A Note on Sources

The documentary materials translated in this collection were drawn from a wide range of sources including both broadcast and print media as well as official publications and releases. Grateful acknowledgment is made for the use of translations from the Foreign Broadcast Information Service (FBIS), the Current Digest of the Post-Soviet Press (CD), the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), United Press International (UPI), and other sources. Translations have been edited to enhance readability and to achieve consistency in the spelling of personal and place names. The chronologies presented in Appendixes A and B are based on an even broader array of press sources. Readers should refer to the Bibliography (Appendix F) for a listing of standard references on the CIS member states.

Acknowledgments

The editors are pleased to note the valuable contributions made to this volume by several research assistants in the office of Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski. The original impulse for this documentary volume arose out of a periodic chronology of key developments within the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) initiated by Dr. Brzezinski in late 1992. Prepared in his office, the CIS Update listed in chronological detail the ongoing efforts both to invigorate and to oppose the consolidation of the CIS as a substitute for the Soviet Union. It was distributed as a public service by the Center for Strategic and International Studies to scholars interested in this subject.

Over the next three years, the CIS Update, which was designed and edited by Gudrun Persson, was edited by Melissa Meeker and then by David Riddler respectively, with each author further refining the product. Melissa and David were also involved in collecting the structural documents for this book, after the decision was made in 1994 to take advantage of the assembled materials to produce a single volume that would trace the evolution of the CIS. Others actively involved in producing the book include Marianne Alves, Marek Michalewski, and Patrick Weide.

A special acknowledgment is due to Marek Michalewski and Patrick Weide. Marek deserves thanks for his substantial effort in assembling the statistics for, and preparing the graphs in, Appendix A, along with researching and assembling the maps reproduced there. Patrick merits special thanks for his enormous contributions to every section of the book, including compilation of the charts for Dr. Brzezinski's conclusion, preparation of the "Hot Spot" and annual chronologies, and selection of many original documents. Patrick's long and dedicated hours, as well as his substantive insights, are greatly appreciated.

To all of the above go our sincere thanks for making this final product possible.

RUSSIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH OF INDEPENDENT STATES

Introduction: Last Gasp or Renewal?

Zbigniew Brzezinski

Will the Russian empire be the first in history to have experienced both dissolution and restoration? This is the key question posed by the formation and the inner dynamics of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), the successor to the Soviet Union. The answer will have vital significance for the geopolitical shape of the world.

The Soviet Union was the successor to the tsarist Russian empire. In both, the inner and dominant core of imperial might was the Russian state, with the Kremlin as its seat of power. With the dissolution of the Soviet Union, the question consequently arises: What in fact is Russia? Most importantly, how does Russia define itself: as a multinational empire or as a national state? That issue perplexes modern Russians as much as it affects their immediate non-Russian neighbors.

A Russia that defines itself as a national state might not always live in peace with its neighbors, but such a self-definition would thereby acknowledge the separate political identity of the non-Russians. A Russia that sees itself as something more than a national state, however, and as the source of a supra-national and quasi-mystical identity, endowed with a special mission in the huge Eurasian geopolitical space formerly occupied by the Soviet Union, is a Russia that claims the right to embrace its neighbors in a relationship that, in effect, denies to them not only genuine sovereignty but even a truly distinctive national identity.

For example, in the view of many Russians today, Ukraine is not a state inhabited by a genuinely authentic and separate nation. Most Russians (according to public opinion polls) perceive Ukrainians as part of a larger Slavic family in which the Ukrainians are a somewhat distinctive but not really different people-”little brothers” who originate from the same cultural roots and thus share a common historical destiny. According to that mindset, it is only natural for the Ukrainian people to be part of a larger multinational state in which effective power is wielded by the Russian majority, that is, “the elder brother.” For about a century, the Russian attitude toward Poland was rather similar, and it took several decades of Polish national independence for the Russian attitude eventually to evolve into an acceptance of Poland’s separate national status.

It may be helpful to note here some suggestive parallels, both historical and terminological, with the experience of another great imperial nation, Britain. It took several decades for the English to adjust to the notion that the Irish did not willingly belong to the British empire. Moreover, even the difference between being “English” (the inner, dominant ethnic element) and being “British” (the Scots, Welsh, and until not long ago the Irish, as well as the English themselves) has subtle Russian equivalents. “Rossiyskoe gosudarstvo” (which can be translated roughly as the Great Russian state) designates more than a purely Russian state, with non-ethnic Russians also part of that multinational state. It is, in effect, the equivalent of Great Britain. A purely ethnic designation for the Russian state (or equivalent to England) would be “Russkoe gosudarstvo.” A “Russkiy” is an ethnic Russian—that is, like an Englishman; a “Rossiyanin” can be a Russian or a non-Russian citizen of the Great Russian empire—that is, like the British.

Thus what happens to the CIS and what happens to Russia are two sides of a single coin. Whatever the CIS becomes—a Moscow-dominated empire, with an increasingly integrated political structure; a zone of protracted ethnic turmoil; or a relatively stable community of cooperative but essentially politically sovereign states—will also determine what Russia becomes. This is an issue that the Russians are debating fiercely, for they know that their future is very much at stake. In many respects, their debate is reminiscent of the choice that Turkey faced earlier in this century: either to be transformed into a more modern, essentially national, and increasingly European post-imperial state, or to remain the center of a multinational empire.

That ongoing grand debate, cast in geopolitical and cultural terms, revolves around a central issue: Is Russia European or Eurasian? Is Russia’s destiny to be part of Europe, or is it to play a separate role as the dominant Eurasian power? Given that Russia's demographic center of gravity is in Europe, and that its culture is derived from Byzantine Christendom, Russia can be legitimately seen as the eastern extremity of Europe, in both geopolitical and cultural terms. On the purely personal level, an educated Muscovite or St. Petersburg resident finds himself more at home in Paris or Berlin, not to speak of Warsaw, than in Beijing, Tokyo, or Singapore. In that respect, Russia is clearly also European.

Those who advocate the European option thus desire to see Russia increasingly move into a closer cooperation with the emerging larger Europe. Abstracting from the specific issues of eventual membership in either the European Union (EU) or the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), the further implication of a Russia that defines itself as a European state is that Russia evolves into a stable democracy, based essentially on a national state (though a federative one, given that about 20 percent of its population is still non-Russian), while remaining linked in an economically cooperative but politically nondominant relationship with the other members of the CIS. Western-type modernity, social prosperity, and democracy are the central strategic goals of those who advocate the European option.

The Eurasian option is quite different. It posits the proposition that Russia geopolitically and culturally is neither quite Europe nor Asia-but that it has a distinctive Eurasian identity of its own. Instead of focusing on the demographic and cultural bonds with Europe, Eurasianism stresses the special legacy of space-control over the enormous landmass between eastern Europe and the shores of the Pacific Ocean, and of a separate imperial statehood that Moscow shaped through four centuries of eastward expansion. That expansion incorporated and assimilated into Russia a large non-Russian and non-European population, creating thereby also a distinctive Eurasian political and cultural identity. Eurasianism in that sense is both a reality and a mission.

Eurasian doctrines are not new in today's Russia. They started surfacing in the late nineteenth century and became more pervasive in the twentieth. The tsarist empire, until its very last phase, did not need special ideological legitimation. Russian Orthodoxy provided the divine sanction for the imperial mandate. The non-Russians of Eurasia-despite some opposition-were in the main neither politically nor nationally activated and could thus be subsumed in a Russia that was de facto both Eurasian and imperial.

Eurasianism surfaced as a more articulate doctrine in opposition to the communism of the post-revolutionary Soviet Union and in reaction to the alleged decadence of the West. 1 Russian émigrés were especially active in articulating Eurasianism as an antidote to Sovietism, realizing that the gradual awakening of the non-Russians required an overarching doctrine to justify the existence of the Eurasian empire. In the Soviet Union, communism as an internationalist ideology performed that legitimizing function for the non-Russians, and even the very concept of the "Soviet Union" involved the formal recognition of the changing status of the non-Russians. If communism were someday to fade,

Eurasianism as a doctrine involved a rejection not only of communism. It was also contemptuous and hostile to the European idea. It repudiated the notion advocated by Russian westernizers that Russia should eventually become part of the West. While communism was seen as a betrayal of Russian Orthodoxy and of the special Russian identity, Europeanism was repudiated because the West was seen as corrupt, anti-Russian culturally, and inclined to deny Russia its right to exclusive control over the Eurasian landmass.

An influential theorist of Eurasianism was Prince Nikolay S. Trubetzkoy. He made the case (in the mid-1920s) that “The Eurasian world represents a self-contained geographical, economic, and ethnic whole distinguishable from both Europe and Asia proper.” According to him, the political unification of Eurasia was a historical inevitability, conditioned by its geography and historical experience. The geography is determined by four parallel zones stretching from west to east (the tundra, the forests, the steppes, and the mountains), intersected by north-south rivers, and forming a single unit. The history was determined by the unification of that territory through the Mongolian empire, which subsequently the Muscovite Principality conquered. The Orthodox Russian tsar infused the new imperial and increasingly Eurasian Russia with both a religious and a national content all of its own.

In Trubetzkoy’s view, communism was a startling departure from that enduring tradition. “Communism was in fact a disguised version of Europeanism in destroying the spiritual foundations and national uniqueness of Russian life, in propagating there the materialist frame of reference that actually governs both Europe and America, and in nurturing Russia on European theories with deep roots in the soil of European civilization.” Thus, if the Russian people “were to reject communism with its European origins, then the connection between it and European civilization would be severed, and the task of strengthening and developing the national historical life of Russia could begin.”

He concluded his historical treatise with a ringing appeal to his countrymen: “Our task is to create a completely new culture, our own culture, which will not resemble European civilization.... It will be possible only when the attractions of European civilization and of ideologies invented in Europe are exhausted once and for all, when Russia ceases to be a distorted reflection of European civilization and finds her own unique historical nature, when she becomes once again herself: Russia-Eurasia, the conscious heir to and bearer of the great legacy of Genghis Khan.” 2

Small wonder then that in the confused and unsettling post-imperial conditions of the mid-1990s, Eurasianism has been increasingly the vogue among many post-Soviet Russian strategic thinkers. It provides the geopolitical justification, and the cultural legitimacy, for a Russia with a special vocation in the space both of the former Soviet Union and of the former tsarist empire. It projects a Russia that is neither Europe nor Asia, but dominant on the Eurasian continent, with an identity all its own, destined to play (though the words are not used explicitly) an imperial role. Global status as a geopolitical superpower, spatial control, and regional hegemony are the central strategic goals of the Eurasian option.

But is imperial restoration a practical option for Russia? Some Russian nationalists seem to think so. It is not only the extremists-like Vladimir Zhirinovskiy-that do. Aleksandr Rutskoy, the former vice president and a possible presidential candidate, speaks for a very large segment of the Russian people, and reflects a deeply rooted impulse, when he asserts that “it is apparent from looking at our country’s geopolitical situation that Russia represents the only bridge between Asia and Europe. Whoever becomes the master of this space will become the master of the entire world. This is why Russia must continue to be a great power.”<sup>3</sup> In keeping with this viewpoint, Rutskoy in mid-1994 launched his “great power movement,” dedicated explicitly to the idea of restoring Russian dominion within the space once occupied by the Soviet Union (and reported that within only a few weeks he had gained about half a million adherents).

How realistic is that goal? Until this century, great empires endured largely because the subject peoples were politically passive and nationally unaware. Once that passivity and absence of national consciousness started fading, the preservation of empire entailed increasing costs. Democratic imperial home states-such as Britain, France, Holland-were ultimately unwilling to pay the price that increased coercion would have required. Some, like the British, came to that conclusion relatively early, in the face of the growing but essentially peaceful political mass mobilization in India. Some, like the French, learned the lesson more painfully, in the course of the prolonged Algerian liberation struggle.

The Russian empire was exposed to that lesson as well, largely through the Polish uprisings of the nineteenth century. But outside Poland, the level of political self-awareness among the non-Russians was relatively low until well into the twentieth century. Thus the tsarist regime did not pay unbearable costs to sustain itself. Its defeats in the Russo-Japanese war of 1905 and in World War I, and even the subsequent Russian civil war, did not precipitate the empire's general dissolution; only the secession of its more politically and nationally conscious western provinces: Poland, Finland, and the Baltic republics. The Communists thereby inherited an imperial state, though one in which the non-Russians were beginning for the first time to stir and awaken.

The Soviet Union was the new formula for the old tsarist empire. It aimed at the preservation of political power by the center-though that center no longer officially defined itself purely in ethnic, Great Russian terms. (Indeed, in the early phase of Soviet power, the top leadership was composed of an amalgam of Russian, Jewish, Lettish, Polish, Ukrainian, and Caucasian Bolsheviks.) The system at large was to be simultaneously “socialist in content and national in form,” which meant that centralized power, which was used to impose an ideologically driven social reconstruction, was to be combined with some respect for non-Russian linguistic, cultural, and even historical diversity. National republics were officially established, their state borders formally (and often very arbitrarily) drawn on the map, and nominal republican governments set up. The pretense was that the Soviet Union was a voluntary association of constituent states.

That diversity, however, was not permitted to cross over into the political realm, and the longer the Soviet system existed, the stronger became the emphasis on the dominant role of the Great Russian “elder brother.” Precisely because some degree of politically oriented national awakening among the non-Russians was inevitable, the Kremlin-especially under Stalin-was ruthless in decapitating any non-Russian political elites suspected of harboring national aspirations. In that respect, compulsion as the means of imperial preservation came to be a centrally important instrument. It generated an external image of unanimity that even led many foreign observers to conclude that, indeed, a new formation-a Soviet nation or a Soviet man-had emerged, immunizing the Soviet Union against the fates that befell the British or the French empires. 4

It was not to be. Contrary to that viewpoint, the Soviet Union did not succeed in immunizing itself against the general consequences of the age of nationalism and more specifically of the contagious effect of post-World War II decolonization. The death of Stalin, moreover, made it more difficult to rely on coercion alone. The post-Stalin leadership felt it had to cultivate the non-Russian Communist elites, thereby indirectly propitiating the gradual spread of nationalist sentiments. For example, Nikita Khrushchev presented Crimea to Ukraine as “a gift” on the occasion of the four hundredth anniversary of Ukraine’s incorporation into Russia. In Central Asia, the diversion of large-scale Soviet resources for the upgrading of the republican capitals and greater reliance on ethnically native Communist rulers was also motivated by concerns that global decolonization could prove contagious.

The crisis of survival that the Soviet Union came to face in the 1980s thus occurred in a setting in which the non-Russian components of the old empire were becoming more assertive and restless. But with the exception of the Baltic republics, and perhaps Georgia, the restlessness was not of the type associated either with Polish nationalism in the tsarist empire or the Irish in the British or the Algerian in the French. It was more a matter of a generalized disaffection on the part of the masses, and especially their intellectuals. This disaffection focused on the demeaning character of the officially imposed worship of everything that was Russian. It also reflected a greater desire for broader autonomy on the part of the national republican, though also still both Soviet and Communist, leaderships.

The disintegration of the Soviet Union in December 1991 was not, therefore, the consequence of an irresistible wave of non-Russian political self-assertion. The old Soviet Union had outlived its day, but the precipitating impetus for its disintegration came from the political conflicts in Moscow, from the struggle between Boris Yeltsin and Mikhail Gorbachev within a demoralized and fractionated Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU)-reinforced by pressures from outside the center for a genuine redistribution of power (especially economic power) between Moscow and the formally “sovereign” capitals in Kyiv, Tbilisi, or Tashkent. The combination of these forces led, to the astonishment of all those who had assumed that the national problem in the Soviet Union no longer existed, to the rapid dissolution of the Soviet Union and its replacement by a quickly improvised new entity called the Commonwealth of Independent States.

However, the majority of the Communist leaders of these independent states, it must be bluntly stated, had their independence bestowed, or even inflicted, upon them. They did not win it either through a national liberation struggle or even by a political contest. To be sure, there were national dissidents, who were willing to defy Soviet coercion and who suffered the personal consequences of their courage and dedication. Nonetheless, the independence that came in late 1991 came largely because the center of Soviet power had collapsed so rapidly. The local, national Communist elites had no choice but to take the lead in a wave of proclamations of national sovereignty and independence, thereby joining in the sudden outburst of national awakenings.

The only exception, but a very important one, was Ukraine. By the summer of 1991, public agitation for national independence infected even the local Communist leadership in Kyiv. Thus both the existing Communist establishment and the long-suppressed nationalist activists joined forces in taking advantage of the Soviet Union's crisis to infuse real substance into Ukraine's formal status as a "sovereign" Soviet republic. That, in the wake of the Soviet Union's dissolution, subsequently provided the basis for Ukraine's firm self-assertion.

Broadly speaking, one can discern the following progression in the process of self-assertion among the non-Russians: The Baltic republics were the first to experience mass demonstrations, with dissatisfaction from below led by a leadership composed of both anti-Communists and non-Communists as well as even some Communist leaders who were swept up by the groundswell of national emotions. The nationalism of the Baltic republics was pervasive, and not surprisingly so, given their previous national independence.

Conditions in the Caucasus were in some respects similar, in part because of the deeply entrenched sense of national identity among the Georgians, Azeris, and Armenians. There, too, non-Communists initially took the lead. The above pattern was followed by Ukraine, which as already noted created a surprising coalition of Communists and non-Communists in the progressive assertion of independence, taking advantage of Ukraine's nominal status as a Soviet republic and very deliberately infusing that status with substance even before the formal breakup of the Soviet Union. Last were the Central Asian states as well as Belarus, which were characterized by the absence of bottom-up agitation and by the rapid usurpation of the independence movement by the established nomenklatura.

In any case, as already noted, by 1991 the old formula of the Soviet Union had outlived its day. But its enduring legacy was the highly interdependent economy, which made it more difficult for the newly sovereign republics fully to take charge of their destinies. The collapse of the Union-and of its various institutions of power-spawned a series of states that in the majority of cases lacked not only the ecstatic sense of national emancipation required to sustain the social sacrifice involved in constructing genuinely independent statehood, but even the minimal capacity for economic self-determination.

In that setting, it was unclear whether the newly proclaimed Commonwealth of Independent States was merely a euphemism for a partially restructured Soviet empire or the framework for “a civilized divorce” (to use the apt phrase of the freshly installed Ukrainian president). That very ambiguity dominated the early months of the CIS. But as the documents that follow indicate, the ambiguity endured longer among the astonished non-Russian elites who suddenly found themselves enjoying the fruits and the trappings of national independence than among the Russians themselves.

Within months of the dissolution of the Soviet Union, a series of spontaneous initiatives originated from Moscow, designed to flesh out and to deepen the scope of CIS cooperation, to enhance its status, to create conditions in which the CIS would, at the very outset, be more than the British Commonwealth, then approximate the European Union, then move beyond a confederation or even a federation to eventually become perhaps again just a multinational state dominated by its largest nation.

How effective are these efforts likely to be? Much depends on the strength of the imperial impulse among the Russians and on the tempo of the spread of nationalism within the non-Russian states. In the final analysis, trends within the CIS thus involve a historically significant race between the growing inclination of initially lethargic national elites to value their independence and the Russian determination to exploit their difficulties especially economic ones-in order to promote a more integrated and centrally controlled entity.

However, how integrated that entity ought to be is also a subject of intense contention among leading Russians. Some Russian politicians, as already noted, believe that an essentially unitary state-in effect, a Eurasian Russian empire ought to be and will be the final stage. Russian army leaders clearly sympathize, and their efforts to subordinate the nascent non-Russian military establishments under Moscow's control (see Chapter 9) appear to be part of a larger geostrategic design to regain control over the space of the former Soviet Union. (The military determination, manifested immediately after December 1991-to preserve strategic enclaves on the outer fringes of the old Soviet Union, in Kaliningrad, Moldova, Crimea, Abkhazia, Tajikistan, and the Kuriles-was in large measure an instinctive response to the empire's dissolution.)

the first post-Soviet ambassador of Russia to the United States and currently the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Duma, Vladimir Lukin, took on those Russians who, like Ruskoy, have argued explicitly for the restoration of “the Russian-Soviet empire.” In Lukin’s view, that option “is unthinkable either technically, without prohibitive sacrifices and costs, or politically because Russia would then find itself in a hostile isolation even more dangerous than the one of the Cold War era.” And he adds that “all this says nothing about whether this variant is compatible with preserving democracy in Russia.”

Lukin suggests instead that “the long-term ultimate task here is to create, by stimulating the natural integration processes rather than by compulsion, close allied relationships of a confederative type. Russia needs to have an internal ring of friends in addition to an outer ring of partners.” Though he does not identify which of the former Soviet republics fit into the category of “friends” and which of “partners,” he does make it clear that Russia should have a special role as the center of the inner ring: “The level of our relationships with friends should as a rule be qualitatively higher than of our relationships with our partners, and the level of relationships of our partners with our friends should be qualitatively lower than that between us and our friends.... There should also be a mechanism in place—ideally a collective one with a Russian basis-for resolving extreme situations with the use of force a factor” (emphasis added).

Lukin’s emphasis on the special role of Russia highlights the acute dilemma that confronts the moderate Russian nationalists. For the imperial nationalists, the issue is clear: Central control of a unitary Eurasian state by Moscow is the ultimate goal. For the moderates, the situation is more complex: They abjure the goal of imperial restoration, yet they desire closer integration and a special political role in it for Russia. Quite often they point to the European Union as their eventual model, but they overlook several decisive differences between contemporary Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Not only is Europe being integrated by stable democracies-and none of the ex-Soviet republics currently are, nor is Russia itself-but within Europe there is no comparable disproportion in power to that which prevails between Russia and the other former Soviet republics. Germany is militarily integrated into NATO and in that domain is more than balanced by France and the United Kingdom; economically Germany is much stronger than any other European state, but it can also be balanced by a coalition of any two or three major European states while within the EU decision-making process an elaborate voting system of checks and balances effectively precludes domination by any single state. Last but not least, the American presence in Europe, through NATO, also provides welcome reassurance against the domination of Europe by any single power.

The situation in the former Russian empire is dramatically different. Russia is stronger militarily, economically, and politically-and stronger by far-than any of the other former Soviet republics. Even a coalition of all of them could not match Russia's power. Thus any steps by the former republics in the direction of integration-even only economic (including the most rational ones)-have the effect of enhancing Russia's political leverage. The Russians as well as the non-Russians know this-and that is why Ukraine, as the largest and nationally the most ambitious of the newly independent states, and (to a lesser extent) the two potentially economically self-reliant Central Asian states, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, have been ambivalent regarding closer economic integration.

The documents selected for Chapter 4 illustrate this ambivalence. On the one hand, the necessity of such "integration" is recognized and its potential benefits much desired, especially given the degree of economic interdependence fostered by the Soviet regime; on the other hand, its political consequences are feared, especially as the new national political elites deepen their attachment to the perquisites of power and as the sense of national awareness becomes socially more pervasive. That is why Ukraine for several years has resisted Russia's entreaties to join the CIS's Economic Union, and that is why the assertive presidents of Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, though joining the Economic Union, have also been promoting a Central Asian Confederation.

In any case, the asymmetry in power and the painful memories of Russian rule make the non-Russians wary even of the more moderate Russian designs. That injects an enduring element of tension into inner CIS relations. And it gives added salience to the question posed at the outset of this introduction.

It is too early to postulate an answer. A tentative one will be attempted in the conclusion to this volume. The tragedy of Chechnya the unspeakable slaughter of its population by the Russian Army in late 1994 and early 1995-indicates not only how volatile and explosive that question is but also how difficult it is to provide a categorical answer.

On the one hand, the decision to suppress the Chechen quest for independence-and the manner in which it was executed-bespeaks the worst in the Russian and Soviet imperial tradition. The behavior of the Kremlin seemed almost designed to signal to the non-Russians Moscow's determination to remain the capital of much more than a national state. Viewed in conjunction with other actions taken to reassert Russia's dominant military-political presence for example, in Georgia, Tajikistan, and elsewhere) as well as the energetic pursuit of the efforts to centralize CIS machinery, Chechnya could be viewed as the extreme manifestation of a dominant political momentum within Russia toward an even more assertive imperial restoration.

On the other hand, the above is not the full story. The popular reaction to the war against the Chechens was heavily negative. Not only the atrocities involved but the decision to use force produced large-scale social repugnance. Though it is too early to tell what are the full political ramifications of these social attitudes, they do suggest that there are limits to popular support for policies of overt and coercive imperial restoration. This is not to say that the Russians lack the desire for a revival of the old “Union,” but it is to make the point that the public may not be prepared to support imperial policies that would entail excessive costs and burdens.

The chapters that follow document the Russian efforts since 1992 to make the CIS into a more viable instrument of economic and political integration, and the ambivalent and, in some cases, negative-responses from the newly independent non-Russian states. The materials assembled in this volume should, therefore, help to frame the answer to the central question posed in the beginning of this introduction.

Part I provides the key documents pertaining to the dissolution of the Soviet Union, including the last-minute but aborted attempt to adopt some form of genuine federalism.

Part II traces, in a comprehensive fashion, the debates that ensued in Russia on the sudden discovery that it was no longer the center of an empire. How to explain that; whom to blame; and what to do about it, was the natural, though belated, reaction to the replacement of the USSR by the CIS. It also examines the evolving reaction of the non-Russian elites to the novel post-Soviet context, taking special note of the distinctive Ukrainian posture; reviews several proposed alternatives to the CIS itself; and traces more specifically Russian efforts to revive economic integration and to reinforce CIS political institutions.

Part III then provides an overview of the actual structures, agreements, and protocols that emerged from the foregoing debates and initiatives. On the one hand, it is evident that a major enhancement of the CIS has occurred during the past several years. On the other, it is also clear that opposition to further integration remains strong, either (and most often) through evasion of implementation or through outright refusal to take part. The latter is most obviously the case with Ukraine, especially in regard to the politically sensitive matters of joint security and border controls.

All the foregoing include introductory notes (prepared by Paige Sullivan) designed to give the reader the pertinent historical context, to define more precisely the issues that have dominated the CIS debates, and to draw attention to particularly important aspects of the documents subsequently cited. The Conclusion attempts to delineate the likely prospects for the CIS.

Appendices A and B, the chronologies of key events, are meant to give the reader the opportunity to sense the degree to which what has transpired has been the consequence of a spontaneous reaction by the Russians to salvage as much as possible of the former Soviet Union and the degree to which these efforts, over time, assumed a more deliberate and sustained character. At first, many of the reactions-whether in the five principal areas of ethnic conflict covered in the pages that follow, or more generally in regard to the political, defense, and economic issues that are also addressed in the chronologies-appear largely spontaneous. That, in itself, is impressive testimony to the great-power instinct of many Russians.

However, with the passage of time, one cannot suppress the feeling that a larger design is also being pursued, guided by a historically driven vision. In any case, it is hoped that the chronologies will be useful to the reader not only factually but also as a source of a more dynamic perspective regarding post-Soviet developments. The Western press has often been negligent in noting some of the more significant aspects of the institutional development of the CIS, giving perhaps an excessive impression that the CIS is largely a failure.

Additional appendices present data for the CIS and profiles of the member states as well as directory and bibliographic information.

The editors hope that our efforts will help scholars, analysts, businessmen, and students interested in post-Soviet affairs gain a clearer perspective on the future of a geopolitically vital portion of Eurasia—a future that is still very much subject to conflicting political pressures, national aspirations, economic dynamics, and popular passions.

Having felt for years that the national problem was the Achilles' heel of the Soviet Union—a viewpoint that he first expressed as a graduate student in his M.A. dissertation—he proposed shortly after entering the White House that an interagency group be established to monitor Soviet nationality problems and to formulate an appropriate U.S. policy toward them. His initiative was opposed (unsuccessfully) by State Department officials on the ground that the Soviet Union did not face any significant national problems that called for a U.S. policy response. The president subsequently approved some specific initiatives in support of non-Russian national aspirations.

Introductory Notes

The year 1991 marked the final phase in the long process of the Soviet Union's dissolution. The momentous events which transpired that year included: (a) in April, the drafting of the ill-fated "Nine-Plus-One" treaty or "Treaty of the Union of Sovereign States" at Novo-Ogarevo outside Moscow; (b) in August, an attempt by conservative members of the government to overthrow President Mikhail Gorbachev; (c) declarations of independence by almost every Soviet Socialist Republic between August and December; and (d) between October and December, a failed effort to unify the sovereign republics of the Union under the mantle of an "Economic Community" treaty. The last was an agreement assigned by the State Council to Grigoriy Yavlinskiy, author of the American-influenced "Window of Opportunity" plan for economic reform. Neither the Union treaty, nor the Economic Community treaty, however, was to succeed in halting the fast-moving train of events carrying the Soviet Union to its demise.

A bit of background on the tumultuous political context in which the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) was hastily conceived is helpful for understanding the later ambiguities of this organization. Following the "velvet revolution" of 1989-90 in Central Europe, tensions mounted between Moscow and its republics, which had all declared their "sovereignty" by the end of 1990, meaning they no longer recognized the supremacy of Union laws over republic laws. This did not reflect a radical movement toward national independence in most of the republics. However, many republican leaders desired autonomy over natural resources, finances, and budget matters, as well as the right to engage in foreign trade and other foreign relationships without Moscow's supervision.

Gorbachev's answer was to initiate the "Nine Plus One" process on 23 April 1991 at his dacha in Novo-Ogarevo, a rural village outside Moscow.

The "Nine Plus One" agreement, which is included in this collection of documents, conceded considerable autonomy to the leaders of the nine republics which participated (Moldova, Georgia, Armenia, and the Baltic states were absent). The "One" referred to Gorbachev. The treaty stipulated an accelerated program of economic reform, and was intended to be the first step toward a looser form of union between the Center and the republics, but one that retained Moscow as the capital of one enormous state.

Political turmoil intervened, however. President Gorbachev had, on his own without prior consultation with the Supreme Soviet or Congress of People's Deputies, convened the drafting session at Novo-Ogarevo. This omission enraged several of Gorbachev's own government appointees as well as some key members of the Supreme Soviet. A dangerous rift developed between Gorbachev and the anti-reform conservatives. Much was written in the Soviet press about this draft treaty and differing attitudes toward it, samples of which appear in this chapter. The extreme reactions to the treaty (as illustrated by the Izvestiya piece, 1.2) figured prominently in catalyzing the August coup attempt against Gorbachev.

Gorbachev was also embroiled in a personal and ideological power struggle with Boris Yeltsin, former Moscow Communist Party chief and ally of Gorbachev in the Politburo. Breaking with Gorbachev in 1987, Yeltsin became an increasingly vocal critic of the Soviet president's frequent compromises with conservative forces and his failure to back the "Five-Hundred Day" economic reform plan, which Yeltsin supported, in 1990. In June 1991, Yeltsin became the first popularly elected president of the Russian Federation. He immediately escalated the struggle for greater Russian autonomy from the Center. An untenable situation developed in which the USSR (represented by the "Center" in Moscow) and the Russian government (also in Moscow) coexisted, but pursued essentially incompatible goals.

The struggle for the military-industrial complex of Russia was at the apex of the political chaos that engulfed the USSR in 1991. Yeltsin attacked the national security priorities of the Soviet government, demanding a reduction in the Soviet defense budget and the conversion of a large group of military enterprises to civilian production. With regard to the "Nine Plus One" process, Yeltsin supported it, but disagreed with Gorbachev over the extent to which the Soviet constitution would supersede those of the sovereign republics. At Novo-Ogarevo, Yeltsin stressed Russia's sov-foreign rights and talked of “taking a renewed Russia onto the world stage as a sovereign state.”

The new Union treaty was scheduled to be signed on 20 August 1991; but between 19 and 21 August, a so-called State Committee on the State of Emergency anointed itself the Soviet leadership, issuing decrees removing Mikhail Gorbachev from power and conferring upon Vice President Gennadiy Yanaev the duties of president of the USSR. As the documents in this chapter illustrate, however, the coup leaders could not cope with the pace or the consequences of the changes occurring in the Soviet Union.

As Gorbachev and his ministers tried to restore some semblance of order following the arrest of the members of the Emergency Committee, a transitional government was erected, the draft law of which appears in this chapter. This law created a “State Council,” consisting of the USSR president and the highest officials of the Union republics, to provide coordinated solutions to domestic and foreign policy issues affecting the interests of the republics and the Center. It was this State Council which was put in charge of drafting a treaty on Economic Community. Grigoriy Yavlinskiy, who had previously written an economic reform plan in cooperation with a group from Harvard University, was chosen to consolidate his ideas in a new treaty. A treaty was drafted, but with great difficulty. The republics could not agree on areas of integration or supranational control. Ukraine, as was to become the rule in ensuing months, refused to sign the treaty from the very beginning. The documents in this chapter include Yavlinskiy's draft, his preamble to the draft explaining the politics of drafting such an accord, and some illuminating press reactions to this highly controversial effort.

October and November 1991 were critical months. On 18 October the Economic Community treaty was signed by eight sovereign republics-Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. (Moldova and Ukraine subsequently initialed the treaty, on 6 November 1991.) This event was heralded as a good omen for the signing of the draft Union treaty in November.

Together, these two treaties would provide for a common economic space, common military force, common foreign policy and common borders, but with a "central coordinator" (Gorbachev's term), not a central government per se. The new Union was to be called the "Union of Sovereign States." Nevertheless, as it turned out, these institutions would not be established for several years within the improvised framework of the CIS and even then they would not be unanimously accepted by the former Soviet republics.

An implacable challenge to confederal rule was posed by Russia and Ukraine. Russia could not accept the pace of economic reform or the lack of foreign policy autonomy contemplated by the new Union. Ukraine could accept neither the degree of economic control implicit in the Economic Community treaty nor the limits placed on republican military power by the new Union. In particular, as reported by Izvestiya, the Ukrainian Supreme Soviet chairman, Leonid Kravchuk, wanted all the republics with nuclear weapons to share authority over them.

It was Ukraine, in fact, which dealt the final overt blow to the chances for the Union treaty's survival. On 1 December it held a nationwide referendum in which 90.32 percent of the citizens of Ukraine voted for total independence from the Union. Two days later, President Yeltsin issued an official statement on Ukraine, which appears at the end of this chapter. He was the first to unilaterally recognize Ukraine—a bold gesture, which opened the question of de jure recognition of the sovereign republics as independent new states.

The last press commentary in this chapter is from Izvestiya. It examines the criteria on which the international community would base its recognition of Ukraine and the other former Soviet republics in days to come. The way was now open for all the former republics to opt out of the Union as totally independent states, a development which was to transpire much more rapidly than expected by the entire rest of the world. Ukraine's recognition, in effect, confirmed the reality of the collapse of the Soviet Union, though it would take thirty days for the complete drama to unfold.

1.1 Draft Novo-Ogarevo Agreement (Union of Sovereign States)

Pravda, 27 June 1991 [FBIS Translation]

I. Basic Principles

1. Each republic which is party to the treaty is a sovereign state. The Union of Soviet Sovereign Republics (USSR) is a sovereign, federative, democratic state, formed as a result of the unification of equal republics and exercising state power within the bounds of the powers with which the parties to the treaty voluntarily invest it.

2. The states comprising the Union retain the right to decide independently all issues of their development, while guaranteeing equal political rights and opportunities for social, economic, and cultural development to all peoples living on their territory. The parties to the treaty will operate on the basis of a combination of values common to all mankind and those belonging to individual nationalities and will resolutely oppose racism, chauvinism, nationalism, and any attempts to restrict the rights of peoples.

3. The states comprising the Union regard as a most important principle the preeminence of human rights, in accordance with the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other generally recognized norms of international law. All citizens are guaranteed the opportunity to study and use their native language, unimpeded access to information, freedom of religion, and other political, social, economic, and personal rights and liberties.

4. The states comprising the Union see the shaping of a civil society as a most important condition for the liberty and prosperity of the people and each individual. They will seek to satisfy people's needs based on the free choice of forms of ownership and methods of economic management, the development of a Union-wide market, and the realization of the principles of social justice and protection.

5. The states comprising the Union possess the full range of political power and autonomously determine their own national-state and administrative-territorial structure as well as the system of bodies of power and administration. They may delegate some of their powers to other states which participate in the treaty of which they are members.

Those participating in the treaty acknowledge democracy based on popular representation and direct expression of the will of the people as a general, fundamental principle, and strive for the creation of a rule-of-law state which would serve as a guarantor against any tendencies toward totalitarianism and arbitrariness.

6. The states comprising the Union consider one of their very important tasks the preservation and development of national traditions, state support for education, health, science, and culture. They will facilitate the intensive exchange of mutual enrichment of the peoples of the Union and of the whole world with humanist, spiritual values and achievements.

7. The Union of Soviet Sovereign Republics operates in international relations as a sovereign state and a subject of international law-the successor to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Its main aims in the international arena are lasting peace, disarmament, the elimination of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, cooperation between states, and solidarity of the peoples in the resolution of the global problems of humanity.

The states comprising the Union are full members of the international community.

They have a right to establish direct diplomatic, consular, trade, and other links with foreign states, to exchange authorized representatives with them, to conclude international treaties, and to participate in the activity of international organizations without encroaching upon the interests of each of the Union states and their common interests, and without violating the international responsibilities of the Union.

II. The Structure of the Union

Article 1. Membership in the Union

The membership of states in the Union is voluntary.

The states comprising the Union enter it either directly or within the composition of other states. This does not restrict their rights and does not release them from responsibilities under the treaty. They all possess equal rights and bear equal responsibilities.

Relations between states where one state forms part of the other are regulated by treaties between them and by the constitution of the states to which it belongs.

The Union is open for entry into it by other democratic states which recognize the treaty.

The states comprising the Union retain the right to leave it freely in the manner established by the participants in the treaty and set down in the constitution and laws of the Union.

Article 2. Citizenship in the Union

The citizen of a state that belongs to the Union is simultaneously a citizen of the Union.

Citizens of the USSR have equal rights, freedoms, and responsibilities, laid down by the constitution, laws, and international treaties of the Union.

Article 3. The Territory of the Union

The territory of the Union comprises the territories of all the states that form it.

Those participating in the treaty recognize the borders existing between them at the moment of signing the treaty.

The borders between the states comprising the Union may be changed only by an agreement between them that does not violate the interests of others participating in the treaty.

Article 4. Relations Between the States Comprising the Union

Relations between the states comprising the Union are regulated by the current treaty, the constitution of the USSR, and treaties and agreements not contradicting these. Those participating in the treaty build their mutual relations within the Union on the basis of equality, respect of sovereignty, territorial integrity, non-interference in internal affairs, the resolution of disputes by peaceful means, cooperation, mutual help, and the conscientious fulfillment of their obligations under the Union treaty and in interrepublican agreements.

The states comprising the Union are obliged: not to resort to force or the threat of force in relations between themselves; not to encroach on one another's territorial integrity; not to permit the stationing of armed formations or military bases of foreign states on their territory; not to conclude agreements contradicting the aims of the Union or directed against the states comprising it.

The use of the armed forces of the Union within the country is not permitted, except for their participation in eliminating the consequences of natural calamities and ecological disasters and also cases provided for in legislation on conditions under a state of emergency.

Article 5. Jurisdiction of the USSR

The parties to the treaty invest the USSR with the following powers:

- protecting the sovereignty and the territorial integrity of the Union; declaring war and concluding peace; the provision of defense and the leadership of the armed forces and of the border, internal, and railway troops of the Union; the organization and direction of the development and production of armaments and military equipment.

- ensuring the state security of the Union; establishing the conditions of and guarding the state border and the sea and air space of the Union; coordinating the activity of the security organs of the republics.

- implementing the foreign policy of the Union and coordinating the foreign policy activity of the republics; representing the Union in relations with foreign states and international organizations; concluding the international treaties of the Union.

- implementing the foreign economic activity of the Union and coordinating the foreign economic activity of the republics; representing the Union in international economic financial organizations, and concluding the foreign economic agreements of the Union.

- confirming and executing the Union budget, carrying out the issuing of money; holding the gold stock and the diamond and currency reserves of the Union; the direction of space research, the all-Union communications and information systems, geodesy and cartography, metrology and standardization; and the management of nuclear power generation.

- adoption of the Union constitution and the introduction of amendments and supplements to it; adoption of laws within the powers of the Union and establishment of the basic principles of legislation on subjects agreed with the republics; supreme constitutional supervision.

- direction of the activity of the federal law-enforcement bodies and coordination of the activity of the law-enforcement bodies of the Union and the republics in the fight against crime.

Article 6. The Sphere of Joint Authority of the Union and the Republics

The bodies of state power and administration of the Union and the republics exercise jointly the following powers:

- defense of the constitutional system of the Union based on this treaty and the USSR constitution; ensuring the rights and freedoms of USSR citizens;

- determination of the Union's military policy; implementation of measures to organize and make provision for defense; establishment of a common procedure for conscription and the manner in which military service is performed; settlement of matters connected with the activity of troops and the disposition of military facilities on the territory of the republics; organization of mobilization preparation for the national economy; management of enterprises of the defense complex.

-determination of the Union's state security strategy and ensuring the state security of the republics; alteration of the Union's state border with the agreement of the relevant party to the treaty; protection of state secrets; determination of a list of strategic resources and products which may not be exported beyond the Union's borders; establishment of general principles and standards in the sphere of ecological security; establishment of a procedure for obtaining, storing, and using fissile and radioactive materials.

-determination of the foreign policy course of the USSR and monitoring of its implementation; defense of the rights and interests of citizens of the USSR and the rights and interests of the republics in international relations; establishment of the basic principles of foreign economic activity; conclusion of agreements on international loans and credits; regulation of the Union's state foreign debt; unified customs activity; defense and rational use of the natural wealth of the Union's economic zone and continental shelf.

