiators seek to resolve issues of basing rights and command posts. In the latest Russian proposal, Russia would take Sevastopol as its main base and command post, with minor bases in Feodosiya and Kerch, while Ukraine would utilize bases in Balaklava (outside Sevastopol) and Donuzlav, 140 km northwest of Sevastopol.

6 · In a Lesnaya Gazeta article, Russian commentator Valeriy Begishev questions Russia’s role in FSU republics and the CIS. He observes that Yeltsin’s recent speech to military graduates, in which he says Russia “feels a political and moral responsibility for the fate of the countries and peoples who marched alongside the Russian State for hundreds of years,” is sure to alarm CIS leaders.

7 · Ukraine announces its view that Russian naval ships and forces based in Sevastopol should be categorized as a foreign military force on the territory of another country. Under international law, the foreign country would be required to pay rent for the facilities and compensate the host country for environmental damage. Instead, the Russians want Sevastopol to be given Russian territorial status.

· In Belarus, Deputy Chief of Staff Vladimir Zametalin accuses the Russian media of campaigning against Lukashenka and his policies. He says he is convinced such activity is orchestrated by certain Russian circles “opposed to integration in the CIS.”

10 · Belarusian First Deputy Foreign Minister Valery Tsapkala discusses Belarus’s foreign policy. He says Belarus needs to forge close relations with its neighbors, Russia, Poland, Ukraine, and the Baltics and says relations with these nations should focus on economic cooperation and contacts. Furthermore, Belarus maintains its neutral military position. The minister calls for a pan-European collective security arrangement, saying that NATO is obsolete because its purpose was to contain communism. Instead, he affirms the post-Cold War importance of the OSCE and the UN.

15 · In Tbilisi, the Abkhaz Council of Ministers expresses alarm about U.S. “activism” in the Transcaucasus, especially its contribution to constitution drafting in the region.

31 · During a special session of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly, Russian Deputy Chairman of the Federation Council Valerian Viktorov argues that the United Nations should endorse the role of CIS peacekeeping forces in CIS hot spots where UN resources are insufficient to conduct full-scale peacekeeping operations. Viktorov argues that one of the main problems for the United Nations is to ensure a regional approach to peace and security. To date, Viktorov says neither the United Nations nor the OSCE have provided adequate assistance in preventing and settling regional conflicts, including Nagorno-Karabakh, Transdnistria, and Abkhazia.

Security

4 · In Ukraine, Deputy Foreign Minister Konstantin Krushchenko discusses defense cooperation with Kazakh Defense Minister Saghatat Nurmaghambetov. Kazakhstan is interested in training its personnel in Ukraine, exchanging teaching manuals and training methods, and sending some of its weapon systems to Ukraine for repair.

5 · Belarus delays the transfer of its strategic nuclear missiles to Russia. A Belarusian official says the Russian Defense Ministry is having problems in preparing for the transfer because of Chechnya.

· Izvestiya publishes an article that alludes to the growing unpopularity of Turkmen President Sapamurad Niyazov. The regime has built shrines to Niyazov, instituted a leadership cult around him, and indoctrinates youth with loyalty “oaths” and other forms of dogma. A large resistance movement seems to be forming. One youth is quoted as saying “No one in our school intends to learn the oath of the Turkmen.” The catastrophic state of the economy, in which many are half-starving, adds fuel to the fires of resentment and alienation.

8 · Writing in Rossiyskie Vesti, Gennadiy Voronin, deputy chairman of the Russian Federation State Committee for Defense Industries, details the perilous state of Russia’s shipbuilding industry. The number of warship expeditions has been cut by three-fourths and duty calls to foreign ports by “several tens.” Less than one-quarter of scheduled repair work is being carried out. Ships which have not served half of their established service lives are being decommissioned from the fleet. Technical facilities and installations are below standard. The bulk of the warships are laid up, especially large ones such as the heavy nuclear-powered missile cruisers Lazarev and Nakhimov. Four of five aircraft-carrying cruisers have been decommissioned. The average age of Russian ships is substantially greater than that of U.S. ships. The author recommends that a “law on the state defense order” be enacted immediately.

10 · Belarusian Defense Minister Valery Tsapkala refers to the CIS Collective Security Pact as “purely a consultative mechanism,” which does not abrogate Belarusian neutrality.

It has no supranational control over Belarusian armed forces. Belarus could not deploy forces without express authorization by its Supreme Council.

- In Russia, Andrey Kokoshin, first deputy defense minister, and Army General Mikhail Kolesnikov, chief of the Russian Federation Army General Staff, meet with administration heads to discuss the army's urgent winter food situation. The Defense Ministry tells the government that defense spending must be "brought into line with real prices" and "regularized," meaning that it must be raised.

- Russian naval command sends orders to headquarters of the Black Sea Fleet to dismantle the flight control center at the aerodrome of Gvardeiskoe (Simferopol, Crimea) before 16 October. Fifty percent of the aerodrome facilities, equipment, arms, property, and material resources are to be transferred to Ukraine's navy by that date. One Russian military expert says that if carried out, the dismantlement would mean the loss of Russian control over Crimean air space for the Black Sea Fleet command.

11 · Karavan (11 August 1995) describes the Kazakh army's many serious problems. Seventy percent of all former officers have been discharged over the past three years-and not only Russian speakers, as some claim. Accordingly, there is a shortage of officers in the army and in the Ministry of Defense. Another problem is the embezzlement of army property and arms, which is rampant. Add to this starvation, homelessness, and no pay and you have a thoroughly demoralized and incompetent army.

17 · Belarus suspends the transfer to Russia of its last eighteen SS-25s. Lukashenka is quoted (without full corroboration) saying: “since we are going to unite with Russia anyway, then why should we aimlessly ship military equipment to and fro?” Belorusskaya Delovaya Gazeta suggests that Belarus did not make the decisions about which weapons to keep. He points out that Boris Yeltsin left Minsk on 22 February 1995 after very successful meetings with President Lukashenka. The next day, Lukashenka announced that Belarus would not scrap its tanks. Perhaps, the author writes, Russia is testing out a trump card, which is the presence of a nuclear sword located directly at NATO’s possible future borders.

22 · Lt.-Gen. Evgeniy Malashenko, former chief of staff of the Carpathian Military District, reviews Russian “military reform” at length in Krasnaya Zvezda (22 August 1995). It recommends that Russia reinforce its troops in the West and North Caucasus because in the West there used to be troops from four groups and four military districts, but now there is just one—the Moscow District, which has become a “border district.”

24 · Russian Maj.-Gen. Vladimir Osadchiy reports that expenditures on the Chechnya war have outstripped the military budget for fiscal year 1994-95 by 1.9 trillion rubles. He says the desperate situation in the army and the navy result from the fighting in Chechnya and from “financial errors” by the Ministry of Finance, noting in particular that the Defense Ministry tops the list of Russia’s debtors and has no funds to pay servicemen or civilian personnel.

28 · Russian Atomic Energy Minister Viktor Mikhaylov

says on television that Russia is destroying chemical weapons using underground nuclear explosions. Even though such explosions contravene the nuclear test ban treaty, currently drafted, the method is “approximately 100 times cheaper than any other means,” says the minister. He says he does not take seriously France and China’s rationale for carrying out additional nuclear tests.

· Defense Minister Pavel Grachev announces that “nuclear weapons will remain Russia’s main war deterrent.” At a meeting marking the fiftieth anniversary of the Russian nuclear industry, Grachev argues “nuclear force must be adequate to the likelihood of a possible threat,” and warns that Russia should not lag behind other nuclear countries in security matters.

29 · A new S-300 missile complex is established in southern Ukraine, near Kherson. Military authorities witness a powerful missile salvo “destroy” sixteen Mi-8 helicopters and Su-23 aircraft in less than a minute. The new missile complex was developed by Ukrainian specialists with Russian participation.

30 · In Uzbekistan, parliament approves the country’s military doctrine of neutrality. The doctrine prohibits Uzbekistan from producing, purchasing, or deploying nuclear weapons and favors the indefinite extension of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Uzbekistan “considers it inadmissible to replace the previous ideological confrontation between East and West with confrontation based on ethnic and religious grounds.”

September 1995

1 · Yeltsin delivers a strong speech to Russia's commercial bankers and entrepreneurs. He emphasizes that the Russian government intends to hold the line on reducing inflation. He says, "People tell me that high inflation is to the advantage of some banks. When inflation is high, dubious debts rapidly depreciate.... The leadership of such banks does not pay a high price for miscalculations.... But if you (want financial stabilization), then support the state's efforts to solve the problem of inflation." He emphasizes the necessity for banks to finance the industrial sectors, and not to let Russia become a country "that develops only its raw material sectors."

4 · Aleksandr Lukashenka announces that Belarus will build “market socialism.” He defines this as “a society with a high degree of social protection, a strong material and moral motivation to work, without shortages or cues....” He calls for a “new pricing and financial-credit policy” in order to keep the country self-sufficient in foodstuffs. This policy, he says, should “keep the incomes of the farmers at a level which encourages them to increase production, making the social standing of the urban and rural population more or less equal .. .”

11 · The Ukrainian State Oil, Gas, and Oil-Processing Industries Committee chairman, Yevhen Covzhok, asks Russia to pay more for its natural gas shipments to Europe through Ukrainian territory. Russia now pays $0.55 per 1,000 cubic meters of gas per kilometer, but Ukraine wants to increase this rate to US$1.6. Ukraine also asks Russia to pay for the gas to keep transit machines operating, which brings the total price to US$1.75 per 1,000 cubic meters. Ukraine plans to sign three separate treaties covering purchasing, transit, and storage of natural gas.

12 · Ukrainian President Kuchma and St. Petersburg Mayor Anatoliy Sobchak sign a trade and economic cooperation agreement. Kuchma laments that the Black Sea Fleet remains a significant problem, and that Ukraine gets “all the blame for this problem....” Sobchak says he believes the fleet should belong to all the former Soviet republics.

14 · The Russian Fuel and Energy Ministry is instructed to coordinate with the Kazakhstani government the question of guaranteed deliveries via the Caspian Pipeline Consortium network of 4.5 million tons of Kazakhstani oil per year. The American company Chevron, which is conducting oil drilling operations at the Tengiz deposit, is left out of the deal. Oman has promised to provide most of the necessary financing, including its own investment and loans from Western banks. However, many large banks have turned the project down.

Political

1 · The head of Kazakhstan's State Committee for Cooperation with CIS Countries, Kalyk Abdullaev, says the committee's work is distinguished from that of the Foreign Ministry in that the committee works with all state agencies in implementing agreed CIS policies, whereas the Foreign Ministry assists in the determination and deliberation of those policies. Put succinctly, the committee's work is to achieve the "utmost promotion of integration processes and the restoration of economic ties."

3 · The UK announces it will support Ukraine's admission to the Council of Europe despite the outcome of Russia's bid for entry. Rifkind assured Ukrainian Supreme Council Chairman Oleksandr Moroz that British representatives were already advancing Ukraine's admission at a Paris meeting of the Political Affairs Committee of the Council of Europe. In their talks, Rifkind also encouraged Ukraine to take full advantage of NATO's Partnership for Peace program, ensuring Moroz that the organization's enlargement threatens no one.

6 · In Russia, the CIS parliamentary speakers from

Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Russia meet at IPA headquarters in St. Petersburg to assess the conflicts in the Caucasus. While they differ on settlement approaches, the leaders agree that resolution is paramount for stability in the entire Transcaucasus region. The parliamentarians, according to IPA chairman Shumeyko, “did everything within their status to influence developments in the region.”

11 · Aleksandr Lukashenka demands the creation of a political-military bloc of CIS states, asserting that such a body is necessary to confront NATO enlargement. Lukashenka believes a military-political bloc within the CIS structure would prove invaluable for world security: “What is happening in the Balkans today could not have happened ten years ago when the Soviet Union acted as the guarantor of stability in the world,” he claims.

· Sergey Naumchik, leader of the Belarusian Popular Front, denounces Lukashenka for supporting the idea of building a CIS military bloc. He feels that such a bloc would threaten Belarus’s neutrality doctrine, as stipulated in the constitution. Moreover, he argues, Belarusian participation would “forever block integration into European institutions, at the same time aggravating the domestic situation and increasing tensions within Belarusian society.”

12 · Russian, Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Kazakh officials declare in a jointly published statement that most CIS states would be unable to fulfill their CFE treaty obligations by the November 17 deadline due to economic hardships. All four claim that funds are not available to dismantle military equipment and weapons falling under the CFE treaty.