—determination of the strategy for the Union's socioeconomic development and creation of conditions for the formation of an all-Union market; pursuance of a unified financial, credit, monetary, tax, insurance, and price policy based on a common currency; creation and use of the Union's gold reserve and diamond and currency reserves; elaboration and implementation of all-Union programs; monitoring of the implementation of the Union budget and issue of money; creation of all-Union funds for regional development and elimination of the consequences of natural disasters and catastrophes; creation of strategic reserves; the management of unified all-Union statistics.

-elaboration of a unified policy and balance in fuel and energy resources; management of the country's energy system, its gas and oil trunk pipelines and its all-Union rail, air, and sea transport; establishment of basic principles for using natural resources and protection of the environment; coordination of actions in the sphere of the management of water conservancy and resources of interrepublican significance.

-determining the basic principles of social policy on issues of employment, migration, labor safety and conditions, social provision and social security, popular education, and health care; the establishment of unified procedures for pension provision and maintenance of other social guarantees when citizens move from one republic to another; establishment of unified procedures for indexation of incomes and a guaranteed minimum income.

-the organization of basic scientific research and the stimulation of scientific and technological progress; the establishment of common principles and criteria for the training and certification of scientific and teaching cadres; the definition of a common procedure for the use of therapeutic means and methods; promotion of the development and mutual enrichment of national cultures; preservation of the age-old life-style of minority peoples and the conditions for their economic and cultural development.

-monitoring compliance with the constitution and the laws of the Union, the decrees of the president, and decisions adopted within the area of competence of the Union; the formation of an all-Union criminal records and information system; coordination of the fight against crimes committed on the territories of a number of republics; the definition of a unified system for organization of correctional facilities.

Article 7. Procedure for Implementation of Powers of State Bodies of the Union and of Joint Powers of States' Bodies of the Union and Republics

Issues that come under joint jurisdiction are resolved by the authorities and administrative bodies of the Union and the states that comprise it by way of coordination, special agreements, and adoption of the basic principles of legislation of the Union and of the republics and of republican laws in keeping with them. Issues that come under the jurisdiction of Union bodies are resolved directly by them.

Powers which are not placed directly by Articles 5 and 6, either under the exclusive direction of the Union's authorities and administrative bodies or in the sphere of joint jurisdiction of Union and republican bodies remain at the direction of the republics and are implemented by them independently, or on the basis of bilateral or multilateral agreements between them.

After the treaty has been signed the relevant change will be made in the powers of the governing bodies of the Union and the republics.

The participants in the treaty proceed on the basis that as the all-Union market is gradually established there will be a reduction in the scope of direct state management of the economy. The necessary redistribution or alteration of the extent of powers of governing bodies will be carried out with the agreement of the states comprising the Union.

Disputes on questions of implementing the powers of Union bodies or of realizing rights and carrying out duties within the scope of the joint powers of Union and republican bodies are resolved through conciliation. If agreement is not reached, disputes are submitted for examination by the Union's constitutional court.

The states comprising the Union participate in the implementation of the powers of the Union bodies through the joint formation of the latter and also by means of special procedures for coordinating decisions and their fulfillment.

Each republic, by concluding an agreement with the Union, can additionally delegate to it the implementation of certain of its powers, and the Union, with the agreement of all republics, can transfer to one or several of them the implementation on their territory of certain of its powers.

Article 8. Property

The Union and the states that comprise it ensure the free development and protection of all forms of property and create conditions for the functioning of enterprises and economic organizations within the framework of a single all- Union market.

The land, its underground reserves, water, and other natural resources, and plant and animal life are the property of the republics and the inalienable possession of their peoples. The procedure for using, holding, and managing them (right of ownership) is established by the legislation of the republics.

The states comprising the Union make available to the Union those facilities in state ownership that are necessary for the exercise of the powers vested in the Union bodies of authority and administration.

State property that is under Union jurisdiction is the joint property of the states that comprise the Union and is used in their common interests, including the interests of the accelerated development of backward regions.

The states comprising the Union have a right to their share of the Union's gold reserves and diamond and hard currency stocks existing when the present treaty is concluded. Their involvement in the subsequent amassing and use of treasure is defined by special agreements.

Article 9. Union Taxes and Levies

In order to finance the Union's state budget and other expenditures associated with the exercise of its powers, Union taxes and levies are fixed at levels determined by agreement with the republics. Their percentage contributions to all-Union programs are also fixed. The level and designation of the latter are regulated by agreements between the Union and the republics with reference to their socio-economic development indices.

Article 10. The Union Constitution

The present treaty is the basis of the Union constitution.

Article 11. Laws

Union laws and the constitutions and laws of the states comprising it must not contradict the provisions of this treaty.

Union laws on matters within its authority are paramount, and their execution is compulsory on the territory of the republics.

The laws of the republics are paramount on their territory on all matters, with the exception of those falling within the authority of the Union.

A republic is entitled to suspend the operation of a Union law on its territory and to protest against it if it breaches this treaty and contradicts the constitution or laws of the republic adopted within its powers.

The Union is entitled to protest against and to suspend the operation of a republic's law if it breaches this treaty and contradicts the constitution or laws of the Union adopted within its powers.

Disputes in both cases are settled through conciliation or passed on to the constitutional court of the Union.

III. Union Bodies

Article 12. Formation of Union Bodies

The Union's bodies of power and administration are formed based on the free expression of the will of the peoples and the representation of the states comprising the Union. They operate in strict accordance with the provisions of this treaty and the Union constitution.

Article 13. The USSR Supreme Soviet

The Union's legislative power is implemented by the USSR Supreme Soviet consisting of two chambers: the Soviet of the Republics and the Soviet of the Union.

The Soviet of the Republics consists of representatives of the republics delegated by their supreme bodies of power. The republics and national-territorial formation in the Soviet of the Republics retain the number of deputies' seats they possess in the Soviet of Nationalities of the USSR Supreme Soviet when the treaty is signed.

All the deputies of this chamber from a republic that is a direct member of the Union have one common vote when issues are being decided. The procedure for electing representatives and their quota are determined in a special agreement of the republics and in the electoral law of the USSR.

The Soviet of the Union is elected by the population of the whole country in constituencies with equal numbers of voters.

The chambers of the Union Supreme Soviet jointly make changes to the constitution of the USSR; accept new states into the USSR; determine the bases of the internal and foreign policy of the Union; confirm the Union budget and the report on its implementation; declare war and conclude peace; confirm changes in the Union's borders.

The Soviet of the Republics adopts laws on the organization of and procedure for the actions of Union bodies; examines questions of relations between republics; ratifies international treaties of the USSR; elects the Constitutional Court of the USSR; endorses the appointment of the Cabinet of Ministers of the USSR.

The Soviet of the Union examines questions of ensuring the rights and freedoms of citizens of the USSR and adopts laws on all questions except for those that are within the competence of the Soviet of the Republics.

The laws adopted by the Soviet of the Union come into force after being approved by the Soviet of the Republics. If a law adopted by the Soviet of the Union is not approved by the Soviet of the Republics, it will be given a second examination by the Soviet of the Union and will come into force on the condition that no less than two-thirds of the chamber's deputies vote for approving it.

Article 14. President of the USSR

The president of the Union is the head of a Union state invested with supreme executive and administrative power.

The president of the Union acts as a guarantor of the observance of the Union treaty, the constitution, and the laws of the Union; he is commander in chief of the armed forces of the Union; he represents the Union in relations with foreign countries; he monitors the implementation of the Union's international obligations.

The president is elected by the Union's citizens on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage by secret ballot for a period of five years and for no longer than two consecutive terms. The candidate who gains more than half the votes cast in the ballot in the Union as a whole and in the majority of the states comprising it is deemed elected.

Article 15. The Vice President of the USSR

The vice president of the USSR is elected together with the president of the USSR. The vice president of the Union performs certain functions of the president of the Union on his authorization and replaces the president when the latter is absent or cannot perform his duties.

Article 16. The USSR Cabinet of Ministers

The Union Cabinet of Ministers is the Union's collegiate body of executive power, subordinate to the Union president and responsible to the Supreme Soviet.

The Cabinet of Ministers is formed by the Union president in agreement with the Union Supreme Soviet.

The heads of government of the republics may participate in the work of the Union Cabinet of Ministers with the right to vote.

Article 17. The USSR Constitutional Court

The Union Constitutional Court examines questions of whether legislative acts of the Union and the republics, decrees of the Union president and the presidents of the republics, and normative acts of the Union Cabinet of Ministers are in accordance with the Union treaty and the Union constitution. It also resolves disputes between the Union and the republics and between republics.

Article 18. Union (Federal) Courts

The Union (federal) courts are the Supreme Court of the USSR, the Supreme Court of Arbitration of the Union, and courts in the Union's armed forces.

The Union Supreme Court and the Union Supreme Court of Arbitration exercise judicial authority within the bounds of the Union's powers. The chairmen of the supreme judicial and arbitration bodies of the republics are ex-officio members of the Union Supreme Court and the Union Supreme Court of Arbitration, respectively.

Article 19. The USSR Procuracy

Supervision of the execution of legislative acts within the Union is performed by the Union procurator-general, the procurators-general (procurators) of the republics, and the procurators subordinate to them.

The Union procurator-general is appointed by the Union Supreme Soviet and is accountable to it.

The procurators-general (procurators) of the republics are appointed by their supreme legislative bodies and are ex-officio members of the collegium of the Union Procuracy. While supervising the execution of Union laws they are accountable to both the supreme legislative bodies of their own states and the Union procurator-general.

IV. Concluding Provisions

Article 20. The Official Language of the USSR

The republics determine independently their own state language (languages). The parties to the treaty recognize Russian as the official language of the Union.

Article 21. The Capital City of the Union

The capital city of the USSR is Moscow.

Article 22. The State Symbols of the Union

The USSR has a state coat of arms, flag, and anthem.

Article 23. The Coming into Force of the Treaty

This treaty is approved by the supreme bodies of state power of the states comprising the Union and comes into force after it is signed by authorized delegations.

For the states that signed it, the 1922 treaty on the formation of the USSR is deemed null and void as of the same date.

From the moment the treaty comes into force a most-favored-nation system will take effect for its signatories.

Relations between the Union of Soviet Sovereign Republics and the republics that comprise the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics but that have not signed this treaty should be settled on the basis of the current legislation of the USSR, mutual obligations, and agreements.

Article 24. Responsibility Under the Treaty

The Union and the states comprising it have mutual responsibility for the execution of obligations undertaken by them and compensation for the damage caused by breaches of this treaty.

Article 25. Procedure for Introducing Amendments and Addenda to the Treaty

This treaty or its individual provisions can be canceled, altered, or supplemented only by agreement of all the states comprising the Union.

If need be, upon agreement between the states that have signed the treaty, appendices to it may be adopted.

Article 26. Succession of the Union's Supreme Bodies

To ensure continuity of state power and administration the supreme legislative, executive, and judicial bodies of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics retain their plenary powers until supreme state bodies of the Union of Soviet Sovereign Republics are formed in accordance with this treaty and the new USSR constitution.

1.2 Reactions to Draft Union Treaty Viewed

Albert Plutnik

Izvestiya, 29 June 1991 [FBIS Translation]

The occasion for these notes is the recently published draft "Treaty on the Union of Sovereign States." But what does that have to do with emotion, with our “seething nerves,” with political passions roused to such heights that the USSR president recently observed: “We are operating in exceptional conditions, perhaps the most difficult for many years, except for the period of the Great Patriotic War when the enemy was at the gates of the capital or of Stalingrad”?

The point is that this draft has been long awaited, and many people worked on it. And in different ways. Not only in Novo-Ogarevo, of course, but throughout the country. Opposing political forces used every available method, including hysterics (remember, for instance, the events in the Supreme Soviet when the people’s deputies “called M.S.

Gorbachev to account”), in the attempt resolutely to define their positions and even to dictate not only particular articles and clauses but even the general thrust of the draft. Because they understood very well that it is a question of the design, the blueprint, according to which a radical reorganization of our entire life is to take place, in all its breadth and multiplicity of economic, political, and social relations.

And now the document has been published. Can it be to everyone’s liking? Certainly not. We are too diverse today. We seek things that are too diverse; we see the truth in different lights. Although its supreme, ultimate meaning, you could say, lies precisely in the constructive resolution of many problems that trouble the public mind-solutions designed for the long term and intended to suit everyone. Although in terms of its basic thrust it is intended to provide the essential principle for all fierce political debates on the direction of our future development-in many ways we are offered an attractive outline for redesigning our Union for the sake of society’s resolute advance toward progress, toward civil peace, and toward a long overdue acclimatization to the general process of civilization. But the choice has been made, and that means that many alternatives have been discarded. By no means everyone will find his own ideas reflected in this single proposed version; not everyone will accept the rights and wrongs of a different view.

Nonetheless any unbiased observer must, I think, admit that people were not wasting their time at Novo-Ogarevo. The result of joint work by the republics’ representatives, the Federation Council, and the members of the preparatory committee formed by the Fourth Congress of USSR People's Deputies is a document that is democratic in content and realistic in character. True, much needs to be clarified and enlarged upon, and many questions will doubtless be prompted by specific provisions relating to the distribution of rights between the Center and the republics, but it is in this area, it seems to me, that there has been a decisive breakthrough. For the first time in the years of Soviet power the draft proclaims what I would call a multiparty economic system. Just as Article 6 of the USSR constitution was revoked some time ago, which meant that the party had renounced its monopoly of power, now the Center is sharing its economic power, largely renouncing its excessive claims. It looks as if at any moment now, on the way to the market, not only prices but the republics are going to be freed. It is not hard to surmise that for our still numerous champions of command-bureaucratic methods of management and staunch supporters of the empire, this whiff-perhaps a mere ghost-of freedom will appear to be the most vulnerable point in the draft.

It is noteworthy that recently, in certain circles, discussions of the draft treaty have usually been linked, so to speak, to the "Window of Opportunity" program drawn up by Soviet and American experts. Whipping up the hysteria, they find a close interconnection between these drafts-on the one hand "the so-called democrats, having grabbed power, are wrecking the Union," and on the other they are nurturing plans for selling off the state to foreign capital. Logical? A shining example of "factional" publicity work is provided by remarks by the well-known Colonel V. Alksnis in the newspaper Politika, published by the “Soyuz” deputies’ group. Commenting on the long extracts from the speeches at the 17 June Supreme Soviet session by the ministers of defense and internal affairs, and also by the KGB chairman (curiously, the session was closed but “selected” mass media, such as the TV program “600 Seconds” and the newspaper Politika were given access to the materials), he seeks to persuade the reader that “the leaders of these government structures, who possess all the information, have stated that unless emergency measures are adopted, our country will cease to exist! And today our people are being taken in by all kinds of Union treaties and similar never-ending stories.” So there you have it. In the same discussion, the colonel’s worthy interlocutor expresses his view of Yavlinskiy’s mission: “It is strange: A man whom nobody has authorized neither the Cabinet of Ministers nor the Supreme Soviet-suddenly goes off to the West and conducts talks of some kind.”

A little earlier, Supreme Soviet member V. Semenov expressed his opinion on the same topic: “I personally do not like the idea that the fate of my state and my people is decided in some office in the White House!” Other people in the Supreme Soviet, as you know, did not like the idea of the fate of the Union treaty being decided in Novo-Ogarevo. ... Just look at the kind of things that prompt dissatisfaction in our statesmen’s minds. What a warped mind you must have to get annoyed about things that you should be thanking people for. Even if Yavlinskiy had indeed been acting without authorization-which is far from being the case-

all the same, all joint Soviet-American proposals should be painstakingly examined. If, of course, you are thinking about the people, the country, rather than being consumed by departmental patriotism ... Ideas have to be paid for. At least with gratitude. Frankly, I thought gratitude was the only “convertible currency” we still had plenty of. But it seems that here too we have spent it all.

Incidentally, M.S. Gorbachev, speaking in the Supreme Soviet the other day, mentioned by name for the first time, as you know, certain representatives of the right wing who try in all circumstances to impose their own opinion on the country’s leadership. Formerly this honor was accorded only to left radical figures. But on this occasion, the president did not get offscot-free, for this “leveling” of the exchange rate. An article promptly appeared in the aforementioned press organ of the “Soyuz” group, openly debating the question of “removing Gorbachev from the political arena.” I will quote just one passage. “If the president, totally ignoring the existing constitution, keeps the Congress and Supreme Soviet away from power and, in collusion with the republican authorities, abolishes the state, it would be interesting to know who can decide which is more lawful: these actions on his part, or some kind of coup in defense of the constitution, the “country’s fundamental law.” Do you see what they are hinting at? “Some kind of coup,” however feeble ... Taking revenge on the president at a stroke for his Supreme Soviet speech, the “Nine-Plus-One” agreement, and his attentiveness to the “Window of Opportunity” program, the newspaper is basically calling openly for something that is scarcely compatible with the “country’s fundamental law.”

Departmental patriotism is similar to factional patriotism. It seems to me that the government demonstration, so to speak, that was organized in the Supreme Soviet was the consequence of jealous displeasure in the Cabinet of Ministers at the fact that G. Yavlinskiy seems to be taking a lot on and acting as if he was the Cabinet of Ministers. This is the result of the persistent habit of being monopolists and formulating on every question a decision that is the only right decision, because it is the only one.

A couple of words of warning to conclude. It is very important, in the process of taking opinions into account and improving the draft, to strip it exclusively of its shortcomings, not of its merits. And not to shake the heart out of it in the attempt to perfect it.

1.3 Pravda Views Provisions of Union Treaty

Viktor Shirokov

Last Thursday the draft treaty on the Union of Sovereign States was published in the press. Thus the process of the renewal of the Union has entered the next stage—the time has come for each of us to consider the wording of the articles of the treaty and its individual provisions. This is the most important matter because in the future this lofty treaty is to be the basis of the constitution of the sovereign federal democratic state, its “alpha” and “omega,” and we shall all have to live according to this constitution in the years and perhaps decades ahead.

The supreme soviets of certain republics, which have firmly resolved to recreate the Union on new principles, have already had time to discuss and approve this most important draft treaty, which determines the fate of the country. The nationwide discussion of the document and the amendments, comments, and additions submitted during its examination in republic parliaments and the USSR Supreme Soviet will probably be taken into account as well. However, it is already clear right now that the fundamental and extremely responsible stage in the new Union’s formation is drawing to a close.

Now let us turn to the text of the treaty. Its preamble sets out in verbal formulas the principles that have prevailed in the political struggle and the passions of the perestroika period and have won the minds of the peoples inhabiting our country. It is here that the sovereignty of the states entering the federal “alliance,” the right of nations to self-determination, and the desire and firm intention to create the conditions for the all-around development of each individual and to reliably guarantee individual rights and freedoms are strictly and precisely stipulated.

The republics that are party to the treaty invest the Union of Soviet Sovereign Republics (USSR) with power within the limits of the authority that they freely delegate to it. Henceforth, the Center will exercise its functions of coordination and authority with their knowledge and consent. That is the first of the “fundamental principles” that combine naturally with the next one, which addresses the autonomy of parties to the treaty on all questions of their development and their commitment to guarantee equal political rights and opportunities for socio-economic and cultural development to all the peoples living on their territory.

I would stress this fact as it is the “counterpoint” essential for consolidation of the peoples in a single federation. We all see and feel the acute alarm of those who, as fate dictates, find themselves living outside the borders of their national territorial entities.

The three basic principles on which the Union is to be built are: (1) free choice of forms of ownership and methods of economic management; (2) development of an all-Union market, that is, a single economic space without which we will wither and die in our national “compartments”; and (3) the realization of principles of social justice and protection.

The section “The Structure of the Union” prescribes the most important features of the organization of the federal state. There is no rigid structure: Entry into the Union can be either direct or as part of another state. It will be open to any democratic state that recognizes it. Parties to the treaty intend to form mutual relations on the basis of equality, respect for sovereignty, non-interference in internal affairs, and the resolution of disputes by peaceful and constitutional means.

The draft treaty strictly defines the jurisdiction of the USSR and the republics and clarifies areas of joint jurisdiction. Powers delegated to the Union relate to protecting the state's territorial integrity, defense and security, implementing foreign policy, coordinating foreign economic activity, approving and implementing the budget, directing space programs, Union-wide communications and information systems, man agement of nuclear power generation, and sectors where coordinated action is essential to success, such as law enforcement.

The joint jurisdiction of the Union and the republics is being considerably expanded. Essentially, all parties to the treaty will be equals in the solution of questions of strategic importance to the state.

A particularly significant provision says that, on the one hand, the laws of a signatory republic are paramount on its territory while, on the other hand, Union laws on questions under Union jurisdiction shall be binding on the territory of the republics. In a strong and united state there cannot be unlimited sovereignty, and the precise separation of the functions of power must guarantee both the rights and responsibilities of all parties. Disputes in this area will be resolved by the Union constitutional court.

1.4 Coup Leader Gennadiy Yanaev Answers Questions at News Conference

Moscow Central Television, 19 August 1991 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Statement and news conference given by Gennadiy Ivanovich Yanaev, acting president of the USSR, with the participation of Oleg Baklanov, first deputy chairman of the USSR Defense Council under the USSR president; Interior Minister Boris Pugo; Vasiliy Starodubtsev, chairman of the USSR Farmers' Union; Tizyakov, president of the Association of State Enterprises and Industrial, Construction, Transport, and Communications Facilities of the USSR; at the Foreign Ministry Press Center in Moscow on 19 August; video shows participants in news conference asking and responding to questions-recorded] [Yanaev]: Ladies and gentlemen, friends and comrades: As you already know from media reports, because Mikhail Sergeevich Gorbachev is unable, owing to the state of his health, to discharge the duties of president of the USSR, on the basis of Article 127.7 of the USSR Constitution, the USSR vice president has temporarily taken over the performance of the duties of the president.

I address you today at a moment that is crucial for the destinies of the Soviet Union and the international situation throughout the world. Having embarked on the path of profound reforms and having gone a considerable way in this direction, the Soviet Union has now reached a point at which it finds itself faced with a deep crisis, the further development of which could both place in question the course of reforms themselves as well as lead to serious cataclysms in international relations.

It is of course no secret to you that a sharp fall in the output of the country, which has so far not been replaced by the alternative industrial and agricultural structures, is creating a real threat to the further existence and development of the peoples of the Soviet Union.

A state of ungovernability and multiple authority has arisen in the country. All of this cannot fail to arouse extensive dissatisfaction among the people. A real threat of the country's disintegrating has also arisen with a collapse of the single economic space, of the single space for civil rights, a single defense and single foreign policy.

Under such conditions, normal life is impossible.

In many regions of the USSR, as a result of interethnic clashes, blood is being spilled and the collapse of the USSR would have the most serious consequences, not only internally but also internationally.

Under such conditions, we have no alternative but to take decisive steps to stop the country from sliding into disaster.

As you know, to govern the country and for the efficient implementation of the state of emergency a decision has been adopted to form a State Committee for the State of Emergency in the USSR made up of the following: Comrade Baklanov, first deputy chairman of the USSR Defense Council; Comrade Kriuchkov, chairman of the USSR KGB; Comrade Pavlov, prime minister of the USSR; Comrade Pugo, minister of internal affairs of the USSR; Comrade Starodubtsev, chairman of the Farmers' Union of the USSR; Comrade Yazov, minister of defense of the USSR; and Comrade Gennadiy Yanaev, acting president of the USSR.

I would like to state today that the State Committee for the State of Emergency in the USSR is fully aware of the depth of the crisis that has hit our country. It takes on itself responsibility for the fate of the motherland and is fully resolved to adopt the most serious measures to get the state and society out of the crisis as quickly as possible.

We promise to hold extensive nationwide discussion on the draft of a new Union treaty. Every citizen of the USSR will have the right and the chance to take part in this most important act in a calm atmosphere, and to make up his mind on it, for the fate of the numerous peoples of our great motherland will depend on what the Union becomes.

We intend immediately to restore legality and law and order, to put an end to the bloodshed, to declare merciless war on the criminal world, and to eradicate the shameful occurrences that discredit our society and humiliate Soviet citizens. We will cleanse the streets of our cities of criminal elements and put an end to the arbitrary rule of the plunderers of national property.

We advocate truly genuine, democratic processes and consistent policy of reforms leading to the renewal of our homeland and to its economic and social prosperity, enabling it to take a worthy place in the world community of nations.

The development of the country must not be built on a drop in the living standards of the population. In a healthy society a constant increase in the well-being of all citizens will become the norm. Without relaxing our concern for strengthening the protection of the rights of the individual, we shall concentrate attention on protecting the interests of the broadest sections of the population, those who are most threatened by inflation, the disorganization of production, corruption, and crime.

In developing the mixed nature of the national economy, we will also support private enterprise, offering it the necessary opportunities for developing production and services.

Our priority task will be a solution to the food and housing problems. All existing forces will be mobilized toward satisfying these most vital demands of the people. We call upon the workers, peasants, the labor intelligentsia, and all Soviet people to restore labor discipline and order as quickly as possible and raise the level of production to subsequently move forward in a resolute manner. Our life and the future of our children and grandchildren and the destiny of the motherland depend on this.

We are a peace-loving country, and we shall unfailingly honor all the commitments we have made. We have no claims upon anyone. We want to live in peace and friendship with everyone, but we state firmly that no one will ever be permitted to encroach upon our sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity. All attempts to speak with our country in the language of diktat, from whatever the source, will be resolutely cut short.

Our multinational people have for centuries lived filled with pride for their homeland. We have not been ashamed of our patriotic feelings, and we consider it natural and regular to bring up the present and future generations of our citizens in this spirit. To stand idly by at this hour, which is critical for the destiny of our motherland, means to take upon oneself the gravest responsibility for the tragic and truly unpredictable consequences.

Everyone who holds our motherland dear, who wants to live and labor in a situation of calm and confidence, who does not accept the continuation of bloody interethnic conflicts, who sees his motherland independent and prosperous in the future, must make the sole correct choice. We call upon all true patriots, people of good will, to put an end to the present Time of Troubles [allusion to the historical period of civil strife in 1605-13]. We call upon all citizens of the Soviet Union to recognize their duty toward the motherland and to render assistance in every possible way to the State Committee for the State of Emergency in the USSR in its efforts to bring the country out of crisis. Constructive suggestions from socio-political organizations, labor collectives, and citizens will be gratefully accepted as a manifestation of patriotic readiness to take an active part in restoring the centuries-old friendship in a single family of fraternal peoples and in the revival of the motherland. Thank you for your attention.

Specifically, and concretely, what disease does he have? And against whom are the tanks that we see on the streets of Moscow directed?...

[Yanaev]: I have to say that Mikhail Sergeevich Gorbachev is presently on vacation and undergoing treatment in the Crimea. He has, indeed, grown very tired over these past years, and he will need some time to put his health in order. I would like to say that we hope that when he has recovered, Mikhail Sergeevich will return to carry out his duties. At any rate, we will continue to follow the course Mikhail Sergeevich Gorbachev began in 1985 ....

[Journalist, Pravda]: I have two questions. Perestroika has not brought about tangible results, among other reasons, because there was an absence of a clear-cut tactic and strategy for implementing it. Do you now have a concrete program for regenerating the country's economy? And, secondly: The Russian Information Agency today transmitted an appeal from Yeltsin, Silaev, and Khasbulatov to the citizens of Russia describing the events of the past night as a right-wing, reactionary, anti-constitutional coup. What is your attitude to this statement? That same appeal called for a general indefinite strike. In this connection, will any specific actions be undertaken on this matter by the committee?

[Tizyakov]: Indeed, the perestroika announced in 1985, as you know-this is not a secret to anyone-has not produced the expected results that all of us were waiting for. Our economy today is in a most grave situation. Production is slumping. This has been brought about by a whole series of factors. Among these, of course, is the fact that such a restructuring was being carried out by us for the first time on such a scale. And, of course, there is also the fact that we were seeking ways, and are seeking ways, and in any endeavor it is always possible there might be certain things not properly worked out; errors, let's say.

What lies in store for us? The situation that has evolved served in the main, of course, for the introduction of a state of emergency. You know that links are badly broken in the countryside today-horizontal ones between enterprises. If one considers the preparations for 1991, no doubt many of the people sitting here know that at the end of the year, at the beginning of December, an all-Union assembly of directors was held. There the formation of links between enterprises in all regions was indeed looked at. We managed to get this problem moving in a very meaningful way and at the beginning of January we had already concluded agreements covering 85 percent of movements of output in the technological cycle. This apparently created certain conditions, but later on, in a whole series of so-called sovereignty-related measures that were carried out, this gave rise to the closure of borders recently in republics like Ukraine, Belarus, the Baltic republics, and other republics. This created an extremely difficult situation for the work of enterprises. Production facilities stopped working, and there was uncertainty among the labor collectives.

What will our actions be like? First and foremost, they will be aimed at stabilizing the economy, and naturally we are not giving up and we are not canceling our reforms aimed at moving toward the market. We consider this correct. The only thing is that we are going to have to work it through more precisely and organize things on a higher level in management and in all our actions.

[Yanaev]: I will answer the second question. Today, when the Soviet people were informed about the formation of the Committee for the State of Emergency, I, like several other members of the committee, had contact with the leaders of all nine republics that stated their willingness to enter the renewed Union federation.

We have been in contact with the leadership of many krais and oblasts of the Soviet Union, and I can say that, on the whole, there is support for the formation of the committee and the committee's attempt to extricate the country from the state of crisis it is in.

I had a conversation with Boris Nikolaevich Yeltsin today. I know about the statement by Boris Nikolaevich, Comrade Khasbulatov, and Comrade Silaev. I would like to stress today that the State Committee for the State of Emergency is prepared to cooperate with the leadership of the republics, krais and oblasts, being guided in this by our aspiration to find such adequate forms of developing our democracy and raising the economy....

I think that the appeal to join a general indefinite strike is an irresponsible appeal. Evidently, we cannot afford the luxury of playing some political games when the country is in a state of chaos. Because, ultimately, the majority of these political games turn against our long-suffering people. If we are not indifferent to the fate of our fatherland, if we are not indifferent to Russia's fate, we should find really practical forms of cooperation.

[Journalist, Central Television]: ... In its message to the people, the Committee for the State of Emergency stated that it will concern itself first and foremost with the interests of the broadest strata of the population and will strive to solve the food and housing problems. Would you say what steps, specific steps, you envisage taking for this, and what resources, what reserves the State Committee has at its disposal?

[Yanaev]: You know, this question is indeed a very interesting, a very important question. The first step that we intend to take is to do the maximum possible to save the harvest. It looks as if we will be adopting the relevant document tomorrow, which will orient us toward adopting emergency measures to save the harvest. Further, we intend to make use of every opportunity, first of all, to carry out a kind of stocktaking of everything there is in the country. As you recall, we said in the statement that once we have done this stocktaking, it will be necessary to tell the people what we have, including material resources that we can mobilize to make progress on the housing problem ....

[Journalist, Argumenty i Fakty]: Tell us, please, apart from his post as president, Mikhail Sergeevich Gorbachev is also general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee. Who is to carry out the duties of general secretary? And my second question: It has become known that a number of papers, including Argumenty i Fakty, Moskovskie Novosti, Kuranty, Stolitsa, and a few others have been closed. For how long have these papers been closed and when will they reopen? Thank you.

[Yanaev]: I think that if we are introducing a state of emergency regime we shall have to reregister some of our mass publications. Reregister. We are not talking about the closure of papers. We are talking about reregistering, because the chaos the country finds itself in is to a large extent the fault of some of the mass media.

As for the post of general secretary, I wouldn't like to comment on it. We have a deputy general secretary. He is capable and hard-working. I think that a party Central Committee plenum or a congress will be able to solve this question. I am now carrying out the duties of the president, and therefore I would not like to use my authority, or lack of it, in order to influence the decision of party bodies.

[Journalist, Novosti]: My question is to Comrade

Starodubtsev. You have ties with the peasant masses-do you think the peasant masses will support the Committee for the State of Emergency? Thank you.

[Starodubtsev]: In perestroika the heaviest losses have been borne by the peasantry, naturally. This year in particular has dealt the most crushing blow to the peasantry, and the majority of state farms, collective farms, and newly born farm economies are on the verge of catastrophe today. The price parity between the town and the village has been upset. Lack of fuel and spare parts and a sharp decline in deliveries of equipment and other materials to agriculture lead, frankly, to a grave state for the peasantry. I think that, driven to despair, the peasantry hopes today that order will be introduced at last and that the eyes of everyone in our society will be turned to the peasantry and will help it to stand up and see a revival.

[Journalist, Nezavisimaya Gazeta]: Could you please say whether or not you understand that last night you carried out a coup d'état? What comparison seems more apt to you, the comparison with 1917 or with 1964? This is the first question. The second concerns newspapers. First, how long will it take to reregister newspapers and what criterion will decide whether or not a particular publication should be reregistered? Who will deal with this? Will political censorship be introduced in the reregistered publications? Thank you.

[Yanaev]: With regard to the reregistration of newspapers, we will try not to drag out this process. I would not like to comment now on the criteria that will be used as the basis for this registration.

As for your allegation that a coup d'état was staged last night, I would beg to disagree with you, inasmuch as we are basing ourselves on constitutional norms. And I assume that confirmation by the USSR Supreme Soviet of the decision we have made will enable us to state that absolutely all the juridical and so-called constitutional norms have been observed. It does not seem to me correct to draw a comparison with either 1917 or 1964. I believe any analogy would be dangerous.

[Unidentified Journalist]: A question for Comrade Baklanov: Please state what measures you plan to take in order to solve, specifically, the housing and food program for servicemen, who have been literally in a disastrous position in some regions since the withdrawal of our troops.

[Baklanov]: I have to say that the meaning of our measures consists in concentrating these existing resources so as now to force through the building of housing for servicemen and their families. You probably know this figure, it is something like 200,000 families in need. This is a manifestly abnormal state of affairs. We have to use our resources and we have to use the resources that, in accordance with the accords, we are to receive from foreign states. That is what the measures mean.

[Yanaev]: I would like to reply to your question regarding President Yeltsin's decree on banning the Communist Party activity. I believe that all decrees and all resolutions to be adopted will be examined from the point of view of the state of emergency we are introducing in the country. But, taking advantage of this opportunity, I would like to stress: What the leadership of the Russian Federation is currently engaged in-building barricades, appealing for disobedience-I think that this is a very dangerous policy, and this policy could lead to the organization of some kind of armed provocation, so as afterward, to lay the blame for the tension, for some kind of excess that might occur, on the leadership of the State Committee for the State of Emergency. We would like to give a very serious warning of this to all Soviet people, especially to the people of Moscow, where a state of emergency has been introduced. We hope that calm and order will be ensured.

[Journalist, Novosti]: My question is to Boris Karlovich Pugo. How do you technically see the organization of this regime? ... Hundreds, maybe thousands of people, will start for the airports today and for places far away from the capital. How is this regime going to deal with this?

[Pugo]: The introduction of military hardware, even including troops, in Moscow, well, it is already completely evident that this is a wholly forced measure. It has been taken only to prevent any disturbance of order in Moscow, to prevent any casualties. As for how things will be controlled, I at least see the development of events in the following way: Provided nobody forces us to extend the arrangement, or to make it long term, we would favor withdrawing all military units and hardware from Moscow as soon as possible.

[Pugo]: But that is something that comes within the jurisdiction of the Moscow commander. If it should suddenly come about that this is necessary, well, that is within his jurisdiction. But we did not count on this. We did not consider it necessary to do that today.

[Journalist, Associated Press]: Can you please tell us if your committee is prepared to order the use of force against civilians? And under what circumstances would force be used against civilians?

[Yanaev]: First, I would like to do everything to ensure that the use of force against civilians is not needed. We must do everything to prevent any excesses. And what we are envisaging now, some extraordinary measures, they are not at all linked with any attack on human rights. On the contrary, we want to protect human rights as much as possible. And I would like to hope very much that we will not be compelled, we will not be provoked into using some kind of force against the civilian population.

1.5 Decision of the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian RSR

Editor's Note: On 16 July 1990, soon after Russia did so, Ukraine issued its own, even more far-reaching Declaration of State Sovereignty. The essence of this sovereignty was “democracy” and economic autonomy for the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic. In proclaiming its independence on 24 August 1991, the Ukrainian parliament denounced the Union treaty of 1922 that had created the USSR and appointed a Ukrainian government, including a Ministry of Defense and a procurator-general. Ukraine was still, however, at this time considered part of the Union, though it was not clear in what status.

Concerning the Declaration of Independence of Ukraine

24 August 1991 [Translated by Natalie Gawdiak]

The Supreme Council of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic resolves:

To declare on 24 August 1991 that Ukraine is an independent, democratic country.

From the moment of the declaration of independence, on the territory of Ukraine only her constitution, laws, and government resolutions and other legislative acts of the republic are valid.

On 1 December 1991 a republic-wide referendum will be carried out to affirm the act of the declaration of independence.

Signed:

Head of the Supreme Rada of the Ukrainian RSR

L. Kravchuk

Declaration of Independence of Ukraine

Supreme Council of Ukraine 24 August 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Stemming from the mortal danger that hung over Ukraine in connection with the government coup in the USSR on 19 August 1991,

-continuing the thousand-year-old tradition of statebuilding in Ukraine;

-implementing the Declaration on State Sovereignty of Ukraine, the Supreme Council of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic solemnly:

DECLARES THE INDEPENDENCE OF

and the creation of the independent Ukrainian state-Ukraine.

The territory of Ukraine is indivisible and inviolate. From this day forth on the territory of Ukraine, only the constitution and laws of Ukraine will be valid.

This act becomes valid from the moment of its approval.

1.6 Referendum on Independence

Interfax, 24 August 1991 [FBIS Translation]

The Ukrainian Supreme Soviet passed a resolution and the text of an act proclaiming the Ukraine an independent and sovereign state within the present-day territory. The Union laws have no effect on the republican territory. According to the ruling, the act takes effect the moment it is approved by the national referendum during the presidential election in the Ukraine on 1 December.

The resolution was passed by 346 votes. The Ukrainian parliament contains 450 deputies, but fewer than 400 were present at the session.

1.7 Yelena Bonner Urges Republics to Observe Human Rights

Komsomolskaya Pravda, 3 September 1991 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Interview with Yelena Bonner by G. Vasilyeva: “The Time for Sakharov’s Constitution Is Past-As Usual, We Are Late....”]

[G. Vasilyeva]: Yelena Grigorievna, perhaps we are celebrating victory in vain. The putschists have achieved what they wanted. The Union treaty is unsigned.

[Yelena Bonner]: The putsch gave the nudge that resulted in the collapse of the Soviet Union. And this raises an extraordinarily important point, perhaps the most important point that I have to make to the readers of Komsomolskaya Pravda. It concerns all the former Union republics, all the autonomous areas, and all the parties. These young sovereign states must come into being without any infringement of human rights. In principle, there are two democratic rights to uphold: the rights of the individual (as set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights) and the rights of the people to self-determination.

On 3 September, I am scheduled to appear before the Danish parliament, which is holding hearings on the subject: “The Helsinki Act: Human Rights-Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow.” They have invited not just private groups but state delegations from all thirty-five countries represented at the Helsinki Conference (August 1975). This is the main point of my speech: Our August victory is yet to be won. For the republics must have an unconditional right to full independence. But the sole criterion for [giving] economic aid to the republics must be their observance of human rights. Right now there are many alarming reports coming from the republics, signaling attempts to interfere with the rights of certain ethnic groups. I want to remind people of the fact that the Sakharov Committee has considerable influence on public opinion in the West, and this influence will be used to counter these attempts. I say this to the Belorussians, I say this to the Baltic peoples, I say this to the Moldovans, Georgians, Azerbaijanis, Turks, and Uzbeks. I say this to all the republics and their political leaders. Any attempt to carry out repressive policies in dealing with the ethnic minorities will result in these republics being left to stagnate without assistance from the civilized nations and, I hope, without any help from democratic Russia. It behooves a democratic Russia to bear in mind that Russia has already been turned into a prison of peoples—we must not revert to that condition. Right now a new Cabinet of Ministers is being formed, but this is an artificial contrivance of the Center with dangerous implications ....

[G. Vasilyeva]: But, Yelena Grigorievna, even Sakharov thought it possible and normal for a union of equal and sovereign states to be placed under the leadership of a parliament in which more than half the seats would be reserved for representatives of Russia.

[Yelena Bonner]: The time for Sakharov's constitution is past. As usual, we are late in trying to jump onto the last car of the train. Today we must consider how to go our separate ways with the fewest losses. It amazes me that the deputies attending the Extraordinary Session of the Supreme Soviet talked for three days about the past when they should have been talking about other things entirely.

[G. Vasilyeva]: Nevertheless, our national territory constitutes a single economic region. In my view it is apparent that if the Union falls apart, everyone will become weaker-and no one will win.

[Yelena Bonner]: The fact that Ukraine has declared its independence does not mean that it has gone off to Australia with all its land and natural wealth. And no one in the West will be buying Estonian sportswear, although I myself am looking for some to buy for my grandchildren. We are all bound together economically, and no sort of national independence will be able to sever these ties.

[G. Vasilyeva]: Within the territory of the RSFSR [Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic] there are about thirty autonomous areas-to say nothing of other minority groups. How many pieces can we break up into or is there a limit beyond which a people cannot claim a right to separate statehood?

[Yelena Bonner]: There is no limit, and this very lack of limitation in Europe has led to the existence of Monaco, San Marino, and Luxembourg. As Europe seeks to become increasingly integrated, we are currently coming apart. But the peoples of Europe have known freedom for a good deal more than a decade. A slave who gulps a breath of freedom cannot immediately aspire to integration. He must first cast off his chains.

[G. Vasilyeva]: Right now there are endless explanations being given about who was where during these tragic days with many sidelong glances and reproaches, often undeserved. How do you feel about this?

[Yelena Bonner]: It is not for people to judge where there is no need to judge. I have neighbors on all ten floors who have known me since 1954. Yet when a campaign was launched against me, only two of these families would speak to me when we met on the stairs. Today I get on with everyone. Yet if the putsch had been successful, I think they would again be looking the other way. It is not for me to judge them. They have been raised in this fashion by our society. When the Supreme Soviet was in session, one person stood up who did not speak Russian very well. He said that he was a Communist, but that he could not comprehend what was happening, and he almost cried. And I almost cried with him. I am always on the side of those who stand up for things.

1.8 Draft Law on the Transition

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 5 September 1991 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

“Text” of draft USSR law “On the Organs of State Power and Management of the USSR in the Transitional Period,” contained in reportage from the Kremlin by Rossiyskaya Gazeta parliamentary correspondents Vyacheslav Dolganov and Robert Minasow]

The draft was prepared by the Congress Commission and the signatories to the statement by the USSR president and the leaders of the Union republics “On the Organs of State Power and Management of the USSR During the Transitional Period.”

Article 1. The supreme representative organ of Union power during the transitional period is the Supreme Soviet, which consists of two chambers: the Soviet of the Republics and the Soviet of the Union.

The Soviet of the Republics consists of twenty USSR people’s deputies and twenty people’s deputies from each Union republic delegated by these republics’ supreme organs of power. In view of the federative system of the RSFSR [Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic], it has fortyfive deputies in the Soviet of the Republics. In order to ensure the equal rights of the republics when voting in the Soviet of the Republics, each Union republic has one vote.

The Soviet of the Union is formed by the supreme organs of power of the Union republics from USSR people’s deputies in accordance with currently existing quotas.

Article 2. The USSR Supreme Soviet of the Republics and Soviet of the Union by joint decision make changes to the USSR constitution, admit new states to the Union, approve the Union budget and the report on its implementation, and declare war and conclude peace.

The Soviet of the Republics adopts decisions on the organization of and procedure for the activity of Union organs and ratifies the international treaties of the USSR.

The Soviet of the Union examines questions of safeguarding the rights and freedoms of USSR citizens and adopts decisions on all questions within the competence of the Supreme Soviet except those relating to the competence of the Soviet of the Republics. Laws adopted by the Soviet of the Union enter into force after they are approved by the Soviet of the Republics.

Article 3. A State Council is formed to provide coordinated solutions to domestic and foreign policy issues affecting the common interests of the republics. The State Council consists of the USSR president and the highest officials of the Union republics named in the USSR constitution. The USSR president directs the work of the State Council. The State Council defines the procedure for its activity. Decisions of the State Council are binding.

Article 4. The post of vice president of the USSR is abolished.

If the USSR president for various reasons cannot continue to perform his duties (including on health grounds, as confirmed by the findings of the State Medical Commission set up by the USSR Supreme Soviet), the State Council elects a State Council chairman from among its members as acting USSR president. This decision is to be approved by the USSR Supreme Soviet within three days.

Article 5. In order to coordinate the management of the national economy and ensure the coordinated implementation of economic reforms and social policy, the Union republics form the Interrepublic Economic Committee on an equal footing. The committee's chairman is appointed by the USSR president with the agreement of the State Council. The USSR president and the USSR State Council directly exercise leadership of Union-wide organs in charge of questions of defense, security, law and order, and international affairs.

In their activity, the Interrepublican Economic Committee and the leaders of the Union-wide organs are accountable to the USSR president, the USSR State Council, and the USSR Supreme Soviet.

Article 6. All deputies are to keep their status as USSR people's deputies during their term in office, including their right to take part in the work of USSR Supreme Soviet organs.

It is deemed inadvisable to hold sessions of the Congress of USSR People's Deputies during the transitional period.

Article 7. The USSR president is to convene the new USSR Supreme Soviet no later than two weeks after it is formed.

Article 8. The provisions of the USSR constitution are valid insofar as they do not contravene the present law.

Article 9. This law enters into force from the moment it is published.

1.9 Yavlinskiy Plan for Economic Union Detailed

I. Demchenko

Izvestiya, 11 September 1991 [FBIS Translation]

The preamble to the draft treaty on an economic union submitted by G. Yavlinskiy to the State Council says:

“Independent states and current and former components of the USSR, irrespective of their present status, affirming their right to autonomously decide all questions of socio-economic development ..., wishing to establish normal relations between peoples and protect citizens’ economic interests, taking account of the USSR’s complex of relations between states that are part of it, believing that solving political, defense, property, and humanitarian questions in relations between states requires time ... conclude this treaty on an economic union.”

The document's text, according to those who drafted it, deliberately did not broach defense and political matters. They believe that this is a problem for further treaties and, perhaps, a question of a more remote time. But this document concentrates only on the economy, which now remains perhaps the only platform on which talks between former republics can be realistically and gainfully held. Incidentally, it is typical that the word “republic” is absent from the document. All participants in the economic union are recognized as sovereign states that are guaranteed full independence.

A Unified Legal System Operates in the Economic Union Territory

Voluntary participation and equal rights are proclaimed the basic principles of participation in the Union. The draft treaty envisages the regulation of exclusively economic mutual relations between partners, which can be states that are or are not part of the political union of sovereign states. The possibility of associate membership of the economic union is envisaged for states that are part of the USSR and are prepared to take on only some of the commitments specified by the document. Mutual relations with republics that have not joined the economic union are organized in the same way as with foreign states. All these “degrees of economic relationship” between former members of the USSR are very precisely regulated depending on the amount of commitments assumed.

The document says that the economic union's member states agree to pursue a coordinated policy in the spheres of enterprise, movement of goods and services, financial and credit policy, finances and taxes, prices, the labor market and social guarantees, customs regulations and tariffs, foreign economic activities and currency policy, various state programs, standardization, metrology, patents, statistics and accounting, and questions regarding the legal regulation of economic activity. The commitments accepted by Union members make them economically responsible both for fulfilling the treaty and for taking steps that jeopardize it. Throughout the economic union's territory, a unified legal system for economic activity is established for physical and legal persons irrespective of their residence permit, citizenship, place of registration, and so forth. This will obviously stop and prevent the continuation of the war of laws, resolutions, banks, and so forth, the destructive consequences of which have taken such a ruinous toll on our economy. The document's draft says that the economic union's organs are an interstate economic committee, a banking union, and an economic union arbitration service. Key economic policy problems are discussed at a conference of leaders of states' governments, who have the right to veto decisions of the interstate economic committee and its chairman.

The Economy's Foundation Is Private Ownership and Free Enterprise

Free enterprise is proclaimed the foundation for the growth and development of the economy and is guaranteed in the whole space within the economic union's framework. Priority is given to private ownership. A state's interference in enterprises' economic activities is limited by legislation and will evidently be reduced to minimal economic regulation. Goods and services will be transferred within the unified economic space freely and duty-free, and the restrictions operating in this connection will be lifted. The principle of free movement is also declared for the work force. In any event, participants in the economic union must endeavor to create the conditions for this, which includes the formation of a housing market and evidently-although the document does not say so-the abolition of the institution of the residence permit. Deliveries of the most important types of goods and services at agreed prices in the transitional period will be carried out on the basis of bilateral and multilateral interstate agreements. Generally the document's section on pricing policy is one of the most laconic, and its basic concept is that the economic union's member states conduct a coordinated policy of transition to free price formation.

A Single Currency and a Coordinated Financial and Credit Policy

It is suggested that states that have signed the document recognize the advantages of retaining the ruble as the common currency of a united monetary system on the economic union's territory and make efforts to strengthen it in 1991- 92. The achievement of internal convertibility of the ruble is specified as one of the most immediate tasks. The introduction of national currencies is allowed here, but on the condition that they do not undermine the strength of the ruble. At least two points stem from this. First, evidently the population on the economic union's territory-if it has been concluded with these rules-will have to live on several types of money that are mutually convertible, which is obviously not very convenient. This is especially inconvenient for enterprise, which must be carried out freely in the whole space of the Union. Second, consequently national currencies will right from the start be put at a severe disadvantage compared with the ruble-because, as has already been said above, nothing must restrict the freedom of enterprise.

It is proposed to establish a banking union of central banks of states that have signed the treaty to elaborate and conduct an effective monetary and credit policy on the principles of a reserve system. This will do away with the monopoly of the USSR Gosbank [State Bank] in making key decisions in the area of credit and financial policy and will finally make the banking system really independent of executive authority. The draft treaty specifically makes the banking union responsible for regulating the ruble rate in relation to other currencies, disposing of the gold reserve and foreign currency reserve (should such a thing appear), regulating the general rules regarding commercial banks' activities, fixing the limits of central banks' participation in loans to budget systems, and organizing cash circulation.

This measure, combined with the coordinated budget and tax policy of economic union participants, will evidently enable sovereign states' budget deficits to be limited for some foreseeable time, if only to some extent. Now, as is known, the deficit levels are enormous. For example, around one-third of the whole budget belongs to Russia and almost one-half belongs to Georgia—it is as if republics are competing with one another to see who can succeed in squandering the most. The draft says that in the event that the prescribed limits on the growth of the internal debt are exceeded, the sum is officially registered as debt liabilities to the rest of the economic union's members. The USSR's internal state debt is reregistered and is basically divided among the economic union's members.

Commitments made on behalf of the USSR to investors in the USSR Savings Bank and to owners of valuable securities will be honored. Furthermore, the economic union declares itself the assignee of all the USSR's foreign economic liabilities and guarantees that they will be met. It is considered necessary to conclude a special agreement that will specify the share of each component of the former USSR in the total sum of the external debt and in the total debt of other countries to our state.

The document envisages the creation of an economic union budget to finance general expenses. It is proposed that contributions to it are determined in the form of a fixed proportion of produced national income or according to another objective indicator. The document does not allow a situation whereby the Union members refuse to pay their share of it-as republics are now doing in relation to the USSR Union budget. In addition, off-budget funds are set aside for financing targeted programs, one of which is designated as special: the fund for the accelerated development of certain regions.

Very Rapid Inclusion into the World Economy

Foreign economic activity by Union members will be geared toward achieving the very rapid inclusion of states and entities engaged in economic activity into world economic ties. The consent of all participants in the economic union is required to obtain new foreign loans. Here states participating in the Union have the right to obtain foreign loans and credits autonomously, if they take responsibility for servicing and clearing them.

A large section of the document is taken up by a list of agreements that, aside from the treaty, should regulate economic relations among Union members. The agreements will determine, specifically, the status and powers of the Union's organs, rights of ownership on its territory, the procedure and conditions for the introduction of national currencies, anti-monopoly policy, mutual commitments in the provision of pensions, the procedure for resolving property and other disputes, etc. It is proposed that the economic union be initially concluded for five years.

It is obvious that the text of this treaty-and the authors of the “Five Hundred Day” plan are still talking about the need to conclude it very soon-can serve as a basis for consolidating all republics, society’s progressive forces, and leaders who have not lost the ability to interpret events constructively. Its great advantage is its lack of political coloring, which makes it a good basis for talks among authorized representatives of states, irrespective of ideological convictions, nationality, creed, and so on. It is evidently the best chance of agreement; first, because the more time that goes by, the bigger everyone’s mutual claims and commitments become, which makes it harder to reach any kind of understanding in principle; and second, because the rapid destruction of the old state structures threatens to bury under the debris not only a unified state but also some of its components-and this is what is now happening in a number of “hot” regions.

As everyone knows, the draft document has been sent out for review by a wide circle of specialists and political figures, including leaders and members of the parliaments and governments of all the republics, leaders of political parties and economic associations and unions, entrepreneurs and economic leaders, ambassadors of leading states, and foreign experts. Evidently discussion of it will very soon be started by the State Council members who were the first to receive the document.

1.10 State Council Views Economic Union

TASS, 16 September 1991 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

The State Council met in the Kremlin at exactly 10:00 A.M. today under the chairmanship of the USSR president. The leaders of Russia, the Ukraine, Kazakhstan, Belarus, Azerbaijan, Armenia, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan participated....

G.A. Yavlinskiy, deputy chairman of the USSR Committee for the Management of the Economy, delivered a report entitled "On the Draft Treaty for the Economic Union." He said that the document's starting point is recognition of the independence of all the members of this Union and realization of the extremely grave economic state. The basic points of this concept are entrepreneurship and private ownership and free movement of goods and services throughout the territory of the proposed economic union. As for monetary policy and the banking system, it is proposed to preserve the common currency, while introducing national currencies. A coordinated budget policy and a settlement of all questions of the republics' domestic and foreign debts is also required. Today, an increase in the domestic debt of each of the republics is an increase in the overall debt of the whole union, Yavlinskiy said.

One other vital condition of the functioning of a unified economic union is the speediest possible movement toward freeing prices. A pooling of efforts in working out a unified mechanism for ensuring social guarantees is also seen as inevitable. Here, Grigoriy Yavlinskiy believes, one needs to begin with the question of pensions because, he stressed, "in our country, this is one economic area that requires more attention than others."

In contrast to the food situation issue, which was discussed in an atmosphere of trust and agreement, discussion of the draft economic union treaty clearly did not go smoothly. Here are some views expressed to TASS by leaders of a number of republics immediately afterward.

The Kyrgyz president, Askar Akaev, is convinced that an economic agreement is the most important step toward a future Union treaty. He noted with satisfaction the fact that the State Council members do not differ on this issue and that there are definite opportunities for this matter to be settled at the present sitting using a model similar to the EEC [European Economic Community] structure. The bilateral and multilateral treaties of sovereign republics could form some kind of basis for a future document. However, the Kyrgyz president noted that the alternative economic agreement proposed by G. Yavlinskiy is “unacceptable because of its complexity.” Moreover, he spoke highly of the alternative draft agreement put forward by Stanislav Shatalin. “Written lucidly and clearly, his draft suits the present-day situation ideally and ultimately could serve as the core of an economic treaty of sovereign republics,” Akaev stated.

I believe that it is too early to sign an economic agreement, said the Turkmen president, Saparmurad Niyazov. He believes that a further two to three months of hard work will be required to eliminate all the uncertainties that have arisen in economic relations among the republics. “Over that period, the sovereign republics, along with the Russian leadership, could clarify their attitudes and work out an acceptable version of an agreement,” the president said. He stressed that we will all be faced in the future with trading at world prices and that this will mean inevitable losses, but we are not losing our confidence in the efficiency of the levers of solidarity. For example, if our Caucasian partners are unable to pay for Turkmen gas supplies immediately, we agree to a mutually advantageous agreement envisaging an equivalent exchange. A common interrepublic insurance fund, which should be set up on a voluntary basis, could help during a difficult period.

Despite the clear need for the country's common economic area to be supported and preserved, I am alarmed by the weakening of economic ties between republics, the Azeri president, Ayaz Mutalibov, said. In their present state, the republics will not individually be able to ensure social programs and, thus, gain the support of their peoples. The Azeri leader believes that the process of demarcating republics increased after the August events and that the mistrust that has arisen should be eliminated, primarily by strengthening economic ties. Otherwise, according to Mutalibov, the economic slump will continue, and this could also result in the loss of the democratic gains of recent years.....

Grigoriy Yavlinskiy, head of the draft economic treaty, commented: "The draft was adopted as a foundation. The republics will form authorized delegations to seek jointly grounds for the agreements constituting the treaty. A big and very complex task lies ahead."

Unfortunately, we know from experience that it is also possible that this work might be drawn out in time and that principles may be substituted and a kind of "salad" might be created of various programs. However, one thing is of main importance today: Work is beginning, in principle. Judging from the debate, which is coming to an end, it will progress with great difficulty.

For instance, the Kyrgyz president, Askar Akaev, proposed a treaty in a more general form, proceeding as it were from international principles. However, it was decided to adopt the most concrete forms of the document, forms that suit our conditions. I consider that it will prove possible to put the finishing touches on the document in an extremely short period of time. We are at a critical point. The State Council session has just been discussing how to share the existing food around the country. If we do not find new approaches to the problem, we will again be engaging in partition. Work on the main part of the treaty must be finished within one month.

1.11 Kravchuk Disagrees with “One Plus Ten” Statement

Interfax, 3 September 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Ukraine disagrees with certain essential points of the One Plus Ten statement, although it has signed the document, the chairman of the republic's Supreme Soviet, Leonid Kravchuk, said at a press conference yesterday evening. "We disagree, for example, with the idea of some abstract separate center," he said. He believes all central bodies should be interrepublican. Otherwise "we shall have what we have now: the closer you are to the Center the more you get." Kravchuk pointed out that, shortly before the end of the putsch and after it, the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation had dealt with matters within the competence of the Union parliament. The Russian prime minister is virtually a co-chairman of the Committee for the Management of the Economy, which is performing the functions of a Union government and includes more members from the Russian Federation than from any other republic. "We see the reasons for it, but we believe at the same time that the wealth accumulated by all peoples of the Soviet Union should be fairly divided among them. We see this as an economic issue rather than a political one," said Kravchuk. He did not share the opinion that the Congress of People's Deputies had started a new coup d'état. "In making suggestions for the agenda, the president and the top leaders of the republics were aware that some of them contradicted the legislation. But the situation in the republics and the Soviet Union as a whole is so grave that emergency measures are perfectly warranted, above all for the sake of preventing economic collapse," he said.

1.12 The Treaty on an Economic Community

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 22 October 1991 [CD Translation]

Independent states that are former members of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, regardless of their current status, expressing the will of their peoples for the political and economic sovereignty codified in acts adopted by the states' supreme legislative bodies and for the protection of citizens' interests, desiring to establish mutually advantageous economic relations between states, striving for radical economic transformations, and considering the common nature of the problems facing the states in connection with the tasks of getting out of the crisis, changing over to a market economy and entering the world economy, recognizing the advantages of economic integration, a common economic space, and the advisability of preserving economic, trade, scientific-technical, and other relations, conclude this treaty on an economic community.

Chapter 1. Basic Principles

Article 1. The Economic Community is created by independent states on the basis of voluntary participation by and equal rights for all its members, for the purpose of forming a united market and conducting a coordinated economic policy as an indispensable condition of overcoming the crisis.

Article 2. Membership in the Economic Community entails the making by independent states of the full range of commitments provided for in this treaty and their acquisition of all the rights provided therein.

The member states of the Economic Community are to proceed on the basis of mutual economic responsibility for the implementation of this treaty and are to refrain from any steps that jeopardize the implementation of this treaty as a whole or of its individual provisions.

Article 3. States that have seceded from the USSR and have not joined the Economic Community are to construct relations with the Economic Community on the basis of generally accepted principles and norms of international law. Questions of common interest for the Economic Community that require settlement are to be resolved by special agreements between the Economic Community and the states in question, to be concluded within no more than three months of the date this treaty goes into effect.

Article 4. A member state of the Economic Community has the right to withdraw from the Community. It must notify the other members of the Economic Community of its intention no less than twelve months in advance. Withdrawal from the Economic Community is conditional on the settlement of relations with respect to all commitments associated with membership in the Community, in accordance with the special agreements.

Article 5. The member states of the Economic Community are to reach an agreement on bringing economic legislation closer together, and also on conducting coordinated policy in the following fields:

- entrepreneurship;
- market for goods and services;
- transportation, electrical engineering and information;
- monetary and banking system;
- finances, taxes, and prices;
- the market for capital and securities;
- the labor market;

- customs regulations and tariffs;
- foreign economic relations and foreign currency policy;
- state scientific and technical, investment, ecological, humanitarian, and other programs (including programs to eliminate the consequences of natural disasters and catastrophes) that are of general interest for the Economic Community;
- standardization, patents, metrology, statistics, and accounting.

Article 6. The member states of the Economic Community mutually pledge not to permit unilateral, uncoordinated actions with respect to the division of property that they recognize as joint property. The composition of this joint property is to be determined by a special agreement.

Article 7. In order to carry out a coordinated economic policy and common measures to emerge from the crisis, the member states of the Economic Community will create community institutions endowed with the appropriate powers.

Article 8. This treaty is concluded for a period of three years. No later than twelve months before that time is reached, the member states of the Economic Community are to resolve the question of extending or changing this treaty or concluding a new one.

Chapter 2. Entrepreneurship

Article 9. The member states of the Economic Community recognize that the foundation for achieving an upswing in the economy is private property, free enterprise, and competition. They are creating conditions to facilitate business activity and are legislatively limiting state interference in the economic activity of enterprises.

Article 10. A member state of the Economic Community pledges to ensure an identical legal system on its territory for physical and juristic persons both of its state and of other member states of the Economic Community. The conditions of the legal system may be spelled out on the basis of bilateral and multilateral agreements.

Article 11. The member states of the Economic Community pledge to conduct a coordinated anti-monopoly policy and to promote the development of competition within the framework of their united market. During the transitional period, the member states of the Economic Community are to carry out coordinated actions with respect to the regulation of prices for goods produced by monopoly producers.

Chapter 3. The Movement of Goods, Services, and Prices

Article 12. The movement of goods and services on the territory of states belonging to the Economic Community is carried out freely and on a duty-free basis. The importing of goods from third states is subject to the imposition of duties in accordance with the Economic Community's uniform external customs-tariff rates.

Article 13. Striving for the formation of a united market, the member states of the Economic Community recognize the impermissibility of restrictions on the movement of goods and services and pledge to eliminate them within an agreed-upon period.

Article 14. The member states of the Economic Community are to conduct a coordinated policy of changing over to freely determined prices. The member states of the Economic Community are to apply agreed-upon prices to a list of products to be determined jointly.

Chapter 4. The Monetary and Banking System

Article 15. The member states of the Economic Community recognize that, in order to end the crisis and control inflation, coordinated actions in the field of monetary and credit policy are a major priority.

Article 16. The member states of the Economic Community recognize the need to preserve the ruble as the common currency of a single monetary system, and they have agreed to undertake efforts to strengthen it. The member states of the Economic Community are permitted to introduce national currencies if they fulfill conditions that would prevent detriment to the Economic Community's monetary system. These conditions are to be set by special agreements between individual states and the Economic Community.

Article 17. In order to work out and conduct an effective monetary and credit policy that restrains price increases and maintains the ruble's exchange rate, the member states of the Economic Community are to establish, on the principles of a reserve system, a Banking Union that will include the central (national state) banks of the Economic Community's member states and are to create an Interstate Emissions Bank under the Banking Union.

Article 18. The legal status of the Banking Union and the procedures for forming its administrative agencies are to be determined by a special agreement. The activity of the Banking Union will be regulated by its charter, which is to be confirmed by the supreme bodies of legislative power of the member states of the Economic Community.

Article 19. The following functions are assigned to the Banking Union:

- determining uniform approaches to the implementation of monetary and credit policy, and establishing quantitative parameters (ceilings) for the operations of central banks that are members of the Banking Union;
- setting interest rates on loans granted to commercial banks by central banks that are members of the Banking Union;

- setting reserve requirements for commercial banks;
- organizing interbank settlements;
- regulating the ruble's exchange rate with respect to other currencies;
- managing that part of the gold reserve and the foreign currency reserve that the member states of the Economic Community transfer to the Banking Union;
- organizing the circulation of cash, including the sale of paper money and coins;
- regulating general rules for the activity of commercial banks.

For 1992, the Banking Union is to establish ceilings on the participation of the central banks of the member states of the Economic Community in providing credits to local budgets.

The directives of administrative agencies of the Banking Union are mandatory for all banks that are members of it.

Article 20. In creating the Banking Union, the member states of the Economic Community consider it necessary to determine, in a special agreement, procedures for the transfer to their ownership and to the ownership of states that do not belong to the Economic Community of appropriate parts of the start-up [ustavniefondy] reserve and other assets of the former USSR state banking system and its equity, limited-liability companies and deposits, as well as of the gold reserve and stocks of diamonds and foreign currency.

Article 21. The member states of the Economic Community are to create, on conditions of equal representation, a supreme bank inspectorate that will be charged with the following:

- monitoring observance of the charters of the Banking Union and the Interstate Emissions Bank;
- considering statements by members of the Economic Community about the infringement of their interests;
- revoking and suspending decisions of the Banking Union that are at variance with its charter.

The Banking Union and the Interstate Emissions Bank must present all necessary documents and materials at the request of the Supreme Bank Inspectorate.

Decisions of the Supreme Bank Inspectorate that are adopted within the bounds of its jurisdiction must be implemented by the Bank Union and the Interstate Emissions Bank.

Chapter 5. Finances and Taxes

Article 22. The member states of the Economic Community are to conduct a coordinated budget and tax policy, which means:

- the agreed-upon limitation of the deficits of consolidated state budgets, taking into account off-budget funds, and the establishment of limits on the growth of the internal debt of the member states of the Economic Community. If a state has exhausted possibilities for floating its securities and if one or several member states of the Economic Community exceed the established limits, the excess amount is listed as a debt liability of the other community members, in accordance with agreed-upon rules;
- the standardization of taxation principles, and an agreed-upon policy in the field of taxes that affect the interests of the other member states of the Economic Community.

Article 23. The member states of the Economic Community consider it necessary to conclude an agreement on the division and legal restructuring of the USSR's internal debt, as it stands at an agreed-upon date, between the member states of the Economic Community and states that are not members, and on the procedures for servicing this debt in the future. Part of the debt may be added to the common liability of the member states of the Economic Community. At the same time, an agreement will be concluded on the distribution of centralized credit resources among the banks of the states. The state internal debt is to be determined with consideration for the state budgets' indebtedness to banks for covering price differences for agricultural output as of 1 January 1992.

The member states of the Economic Community affirm the continuity of obligations assumed in the name of the USSR to the holders of deposits in the USSR Savings Bank, USSR state securities, certificates of the USSR Savings Bank, and insurance policies (obligations) of the USSR Ministry of Finance's Chief Administration for State Insurance.

Article 24. In order to finance joint expenditures, including expenditures for the maintenance of institutions of the Economic Community, the member states of the Economic Community are to create a budget for the community.

Within the framework of the Economic Community's budget, the following special funds are to be created;

- a fund to service the part of the USSR internal state debt that has been added to the joint liability of the member states of the Economic Community;
- a fund to service the USSR's foreign debt and the foreign debt of the Economic Community (the portion paid in rubles);
- a fund for emergency situations and for eliminating the consequences of major natural disasters and catastrophes, such as Chernobyl, the Aral Sea, the earthquake in Spitak, and others;
- a fund for special purpose programs;

-and a financial reserve.

The budget of the Economic Community is formed from the dues paid by its members, which are set in fixed amounts. The amounts of these fixed dues and the procedure for forming them are to be determined by a special agreement among the members of the Economic Community. The budget cannot be in deficit.

The Interstate Economic Committee will make quarterly reports to the Council of Heads of Government of the Member States of the Economic Community on the fulfillment of the budget.

Article 25. The member states of the Economic Community may create off-budget funds to finance special-purpose programs. The Economic Community's off-budget funds cannot be in deficit.

Article 26. The member states of the Economic Community recognize the need to conduct special-purpose programs to aid the development of certain regions and provide social support for the population of those regions. To this end, they are to create an appropriate fund by contributing agreed-upon shares of the national income (gross national product) produced on their territories, in current prices. The activity of this fund is to be regulated by a special agreement and the charter.

Article 27. The member states of the Economic Community are to arrange for movements of money and other financial resources and the emission and circulation of securities within the framework of the Economic Community to be regulated in accordance with a special agreement that does not include the free movement of capital.

Chapter 6. The Labor Market and Social Guarantees

Article 28. The member states are to strive to implement the principle of freedom of movement for the work force on the territories of the member states of the Economic Community and, consequently, are to create the conditions for this, including the formation of a housing market.

Article 29. The member states are not to permit discrimination against citizens on the basis of nationality or on any other basis in questions of job availability, pay or other working conditions, or in providing social guarantees.

The member states are to mutually recognize the educational and skill levels, as confirmed by appropriate documents, that employees obtained in other member states and are not to demand additional confirmation of these levels when hiring people or admitting them to educational institutions, if this condition is not mandatory for everyone.

The member states are to agree on a visa-free system for the movement of their citizens within the territorial bounds of this Community.

Article 30. The member states are to conclude special agreements on regulating migration processes and mutual obligations in the field of social insurance and pensions for citizens of states belonging to the Economic Community.

Chapter 7. Foreign Economic Relations and Foreign Currency Policy

Article 31. The member states are to reach agreement on the coordination of foreign economic activity and foreign currency policy.

Article 32. The Economic Community, as the legal inheritor of all the foreign economic commitments of the USSR, as well as of the commitments of other countries to the USSR, guarantees their fulfillment. Each member state, when it enters the Economic Community, confirms its participation in the joint fulfillment of these commitments.

The members of the Economic Community are to create a bank that will be the legal successor to the USSR Bank for Foreign Economic Activity, a bank through which settlements related to the repayment of foreign debts and the receipt by the Economic Community of debt payments from other countries will be made.

The members of the Economic Community will assume the settlement of all relations regarding foreign debts with each member of the USSR that does not join the Economic Community.

The members of the Economic Community consider it necessary to conclude a special agreement on determining the share of each member of the former Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics in the overall total of payments on the USSR's foreign debt and in the total of debts owed to the USSR by other countries as of an agreed-upon date.

The indicated shares are to be used for settlements regarding debt repayment with states not wishing to accede to the treaty or withdrawing from the Economic Community. These states are to conduct settlements with the Economic Community up to and including the full payment of all debts falling to them.

If a state that does not wish to accede to the treaty, that withdraws from the Economic Community, or that is a part of it reaches an agreement with all its creditors on restructuring its share of the overall foreign debt, then the independent repayment by that state of the indicated portion of the debt is to be permitted.

Article 33. The Economic Community is to obtain new foreign loans on the basis of an agreed-upon decision by all member states of the Economic Community.

A member state of the Economic Community has the right to obtain foreign loans independently, with all the ensuing obligations regarding the servicing and repayment of such loans.

The granting of credits or other economic assistance to foreign states by the Economic Community or individual member states is to be carried out according to the same procedure.

Article 34. The member states, using a common monetary unit, have agreed that achieving internal convertibility for the ruble is an immediate goal of this Community. They pledge to carry out the necessary preparatory measures on the basis of an agreed-upon program for changing over to internal convertibility for the ruble.

Article 35. Pending the changeover to internal convertibility for the ruble, the member states of the Economic Community recognize the need to establish a uniform procedure for the accumulation of foreign currency receipts to service the foreign debt.

Article 36. The member states are to independently regulate foreign economic activity, the setting of quotas and the issuing of licenses for foreign economic operations within agreed-upon quotas.

Article 37. The member states are to reach agreement on the preservation of a single customs territory for the Economic Community and are to conduct a coordinated customs policy with regard to third countries.

Questions related to the procedure for establishing customs duties and taxes on exports and imports and levying them in the appropriate budgets are to be resolved by a special agreement.

Article 38. The member states are to reach agreement on common membership in the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and other international economic organizations, and they are to confirm the legal validity of applications made to these bodies on behalf of the USSR.

Article 39. The member states are to conduct an independent policy in the field of foreign investments, coordinating this policy when necessary. The member states are also to coordinate their actions in the field of technical, advisory, and other forms of assistance from foreign states and international organizations.

Chapter 8. The Legal Regulation of Economic Activity

Article 40. The legislative acts of the member states of the Economic Community have supremacy in these states. Physical and juridical persons engaged in economic activity on the territories of these states are guided by their legislation.

Article 41. For the effective period of this treaty, the member states have agreed to bring the norms of their economic legislation closer together, with a view to creating most-favored and equal conditions for entrepreneurship and free trade throughout the space of the Economic Community. They pledge to ensure the conformity of their legislation to the norms of international law and the acts of the Economic Community.

Article 42. If rules other than those contained in the legislation of the member states of the Economic Community exist within the bounds of their jurisdiction, the priority of the treaty and of the agreements and normative acts of the Economic Community is to be recognized.

Article 43. During the period necessary for the settlement of all aspects of economic life by legislation of the member states, acts of USSR legislation, insofar as they are not at variance with this treaty and agreements, are to be used temporarily with respect to unsettled questions, according to an agreed-upon procedure.

Chapter 9. Institutions of the Economic Community

Article 44. The institutions of the Economic Community are:

- the Council of Heads of Government of the Member States;
- the Interstate Economic Committee;
- the Court of Arbitration of the Economic Community.

The institutions of the Economic Community are formed on a professional basis from representatives of the member states of the Community.

Article 45. The supreme coordinating body of the Economic Community is the Council of Heads of Government of the member states.

Regular conferences of ministers of the member states of the Economic Community will be held in order to resolve questions of cooperation and the working out of a common policy in specific aspects of economic management.

Article 46. The Interstate Economic Committee is the executive body of the Economic Community. Within the bounds of its jurisdiction, it ensures the fulfillment of the tasks of the Economic Community as determined by this treaty and related agreements, as well as by decisions of the Council of Heads of Government of the member states.

Article 47. The work of the Interstate Economic Committee is directed by its chairman.

The chairman of the Interstate Economic Committee is recommended by the Council of Heads of Government of the member states and is appointed and relieved of his duties by the Council of Heads of Government of the member states, by majority vote (more than half).

The chairman of the Interstate Economic Committee is to present the committee's regulations, structure, and estimated expenditures to the Council of Heads of Government of the member states for confirmation.

Article 48. In order to ensure the uniform application of this treaty throughout the member states of the Economic Community, a Court of Arbitration of the Economic Community is to be formed to resolve disputed questions and apply economic sanctions.

Chapter 10. Agreements

Article 49. Economic relations between the member states of the Economic Community are regulated on the basis of this treaty and related agreements.

Article 50. Within no more than three months from the time this treaty is signed, agreements lasting for the duration of the treaty are to be concluded on the following questions:

- on the status and powers of the institutions of the Economic Community;
- on the formation of the Banking Union, including its character;
- on the Economic Community's Bank for Foreign Economic Activity;

- on bringing closer together the legislation of member states regulating economic activity;
- on the regulation of migration processes;
- on the creation of a Fund for Regional Development and Social Support for the Population, including its charter;
- on the creation of off-budget funds for financing special-purpose programs of the Economic Community and statutes concerning those funds;
- on the settlement of the mutual obligations of states if they withdraw from the Economic Community;
- on the movement of capital and securities;
- on anti-monopoly policy within the framework of the united market of the member states;
- on mutual obligations in the field of pensions and social insurance;
- on scientific and technical cooperation;
- on the patent service;
- on procedures and conditions for the introduction of national currencies by member states;
- on the procedure for changing over to general principles of international economic relations with states that are part of the USSR but have not joined the Economic Community;
- on the division and legal restructuring of the USSR state internal debt and the procedure for servicing it in the future;

-on the principles and mechanisms for servicing the Economic Community's foreign debt.

Chapter 11. Associate Membership in the Economic Community

Article 52. A state that assumes only part of the commitments specified by this treaty may, with the consent of the Economic Community's members, be granted the status of associate member.

Article 53. The conditions on which states may become affiliated with the Economic Community as associate members are specified by the members.

Article 54. Relations between the Economic Community and associate members are regulated in each individual instance by a special agreement that provides for, in particular, the resolution of questions concerning customs procedures, interstate deliveries and prices, and the Economic Community's participation in determining the associate's budget and off-budget funds.

Chapter 12. Concluding Provisions

Article 55. The member states of the Economic Community pledge to resolve questions involving the violation of this treaty in the Economic Community's Court of Arbitration in accordance with the jurisdiction assigned to that body, and also through negotiations.

Member states that commit flagrant violations of their commitments stemming from the treaty or its supplemental agreements on specific issues may be subject to sanctions provided for in agreements, up to and including expulsion from the Economic Community.

Article 56. The Economic Community is open to the entry of states recognizing this treaty. The admission of new members will be regulated by a consensus vote among member states.

1.13 President Gorbachev's Appeal to Ukrainian Leadership

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 23 October 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Esteemed Ukrainian people's deputies!

This appeal to you is dictated by a desire to extricate the country as quickly as possible from its grave economic and political crisis and to return people's lives to normal. Today it is a question of the destiny of our multinational homeland. And we are profoundly convinced that only together can our peoples resolve the urgent problems of their development and build a worthy future for themselves and their descendants.

The changes that have occurred in the country since the August events have created a fundamentally new political situation. The obstacles in the way of society's cardinal democratic renewal are being removed. Conditions are evolving so that each people can freely choose its own form of statehood.

Freedom and independence and the conditions for their development are the natural right of every people.

Freedom and independence are also preconditions for the peoples' unification on a truly voluntary and equal basis.

Such a Union is vitally necessary. The entire history of our multinational state and the deep-seated traditions of our peoples' lives speak for themselves. The urgent needs of many millions of people and fundamental international conditions make unification necessary.

For centuries our peoples created a great spiritual culture together. If they were to go separate ways today, this would be an irretrievable loss both for each of them and for world civilization.

We know what state our economy is in now. But it is a fact that it developed for decades within the framework of a unified economic complex. If you were to tear this thick fabric in two or three places, the entire canvas would start to fray and disintegrate. People in all republics and parts of the country are already feeling the pernicious consequences of the rupture of economic ties.

Over the long years of our multinational state's development, the nations and peoples have moved about its vast space. Millions and even tens of millions of people now live outside their own national republics. Demographic upheavals would be the inevitable consequence of their isolation. The dramatic fate of hundreds of thousands of refugees is apparent to everyone.

The military might of our superpower was created by the very hard labor and the sacrifices of several generations. Today, together with other states, we are traveling the path of decisively reducing that might and bringing it into line with the doctrine of defense sufficiency. But the USSR remains one of the two greatest nuclear powers. We bear a responsibility, both to our own people and to the whole world, for ensuring that this terrible force is under reliable control.

Let us be frank. There is still prejudice against the Union in people's minds. Many negative phenomena associated with the rigid unitary model of state structure live on and are still far from being forgotten. But it is now a question of a new Union, in which the very foundations of the economic and political structure, the socially oriented market economy, political and ideological pluralism, and the multiparty system will serve as a guarantee of the free development of every nation and every citizen.

It was for just such a Union that the overwhelming majority of the population of the country as a whole and in each of the republics voted in the referendum on 17 March this year.

The building of the new Union has begun. The signing of the Economic Community treaty is of great significance in this connection. Work on the draft treaty on the Union of Sovereign States has been resumed. In accordance with the joint statement of the USSR president and the leaders of nine republics, the session of the new convocation of the country's Supreme Soviet opened in Moscow on 21 October by decision of the Fifth Congress of USSR People's Deputies.

We address you, esteemed elected representatives of the people, with an expression of hope that Ukraine's representatives will take an active part in this collective work. Ukraine is one of the largest republics in the Union. Its role in our country's development and in everything of which our peoples can be rightly proud is indispensable. We want to believe that it will make an equally worthy contribution to the building of the new, united family of peoples, of which the great Kobzar dreamed.

Let us state frankly: We cannot imagine the Union without Ukraine. We are convinced that the multinational people of Ukraine also cannot conceive of the future without relations of alliance with all our country's peoples, with whom they are linked by a history dating back many centuries.

Accept, esteemed deputies, our wishes for the successful work of the republic's Supreme Soviet.

We send our very kind feelings and wishes to the people of the fraternal Ukraine.

[Signed] M. Gorbachev, B. Yeltsin, S. Shushkevich,
N.Nazarbaev, I. Karimov, A. Mutalibov, A. Akaev, S.
Niyazov, A. Iskandarov

1.14 Yeltsin's Reactions to a Union Without Ukraine

Editor's Note: Ukraine's 1 December referendum on independence forced Boris Yeltsin's hand. Although he supported the Union, he was literally the "co-president" of the Soviet Union, and he wanted to rid the political scene of Mikhail Gorbachev. In the interviews that follow, Yeltsin signals that Russia will probably not sign the Union treaty if Ukraine does not. This, of course, removes any pretext of a need for a Union president and sets the stage for the USSR's collapse. (Yeltsin may have been thinking that he could reunite the republics after Gorbachev's fall.)

Yeltsin's Pre-Referendum Views

TASS, 30 November 1991 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

The Russian president, Boris Yeltsin, stated Monday that he cannot conceive of the Union without Ukraine, whose population will vote tomorrow on whether or not the republic should proclaim its independence.

Addressing journalists following a meeting of the presidents of the USSR and the RSFSR [Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic], Yeltsin expressed his apprehension that if Ukraine leaves the Union, "it would rapidly introduce its own national currency and Russia would be left to pick up the pieces."

President Yeltsin said that Mikhail Gorbachev had assured him that he would take every step to see that Ukraine signs the Union treaty.

“As far as I am concerned, I have always said that I am for the Union,” the president declared.

[Moscow Central Television, 1900 GMT]

[Interviewer]: In your interview in yesterday's Izvestiya you stated that Russia would not sign the Union treaty until Ukraine signs it. Judging from Kravchuk's statements, Ukraine does not intend to participate in the Union treaty. What does this mean? Will there be a Union?

[Yeltsin]: You have paraphrased it somewhat. You have put it inaccurately, just as Izvestiya did.

[Interviewer]: You will not-Russia will not-sign?

[Yeltsin]: No, give me the Izvestiya.

[Yeltsin]: At today's State Council I will be compelled to say that until Ukraine signs the political treaty, Russia will not sign. Well, that is approximately it, although what I said is not entirely accurately reproduced here, but in essence, yes. I cannot envisage a Union without Ukraine. Because if Ukraine were to rapidly introduce its own national currency, the entire ruble monetary mass would collapse on Russia. This cannot be. In general, what kind of Union would it be without Ukraine? The president has told me that he will take all measures necessary for Ukraine to sign the treaty. Well, that is all. I am saying what I have always said-that I am in favor of the Union.