14 · Chairman of Moldova's United Democratic Congress Party Valeriu Matei states that most Moldovan politicians and academics oppose the military-political bloc proposed by Belarusian President Lukashenka. Matei argues that such a bloc would lead to restoration of the Soviet Union and "smother the former Soviet states' independence and sovereignty."

· Kyrgyzstan indicates that it will soon join the customs union treaty currently participated in by Russia, Belarus, and Kazakhstan.

15 · Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin flies to Tbilisi for talks with Shevardnadze. The two discuss a number of bilateral agreements covering railway transportation, legal codes covering criminal, civil, and family cases, pensions, currency, and export control.

- Belarusian Foreign Minister Syanko denies President Lukashenka ever proposed establishment of a military bloc, but says he merely spoke of the past when the Warsaw Pact could have prevented the Yugoslav crisis. Syanko says journalists misreported what the president actually said. Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev says such a formation is proceeding within the CIS Collective Security framework, but that the treaty seeks to “strengthen the common security of our states and realize our common interests.” In fact, says Kozyrev, “Russia is against a new division of blocs.”

16 · The presidential decree “Russia’s Strategic Policy Toward the CIS” is published. Tenets of the policy include:

- ensuring overall stability in political, military, economic, humanitarian, and legal areas;
- helping ensure political and economic stability in the CIS states that will pursue friendly relations with Russia;
- positioning Russia as the leading force in a new system of economic and political relations;
- solidifying the CIS integration process; and
- positioning Russia as the leading educational center and ensuring generations to come are educated with a favorable Russian view.

Much of the document envisages stepped-up efforts toward military integration, consolidation of the Collective Security Treaty, and implementation of previous CIS defense agreements. The new policy asserts that concerted efforts must be taken to position the CIS as a leading regional organization “which can enter into sweeping cooperation with leading international forums and organizations.”

26 · Prime Minister Akezhan Kazhygeldin says Kazakhstan supports Russia’s new strategic policy toward the CIS. He sees no “dictatorial” mandate in it. He agrees with Russia’s placing heightened importance on CIS relations, and less on those with the West.

· Baktybek Abdrisaev, head of the Kyrgyz president’s commission on international relations, says Kyrgyzstan welcomes the new Russian policy edict toward the CIS. He praises the Russian leadership for rebuilding relations with the former Soviet republics “in a well-balanced and soberthinking fashion.”

· Borys Oliynyk, chairman of the Ukrainian Commission on CIS relations, says he is not surprised by the September 15 Yeltsin edict and says Ukraine will not support the document. He says it contains the seeds of potential conflict among the CIS member states because each has its own strategic goals. This policy, he feels, leaves little room for flexibility and Russia clarifies Russia’s hegemonic aims in the CIS. He particularly objects to the article that tries to forbid CIS states from entering into international fora and institutions that might “compete with the CIS.”

Security

6 · Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev visits several new military schools which have been established in Russia's Far East. In one of his speeches, he credits the Russian army with saving Russia from disintegration. He gives a speech to military officials on military reform.

8 · Tajik President Rakhmonov visits President Boris Yeltsin in Moscow to sign several bilateral agreements. He says Russia is Central Asia's security guarantor. "Russia's readiness to render our republic material and technical aid, financial and food assistance, preparation for a customs union, and establishment of Russian-Tajik financial and industrial groups provides graphic evidence that Russia is Tajikistan's principal strategic partner," he says.

13 · Leonid Kravchuk, former president of Ukraine, says Ukraine's only foreign policy option is to balance between Russia and the West. "The main difficulty (in Ukraine's relations with Russia) is the mentality of the Russian leadership, which still does not see Ukraine as an equal partner in the international arena."

· President Kuchma denies that Ukraine's overtures toward NATO will intensify tensions in its relations with Russia. He strongly criticizes President Boris Yeltsin's recently expressed intention to form an opposing military bloc should the Western alliance choose to expand.

14 · The super-modern antisubmarine vessel, the Admiral Chabanenko (named after the legendary Northern Fleet Commander Andrey Trofimovich Chabanenko), is returned to the Russian navy by the Yantar shipyard on the Baltic Sea where it has been assigned to the Northern Fleet.

· Ukraine and NATO launch a series of political dialogues on the “sixteen plus one” formula. Until now, Russia has been the only member of the Partnership for Peace engaged in a privileged “special relationship” with NATO. The “sixteen plus one” program envisages holding joint exercises, training assistance, exchanges of experiences with peacekeeping operations, and assistance with establishing democratic means of controlling national armed forces.

- President Kuchma meets with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in Kiev on 13 September to speak about Ukraine’s determination to maintain its independence. He clarifies his intention to adopt a pro-American policy, but suggests a tripartite Ukrainian-Israeli-U.S. cooperation program, saying that Israel has a vested interest in maintaining “a strong and stable Ukraine.” Kuchma explains that Ukraine purchases oil from Iran because Russia has raised its prices, but that Ukrainian-Iranian ties are strictly civilian, and there will be no military cooperation. Earlier in the day President Kuchma's staff tells Rabin that Russia has asked Ukraine to join its nuclear deal with Iran, but Ukraine turns down the offer.

· CIS Foreign Ministry representatives meet at the Headquarters for Coordination of CIS Military Cooperation. CIS Executive Secretary for Military Cooperation and Security Oleg Putintsev says the purpose of the meeting is to define peacekeeping in the CIS member states. Putintsev reports that each state supports a "peacekeeping" role for the CIS, but refers to constitutional limitations on its participation. The Russian delegation proposes to wait for a response from the United Nations and the OSCE on its request for recognition as "peacekeeper" in the region. Belarus strongly objects. It is decided to resume the discussion on 27 September, after which a definition will be submitted to the Council of CIS Heads of State.

15 · President Boris Yeltsin issues an edict announcing a new Russian "Strategic Policy Toward the Commonwealth of Independent States" (see Chapter 3).

6 · Ukrainian Foreign Minister Gennadiy Udovenko sends a confidential letter to President Kuchma, which is published by the Ukrainian Independence paper. Udovenko negatively assesses Russia's strategic policy toward the CIS which has been approved by President Boris Yeltsin. He says the Ukrainian Foreign Ministry deems it necessary to assess the admissible level of Ukraine's economic dependence on Russia and determine the number of enterprises which are "tied" to the Russian economy and could not function if economic relations with Russia were broken. Udovenko suggests that the countries whose views on the CIS are close to Ukraine's should work out a joint approach to resolving problems related to the CIS. "Russia has no intention to work out its relations with the CIS in line with international law, respecting their territorial integrity, sovereignty, and the principle of non-interference into domestic affairs," Udovenko says. He says the "integration, whose necessity is proclaimed in Yeltsin's corresponding decree" in fact means undermining the CIS countries' sovereignty, subordinating their activity to Russia's interests and restoring the centralized superpower." Udovenko continues that: "It should be considered possible that following its earlier proclaimed attempt, Russia will declare Ukraine a bankrupt state and demand that Ukraine compensate its debt by its property." He says he believes Moscow might take several steps. It "may put forward property claims and demand that Kiev transfer to Russia the Ukrainian network of main pipelines and gas storage facilities, control blocs of shares in enterprises of the key industries, etc." Udovenko expresses regret over the publication of his confidential letter to Kuchma and tells the press the letter is not an official document.

19 · Ukrainian Prime Minister Evgeniy Marchuk says the core Russian-Ukrainian economic agreements for 1996 will be signed before the end of November. He is referring to agreements on trade and economic cooperation between Ukraine and Russia in 1996, and on gas supplies to Ukraine and transit of Russian and Turkmen gas through Ukrainian territory. Marchuk says he believes that the situation concerning free trade within the CIS “is getting more complicated rather than easier” following the creation of the customs union between Russia, Belarus, and Kazakhstan. He says that after the treaty on the customs union comes into effect, Ukraine and Kazakhstan will have to coordinate their bilateral trade relations with “supranational structures.”

23 · A high-ranking Russian diplomat tells Interfax that Moscow has received no official explanation from either the Azerbaijani government or the international oil consortium concerning the decision to accept two routes for exporting crude oil from the southern part of the Caspian Sea-through Russia and through Georgia. The decision was made at the beginning of October. He says Moscow does not object to the parallel transportation of crude oil on the condition that the Russian pipeline is given priority. “Up to Novorossiysk, the Russian oil pipeline is in need of minor repair, estimated at about $60 million. The construction of the Georgian pipeline is still to be completed, which will require an investment of $200 million to $300 million, and will take about eighteen months,” says the diplomat.

31 · The deputy speaker of the Georgian parliament calls the international oil consortium’s decision to transport Azeri oil across Georgia “comparable only with the republic’s entry into the UN.” Referring to Russia’s role, he says that the Russian side was essential, because Georgia would not have been able to transport oil across its territory on its own.” In the deputy speaker’s opinion, “the decision to transport Azeri oil across Georgia is just the start of an international program to build a Eurasian oil pipeline across Georgia and Azerbaijan.”

4 · A suggestion to convert schools in eastern Ukraine to the Ukrainian language causes an outpouring of political passions, especially in Russian-speaking Kharkov. Some candidates for deputies in the elections make names for themselves by promising not to permit the forcible Ukrainianization of the schools. Most of the schools remain Russian-speaking after the uproar, while volunteer classes in Ukrainian language are instituted.

5 · Viktor Timoshenko, writing in Nezavisimaya Gazeta, says that unlike some other CIS participants, the Russian Foreign Ministry has its own plans for “closer integration.” A meeting of CIS foreign ministers in Moscow-six ministers from Azerbaijan, Armenia, Georgia, Russia, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan and six first deputies from Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, Moldova, and Ukraine-ends in failure to sign any of the seventeen documents they discuss. Russia was interested in creating a concept of CIS peacekeeping activities, so it put forward several ideas on forming working agencies a Council and a Secretariat of CIS Collective Security-as well as a draft procedure for funding peacekeeping functions. Ukraine took greatest exception to these proposals, saying “the legitimacy of peacekeeping activity is determined by already existing authoritative international organizations.” The second package put forward by the Russians was coordination of the CIS countries’ actions on the international scene. The Russian delegation believes united CIS working agencies should be set up to coordinate CIS relations with ASEAN, UNESCO, and other international organizations. These proposals found no support either. The conference was supposed to pave the way for the CIS summit planned for late October 1995, but no decision on the summit was made. The date will likely be moved further down the road.

· Ukrainian Supreme Council Chairman Oleksandr Moroz and Polish Sejm Speaker Jozef Zych announce at their 5 October meeting that Ukraine and Poland should coordinate their actions in the Council of Europe by working out common decisions and defending them. The two speakers also agree to coordinate their countries' legislation. Moroz stresses that following the Council of Europe's decision to admit Ukraine, both countries have "equal responsibility for the situation in Europe."

· Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma, speaking at a meeting with Polish Sejm Speaker Jozef Zych in Kiev, says that Ukraine and Poland are strategic partners not only in rhetoric but in action. Kuchma adds that Ukrainian Defense Minister Valeriy Shmarov is visiting Poland at that moment, and that a consultative meeting of the Ukrainian and Polish presidents has been held recently.

10 · An article in a Lvov publication, Post-Postup, entitled "In the East Ukraine Borders Russia, in the West, America," says Kiev must balance between two axes-Washington and Moscow-in its geopolitics. The article appraises Prime Minister Evgeniy Marchuk's October visit to the United States. On the economic level, things did not go well. The IMF has established the condition on U.S. credits to the Ukrainian economy that mandatory sales of hard currency by enterprises must be abolished, yet the Ukrainian parliament has prepared a draft resolution calling for 100 percent mandatory sale of hard currency! Illustrating Ukraine's method of playing Washington off against Moscow, Marchuk stated that, "in the event of Moscow's unconstructive policy with regard to the Black Sea Fleet base, Kiev does not rule out a possibility to appeal to the United States for arbitration."