Yeltsin's Post-Referendum Reaction

TASS, 3 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

A nationwide referendum on the future of Ukraine took place on 1 December 1991. The Russian leadership declares its recognition of the independence of Ukraine in accordance with the democratic will of its people.

We must now rapidly establish new interstate relations between Russia and Ukraine, preserving traditions, friendship and good-neighborliness, and mutual respect between both peoples, and strictly observe the pledges we have made, including the nonproliferation of nuclear weapons, observance of human rights, and other universally acknowledged international norms.

The basis for a comprehensive and mutually beneficial partnership between Russia and Ukraine was laid down by the treaty of 19 November 1990 and the communiqué of 6 November 1991. We will continue to adhere to this strategic course. We are ready to start work on a draft of a full-scale interstate bilateral treaty, which would meet all the demands of this new stage in Russian-Ukrainian relations.

All-around cooperation between our states, their mutual dependence, and the positive experience of our mutual relations in the past demand a particularly careful attitude.

Mutually beneficial and balanced cooperation between Russia and Ukraine can and must serve as an example of bilateral relations between the republics of the old Union. New possibilities are opening for close cooperation among republics and for forming a genuinely equal community of sovereign states.

The new partnership between Russia and Ukraine-two sovereign states-will make a substantial contribution to security and stability on the continent-in accordance with the CSCE [Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe] principles-and to the positive processes in the world.

Russian and Ukrainian observation of obligations in disarmament, human rights, and national minorities, including the avoidance of discrimination on the basis of language; openness of borders; freedom of choice of citizenship; and cooperation in the formation of a common economic space and the development of contiguous regions will create a good basis for the rapid establishment of diplomatic relations between our two countries.

1.15 No “Obstacles” to Recognition of Ukraine

Editor’s Note: Even before formation of the CIS, Ukraine put on the world agenda the issue of whether and how quickly former Soviet republics could expect to receive international recognition as sovereign states. The general referendum ratifying Ukrainian independence on 1 December 1991 caused a great deal of discussion in the world community. Many countries feared the eruption of a territorial dispute between Russia and Ukraine. For some countries, human rights guarantees were a very important criterion for recognizing the statehood of a former republic of the Soviet Union. Many others (including the United States) initially chose to withhold recognition until Ukraine proved it was willing to give up its nuclear weapons and become a “nuclear-free” state. Some Ukrainian politicians, wary of Russian intentions, believed Ukraine should retain at least some of its powerful nuclear missiles and missile production capacity as a bargaining chip in debates with its “big brother.” This position was adamantly discouraged by the United States and several European nations, however, becoming in some ways an unfortunate distraction from other issues involved in the stabilization of the region and an obstacle to mutually beneficial relations between Ukraine and the West. As the following article states, however, an important step forward was taken by world organizations in considering what the “universal criteria” for statehood might be. It is noteworthy that the piece that follows mentions Russia's allusion to the status of Russians living in former republics. This was to become a difficult issue for every CIS member and was to figure into Russia's rationale for a more aggressive "peacekeeping" role in the new states. Although old thought patterns would require time to fade, world recognition of Ukraine was an important marker on the path toward the post-Cold War world order, and convincing proof that the Soviet Union was really gone for good.

Russia and the Community of Nations United in Their Approach

V. Mikheev

Izvestiya, 5 December 1991 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpts

The world community of nations is displaying unprecedented unanimity in its approach to the conditions for its diplomatic recognition of the new European power-Ukraine.

In short, in the words of the Australian foreign minister, G. Evans, there are a number of "generally recognized international criteria for statehood." Ukraine must fit the status of a sovereign state in all parameters. Doubt may have been cast on the "generally recognized" concept yesterday. However, with regard to Ukraine the community of nations has displayed rare unanimity, and the criteria for statehood and the terms for recognizing Ukraine de jure in its new capacity coincide in the statements issued by the White House and the Russian president, Boris Yeltsin, in the demands made by NATO and neutral Sweden, and in the wishes expressed by its very close neighbor Germany and far-off Australia.

What are these unified terms? Compliance with the USSR's international disarmament commitments; respect for human rights, including the rights of national minorities (the 12 million Russians, in particular, of course); and implementation of the normative acts adopted in Helsinki and Paris establishing the principles for European communal life.

The Russian president's statement adds: "the prevention of linguistic discrimination" and "freedom to choose citizenship."

The second "basket" concerns the subject of the unexpected expansion of the "nuclear club." The United States is insistently calling for Ukraine to implement its desire for a "nuclear-free status" and meanwhile ensure responsible and reliable control over the nuclear weapons on its national territory and prevent the spread of dangerous technologies. The latter is understandable given the increasingly frequent reports that our nuclear physicists are being made alluring offers to work abroad on contractIran and Iraq figure among the employers.

The third "basket" holds a reference to one of the precepts of the Helsinki Charter. A change in Europe's existing borders is undesirable, but, if it is unavoidable, it should occur solely by peaceful means and through negotiations. No one denies that the explosive potential of any territorial dispute may rival that of the nuclear arms. Romania's claims to northern Bukovina are an alarm signal. Since up to 85 percent of the borders within the former Union are not marked, the reference in Yeltsin's statement to the idea of Russian and Ukrainian commitment to the principle of "open borders" should be seen as the correct move. Does that settle the problem?

The positions espoused by most states are seen to be consonant on all three "baskets," although there could be some additional emphases in the reactions from the community of nations. Thus Australia is raising the matter of "effective control of its territory" as an important attribute of statehood. How does this apply to Ukraine, where major troop contingents “under the jurisdiction of the Soviet central command” are stationed? On the other hand, the permanent representatives of the North Atlantic Alliance countries unequivocally advocated ensuring reliable control over nuclear weapons and preserving “unified command of these weapons.”

The different nuances do not negate the fundamental coincidence of approaches, enabling the following optimistic conclusion to be drawn: With the deideologization of world politics and the fading of Cold War inertia, it has become possible to develop interstate relations on legal foundations that really are universally recognized, on the ethical postulates of the civilized world. It is because of that ideological unity that the voice of the community of nations has become louder and heavier. Everyone who decides, like Ukraine, to become a full-fledged subject of international relations in the future must take that into account. I think that this episode, rather than the united front against Baghdad’s tyrannical regime, better displays the features of the “new world order.”

People in Kiev are fully aware of that. The Ukrainian foreign minister, Anatoliy Zlenko, confirmed that his state regards itself as the “rightful successor to the former Soviet Union insofar as the agreements signed by the latter are concerned,” including the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks (START) treaty, the Helsinki accords, and other human rights agreements. Ukraine, the minister said, intends to eliminate 130 of the 176 ICBMs [intercontinental ballistic missiles] on its territory. In the future Ukraine will become a nuclear-free state. Our involvement in any military blocs is ruled out. In conclusion, Zlenko reassured creditors, Ukraine will abide by the accord of 21 October and pay its share of the USSR's foreign debt.

So, the obstacles have been cleared to formal international recognition of Ukraine. Unlike the Baltic states, however, few are rushing to open their embassies in Kiev. Still, it cannot be ruled out that this step is only a matter of time. The following words are encountered most frequently: "We will consider the matter with neighboring countries" (Norway); "We will make a decision with other EC [European Community] states" (France); "We must wait for an explanation of the position on CSCE [Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe] principles, including the Paris Charter commitments regarding the observance of human rights" (Sweden); "We will act in accordance with other Asian states" (South Korea); and so on.

The wait-and-see approach does not detract from the main point: There are no formal obstacles to diplomatic recognition, and therefore, according to France's Le Monde, it is a matter of months or even weeks.

2 Three Plus Eight: From the USSR to the CIS

Introductory Notes

As the CIS was being hastily cobbled together (7-8 December 1991) in a meeting held just outside Minsk in the Republic of Belarus, the USSR was "on the brink of explosion." Such terms were used by international reporters because at that moment the Union was bankrupt (every republic had ceased paying taxes months before); all central government bodies had been dissolved in November; 72 percent of the Soviet people no longer believed Mikhail Gorbachev was in control of the country; Ukraine's referendum on independence threw any hopes of its signing the Union treaty into grave doubt; and many people believed that another putsch attempt was in the making. Add to this picture the fact that Presidents Gorbachev and Yeltsin were making it increasingly clear that they could not work with one another-that one or the other would have to go-and you have a complex recipe for dissolution from the top down.

The first two documents in this chapter-press accounts of Ukrainian leaders' pronouncements on foreign and military policy-illustrate that, despite President Gorbachev's vehement statements to the contrary, Ukraine was steadfastly severing itself from the Union. This was being interpreted as the final blow to the Soviet state, making it clear to almost everyone that the old federal way of life was no longer viable.

The Minsk (Belovezh Forest) and Alma-Ata agreements, provided in their entirety in this chapter, are the two formative documents of the CIS. The Minsk agreement was drafted by the three Slav presidents-Yeltsin of Russia, Kravchuk of Ukraine, Shushkevich of Belarus-and their prime ministers at the Belarus government's Viskuli residence in the Belovezhskaya Pushcha (Belovezh Forest) on 8 December. Press reviews said that the three leaders were meeting to discuss certain problems with the current (fifth) version of the Union treaty, which Mikhail Gorbachev had sent to the republics in November for their review. The Kazakh president, Nursultan Nazarbaev, an ardent supporter of the Union treaty, was also supposed to be present (Kazakhstan is the fourth largest nuclear state of the former Soviet Union). For unclear reasons, Nazarbaev did not attend, and the meeting turned out to have quite a different purpose.

The Minsk agreement that resulted from the meeting declared that the USSR had ceased to exist as "a subject of international law" and as a "geopolitical reality." A commonwealth was proclaimed in its place by the three "high contracting parties" (which had been the original founders of the USSR in 1922). Any former republic or third-party state agreeing with the principles established in the Minsk agreement was invited to join the CIS. Fulfillment of the international treaties and agreements signed by the USSR was guaranteed within the agreement. The basic understandings of the three leaders at the time are reflected in the "Declaration on the New Commonwealth" and the "Declaration on Economic Policy," which were attached to the Minsk agreement. These two declarations outline the three leaders' basic understanding of how the commonwealth was to reestablish stability in the region.

What the Minsk declarations did not express, however, was the leaders' fundamentally divergent perceptions concerning the future evolution and role of the CIS. They all saw it as an "amicable divorce" from the Union. However, Boris Yeltsin thought of the CIS as a new type of union, formed to rescue Soviet integration as the Soviet state was falling apart, leading in a few years to a confederal arrangement, similar to the European Union. In addition, Yeltsin saw in the dissolution of the USSR a convenient vehicle for the removal of Gorbachev from the post of president of the Soviet Union. Stanislav Shushkevich regarded the CIS as a vehicle through which Belarus could raise its profile by becoming the new "headquarters" of the CIS. In Leonid Kravchuk's view of post-Soviet life, however, the CIS was a transient arrangement required to ease the transition from Union to independence. He envisioned a loosening of ties over time, as states strengthened their own economies, not the reverse process. None of the three leaders perhaps appreciated fully just how difficult policy decisions would be regarding interstate integration within the CIS.

On 9 December, following the Minsk meeting of the Slav presidents, the Kazakh president, Nursultan Nazarbaev, sat in on the meeting between presidents Mikhail Gorbachev and Boris Yeltsin at which Yeltsin presented the joint resolution of the CIS founding states. Nazarbaev was deeply offended by the exclusion of the other republics from the founding session. Subsequently, on 13 December the Kazakh president and leaders of the other Central Asian states met in Ashkhabad to consider forming their own “Eurasian Union” as a counterbalance to a “Slavic Union,” which was what they considered the CIS to be. Ultimately, a senseless division of the former Union into two warring halves (Slavic and Muslim) was avoided. The original text of the “Ashkhabad Declaration” that emerged from the meeting appears here in its entirety. Its purpose was to guarantee Central Asia equal status with the founding members in the CIS. All five Central Asian states (Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan) were persuaded to join the CIS when they were assured the status of “high contracting parties” (or founders) in the Alma-Ata agreement, which was concluded at the 21 December meeting of the CIS.

Mikhail Gorbachev retired as the last president of the Soviet Union on 25 December. His resignation in a televised speech to the former Soviet people is contained in this chapter. On 26 December, the USSR Supreme Soviet was dissolved and the Soviet flag over the Kremlin was lowered. This memorable occasion is commemorated in this chapter in an address by the chairman of the Soviet of the Republics before the last extraordinary session of the Supreme Soviet. These two acts confirmed the disintegration of an imperial unit that had lasted for some five hundred years. In a bloodless transition, the second Russian revolution-this time a peaceful, democratic one-had, in effect, ended, or, with the advantage of hindsight, just begun. By its very nature, this transition contained the seeds of a dilemma for the Russian leadership. In some instances, Russia was to assume the duties, obligations, and assets of the Soviet government. In other instances, these things were to be shared among the new member states of the CIS. The CIS was to become the vehicle through which Russia is still today defining itself as a democratic nation.

The remaining documents provided in this chapter reflect the essence of what was to transpire in the first few months of the CIS's existence. Stanislav Shushkevich in his preview of the Minsk Summit of 30 December refers to the "two competing approaches" to organizing the economyintegrationist and minimalist. Stressing the paramount importance of resolving every question legally, he says: "I get the impression that even Russia itself is convinced that in general it cannot occupy a worthy position if it obeys the principle of great-powerism."

The agreement on Councils of Heads of State and Government signed at this first summit established the protocols for meetings and voting on issues. It is interesting to note, as a harbinger of what was to come, how it handles the problem of language. It says: "The official languages of the Council are the state languages of the Commonwealth states." Just below this, it says: "The working language is the Russian language." By the end of the session, it is obvious that the proceedings have been much more difficult than anyone really expected. The press accounts cited at the end of this chapter express apprehension about the relationships evolving within the CIS. Fifteen documents are signed at the summit, most of which concern strategic forces, armed forces, and border troops. The charter, however, which contains the rules and principles by which the CIS will be governed (its "constitution") is not passed. When asked why not, President Shushkevich answers: "It is difficult to elaborate a long-term document during the transitional period." But, in fact, a consensus position on a CIS charter had still not been reached three and a half years later.

2.1 Ukrainian Foreign Minister Views New Political Concept

Radio Kiev, 6 December 1991 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpts

At the press conference for Ukrainian foreign journalists, Ukraine's foreign minister, Anatoliy Zlenko, informed all those present about a foreign political conception of the new independent Ukraine.

[Begin Zlenko recording]: I'm glad that the transition to independence is being made by peaceful means, written not in blood but in ink. So the new, independent

Ukraine has arrived. New tasks are put forward before the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The main problem is to develop and implement the whole complex of measures to defend the national interests of Ukraine. The greater concern is international commitment, and, in accordance with the law on succession of 12 September this year, Ukraine is the successor of the former USSR in treaties that do not contradict its constitution.

The second problem is that of debts. In its statement of 23 October of this year, Verkhovna Rada—the parliament—confirmed its readiness to repay its share of foreign debt and at the same time to obtain its share of the assets of the former USSR. On the question of the armed forces: Ukraine will create its own armed forces, as well as a Republican Guard. This complies with a statement of 22 November 1991, which gradually takes into consideration the existing treaties, agreements, and consultations with other sovereign states and the USSR Ministry of Defense. The number of enlisted men in the army will be established by law on the basis of the principle of reasonable sufficiency. It will also be determined by whatever guarantees of collective defense are agreed upon. We shall also take into consideration the treaty on Conventional Forces in Europe.

The next problem is that of nuclear weapons. Taking into consideration all the factors of national security, Ukraine will carry out its intention to become in the future a neutral nonnuclear state, not participating in military blocs. It will observe three non-nuclear principles. Ukraine will participate in all treaties and agreements on the non-use of nuclear weapons, the START [Strategic Arms Reduction Talks] treaty signed in 1991 between the USSR and the United States, including the section concerning Ukrainian territory. I would like to stress that Ukraine has no control over, and does not wish to control, the nuclear weapons situated on its territory. These weapons must be transferred into the hands of a united command of Ukraine, Russia, Kazakhstan, and Belarus. Nuclear weapons must not be taken from Ukrainian territory, nor transferred for any purpose other than elimination, within the framework of negotiations, and under multilateral international control.

The next bloc of issues concern democracy and human rights. Being a European state, Ukraine has repeatedly talked about its intention to be a full-fledged participant in the all-European process. Accordingly, Ukraine accepts all international legal obligations and commitments resulting from the documents of the CSCE [Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe]. It will strictly observe the human rights covenants, and will proceed on the principle of the priority of these rights.

The issue of borders: Ukraine has repeatedly stated and states once more that its territory is indivisible and inviolable. It respects the inviolability of existing borders, and it has no territorial claims on any other state. We are categorically against the revision of the Helsinki agreements.

2.2 Ukrainian President Receives U.S. Under Secretary of State

The Ukrainian delegation is taking a package of important proposals to Minsk, where a meeting will begin today involving the leaders of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus. The proposals concern the political and economic interrelations between the republics of the former Soviet Union, matters of collective security, and nuclear arms control. This was stated today by the Ukrainian president, Leonid Kravchuk, during a meeting with Thomas Niles, representative of the U.S. president and under secretary of state, who arrived in Kiev to acquaint himself with the principles of Ukraine's domestic and foreign policy after its independence was confirmed by its people. Leonid Kravchuk noted: Ukraine is attaching special significance to relations with Russia and supports Boris Yeltsin's initiative on signing an interstate treaty. It is prepared to sign a similar treaty with Belarus. Naturally, other republics, primarily Kazakhstan, may join them on an interstate basis. In this way, a community of states like the European Community, without any Center as formerly understood, may emerge. This does not rule out the creation of a coordinating body, but an organ similar to the Interstate Economic Committee under Ivan Silaev's leadership.

Ukraine intends to comply with all international pacts, agreements, and treaties and to consistently advocate the destruction of nuclear weapons and the reduction of conventional armaments and armed forces, the president continued. It seeks to develop mutually advantageous cooperation with all countries, including neighboring states and, particularly, wherever Ukrainians live-the United States, Canada, and elsewhere.

2.3 The Minsk [Belovezh Forest] Agreement on Creation of the Commonwealth

8 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: On 8 December 1991 President Boris Yeltsin, President Leonid Kravchuk, and Supreme Soviet Chairman Stanislav Shushkevich met outside Minsk in a secluded residence in the Belovezh Forest and concluded an agreement establishing a Commonwealth of Independent States. The three newly elected heads of state felt it was time to acknowledge that the Soviet Union no longer existed. In its place they envisaged a free association of former Soviet republics, with common defense forces and a common economic space. Time, however, would reveal the wide gulf in understanding between the “fathers” of the Commonwealth.

Boris Yeltsin would maneuver for Russian supremacy over the organization. Leonid Kravchuk would insist on an amicable separation between equal and sovereign independent states. Stanislav Shushkevich would argue for Belarusian neutrality and a multinational, “rule-of-international-law” organization that would enable Belarus to sow the first seeds of a separate national identity. As “high contracting parties,” the three leaders considered their countries the nucleus of the new commonwealth, as they were when the Soviet Union was created. This pivotal assumption, however, was to change in dramatic fashion by the end of the month at the Alma-Ata conference on 21 December.

Preamble

We, the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and the Republic of Ukraine as founder states of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), which signed the 1922 Union treaty, further described as the high contracting parties, conclude that the USSR has ceased to exist as a subject of international law and a geopolitical reality.

-Taking as our basis the historic community of our peoples and the ties that have been established between them;

-Taking into account the bilateral treaties concluded between the high contracting parties;

- Striving to build democratic states governed by law;
- Intending to develop our relations on the basis of mutual recognition and respect for state sovereignty, the inalienable right to self-determination, the principles of equality and non-interference in internal affairs, repudiation of the use of force and of economic or any other means of coercion, settlement of problems by mediation and other generally recognized principles and norms of international law;
- Considering that further development and strengthening of relations of friendship, good-neighborliness, and mutually beneficial cooperation between our states correspond to the vital national interests of our people and serve the cause of peace and security;
- Confirming our adherence to the goals and principles of the United Nations charter, the Helsinki Final Act, and other documents of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe; and
- Committing ourselves to observe the generally recognized internal norms on human rights and the rights of peoples, We have agreed on the following:

Article 1. The high contracting parties form the Commonwealth of Independent States.

Article 2. The high contracting parties guarantee their citizens equal rights and freedoms regardless of nationality or other distinctions. Each of the high contracting parties guarantees the citizens of the other parties, and also persons without citizenship who live on its territory, civil, political, social, economic, and cultural rights and freedoms in accordance with generally recognized international norms of human rights, regardless of national allegiance or other distinctions.

Article 3. The high contracting parties, desiring to promote the expression, preservation, and development of the ethnic, cultural, linguistic, and religious individuality of the national minorities resident on their territories, and that of the unique ethno-cultural regions that have come into being, take them under their protection.

Article 4. The high contracting parties will develop the equal and mutually beneficial cooperation of their peoples and states in the spheres of politics, the economy, culture, education, public health, protection of the environment, science and trade, and in humanitarian and other spheres will promote the broad exchange of information and will conscientiously and unconditionally observe reciprocal obligations.

The parties consider it necessary to conclude agreements on cooperation in the above spheres.

Article 5. The high contracting parties recognize and respect one another's territorial integrity and the inviolability of existing borders within the Commonwealth.

Article 6. The member states of the Commonwealth will cooperate in safeguarding international peace and security and in implementing effective measures for reducing weapons and military spending. They seek the elimination of all nuclear weapons and universal total disarmament under strict international control.

The parties will respect one another's aspiration to attain the status of a non-nuclear zone and a neutral state.

The member states of the Commonwealth will preserve and maintain under united command a common militarystrategic space, including unified control over nuclear weapons, whose implementation is regulated by a special agreement.

They also jointly guarantee the necessary conditions for the stationing and functioning of, and for material and social provision for, the strategic armed forces. The parties contract to pursue a harmonized policy on questions of social welfare and pensions for members of the services and their families.

Article 7. The high contracting parties recognize that within the scope of their activities, implemented on the equal basis through the common coordinating institutions of the Commonwealth, will be the following:

- cooperation in foreign policy;
- cooperation in forming and developing the united economic area, the common European and Eurasian markets, in the area of customs policy;
- cooperation in developing transport and communication systems;
- cooperation in preservation of the environment and participation in creating a comprehensive international system of ecological safety;
- migration policy issues;
- fighting organized crime.

Article 8. The contracting parties recognize the planetary character of the Chernobyl catastrophe and pledge to unite and coordinate their efforts in minimizing and overcoming its consequences. To these ends they have decided to conclude a special agreement that will evaluate the gravity of the consequences of this catastrophe.

Article 9. Disputes over the interpretation and application of the norms of this agreement are to be resolved through negotiations between appropriate bodies and, when necessary, at the level of the heads of government and state.

Article 10. Each of the high contracting parties reserves the right to suspend the validity of the present agreement or individual articles thereof, after informing the parties to the agreement one year in advance of this decision.

The clauses of the agreement may be added to or amended with the consent of each of the high contracting parties.

Article 11. With the signing of this agreement, the norms of third states, including the former USSR, are not permitted to be implemented on the territories of the signatory states.

Article 12. The high contracting parties guarantee the fulfillment of the international obligations binding upon them from the treaties and agreements of the former USSR.

Article 13. The agreement does not affect the obligations of the high contracting parties with regard to third states. The agreement is open to all members of the former USSR, as well as to other states that share the goals and principles of the agreement.

Article 14. The city of Minsk is the official location of the coordinating bodies of the Commonwealth. The activities of bodies of the former USSR are discontinued on the territories of the member states of the Commonwealth.

Executed in the city of Minsk on 8 December 1991 in three copies each in the Belarusian, Russian, and Ukrainian languages, the three texts being of equal validity.

2.4 Declaration on the New Commonwealth

TASS, 8 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

[Declaration by the Heads of State of the Republics of Belarus, the RSFSR (Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic), and Ukraine]

We, the leaders of the Republics of Belarus, the RSFSR, and Ukraine

-noting that the negotiations to draw up a new Union treaty are deadlocked, that the objective process of secession by republics from the USSR and the formation of independent states have become a reality;

-affirming that the myopic policy of the Center has led to profound economic and political crisis, to the collapse of industry, a catastrophic decline in the living standards of practically all strata of society;

-taking into account the growth in social tension in many regions of the former USSR, which has led to interethnic conflicts with numerous human victims;

-conscious of our responsibility before our peoples and the world community, and of the urgent practical need for implementing political and economic reforms, declare the creation of a community of independent states, in accordance with which an agreement was signed by the parties on 8 December 1991.

The community of independent states, consisting of the republics of Belarus, RSFSR, and Ukraine, is open for accession by all member states of the USSR, as well as by other states that share the aims and principles of the above agreement.

The member states of the community intend to pursue a policy of strengthening international peace and security. They guarantee to honor international obligations contained in treaties and agreements of the former USSR, and to ensure unified control over nuclear weapons and their non-proliferation.

2.5 Declaration on Economic Policy

TASS, 8 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

[Declaration by the governments of the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine on Coordination of Economic Policy]

It is vitally important to maintain and develop the existing close economic links between our states in order to stabilize the situation in the economy and pave the way for economic revival.

The parties have agreed on the following:

- To conduct coordinated radical economic reforms aimed at creating fully fledged market mechanisms, transforming property relations, and insuring freedom of enterprise;
- To refrain from any actions inflicting economic damage upon one another;
- To base economic relations and settlements on the existing unit of currency, the ruble; to introduce national currencies on the basis of special agreements that guarantee observance of the parties' economic interests;

- To conclude an interbank agreement aimed at restricting monetary issues, insuring effective control of the money in circulation, and forming a system of mutual settlements;

- To pursue a coordinated policy of reducing the deficits of the republican budgets;

- To undertake joint action aimed at ensuring unity of the economic space;

- To coordinate foreign economic activity and customs policy, and to ensure freedom of transit;

- To resolve by way of a special agreement the issue of indebtedness of former Union enterprises;

- To agree within ten days on the amounts of and procedures for financing in 1992 expenditures on defense and on eliminating the consequences of the accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power station;

- To request the supreme soviets of the republics, when formulating taxation policy, to take into account the need for coordinating value-added tax rates;

- To facilitate the establishment of joint ventures and joint-stock companies;

- To draw up during December a mechanism for implementing interrepublican economic agreements.

2.6 The Ashkhabad Declaration

TASS, 13 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Declaration of the heads of states of the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and the Republic of Uzbekistan: In accordance with the accords reached at the meetings in Alma-Ata (1990) and in Tashkent (1991), heads of states N.A. Nazarbaev, A.A. Akaev, R.N. Nabiev, S.A. Niyazov, and I.A. Karimov gathered for a routine consultative meeting in Ashkhabad. They discussed the situation that has taken shape since the signing in Minsk of the agreement setting up a Commonwealth of Independent States. Following a comprehensive exchange of views and an analysis of the political situation, those attending the meeting declared the following:

We appreciate the desire of the leaders of the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic, and Ukraine to create, in place of the republics that previously had no rights, independent law-governed states united to form a commonwealth. The Minsk initiative on the creation of a Commonwealth of Independent States, with the participation of Ukraine, is positive. However, this agreement came as a surprise to us.

The participants in the conference agree with the assertion that the process of a new integration of the subjects of the former USSR on the basis of the decisions of the Fifth USSR Congress of People's Deputies has reached a dead end. The Center's shortsighted policy has led to a profound economic and political crisis, the breakdown of production, and a catastrophic decline in the living standards of virtually all strata of society.

The participants in the meeting believe that:

- It is necessary to coordinate efforts to shape the Commonwealth of Independent States.
- The establishment of the Commonwealth of Independent States must be implemented on a lawful basis.
- There must be a guarantee of equal participation by the subjects of the former Union in the process of elaborating decisions and documents on the Commonwealth of Independent States. All the states forming the commonwealth must be recognized as founders and referred to in the text of the agreement as high contracting parties.

-One should take into account in these documents, decisions, and agreements, the historic and socio-economic realities of the republics of Central Asia and Kazakhstan, which, unfortunately, were not considered during the preparation of the agreement on a commonwealth.

-The Commonwealth of Independent States should guarantee the equality of rights of all nations and ethnic groups and the protection of their rights and interests.

-The Commonwealth of Independent States cannot take shape on an ethnic, religious, or any other basis infringing on the rights of individuals or peoples.

-The Commonwealth of Independent States recognizes and respects the territorial integrity and inviolability of presently existing borders.

-In the interests of preserving strategic stability in the world, it is expedient to ensure common control of nuclear weapons and a unified command for strategic defense troops and naval forces.

-It is essential to endorse the treaty concluded earlier on an economic community and to complete work on it.

Proceeding from the above, we declare our readiness to become equal co-founders of the Commonwealth of Independent States, which takes into account the interests of all its subjects. Issues developed within the Commonwealth of Independent States should be examined at a conference of the heads of the sovereign states.

The participants in the consultative meeting acknowledge the fact that Uzbekistan will determine its final position on participating in the Commonwealth after nationwide presidential elections are held on 29 December 1991.

2.7 The Alma-Ata Declaration

21 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The Alma-Ata Declaration was signed by eleven heads of state on 21 December 1991. The purpose of this agreement was to incorporate the five Central Asian countries, two of the Transcaucasian states (Azerbaijan and Armenia) and Moldova into the CIS as members of equal standing with Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine. Because these countries had not participated in the meeting in Belovezha Forest, their leaders were justifiably concerned about their rank in the new Commonwealth. The Central Asian leaders demanded and received assurances in the Alma-Ata Declaration that parity would be the guiding principle of the CIS.

Protocol

The Azerbaijan Republic, the Republic of Armenia, the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, the Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, the Republic of Uzbekistan, and Ukraine, on an equal basis and as high contracting parties, are forming a Commonwealth of Independent States.

The agreement on the creation of a Commonwealth of Independent States enters into force for each of the high contracting parties from the moment of its ratification.

Documents regulating cooperation within the framework of the Commonwealth will be worked out on the basis of the agreement on the Creation of a Commonwealth of Independent States and with consideration for the reservations made during its ratification.

This protocol is a component part of the agreement on the Creation of a Commonwealth of Independent States.

Done in the city of Alma-Ata on 21 December 1991, in one copy each in the Azerbaijani, Armenian, Belarusian, Kazakh, Kyrgyz, Moldovan, Russian, Tajik, Turkmen, Uzbek, and Ukrainian languages. All texts have equal force. The original will be kept in the archives of the government of the Republic of Belarus, which will send the high contracting parties certified copies of this protocol.

Preamble

The independent states:

The Republic of Armenia, the Republic of Azerbaijan, the Republic of Belarus, the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, the Russian Federation, the Republic of Tajikistan, the Republic of Turkmenistan, the Republic of Ukraine, and the Republic of Uzbekistan;

-seeking to build democratic, law-governed states, the relations between which will develop on the basis of mutual recognition and respect for state sovereignty and sovereign equality, the inalienable right to self-determination, principles of equality and non-interference in internal affairs, the rejection of the use of force, the threat of force and economic and any other methods of pressure, a peaceful settlement of disputes, respect for human rights and freedoms, including the rights of national minorities, a conscientious fulfillment of commitments and other generally recognized principles and standards of international law;

-recognizing and respecting each other's territorial integrity and the inviolability of the existing borders;

-knowing that] advantageous cooperation, which has deep historic roots, meets the basic interests of nations and promotes the cause of peace and security;

-being aware of their responsibility for the preservation of civil peace and interethnic accord;

-being loyal to the objectives and principles of the agreement on the creation of the Commonwealth of Independent States;

are making the following statement:

The Declaration

Cooperation between members of the Commonwealth will be carried out in accordance with the principle of equality through coordinating institutions formed on the basis of parity and operating in the way established by the agreements between members of the Commonwealth, which is neither a state nor a supra-state structure.

In order to ensure international strategic stability and security, allied command of the military-strategic forces and unified control over nuclear weapons will be preserved, and the sides will respect one another's desire to attain the status of a non-nuclear and (or) neutral state.

The Commonwealth of Independent States is open, with the agreement of all its participants, to states-members of the former USSR, as well as other states-that share the goals and principles of the Commonwealth.

The allegiance to cooperation in the formation and development of the common economic space, and all-European and Eurasian markets, is being confirmed.

With the formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States the USSR ceases to exist. Member states of the Commonwealth guarantee, in accordance with their constitutional procedures, the fulfillment of international obligations, stemming from the treaties and agreements of the former USSR.

Member states of the Commonwealth pledge to observe strictly the principles of this declaration.

The member states of the Commonwealth, citing Article 12 of the agreement on the Creation of a Commonwealth of Independent States,

Proceeding from the intention of each state to fulfill the obligations set down by the UN charter and to participate in that organization's work as full-fledged members,

In view of the fact that the Republic of Belarus, the USSR and Ukraine were original members of the United Nations,

Expressing satisfaction with the fact that the Republic of Belarus and Ukraine are continuing to participate in the United Nations as sovereign independent states,

Firmly resolved to promote the strengthening of international peace and security on the basis of the UN charter and in the interests of their peoples and the entire international community,

Have declared that:

1. The states of the Commonwealth support Russia in its continuation of the USSR's membership in the United Nations, including the USSR's membership in the Security Council and other international organizations.

2. The Republic of Belarus, the Russian FSR and Ukraine will support the other states of the commonwealth in resolving the question of their full-fledged membership in the United Nations and other international organizations.

2.8 Gorbachev Resigns as USSR President

Moscow Central Television, 25 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Dear compatriots and fellow citizens. Because of the situation that has developed with the formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States, I am ceasing my activity in the post of USSR president. I adopt this decision on principle. I have been firmly in favor of the independence and self-determination of people and for the sovereignty of republics but, at the same time, in favor of preserving the union state and the country's integrity.

Events took a different course. A policy of splitting up the country and disassembling the state—something with which I cannot agree—has prevailed. And after the Alma-Ata meeting and the decisions adopted there, my position on that account has not changed. Besides, I am convinced that decisions of such a magnitude should have been adopted on the basis of a show of will by the people. Nevertheless, I will do everything within my power [to help ensure] that the accords signed there lead to real social harmony and make it easier to emerge from the crisis and to continue the process of reforms.

Addressing you for the last time in my capacity as USSR president, I believe that it is necessary to state my appreciation of the path that has been traveled since 1985, especially as there are quite a few contradictory, superficial, and subjective views on this account.

Destiny saw to it that even when I took charge of the state it was clear that all was not well with the country. There was a lot of everything-land, oil, and gas, other natural wealth, to say nothing of the brains and talent with which it was endowed by God-but still our living standards were far behind those of developed countries, and were slipping farther and farther behind them.

The reason was clear even then: Society was being crushed in the jaws of the command and bureaucratic system. Doomed to serve ideology and to bear the terrible burden of the arms race, it was stretched to the limit of its endurance. All attempts at partial reform-and there were many of them-suffered failure one after the other. The country lost its vision of the future. It was impossible to live like that any longer. What was needed was a radical change. That is why I have never, ever regretted not taking advantage of the post of general secretary merely to reign for a few years. I would have viewed that as irresponsible and amoral. I realized that it was an extremely difficult and even risky business to begin reforms on that kind of scale and in our kind of society. Even today I am convinced of the historical correctness of the democratic reforms begun in the spring of 1985.

The process of renovating the country and the key changes in the world community have turned out to be far more difficult than could have been predicted.

However, what has been done should be assessed on merit. Society has gained freedom and liberated itself politically and socially. This is the main achievement, which we have not yet fully realized because we have not yet learned how to use freedom.

Still, work of historic significance has been done. A totalitarian system, which has long deprived the country of an opportunity to become wealthy and prosperous, has been liquidated. A breakthrough has been made toward democratic transformation. Free elections, a free press, religious freedoms, representative government, and a multiparty system have become a reality. Human rights have been recognized as the highest principle. A movement toward a mixed economy has begun.

Equality of all forms of property is being established. Within the framework of land reform, the peasantry began to revive. Farmers have appeared. Millions of hectares of land have been given to rural inhabitants and city dwellers. Economic freedom for producers has been legalized. Enterprising joint-stock companies and privatization have started to gain force.

As the economy becomes more marketized, it is important to remember that all this is done for the sake of the individual. During this difficult time, everything should be done for his social protection, especially with regard to old people and children.

We are living in a new world. The Cold War is over. The arms race, the insane militarization of the country that disfigured our country, public consciousness, and morality has been halted. The threat of world war has been taken off the agenda.

I want to emphasize again that during the transition period I have done everything possible to retain reliable control of nuclear arms. We have opened to the world and renounced intervention in other people's affairs and the use of troops beyond the borders of our country. In return, we were shown trust, solidarity, and respect.

We have become one of the main strongholds for the transformation of modern civilization by peaceful democratic principles. Peoples and nations have achieved real freedom of choice in seeking their paths toward self-determination. The search for the democratic reform of our multinational state brought us to the threshold of a new Union treaty.

All these changes have demanded a great deal of effort. They came about in a fierce fight in the face of increasing resistance by forces representing what is old, obsolete, and reactionary by the old party and state structures, the economic apparatus, as well as by our habits, ideological prejudices, and the philosophy of leveling down and dependence. They came up against our intolerance, low level of political culture, and fear of change. This is why we have lost so much time. The old system collapsed before the new one could start working. The crisis in society became even more acute.

I know about the dissatisfaction with the present difficult situation, about the sharp criticism of authorities at all levels and of my own activities. But I want to stress once again: Radical changes in such an enormous country, particularly with such a heritage, cannot happen painlessly, without difficulties and disruptions.

The August coup stretched the general crisis to its utmost limit. The most destructive element in this crisis was the collapse of statehood. Today, too, I am alarmed by our people's loss of their citizenship in a great country. The consequences might be very severe for everybody. I feel that it is vitally important to preserve the democratic gains of recent years. They were achieved through historic and tragic suffering. We must not renounce them under any circumstances. Otherwise, all hope for better things will be buried.

I speak about all this honestly and frankly. This is my moral duty. I want to express my gratitude today to all citizens who supported the policy of renewal in the country and joined in the implementation of democratic reforms. I am grateful to the state, political, and public figures, to millions of people abroad, to those who understood our intentions and supported them, who met us halfway in sincere cooperation with us.

I am leaving office with alarm, but also with hope-with faith in you, your wisdom, and strength of spirit. We are heirs to a great civilization. It depends on each and every one of us now-to see that it is reborn and will have a modern and worthy life.

With all my soul, I wish to thank those who stood alongside me during these years in a just and a good cause. Some mistakes could probably have been avoided and much could have been done better, but I am sure that sooner or later our shared efforts will achieve results. Our people will live in a flourishing and democratic society. I wish every one of you all the best.

2.9 Anuar Alimzhanov Addresses the Final Session of the Supreme Soviet

Radio Mayak, 26 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Esteemed people's deputies! As you will have noticed, the flag of the Soviet Union over the Kremlin was lowered today. Last night we all witnessed how the president-the first president of this great country-resigned.

I do not know how the first session of the Supreme Soviet went or how people there felt, but I imagine that they spoke of great things, of world revolution, of social equality, of socialism, of the dream of advancing to communism. Probably there were many good, kind, and fine words there about the future of this vast country.

History has decreed that today I should participate in the last meeting of this body. Let us say plainly that what we dreamed of and spoke of at that first session has not come to pass. There was obviously talk there that by building communism we were skipping entire historical epochs; but it turned out that it is not possible to skip epochs in history. We have again turned toward capitalism; probably not toward a developed form of it, but perhaps toward its least-tamed form.

All this is history. All this is our life. Speaking about the past, of course, we must also give due tribute to the fact that, in fulfillment of the great dream spoken of at that first session, people gave up their lives. The totalitarian system took away the most elite part of our people, our young people. Herein lies its fatal nature.

But there were also victories. There was also unity. There were also exploits. Today we have reached the stage where the old has been destroyed and the new is beginning. We understand perfectly well what we have lost; what will be, we are not yet aware of. However that may be, a new Commonwealth of Independent States has been formed. This is a new phenomenon in world history. What it will show, for the time being, one can only guess at and think about. We would like this new phenomenon to preserve the very best traits of democracy, of a commonwealth of peoples. We would like it to lead people truly along a democratic path, toward social equality, toward an improvement of people's lives, avoiding war and confrontation.

This is our last meeting. Newspapers have written about our previous meetings, that we had missed the boat and that we were dragging out the funeral, but that is the journalists' business. I think that the journalists are also in some kind of crisis now-not all, of course, but there are those who are somehow beginning to dance around the lion that has not yet been slain. In this sense, however it may be, whatever is said, it is precisely our chamber that has held out until the end. I think it has fulfilled its civic duty and the duty of deputies. It has justified the trust of our sovereign republics.

I wanted our president to resign in a human way. Whatever he is, he is a man of history. It is not up to us to judge. Today it is still too early to speak of the past. Nevertheless, as the president resigned yesterday before the entire nation, as the flag of the Soviet Union has been lowered, this means we have the full moral right today to complete our business constitutionally with a clear conscience and to hold our last sitting.

You remember that at the last meeting we had a few questions left concerning comrades being relieved of their posts that had been ratified by the Supreme Soviet. We should discuss this. Prior to this, we should discuss the draft of our declaration, of our decision. It seems to me now that even if anyone has any remarks, addenda, or wishes, we should first discuss our declaration.

I started in a businesslike way, because registering is important, not only because this is our last meeting, but to show that there is a quorum here, if journalists are interested. There is even a quorum from Belarus, which has called back its deputies, over ten people. Present are representatives of Ukraine. Present here are all Central Asian republics and Kazakhstan. Present are deputies, people's deputies of the Soviet Union who have the right to be here at this last final meeting, the final stage of our parliament's work.

Therefore, with a clear conscience we can set about completing our business. That is to draft a declaration ending the USSR and setting up the Commonwealth of Independent States. We have examined the draft. Remarks were voiced. It is necessary to discuss this now. Perhaps someone has an addendum. How shall we adopt it-wholly or in parts?

2.10 Further on the Union Dissolution

Interfax, 26 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

On Thursday, 26 December, the House of the Republics of the Soviet parliament passed a declaration on the dissolution of the USSR and the formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States saying that “relying on the will expressed by the top elected bodies of state power of Azerbaijan, Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Ukraine to form the Commonwealth of Independent States the House of the Republics announces the dissolution of the USSR after the ratification of the agreement on the formation of the Commonwealth by said states.”

The House of the Republics urged the top elected bodies and heads of Commonwealth states to do their utmost to guarantee the rights and liberties of people irrespective of their nationality, the peaceful cohabitation of Commonwealth peoples, the democratic development of their states. ...

The last session of the upper house of parliament also passed a resolution relieving members of the USSR Supreme Court, the USSR Supreme Court of Arbitration, and the Office of the USSR Procurator, and their staffs, of their duties as of 2 January 1992 in connection with the closure of Union government bodies.

For the same reason the chairman of the USSR State Bank, Viktor Gerashchenko, and his first deputy, Valerian Kulikov, have been dismissed.

The House of the Union decided on 23 December not to hold any more sessions.

2.11 Stanislav Shushkevich Previews Minsk Summit Meeting

Oleg Stepanenko and Aleksandr Ulitenok
Pravda, 30 December 1991 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpts

[Pravda]: This is probably the first time since the war that we have greeted the New Year in such an anxious situation.

[Shushkevich]: Yes, the times now are complex and difficult. But they are crucial times. Now it is most important not to plunge into despair. We have everything in order to build a life worthy of man: industrious, skilled hands, a bright intellect, and a strengthening sense of national awareness. In addition, not only destructive processes are under way; creative ones have begun, too. I mean the creation of the CIS. The idea born in Belarus three weeks ago has already found not only broad support but also practical embodiment.

[Pravda]: Stanislav Stanislavovich, what place will the upcoming meeting of the leaders of eleven states occupy in this rapidly developing process?

[Shushkevich]: It is hard to answer unequivocally. In Alma-Ata we agreed that eight basic documents would be prepared. Strange though this may seem, the document defining the procedure for reorganizing the armed forces strikes me as the most important in this package. It is necessary to have a clear idea of their present state and of the plans for the phased transfer of military subunits to qualitatively new structures. I also hope that questions of the Commonwealth's charter will also be agreed on, at least conceptually. We might also manage to sign a document on the CIS institutions, because it is on this matter that we still lack full unanimity on certain questions, although, if you take an unbiased look at reality, you cannot particularly count on this in such organs.

[Shushkevich]: No, intensive work on the documents is being done in literally all the CIS members....

[Pravda]: Stanislav Stanislavovich, are the leaders of the allied states being strengthened in their realization that what is needed is an adequate degree of integration, which will not disrupt the natural relations that have evolved over decades and centuries? Or is what we call the “war of sovereignties” breaking out among some of them?

[Shushkevich]: I will dwell on what is most important: borders. They must be open to all citizens. This question has already been virtually resolved. From the viewpoint of organizing the economy, there are two competing approaches. First, there is an undoubted realization that without integration we will experience exceptionally hard times. Second, the republics cannot find their feet as sovereign states if all the so-called integration structures from the past are preserved. Therefore a fundamentally new approach is needed here. What is the problem? A juridical, legislative vacuum has formed, and an initial normative basis is needed. Even if we work out very few principles and conclude very few treaties, we still need a mechanism and an organ of control with very clear-cut and effective sanctions for violating or failing to fulfill what we outlined together....

[Shushkevich]: Since we are building rule-of-law states and a rule-of-law commonwealth, everything must be resolved legally. I get the impression that even Russia itself is convinced that, in general, it cannot occupy a worthy position on the principle of great-powerism. Russia is great in itself. Its greatness must not, in my opinion, be increased by diktat.

Moreover, there is a very easy way out of the commonwealth. The commonwealth, if something were to happen, could turn away from Russia.

[Pravda]: The economic situation causes the greatest alarm. Will the problem of coordinating economic programs and reforms arise at the conference?

[Shushkevich]: The first idea is expressed in the old style: to maintain deliveries at least at last year's level of 70 percent, and so forth. To be honest, I do not see any innovations in these premises that would tally with the idea of a political Commonwealth-I cannot see them! I believe that the governments will find a different approach in accordance with the new realities. I do not rule out the possibility that there might not be an overall accord, because there simply must be normal economic relations among sovereign states. But accords must definitely be mutual on the level of inflation, which at once determines spending quotas. Stern measures are needed here. For, if there are none, the Commonwealth could lose its meaning, as then the introduction of national currencies is inevitable. This is virtually a process of disintegration. This is why a fully agreed mechanism of expenditure quotas is needed. It is necessary to rule out legislatively, on the basis of treaties, an improvement in your own position at your neighbor's expense. Questions of your own well-being must be resolved by honest labor. Otherwise there will be no equality. Account should be taken of the fact that there are differences in natural resources, in the republics' levels of development.... Perhaps this is why there must be some kind of a correction, for current members of the Commonwealth are sometimes to blame for the state of other members' economies.

[Pravda]: But a confidential approach is not an economic category. Economics operates on the basis of self-interest, which is frequently at odds with your neighbor's interests. Clearly, the Commonwealth and its institutions must somehow regulate the balance of interests, after the EEC [European Economic Community] model, for example.

[Shushkevich]: You see, the EC [European Community] includes more reliable autonomous structures, if I may call the states this. They already knew how to manage their domestic affairs, and they have only improved their position thanks to the joint resolution of certain tasks. But we have taken refuge in joint management and built such unreliable, distant economic ties that it is simply terrible.

[Shushkevich] A general prescription is impossible here. For monopoly is sometimes not an economic necessity but a consequence of a past subjective approach. Why, for example, had attention previously focused only on oil extraction in Tyumen? Kazakhstan ranks fifth in the world in terms of known reserves, and oil extraction could have been developed more intensively right there. A redistribution of effort will probably be needed—for we, Ukraine, and Russia all sent our specialists to Tyumen.....

But the question is this: Where are investments more profitable? It must be resolved neither out of considerations of the former, central morality nor according to this principle: "We have seen a place, one of the powers-that-be liked it, and so let us invest billions and build it up." Such mobilization of means is impossible now and cannot be squeezed out the way it used to be. We are taking the path of normal management, which is approaching market management. This must be resolved not by new structures, but what is needed is bilateral, trilateral, and quadrilateral treaties, on the basis of which joint economic projects will be implemented. There is no need to create special economic structures for this.

[Shushkevich]: I am, in general, an optimist by nature, and I know that nothing will come of it if you immediately react with great alarm. I react with hope. I would not have gotten into this business at all if I had not been confident that it was necessary to take precisely this path....

2.12 Agreement on Council of Heads of State and Heads of Government

Editor's Note: A provisional agreement on the membership and conduct of Councils of Heads of State and Heads of Government was concluded between the members of the Commonwealth on 30 December 1991. Boris Yeltsin was unanimously elected chairman of the Council of Heads of State. This set a precedent for all subsequent steering committees and councils, which elected Russians as their chairmen. The Russian delegation was also to propose most of the future agreements and protocols to be considered by the Commonwealth member states.

Preamble

The member states of this agreement, guided by the aims and principles of the agreement on the creation of a Commonwealth of Independent States of 8 December 1991 and the protocol to the agreement of 21 December 1991, taking into consideration the desire of the Commonwealth states to pursue joint activity through the Commonwealth's common coordinating institutions, and deeming it essential to establish, for the consistent implementation of the provisions of the said agreement, the appropriate interstate and intergovernmental institutions capable of ensuring effective coordination, and of promoting the development of equal and mutually advantageous cooperation, have agreed on the following:

Article 1. The Council of Heads of State is the supreme body, in which all the member states of the Commonwealth are represented at the level of head of state, for the discussion of fundamental issues connected with coordinating the activity of the Commonwealth states in the areas of their common interests.

The Council of Heads of State is empowered to discuss issues provided for by the Minsk agreement on the creation of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other documents for the development of the said agreement, including the problems of legal succession, which have arisen as a result of ending the existence of the USSR and the abolition of Union structures.

The activities of the Council of Heads of State and of the Council of Heads of Government are pursued on the basis of mutual recognition of and respect for the state sovereignty and sovereign equality of the member states party to the agreement, their inalienable right to self-determination, the principles of equality and non-interference in internal affairs, the renunciation of the use of force and the threat of force, territorial integrity and the inviolability of existing borders, the peaceful settlement of disputes, respect for human rights and liberties, including the rights of national minorities, conscientious fulfillment of obligations and other commonly accepted principles and norms of international law.

Article 2. The activities of the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government are regulated by the Minsk agreement on setting up the Commonwealth of Independent States, the present agreement and agreements adopted in the development of them, and also by the rules of procedure of these institutions.

Each state in the council has one vote. The decisions of the council are taken by common consent.

The official languages of the Councils are the state languages of the Commonwealth states.

The working language is the Russian language.

Article 3. The Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government discuss and, where necessary, take decisions on the more important domestic and external issues.

Any state may declare that it has no interest in a particular issue.

Article 4. The Council of Heads of State convenes for meetings no less than twice a year. The decision on the time for holding and the provisional agenda of each successive meeting of the Council is taken at the routine meeting of the Council, unless the Council agrees otherwise. Extraordinary meetings of the Council of Heads of State are convened on the initiative of the majority of Commonwealth heads of state.

The heads of state take turns chairing the meetings of the Council, according to the Russian alphabetical order of the names of the Commonwealth states.

Meetings of the Council of Heads of State are generally to be held in Minsk. A Council session may be held in another part of the Commonwealth states by agreement among those taking part.

Article 5. The Council of Heads of Government convenes for meetings no less frequently than once every three months. The decision concerning the scheduling of and preliminary agenda for each subsequent meeting is to be made at a routine session of the council, unless the Council arranges otherwise.

Extraordinary sessions of the Council of Heads of Government may be convened at the initiative of a majority of heads of government of the Commonwealth states.

The heads of government take turns chairing the meetings of the Council, according to the Russian alphabetical order of the names of the Commonwealth states.

Meetings of the Council of Heads of Government are generally to be held in Minsk. A Council session may be held in another of the Commonwealth states by agreement among the heads of government.

Article 6. The Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government of the Commonwealth states may hold joint sessions.

Article 7. Working and auxiliary bodies may be set up on both a permanent and an interim basis as decided by the Council of Heads of State and Council of Heads of Government of the Commonwealth states.

These are composed of authorized representatives of the participating states. Experts and consultants may be invited to take part in their sittings.

2.13 Commentary: “Final Attempt” at “Normal Life”

G. Shipitko

Izvestiya, 31 December 1991 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpt

Editor's Note: From the very beginning, it was realized that economic questions would provide the decisive rationale for integrating the former Soviet republics. Although few leaders of the former republics would agree to any arrangement that entailed a loss of sovereignty, economic integration was a major topic of discussion in the first days of the fragile Commonwealth's existence. In this article, Izvestiya's journalist expresses very positive conclusions about the unifying process going on among Commonwealth members.

The meeting of Commonwealth heads of state, which, as is well known, had been preceded by two other meetings, in Minsk and Alma-Ata, began at eleven o'clock on 30 December. Judging by the agenda, the process of the creation of a new Commonwealth is without parallel in the history of state formations and promises to put a stop to the endless question of who will be the legal successor to the collapsed Union. That is a question that vitally concerns not only the millions of people living on our territory of one-sixth of the globe but also, without exaggeration, the entire world community.

So the eleven heads of independent states and the same number of heads of government assembled to answer the question of what basic structure the Commonwealth will adopt. Ten of the thirteen proposed items on the agenda were approved, giving an entirely unambiguous answer-the Commonwealth proposes to have quite firm forms of relations with a set of institutions regulating their relations and common finances to maintain the coordinating institutions. The meeting is discussing agreements on defense questions, on the Commonwealth's television and radio company and its press organ, and on environmental emergencies. The questions of vital interest include an agreement on distributing food purchased with credits from foreign states. The agenda includes questions like temporary measures for the coordinated use of diplomatic and consultative missions, legal succession regarding the former Union's property, and the procedure for signing and implementing agreements on political, economic, scientific and technical, and cultural collaboration among the Commonwealth member states, and also agreements on cooperation in the spheres of culture and space.

... But it has already been learned from sources close to the government that it is proposed to create a foreign ministers committee. It is necessary right now to resolve the exceptionally complex and delicate question of interethnic conflicts. A large group of residents of the Dniester region came to meet with the heads of state from Moldova. They are trying to convince the participants of the need to create an autonomous Dniester republic, independent of Moldova.

... It is easy to see from the list of questions, given a very approximate assessment of the approaches, that the Commonwealth, while remaining independent in its component parts, is seeking in its actions to create fundamental directions toward unity. That is probably the first encouraging conclusion from the conference that has begun in Minsk. Another equally important conclusion is that the future Commonwealth seems finally to be realizing that without a single economic area ... it may not prove viable. I think that is an extremely encouraging fact that holds out a promise to all of us moving away from national economic isolation toward the emergence of economic relations in the future....

In the two hours initially allocated for discussion of the ten questions included on the agenda, it was possible to agree on only one of them-the draft agreement on coordinating institutions....

Today it is clear that the Commonwealth of Independent States is the final attempt to switch to a normal life and join the civilized world. Otherwise everyone is threatened by the unpredictability of economic life, which may reduce society to a crisis from which the way out could be long and difficult.

2.14 “Commonwealth of Uncivilized States” Observed

Mikhail Mayorov

Interfax, 3 January 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Editor's Note: In this article, the reporter expresses the opposite of the preceding conclusion. Conflicting reports and vantage points at the time showed just how difficult the negotiations, and how grave the disagreements, were.

The relationships taking shape within the Commonwealth have been the source of frustration, rather than inspiration, for people in Europe and worldwide. The Minsk summit of 30 December, according to one of Russia's diplomats appointed to assess its results, vividly showed how dangerous nationalism can be if it is adopted as a dominant form of intergovernmental relations. “So far one can speak only of a ‘Commonwealth of Uncivilized States,’ considering the imminent political and military disputes, as well as clashes on property-related and other matters,” the diplomat said.

According to some observers, nationalism is something that has seriously affected every ex-Soviet republic, big and small. Those blaming the present differences exclusively on Ukraine overlook the fact that Russians regard other nationalities with an undue degree of “ethnic superiority”-an attitude particularly conspicuous among those whom the tide of recent political events has brought right into government cabinets.

The fight for ex-USSR property raging between Russia and Ukraine shows that the two newly independent states longing for access to the international political arena still have to learn a lot about the universally accepted “code of behavior.” Ukrainian leaders’ desire to have armed forces of their own is understandable, considering the widespread public sentiments in the republic. On the other hand, the West would much rather have the military stay under centralized command within the ex-Soviet borders. Ukraine, for one, is claiming full control over all the non-nuclear vessels of the Black Sea Fleet-Russia's old-time pride-as well as over three military districts with all their hardware, weapon depots, and firing ranges. The shipyards of Nikolaev, where surface ships and submarines for the Northern and Pacific Fleets used to be assembled, will be transferred to Ukrainian jurisdiction, too.

A senior Russian diplomat who asked not to be identified told journalists that "in terms of its territory, Ukraine is another France, and in terms of its ambitions it's another China." However, Russia's ambitions do not seem to be any more moderate, since the same diplomat insisted that Russia should be proclaimed not only the legal successor of the USSR but also a "continuation state" inheriting the full scope of rights from the ex-Soviet Union. "The other independent states may open foreign missions in whatever form they may choose," the diplomat commented.

... The most experienced and far-sighted observers, far from trying to find out who's right and who's wrong in the Russo-Ukrainian dispute, have been trying to guess how viable the Commonwealth, which they say is still a far cry from an entity fitting that title, may turn out to be. According to Lithuania's deputy head of parliament, Kazimieras Motieka, the Commonwealth will not last long. The Moldovan parliamentarian Ion Tsurkanu does not see any future for the CIS, either.

No comment has come so far from the politician whom the formation of the Commonwealth of Independent States left without a job and who should regard the present situation from the angle “the worse, the better.” But it seems quite possible that Mikhail Gorbachev may one day say something like: “You were unwise enough to prefer Minsk to Novo-Ogarevo; I warned you against it, but you wouldn’t listen.”

2.15 Former Defense Minister Evgeniy Shaposhnikov Interviewed

Interview by Tatyana Sukhomlinova

Rossiia, no. 10, 19-25 April 1995 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpts

Editor’s Note: We have included the following excerpts from an interview with former Defense Minister and Commander General Evgeniy Shaposhnikov because they throw light upon the politics of the collapse of the USSR. Although many republican leaders would have supported a continuation of a Union, Shaposhnikov says they could no longer follow Gorbachev. It can logically be deduced, therefore, that Boris Yeltsin had already become extremely powerful behind the scenes—in typical “Kremlin style.” His remarks also seem to indicate full military compliance with Yeltsin’s wishes, even though Shaposhnikov adamantly believed that the Soviet Armed Forces should have remained intact.

Evgeniy Shaposhnikov always left top jobs at his own initiative, which is very rare in our country and in our times.

“Every time, my departure was a protest of sorts against the fact that I was powerless to influence a particular situation. ...”

In August 1991 he took a stand against the GKChP (State Committee on the State of Emergency), believing that “to a certain extent Afghanistan was both an impetus and a catalyst for the disintegration of the Union. It illuminated very dark sides in our life of the Soviet period.... For me, the GKChP meant a return to those times and methods....

The same August he became USSR minister of defense. He says that he accepted the appointment without particular elation because he realized that this was too heavy a burden. Generally, he had never thought of it: There had never before in the country’s history been any ministers of defense with a background in aviation.

... The military is a powerful force. And that always made it attractive, especially for politicians losing their political influence. Whether a minister of defense wants to or not, he acquires the significance of a political figure. This E. Shaposhnikov found out, so to say, on his own hide.

The marshal is still convinced to this day that there was a way to avoid the disintegration of the USSR after the GKChP [formed].

“I saw that the leaders of Union republics did not so much want not to preserve the Union as they no longer accepted Gorbachev. And he, in my opinion, should have responded to this mood and initiated popular elections of a new national president. I think in this case the Union could have been preserved. In a different form, of course, than before ....”

But everything went the way it went. And on 21 December 1991 the heads of what were then independent states rather than Union republics gathered in Almaty, where it was said: “The strategic forces across the CIS must remain unified, but the armed forces should be divided ....”

E. Shaposhnikov was unequivocally against it. He launched a massive attack and seemed to have won. The leaders decided to return to this subject later.

And they did. On 30 December in Minsk it was decided to divide the armed forces among the CIS components. The ministers of defense, which by then already had been appointed in some republics, and chairmen of defense committees supported their leaders. Only E. Shaposhnikov remained against the idea. And then he wrote the following document.

“To the Heads of Independent States”- Statement

“In connection with the fact that the USSR has ceased to exist, and taking into account that after the abolition of the Ministry of Defense there is no unanimous approach to the organizational development of the collective defense and security of the CIS, and taking into account that no transition period is envisaged in dealing with the questions of creating armed forces by some CIS states, which may cause an explosion among the military servicemen and suffering on the part of their family members, I request to be relieved from my responsibilities as the commander-in-chief of the CIS Unified Armed Forces and to be discharged from the armed forces in accordance with proper procedures.

I do not wish to be a part of this. 30 December 1991.”

“I fought for the CIS to the last bullet,” he says, “because I never thought that we would be infected with this stupidity be divided by borders, oaths, etc. After all, we have lived together for more than just seventy years. ....”

Nevertheless, when he was asked to restore the recently dismembered Union by military force, he refused. The request came from, among others, the USSR president.

E. Shaposhnikov reasoned more or less this way then: The leaders of the CIS countries made a decision, albeit an erroneous one. But they had been elected by their people and acted on the people's behalf.... They signed the Belovezha agreements and denounced the Treaty of 1922. The USSR president resigned on 25 December. Was it up to the military to become a counterbalance to the people? ...

“I rejected all these requests because I was aware that preserving the Union by such means would involve bloodshed, human casualties, and, let me put it plainly, unpredictable consequences ... At the same time I still defended the idea of the CIS and the common armed forces. And some time at the end of 1991, I began to feel I was becoming not too welcome a figure for the Russian leadership .. .”

As E. Shaposhnikov tells it, all of 1992 passed in endless argument in favor of integration. In February he appealed to the leaders of the CIS members, asking them to refrain from forming their own armed forces—primarily in those regions where “hot spots” were flaring up or smoldering. He proposed that CIS interstate peacekeeping forces be formed. The reaction to everything he suggested was silence.

“Then I decided,” says E. Shaposhnikov, “that, if we cannot succeed in having a unified armed forces, then at least let Russia have something. At my prompting, President Yeltsin issued edicts transferring to the jurisdiction of Russia the Western Group of Forces in Germany, the Northern Group of Forces in Poland, the Northwestern Group Forces on the territory of the Baltic states, the troops of the Transcaucasus Military District, the 14th Army troops (I did not succeed in transferring all of it, because Moldova by then had passed a law on the subject), and the entire Black Sea Fleet. But the edict on the fleet was subsequently revoked. As to Chechnya ... because I considered Chechnya a federation component, what was there to divide? (Although I was getting reports that the situation around the garrison was difficult.) That is why we mined approaches to the depots, and sealed the depots....

These days Evgeniy Shaposhnikov is the Russian Federation president's representative at the state company Rosvooruzhenie (Russian armaments). Over the past several years, Russia's influence in the arms market has shrunk somewhat. He does not fully agree with this, however, because usually comparisons are made with the Soviet Period, when the country did not engage in arms trading. "We supplied arms-for slogans, bananas, embraces," says S.E. Shaposhnikov. "It is hard to tell how those $2-3 billion the country did earn were spent. They went to world communism, I think. Rosvooruzhenie was started only in 1993. And Russia immediately achieved a real figure: $2-3 billion. Now we are restoring old ties, entering markets that were not traditionally Russia's Southeast Asia, southern Africa, Latin America, and the Persian Gulf countries. Moreover, the way the situation is developing, we may become partners with some of our competitors, jointly gaining distribution markets."...

... "I am not a member of any political party. I like the RDDR (Russian Democratic Reform Movement), Russia's Democratic Choice, S. Glazyev's DPR (Democratic Party of Russia), and G. Yavlinskiy's movement, and the new political entity headed by B. Fedorov."

The marshal laconically rejected a guess that his political ambitions would be satisfied if some political forces close to him saw in him their presidential candidate:

“I am not suitable for this role.”

An Afterword

Last year, 50,000 published copies of E. Shaposhnikov’s book, The Choice. Memoirs of a Commander-in-Chief did not reach the readers. Somebody somehow “excised” from distribution 48,000 copies. Where are they? Who cast “an eye” on them? Perhaps those who recognize his real or potential strength.

Part II
The Grand Debates: Whither, Whether, and What?

3 Russia's "Great Power" Debate

Introductory Notes

The heart of Russia's "Great Power" debate lies in its search for a post-Soviet identity as a fundamentally new state. What is Russia? Who are the Russians? What will Russia's relationship be with the other former Soviet republics? Will the country's leadership choose to develop a modern, Western-style democracy operating from within the existing boundaries of the Russian Federation, or will it revert to an imperial policy? The disintegration of the Soviet Union left many in Russia's upper echelons feeling frustrated, depressed, and powerless-their country now being (from their point of view) devoid of its historical greatness as the former seat of a vast multiethnic empire, evolved from several centuries of aggressive colonization of contiguous territories and their conversion to a religious and dynastic culture that constituted the "Russian myth." <sup>1</sup>

It now appears that nationalism has started to fill the ideological void left by the dissolution of the Soviet empire. Unable to accept the loss of two empires, the nationalists who wish to restore Russia's Great Power status are seeking a "foreign" policy that will compensate for the losses. Many Russian nationalists have become jaded about the promises made in the name of Western democracy and prosperity. They are trying to define just how extensive Russia's real military, political, and economic power ought to be within the fragile CIS (and elsewhere).

The documents in Chapter 3 have been selected to illustrate the debate among the Russian political and economic elite (which are often the same group) on the issues surrounding Russian identity and power projection in the “near abroad.”

The Great Power debate contains many sub-issues. This chapter documents six of these-with speeches, interviews, and press commentaries by key members of parliament, the press, the military high command, and the intellectual elite.

The first issue is what constitutes Russia’s post-communist geostrategic space. Will borders be redrawn? Instead of being bordered to the west by Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Romania as the USSR was, the Russian Federation, as defined by Soviet Party organs, is bordered to the west by Estonia, Latvia, Belarus, and Ukraine and to the south by the Transcaucasus and Central Asia. The problem being raised by several political groups in Russia is essentially whether the government ought to in some way reconstitute the territories governed by the tsars before 1917 and by the Soviet Union after 1922. Given the dubious constitutionality of the new commonwealth and the nondemocratic nature of Boris Yeltsin’s second presidency, solutions to this question vary greatly from group to group depending on political and economic orientation.

Partially related to the above is the second issue, namely that of Russia’s self-proclaimed obligation to maintain peace in “hot spots” throughout the territory of the former USSR. Russian leaders have sought both CSCE and United Nations legitimization of Russia's role as "peacekeeper" in the post-Soviet space. Leaders of the non-Russian CIS states, as shown in this chapter, take an ambiguous position on the presence of Russian troops in their countries. Some feel the need of Russian military assistance, but they fear the loss of political sovereignty this entails. Below the surface lies evidence that Russia has been exacerbating some of these violent conflicts in order to keep the other CIS states weak and receptive to its military and economic influence. Peacekeeping is an important component of the power debate in Russia. It will, in fact, be the most important determinant of whether democratic principles of international relations and engagement will be observed by Russia in the CIS strategic space.

A third Great Power issue is the acrimonious debate over Russian "minority rights" within the other CIS states, and who in the CIS states should receive dual citizenship (Russian in addition to that of the state in which the person is living). This issue addresses a very real dilemma-that of almost 26 million Russians who find themselves living "in foreign countries" following the collapse of the USSR. Still, the issue quickly became part of the Great Power debate when Russia unilaterally declared a policy of "dual citizenship" and began to encourage all Russian-speaking peoples living outside Russia to apply to the Russian consulate in their state for Russian citizenship! Such "citizens" are looked upon as "compatriots" by some participants in Russia's foreign policy debate, as illustrated in the Izvestiya article by Valeriy Rudnev (7 September 1992) contained in this chapter (3.22).

A fourth issue simmering beneath the surface of the Great Power debate is: “Should the Commonwealth become a new Soviet Union?” As the economic hardships of the transition to market economics become chronic, many politicians, professionals, and common people in Russia find comfort in lamenting the breakup of the Soviet Union. The former communists of Russia are expert at manipulating these sentiments, and openly espouse a program of reestablishing the Soviet Union. The liberal democrats, who initially accepted the collapse of the USSR and respected the “universal principle” of equal treatment, now find themselves faced with widespread sentiment within Russia for molding the CIS into a second Union.

The question of a renewed Union raises the fifth issue that of “collective security.” If the Commonwealth should be transformed into some sort of Russian-dominated confederation or federation, what will be the new organization’s external borders? The new Russian military doctrine, promulgated in November 1993, confirms Russia’s “right to export its troops” and contains many vaguely worded, but very aggressive readiness measures. This issue has heated up inside Russia since Yeltsin’s invasion of Chechnya, especially in reaction to the “war party” which seemed to heavily influence the Kremlin’s policy. (The “War Party” is a name used by the press to refer to military-nationalists; a press account of this group’s influence is documented here in 3.30).

In recent years, the Great Power debate has shifted ground from deliberation over Russia's past greatness to the definition of Russia's "special interests" in the CIS states, and whether these interests are legitimate, or merely another way to claim hegemonic power over the Commonwealth member states. This question has been vigorously debated in Russia since December 1993, following the election of large numbers of neo-Communists, Fascists, and Nationalists to the State Duma.

The political factions grappling with these issues inside Russia may be grouped, for the sake of simplicity, under four major headings: (a) the Western-oriented neo-democrats; (b) a large and disparate group of conservative nationalists-dubbed "national-patriots"; (c) the "pragmatic nationalists," who claim to adopt a moderate liberal position on foreign policy and Russian statehood issues; and (d) the neo-Communists and Fascists who adopt extremist, fringe positions, especially on questions of Russia's military role, external borders, and imperial destiny.

The Neo-Democrats

The neo-democrats assumed positions of power when Boris Yeltsin was elected first president of Russia, in June 1990. Egor Gaydar took control of Yeltsin's economic reform programs, stressing free markets and prices and self-correcting distributional patterns. Andrey Kozyrev became the principal architect of the Russian democrats' foreign policy, which stressed Western humanitarian, non-expansionist values and focused heavily on relations with the United States. This policy endorsed "equal status" among the newly independent states of the Commonwealth, supporting in essence Ukraine's approach to the CIS as the facilitator of a "civilized divorce" among the former Soviet republics. In their speeches and articles, Kozyrev and a small group of Yeltsin advisers and cabinet ministers tried to project a new ideology onto Russian foreign-policy-making-cleansed of Russian chauvinism and rooted in the democratic principles of international relations. They especially counted on Russia's rapid economic transformation and integration into world organizations to restore Russia to the great power status for which many Russians yearned.

Chapter 3 contains several statements that illustrate the political philosophy and policy positions held by prominent democrats surrounding Yeltsin. Stanislav Kondrashov writes (15 January 1992) that "the Commonwealth is vitally necessary-to eradicate the imperial mentality and at the same time to preserve-under different, democratic, conditions-the geopolitical and geostrategic area that ethnic Russians and Russian citizens have grown accustomed to for centuries." A statement by Yeltsin (22 February 1992) defends his government against charges that it is ignoring national interests. The democrats' position on Russia's borders within the CIS is addressed here by Dmitriy Furman. Most importantly, a long article in which Andrey Kozyrev explains his foreign policy philosophy and priorities appears here (20 August 1992) as the centerpiece of the neo-democratic "doctrine." Sergey Shelov-Kovedyaev, Kozyrev's principal deputy in 1992, gives us an insight into working conditions within his ministry and describes the struggle being waged over Russia's use of its armed forces in the CIS.

sharp rebuttal to the Supreme Soviet's ever-increasing challenge to his power and authority. This is Kozyrev's last attempt to defend Western liberal democratic principles of international engagement for Russia. The opposition (see "National Patriots" below) has by this time become so entrenched that he is forced to recant not long afterward, hoping perhaps to limit the damage to his former vision. The third piece included here by Kozyrev (22 September 1993) shows a completely different person, who defends the use of Russian soldiers in "hot spots" on former Soviet territory: "Owing to its close historical, political, cultural and other ties with the neighboring states, Russia could not- nor does it have the moral right to-remain indifferent to their requests for help in ensuring peace.” Likewise, in a 20 January 1994 paper delivered at a conference on Russia and the Commonwealth, Kozyrev staunchly defends Russia’s “special role” in other CIS states. (On 8 February 1993, Russia’s ambassador to Ukraine demands dual citizenship for Russians living in Ukraine, and warns that Russia could halt fuel deliveries if Kyiv does not accept Russia’s proposals. This ultimatum shows just how hardline the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has become on the issue of Russian dominance.)

Another example of the Russian Foreign Ministry’s about-face in policy toward the other CIS states after September 1993 is the letter sent by the Ministry to the British Embassy claiming control over the Caspian Sea’s oil and gas resources. That letter asserts Russia’s unrelenting determination to prevail in “pipeline politics.” Finally, the chapter provides two 1995 press accounts of Moscow’s new CIS integration policies.

The National-Patriots

The clash between the Russian White House and the Supreme Soviet in the aftermath of the collapse of the Soviet Union was entirely predictable. The Supreme Soviet deputies had been elected in 1990, when the Communist Party was still the strongest local organization in most Russian towns and oblasts. Most of these legislators were communist nationalists who had fought against Gorbachev’s reforms and the Union Treaty drafted at Novo-Ogarevo. They included such people as Vice President Aleksandr Rutskoy (whose views are represented in this chapter) and chairman of the Supreme Soviet Ruslan Khasbulatov, who were both unwilling to come to terms with the breakup of the Soviet Union. Although some of these people, like Khasbulatov, had originally supported Boris Yeltsin, they disagreed with Kozyrev's Western tilt and strongly opposed his lack of any plan for reintegrating the non-Russian CIS states.

As soon as the ink was dry on the Commonwealth Declaration, the national-patriots 2(those who combined nationalist sentiments with the desire to restore Russia as a Great Power) criticized Yeltsin's foreign policies for being servile to United States influence, irresponsible on the Russian economy, and wrong to allow the ties between the former Soviet republics to lapse. Yuriy Glukhov documents this side of the debate in his Pravda article of 24 February 1992.

Another influential member of the national-patriots, Evgeniy Ambartsumov (chairman of the Supreme Soviet Committee for International Affairs and Foreign Economic Relations), directly calls for a hard line with the former Soviet republics in an interview given in April 1992. In his view, Russia cannot afford to be as "civilized" with the turbulent CIS states as it is with Western governments. He demands that the Foreign Ministry defend Russia's interests in the "near abroad," and implies that this cannot be accomplished with "agreements" alone. Like most national patriots, Ambartsumov employs the emotional issue of the rights of Russians living in the other CIS countries to pummel Kozyrev's Foreign Ministry. He even expresses sympathy for the Dniester Republic, where separatist Russians living in Moldova have declared independence with backup from the former Soviet 14th Army under the command of Lt.- Gen. Aleksandr Lebed. Russia has adopted a policy of disclaiming involvement in the Dniester affair, combined with obvious behind-the-scenes support for the breakaway region. (See CIS Hot Spots, Appendix A.)

On 15 June 1992 Ruslan Khasbulatov takes matters into his own hands and declares a Russian foreign policy of intervention into the ethnic conflict between South Ossetia and Georgia (at the time not a member of the CIS). Using the excuse of refugees flowing across Russia's borders, he accuses Georgia of genocide and asks the Supreme Soviet to approve a state of emergency in North Ossetia, thus allowing Russia to send troops to the border. Khasbulatov's statement and the Supreme Soviet's state of emergency declaration are provided here. (For Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze's response to this bold move, see Chapter 4.)

Such blasts from the Congress were echoed in political groups such as Aleksandr Rutskoy's "Free Russia Peoples' Party." In a piece written for Rossiyskaya Gazeta Vasiliy Lipitskiy, who chairs the party, calls for a Russian foreign policy oriented away from the West and toward the ex-Soviet and Eastern European states as well as toward Saudi Arabia, the Persian Gulf states, and Taiwan for economic aid. He castigates Kozyrev for meekly accepting almost as a fait accompli the increasing influence of Turkey, Iran, and Afghanistan in Central Asia. In his diatribe, he outlines the basic tenets of a Eurasianist foreign policy, in which Russia would take on the role of a Eurasian rather than a European "Great Power."

These kinds of critical attacks continued in an ever more serious vein throughout 1992 and 1993. On 30

June 1992 Kozyrev presented his vision of Russia's foreign policy before a closed session of Ambartsumov's Committee. In response, Ambartsumov issued his "recommendations" in the form of a White Paper on Foreign Policy, which opens with the following statement: "The Russian Foreign Ministry does not have an integral concept of its foreign policy in either nearby or distant foreign parts." Konstantin Eggert, in an interesting article provided here from Izvestiya, 8 August 1992, characterizes Ambartsumov's foreign policy as Russia's "Monroe Doctrine."

In March 1993, Aleksandr Rutskoy wrote that the CIS was not working. In his article he argues that Russia lost too much in the breakup of the Soviet Union—seaports and critical economic ties. He instructs Russia to take into account the “historically determined interlacing of the (CIS) economies, the problems of their common “Union” and ... the multinational character of their population.” The article is a more modest version of what were to become his later views.

Another article provided here, from Novaya Ezhednevnyaya Gazeta, illustrates how national patriots often combined their opposition to Yeltsin’s liberal economic reform policies with opposition to his government’s foreign policy, interchangeably blaming one upon the other. Oleg Bogomolov writes in June 1993 of his disagreements with the Chicago school of economics, in which Egor Gaydar was educated, and about his severe disagreements with Yeltsin’s foreign policies.

Yeltsin reaches a point in October 1993 at which he can no longer pretend to work with the parliament. Up to then, Yeltsin and Kozyrev managed to sustain their control over the broad outlines of foreign policy. However, the Supreme Soviet belligerently insists on a definitive role in foreign policy decisions. On October 4, Yeltsin orders parliament to close its doors and decrees that the country will hold new parliamentary elections in December. He wins compliance with this order only with the help of the Russian Army, which fires on almost one hundred deputies who refuse to dissolve the Supreme Soviet, among them Vice President Rutskoy and Ruslan Khasbulatov as leaders of the insubordinate action.

The elections, this time to the State Duma-a new legislature instituted in December 1993 under a new constitution-bring new surprises and challenges. The Russian people elect a large contingent of conservative nationalists, including neo-communists and national-patriots, but most shockingly, the radical right, led by Vladimir Zhirinovskiy (whose party is misleadingly called the “Liberal Democratic Party”) wins almost 30 percent of the vote. Yeltsin is forced to compromise with these political forces and evidence points to the fact that not only the “Red-Browns” in parliament, but also the military, begin to play a far greater role from that time on in Russia’s foreign policy decisions.

The growing influence of the national-patriots over Russian foreign policy was clearly demonstrated in the new military doctrine promulgated in November 1993. The documents included here describe that doctrine and the view that the “hawks” had won in a decisive political battle over its drafting. The doctrine introduces a new component into Russia’s foreign policy. (The contents of this doctrine are documented at some length in Chapter 9.) This is the concept of “peacekeeping”—an idea becoming popular in the West following the dissolution of the Soviet Union. Yuliy Vorontsov, permanent Russian representative to the United Nations, announces on 19 November 1993 that Russia is to become “peacekeeper” in the CIS, which it claims as its “sphere of influence.” Russia has tried to obtain the UN’s approval of its “peacekeeping” obligation, but has not succeeded in making it an official UN position.

In 1994 and 1995 the national-patriots stepped up their political activities, hoping to win in the next Russian parliamentary elections in late 1995 and in the presidential election scheduled for June 1996. Oleg Bogomolov, in an article contained here from Kommersant (15 July 1994), advocates a more rapid economic reintegration of what he calls the “post-Soviet zone.” He bases his arguments on the premise that the disruption of interenterprise relations and trade has caused economic crises in the CIS countries. (Other experts believe the crisis was already occurring when the Soviet Union broke up and was deepened in some areas, but dispelled in others by the formation of the CIS.) Bogomolov’s views have figured prominently in Russian hard-line economic pressure tactics to accelerate CIS economic integration policies since early 1993. In June 1993, the Russians proposed that the CIS form a supranational “Interstate Economic Committee” (IEC). This was the first suggestion to give any CIS organization supranational powers. Ukraine and Uzbekistan immediately rejected the proposal. Turkmenistan said it preferred not to give CIS organizations such powers. The other states, for the most part, have gone along with the proposal, saying it is time to implement some of the four hundred-odd agreements signed within the Commonwealth.

Upon his release from Lefortovo prison in July 1994, Aleksandr Rutskoy formed a new movement called “Power.” He defines the goals of this movement quite explicitly in an interview provided here with the Prague publication, Lidove Noviny, as being to restore Russia’s innate status as the dominant Eurasian state.

The last three articles in the section provide interesting insights into the anti-American views that have proliferated since Russia’s adoption of its imperialist course; the role of the “war party” in Yeltsin’s White House (especially over Chechnya policy); and Russian fears of espionage on the part of certain other CIS states.

The Pragmatic Nationalists

The third group of important players in Russia's foreign policy struggle comprises what might be called the "pragmatic nationalists." Georgiy Arbatov defines this group as follows:

Although they are quite Westernized in their upbringing and outlook, they are in most cases distinguished by a more realistic, even pragmatic attitude toward Russia, the West, and the world at large. In the Foreign Ministry, such an attitude is shared by the ambassador to the United States, Vladimir Lukin; indeed most of the liberal Foreign Ministry officials who rose during the Shevardnadze years would subscribe to this position. 3

Arbatov identifies as members of this group: parliamentarians Aleksandr Peskunov, Evgeniy Kozhokhin, and Aleksey Tsarev; older-generation diplomats and intellectuals such as Arbatov himself, Roald Sagdeev, Oleg Bogomolov, Stanislav Shatalin, and Nikolai Petrakov; and younger academics such as Grigoriy Yavlinskiy, Aleksey Arbatov, Sergey Rogov, Aleksandr Konovalov, Sergey Oznobistchev, Emil Payin (Yeltsin's advisor on separatist politics), Leonid Vasilev, and Pavel Baev.

The pragmatic nationalists began to make their influence felt in the foreign policy debate in late 1992 and 1993, and especially after the elections to the State Duma. Recognizing that the impasse between the executive and legislative branches could not be allowed to continue, members of this group intervened to make Russian nationalism more palatable to the West as well as to participants in the Russian debate and in other CIS countries. This relatively small group of intellectuals was able to successfully recast the position of the national-patriots into acceptable, pragmatic terms. The first change, upon which they based their political identification, was to substitute the jargon of "Russian special interests" in the CIS for Russian "Great Power" interests. Arbatov refers to this group as "moderate liberals." They categorically dismiss as "romantic" and "idealistic" the early democratic principles espoused by the liberal democrats. Nevertheless, they leave fairly open the definition of what Russia's "special interests" are, and they make it quite clear that they agree with the national-patriots on the question of whether to use Russian military force when and if necessary to advance those interests. This group is able, by early 1994, to win Andrey Kozyrev's subscription to its views.