12 · An article by Tetyana Sylina in Siliske Zhyttya (Ukrainian) entitled "The CIS Train Has Been Offered a ‘Strategic’ Course, Ukraine Is in No Hurry to Stand in Line for a Ticket,” reveals Ukraine’s position on the recently promulgated Russian edict (14 September) proclaiming a new strategic policy toward the CIS. The following excerpts are taken from the article:

“To all appearances the already notorious ‘Strategic Course of Russia Toward Developing Relations with CIS Countries’ was born without assistance from the Russian Foreign Ministry. This conclusion is obvious even after a superficial glance over the document’s blunt wording, which makes it more like a manifesto.... As for who concocted the manifesto, society was denied that knowledge. There are many institutions and officials who consider themselves experts on foreign policy issues, including the Commonwealth Affairs Ministry and the Duma Committee for CIS Affairs and Relations with Compatriots, as well as ‘analysts’ of the Russian Defense Ministry and KGB in the [Yeltsin advisor Aleksandr] Korzhakov mold.... Although not particularly enthusiastic about its implementation, the CIS countries have regained the gift of speech. Upon returning from Moscow, the Ukrainian delegation (led by Deputy Foreign Minister Kostyantyn Hryshchenko) noted with pleasure: ” ‘For the first time ever, the Ukrainian stance was consistently supported by many states. In the past, on the eve of every summit, they whispered into our ears, ‘You guys are our last hope.’ During the summit, however, they preferred to keep quiet and watch Ukraine ‘throwing itself at the tank.’ Outspoken about its refusal to dance in the crowd, Ukraine appeared to outside observers as a lonely heretic facing isolation.... This time, we have chosen a different path, thinking not only about whether, and why, proposals made by integrators from Moscow are not suitable for us, but also why they are unacceptable to others. And it turned out that if you convincingly point out the unfounded and premature nature of an idea, they start to listen to you. If a Moscow proposal is unacceptable, you may come up with your own .... Our delegation went to Moscow with two proposals: to enforce the notion of 'state' rather than 'internal' or 'external' CIS borders, and ... to examine the issue of CIS support for returning deported citizens.... When signatories of the Tashkent Treaty (Collective Security Treaty) approved a set of documents about the financing and activities of the Collective Security Council, Ukraine demurred. As of today, there is no clear concept of the collective security system in the CIS. Nor has it been decided against 'whom' or 'what' the Commonwealth should defend itself. Besides, who is supposed to defend it? After the collapse of the Soviet Union, only Russia and Ukraine were left with big armies. The rest of the states have 'toy' armies that are short of equipment, qualified officers, and recruits. One can understand their intention to hide under someone's 'security umbrella.' It is unlikely, however, that everyone will feel comfortable under such an 'umbrella' because everyone has different geopolitical interests. Therefore, one can state that the CIS collective security system is presently nothing more than a political slogan."

13 · Moldovan President Mircea Snegur says that relations with Russia have priority for Moldova over those with Romania and Ukraine. As an "economic member of the CIS," Moldova is at the same time orienting itself toward "Western values in politics and economy." The partnership agreement with the EU and the "Partnership for Peace" with NATO should ensure Moldova's stability, says the president. Moldova does not want to become a member of any military bloc, nor agree to a stationing of troops.

20 · In an interview with Kievskie Vedomosti, Russian State Duma Chairman Ivan Rybkin is questioned about Russian- Ukrainian relations. One year has passed since the Ukrainian parliament's speaker, Oleksandr Moroz, visited Russia. No reciprocal visit by the Russian speaker has been made. Rybkin indicates that relations are cool. His answers are evasive and repeat the "formula" provided by the Foreign Ministry. He urges

Ukraine to join the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly (IPA). He says that the Russian delegations go to meetings of the IPA with copies of adopted Russian laws and bills; every CIS parliament is given the “opportunity to become familiar with these bills.” Asked whether he is satisfied with the Russian parliament’s Committee for CIS Affairs and Ties with Compatriots, which many Ukrainians believe engages in activities that violate their direct functions and serve to weaken ties between Ukraine and Russia, Rybkin replies evasively, recounting the difficulties encountered by the 25 million Russians living outside their “homeland.” He says the problem of Crimea is a “tough problem,” referring to Crimea as a “component of Ukraine,” but then saying: “All decisions regarding Crimea should be well-considered and take into account the Crimean people’s will.” He says the Black Sea Fleet is still a problem, especially in the context of the Yugoslav civil war, implying that Ukraine is trying to join the NATO military bloc by participating in NATO peacekeeping units in Bosnia. When asked whether Russia and Ukraine are in a “state of cold war,” he answers: “I am sure our relations could be closer, and I wish they were. We should not stick to any narrow selfish nationalistic interests, many of which are fictitious.”

26 · Ukrainian President Kuchma, touring Latin America, tells journalists in Brasilia that “Russia bears in mind only its own interests in relations with other CIS countries.” He feels “neither respect nor common equal partnership” with Russia, he says. The problem of the Black Sea Fleet could have been solved much sooner, he believes. “Ukraine is making great concessions on this issue,” he adds.

27 · During President Leonid Kuchma’s visit to Buenos Aires, Ukraine and Argentina are to sign a declaration on the principles of political relations respected by both states.

28 · Konstantin Zatulin, chairman of the Russian State Duma Committee for CIS Issues and Contacts with the Diaspora, talks about the 20 October resolution on the development of integration processes between the Russian Federation and Belarus. This is a resolution “To discuss the need to hold a Russia-wide referendum on relations with the Republic of Belarus after the program for integration is drafted.” The first clause of the resolution reads: “To recommend that the president of the Russian Federation submit for discussion by the Russian Federal Assembly the program for integration between Russia and Belarus.” Asked what prompted the Duma to pass the resolution, Zatulin says the Duma considered the 14 May referendum in Belarus which confirmed that the Belarusian nation is striving to reunite with Russia. In light of this referendum the Duma wanted to express its absolute support for profound integration between the two states. State Duma deputies “expect that further rapprochement between our two countries ... will contribute to the increase of their wealth, ... facilitate the development of Slavic culture, and strengthen Russia’s and Belarus’s authority in the international arena.”

Security

6 · Col.-Gen. Viktor Samsonov, chief of staff for Coordinating Military Cooperation Among CIS States, writes in Krasnaya Zvezda that events in the Balkans are assuming a dangerous character, necessitating the immediate formation of a CIS mechanism for joint consultations so as to coordinate their positions (on Bosnia). He writes that “such actions by the CIS should not be viewed as the formation of a bloc and return to confrontation. In the current international atmosphere this is above all an attempt to ensure their own security by collective efforts within the framework of a regional collective security system.” He goes on to say that “Military security is just one of the many forms of security that the majority of countries want to achieve. The practice of world development shows that this goal can be achieved in practice only on the basis of the pooling of states’ efforts.

. . The objective conditions for the formation of such an alliance based on the community of interests and military-political aims already exist in the CIS states. The corresponding interstate documents reflecting the countries' desire for closer cooperation in the military security sphere also exist." He writes further that implementation of CIS security agreements would "increase CIS influence on the development of world events directly affecting their collective interests." All of this implies that Samsonov is arguing for collective intervention by CIS states in the Yugoslav conflict, or at least coordination of the CIS position with Russia's perceived interests.

11 · Within the framework of the interstate agreement between the Republic of Kazakhstan and Russia "On Joint Efforts to Protect the CIS Countries' External Borders," Russian and Kazakh border guards will perform joint service in Kazakh outposts. Maj.-Gen. Vladislav Prokhoda has been appointed commander-in-chief of these troops.

13 · Pavel Tarasenko, commander of the Russian Border Troops in Tajikistan, says in a news conference that the Tajik-Afghan border is subject to violent attacks by the Tajik opposition forces and that more than 1,500 opposition fighters are poised on the border, prepared to attack. Opposition authorities describe these words as "lies and slander." They say the Tajik united opposition's military forces are not preparing to attack, but are awaiting the fifth round of negotiations, and want peace in the region.

19 · Ukrainian Defense Minister Valeriy Shmarov says

Ukraine will not join with Moscow in any future military alliance aimed at countering NATO, but neither does Ukraine intend to seek full membership in the Western alliance. Reacting to a recent veiled threat by Russia to create a new military bloc to counter an eastward expansion of NATO, he says: "Ukraine is a neutral state, is not a member of any bloc, and will not take part in any military bloc." The minister says Ukraine has joined NATO's Partnership for Peace scheme and "is currently looking at ways of cooperating with the Western alliance," but will under no circumstances join NATO's management structure. On 25 September Defense Minister Pavel Grachev had warned that if any of the three former Soviet Baltic republics were to join NATO, Russia would "create its own alliance." Shmarov's reply, made during a visit to the autonomous republic of Crimea, comes on the same day that Russian President Boris Yeltsin says he will sack his foreign minister, the strongly pro-Western Andrey Kozyrev. Kozyrev's fall is seen as symptomatic of a hardening of Russian attitudes against the West in general and NATO in particular.

23 · Eduard Baltin, commander of the Black Sea Fleet, does not intend to carry out a single decision of the commander-in-chief of Russia's navy and the Ukrainian defense minister regarding the transfer of the Black Sea Fleet infrastructure until a corresponding decision is adopted by the presidents of Russia and Ukraine.

27 · The Russian State Duma adopts the Russian Federation Law "On Defense" in its third reading. The new law makes a number of organizational changes, such as providing for involvement in defense of the border troops, the internal troops, the railway troops, FAPSI (Federation Government Communications and Information Agency) troops, and civil defense troops. Article 10 says: "The Russian Federation president can use the Russian Federation Armed Forces to perform tasks that fall outside their remit in accordance with federal laws." The law remains to be brought into force (or not), which will depend on the Federation Council and the Russian Federation president. One of the drafters does not expect the law to have an easy passage or to be quickly approved by presidential edict. Debates are inevitable.

29 · In the Russian parliament the Russia's Choice bloc criticizes the recent increase in the military budget in connection with an increase of the army by 200,000 men, which will cost the budget 2.7 trillion rubles.

31 · Abkhazian Premier Gennadiy Gagulia announces that Russia has lifted its sea blockade of Abkhazia and the port of Sukhumi is reopening.

November 1995

8 · Ukrainian officials call for a new free trade agreement between bordering oblasts of Ukraine, Russia, and Belarus, which is supposed to boost local trade. A previous agreement signed in 1993 is judged ineffective because 200 commodities, including fuels, non-ferrous metals, timber, and cellulose, were not put on the list and are still subject to non-tariff regulations.

14 · Ukrainian President Kuchma holds talks with top Chinese leadership on military-technical cooperation. Ukrainian-Chinese trade reached $900 million in 1994. Most of this was Ukrainian exports ($850 million).

China is interested in the Nikolaev Shipbuilding Yards, capable of building large warships and auxiliary craft.

15 · Writing in the Kazakh journal Karavan-Blits, Viktor Verk expresses his view that if the communists come to power in Russia and if Viktor Chernomyrdin is toppled, Almaty will be forced to give up several planned joint programs, particularly the establishment of joint financial and industrial groups. He explains that left-of-center parties in Russia are calling for restrictions on assistance from Moscow to former “little brothers.” The Zyuganov faction receives its mandate from populist promises it makes to voters. Furthermore, as communists move to fulfill their slogans of “restoring the USSR,” relations with Kazakhstan will become “frosty.” Verk believes that attempts to play the Russophone card will intensify because Zyuganov is closer to nationalist patriotism than to orthodox communism. “Things have never worked out well when we have had Russian nationalist patriots in charge of things,” he explains. Verk says people who believe that once “reds” take over in Russia, the same will happen in Kazakhstan, are wrong because the Kazakh communists have no program. He conjectures further that Russian communists might grant one of the petitions that claim the electoral law is unconstitutional, which could delay the emergence of a new Duma indefinitely.

21 · Russian Fuel and Energy Minister Yuriy Shafrannik says Russian-Ukrainian trade turnover has grown by 1 percent in 1995. He believes that next year the trade turnover will grow primarily through more Russian energy supplies to Ukraine. Ukraine’s total energy debt to Russia for 1995 is $186 million compared to $133 million for 1994. Ukraine plans to cover $60 million of the debt by supplying nine fishing vessels to Russia.

25 · An article in Kommersant-Daily assesses prospects for the CIS Customs Union, which has three signatories: Kazakhstan, Russia, and Belarus. At a regular trilateral commission meeting held in Moscow under the chairmanship of Vice Premier Aleksey Bolshakov, the members decide to eliminate the accelerated acceptance of new members in the Customs Union. Countries will be admitted only after they meet minimum procedures and fulfill all requirements established by the founding states. These requirements include adopting a list of complex tariff regulations and non-tariff barrier agreements. Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan have applied to join the union. In response, the procedures were worked out for accepting new members.

28 · Turkmenistan and Russia form a joint-stock company, Turkmenrosgas, which will control 100 percent of Turkmen gas supplies to CIS markets. President Niyazov emphasizes that the joint venture does not limit the interests of potential investors from third countries: “If they have mutually advantageous proposals, let them come.”

29 · Turkmen President Saparmurad Niyazov and Slovak Republic Prime Minister Vladimir Meciar approve the idea of creating a new trilateral grouping with Ukraine under which the Slovak Republic will buy Turkmen gas with payment in commodities and services. The deal depends, however, on Russia, which must approve the transit of gas through the Russian pipeline. No alternative exists at this time.

Turkmenistan has made efforts to build a new pipeline with Iran and Turkey to the west, as an alternative to the Russian pipeline, but Western investors lose enthusiasm when Iran is included. Meanwhile, Moscow has plans for Turkmen oil and gas, expressed by Viktor Chernomyrdin during his spring visit to Turkmenistan. Chernomyrdin proposed exporting by Russian gas pipeline to Europe as much as 125 billion cubic meters of natural gas from Turkmenistan, a deal which would be much more profitable for Russia than exporting Siberian gas abroad. However, Niyazov has made no response to Chernomyrdin's proposal to date, at no surprise to local observers.

- Viktor Hladush, Ukraine's First Deputy Minister of Trade and Foreign Economic Relations, says the Ukrainian government believes it is inexpedient to sign any more interstate agreements on trade and economic cooperation within the CIS and plans to shift to direct contracts with economic agents of CIS states, full-fledged free trade, and formation of financial and industrial groups. The decision comes following a sharp drop in volume of goods supplied under interstate agreements within the CIS. Total trade turnover within the CIS for the first nine months of 1995 amounted to 85.4 percent of the level for the same period in 1994. The share of trade under interstate agreements in total turnover fell from 8.7 percent to 4.5 percent. The CIS rule of reconciling mutual supplies at world prices is unprofitable, says Hladush, inasmuch as many Ukrainian prices are higher than world prices. Ukraine will continue to purchase fuel and energy supplies under interstate agreements, but only to cover the minimum needs of the communal and production sectors. Ukraine owes CIS states $3.46 billion, including due and overdue interest.

- Moldovan presidential spokesman Vasiliy Grozavu tells the press that Moldova does not intend to join the CIS military-political union or any other military-political blocs. This would contradict the Moldovan Constitution which reads that the country is neutral, Grozavu says. “Moldova’s membership in the CIS consists of participation in comprehensive mutually beneficial economic cooperation with all CIS member states,” he says.

- Ukrainian Foreign Minister Hennadiy Udovenko tells the press that the success of Ukraine’s economic reform depends to a large extent on assistance from the European Union (EU). Only three EU member-countries out of fifteen (France, Spain, and Italy) have so far ratified a partnership and cooperation agreement between Ukraine and the European Union. Udovenko says these three share a common view with their Ukrainian counterpart on the processes taking place in the CIS in general and Russia in particular. He says that the 14 September decree on Russia’s strategic interests prompted concern and various reactions in EU member-countries.

Political

2 · Moldovan oppositionist Nicolae Dabija, deputy chairman of the Party of Democratic Forces, writes in the weekly Literatura  $\neg$ iArta that Moldova has reached a dead end in its new constitution. He says the Moldovan Constitution “in fact only ratifies the Ribbentrop-Molotov pact and looks like an annex to the pact. It federalizes Bessarabia. It makes collective farms eternal. It tells lies (e.g. [by referring to] the Moldovan language, Moldovan people, Moldovan nation). It states that we are not a nation, but a population. Private property is not protected. Teaching of religion in schools is prohibited,” Dabija says. In fact, he concludes, Moldova as a state with an “independent” appearance is really a Russian “creature,” with its “sovereignty declared and never achieved, and which will estrange us from our origins.”

3 · After a five-month pause in the activity of CIS supreme collective organs, the CIS Heads of State meet in Moscow for a summit. In the period under review, no breakthrough toward closer integration in the political or economic spheres has been achieved. Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin announces that forty-seven agreements have been adopted, and an Interstate Economic Committee and customs and payments unions have been created. Nevertheless, CIS member-states are in arrears to the Russian fuel and energy complex to the tune of 14 trillion rubles, including 12 trillion rubles for gas. The sum of Russian state credits to its partners in recent years is $5.8 billion. The Interstate Economic Committee (IEC) proposes delegation to itself of additional powers which would allow it to adopt decisions on the formation of the Economic Union and the activity of its organs. This proposal has been debated before, but the Armenian delegation objects to any point which would give the IEC the right to approve statutes and rules of collective organs. Azerbaijan and Ukraine have an even tougher stance. They are against the IEC's powers to make operational decisions and see no need to create supranational organs. A summit of the CIS Heads of State is due to take place in December.

11 · Vladimir Zhirinovskiy and Ukrainian businessman Volodymyr Bezymyanyy hold a meeting which they describe as an encounter between the future presidents of Ukraine and Russia. They tell journalists that they will take all measures to unite Ukraine and Russia.

· The Supreme Soviet chairman of the so-called "Dniester Republic," Grigore Maracuta, says Dniester will adhere to all CIS economic, customs, and security structures. "Our integration with all CIS institutions will prevent Moldova's integration with Romania and will contribute to its remaining an independent state," he says. Dniester's constitution stipulates that Dniester is an independent, sovereign country, parliamentary-presidential, with independent branches of power. The "republic" plans to adopt the constitution by referendum.

14 · Russian and Estonian negotiators launch another round of talks on their border dispute. In 1991, when Estonia regained independence, it claimed some 2,500 square kilometers of Russian land, referring to the 1920 Tartu peace treaty. Tallinn is ready to drop its territorial claims in exchange for Russia's recognition of the treaty. Russia is willing to recognize the historical value of the document only.

21 · Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman Grigoriy Karasin tells the press that Russia and Ukraine disagree considerably on the “joint citizenship” issue. Ukraine would prefer to end dual citizenship entirely, he says. This would mean that if a treaty is signed, people who are now citizens of both Ukraine and Russia would have to give up one of their citizenships. As for Russians, they believe that “in the situation that emerged following the disintegration of the USSR, it is necessary to recognize people’s right to be citizens of not only the state they live in at present, but also of the state they were born in or lived in for a long time, and not force them to choose the citizenship of one country,” Karasin explains.

22 · The Russian State Duma votes down a motion put forward by two factions to ask Russian President Boris Yeltsin to dismiss Defense Minister Pavel Grachev. In their appeal, the Russia’s Choice and Women of Russia factions urged lawmakers to “rid the army of such a minister.” This move follows Grachev’s statement that he will order the army to vote for the Our Home Is Russia [party] in upcoming parliamentary elections scheduled for 17 December. Faction members testify that Grachev has violated the law “On Defense,” which bans campaigning in the army.

28 · Ukrainian Prime Minister Evgeniy Marchuk tells Le Soir that the Ukrainian government was never sent an advance copy of the 14 September decree issued by President Boris Yeltsin on Russia’s relations with the other CIS member-states. Even in Russia, this decree was interpreted as a sign that Moscow was returning to ideas close to Soviet imperialism. Marchuk says he does not know whether other countries received copies of the decree. Interviewer says Belarus obviously did, because it is clearly acting on it.

29 · Dmitriy Markov, Ukrainian President Kuchma's press secretary, tells the press that "The Ukrainian president will continue to follow principles of balanced and predictable relations, the more so with Russia, while pursuing his foreign policy."

· Moldovan presidential spokesman Vasiliy Grozavu says President Mircea Snegur emphasizes the OSCE's priority role in mediating the settlement in the Trans-Dniester region.

Security

2 · Pavel Grachev addresses a meeting of the CIS council of Defense Ministers held prior to the summit of Heads of State. He says that so far no common approach has been formed with regard to the creation of a collective security system and a unified armed forces. Grachev suggests removing from the agenda the issue of a committee of chiefs of staff which would plan the use of troops and coordinate plans for building CIS armed forces, saying it is too early considering the absence of a common approach to a collective security system for the Commonwealth.

8 · In a move which strengthens Russian-Kazakh military cooperation, Russia announces it will supply military aircraft to Kazakhstan in November and December. The Russian spokesman does not specify what kind of aircraft will be supplied.

11 · The CIS Council of Defense Ministers meets and discusses training of CIS peacekeeping troops. Participants (except Moldova, Ukraine, and Azerbaijan) approve an agreement on the preparation of training programs. The joint air defense system is also discussed, but financing poses difficulty. Russia wants all members to contribute, but this is unacceptable to some because each has an air defense system which is more or less developed. The necessity of a single approach is questioned.

21 · Ukrainian Defense Minister Valeriy Shmarov and Austrian Defense Minister Werner Fasslabend sign an agreement on military cooperation, under which the two countries will cooperate in peacekeeping, European security, military personnel, military medicine, economics, and other aspects of security.

23 · On 23 November 1995, Lt.-Gen. Aleksandr Sokolov, deputy commander of the land troops of the Russian Federation, proposes a function transfer from Russian peacekeeping troops deployed in the eastern part of the Republic of Moldova to the Operative Group of Russian Troops, the successor to the 14th Army. The Moldovan Joint Control Commission for peaceful settlement of the situation in Dniester has issued a communique rejecting the Russian proposal. The communique cautions that Article 4 of the Moldovan-Russian convention of July 1992 stipulates that the Russian Army units deployed in Moldova are to observe strict neutrality. A transfer of functions would also be tantamount to a violation of the 1994 accord between Moldova and Russia regarding the juridical status, manner of operation, and deadlines of Russian military units temporarily deployed on the territory of the Republic of Moldova. The 1994 accord stipulates the full withdrawal of Russian troops from Moldova.

25 · The Moldovan Ministry of National Security captures a Russian agent infiltrated into the leadership of the national Defense Ministry.

27 · Russia and Ukraine reach agreement to hand over the Black Sea fleet based in Crimea to Ukraine's Navy beginning 1 December 1995. Agreement is based on Sochi talks between Ukrainian Defense Minister Valeriy Shmarov and his Russian counterpart, Pavel Grachev. Under another agreement with Russia, Ukraine will receive a military garrison in Kerch, where aircraft, missile, naval, and airborne testing ranges, airfields, shipyards, and ship maintenance shops are located. Ukraine will also take over arsenals of two ammunition depots, including an aviation ammunition depot belonging to the Black Sea fleet.

29 · Commanders of the Baltic countries' armed forces concluding a joint meeting in Riga announce an agreement to create a joint Baltic headquarters which will conduct training programs within the Partnership for Peace program. A permanent Baltic battalion staff will also be created. Estonian peacekeeping forces will be incorporated in the Nordic unit and Lithuanians and Latvians within the Danish battalion.

Economic

13 · The European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD) announces that it will provide Ukraine with a loan worth more than US$75 million to promote economic reform in the republic.

· Ukraine signs an agreement on cooperation with the Konrad Adenauer Foundation in Kiev. Deputy Prime Minister Ivan Kuras stresses that this action is additional convincing evidence of a rising trend in the development of German-Ukrainian ties.

16 · In an interview with Vysokyy Zamok, the Russian consul in Lvov, Anatoliy Kovalev, explains that he has made an economic study of western Ukraine and sent a report to Moscow, which is being studied at the highest levels. The study analyzes the economic potential of factories in the west, the kinds of investment they require and what channels for selling products. Kovalev says western Ukraine is the most stable region politically and that Russia and other countries could safely invest their capital and technologies there. He holds out prospects of such economic activity creating many new jobs. “Our concept is thus to return Russia (with Ukraine’s consent) to these eight Ukrainian oblasts at the state level,” he says. “This requires a long-term program and partnership, and Russia should be represented in this process by the most serious organizations. Kiev has also supported this program.”

18 · The frequency of current in Ukraine’s power grid grows following its reconnection to the Russian power grid. After disconnection of the two power grids on 4 December the frequency dropped to a close to critical level as far as nuclear power plants are concerned.

26 · Viktor Chernomyrdin announces at a meeting of the CIS Interstate Economic Committee that the CIS countries owe Russia 15 trillion rubles for energy resources. Over eleven months of 1995, Russia exported 61 billion cubic meters of natural gas, 25 million tons of oil, and 10 billion kW of electrical energy to CIS countries. Chernomyrdin says that in 1996 the Russian budget earmarks only 200 billion rubles as credits to CIS countries. These credits will be set aside for the purchase of ready-made products, not energy supplies, says Chernomyrdin.

Political

7 · The Tajik Communist Party leader, Shodi Shabkolov, says his goal is the re-creation of the USSR as a voluntary union of fraternal peoples. “The communists of Tajikistan are now very actively participating in the movement for unity, friendship, and fraternity of the peoples of the Union,” he explains.

· Ukrainian Parliamentary Speaker Oleksandr Moroz stresses that “mistakes were made when the CIS was set up because the disintegration of the USSR should have been based on the specific condition that the future subjects of the Commonwealth would continue to exist even after the Soviet Union was gone.” He says that as things are, one member has ended up with everything and the others with nothing. He says, however, that Ukraine could defend its interests better if it were a full, rather than an associate, member of the organization. He says that joining the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly would pose no threat to Ukraine’s sovereignty. Leonid Kravchuk, the former Ukrainian president, notes that “setting up the CIS was not a simple process and is still continuing.” He emphasizes that the European Union was set up over a thirty-five-year period and that in the initial stages the CIS failed to resolve the problem of a “civilized divorce.”