One of the pragmatic nationalists' principal spokesmen is the former Russian ambassador to the United States, Vladimir Lukin. In the interview and two articles by Lukin that are presented here, he defines his concept of Russian nationalism and his idea of Russia's role in the Commonwealth. He offers pragmatic concepts, saying Russia should distance itself from the United States and Western liberalism in general, but acknowledges that there is a European side to the Russian soul. He calls for a strong Russian government administrative bureaucracy, led by the intelligentsia, whose mission would be to create a single economic space within the Commonwealth. He does not address what this would mean for the sovereignty of each state, although the implication is that each should willingly sacrifice its sovereignty for access to the protection and resources of Russia. In 1995, Lukin argues the dangers of the international principle of "self-determination" (17 February 1995). Warning of the trouble it can bring to the region for many years to come, Lukin states that Russia should adopt a clear policy of using force in the Commonwealth states, and that "the more convincing it is, the less it will have to be resorted to." Lukin's writings illustrate the dilemma of the moderates-who wish to uphold the sovereignty of the new republics, but foresee the potential for chaos and turbulence in these territories for years to come and realize that Russia's vital interests as a world power remain entangled with all of these new states.

The last document in this section, an interview with the Russian Federation Minister for Cooperation with the CIS states, Valeriy Serov, illustrates the extent to which the official government position on integration within the CIS agrees with the moderate nationalist position. That policy, however, remains a confusing combination of advances and retreats on the imperial front.

The “Reds” and the “Browns” comprise the fourth general category of participant in Russia’s Great Power debate. These are the extreme-left Communist Party of the Russian Federation and the extreme-right nationalist groups, such as Vladimir Zhirinovskiy’s Liberal Democrats and the overt Russian fascists. Russia’s right-wing fringe advocates a Russian state that is centralized, authoritarian, and expansionist. Its proponents reject the multinational Russian Federation in favor of a single ethnic state, with one culture and one language. Their vision of a strong Russia, supported by a strong military, is aggressively Eurasianist, supporting a vigorous expansion southward and eastward by military campaign. The “Browns” supporters include a large segment of the military and large numbers of frustrated nationalists whose support cannot be enlisted by the communists, the democrats, or the moderates. Their greatest threat to Russia’s fragile democracy at this time lies in their skillful political game of leading other groups into adopting increasingly conservative policies as they compete for the votes of an increasingly nostalgic populace.

Chapter 3 provides several examples of Russian right-wing extremist positions on issues in the Great Power debate, including Communist Party Chairman Gennadiy Zyuganov's political report to the Third Communist Party Congress.

The documents in Chapter 3 provide key highlights of almost four years of foreign policy toward the "near abroad" in post-Soviet Russia. The documents give points of reference in the struggle that has engulfed Russia's political and intellectual elite, and much of the population at large. Right-wing forces have made obvious gains in the debate, tempered by the ideas of the center-right. For the time being, the former communists have most cleverly manipulated the yearnings of the bulk of the Russian people for stability and the return of social supports offered by the state. Chechnya, however, raises new questions about who controls Russia's foreign policy, as well as about why Chechnya was attacked so ferociously, and how the political premises and precedents set in Chechnya might affect Russian foreign policy in the future. (See CIS Hot Spots, Appendix A.)

Notes

1. The Russian “myth” refers to the dynastic ideology of Russian imperialism under early tsars, such as Ivan the Terrible, Peter the Great, and Catherine the Great, who claimed to rule by divine right. These tsars captured large numbers of peasants and lands surrounding Muscovy and “Russified” them more through religious conversion and dynastic paternalism than through nationalism in its modern sense. Captured lands and peoples were often divided among Russian nobles as rewards for military service and other favors. Through this process, a sense of “Russianness” became rooted in many of the nations surrounding the ancient principalities of Muscovy.

2. Grigory Arbatov, in his article “Russian Foreign Policy Alternatives,” International Security, Vol. 18, Fall 1993, pp. 5-6, identifies some of the more prominent members of the national-patriot group, including: former Chief of the Yeltsin Security Council Yuriy Skokov, Vice Premiers Oleg Lobov and Mikhail Malei, Sergey Karaganov, Andrey Zubov, Sergey Stankevich, Andranik Migranian, and Aleksandr Tsipko.

The Neo-Democrats

3.1 Article Assesses Role of the Commonwealth, Peace

Stanislav Kondrashov

Izvestiya, 15 January 1992 [FBIS Translation]

The television Channel 1 has cited the figures from a poll according to which less than one-third of the people now believe in the stability of the CIS [Commonwealth of Independent States]. The distrust was aggravated by the recent debates between Russia and Ukraine over the Black Sea Fleet. The idea of the CIS is centripetal (albeit without a center) and unifying, yet practice continues to be centrifugal. Currently, this suits some leaders and politicians, but by no means the peoples who are quite reluctant to fight. Yet without the Commonwealth there will be no real peace between the independent states.

To explain this there is no need even to look at the example of Yugoslavia as it unfolds before our eyes or even closer at the example of Azerbaijan and Armenia. You just have to imagine a new-and as yet unpublished-map on which instead of the single Soviet Union there are fifteen independent states. And to take a look around with Russian eyes, remembering history. That of course is difficult-looking with new Russian eyes and not the “common” Soviet eyes, and perception lags behind events but perhaps it should be made to catch up to avoid trouble.

What we can see in Russian on this map is not like what we saw in the USSR. Of the former neighboring states only Norway, Finland, Mongolia, and China remain. The USSR was closer to Western Europe than Russia is now-closer physically. The USSR bordered on Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Romania.

Russia borders on Estonia, Latvia, Belarus, and Ukraine. It touches on Poland and Lithuania only in Kaliningrad oblast, whose future without the CIS will be complicated. Imagine—without the CIS the sheer hostility between Ukraine and Russia, in which Belarus inclines toward Ukraine. One option is a railroad blockade of freight from Western and Central Europe to Russia like the blockade that Azerbaijan is implementing against Armenia, only on a far larger and more dangerous scale.

Let us move farther south on the new map. The USSR used to border on Turkey, Iran, and Afghanistan and was but a stone's throw away from Pakistan and India. Russia has different neighbors—Georgia, Azerbaijan, and east of the Caspian Sea it has the large Kazakhstan. The Kazakh republic used to protect Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan from Russia and also protect China over thousands of kilometers of the former Soviet-Chinese border that passed through Central Asia.

What are the options, both extreme and not very extreme? You cannot list them all—from transit visas via Kazakhstan for a citizen of the Russian Federation traveling to, let us say, Tashkent, to the departure of “our” Central Asia to the Muslim world if the historically formed attraction to Russia is weakened and reduced to nothing by the years. At present these are only seeds in the soil of separatism. They will sprout without fail if the centrifugal forces continue to rule and the CIS remains only an empty shell, only a convenient form of bidding farewell to the totalitarian Union.

In the depths of youthful Russian diplomacy has been born the concept of the “near abroad,” that is, of yesterday’s republics that have become sovereign states. Establishing equitable mutually advantageous ties with them is a priority. That also means filling with content the form of interstate association that is called the CIS. But since diplomatic energy is not infinite and new priorities are fraught with the danger that old ones will be weakened, it is entirely likely that the active foreign policy of Russia and Central Asia will result in passivity in the Near East except, obviously, for Israel, where hundreds of thousands of our fellow citizens are settling.

In general, if we look from Russia, of the former borders apart from the Norwegian and Finnish borders, only the Far Eastern one remains-with Mongolia and China. Great prospects are opening up there for relations with Japan, a rapidly developing economic superpower, but the underdeveloped, underpopulated Far East is not ready for their accelerated implementation, even in the South Kurils.

If Russia implants democracy and successfully implements radical economic reform, a fruitful involvement in the world economy awaits us. The improvement of the Russian living standard and civic freedom will compensate for the psychological damage caused by the loss of status as a global superpower which millions of people, especially the older generation, cannot help experiencing.

To ensure that this is not a fashionable and implausible new fairy tale about a bright future on the radiant summits of capitalism, the Commonwealth is vitally necessary-to eradicate the imperial mentality and at the same time to preserve-under different, democratic, conditions-the geopolitical and geostrategic area in which ethnic Russians and Russian citizens have grown accustomed to live for centuries. Yes, to nurture one's own national and state dignity, but in no circumstances infringe on the national and state dignity of the Russian giant, is vitally important for all states of the Commonwealth.

Alas, in the story of the Black Sea Fleet, Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk failed to display such understanding. He acted too hastily without considering how his "predatory" method would be received in Russia. Boris Yeltsin reacted with obvious delay, not immediately using his position to back up Marshal [Evgeniy] Shaposhnikov and Admirals Chernavin and Kasatonov. And when his position was finally stated-“it has been, is, and will be Russian”the Ukrainian side suspected it of containing a challenge to its sovereignty. The precondition of the conflict was the general haste in creating the CIS and the obvious incompleteness of its fundamental documents, including those about the fate of the former USSR’s armed forces. Now, after the Russian-Ukrainian talks in Kiev, which were belated and, once again, hasty, they seem to have moved toward an agreement, but so far it is hard to regard the agreement as definitive.

Is the present Black Sea Fleet necessary in our present circumstances? What is more important-the Fleet or sausage? These are important questions but they ignore the broader background to the conflict that has suddenly erupted. Behind Ukraine’s desire to get the Fleet and, moreover, without prior arrangement, Russia saw the first bold attempt to encroach on its geostrategic area, which it is prepared to share with Ukraine and other CIS members, but does not intend to tear possessions away from itself and hand them over to another state.

Behind the silhouettes of the warships there immediately loomed Sevastopol, the “city of Russian glory,” and the entire Crimea and the main Black Sea trading ports, which traditionally belonged to Russia and to which it does not intend to lose free access. Give them an inch and they will take a mile. Especially (let’s take another look at the transformed map) insofar as Russia will also be constrained in the Baltic if the settlement with independent Estonia and Latvia is as poorly thought out as with Ukraine and closes the main Baltic ports to it.

The conclusion may be formulated briefly: Live and let live. That simple wisdom is alien to the imperial spirit, but it sees the protection of one's own interest with respect for the interests of others. It also presupposes a consideration of geography and history dictating the compulsory "transparency" of borders. And the utmost balance and circumspection in the difficult construction of the CIS.

3.2 Yeltsin Defends His Foreign Policy

Interview by Nikolay Burbyga

Izvestiya, 22 February 1992 [CD Translation], Excerpts

Question: As we know, America and other states, while respecting universal human values and interests, nonetheless never forget their national interests; on the contrary, they even accord the latter paramount importance. But for some reason I haven't heard our politicians say that various steps we are taking serve Russia's state interests. Boris Nikolaevich, does Russia have its own interests? If so, please say what they are, in your opinion.

Answer: I have often read and heard reproaches of this kind-to the effect that Russia's leadership has supposedly all but eschewed state interests, and that a retreat is under way on all positions.

I categorically disagree with such assertions.

No, Russia is no longer the main power center of an enormous communist empire. Thoughts of painting the planet red have been discarded. We have rejected the notion that we are surrounded by covert or overt enemies, and that the most important thing in the world is a struggle that we must unfailingly win.

The elevation of these decrepit notions to a principle of foreign policy led to the ultimate collapse of the totalitarian system. They did enormous damage to our people and our national interests. And no less importantly, they did not make a single country or a single people happy.

Domestic and foreign policy are not separated by a wall. And they are based today on the interests of the Russian Federation's people. I don't think I have to try to persuade anyone that the most important task facing our country is to emerge from the deep quagmire of crisis and to effect a transition to foundations of life that will enable us and other peoples to live and work normally.

It is for this reason that we have an interest in seeing the world truly stable and in affirming the norms of civilized life and strengthening mutually advantageous cooperation in the world community.

We categorically oppose the use of diktat both with respect to states and peoples and with respect to individual citizens. The Russian Federation is firmly committed to strengthening guarantees of human rights and freedoms both within the country and beyond its borders.

These are the most important priorities of Russian foreign policy. We are taking our first steps in foreign policy. Not everyone in our country agrees with them. The influence of imperial thinking is strong. But I think that after a little while we will all understand that a policy of goodwill serves our interests far better than a policy based on force.

3.3 Border Changes, Even if Fair, Are Not Desirable

Dmitriy Furman

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 3 July 1992 [CD Translation]

The whole logic of the development of events since the destruction of the USSR is pushing Russia in one direction-toward repeating the path of post-Versailles Germany or today's Serbia. A large country surrounded by weaker countries with national minorities representing the large country, especially if these national minorities are oppressed (and any national minority may feel oppressed, to a certain extent), is virtually unable to withstand the temptation to use its strength....

It is very difficult not to intervene, not to pound the table with one's fist (or pound Kishinev [now Chisinau] with aircraft), when one sees what is happening in Moldova. Ruskoy's threats against Georgia are very understandable-this is a normal human reaction to the nightmare in Ossetia and the nationalistic stupidity of a number of Georgian leaders. The borders that Russia and the other republics inherited are absurd borders, and one simply cannot bring oneself to talk about their unshakability.

But it is not only foreign policy realities that are pushing Russia toward a redrawing of borders. Domestic-policy realities are also pushing it in this direction. The destruction of the Soviet Union, ... which was a shrewd move by Yeltsin in his struggle for power, could not help but draw reactions from the Russians, who are entangled in their own contradictory aspirations and are increasingly feeling that their leaders have swindled them. If one adds to this the economic reform, the pace of which allows one to hope-as the brightest prospect-for a restoration of 1985's standard of living by the early twenty-first century, one can hardly be surprised at the growing reaction. This growing nationalistic reaction is making the same people who actively destroyed the Union strike Great-Power poses. It is perfectly natural and logical that the democratic wave of 1988-91 is being replaced by a nationalistic wave, which all the careerists who earlier tried to ride the democratic wave are now trying to ride. Stopping it will be just as difficult as it was to stop the first wave.

Everything is drawing us toward a struggle for the redrawing of borders. But this means war, something that, incidentally, the Germans under Hitler were also drawn into gradually.... As things stand now, we could unite South Ossetia with North Ossetia without any special effort. The world might even close its eyes to this, and the people would applaud Yeltsin or Ruskoy. Then a war would begin with Ukraine and Kazakhstan. And then what would happen? ...

The entire logic of the development of events is drawing us onto this path. But nevertheless, this logic must be opposed by everyone who cherishes Russian democracy and, in the final analysis, simply cherishes Russia....

However, the struggle against this trend that is being waged by those who truly seek a democratic Russia is impeded by the chaos of heterogeneous and mutually contradictory principles and values that exists in their minds on the question of borders in the CIS. In fact, although they do not want war and fascism, their moral consciousness protests the unshakability of borders .... To recognize the unchangeability of the present borders is tantamount to approving all the injustices and crimes accumulated by history, all the evil of history-from Ivan the Terrible's conquest of the Tatar khanates, after which the Tatars were doomed to live in a state that continually celebrated various anniversaries of the Battle of Kulikovo, to the hiring for jobs in Estonia of Russian workers whom no one warned would someday be required to learn the difficult and strange Estonian language. There are various rights and truths in the world that are mutually contradictory. The right of states to inviolable borders contradicts the right of nations to self-determination, the practical application of which is not at all clear.... If you add to this the principle that the rights of indigenous peoples to their historical territory must not be completely denied (although God only knows as of what century a territory can be considered to “historically” belong to a people), and the fact that this introduces even more confusion, because preserving-for example-the Abkhazi’s historical rights to Abkhazia, where they have turned out to be a minority as a result of the Stalinist policy encouraging Georgian in-migration, is possible only at the cost of infringing upon the rights

Is it possible to reconcile these various “truths”? I don’t think that they can be reconciled, but it is possible to establish a certain hierarchy of these rights and our principles.

No matter how unfair it may be, it is a legal fact that Karabakh is a part of Azerbaijan and Chechnya is a part of Russia. The alternative to recognizing this fact is general and bloody chaos, a war of everyone against everyone in a country ... that is stuffed with nuclear weapons. This is unfair, but the evil that stems from this unfairness is many times smaller than the evil that would arise if we began a struggle for fairness here, using military force. If the former is an evil, it is the lesser of two evils.

Does this mean that we should put up with all the injustices that are codified by this right of states, that the Ossetians must remain separated forever, and that the Tatars have to continue watching on television and hearing on the radio about the Battle of Kulikovo, which saved Russia from the barbarians? No....

First of all, we must strive to have Russia set an example in resolving conflicts between nationalities. A poor man does not have the right to rob a rich man, but the rich man is morally obligated to help the poor. In comparison to Chechnya and Tataria, we are rich. No one can make us recognize their sovereignty. We have every right (including a moral right) to make sure that Chechnya and Tataria observe our laws, and we may use force in doing so. But we can also simply treat the Tatars and the Chechens humanely by changing our legislation, making it closer to the demands of morality and humaneness, and giving them the opportunity to secede from us legally and in good order. We have the right not to do this, but doing it is also our right, and if we do it, it would be a great and noble act that would change the entire climate in the CIS. Only if we ourselves set such an example will we have the moral right to exert pressure (but not through violence or the threat of violence) on behalf of Russian minorities and peoples like the Gagauz, the Ossetians, or the Abkhaz. We can even strive for border changes in our favor-while absolutely ruling out violence-by appealing to an international court on the Crimean question, for example, and thereby furthering the development of international law. Finally, we can struggle for the creation of a climate and conditions in the CIS in which borders would not have such great significance....

At present, in compensating for our inferiority complex, we have begun to say quite often that Russia is a great power. What this means is not very clear, but it is clear that Russia is a strong country and the strongest one in the CIS. Great demands are made on a great country. We can plunge not only ourselves but half the world into bloody chaos, or we can create a democratic order in the CIS and become a decisive force in creating such an order throughout the world. If Russia's democratic forces halt our slide toward wars and fascism, and if we can get at least ten years of peaceful democratic development, calm down just a little, and come to our senses, the very worst will be behind us. But if this is to happen, the democratically minded people of Russia will have to struggle with all their might against attempts to forcibly change borders, even if they are justified by the loftiest and most obvious principles of fairness.

3.4 Shelov-Kovedyaev Comments on Policy Criticism

Interview by Aleksandr Gagua

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 30 July 1992 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpts

Editor's Note: Shelov-Kovedyaev's description of the Foreign Ministry's problems, and his reaction to parliament's criticism, are especially important because he describes and defends the early policy direction of the neo-democrats. Both Yeltsin and Kozyrev tried to apply the neo-democratic concepts of maximum Russian restraint, and a literal application of international law to the "near abroad," for as long as possible. Soon after the interview recorded here, however, the nationalist viewpoint began to overpower that of the neo-democrats, and the democrats responded by changing their own policy direction.

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: . . . If in the sphere of policy in the "near abroad," the tilt toward the use of power methods, the lack of coordination of actions, the shift of priorities, the incorrect organization of work, and the unprofessional interference increase, despite the Foreign Ministry's efforts, I do not rule out the fact that I myself will raise the question of my resignation-inasmuch as under such conditions I, really and truly, would not greatly understand in what way I could be of use to the fatherland and the president....

We may speak first and foremost about the fact that the inertia of isolation among states of the Commonwealth engendered by the old Union, and inherited by us after its disintegration, has been overcome. It is significant that even journalists have ceased to concern themselves with when the Commonwealth will cease to exist. It is clear to all now that doubts concerning its viability were premature. Such institutions as the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government have shown themselves to be efficient instruments for harmonizing viewpoints and formulating common approaches in policy. Agreement is not being reached on all questions immediately, naturally-the European Community also, for example, developed in just the same way. Many questions to which there were no generally acceptable solutions were on the agenda for years, decades even, and all attempts to force their solution invariably failed. But we have succeeded in coming to terms in such important fields as transport, power engineering, pricing, the functioning of the ruble zone, the environment, and social security; military questions are being decided without serious cataclysms. In respect to the latter it is sufficient to mention the harmonization of the procedure of compliance with the treaty on Strategic Arms Limitation [SALT] and the Conventional Forces in Europe Treaty. A number of states have signed the Collective Security Treaty. A military-political nucleus is thereby taking shape in the Commonwealth. Having devised the appropriate mechanisms and having begun to implement them, the Commonwealth has shown its capacity for responding to the challenge of regional conflicts. Fundamental decisions have been adopted with respect to customs. Finally, the CIS is increasingly taking organizational shape. A working group which prepares meetings of the Council of Heads of State and the Council of Heads of Government has been formed, and the standing orders and rules of procedure of a meeting of the councils have been adopted. The Foreign Ministers Council, the Defense Ministers Council, and a number of sectoral councils or committees-on transport, power engineering, the environment and so forth-are functioning. The Foreign Ministers Council assembles on the eve of a meeting of the Council of Heads of State to put the final touches to the agenda, and the Council of Heads of Government has adopted the decision that the corresponding ministers will assemble on the eve of its meetings for the same purpose. An instrument for the resolution of economic disagreements has been created.

It was clear even before the creation of the Commonwealth that its geometry would be asymmetrical. Actual development proved this forecast correct. Two groups of states have become clearly defined in the CIS: Seven are disposed toward the development of close interaction on a multilateral basis-these are, besides Russia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Armenia, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and, of late, increasingly, Uzbekistan; four-Ukraine, Moldova, Azerbaijan, and Turkmenistan-are adopting a more aloof position. It is significant, moreover, that Ukraine and Turkmenistan have as of late been joining increasingly actively in multilateral cooperation and that Moldova and Azerbaijan, which have yet to ratify the Agreement on the Formation of the CIS, are intensively seeking opportunities for association with the Commonwealth.

Has so little happened, and in six months at that?

In addition, a tremendous amount of work is being done in the sphere of bilateral relations with each state of the "near abroad." The process of the conclusion of general political treaties is being completed. I shall not dwell specially on the large-scale bilateral economic negotiations between Russia and Kazakhstan and Russia and Belarus or on the top-level bilateral negotiations in Dagomys and Moscow either. All that the Union formerly made a mess of is now having to be restored on a treaty basis, and this means dozens and dozens of topics for negotiation with each state. The corresponding Russian delegations, which are working very intensively inasmuch as the existing problems require package solutions, have been formed to this end. The most important areas of the negotiations and our positions on each of these issues have been defined. Human rights and humanitarian issues generally are the priorities for us here. Negotiations, however, as distinct from the issuance of instructions, are distinguished by the fact that they take time, and the expectation of immediate results here is for this reason unjustified. The majority of ambassadors have been appointed, and they have taken up their duties, and personnel for the embassies is being selected. The formation of a Commonwealth Affairs Department is being completed in the Foreign Ministry. All this, the selection of people particularly, has required-inasmuch as the extent and the nature of the problems are wholly unprecedented-particular attention and time, if it is considered that we had to begin practically from scratch. But we are completing this organizational period successfully.

The second accusation: All that the Foreign Ministry is doing in the sphere of policy in the “near abroad” it is doing badly, erroneously, and to the detriment of Russia’s interests. I will permit myself here to give just a few of the most striking examples of the direct opposite tendency.

The conflicts in the Dniester region and South Ossetia are being settled in accordance with the recommendations and plans, including the involvement of representatives of the Dniester region, which were patiently and painstakingly developed over a period of months by the Foreign Ministry in the course of pursuing bilateral and multilateral initiatives. Special working groups for each conflict situation, Nagorno-Karabakh included, were formed, and permanent representatives to the Mixed Commission were sent to Moldova. Remember how many menacing decisions were adopted by the Supreme Soviet and the congresses of deputies, how many trips for the purpose of saber-rattling were made-they all merely exacerbated the situation. And as a result everyone had to return to the proposals of the Foreign Ministry, which produced results. Furthermore, the signing of a settlement in the Dniester region, for example, not only enabled the supporters of “speaking-straight-from-the shoulder” to get a clearer idea of the alignment of forces in Moldova, but also graphically demonstrated how painful the actual process of settling chronic conflicts can be.

We are all disturbed by the human rights situation in the Baltic countries. But none of the most “decisive” actions, of the Supreme Soviet, for example, were able in any way to influence the international community’s attitude toward this question. On the contrary, the appeals of the Foreign Ministry to the CSCE, the Council of Europe, and United Nations led to the Council of Europe's adopting a decision to send to the Baltic a special group of human rights experts.

A third accusation: The Foreign Ministry is operating without a concept of policy in the "near abroad." This, I confess, I absolutely don't understand. Such a policy was created back in March. It was presented to Kozyrev and sent to the president and the two first (at that time) deputy prime ministers-Burbulis and Gaydar-and also to two committees of the Supreme Soviet. The minister and Burbulis and also the committees of the Supreme Soviet made a precise reading of it. But neither the Supreme Soviet nor the government discussed it. Inasmuch as no objections to it were forthcoming, the Foreign Ministry has been guided by it. I would have understood had our concept been deemed inappropriate, but to say that there has been none at all?

Much time has elapsed since then, and for this reason I am now engaged in a collation of both my own thoughts and materials of my colleagues for an updated version of this concept, which I hope to present to the president upon his return from vacation.

[Gagua]: But it is the president who has said repeatedly that the Foreign Ministry is operating without a concept.

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: I have only one explanation for this. The president has not seen our concept. It has evidently gone astray somewhere in the depths of his staff.

[Gagua]: And what now, from your viewpoint, is most problematic in the sphere of Russia's foreign policy?

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: The problem of the security of Russia's borders is, as before, quite serious. I am not, of course, talking about a carryover of all the attributes of the Soviet border-barbed wire, machine gun towers, rigorous control, and so forth-to the border between Russia and its neighbors in the "near abroad." We would not want to unilaterally violate the accord on the transparency of internal borders between, for example, states of the Commonwealth. But several states-Ukraine, Moldova, Azerbaijan, and others did not formerly sign the Agreement on Common Principles for Safeguarding the External Borders of the Commonwealth States. Nor have all signed the agreement on the settlement of customs questions. And some states that have signed these documents, Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan, for example, have come to an arrangement concerning reciprocal visits with Turkey that do not require visas. I am by no means questioning these states' sovereign right to adopt such decisions. The issue lies elsewhere-the territory of Russia has come to be open to the penetration of freight or persons from across the border of the former USSR. A similar situation has taken shape on the border with the Baltic countries. It is clear that transparency also works in the reverse direction-for bleeding commodities from Russia, for example. Nor can we lose sight of all that is connected with the border of the former USSR-electronically, the most heavily fortified in the world. It is urgent that all these problems be resolved. The Foreign Ministry has been submitting proposals since April. But insofar as there are many aspects which are outside the jurisdiction of the Foreign Ministry, and require concordance with the border guards, the Ministry of Security, and the MVD, actual steps became possible only recently.

There were many problems with military property prior to the formation of the Russian armed forces. In fact, many weapons were transferred to republics outside of Russia in the final months of the Union. After its disintegration, the Foreign Ministry consistently held that the existence of extra-state armed forces was impossible. But this idea prevailed, as is known....

Things are difficult when it comes to withdrawing forces from the Baltic states. At the negotiations with Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia the Russian side is upholding the package principle of a solution to the problem, including questions of the future use of former Soviet military property, facilities, bases and such; social problems of redeployed servicemen and their families, military retirees remaining in the Baltic, the status of forces in the period of withdrawal, and so forth.

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: Two factors may be noted here. First, the unprofessional interference in the sphere of policy in the “near abroad” by persons who dabble in this on an occasional basis, and mainly under the influence of an emotional perception of reality. This may come in the form of political initiatives, or in the appointment of these persons to positions of responsibility. In either case the Foreign Ministry has to make efforts to minimize the consequences. It is sufficient to recall the utter failure of the power approach to a settlement of regional conflicts. Often, super-tough declaratory demarches are undertaken in order to intimidate those to whom they are addressed. Inasmuch, however, as the reaction to them is usually the direct opposite, their authors become totally confused and, unless “insurance has been taken out against them in good time,” display a readiness to move considerably further in the direction of a compromise than necessary. It is for this reason that I remain a supporter of diplomatic actions that are, although gradual, consistent and professional....

[Gagua]: But Minister Kozyrev and you have, for all that, an entire ministry. Could these problems not have been resolved more quickly on the basis of self-reliance?

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: If only things were as you say! Although the Foreign Ministry inherited from the Russian and Union ministries an enormous number of highly skilled specialists, in January, counting your humble servant and his secretary, a few more than ten persons were working in the ministry with countries of the “near abroad”-there was only one special officer in charge of each country! The Commonwealth Affairs Department is still not fully staffed, nor are the departments in charge of the Baltic countries in the Second European Administration. The Foreign Ministry had no trained specialists for work with these countries. People are having to be taught from scratch since, I repeat, the problems for the Foreign Ministry here are entirely unprecedented, beginning with the study of the languages of several states. And this instruction has to be carried out on the march, as they say, while solving current questions.

In addition, the formation of delegations, the selection of ambassadorial candidates, the creation of special regional conflict working groups, the choice of observers for permanent or shift work in areas of the Dniester region, South Ossetia, and Nagorno-Karabakh, the creation of a structure for the prompt evaluation of crisis situations....

We can now say that this work is approaching completion. But it is clear to every unbiased person, I believe, that time has been needed for this, considerable time at that....

The ministry lists of personnel were approved only in April, and there is still no budget! We are still receiving less than 30 percent of the currency resources that we need and 40 percent of the ruble appropriations for the upkeep of the main staff. What fitting support for the new subdivisions this is! The pay scales of our employees for today's times are simply wretched.

The further we go, the worse it gets. We are not being allowed to finance the minimum salary of an ambassador in states of the “near abroad” in dollars, because the majority of states have not as yet left the ruble zone, and it is required that they be paid in rubles. After all, we have already “seen” all this. In the former CEMA countries (and in “socialist countries” generally) our diplomats were paid not in freely convertible currencies, but in the local currency. As a result, these embassies were considered second-rate, and it was frequently the corresponding type of people who ended up there. So what will we in the new way divide diplomats into “clean” and “unclean”? Who will our employees in the “near abroad” be after this —“priority” or “third-grade”? With whom will we fill the embassies on such terms? Not to mention the fact that even for low pay in dollars some of the necessary engineering personnel could be hired for the embassy locally, but for rubles no local inhabitant would come to work for us. And taking the entire personnel from Moscow would be more expensive, even in rubles....

And even in rubles there is a reluctance to pay at the real exchange rate! Our ambassador in Kiev has calculated that the family of a diplomat of his level of three persons would have to spend R14,000 a month on food alone! This was in May. And now? And the other expenses? No, we are told, let the Russian ambassador be oriented toward state supplies and state prices. And how, after this, will such an ambassador defend the rights of Russians if he himself is wholly dependent on the charity of the authorities of the host state? And I am, naturally, leaving out of the equation such a “trifle” as the organization of obligatory diplomatic receptions....

And what will be the authority of such a “ruble” Russian ambassador in Chisinau when, say, Belarus has determined for its ambassador there, in addition to the ruble allowance, an extra $1,200 a month?

The Foreign Ministry is being continually pestered by the questions: Where are the Russian embassies in the “near abroad”? The Americans are represented everywhere, but we, nowhere....

We are now permanently maintaining our ambassador in Kiev in an unequipped (!) hotel room, paying his expenses “per item.” But were we to send only one ambassador without staff on the same terms to the remaining thirteen states, there would be nothing with which to pay the wages of the Foreign Ministry central staff.

In addition, it is not enough just to obtain a building for an embassy. It needs to be renovated, equipped, and so forth. And there is no way that we can obtain the money for this either. Instead, it is once again recommended that the Foreign Ministry halve its overseas staff!

[Gagua]: To what did you refer when you spoke about the danger of a shift of priorities in policy in the “near abroad”?

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: I have already spoken about the two groups of countries (“7 + 4”) within the framework of the Commonwealth. There are the states that signed the Collective Security Treaty together with us. These are our allies. We must be particularly attentive in relations with them.

There are states whose positions are as close as could be to ours on a number of most important issues. In Asia these are Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan, in Europe, Belarus and Armenia. I believe that in the sphere of bilateral relations with Russia such states should enjoy entirely special advantages. There is no discrimination in this-this is customary political practice.

It is good that such a model has come to be realized in relations with Belarus. A whole package of documents has now been prepared for signing with Turkmenistan, as has a general political treaty with Tajikistan. I believe that they should be signed without delay. Allusions to the situation in Tajikistan, say, would, in my opinion, be inappropriate here. The rivalry of North and South did not arise yesterday and will not disappear tomorrow. In addition, as far as I know, all political forces of Tajikistan would welcome the signing of a treaty with Russia and would recognize its legal validity, regardless of how the situation develops. If, on the other hand, we delay any further, it cannot be ruled out that we would soon lose Tajikistan as a state close to Russia, for which there is no justification. Armenia, on the other hand, signed the Collective Security Treaty, and we, in my opinion, are simply obliged to build our relations with it as our ally in the Transcaucasus.

Georgia has in practice recently been demonstrating the aspiration to develop a close partnership with Russia. Although it is at this time difficult to forecast the results of the fall elections, we should be supporting and developing this trend in every possible way. Otherwise, Georgia will be forced to seek other contracting partners, which would hardly be in Russia's interests.

Russia's relations with Ukraine and Kazakhstan, for example, are an entirely different topic. Our destinies are most amazingly interwoven. We are bound by such a quantity of threads and are united by such a number of common interests and are so interdependent that we should be particularly solicitous and tactful [toward them]. But concurrence does not mean total identity. For this reason it is essential that we adhere precisely to that boundary which in the name of our common interests we cannot transgress, meeting our partner half-way, for damage to Russian interests would inevitably, by virtue of the specifics of our relations, be reflected in damage to Kazakhstan or Ukrainian interests. We must defend these boundaries with the aid of the force of argument, logic, right, and justice inasmuch as we are not in the least bit any less dependent on Kazakhstan or Ukraine than they are on us.

[Gagua]: You have mentioned Ukraine. Russia's policy with respect to this country is criticized most.

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: Yes, we are, indeed, quite often rebuked for the fact that we have responded "inadequately" to certain actions, including unilateral ones, by Ukraine.

I believe that in the past there were several reasons for such steps by Ukraine. First, considering its history, it was not enough for this country to have gained independence, it was also important for it to prove to itself that it is independent (we are observing the same thing in the Baltics also, incidentally). Second, there was a great temptation, having come face to face with growing economic difficulties, to switch to a struggle against an "external enemy," the more so when there is such a big neighbor as Russia.

I will venture to maintain that it was the absence of a stiff response on the part of Russia that helped Ukraine overcome the syndrome of doubting its own independence, and to convince itself that no one was encroaching on it, and showed its own citizens and the world community the futility of exploitation of the "image of Russia as the enemy."

As a result we have come to witness the start of a change in Ukraine's attitude toward the Commonwealth. And the shouting from Moscow by individual politicians or the parliament of Russia have merely on each occasion made the situation worse, really bringing Russian-Ukrainian relations to a critical point.

Two major problems now remain in our relations, with which all the others are in one way or another connected: the financial problem (including reciprocal payments, commodity turnover, and the fate of the ruble supply following Ukraine's transition to the hryvna) and the problem of the Black Sea Fleet.

We will leave the first to the economists. And it would be quite just to solve the question of the Black Sea Fleet in accordance with the actual Ukrainian concept of a Ukrainian navy, proclaiming that Ukraine needs a coastal defense force, and with it the Naval Symbols Protocol, which Ukraine signed on 16 January 1992.

[Gagua]: Calls for the use of power methods in the solution of Russia's relations with states of the "near abroad" arise with the question of defending the rights of Russians, servicemen included. Usually cited as an example here is America, which, without a second thought, employs force in such cases....

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: Here we encounter a misunderstanding of the fact that we must deal with the newly independent states, not only with the "old" members of the world community, on the basis of the rules of international law, which excludes the unilateral use of force. Examples of force having been employed with the sanction of the UN Security Council are well known.

It is true that the United States has in some cases acted in violation of this procedure. But, contrary to popular opinion, this was never done on the spur of the moment, without the necessary all-around preparation and without other possible solutions having been exhausted. In addition, all such actions were, as you will recall, very brief and culminated in the evacuation of dozens, and in extreme cases, hundreds, of American citizens, who, in addition, found shelter and every opportunity to continue to work back home, in accordance with their choice.

It is not hard to observe that we are in a fundamentally different situation. Where would we evacuate, for example, hundreds of thousands of people from the Dniester region? What could we offer them-a shameless solution, at their expense, consisting of the problems of our non-Black Earth region? From where would we get the money for this Great

Move from many, many points of the former USSR where conflicts are smoldering or blazing? And, most important, have we asked people whether they want to be evacuated? After all, an absolute majority are demanding observance of their rights on the land that they consider home. See how quickly refugees begin to return to hearth and home just as soon as there is the least glimmer of hope of restoring a peaceful life in the conflict zone! And those who are firmly bent on leaving their old haunts do not, as a rule, wait for an upheaval, and do not request the arrival of troops, but have long since moved to Russia.

Is it, after this, responsible to talk about staging unilateral military actions for the purpose of defending human rights? If anyone believes so, then, please, go ahead, but without me.

After all, it is clear that whereas it is still possible to theorize that the world community would perceive with understanding our unilateral military operations in one location or another, as soon as this diversion started to become protracted, public opinion would undoubtedly turn against us, for there would be only one definition of our military presence outside Russia-occupation. And no one would turn a blind eye to or forgive us our creation, all the more so in our present situation, of new Afghanistans-with all the ensuing catastrophic consequences for Russia.

If we have, indeed, recognized the priority of the law and human rights not just as fine-sounding words, the latter have to be defended by legal methods. Consequently, for the protection of Russians' rights in practice, painstaking work on the realization of the corresponding articles of treaties (which also cannot be achieved immediately and in full) is essential. It is necessary to conclude agreements that are being negotiated at this time. And these, as shown by the situation in the Polish areas of Lithuania following conclusion of the Polish-Lithuanian agreement on the rights of Polish-speaking minorities, are not in themselves a panacea. Enlisting world pressure on one country or another in civilized forms is appropriate, which the Foreign Ministry is doing.

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: In which case the vice-president, as if confirming a report on a meeting of the Security Council, proposed that he resign.

[Gagua]: And the president observed quite sharply that Kozyrev was thereby copying the well-known demarche of Shevardnadze, only without tendering his resignation. What are your thoughts in this connection?

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: I assume that the minister evidently had his reasons for such a statement.

I can only repeat that I see a grouping of representatives of various parts of the political spectrum that confuse the two concepts “strong policy” (that is, fruitful) and “policy of strength” (that is, coercion) growing increasingly consolidated.

[Gagua]: How do you evaluate the idea of creating a Ministry for Commonwealth Affairs?

[Shelov-Kovedyaev]: It is now possible, as distinct from the practice to date, that foreign policy work with countries of the “near abroad” could be organized with the aid of either a special ministry or the distribution of Commonwealth materials in individual territories. Both paths to me would seem wrong in principle.

The first idea is not new, although credit for its advancement was recently claimed, as unjustifiably as much else, by the speaker of the Russian parliament. A proposal for the creation of a separate Committee (under the auspices of the Foreign Ministry, or independent) or a Ministry for CIS Affairs was advanced last spring. We were able at that time to persuade people of its ineffectiveness.

The formation of such a ministry would cause a new crisis in the Commonwealth since it would be perceived by our partners as Russia ranking them as second-rate countries compared with both the states of the “traditional” abroad and also with the Baltics and Georgia, which are not a part of the Commonwealth.

Further, the formation of a ministry at a time when an analogous intra-Foreign Ministry structure has only just begun to find its feet would be sickeningly reminiscent of the unforgettable Congress of Deputies’ administrative urge, which with painful consistency used to force everyone repeatedly with Manilov-like “miracle dreaming” to destroy everything that operated, with only the least bit of efficiency, in the name of a future structure that was unclear to anyone. It is clear that at a time when we may finally in the Foreign Ministry speak about the appearance of efficient departments, such a recarving would indefinitely plunge work with the states of the “near abroad” into a state of disorganization and continuous last-minute rush. Finally, there would simply not be the personnel for such a ministry, and it could not work. It is clear that no self-respecting Foreign Ministry official would go to work in such a ministry since this would mean for him severance from the Foreign Ministry and his formerly chosen profession. Consequently, a new ministry would inevitably be doomed to a long period of amateurism.

The second idea, possibly, has a right to exist in the future, but is clearly premature at this time.

Each state of the “near abroad” is simultaneously, as a rule, a part of several intersecting regional formations taking shape on Russia’s borders. For example, the states of Central Asia, Kazakhstan, and Azerbaijan are part of one region with Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, Afghanistan, India, and so forth. Simultaneously, Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan, together with Russia, are connected with the Far Eastern region. On the other hand, Azerbaijan together with Armenia, Georgia, Russia, Ukraine, Moldova, Romania, Bulgaria, Turkey, Greece, and a whole number of other countries are part of the extensive Black Sea region. But that same Ukraine together with Belarus and Moldova is part of the Central European region. And Belarus together with the Baltic countries, Russia, Germany, Denmark, Scandinavia, and Finland form the Baltic region. In addition, the formation of a Baltic-Black Sea community with the participation of the states of the Baltic, Belarus, and Ukraine is evidenced by a whole number of indications. A complex system of relationships is taking shape in each of these structures.

On the other hand, rivalry over influence among, for example, Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan and, in the future, Afghanistan is developing in far more than the Central Asia region alone. Russia’s concept for maintaining a balance of interests should, accordingly, be imminent.

Consequently, a mechanical assignment of work with states of the “near abroad” by territorial divisions would lead to an artificial and fortuitous disarticulation of the common living fabric of closely interwoven unity into individual, unconnected fragments; the forfeiture of the opportunity to advance initiatives that preserve the interdependence of processes occurring here; and a loss of correct perspective and a vision of the whole, and would increase appreciably the likely emergence of uncoordinated political initiatives. This would confuse work because it simply could not be ruled out that the same executives would be simultaneously receiving separate assignments from separate superiors.

3.5 Andrey Kozyrev Outlines Foreign Policy Priorities

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 20 August 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Editor's note: By August, Andrey Kozyrev was fighting for the survival of his liberal, Western-oriented foreign policy, as the following passages clearly illustrate. This article is particularly noteworthy for its honest and critical analysis of the “halfhearted” transition made by the Gorbachev regime, and his portrayal of the Soviet Union’s role in the Cold War.

Franz Kafka wrote a horror story called Metamorphosis. It describes how one day a man wakes up to find that he has been turned into a horrible arthropod. For this reason the entire world turns away from him, and he himself becomes unbelievably contrary.

Against this we set the Bible story of Jesus Christ before he goes to Golgotha to save mankind and later ascends the mountain and is transformed into God, or, rather, Man- Made-God.

Today, a year after the triumph of democracy in August 1991, Russia and the other CIS states face about the same dilemma: either metamorphosis-a transformation from one kind of monster into another-or a transformation before becoming a true participant in the world process.

Let us not delude ourselves. This question was not resolved once and for all in August. It was only an attempt to preserve the old, to push society back to its former state, which was cut short. And that attempt was doomed. But in the White House, which was defended by tens of thousands of Muscovites, stood the bearers of the new, who were not necessarily devoted to the same alternative for the future.

What happened last August was, rather, that as they drew the final line under the past, the defenders of the White House were opening up a chance for the future. But the question of how to take advantage of that chance is being resolved today. And just over the past year two parties and two trends have emerged quite clearly.

Let us not build up some kind of suspense, as in a detective story. I hope that the thoughts that I put forward will not appear under a garish headline reading “Kozyrev Warns of New Putsch.” Although I do understand Andrey Ostalskiy perfectly; it was he who took up precisely this subject as the most attractive for the reasonably good interview he did for Izvestiya. I do hope, however, that the conversation will turn out to be deeper and more topical.

Yes, let us hope that the putsch will not be repeated. In fact, progressive-thinking people do stand at the head of the state. The chief of them today is not at all the president who was the head of the Union a year ago. The buttress and the guarantee of democracy is the president of Russia, elected by the people. And it is even more apropos to recall the mandate that he has. It is a mandate for the democratic transformation of Russia together with all the territory of the former USSR, and on the broader plane, the former socialist camp. This is precisely why Russia looks with such hope toward the war-stricken peoples of Yugoslavia, and the peoples of Eastern Europe, painfully feeling their way into the future.

But the resistance offered by opposing forces should not be underestimated. The simplest thing is to be aware of the communist opposition and to pity those who wave red flags because they are associated with decades of heavy labor and hopes, and we should be making a deep obeisance to their exploits, even if they were worshipping at the wrong altar.

... It is even simpler to return along with the four-square defenders to the bosom of the CPSU [Communist Party of the Soviet Union]. We can argue until we are hoarse about whether their choice is constitutional, whether the past of the party was constitutional. History itself has pronounced its verdict: Any power that does not come from the people and does not rest on honest and free elections, but on usurpation by a small group of those who claim to possess an absolute truth, is unlawful from the standpoint of contemporary legal and political consciousness. In the twentieth century there is no place for dictatorship either of the fascist or the communist ilk.

It is, however, as if it is precisely the Russians and the other peoples of the USSR, who made a decisive and heroic contribution to the rout of fascism and, in August 1991, the destruction of the communist system, who must face a decisive duel with a third monster that lies in wait for humankind at the close of the present century. This is the plague of nationalpatriotism or, more accurately, aggressive nationalism.

The great Russian philosopher Berdyaev once said that communism had become the ineluctable fate of Russia. He traced the metamorphosis to totalitarianism from its feudaltsarist and serflike socialist forms. Today there is a real danger of a new metamorphosis.

And again we clearly sense some kind of inferiority complex in the face of the difficult task of entering the surrounding world. In 1917, convinced that Russia was the sick man of Europe incapable of making it through to the end of the Great War, the Bolsheviks proposed their own primitive but enticing and simple solution. The essence of this solution was that instead of the inevitably prolonged and difficult democratic process of transformation, there would be a cavalry charge to reach (or so it seemed) obvious objectives. Peace for the people, land for the peasants, bread for the hungry- and all of this decisively and boldly, through direct action backed by force. It was in this way that they carried out collectivization and brought order to Czechoslovakia and Hungary, and later to Afghanistan; this was how they strengthened the Union....

And people who moved along a different path evoked a growing hostility, irritation, and abuse. The very fact of the existence of a gradual but steady flowering of liberal, “babbling” democracies was an unacceptable challenge to totalitarianism. Outside it was democracy and the democrats of Nazi Germany that were perceived as Public Enemy No. 1, while inside the communist Soviet Union it was the bearers of these ideas, as a despicable domestic “fifth column” that was interfering in “how things were run.”

Even during the decline of the Soviet Union this aggressive rejection of the surrounding world and the desire to force on protective armor against it began to be clothed not in the doomed apparel of Marxism-Leninism but hurrah patriotism apparel. We recall that both in the notorious “Word to the People” and in the appeal issued by the State Committee for the State of Emergency, the emphasis was laid not so much on the defense of socialism against the intrigues of imperialism but, rather, on the loss of superpower status.

Here we have the very essence of a harmful consciousness. Aware of its own inadequacy in today's civilization and its own inability to assert itself in the surrounding world, it seeks a way out through confrontation with that world, thus affirming its own being and ultimately its own right to existence. Properly speaking, this is the deep nature and motive force of any aggressive nationalism, which now threatens not only us but also Eastern Europe and even Western Europe.

It is time to recognize that this threat lies in wait not only for communist and totalitarian, but also democratic societies, especially if the democracy in them has not sufficiently matured. The most fertile ground for the carriers of this virus is the instability of national-state consciousness. The classic example was Germany in 1938, in which, instead of making the difficult entry into the League of Nations, which was being formed at that time, and learning to live according to civilized laws, Hitler chose the shortest route to revival of imperial might and to national catastrophe....

Is this so remote from us in history? The Russian political climate is over-saturated with vituperative discourse about loss of national achievement and status as a great power, and the possibility of becoming one, or several, banana republics. And it is not only the national Communists but also, I would say, the national democrats who are demanding individuality at any price and are looking for justifications for it.

Let us look a little more closely at these arguments. And not just for the sake of polemic, but first and foremost because in many cases it is a question of the real nationalstate interests, but turned on their heads, and of a neo-confrontational, pseudopatriotic consciousness.

The popular thesis rests on our Eurasian nature and the impermissibility of a pro-Western bias. In fact, if we talk about the West in the geographical sense, then a one-sided orientation toward only our European neighbors would be unjustified. Even though the task remains of joining the European structures and establishing relations with the NATO Euro-Atlantic alliance, which includes the United States and Canada in addition to European countries. And the West as a political concept is the East for at least 70 percent of Russia. The United States, Canada, and Japan are our nearest neighbors in the Asia-Pacific region.

But it is not a matter of geographical discoveries. The attempt to close off America and the entire Western thrust of policy as a priority is transforming the Eurasian nature into an Asiatic one, and Russia as a great power in the heart of Eurasia from a natural connecting link between the highly developed democratic states with market economies (that is what the West really means) into a missing link, the sick man not only of Europe but also Asia, where firm trends toward “pro-Western” development are seen, along with integration on the basis of eagerness for the market economy and the modern organization of society. Whereas the communists are sickened by this direction in foreign policy out of ideological considerations, it evidently frightens the national democrats just as college scares the freshman.

In fact, to use the expression of the Russian historian N.M. Solovyev, Russia has a right to a place alongside the highly developed states and the leading representatives of humankind. However, because of the monstrous zigzag that resulted from the previous attempt to build a home-grown paradise in a single, isolated country, we must make up what was lost in a number of fields and engage, as it were, in external studies to follow the course of civilized behavior here at home and in the world that surrounds us. Neither Peter I nor the thousands of leading minds of Russia in the following centuries were afraid to learn from others. This, however, is humiliating for our new-made democratic state figures, who obviously believe that it is better to be a big fish in a small pond than a small fish in a big sea. Perhaps this explains the desire to make advances to the national-patriots who through their own clamor, particularly within the walls of the Russian parliament, seem to be a much more impressive force than in society as a whole, and to the most backward and reactionary part of the military-industrial complex, and indeed simply the industrial complex, which fears more than anything else in the world the loss of its privileged position in a closed economy and finding itself facing foreign competition.

It is clear, however, that instead of joining the community of democratic states and correspondingly the highly developed world economy, continued autarky would be tantamount to national betrayal and Russia's final slide into the category of a third-rate state, even though by dint of its geographical position and its scientific and technical and resource potential it is called upon directly to make the dash into the club of the elite.

So, dear fellow citizens, shall we walk barefoot into the city for a university education or shall we take delight in the fact that we have never graduated from university, and for that reason "the Soviets have their pride?"

In practice, however, an enormous and powerful country like Russia is simply unable, even when so commanded by parliamentary patriots, to remain on the sidelines of history and idle away its time as some kind of international ignoramus. Willy-nilly it is being drawn into big policy, and on a global scale. And here it turns out that the issue is the direction of that policy: whether it is, as before, opposed to the leading states of the world community or is in alliance with them. It goes without saying that it is a question not of a new military-political super-alliance but of an alliance of states sharing common democratic and market values....

The confusion about the notorious Slavic factor in foreign policy, however, prevents our national democrats from responding precisely and clearly to this simple and apparently convincing question. There is no question that this factor should to some extent be considered in the policy of a state with an enormous Slavic population. But this by no means applies only to the Serbian national Bolsheviks, who incidentally are acting not only against the national interests of the Serbian Slavs themselves, but also against all the other Slavic peoples of former Yugoslavia. We shall not forget that even the Muslims in Bosnia are still Slavs even though they profess a different religion. All the former Yugoslav republics look to Russia with hope and, as I have had the opportunity to be convinced during a trip across former Yugoslavia, with love and expect from it a fair position and protection from the game of war, which, of course, is going on not only in Serbia but also Croatia and Bosnia, and Herzegovina....

Let us consider the scenarios proposed within the framework of the so-called third, special path for Russia, as applied to the political-diplomatic game being played on the very important chess board of the UN Security Council. It is precisely here that Russia has succeeded in inheriting the status and privileges and simultaneously the responsibility as one of the five great powers that are permanent members of the Security Council. Let us not delude ourselves; this by no means happened automatically. There could have been different scenarios. But the concept of the USSR's inheritor state in the United Nations was worked out by Russian diplomats in the closest contact with their English and other Western colleagues. Behind all this could be palpably felt the credit of trust in the democratic leadership in Moscow, and that in the person of the new Russia the international community would not be obtaining a somewhat diminished version of the former Soviet Union, which for many years blocked the work of the Security Council, including by use of its veto, guided as it was by an anti-West and anti-imperialist doctrine.

The civilized world had already welcomed the policy of new thinking that led to the USSR's abandonment of its blocking, confrontational line. By dint of its own halfheartedness, however, this policy did not lead to the emergence in the Security Council of a firm alliance of democratic, highly developed states. As was typical for Soviet diplomacy of recent years, the tactic was employed of slowing the increasing work of the Security Council in standing firm against states that violate the peace or (and this is usually the rule) those same regimes that violate human rights. It is not happenstance but a law-governed pattern that many of these regimes were the ideological allies of the socialist USSR. But the Soviet leadership of the perestroika years was determined that it would not move, as in earlier years, to direct patronage of them through confrontation with the West. However, it lacked the spirit to move not in words but in deeds, in this case through diplomacy, to switch to the other, civilized and democratic side of the barricade. Therefore, as a rule, before a decisive vote the Soviet delegation would remain vague for a long time with respect to its own final vote, sometimes taking time out several times for consultations with Moscow or some other kind of demarche pertaining to its own former clients.

Of course, in particular, specific cases it is appropriate to use old connections and channels of influence to try once again to achieve by peaceful means what must otherwise be extracted from former allies with the aid of sanctions and other harsh measures by the international community. But let us look the truth in the eye: In most cases all these demarches were made with quite clumsy maneuvering that counted not so much on real influence on the “intractable” but rather on fence-sitting. It is not happenstance that this kind of body movement failed to win real respect from either side, even though the West in general, of course, was grateful to Gorbachev for the fact that, in contrast to his predecessors in the post of leader of the Soviet Union, ultimately he did not prevent adoption of the correct decisions. Incidentally, socialist China has also been employing the tactic either of abstaining or voting in favor in the Security Council.

Today, however, more is expected from democratic Russia and the democrats in the Kremlin: real alliance with those who stand guard over international legality and are ready to make use of the most decisive measures for this, not by unilateral military intervention of the type made in the USSR's Afghan and Czechoslovak adventures, but in accordance with the UN Charter. I am convinced that this line (and in the latest votes in the Security Council it has started to take shape in the form of a firm Russian "yes") will evoke great respect both from its new allies and from its former "ideological friends" who, like the former Soviet regime, understand only a sharp tongue.

Really and truly, criticism of the present course from the national Bolsheviks, who are essentially demanding a return to the old position of the Soviet leadership—open opposition to the democratic West and alliance with all forces that oppose it—evokes great sympathy for our role. At least it is clear that it is possible to have if not those, then some other allies. And if we do not stand in the ranks of people of probity, then at least we do not head up a gang of brigands. But obviously neither the one nor the other is enough for the "national democrats," who—as, for example, in the case of sanctions against the Belgrade national patriots—are proposing abstention in the Security Council vote. The logic is in general quite simple: The "democrats" do not want to join hands with the Bolsheviks while the "nationals" are sickened by alliance with the cosmopolitans when the issue goes beyond rebuffing power policy, and with the West. And no references to the "sacred cow" of Serbian-Russian friendship achieve anything here. All we have to do is look at the example of France, which, perhaps, no less than Russia has ancient historical ties with Serbia. It is not by chance that much in the actions by the French is similar to what we are doing. Before voting in the Security Council for the sanctions, the president of Russia sent his own foreign minister to Belgrade and Sarajevo. After the sanctions had been adopted, the president of France himself journeyed to the same places. After becoming convinced that it is precisely Belgrade that has carried and still carries the burden of responsibility for the bloodshed, Russia voted for the sanctions in the Security Council. And France, through the lips of its own president when he returned from his trip to Yugoslavia, spoke in favor of further decisive measures against Belgrade. I think that the vision of both Serbia's and France's long-term interests had an effect here, and also the self-respect of democratic France. I am convinced that out of the same considerations Russia must not go back to a policy of slowing things down, but must go forward so that a Security Council resolution on measures against those who violate the peace and human rights can be put forward not by three powers-the United States, England, and France as now, but by four great democratic powers. If China with its political abstention in the vote can understand how far in the case, for example, of Yugoslavia, it goes beyond the zone of its traditional interests, then as applied to Russia, this kind of policy was totally at variance with those very special historical, Slavic, if you will, links that we have had and will have with the peoples of former Yugoslavia....

Let us, however, return to the "Slavic factor." Can it, like Orthodoxy, become a real and dominant factor in Russian foreign policy? I think not. First, because today no state is guided by such criteria in its own foreign policy if, of course, we are talking about the civilized, democratic countries. In Europe any attempt to divide ourselves into Slav, Germanic, or French societies threatens to return the situation not to World War II but World War I, and, as applied to the Yugoslav tragedy, a repetition of history in making Serbia the detonator of a global catastrophe. Second, this kind of ethnic-religious foreign policy would be anti-Russian since it would promote a split in Russia itself, where along with the millions of Orthodox Slavs, peoples of other nationalities and religions live, in particular the Muslims. And if hotheads among our so-called patriots are prepared even from the tribune of the parliament to state that under all circumstances Moscow should sympathize with the Serbian militia units in Bosnia and Herzegovina, then why should Russian Muslims not be just as reckless in defense of their fellow believers in that same Bosnia and Herzegovina? Then where would Moscow be? And is this kind of policy not tantamount to shifting the civil war from Yugoslavia to our own motherland?...

Nor should we forget that any onesidedness, national patriotism with a red Slavic-Orthodox taint, just like, incidentally a Turkic-Islamic taint, is a scandalous contradiction of the indisputable priority in Russian foreign policy of strengthening good-neighbor relations with “close neighbors” and ensuring the smooth running of the CIS mechanism. At the same time it is precisely in this former Soviet space that no better use can be made of the geopolitical and other advantages of Russia as a great Eurasian power. Both for republics with a predominantly Slavic population and states with an Asian population there is no more natural partner than Russia, which by its very nature cannot be anti-Slav or anti-Muslim, just as it can be neither pro-Slav nor pro-Muslim. What is more, for both the former and latter, Russia will be an attractive and really valuable partner just on the basis of the principles of civilized behavior-those same principles that were worked out and are defended by the CSCE. We earned the gratitude and respect of our neighbors when we actively helped them become full-fledged members of the all-European process. Continuing this line, we shall pursue a truly patriotic policy of democratic transformation both for Russia itself and for the former space of the USSR, and the creation of a community of independent states based on respect for human rights, including national minorities, Russians, Ukrainians, Germans, Uzbeks, Tajiks, Jews, on a common basis of truly democratic institutions of power, equal states, and a market economy....

Look once again at last year's instructive history lesson. If the August putsch finally alienated the republics from the idea of the Union, then the new Russia's adherence to democratic and economic reforms has earned the trust of its neighbors, and it was this that enabled it to move to the Dagomys and Yalta agreements with Ukraine and to a number of coordinating mechanisms for the Commonwealth of Independent States, and to military-political alliance with many of those states, including states in Asia, that just a year ago were apparently ready to look for an alliance with any of their neighbors to the south, but not to the north.

It is also time to remember yet another trend that is capable of reversing Russian foreign policy. This is replacing reckless ideologization for a short-sighted "economization" that is just as reckless. It is not only here that the pressure is felt, and perhaps not even so much from traditional ideological partners but rather from international outcasts-the industrial and military-industrial circles in our country. That same desire can be palpably felt to avoid and cut short the difficult stage in moving to a highly developed society, only in this case not in the political sphere but in the economic sphere. In fact, it turns out that it is not a simple matter to learn to trade with the countries that are more advanced in economic relations, or to penetrate the highly competitive markets that they have chosen. So there is a temptation to accuse them of a reluctance to meet us halfway ... and in this way to look for even some temporary easy profit from old clients who, under conditions of international sanctions that are damaging to them, are not so fastidious. With feigned naivete we often hear the call: Why is it that sanctions are being introduced against our trade and financial partners and not the West's? Does this not provide proof of some dirty game? Meanwhile, the answer is well known-like master, like man. The fact is that under the communist system, which stifled the Soviet economy in its embrace, there could be no other partners. And today, without changing our benchmarks in domestic and foreign policy and without setting a course toward a change of partners, it is impossible to count on any worthwhile place in the world economy, or on any final elimination of the suspicion among the Western business world, or the complete dismantling of Cocom [Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Controls] barriers, and so forth. Otherwise we must again set everything on its head as in these previous seventy years and ascribe the guardedness of the highly developed West as the reason for, rather than the consequence of, our own inability to manage things in a civilized way and show the necessary discernment in the selection of our partners....

In this connection we must speak of the policy of weapons exports. The fact that, even today, for us this is one of the most profitable, unchanging items of foreign trade evokes no doubts, no reproaches. In this field as perhaps in no other, however, there is a great danger of sliding onto the old rails, once again not out of ideological considerations but because of oversimplified economic considerations, when it turns out to be a difficult business to penetrate new weapons markets, where stable pro-Western countries (and these are most often best able to pay) do not acquire weapons to support international terrorism or realize aggressive plans by regimes at war with their neighbors and with all civilized peoples. Whereas the latter only dream of a return to the times when Russia used to supply the weapons of war, more often than not on credit (would that those debts could be repaid now!), the former just as naturally want to convince themselves that the old practice has ended and that the new Russia really does want to build its policy in a new way in particular regions.

And here it is not a question of ideology or the intrigues of the West, but the basic instinct for survival among the new purchasers of Russian weapons who at the same time become the victims of belligerent neighbors armed previously by the Soviet Union. The classic example here is the Persian Gulf, where even today the urgent task is to remove once and for all the threat of a repetition of the Iraqi aggression, and to secure guarantees for the elimination of chemical and other weapons of mass destruction from the Iraqi arsenals. Incidentally, the latter were for us not only military exports but also a geostrategic interest, because destabilization in that region and activation of extremist forces there, whether of the pseudo-revolutionary or Islamic fundamentalist ilk, and even more their possession of very destructive weapons and the means to deliver them over great distances, are capable of spreading with dizzying speed to the vulnerable regions of the Caucasus and Central Asia.

Concern about non-proliferation of missiles and missile technology for military purposes is also a priority for Russian foreign policy in South Asia where considerable potential for conflict exists, and even great and friendly powers, such as India, have still not subscribed to the regime of nuclear non-proliferation. So it happens that any deal, particularly when it is a question of "sensitive" technology on our southern borders, must be weighed on very accurate political scales, not bazaar scales. Only if this is done will it be possible to preserve the military-political links that fully justify themselves, as, for example, with India, and at the same time move on to promising new partners that are not subject to sanctions.

In sum all of this will be the policy of a great but normal rather than ideologized great power—a power that has respect for itself and enjoys the respect of the international community, a power of which it might be said "tell me who your friends are and I will tell you who you are," without the fear of being assigned to the category of international riffraff. For halfayear we have been convinced through positive and negative experience that normal policy, and in general normalcy as a way of behavior abroad, both near and far, has nothing in common with primitive, cavalier, sudden attacks, and improvisation. After seventy years of exclusivity, normalcy is something that we still have to learn. And paradoxical though it may seem, it requires the highest level of professionalism, whether in domestic policy or foreign policy.

When issuing a statement several months ago on behalf of Russia about entry into the Council of Europe, I especially emphasized that whereas in form it was a question of one country's joining a club of other states that already existed, what it was essentially was the beginning of a process of rapprochement and mutual adaptation. The Russian Federation is not simply one of the new members but an entire continent with an enormous and original political, historical-cultural, and economic potential. No one disputed this, and no one will if, of course, we are talking about serious policies for both them and us.

The question lies elsewhere: Will we succeed in not setting our originality in opposition to the democratic community, but in realizing it through cooperation with it? And here it is not a question of playing up to the West. It has learned to live in a civilized and prosperous way without us. For seventy years we also demonstrated our ability to live, but not by the common laws of democracy and the market. And now we can obtain financial stabilization assistance from the International Monetary Fund, while the European Community gains the respect of the Belgrade nationals. This means that once again we have seen demonstrated the adage: Know yourself! It means that once again the “Westerner,” who wants a transformed Russia to take its special place not opposite the club of the most advanced states, and not alongside it, but within it, can finally retire with a quality of life that will not make matters worse for Russians.

Of course, instead of national-patriotic political intrigue, true democratic policy faces many objective and subjective difficulties. It would be erroneous to depict the experience gained as only positive. There have been, are, and will be mistakes because only he who does nothing makes no mistakes. Let us emphasize once again that discussion within the framework of this choice and the search for the most effective scenarios are what are most needed both for the government and for society. One problem is the still uninformed nature of public opinion with regard to foreign policy. It is still sometimes difficult to distinguish in journalism between a fondness for various kinds of sensationalism and superficial assessments in the spirit of “rightist” commentators in Pravda and Sovetskaya Rossiya, the newspaper Den, or the “leftists” from Kuranty. Nevertheless, there is no alternative to real free speech, which ineluctably brings the dross to the surface. Similarly, there is no alternative to a foreign policy that meets the real national interests.

Ideology is being replaced by a normal vision of geopolitical interests. Today patriotic foreign policy is the persistent realization of four or five main priorities that make it possible to create the most favorable conditions for domestic democracy and the economic transformation of the Russian Federation. First, there is the entry as a great power into the family of the most advanced democratic states with market economies, the so-called Western society, if you will. They are just as much the natural allies of a democratic Russia as they are the sworn enemies of the totalitarian regime, whether it has red, red-and-brown, or simply brown banners. The second priority, which coincides 70 percent with the first in terms of whom it addresses, is the formation of goodneighbor relations with all states along the perimeter of the Russian border. Here, of course, a special place belongs to the CIS members and the major powers of Asia, such as India and China, and neighbors to the south of the CIS. Both these priorities could not better match the third priority-the development of mutually advantageous economic links and attracting investment and support for the domestic economy. The fourth priority is to safeguard human rights, especially for the Russian-speaking populations in neighboring republics. Effectiveness in resolving this task will depend largely on the status that Russia wins for itself in the first two priorities. And finally, the fifth priority is the balanced use in the first four priorities in foreign policy of the advantages of the Russian Federation, such as the unity and diversity of the ethnic groups, religions, and traditions. We have an unprecedented opportunity to be Asians in Asia and Europeans in Europe, and democrats in the world in general. Democrats first and foremost! Loyalty to the democratic choice in domestic and foreign policy means loyalty to the choice for which Russians voted at the first national elections in their history for a president, and which they defended at the barricades raised around the White House on 19 August 1991.

3.6 Address by Andrey Kozyrev Before the Russian Supreme Soviet

Russian Television Network, 22 October 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: On 30 June 1992, Andrey Kozyrev warned that a right-wing coup was possible in Russia—by national patriotic forces this time, rather than by communist conservatives. The national patriots were accusing Boris Yeltsin of “over-Westernizing” Russia’s foreign policy. An isolationism was emerging that stressed native (samobytnyi) traditions and questioned the need for Russia’s “return” to Europe as well as reintegration with the world economy. Under pressure from these patriots, Kozyrev drafted a foreign policy even though he basically opposed putting his policy in a single document as too ideological and reminiscent of the Soviet program. In July, however, the Supreme Soviet returned the document to the ministry for revision. Meanwhile, the parliament's Council for Defense and Foreign Policy issued an alternative policy, which emphasized good relations with Western Europe and China, and a steering away from America. It took a pessimistic view of Russia's economic outlook and talked of "encirclement," which could be mitigated by pursuing an "enlightened post-imperial integrationist course" toward the other former Soviet republics, many of which the document said had a "weak historical legitimacy" in terms of borders, ethnicity, and economic development.

By October, feeling his grasp on foreign policy beginning to slip, Kozyrev made a vigorous defense of his ministry's policies to the Russian Supreme Soviet. His speech, which follows, is a strongly worded protest against the adoption of a "Eurasianist," or eastward-leaning, foreign policy. At the same time, however, it tries to mollify the patriots by stressing the importance of Russia's "peacekeeping" role in the "near abroad" and the need for a consistent defense of Russian and Russian-speaking peoples in the surrounding states. Esteemed People's Deputies! I would like to begin with what worries me most of all. There is the danger that our debate on foreign policy will become something other than the search for the best way of realizing the interests of the country. Under the cover of slogans like "the third way," or "enlightened patriotism" (very similar to socialist patriotism), the choice of a democratic path of development adopted by the First and confirmed by all subsequent Congresses of People's Deputies of the Russian Federation is questioned: the choice of transforming Russia into a democratic country and an equal member of the community of democratic states of the world.

I must say, the government and the president adhere to this choice, and President Yeltsin, speaking from this rostrum, has confirmed this in a recent speech from this rostrum. I perceive it as my duty as Foreign Minister-confirmed by the Supreme Soviet and in the democratic program for reviving Russia as a great power open to the world-to defend the choice your body formulated both here and in the United Nations, and in meetings with the media. A return to confrontation with the world around us, especially in our current state of transition, threatens to lead to a national catastrophe. I am sure that the common sense of the Russian people and their chosen deputies will recognize the threat and will not allow a step backwards, either in domestic or foreign policy.

Esteemed People's Deputies! I do not agree with the panicky and defeatist mood that says that Russia has become a "banana republic," a "third-rate power," and that nobody takes us seriously. My attendance at the UN General Assembly session convinced me of exactly the opposite. Dozens of meetings with foreign ministers and heads of states were imbued with a feeling that they regarded us as a great power and want to do business with us and under no circumstances want us to withdraw from the international community. While my ministry agrees with this, the so-called "near abroad" (blizhnee zarubezhye) remains our first priority.

You all probably know the outcome of the Bishkek summit. 1 I will limit myself to only a few remarks about it. On the whole, the summit indicated a turn toward re-integration. On the other hand, this reintegration is occurring in different ways in separate republics. Some republics are prepared to go much further toward integration than others. Probably Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan are ready to move toward integration in the largest number of areas. I do not have to mention Russia.

I must say that our peacekeeping efforts have achieved high respect and are seen as a reserve of stability in the world. You know that some of our partners are at various levels of internal political struggle and conflict and are in the habit of accusing Russia of either lacking involvement or literally the next day accusing her of interfering too much in their affairs.

First they ask for Russian peacekeeping forces and then they accuse them of interference. Of course we are able to carry out this policy partly as a result of our prestige in the world and in the UN Security Council. Once again, this shows how closely countries near and far are linked.

A few words on the painful problem of the Baltic region. We are very glad that the Committee on International Affairs has examined issues linked to Lithuania. But Lithuania is a more or less benign case. Things are much worse in Latvia and Estonia, not so much with respect to the withdrawal of our troops, but with respect to the defense of Russians and the Russian-speaking population. I have provided you with many notes and appeals on this issue.

I would note two aspects of this problem. The first is that our efforts to mobilize international pressure in support of Russian minorities are beginning to show tangible results. Second, the internal struggle in these countries is beginning to recognize the issue of human rights. This is good, and allows us to exert our own pressure not only on foreign media but internally. Of course, this issue will require a much more sophisticated approach in the future and more delicate political work.

Note

1. The Kyrgyz capital, Bishkek, was the site of the October 1992 summit of CIS Heads of State and Government. The summit was noteworthy only for its failure to achieve a consensus on what Russia considered the vital question of a unified CIS armed forces and a draft Collective Security Treaty. By October, only six member states had signed the Collective Security Treaty which Russia proposed at the 16 May summit. The Russians also tried to secure an agreement on monetary, credit, and currency policies at the October summit, but only managed to secure commitment to a consultative committee, which Ukraine did not approve.

3.7 Boris Yeltsin Addresses Minsk Summit

Moscow Ostankino Television First Channel Network,
16 April 1993 [FBIS Translation]

In various political circles, and indeed, in the mass media, they have started speculating of late that the CIS is not capable of resolving any issues at all and almost that the CIS is moving toward disintegration. Of course, this is wrong; therefore, all we heads of state agreed to meet and generally to map out further steps to strengthen the Commonwealth of Independent States. In addition, we have agreed to meet in May in order to make specific decisions relating to the measures already drawn up. The matters facing the CIS now are posed by life itself, and the well-being of our peoples depends to a large degree on these matters being resolved. During the past we gradually realized that it is not practical to regard the CIS merely as a mechanism for a civilized divorce. The euphoria of standing apart and shutting oneself off as states is passing; the striving for restoration and development of economic and political cooperation is becoming increasingly evident. This is not surprising either. Our states are choosing their path of development independently without any force or pressure from outside.

The formation of the Commonwealth did not cause a single conflict between the former Union republics. On the contrary, over the past year, we have acquired our first experience in peacemaking actions on how to put an end to shooting and bloodshed and how to stabilize the situation. Proceeding along the path of strengthening their independence, our peoples are not losing common sense and are maintaining kind feelings toward one another. There is no need to prove today that the CIS countries are united in many more ways than they are divided. The objective community of interests is the basis for this. At our previous meeting, we all unanimously spoke in favor of improving the effectiveness of the work of the CIS. Seven participants of the CIS adopted the Charter of the Commonwealth. Yesterday, the Russian Federation Supreme Soviet ratified the Charter practically unanimously. The main thing today is to give new impetus to the development of the Commonwealth. Its childhood is over; the time has come for it to stand firmly on its own feet.

First, the time has come for the Commonwealth to form its own opinion in world politics. We believe that the formation of a common position with regard to key international problems is both possible and necessary. Why not adopt the practice of putting forward joint initiatives on foreign policy? We can start with issues that are in the interests of all. For example, joint actions on key issues of world politics like preventing weapons of mass destruction and means of delivering them, strengthening international stability, settling regional conflicts, protecting the environment, fighting against terrorism and illegal drug trafficking, as well as putting forward a joint proposal of the Commonwealth members to set up CSCE peacekeeping forces. Another possibility is organizing top-level meetings-for instance, of the Commonwealth foreign ministers with representatives of influential international organizations, such as the European Community, the Council of Europe, ASEAN [Association of Southeast Asian Nations], and some others.

Second, the key to resolving socio-political issues confronting our countries lies in the economic sphere. The time has come-and I think I shall voice a general opinion by saying this, since we have arrived at the same opinion today-to clear away most resolutely all obstacles on the way toward mutually advantageous economic cooperation. The main thing is to establish direct and, more important, free links between enterprises, producers, and consumers of goods, and their direct interaction. I have just returned from the congress of industrialists and entrepreneurs, in which about 5,000 people took part, and they instructed me to tell heads of state here that, without developing further cooperation, the market and the reform will of course progress with great difficulties. A tendency toward forming mutually advantageous unions whose members share the same interests, toward creating various transnational corporations and associations in industry and agriculture, power engineering, transport communications, and in the service sphere is gaining momentum. The task now is to support these trends in an active and concerted manner, and then we can be sure of success.

Third, we need multilateral coordination in the development of individual key industries in the national economy. The Commonwealth already has certain experience of this kind. The CIS electric and power engineering council has been set up. Already operating are a railway transport council, an interstate space council, a regional commonwealth in the field of communication, and a number of others. Agreements on the interstate oil and gas council signed in Surgut have considerable potential. Essentially, we are moving toward industrial cooperation in this sphere, including capital construction, effective use of oil and gas pipelines, scientific and technical matters, etc.

Fourth, the necessity to cooperate on investment is becoming more obvious every day, inter alia to guarantee the development of deposits in Western Siberia, on Sakhalin, on the Barents Sea shelf, and others. We can remark upon these processes or not, we can hinder them or assist them. But we cannot stop them. The development of integration requires free trade, without customs barriers, movement of goods, services, capital, and labor resources, a single monetary system, a more or less uniform legal environment in which enterprises and all sorts of entrepreneurs' structures can work, the formation of a common economic policy or at least its elements. Creating a single economic space and a common market envisages CIS countries setting up an economic union on the basis of a customs and currency union.

The customs union will make it possible to remove customs restrictions of all kinds among signatory countries, and to introduce a single customs rate along the outer CIS perimeter. The difference in price levels will disappear, and the uncontrollable speculative channeling of goods across today's transparent borders will cease.

A few words about a currency union. The ruble zone has effectively disintegrated. As we know, considerable difficulties arise with the introduction of national currencies. That is why we have already put forward our proposals for introducing relevant draft agreements on a single system. Russia is ready to continue with talks on this issue. But in the end we have to decide between either demarcating and creating our own monetary systems, or integrating. There is no third option: preserving the present situation would be dangerous for the economies of the Commonwealth countries.

It is clear that to tackle the range of economic issues we need to create a special permanent committee with appropriate powers. I am sure it is possible to turn the Commonwealth into an effective interstate association capable of coordinating interests and uniting efforts in the cause of economic progress.

Strengthening military-political cooperation seems to be topical. An effective system of collective security is probably not possible without forming a defense union, although not everyone agrees with this. A treaty on collective security can become the core of this system. It is important that the treaty come into force and the organizational structures envisaged by it be created in the shortest possible time.

It is worthwhile to think about establishing a mechanism for its implementation that would take into consideration the possibility of the CIS countries who have not signed the treaty joining it. We should also clearly define the role of the commander-in-chief in the organizational structure of the military-political leadership of the joint armed forces of the treaty member states. The possibility of setting up joint armed forces in the future, perhaps, with the participation of some states under a single coalition command, should not be ruled out.

The development of events inside the CIS and on its borders is more and more urgently demanding joint peacekeeping actions. To regulate and prevent armed conflicts, a set of concrete collective measures should be drawn up within the CIS framework and appropriate mechanisms set up, using wherever appropriate the experiences of the United Nations and the CSCE.

Russia is prepared to take part in peacekeeping actions, but of course it cannot bear the burden of responsibility, both moral and financial, single-handedly. In this connection, I would like to draw your attention to the fact that similar accords are not always fulfilled, putting it mildly.

In order for the Commonwealth fully to live up to its name and fulfill its purpose, it is necessary to ensure strict observance of human rights in all the CIS states. An analysis of local conflicts in the countries of the Commonwealth leads one to conclude that in practically all the primary cause has been violations of human rights or the rights of national minorities. This is of course a very difficult and delicate problem for our Commonwealth. But I am convinced that there would be no friction or conflict if all members of the CIS strictly observed internationally recognized standards of human rights and freedoms. So we call on all our partners to accede to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and UN pacts on human rights as soon as possible.

We believe that one of the priority areas for the implementation of the CIS Charter is to ensure that a commission on human rights is established and starts work as soon as possible. We also propose that a regional convention to protect persons belonging to national minorities be concluded.

Esteemed council members, it is obvious to Russia that the Commonwealth ought to become an effective interstate association, whose members play a real part in various forms of cooperation and bear their portion of responsibility. Such logic leaves no room for living at others' expense or attempts to derive one-sided advantage at the expense of others. At the same time, it completely rules out the notorious habit of encouraging disciplined partners and punishing the negligent ones. The charter of the Commonwealth of Independent States is essentially aimed at this. The principle of it is simple and comprehensible-equal rights, equal obligations, equal advantages and benefits.

Let's call a spade a spade. He who does not sign the charter will in effect remain outside the main channel of cooperation within the framework of the Commonwealth, with all the consequences that stem from that. It is possible that these countries are placing emphasis on developing bilateral relations. They will find an honest and reliable partner in Russia, with whom they can cooperate on the basis of generally accepted norms of international law. The choice is open to each state.

Participants in the CIS interested in deepening cooperation on joint settlement of economic and other problems could conclude an agreement within the framework of the CIS, of course, after it had been prepared, possibly in May. The signing of agreements of this kind does not mean resuscitating the unified state or returning to the former Union bodies of authority and management. Participants in the conference retain their independence and sovereign rights. We are talking about giving our relations new momentum and multiplying our forces to tackle everyday problems. We have talked about and discussed many of these issues today, when only heads of state were at the first part of the sitting. Thank you all for your attention.

3.8 Andrey Kozyrev on Russia's Peacekeeping Role in the CIS

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 22 September 1993 [CD Translation]

One sometimes gets the impression that the world community underestimates or doesn't understand the seriousness of the threat that conflicts in the area of the former USSR pose to the cause of regional and world peace. At the same time, one can see a certain reticence, if not suspicion, regarding Russia's role in settling these conflicts.

There must be complete clarity on these points.

Owing to its close historical, political, cultural, and other ties with the neighboring states, Russia could not- nor did it have the moral right to-remain indifferent to their requests for help in ensuring peace. Back when the world community was just beginning to take a closer look at the “hot spots” in the former USSR, and sometimes simply trying to find them on the map, Russia was the first to provide mediation and its good offices in searching for ways to reach settlements and to aid the populations suffering as a result of hostilities- among them several hundred thousand Russians and Russian-speakers. Russian Federation soldiers and officers have had to stand between the warring sides in order to stop the bloodshed, and in some areas they still are doing so. But in all cases, without exception, Russia’s peacemaking and peacekeeping efforts in the former USSR have been made with the consent of and at the request of the parties to the conflicts, and its peacekeeping contingents have been sent into the conflict zones on the basis of appropriate agreements. These agreements are not at variance with the UN Charter. This was the case in South Ossetia and the Dniester region, and operations in Abkhazia and Tajikistan are being readied in accordance with the same principles. The United Nations and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe are regularly briefed on these efforts. Moreover, there is a UN or CSCE presence in virtually all these zones-in the form of special missions, representatives, or observers. They are performing their functions in a worthy manner, and we are grateful for this.

Russia and its neighbors have repeatedly proposed closer cooperation with the United Nations and the CSCE, but so far the response to these proposals has been clearly insufficient. It seemed that things were starting to change when the agreements that were reached between the Georgian and Abkhazian sides this July in Sochi with Russian mediation were reinforced by a Security Council decision to establish a UN observer mission in Abkhazia. However, only 22 of the 88 promised observers have arrived in the conflict zone to date. Moreover, Russia and Georgia, with the Abkhaz side's agreement, have urged the United Nations to send international peacekeeping forces to the contingent stationed in Sukhumi for this purpose. If this contingent had been significantly reinforced and the United Nations had promptly heeded our appeal, it might have been possible to prevent the collapse of the Sochi agreements and the new outbreak of war in Abkhazia. However, the United Nations still hasn't responded, although this does not, of course, justify footdragging on our part.

We are today on the threshold of a similar choice in the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict. Whether we like it or not, there is no alternative to a Russian Federation peacekeeping contingent in this conflict either; immediately after a settlement mechanism is set in motion, this contingent should be given the status of a UN force and reinforced with UN units from neutral European CSCE member countries. Here too, we ourselves, as well as the United Nations, must do our historical duty. It would be irresponsible to evade this.