8 · Ukrainian Foreign Minister Gennadiy Udovenko says he is “astonished” by Romanian Foreign Minister Teodor Melescanu’s statement openly implying a territorial claim against Ukraine. Ukraine and Romania have territorial disputes going back to before World War II. The Molotov-Ribbentrop pact, which divided much of Eastern Europe between Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union in 1939, ceded vast tracts of Romanian land to the Soviets. Since the end of the Cold War, nationalists in Romania have been calling for an abrogation of the pact, despite the 1947 Paris Peace Treaty which recognized Soviet and subsequently Ukrainian gains under the pact. Melescanu said in the Romanian parliament that Ukraine “refused to give back Zmeyiniy Island, situated in the Black Sea.”

13 · The Ukrainian president’s chief of staff, Dmitriy Tabachnik, tells the press that Kiev and London have developed completely new relations, and want closer cooperation. He says London now treats Ukraine as an entity quite outside the former USSR. He recalls that the Ukrainian and British leaders have met on numerous occasions in 1995 and that the British parliament is one of the first to ratify the Ukrainian-European Union partnership and cooperation agreement. The two countries plan to sign a joint declaration on 15 December which will express a more active rapprochement between the two countries and thus enhance Ukraine's international standing.

- Azerbaijani President Geydar Aliev says the slowing in Azerbaijani-Iranian relations must be overcome. "One cannot allow cooling in our bilateral relations," he declares during a meeting with Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister Mahmud Va'ezi in Baku. "Azerbaijan will not allow any other country to influence the Azerbaijani-Iranian relationship."

14 · Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin states categorically that there will be no unification of Russia and Belarus.

18 · The presidents of Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan meet in southern Kazakhstan to discuss the economic integration plan they adopted in April. They decide to increase the Central Asia Bank's nominal capital from $5 million to $9 million. They also set up a Council of Defense Ministers in order to stiffen regional security. During the meeting they appeal to the UN secretary general to form a UN-sponsored peacekeeping battalion as a reserve force to be deployed on Kazakhstan's southern border with Uzbekistan.

- Moldovan and Belarusian Defense Ministers General Pavel Creanga and Lt.-Gen. Leonid Maltsaw tell the press in Chisinau that the parliamentary elections in Russia should not lead to the restoration of the ex-USSR. “The elections and their results are Russia’s domestic affair and they should not influence interstate political relations,” the Moldovan minister says. “The idea of restoring the USSR should be renounced, because this might result in confrontation, including armed confrontation, between the countries of the former USSR,” he concludes.

- A foreign policy advisor to Moldovan President Mircea Snegur, Petru Dascal, says that the Russian parliamentary election results cannot change Moldova’s external political course. “This course is determined by the constitution and the national Foreign Policy Concept, and is being consistently implemented,” he explains. “We are building civilized, mutually beneficial relations with all states, including the Russian Federation.”

20 · Gennadiy Zyuganov says there has been a complete debacle of anti-communism in Russia and a complete downfall of radical democrats who were unanimous in their disdain for Russia. He says recent Duma elections in Russia show that the government’s course is backed by only one out of ten who went to the polls. He says the elections also show the defeat of the centrists who do not enjoy support from many social segments of the population.

21 · Evgeniy Primakov, in an address to mark the seventyfifth anniversary of Russian Foreign Intelligence Service, says the service’s aim of preventing Russia’s territorial disintegration has acquired a new importance. He says the Foreign Intelligence Service has done much to strengthen Russia’s peacemaking role in the southern crisis and in the Armenia-Azerbaijan, Georgia-Abkhazia, Tajik-Tajik, and other conflicts. The service supports the recent emergence within the former USSR of centripetal trends and processes, he says. “The future of the CIS lies in such processes,” he stresses, “as long as there is a sensible approach to reality and an understanding of the need to inject several radically new elements into the policy of economic, scientific, cultural, information, and military-political integration.”

· “Moscow does not recognize division of the Caspian Sea into national sectors and rejects any unilateral actions in this direction,” according to the deputy director of the Foreign Ministry’s Asia Department, Maksim Peshkov. Russia’s position is calculated to prevent any of the five countries bordering on the Caspian from unilaterally developing any part of its resources or profiting from them.

26 · The presidents of the CIS states, who are planning to hold a summit in mid-January 1996, will probably not respond to a petition from the “Dniester Republic” to join the CIS, says Nezavisimaya Gazeta reporter Alan Kasaev. Mircea Snegur will be adamantly opposed to the petition, and Eduard Shevardnadze and Geydar Aliev are likely to support him.

28 · Results of the Russian State Duma elections show that four electoral associations were the “big winners.” The CPRF (Communist Party of the Russian Federation) for the left-wing forces; “Yabloko” for the right-wing forces; the LDPR (Liberal Democratic Party of Russia) for the national patriots; and the “party of power” in the shape of “Russia Is Our Home” (NDR).

· Moskovskie Novosti reporter Akakiy Mikadze writes that Igor Georgadze, former head of the security service in Georgia, is living in Pavel Grachev’s dacha in Moscow. Mikadze conjectures that Georgadze may be used as a tool by Moscow authorities if Georgian policy (especially concerning the transportation of Caspian oil) does not suit Moscow.

Security

15 · Ukrainian President Kuchma says that “a strong and sovereign Ukraine is a major factor in European stability,” before returning home after a three-day stay in London. He stresses that Ukraine is not seeking membership in NATO. "For Kiev even to apply for admission to the North Atlantic alliance would have a negative role from all perspectives, but especially politically, by acting as a destabilization factor on the European continent," Kuchma says. "Ukraine should keep clear of any alliances."

- Ukrainian President Kuchma and the British secretary of state for defense, Michael Portillo, meet to discuss bilateral relations. Kuchma calls for more active relations between the two defense ministries. Portillo tells the press that the possibility is being considered of holding joint maneuvers of British and Ukrainian servicemen on the territory of Ukraine by the end of next year.

22 · The CIS Council of Border Guard Commanders meets in Dushanbe and signs twenty-six documents coordinating border policy throughout the Commonwealth, especially along the Tajik-Afghan border. The meeting is chaired by the director of the Russian Federal Border Service, Andrey Nikolaev. Among the documents signed is a Russian-Turkmen agreement on the presence of up to 1,000 Russian border guards and military advisers in Turkmenistan. Nikolaev notes progress toward the creation of a single information space for CIS border troops through coordination of research activities. The term of the Uzbek, Kazakh, and Kyrgyz military units stationed in Tajikistan is due to expire on 31 December, but Nikolaev favors extending their stay.

- The presidents of Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Kazakhstan appeal to the UN Secretary General to consider the possibility of forming a regional peacekeeping force under UN aegis to be deployed in the south of Kazakhstan. They stress that the new force can be used in Bosnia and various trouble spots rather than to maintain stability in Tajikistan where CIS peacekeepers are now deployed. Andrey Nikolaev, the Russian director of the Federal Border Service, says the three-nation initiative should not be seen as an attempt to contrast regional forces to CIS collective security forces. Nikolaev says that he hopes for further Dushanbe-Moscow cooperation because Tajikistan is finding itself in a key role in ensuring the stability and security of Central Asia and the CIS as a whole. "By solving the problem of Tajikistan, we solve those of each CIS state," he says.

27 · Russia completes removal of the last strategic missiles from Ukraine scheduled for this year. It has bought thirty-two strategic SS-19 missiles from Ukraine; this does not violate international agreements, as Moscow may maintain 105 missile complexes after ratification of START-II.

28 · President Boris Yeltsin creates a Foreign Policy Council, which purportedly will include leaders of the Foreign Ministry, Defense Ministry, Ministry for Foreign Economic Affairs, Ministry of Finance, Federal Security Service, Foreign Intelligence Service, and Federal Border Service as well as Dmitriy Ryurkov, the president's aide for foreign policy. The council will engage in analysis and forecasting of the international situation and will work directly under the coordination of the head of state.

Postscript

On 5 January 1996, Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev submits his resignation to President Yeltsin. Kozyrev has served in the post since October 1990. On 9 January 1996, President Yeltsin appoints Evgeniy Primakov as the new foreign minister. Primakov formerly headed the Russian Foreign Intelligence Service, a branch of the former Soviet KGB. Many analysts predict that the appointment signals a change in Russian foreign policy to a more hard-line approach toward the CIS and the West.

Country Profiles

Republic of Armenia: Political Profile

Capital: Yerevan

Official language: Armenian

Currency: Dram (introduced 24 November 1993)

Head of State:

President Levon Akopovich Ter-Petrosyan, b. 1945. Ter-Petrosyan worked at the Armenian Institute of Literature in the mid-1970s and at the Matenadaran Archive intermittently from 1978 to 1990. A radical nationalist, he was a member of the Karabakh Committee and was in prison December 1988-May 1989. He was leader of the Armenian Pan-national Movement and in August 1990 was elected Chairman of the Supreme Soviet (de facto head of state). He was confirmed in office by an overwhelming majority in direct elections for the post of Executive President of the Republic in October 1991. The popularity of his regime decreased gradually as a result of the protracted civil war in Armenia and consequent economic conditions. One major problem in 1993-94 was the conflict between pragmatic Armenians (like Ter-Petrosyan) favoring closer links with Turkey and the more extreme, nationalist groups-the Union for National Self-Determination and the Armenian Revolutionary Federation-opposing such links. In 1996 Ter-Petrosyan declared victory in a closely contested presidential election in which he was opposed by a former Karabakh Committee ally, Vazgen Manukyan.

Main political parties:

Armenian Democratic Party, f. 1993 formerly the Communist Party of Armenia, it was dissolved in September 1991, re-legalized in 1992, renamed in 1993.

Armenian Pan-national Movement, f. 1989.

Armenian Revolutionary Federation-Dashnaktsyutun, f. 1890 by the ruling party in independent Armenia; 1918-20, prohibited under Soviet rule but continued its activities in other countries; permitted to operate legally in 1991 then banned again in 1994-95.

National Democratic Union, f. 1991 as a splinter party for the Armenian Pan-national Movement.

Party of Democratic Freedom, f. 1905.

Republican Party of Armenia, f. 1990 following a split in the Union of National Self-Determination.

Union of National Self-Determination, f. 1989.

National legislature and distribution of seats:

Unicameral assembly with 190 members

In July 1995 elections, the Armenian pan-National Movement and its allies won 70 percent of the seats in a new parliament. The Communists came in third.

Azerbaijani Republic: Political Profile

Capital: Baku

Official language: Azerbaijani

Currency: Manat (introduced 15 June 1993)

Head of State:

President Geydar Aliev, b. 1923. A graduate of Azerbaijani State University in 1957, Aliev is a native of the Nakhichevan region of Azerbaijan, located between Iran and Armenia (see map). He joined the CPSU in 1945 and was prominent in the republican apparatus by the 1960s. He became First Secretary of the Azerbaijani Communist Party and thus leader of the republic in 1969. In 1982, he was appointed First Deputy Chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers in Moscow. Dismissed in 1987 by Gorbachev's drive against corruption, he left the Communists in July 1991, alleging their suppression of democratic movements. In September 1991, he was elected Chairman of Parliament of the Autonomous Republic of Nakhichevan. He was prevented from running in the June 1992 presidential elections because he exceeded the maximum age of sixty-five years. In the same year, he founded the New Azerbaijan Party, support for which demonstrated his continuing popularity in the country. In early June 1993, threatened by revolt, President Abulfaz Elchibey summoned Aliev to Baku and offered him the premiership, which he refused. On 13 June Aliev attempted to negotiate with Col. Surat Husseinov, a rebel army commander. Two days later, Aliev was elected Chairman of the Supreme Soviet.

With Elchibey having fled to Nakhichevan, Aliiev was granted a majority of the presidential powers and, on 3 October, received 98.8 percent of votes cast in direct presidential elections.

Past heads of state since independence:

Ayaz Mutalibov, b. 1938. Mutalibov joined the CPSU in 1963 and climbed his way to First Secretary of the Azerbaijani Communist Party Central Committee in January 1990. In May 1990, he was appointed Chairman of the Supreme Soviet of Azerbaijan (President). Although he resigned as First Secretary in the aftermath of the August coup, he was elected unopposed in September 1991 as the republic's first President since independence from the Soviet Union. The war in the Nagorno- Karabakh region decreased his popularity and he was forced to resign in March 1992.

Abulfaz Elchibey assumed the presidency by direct election as leader of the Popular Front of Azerbaijan—the main democratic-nationalist party—on 7 June 1992. Like his predecessor Mutalibov, his popularity was hurt as a result of the war, which worsened already poor economic conditions. This, coupled with charges of corruption, led to decreased popularity of his regime. His demise was imminent after a military skirmish with Col. Surat Husseinov-Commander of the Azerbaijani forces in Nagorno-Karabakh—who seized the city of Gyanja and demanded the resignations of Elchibey, the Prime Minister, and the Chairman of the Milli Majlis (parliament). Husseinov ordered his forces into Baku and Elchibey, knowing the army would not protect him, fled. Impeachment proceedings were set in motion and, after some wavering, 97.5 percent of participants in a referendum voted in favor of impeachment. The Milli Majlis endorsed this result on 1 September 1992.

Main political parties:

Communist Party of Azerbaijan disbanded September 1991, re-established November 1993.

Musavat- "Equality" Muslim Democratic existed in 1992; re-established in 1992, promotes Islamic values and the unity of Turkic peoples.

New Azerbaijan, f. 1992.

Popular Front of Azerbaijan, f. 1989.

Social Democratic Group, f. 1989.

United Azerbaijan.

National legislature and distribution of seats:

Unicameral assembly with 125 members

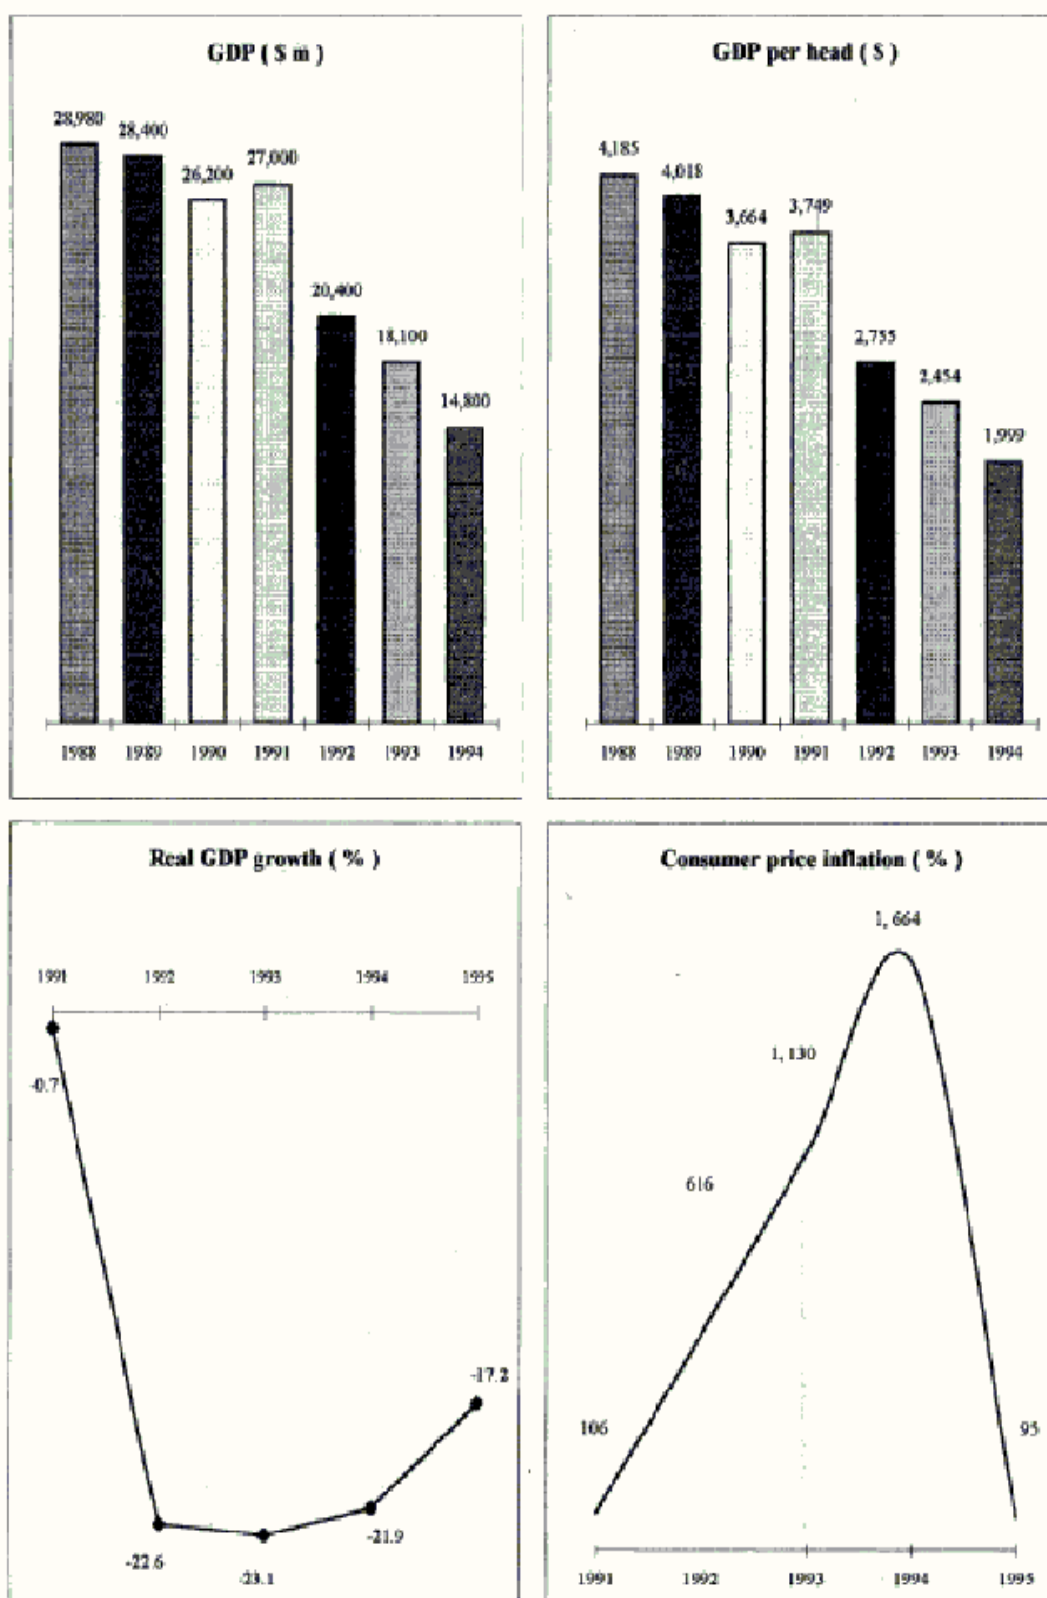

In November 1995 parliamentary elections, Aliiev's New Azerbaijan party won a clear majority.

Participation of other parties was banned or (as in the case of Musavat) restricted.

Republic of Belarus: Political Profile

Capital: Minsk

Official language: Belarusian

Currency: Belarusian ruble (introduced 25 May 1992)

Head of State:

President Aleksandr Lukashenka, b. 1954. Lukashenka graduated from Mogilev Pedagogical Institute and the Belorussian Agriculture Academy. He started his working activity in 1975 and held various positions in Mogilev region. In 1987, he became state farm manager. In 1990, he was elected a Deputy of the Supreme Council. Prior to his election to the post of President, Lukashenka served as the Chairman of the Interim Supreme Council Anti-Corruption Commission. On 10 July 1994 he won more than 80 percent of presidential election votes to become the first President of Belarus.

Past heads of state since independence:

Stanislav Shushkevich, b. 1934. Shushkevich studied physics at the Belorussian State University, where he later lectured. He authored several textbooks and joined the Belorussian Academy of Sciences in the early 1970s. He entered politics only after the 1986 Chernobyl nuclear disaster and quickly moved his way up. In 1990, with the support of the Belarusian Popular Front, he was elected to the Supreme Soviet and, not even a year later, was elected Chairman of the Supreme Soviet on 19 September 1991. Under Shushkevich, Belarus was one of the original signatories of the CIS, but his refusal to sign the Collective Security Treaty, on the grounds that it violated Belarusian neutrality and sovereignty, made him unpopular with the pro-Russian majority in the Supreme Soviet. In January 1994, he was dismissed by the parliament for alleged financial misconduct, charges he categorically denied.

Myacheslav Hryb, b. 1937. During the Soviet era, Hryb was a colonel in the police force in the northern Vitebsk region and head of the security and defense committee of Belarus. Drawing support from the conservative factions in parliament, Hryb was elected Chairman of the Supreme Soviet on 28 January 1994, indicating a victory for the “Great Russia” communist old guard. He immediately proposed closer economic and political ties to Russia and urged support to remain in the ruble zone. Hryb lost the presidential election, however, on 10 July 1994, and Lukashenka became President.

Main political parties:

Belarusian Peasant Party, f. February 1991, defends the interests of agricultural workers and favors private farming.

Belarusian Peasants' Union, f. September 1989, is less Belarusian nationalist than the Peasant Party but draws from the same agricultural base.

Belarusian Social-Democratic Union, f. March 1991, takes the German Social Democratic Party as its model and has its stronghold in the liberal cultural intelligentsia.

Movement of Democracy, Social Progress, and Justice, f. October 1991, is neo-Stalinist and Russian supremacist.

National-Democratic Party of Belarus, f. June 1990, is one of the first non-communist parties devoted to Belarusian national causes.

Party of Communists of Belarus, f. June 1992, was established after the Communist Party was banned with a view to carry out the Party's work.

Party of National Accord, f. 1991, is a centrist grouping.

Popular Front of Belarus, f. June 1989, is the main opposition force and supports national revival, independence, and Western-style institutions.

United Party of Belarus, f. November 1990, has its main base of support among the technical/scientific intelligentsia. It is committed to democratic development with less emphasis on nationalism.

National legislature and distribution of seats:

Unicameral assembly with 260 members

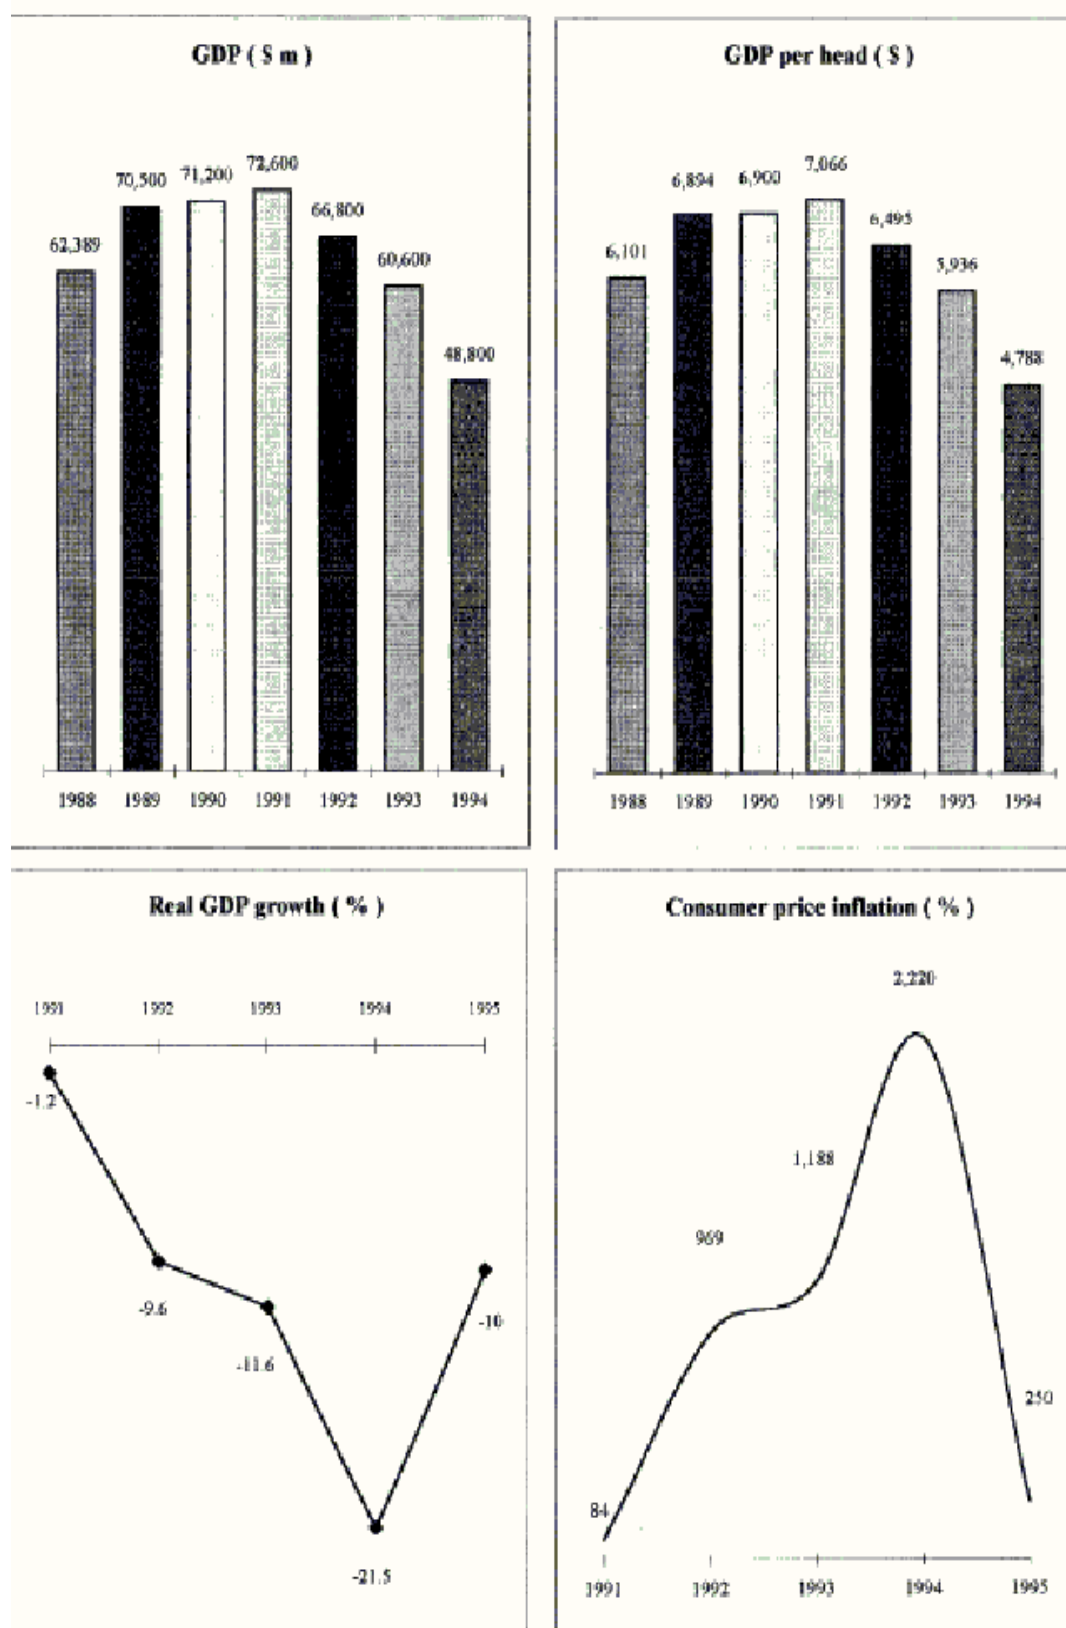

Elections to Belarus's new parliament were disrupted by conflicts with the president over the course of 1995 and eventuated in the election of a majority registered as Independents.

Republic of Georgia: Political Profile

Capital: Tbilisi

Official language: Georgian

Currency: Georgian coupon (introduced 2 August 1992)

Head of State:

President Eduard Shevardnadze, b. 1928. Shevardnadze was a member of Komsomol and in 1957 became its leader. In 1961 he joined the hierarchy of the Communist Party and soon became Minister of the republican government. In 1971, he was appointed Georgian Party leader. He campaigned against corruption, but gained a reputation for being harsh with dissidents and nationalists. In 1978, he became a candidate member of the CPSU Politburo and, in July 1985, a full member-at the same time Mikhail Gorbachev appointed him Soviet Foreign Minister. In December 1990 he resigned and warned of an impending "dictatorship," but briefly returned to the post at the end of 1991. Following the demise of the USSR in December, his political future looked uncertain until he was invited back to Georgia by the new regime. He returned in March of 1992, giving the Georgian regime international respectability, and he immediately became Chairman of the State Council. Direct popular elections were held in October 1992 and Shevardnadze was elected Chairman of the new Supreme Council (head of state). In 1995 Georgia restored the office of president and Shevardnadze was elected to the post with 73 percent of the popular vote.

Past heads of state since independence:

Zviad Gamsakhurdia, b. 1939. Gamsakhurdia's early career was in literature. He worked as a senior researcher at the Rustaveli Georgian Literature Institute. He became politically active, engaging in several projects opposing Soviet authorities, becoming publisher and editor of the first underground dissident publication in Georgia, Samizdat. In 1989, he was elected chairman of the nationalist St. Iliya Society, increasing his political profile and becoming more active in the opposition movement. As such, Gamsakhurdia was repeatedly arrested and jailed, both in Moscow and in Georgia. In November 1990, the Round Table Free Georgia Party won the first multiparty elections and as the party's head, Gamsakhurdia was made Chairman of the Georgian Supreme Soviet (de facto head of state). His increasingly chauvinistic rhetoric threatened non-Georgians from holding political positions in various autonomous regions in Georgia, most notably in South Ossetia and Abkhazia. Opposition to his rule mounted and a series of military riots culminated in his ouster on 6 January 1992. He is reportedly in hiding in Grozny, Chechnya.

Main political parties:

Agrarian Party of Georgia, f. 1994.

Citizens' Union of Georgia, f. 1993.

Georgian Popular Front, f. 1989.

Georgian Social Democratic Party, f. 1893;

National Democratic Party of Georgia, f. 1981.

National Independence Party, f. 1989.

National legislature and distribution of seats:

Capital: Alma-Ata

Official language: Kazakh

Currency: Tenge (introduced 27 December 1993)

Head of State:

President Nursultan Nazarbaev, b. 1940.

Nazarbaev joined the CPSU in 1962 while working at the Karaganda Metallurgical Combine and, in 1969, began work with the Komsomol in Temirtau. He rose rapidly in the republican Party and state apparatus, becoming Chairman of the Kazakh Council of Ministers in 1984. In June 1989, he became First Secretary of the Kazakh Communist Party. In April 1990, the Kazakh Supreme Soviet elected him to the new post of Executive President. In July 1990 he became a member of the all-Union Party Politburo and an increasingly important politician outside Kazakhstan. He was a supporter of the Union and, after independence, argued for close links within the CIS. His main concern was political stability, resulting in limited democratic developments, although much of this is attributed to the general cultural preference for consensus. He enjoys good relations with the West, as his authoritarian but benign regime provides stability in a potentially wealthy county and in the region as a whole. In a 1995 referendum, Nazarbaev's presidential term was extended to the year 2000.

Main political parties:

Democratic Party of Kazakhstan.

People's Congress Party of Kazakhstan, f. 1991, advocates civil peace and represents all ethnic groups in Kazakhstan.

People's Unity Party, f. 1993. Originally a socio-political movement before becoming a political party; centrist, opposing radical nationalism; promotes social and ethnic harmony.

Republican Party-Azat, f. 1992 by a merger of three nationalist opposition parties: Azat (Freedom movement), the Republican Party, and the Jeltoqsan (December) National-Democratic Party.

Socialist Party of Kazakhstan, f. 1991 to replace Communist Party of Kazakhstan.

National legislature and distribution of seats:

A senate and a lower house with 67 seats

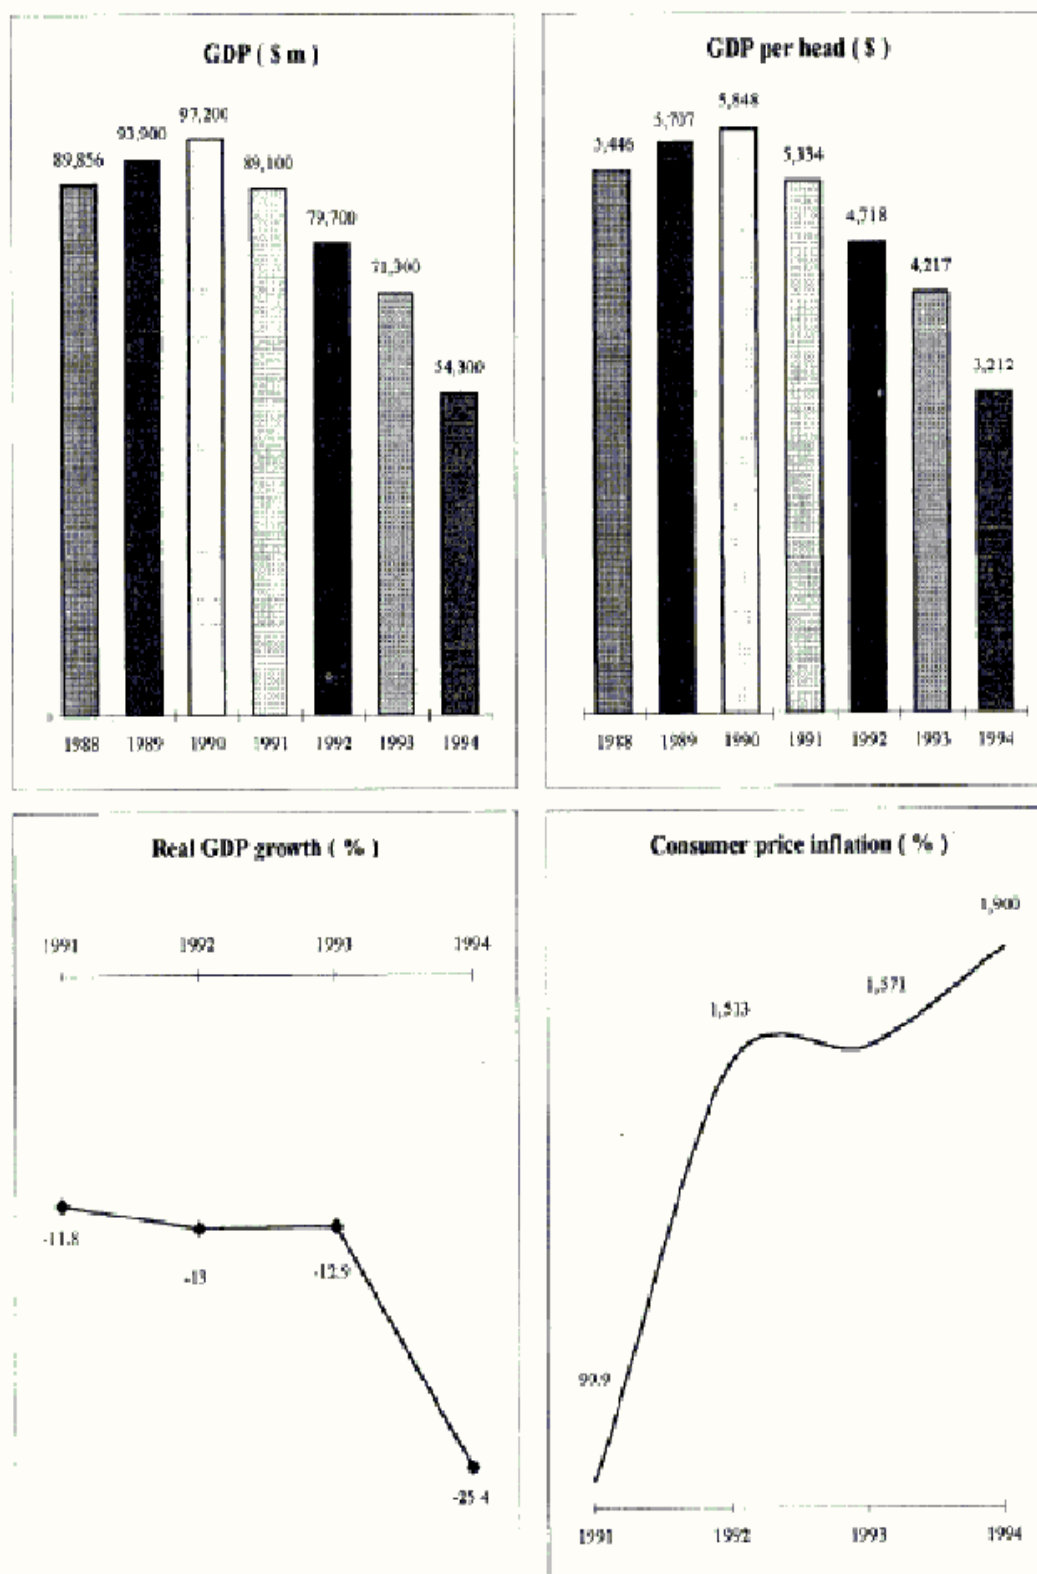

In 1995 elections to the new parliament, the pro-government People's Unity Party and Democratic Party won the largest number of seats. Several parties boycotted the elections and some of their adherents ran as independents.

Head of State:

President Askar Akaev, b. 1944. Akaev was a professor who joined the CPSU in 1981 (he resigned in 1991). He was a member of the Central Committee of the Kyrgyz Communist Party, President of the Kyrgyz Academy of Sciences in Bishkek, and a member of various all-Union committees. A known liberal, he was elected by the republican Supreme Soviet as Executive President in October 1990 as a compromise candidate who favored reform and was not connected with the dominant factions, having been in Leningrad for most of his academic career. Akaev favored economic reform before instituting political changes and he ensured that Kyrgyzstan remained one of the most liberal Central Asian republics. He condemned the coup attempt against Gorbachev and was himself the subject of communist putschists. In October of 1991 he was unopposed in direct elections and resolved to make Kyrgyzstan the "Switzerland of Central Asia," focusing also on economic reform. In December 1995 he was reelected, easily defeating a Communist challenger.

Capital: Chisinau

Official language: Romanian

Currency: Moldovan leu (introduced 29 November 1993)

Head of State:

President Mircea Snegur, b. 1939. An agronomist by profession, Snegur became a Communist official in the 1980s, but was also a nationalist supported strongly by the Popular Front of Moldova. He was elected the republican leader, Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet in July 1989, and reelected as Chairman of the Supreme Soviet in April 1990. In September, he was elected unopposed to the new post of Executive President and, in the first popular presidential elections held in December 1991, Snegur, the sole candidate, won more than 98 percent of the votes cast. An advocate of sovereignty and independence for Moldova, Snegur repudiated any unification with Romania, in part attempting to allay the fears of the secessionist Trans-Dniestrans and Gagauz. Having initially rejected full participation in the CIS, Snegur succumbed to Russian pressures to join the CIS and has since entered into most CIS organs and treaties.

Main political parties:

Agrarian Democratic Party. The most prominent pro-CIS party, its membership comes from the leaders of cooperative farms and rural administrative officials. The party has played a critical role in the formation of all post-independence governments.

Christian Democratic Popular Front, f. 1989.

Originally the Popular Front of Moldova, the group was renamed in 1992; advocates Moldova's reintegration into Romania.

Congress of Intelligentsia, f. 1993 as a breakaway from the PFM; advocates an independent Moldova, close links with Romania with the CIS at arm's length away; teamed with other groups to form the Peasants and Intellectuals List.

Democratic Labor Party of Moldova, f. 1993.

Membership consists mainly of directors of large industrial enterprises who want gradual economic reform.

Party of Democratic Forces, f. 1995.

Party of Revival and Conciliation, f. 1995. A presidential party.

Party of Social Progress, f. 1995. A social-democratic party created in a split from the Agrarian Democrats.

Reform Party, f. 1993 with the backing from large financial interests and the support of a major newspaper; advocates restricting privatization process.

Social Democratic Party of Moldova, f. 1990.

Supported by urban professional groups and ethnic minorities; supports independence and economic reform.

Socialist Party. Mostly composed of former Communists, strongly pro-CIS and opposes even moderate economic reform; linked with the Russians for Unity movement which represents the Russian-speaking majority in Moldova.

Russian Federation: Political Profile

Capital: Moscow

Official language: Russian

Currency: Ruble

Head of State:

President Boris Yeltsin, b. 1931. Yeltsin graduated from the Urals Polytechnic Institute and after several years of construction work, he began full-time Communist Party work in 1968. He became outspoken about Party reform and ending corruption when he was appointed First Secretary of the Moscow Party Committee. His criticism of the slow pace of reform led to his dismissal from his post and from the Politburo in 1987. In 1989, however, he campaigned for a seat in the Congress of People's Deputies, winning over 90 percent of the Moscow constituency. He continued demanding more radical reform and dismissing conservative Communists. In 1990, he was elected to the Russian Supreme Soviet and immediately appointed Chairman. In early 1991, he was granted executive powers by the Supreme Soviet, pending direct elections for Executive President of the Russian Federation in June. He won these elections handily and further secured his authority through his leadership against the August coup attempt in 1991. As an original signatory of the Minsk (Belovezh Forest) Agreement of December 1991, Yeltsin established the CIS and ensured the demise of the USSR. As President of the newly independent Russian Federation, he introduced a radical economic reform program. On 20 March 1993, his emergency powers suspended by parliament, he introduced a period of emergency rule and scheduled a referendum of confidence for 25 April 1995, in which 57.4 percent of the votes cast supported him. His position strengthened further after he suppressed a parliamentary rebellion in September-October 1993 and endorsed a new constitution providing for a more powerful presidency. However, the December 1993 elections to the new legislature showed strong support for the extreme right-wing Liberal Democratic Party and unanticipated softness of support for Yeltsin's reformer bloc, Russia's Choice. Again in the December 1995 parliamentary elections, Yeltsin opponents-this time the Communist Party of the Russian Federation-prevailed. In the 1996 Russian presidential elections, Yeltsin formed an alliance with Aleksandr Lebed after a weak showing in the first round, and prevailed in the second round over his strongest challenger, the Communist candidate Gennadiy Zyuganov.

Republic of Tajikistan: Political Profile

Capital: Dushanbe

Official language: Tajik

Currency: Ruble

Head of State:

President Emomali Rakhmonov, b. 1953. Rakhmonov studied economics at Dushanbe's Lenin University. He worked in various positions ranging from electrician to the director of a collective farm in his native district. He was reportedly a protégé of the main Kulyabi militia leader Sangak Safarov in the 1992-93 civil war. He became head of the Kulyab region administration on 2 November 1992 and, within a few weeks, was elected Chairman of the Supreme Soviet and made head of state. In November 1994 he won election as president. Rakhmonov appointed many fellow Kulyabis to high office but was careful not to alienate completely the wealthy Khojandis, who demanded disarming the militia. He achieved this by incorporating the militia into national security services, but the Khojandis were dubious about institutionalizing the Kulyabi military advantage. Military assistance for the Rakhmonov administration came from Russia and Uzbekistan, which favored a conservative communist regime.

Past heads of state since independence:

Rakhmon Nabiev(November 1991-November 1992), b. 1930. Nabiev came from peasants of reportedly Uzbek origin. He studied agricultural mechanization, working in various positions in the field until 1961, when he went into full-time work for the Communist Party at the Agricultural Department of the republican Central Committee. In the early 1970s, Nabiev served as Minister of Agriculture and from 1973 to 1982 chaired the republican Council of Ministers. When Tajik party chief Dzhabbar Rasulov died of a heart attack in 1982, Nabiev was chosen to replace him. However, when Gorbachev came to power, he began sweeping out Brezhnev-era leaders and Nabiev lost his position as party chief. In 1989, he returned to politics, being elected to the Supreme Soviet. He was made interim Chairman and Acting President following the resignation of then Supreme Soviet Chairman Kakhar Mahkamov. Presidential elections were held in November of 1991 and Nabiev received 57 percent of the vote. Nabiev made several enemies in the aftermath of the elections in his efforts to restore ground the Communists had lost. In March of 1992, Nabiev caused much political strife in attempting to dismiss Minister of Internal Affairs Mamadaez Navzhuvanov, who in turn orchestrated demonstrations against Nabiev. Nabiev lost much support and there were increasing calls for his resignation. Clashes erupted between Nabiev loyalists and opposition groups, and in September 1992 he was forced to flee, launching Tajikistan into a bitter civil war.

Main political parties:

Communist Party of Tajikistan, f. 1924. Only registered party until 1991 and during 1993.

Democratic Party of Tajikistan, f. 1990. Secular nationalist and pro-West.

Islamic Renaissance Party, f. 1991.

Lale Badakhshon, f. 1991. Sought greater autonomy for Gorno-Badakhshon and its peoples, the Pamiri.

Party of Economic Freedom, f. 1993, represents interest of northern Tajikistan.

Party of Popular Unity and Justice, f. 1994, opposition.

People's Party of Tajikistan, f. 1993. Pro-communist.

People's Democratic Party, f. 1993, seeks to represent northern economic interests.

Rastokhez (Rebirth), f. 1990. Nationalist-religious party favored by intellectuals.

National legislature and distribution of seats:

Unicameral assembly

Opposition parties widely boycotted the 1995 parliamentary elections which resulted in an overwhelming victory for the Communist Party of Tajikistan.

Head of State:

President Saparmurad Niyazov, b. 1940. Niyazov joined the Communist Party in 1962, heading the Ashkhabad organization until 1984, when he went to CPSU headquarters in Moscow. In 1985, he returned to Turkmenistan as Premier and Party leader. He was elected Chairman of the Supreme Soviet (de facto head of state) in January 1990 and returned unopposed as the directly elected President in October. A conservative Communist, he did not condone or condemn the coup in August and retained the Communists as the ruling party. No opposition parties were permitted to register in Turkmenistan, which remained the least reformed of the former Soviet Republics and the one least interested in independence. Niyazov also became Prime Minister and Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces in May 1992 in accordance with the new Turkmen constitution. In June he was reelected as President, running unopposed. In a referendum in January 1994, 99 percent of the electorate voted to exempt him from re-election in 1997, an indication of the extent to which Niyazov had consolidated his power since independence. The natural gas resources of the country provided Turkmenistan the potential wealth necessary to secure Niyazov's future aim of achieving true independence. He favors regional economic cooperation but distances Turkmenistan from external political and military entanglement, opting not to enter Turkmenistan in most CIS organs and agreements.

Main political parties:

Agzybirlik (Unity), f. 1989. Popular front organization.

Democratic Party of Turkmenistan, f. 1991. Name changed from the Communist Party of Turkmenistan.

Peasants' Party, f. 1993 by deputies of the agrarian faction in parliament.

National legislature and distribution of seats:

Head of State:

President Leonid Kuchma, b. 1938. Kuchma graduated from Dnepropetrovsk State University. In 1960, he joined Yuzmash, the largest missile factory in the country, and eventually became manager. A member of the CPSU from 1960, he was appointed to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Ukraine in 1981. On 13 October 1992, his nomination for Prime Minister was approved by the Ukrainian parliament. Reluctant to accept the post, he nevertheless energetically pursued his policy of market reform. In November, he persuaded the parliament to grant him the power to rule by decree for a period of six months. At the end of that time, however, his powers were not renewed. He resigned as Prime Minister in the face of increasing parliamentary opposition to his economic reform, but was elected President with 52 percent of the popular vote 10 July 1994.

Past heads of state since Independence:

Leonid Kravchuk, b. 1934. A member of the CPSU since 1958, Kravchuk was serving as the Second Secretary of the Communist Party of Ukraine when he was elected Chairman of the Ukrainian Supreme Soviet. On 1 December 1991, Kravchuk garnered 62 percent of presidential election votes to become the first President of independent Ukraine. Just a few months prior, Kravchuk resigned from the Central Committee of the CPSU, the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Ukraine, and the CPSU.

During his tenure as Chairman of the Supreme Soviet, Kravchuk initiated legislation resulting in a Declaration of State Sovereignty, the Proclamation of State Independence of Ukraine, and various laws implementing Ukraine's sovereignty in economic and political spheres.

Main political parties:

Communist Party of Ukraine, f. 1993 by Russian-speakers in eastern Ukraine.

Inter-regional Reform Bloc is the core of support of President Kuchma.

Labor Party of Ukraine, f. 1993, represents managers of state enterprises.

Head of State:

President Islam Karimov, b. 1938. Karimov was a mechanical engineer before moving into economic planning in 1966. He became a regional Communist Party leader in 1986 and a republican leader in 1989. He assumed the chairmanship of the Supreme Soviet (Presidency) of Uzbekistan in March 1990. Although regarded as an old-style, conservative Communist and architect of a repressive regime, he did favor a greater degree of republican control over the central government. After the failed coup, he banned the Communist Party. In December, he was elected President of the Republic in free elections. Until January 1992, he also performed the functions previously executed by the Chairman of the Council of Ministers-a position he abolished in November 1990. During 1992 and 1993, Karimov's leadership became increasingly absolutist as he consolidated his position of power. He extended his control over the mass media, precluded the spread of opposition movements from neighboring Tajikistan, and-prevented domestic opposition movements from registering as political parties. Allegations also surfaced that Karimov intimidated opposition leaders. His stated concern was ensuring political stability during the transition to a free market economy and he particularly discouraged religious or ethnically based parties. Karmov had a large role in inciting the Tajik civil war by invading the neighboring republic with Uzbek and Russian troops, ostensibly to prevent the rising Islamic movement from spreading into Uzbekistan.