It is time to overcome both our own “internal” foot-dragging and the world community’s indecision with regard to Russia’s peacekeeping efforts in the former Soviet space. This is not a “neo-imperialistic” space, but a unique geopolitical one in which no one is going to keep the peace for Russia. At the same time, it is an integral part of the global system of international relations that is subordinate to universal legal norms and is undergoing fundamental changes. The “classical” standards with which the United Nations approached peacekeeping operations decades ago are not appropriate today. But we hear doubts: Is it good to have the parties to a conflict and a “neighboring country” participate in peacekeeping contingents? This, it is said, goes against UN practice. But one must proceed from real life, not stereotyped patterns, especially since the new approaches have already proved their effectiveness in the Dniester region and South Ossetia, for example. Of course, as in any endeavor, especially a new one, some snags are unavoidable, but can the answer really be to give up in the face of difficulties? ...

To put it bluntly, Russia alone has borne the heavy financial burden of real peacekeeping in conflicts along its periphery for two years now. At the same time, the pay that Russian soldiers and officers and their partners in these operations are receiving is hundreds of times less than the pay for UN operations. And this is at a time when we are regularly being charged multimillion-dollar dues to pay for UN peacekeeping operations in distant regions.

Russia recognizes its obligations to the United Nations. But the United Nations is a universal organization, and it too is obliged to recognize that the efforts of Russia and its neighbors to maintain peace and stability in the former Soviet space are at least as important for regional and international security as, for example, extinguishing crises in Central America. We are convinced of the need for genuinely concerned participation and real support-not just sympathetic attention-from the international community.

Needless to say, Russia will not abandon its neighbors and friends, no matter what happens. Unless we find the political will and real resources-troops and hardware, to put it bluntly-for peacekeeping in the former Soviet zone, this vacuum will be filled by others, above all the forces of political extremism, which also threaten Russia itself.

However, cooperation with the world community and the United Nations will make efforts to solve current problems in the new states both easier and less costly for everyone. The UN Secretary General, in a recent article in Nezavisimaya Gazeta, rightly stressed repeatedly that any peacekeeping operation always costs less than war, above all in terms of the most precious commodity-human lives. The time has come to turn these ideas into practical actions and to make UN support for peacekeeping efforts by Russia and its neighbors much more substantial.

3.9 Andrey Kozyrev Addresses Russian Ambassadors to CIS States

Aleksandr Krylovich and Georgiy Shemelev
TASS, 20 January 1994 [ITAR-TASS]

Editor's Note: By January 1994, Kozyrev's foreign policy approach had rotated one hundred and eighty degrees. It clearly displayed the growing influence of the Russian military on what to do about CIS "hot spots," and on Russia's "peacekeeping" role (which was becoming a euphemism for the use of force). If we compare the following speech with his 1992 address to parliament, the acquiescence to a "national-patriot" viewpoint, probably in order to survive politically, is clearly discernible. His language is that of the moderate nationalists, but the practical results are that Russia has claimed a right to deploy peacekeeping forces to any part of the CIS it deems necessary.

Russia is playing a special role and has a special mission in establishing the Commonwealth of Independent States on the territory of the former Soviet Union, Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev said.

The statement was made in his closing speech at a conference on Russia's foreign policy in the Commonwealth and the Baltic states in Moscow today. The conference was attended by the Russian ambassadors to the CIS republics and the Baltic states and representatives of various departments and organizations.

This line lies between two extremist approaches. The first approach is to send tanks and restore some post-imperial space by force. The second one boils down to demands that Russia should leave the former Soviet republics and forget about its historic ties, about what it has achieved over centuries, and its special relations in this space sealed by the common history and culture of the multimillion-strong Russian-speaking population.

“Millions of our brethren, neighbors if you please, do not view and have never viewed Russia as an imperial center. There have been no relations under which one would only take, as a colonial power, while the other would only give. There are lots of examples when the Russian center provided assistance, technologies, culture, and education to other parts of the former 'big country.' That was a process of mutual enrichment. No one will ever be able to escape these historic, humanitarian, economic, and cultural ties.

"I believe that both approaches are anti-historic and unrealistic. The implementation of either one would lead to a repetition of the Yugoslav scenario on the expanses of the former Soviet Union. The sending of tanks would automatically unleash a war of all against all. We have avoided this. And we will never let ourselves be led by pseudo-patriots who are pushing Russia into a fratricidal war with Ukraine and other republics of the former Soviet Union. However, negligence of Russia's 'special role,' and a panicky escape from former Soviet republics, would bring the same result. It is Russian troops that bear the major part of the burden and face bullets. The 'special,' but not imperial, role of Russia is to ward this off.

"Suppose we leave Tajikistan, abandon our peacekeeping role in Abkhazia, Ossetia, Karabakh. Where would millions of refugees go? They will go to Moscow. We cannot and will not allow this to happen. They should stay where they are, but on a new basis," Kozyrev said.

The minister said that he continues to call for creating a legal basis for the presence of Russian troops in the republics that request it. This will protect the troops legally. They will know their rights and duties, and no one will be allowed to say that their presence is illegal. That's what respect for the sovereignty of other states is all about.

The misunderstanding of Russia's "special" role causes hysterical and panicky cries that Kozyrev wants to preserve Russian bases, the minister said. So, if Russian bases give too much trouble to someone in the West, this is a sign that people there have either failed to get rid of Russia's image as an enemy or are trying to revive it.

Kozyrev dwelt upon the foreign reaction to his speech at the opening of the conference yesterday. He said that a statement by the U.S. State Department spokesman in which he argues with him can cause nothing but bewilderment. Kozyrev said he told the U.S. ambassador in Moscow today that he cannot accept such behavior and expects it to be changed.

The reaction of the Baltic neighbors is even stranger, Kozyrev stressed. It seems that someone in Latvia needs an incident. The incident involving Russian army officers in Latvia is over, but someone obviously needed this hysteria about words that in this particular case have nothing to do with Latvia. They even speak about the sovereignty of the Baltic states which they fear Kozyrev may damage. This will be even more comical if one recalls that it was Boris Yeltsin and Andrey Kozyrev who presented representatives of the three republics with a presidential decree recognizing their sovereignty after the August 1991 putsch.

"Speaking about their sovereignty and independence, which they are so carefully protecting from my statements, when they address the United States in a public statement, it seems that they are seeking to get into another dependency,” the minister said.

Russia calls for an organized withdrawal of its troops on a contractual and civilized basis, Kozyrev continued. Where they will stay for a long time, a principle for their presence, a legal basis, should be determined. Their withdrawal cannot occur all at once, but should take into account all circumstances that are well known to the Baltic states. This will also strengthen their sovereignty. “So I believe everything is absolutely clear on this issue,” the minister noted.

Speaking about the status of the Russian minority in other republics, Kozyrev said there is much speculation and misunderstanding on this issue. This topic cannot be a subject for intrigue because human lives are involved. We will not solve this problem by force, ultimatums, or armed confrontation with the republics as some propose. This would be political adventurism. But neither will we say that there is no such problem in independent states and republics, and that it should not be discussed or even raised because this may be perceived as Russian imperialism or as a concession to red-brown pseudo patriots. We will raise these questions and show responsibility without causing hysteria. We will calmly and seriously work on these problems. However, if, despite endless recommendations of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) and the Council of Europe, and our tactical suggestions, laws (like in Latvia) that lead to deportation of people are adopted, such laws and even their orientation cannot leave us indifferent.

One can violate CSCE recommendations, one can challenge international norms and deport thousands of people because, as it turns out, Moscow should keep silent, Kozyrev should keep silent. Otherwise they will be Zhirinovskiy's agents. We will not yield to blackmailing by our pro-fascist forces, but neither will we give in to that other blackmailing either. We will react in the most decisive way to mass and gross violations of human rights. All these questions can be solved calmly without hysteria. In the event of a reckless line aimed at creating a spot of tension and destabilizing the situation, Russia, of course, will not keep silent and will resort to tough measures. If need be, it will impose economic sanctions. I would like our Western partners to take this seriously, for there would be no double standards in the protection of human rights. Instead of indulging in empty rhetoric about Russian imperialism, we would like the West to take a more serious position on this human rights and therefore international problem," Kozyrev said.

3.10 Russia's "Westernization" Stage Is Seen as Over

Segodnya, 24 November 1994 [CD Translation]

The time has come to tally some results. One stage of the transformation of post-communist Russia has ended, and a fundamentally new one is beginning. The first period was marked by a course aimed at rapid Westernization and "entry into Europe" and by a completely pro-Western orientation in foreign and domestic policy, with enormous hopes for decisive Western economic assistance and Western solidarity with a country that had thrown off communism; had set everyone free, heedless even of its own losses and interests; had voluntarily and happily capitulated in the Cold War; and had voluntarily taken on the burden of reparations for that defeat.

This period began under Gorbachev and peaked in the first quarter of 1992, when Egor Gaydar said: "We have an opportunity to use for our reform resources that significantly exceed our domestic possibilities." These hopes on the part of political leaders did not just fall from the sky; they were grounded in a very optimistic public mood that was fully commensurate with them. This period ended in defeat and disappointment—a defeat for the West, which for all practical purposes totally missed the opportunity to bring about Russia's "soft" integration into the "Western world," leaving those political forces in Russia that had been counting on a Western future in the position of undoubted political outsiders. Now objectively thinking pro-Western democrats who understand the hopelessness of political mimicry are very much aware of the modesty of their immediate prospects. They hope only for one thing: that they will not pass on the cause of post-communist evolution, which they began, into the worst possible hands. Incidentally, this is what is giving impetus (at least some impetus) to the dreary idea that they themselves might personally nurture some sort of “social democratic future.” ...

The stage of transformation that is beginning today is a national stage. We must get it into our heads that Russia is going to emerge from its very grave and very inevitable crisis on its own, with no support from outside. No one is going to help us, although some can hinder us a great deal. We need foreign investments, and we will get them if all goes well, but investments are not aid. We will get them on very tough market terms.

In this situation, the range of possibilities is much broader than it is under the “pro-Western” vector, which posits a specific ideal model and has patented external inspectors to track and evaluate the parameters of movement toward this model. This new unpredictability gives rise to fear, perhaps fully justified fear, among democrats-both our domestic “Westerners” and the actual foreign ones. National development with an inevitable measure of autarky, first of all a cultural/values autarky, is fraught with the danger of very exotic forms of originality that are not limited by civilization and common sense. At the same time, all national-patriotic constructs imply, in one way or another, the restoration of state management of the economy, something that is hardly possible to accomplish-even at the cost of considerable bloodshed-when the state itself is breaking up. One can console oneself with the thought that no national-socialist prospect for Russia exists, that it is simply a road to disaster, but this is poor consolation, especially for the Russian population.

However, national development creates previously unknown prospects for Russian liberalism and for the building of a truly free economy and an organic societal structure grounded in natural traditions and possibilities and in national cultural values. In building state, public, and economic institutions virtually from scratch and ridding itself of social constructivists who seek to impose on Russia their own “models” (from American to Chinese), Russia will be able to realize advantages that virtually no other country has at present.

There is another undoubted plus in all this, especially as concerns the choice of political solutions: We will no longer have to keep looking slavishly over our shoulder at the West, fearing that we will get a grade of “poor” in “democracy” or in “foreign policy behavior.” The period of “training for life” has ended, and everything that can be comprehended has been comprehended. We need partners, but we do not need mentors. In light of the discussions, which have been drawn out to indecent lengths, on admitting Russia even to the Council of Europe, for example, one can assume that when the West finally gets around to admitting us, there simply will be no one left in Russia with whom to discuss the matter. Perhaps that is all to the good.

3.11 Russian Efforts on CIS Integration Assessed

A. Kolesnikov

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 7 October 1995 [FBIS

Translation]

Editor's Note: Within Russia, a backlash developed in 1995 against deep economic integration with the CIS states, especially if based on geopolitical and military-political reasoning rather than sound economic rationale. According to writers for Russian economic journals such as Kommersant Daily, the only Russian companies that are lobbying for closer CIS economic integration have been those in the energy sector. The economic integration scheme known as “financial-industrial groups” has never taken off (only one serious one exists in Kazakhstan-Interros), and other joint enterprise schemes have also been abandoned. Privatization is only beginning to be developed in Ukraine and Kazakhstan, and exists only on the level of promises in Belarus. Deep integration, therefore, while it should be taken as a serious Russian strategic policy, is not to be rationalized or legitimized on the basis of “restoring essential economic links,” as the following article so aptly argues.

The most radical turn in Russian policy has occurred in the area of cooperation with CIS countries. The Ministry for Cooperation with Member States of the Commonwealth of Independent States, originally the State Committee on Economic Cooperation with Member States of the Commonwealth, whose chairman was Vladimir Mashchits, one of the bright stars on Gaydar’s team, has renounced its former priorities announced just a year ago.

At the end of 1994, Russia, proceeding from economic and not from geopolitical reasoning, which is the case today, attempted to rid itself of the traditional role of a financialeconomic donor of “spiritually close,” and not so close, republics. Repayment of credits issued by Russia never did take place. By the way, let us also note it was doubly difficult to repay them because as early as February 1992, massive credits to countries of the so-called ruble zone (the elimination of which took two years) began. According to data of the Institute of Economic Analysis in May 1992, the volume of credit reached 8.4 percent of Russia's GDP (in February it was just 1.2 percent of the GDP). (Simultaneously the import of inflation from other countries began.) Such extensive credits are essentially impossible to repay (between 1992 and 1994, $5.6 billion in state credits had been extended).

At the meeting of Commonwealth Heads of Government in December 1994, Viktor Chernomyrdin threatened his colleagues with a credit cutoff in 1995 if the debt was not settled in 1994.

The priorities changed in less than one year. Unfortunately, the restoration of former ties at any cost, mainly economic cost, is now considered to be of paramount importance. Geopolitics began to determine economics, while, at the same time, Gaydar's version of reform, which was not yet complete but which defined a certain political landscape, was oriented toward the self-sufficient transformation of Russia without the participation of under-reformed or totally unreformed CIS countries. This is what constitutes the complexity of integration in its new variant.

The Ministry for Cooperation with Member States of the CIS does not recognize that the levels of economic development of the CIS countries must be evened out, after which cooperation and integration with Russia will be worthwhile. First, judging by everything, there is no unanimous opinion in the ministry concerning the depth and intensity of integration. Second, the idea of a customs union has received far from enthusiastic endorsement from representatives of other economic agencies: the Ministry of Economics and Ministry of Finance count the losses, while the Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations is concerned with the possible entry of Kazakhstan into the World Trade Organization.

Supporters of a deeper integration have something to say about this. Let reintegration here and now bring certain losses, but later the advantages of closer cooperation, including those of a customs union whose area is expanding, will become self-evident.

The truth, as usual, is apparently to be found somewhere in the middle. It is not worth being hasty only because it is necessary to ensure the security of ethnic Russians against arbitrary action by local authorities, while at the same time, of necessity providing them with jobs. As a start, it would be good to load up the local enterprises and provide work for citizens within Russia. In addition, it is necessary to restrain inflation, where the next regular upswing in imports is inevitable as a result of the increase in the volume of credits. Integration processes really must be synchronized economically and legislatively (work, by the way, is still under way on a model “CIS code,” without which civilized economic relations are quite impossible). Synchronization of economic development has not yet reached a level where political and geopolitical motives come into play. A large degree of economic and social prosperity is necessary for that purpose.

It appears that executive power in Russia has been hasty in declaring a geopolitical championship. First-place positions in that tournament will bring no benefits now.

3.12 Kozyrev Responds to Reports of “Impending Dismissal”

Andrey Krasnoshchyokov and Igor Shchyogolev
ITAR-TASS, 20 October 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Russian foreign minister Andrey Kozyrev has voiced his response to the media reports on his impending dismissal.

Yeltsin, departing for his official visit to France together with Kozyrev today, backtracked on his Thursday [19 October] statement at a new conference that he considered replacement of Kozyrev, saying that the foreign minister remains in his post.

“I feel as I did yesterday,” Kozyrev told reporters today.

“The president is being exposed to a strong pressure from dark forces, from people whose minds are closed, who cannot imagine Russia as a normal member of the international community. He needs to be helped to resist this pressure,” Kozyrev said.

Kozyrev stressed that he is not pro-Western, but struggles for Russia’s interests.

However, a weighed and open approach to this job requires an understanding that it is in Russia’s interests to develop ties with the West, and vice versa, Kozyrev continued.

He said that Russian diplomacy should work better to promote Russia’s cooperation with international organizations and educate Russians into the notion that Russia may live only with the world around it.

Otherwise, Russia will return behind the Iron Curtain or some sort of fence, with Russian pseudo-patriots sitting behind it and scaring the world with their surprises, Kozyrev said.

3.13 Daily Names Potential Candidates

Maksim Yusin

Izvestiya, 21 October 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Before departing for Paris on the morning of 20 October Boris Yeltsin stated at Vnukovo Airport that Andrey Kozyrev will remain foreign minister, admittedly without saying for how long. These words are unlikely to have reassured Andrey Vladimirovich: After the president’s news conference Thursday [19 October] the Foreign Ministry chief can hardly be under any illusions as to his future. The fate of post-

Soviet Russia's first foreign minister is effectively a foregone conclusion. Who is going to replace him?

The range of candidates is fairly extensive. The list of contenders can be conveniently divided into two groups: Foreign Ministry staffers and "outsiders." As a rule those in the first category are people who do not belong to "Kozyrev's team" and whose promotion to leading positions in Russian diplomacy took place in times when Andrey Vladimirovich was still an unknown official in the USSR Foreign Ministry International Organizations Administration. Younger diplomats who entered the ministry leadership following the Soviet Union's disintegration are closely associated with their boss and his policies.

The figure of a veteran who has never been part of Kozyrev's entourage looks more acceptable in this sense. The names of Russia's ambassador to the United States Yuliy Vorontsov and ambassador to Britain Anatoliy Adamishin are being mentioned as potential Foreign Ministry candidates increasingly frequently. Both have a reputation as fairly conservative politicians (compared to the "early" Kozyrev, at any rate) and should not be rejected by the Duma's communist-nationalist majority.

It would be extremely risky from the viewpoint of their future careers for younger and more ambitious diplomats to accept the offer to head the Foreign Ministry right now. The situation in Russia is too unstable. If Yeltsin loses the upcoming presidential election he could quite easily take his entire team into political oblivion with him, including the Foreign Ministry chief, who will in one way or another be associated with a defeated head of state. This is why few people are mentioning Vitaliy Churkin, Russia's best-known diplomat, who is riding out Moscow's political storms in Brussels, as Kozyrev's possible successor. His time has not yet come, although it cannot be ruled out that Vitaliy Ivanovich's candidacy for the ministerial post will be seriously considered as early as June next year.

The "outsiders" include the ostensible favorite Vladimir Lukin, chairman of the Duma International Affairs Committee, especially as Vladimir Petrovich has never made any particular secret of his desire to hold Kozyrev's job-to hold it not for a few months but for a really long time. Therein lies the difficulty of the choice facing Lukin: Should he accept Yeltsin's possible offer he would, as it were, become a member of the "party of power," heaping on himself all its "sins," which would not be the best pre-election gift for the "Yabloko" bloc. It is hardly worth Lukin's while to jump the gun. In eight months' time, after the presidential election, he will have a good chance of heading the Foreign Ministry without linking his fate with Yeltsin's team.

There is one other possible candidate-Dmitriy Ryurikov, the president's foreign affairs adviser. His nomination seems not so very unlikely, bearing in mind that there have already been precedents for Yeltsin appointing people from his inner circle to key posts in the state (the security minister, for example). In addition, in the last few weeks there have been periodic rumors of Deputy Prime Minister Vitaliy Ignatenko's impending arrival in Smolenskaya Square [location of Foreign Ministry], and the name of Foreign Intelligence Service Director Evgeniy Primakov has also occasionally cropped up.

Be that as it may, there is no doubt that after Kozyrev the Foreign Ministry will pursue the same “presidential foreign policy” as it did under Kozyrev. The only thing for which Yeltsin could never criticize the disgraced minister is for being excessively principled, independent, and unwilling to adapt his views to the Kremlin’s constantly changing foreign policy line. Boris Nikolaevich will hardly allow the new head of Russian diplomacy to have shortcomings of which his predecessor, who despite all the forecasts and rumors kept his post for five years, was so fortunately devoid.

3.14 Yeltsin Accepts Kozyrev's Resignation

ITAR-TASS, 5 January 1996 [FBIS Translation]

Russian president Boris Yeltsin signed an edict today releasing Andrey Kozyrev from the post of foreign minister in connection with his election as deputy in the State Duma, the presidential press service told an ITAR-TASS correspondent.

Forty-four-year-old Andrey Kozyrev has headed the foreign political department since October 1990.

The National-Patriots

3.15 Russian Foreign Policy Under Fire

Yuriy Glukhov

Pravda, 24 February 1992 [CD Translation], Excerpts

Editor's Note: The following section looks at developments in the thinking of Russia's "national-patriots," many of whom have influenced Russian policy from their seats in the Russian parliament and on parliamentary committees.

The national-patriot political viewpoint is expressed by members of the military-industrial complex, disillusioned "democrats," some of whom supported President Yeltsin in 1991, and former communists who have chosen radical nationalism over a return to the Communist Party to replace the ideological credo that was lost with the dissolution of the USSR.

As the following article shows so clearly, the nationalists attacked from the outset Yeltsin and Kozyrev's dramatic departure in Russian foreign policy, which, had it worked, would have made the idea of a democratic zone stretching from Vancouver to Tokyo seem less empty.

The new political thinking seemed to promise enormous material benefits for both the USSR and the world as a whole...

Why, then, did we suddenly fall into a deep pit of debt? The loans and credits we have taken total $70 billion already and will top $200 billion by 1995.

First, the disarmament and conversion process itself has proved to be costly and to require special preparations and billions in appropriations, something that was yet another surprise for our politicians and economists. Second, after shifting to payment in freely convertible currency, it turned out that neither we nor our trading partners had any hard currency. The familiar economic relations that had developed over decades were severed, and no new ones have yet been established. The result is losses. Virtually the same thing has happened with our writing off costly allies and partners (Cuba, Ethiopia, Afghanistan, and others). In one way or another, the scope of cooperation has narrowed, especially with respect to the Third World. Our expanding ties with the West have not compensated for these losses. Our overscrupulousness about arms sales, which resembles a teetotaler's behavior in the company of alcoholics, has also made a hole in the budget.

Unlike us, the practical Americans, for some reason, have not yielded to the euphoria of romanticism and have not cut back either the production or sale of weapons. While the Soviet Army loses its former fighting capability and disintegrates under the influence of the USSR's disintegration, the U.S. Armed Forces are building up their might. While the Warsaw Pact has broken up, NATO continues to grow stronger. And while it was formerly said that there were neither victors nor vanquished in the Cold War and that friendship ultimately triumphed, today the United States has unreservedly declared itself the winner. The Yankees still put their faith in the cult of strength.

Unfortunately, the new political thinking has remained purely our own. Yes, humanity has reached a critical point, threatened by global catastrophe; it is essential to disarm. We ourselves have been exhausted by the mindless arms race. But disarmament and the current unilateral destruction of our military potential are two completely different things. Having torn apart the Union, we have been unable to exploit the enormous positive potential of the USSR's new policy. The Soviet-American disarmament agreements, which were so carefully scrutinized by the experts and based on strategic balance, aren't worth the paper they're written on. We can console ourselves with the thought that the new political thinking and our sacrifice in the name of peace may be duly appreciated in the future: After all, for the second time in the history of the twentieth century, we have burned down our own house in order to light the way for humanity....

The foreign policy of Russia, which has declared itself the Union's successor, is undergoing a transformation: from a policy of peaceful coexistence (Khrushchev and Brezhnev) and partnership (Gorbachev), to allied relations with the West (Yeltsin).

An alliance presupposes an orientation: It is created in the name of something or against someone. However, no such clarity exists. ... Judging from our leaders' practical actions and pronouncements, the West is being chosen to guide us, since the Cyclops of the Soviet Union preferred to blind itself rather than look at the world with the single eye of the communist vision and has now lost its bearings.

We are on a leash of hunger. Given a desire, the mere manipulation of deliveries of food aid could be used to strangle any regime deemed objectionable.

The Russian leadership says that the fate of economic reforms and democracy itself and the triumph of the incipient renewal process depend on the West's involvement. But what, then, is our own role in this?

We hear constant appeals to the United Nations for help in resolving our conflicts, such as the one in Nagorno-Karabakh. This is tantamount to a declaration of the Commonwealth's inability to manage its own affairs.

The primacy of international law over the laws of individual states is being declared, and the possibility of using force to deal with "disturbers of the peace," as was done with Iraq, is being acknowledged. The Russian Foreign Minister has made his own contribution to the advocacy of "civilized" intervention. I wonder whether he was thinking in abstract or concrete terms. Given the legal chaos that reigns on the territory of the former USSR, such a theory of a "new world order" readily lends itself to intervention in our internal affairs. I wouldn't be surprised if there is soon talk of armed international support for an "independent Crimea," the Kuriles, Kaliningrad, Chechnya, Tatarstan, etc....

It would behoove us to avoid succumbing solely to unrequited love and to consider the extent to which our interests coincide with those of the United States. What role, for example, will be assigned to Russia, which has proposed taking part in the American Strategic Defense Initiative? The role of a trace horse? I think that our immature Russian diplomacy suffers from nocturnal emissions of infertile initiatives that are devoid of either knowledge of the situation or foresight. Hence such failures as the fruitless talks with the Afghan opposition, the futile personal mediation of B. Yeltsin and N. Nazarbaev in the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict, the scandals surrounding an autonomous area for the Germans and the retargeting of strategic missiles, which frightened Ukraine and Belarus, and much more....

Without belittling the importance of relations with the world's number one power-the United States or the need to declare Russia's legal succession to the Union, I think that the Russian president should have made his first official visits after the proclamation of the CIS to the Commonwealth capitals. And he should have hurried to Kiev at the first hint of frictions with Ukraine, if only to squelch false rumors that the USSR had been abolished in order to remove Gorbachev, rather than for the sake of preserving Russian-Ukrainian friendship. That did not happen. The moment was lost, and we are seeing the disastrous consequences of the neglect of Russian policy's main priority-the strengthening of the Commonwealth, without which we cannot survive. The Ukrainian chain continues to acquire more and more links of conflict-the army, the Black Sea Fleet, the Crimea, ruble-coupons, resettlement of the Germans, a counteralliance with the FRG, etc....

It is inadmissible to put forward initiatives and assume responsibility for the resolution of issues that affect the interests of the other CIS members without even informing them. And that is precisely what Russian diplomacy is guilty of. Relations within the Commonwealth cannot take second place to relations with the outside world; they must take priority.

No foreign aid can compensate for the losses we have suffered as a result of the disruption of economic ties .... The nationwide miners' strike that was supported by the Russian president no doubt cost an amount equal to all the charitable aid we are receiving today. We wouldn't have to go begging had we headed off the decline in the production of industrial goods, metal, and oil, and brought in the harvest. But the decline continues. Meanwhile, our statesmen are demonstrating great skill at borrowing more and more and more from other countries.

Returning to the "peace dividend," it must be said with some sadness that our diplomacy is disastrously unprofitable, both economically and politically. Marx once wrote with delight of the tireless mole of history. I think that mole embodies our zeal today too, although it has changed its Marxist coloring to a democratic one. The trouble is that moles cannot see, and they dig blindly.

3.16 Ambartsumov on the Need for Change in Foreign Policy

Interview by Vitaliy Buzuev

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 13 April 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[Interview with Evgeniy Ambartsumov, chairman of the Supreme Soviet Committee for International Affairs and Foreign Economic Relations, by Vitaliy Buzuev.]

Until very recently, it looked as if it was going to be far easier building diplomatic relations with the former Soviet republics than with Western countries. But life has overturned that assumption. The Russian Foreign Ministry's initial attempts to take an active stand have left many experts feeling disappointed. Why? I asked Evgeniy Ambartsumov, chairman of the Supreme Soviet Committee for International Affairs and Foreign Economic Relations.

[Ambartsumov]: The young Russian Foreign Ministry appears to have taken the methods of dealing with capitalist countries evolved by the old Union department and projected them into a totally different arena, the turbulent CIS. It is easy to continue the policy of disarmament and easing tension in relations with the West, because there is something to be continued. But totally different methods are needed for working with the CIS countries. Take negotiations, for example, I do not think they can be as “civilized” as our negotiations with Western countries; normal partnerships have yet to evolve within the CIS, and the compromises that Russia seeks to make are interpreted as a sign of weakness. Talks must have more of a “family” atmosphere about them, if you like. This does not mean, however, that dialogue within the “family” (we are not talking about Stalin’s “family of peoples,” of course) cannot be tough. Yet it is bad when dialogue is reduced to a slinging match. It goes without saying that we have a right to expect greater firmness from our foreign minister when defending Russia’s interests in the CIS countries and the interests of Russians who have become foreigners against their own free will. I think many people now realize that the previous foreign policy practice of Russia concluding agreements with the former Soviet republics was detrimental to the cause (the agreements were drawn up by the Foreign Ministry, incidentally). This is mainly because it did not resolve problems connected with the rights of our compatriots and our property. Russia concedes to its neighbors in everything nowadays, receiving nothing in return. The interests of our compatriots are being flouted. They are treated as second-class citizens: They cannot acquire property, and those who do not speak the language cannot get work. Of course, they themselves bear some of the responsibility for the fact that they have not learned Estonian or Lithuanian, for example, but the state in which they live cannot even provide them with textbooks and teachers.

[Buzuev]: Nevertheless, the Russian Foreign Ministry has recently been trying to catch up with events. Take Andrey Kozyrev's recent visit to Moldova and the Dniester region, for example....

[Ambartsumov]: Talking about the Foreign Ministry trying to catch up with events, I am reminded of a recent joke that made the rounds among deputies after the U.S. secretary of state's lightning tour of the CIS countries. Question: Who is the CIS foreign minister? Answer: James Baker. It is a good thing, of course, that Andrey Vladimirovich Kozyrev made this trip. But I am not satisfied with the agreement that our minister signed in Chisinau with three other foreign ministers-Romanian, Ukrainian, and Moldovan. The document lacks balance. It does not consider the interests of another side involved: the Dniester region....

[Ambartsumov]: A perfectly valid complaint. Russia is certainly not obliged to recognize the Dniester region as a sovereign state, but it is nevertheless involved in the conflict. Azerbaijan recognizes that Nagorno-Karabakh is involved in the conflict over there. So why has our minister not secured similar recognition from Moldova? He has had the opportunity to do so, after all. The English political lexicon contains the concept of “bargaining,” which translates rather crudely into Russian as “haggling.” We really should have engaged in some haggling.

[Buzuev]: Why do you think that “haggling” would have been successful?

[Ambartsumov]: About two weeks ago, some representatives of the Moldovan parliament arrived in Moscow. During talks with us, they agreed that the Dniester region should be given not only special economic status but special political status as well. Admittedly, finding themselves under pressure, they later went back on this agreement. But another group of Moldovan parliamentary deputies visited us recently. We succeeded in drawing up a very balanced document in the course of an evening. I should point out in particular that it was signed by Russian deputies with the most diverse political views. It does not demand recognition for the Dniester region. It proposes special legal status for the region and speaks of the need to separate the hostile sides with the aid of 14th Army units. It looked as if the situation was no longer at a standstill. But then the Moldovan deputies received a telegram of disavowal from Mosanu, chairman of the Moldovan parliament in Chisinau. He said that the deputies did not have the authority to sign such a document. But what has it got to do with authority? The deputies had acted on the basis of their personal beliefs. It is not that Mosanu does not want a peaceful solution to the conflict. Of course not. But he is under a lot of pressure from ultranationalists and the People’s Front. These forces are greedy for power, so they are counting on conflict. But it is worth taking a sober view of things: Even if Moldova merges into Romania, it simply will not be to its advantage to drag a “thorn in the flesh” like the Dniester region with it. I am convinced that a solution to the totally irrational Dniester conflict can be found. A “mere trifle” is required: goodwill on the part of both sides involved in the conflict.

[Buzuev]: Another CIS country, Ukraine, is taking part in resolving the conflict in the Dniester region. I know that you have had a dialogue with Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk. What is your opinion of this politician?

[Ambartsumov]: Our paths crossed several days ago in Bonn, at a meeting of several European countries' prime ministers, prominent economists, and entrepreneurs. Kravchuk delivered the first report and I gave the second.

The main thread of his report was that the formation of the CIS should be welcomed, but that Ukraine must be a completely independent state and not forgo one iota of its sovereignty. The Spanish prime minister, Gonzalez, came up with a good response. He said that Spain cannot control all the processes taking place in the European Community and consciously delegates some of its rights to it. "How do you intend to become part of a united Europe if you refuse to forgo even part of your sovereignty?" Gonzalez asked. Kravchuk had no answer to this. Generally speaking, I must say that he feels he has more freedom abroad than at home, where he is forced to make concessions to national extremists. At the same time, Kravchuk is an intelligent and fairly flexible politician. In my opinion, he is open to dialogue and is prepared to make compromises.

[Ambartsumov]: No, I do not. Ideally, in my view, we should work toward recreating a confederation of states albeit not the Soviet Union. Russia should have a leading role. After all, it is something bigger than the Russian Federation. And, moreover, objectively it is a world power.

[Buzuev]: But first the CIS must collapse completely.

In your opinion, does that mean further disintegration is inevitable?

[Ambartsumov]: I would like to remind you that all this began with the collapse of a great state-not with the disintegration of the CIS. I am more and more convinced that the breakup of the USSR was a totally ill-considered, irresponsible step. The politicians simply did not foresee the consequences, which will only accumulate. But that is the reality of the situation. Another reality is that it will be far harder getting out of the impasse alone than together. Several states are beginning to realize this, so unifying ideas are not being developed. Georgia and Armenia are drawn toward Russia. This coming together of the CIS countries is also inevitable because it is sometimes impossible to draw geographical or even family boundaries. During the collapse of the British and French empires, the mother countries were clearly separate from the colonies, which subsequently became independent states. But in our case everything is all mixed up together. It is another proof that the process of forming a new union will, unfortunately, not be painless.

3.17 Russian Neighbors Urged to Sign Border Treaties

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 12 June 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Following the collapse of the Soviet Union, its former constituent parts-which were the sovereign Union republics, drifting along on their autonomous course-rushed around racing each other to visit various Western and Eastern countries, as if they were hurrying to convince the world of the reality of their independence.

At best they started bidding a strained farewell to yesterday's brothers-in-Union. At worst they started drawing national maps, "incorporating" parts of neighboring territory into them.

So much for the provocative and irritating pranks of fledgling statehood. They should not become a substantial part of everyday interstate relations. But the aspirations for a strict policy of cooperation with many republics' "national patriots" (including those in Russia!) are not concealed.

But how on earth can such intentions be allowed to prevail in state policy? The historical roots of our people's fates have become too firmly intertwined, as the Fifth Congress of Russian Federation People's Deputies stressed in its appeal to the Supreme Soviets of the former USSR republics. The rapid passage of time also helps our historical indissolubility to be recognized.

Having established our "sponger" relationship with the outside world, where everything has long been politically settled and economically "sewn up," many people started to contemplate more soberly the whole ruinous effect of the abrupt dissolution of yesterday's interrepublic contacts and ties. The belief in the need to form our own open, independent Eurasian market for labor, capital, manpower, and services is starting to prevail in the minds of politicians, economists, and legislators. The sooner we grasp this reality and start applying to the building of our own interstate formation modeled on the EEC, the more quickly and easily we will be able to extricate themselves from today's total economic chaos....

The correctness of each independent state's actions to legalize its geopolitical area where it has territorial supremacy, which constitutes an organic part of state sovereignty, is obvious. But are the limits of our territorial independence just as clear and obvious?

Before 1917 Russia had a permanently fixed external border. The domestic administrative-territorial structure comprised the guberniyas and their groups of guberniyas the governor-generalships. The October 1917 revolution initially destroyed the external border. Russia lost Finland (1917), Estonia (1919), Lithuania (1919), and Latvia (1920).

Immediately afterward an internal redrawing started by means of an arbitrary removal (to the benefit of the revolutionary rulers' immediate interests!) of Russia's state flesh by those who set about zealously establishing Soviet power.

By December 1922 (besides the Baltic peoples, who had been lost) Russia was partitioned into six Soviet republicsthe Ukraine, Belarus, and the RSFSR itself, plus the Federation of [three] Transcaucasian Republics that founded the USSR.

However, Russia's partition did not end there. Because of the population's substantial resistance to the insertion of the lumpenized power of the soviets into the specific structure of the Central Asian peoples, the Bolsheviks and Leninists tempted their devotees from surrounding territories by regional autonomization. If only they had secured the retention of power at the local level.

Thus, in October 1924 Turkestan Kray was broken up into the Uzbek and Turkmen Union Republics, the Kirghiz (the future Kazakh) and Kara-Kirghiz Autonomous Republics, and the Karakalpak Autonomous Oblasts, which were part of the RSFSR.

The Moldavian Autonomous Union Republic was formed in October 1924 as part of the Ukraine. Following the return in June 1940 of Bessarabia, seized by Romania from Russia in 1918, Moldavia acquired the status of a Union republic in August 1940.

That is how the truncation of Russia generally, and the birth of new republics in particular, proceeded.

And now, in the conditions created by the existence of autonomous state regimes, we must legislatively enshrine our new lines of republic borders, which in fact have never before enjoyed the status of international borders.

As is known, the establishment of state borders is a political and at least a bilateral process: Contiguous countries take part in it. Initially a treaty on the delimitation of borders is prepared and signed with a neighboring state, that is, the general direction of a border's path between states is determined. A map with the border line marked on it is attached to the treaty.

After this the border is demarcated, that is, the state border is erected on the ground and marked by special and clearly visible border signs (border posts, pyramids, marker signs, and the like). Demarcation is carried out by joint commissions, created by the states concerned on an equal footing.

How will the border process proceed between us? Will there be enough wisdom and diplomacy to prevent the state repartition that goes back to 1917 from turning us into irreconcilable enemies and sowing the seeds of hatred and confrontation in the generations immediately following us?

What can be done to ensure that the permanent state borders between us become transparent borders of peace and good-neighborliness, and not the lines of new "Karabakhs"?

The Alma-Ata agreement on the CIS reaffirmed and enshrined our adherence to the international principle of the inviolability of borders. But this agreement (like others, incidentally) lacks a mechanism to resolve possible territorial disputes. Will we resolve them in a civilized fashion or from a position of strength?

The principle of the inviolability of borders proclaimed by the Helsinki Final Act commits states “now and in the future to refrain from making any encroachments” on these borders and any demands or actions aimed at seizing and usurping part or all of another state’s territory.

At the same time this principle, like the principle of territorial inviolability recognized by international law, does not exclude the possibility of changing a state territory’s borders by peaceful means through the process of talks.

This mutual understanding is gradually starting to enter the practice of our interstate relations.

In particular, the Agreement on Cooperation Between the Russian Federation Ministry of Ecology and Natural Resources Committee for Geodesy and Cartography and the Lithuanian Republic Department of Geodesy and Cartography was concluded 21 May 1992 in Riga. It was signed by these departments’ leaders: by N.D. Zhdanov of Russia and Z. Kumetaitis of Lithuania.

Article 3 of the agreement is noteworthy: “The sides will regularly exchange geographic information (administrativeterritorial division, changes in the names of population centers and other facilities, changes in the road and railroad networks, and the suchlike) about their territories.

“The sides will refrain from making on published maps any changes to the position of the state border between the Russian Federation and the Lithuanian Republic before adoption of relevant bilateral governmental agreements on this question.”

The same norm in the form of an appendix was also incorporated 21 May 1992 in a similar agreement concluded March 1992 by the aforementioned Russian and Latvian departments.

However, while realizing the importance and delicacy of the problem of territorial delineation between former subjects of the USSR, placing responsibility for resolving it at the level of merely interdepartmental relations would be an unforgivable mistake.

An open, interstate legal act seems necessary, which would regulate the procedure for peacefully resolving (now and in the future!) territorial disputes that arise and simultaneously contain undertakings to adhere to the act on the part of the states that recognize or are signatories to it.

At a recent two-day conference of the Parliamentary Coalition for Reforms in Russia, a memorandum was adopted from conference participants to all parliaments and governments of the former USSR's subject states, containing the proposal to join forces to draw up an open interstate convention on the inviolability of borders and the peaceful resolution of territorial questions....

3.18 Khasbulatov on the South Ossetia Conflict

Moscow Mayak Radio Network, 15 June 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: In June 1992, Ruslan Khasbulatov, one of Russia's most prominent national-patriots, as chairman of the holdover Russian Supreme Soviet, boldly asserted Russia's right to intervene in the conflict between Georgia and its South Ossetian province. The following statement asserts Russia's "Great Power" status within the CIS by defining the terms for intervention as "peacekeepers," and by exacerbating the conflict between the two parties. Georgian president Eduard Shevardnadze responded to the speech with shocked surprise and indignation, rightly regarding Khasbulatov's speech as interference in Georgia's internal affairs.

Esteemed citizens of the Russian Federation, as you know from numerous reports in the media, an extremely difficult situation has arisen in a number of regions on Russia's borders. One of the most critical situations that has developed into a bloody confrontation is in South Ossetia. Some political figures in Georgia and armed formations under their control have adopted, it seems, a single course of expelling

South Ossetians from their historical homeland in Georgia.

South Ossetian towns, villages, and the city of Tskhinvali are being continuously fired on with all types of weapons, including artillery and missiles. There are numerous casualties. Agreements recently reached between the Russian president and the Georgian leadership with the participation of South Ossetia about an end to the bloodshed and the beginning of peace talks have been cynically ignored by Georgian armed formations; indeed, the attacks have intensified in recent days following a visit to the area by a Supreme Soviet delegation.

Attacks against the civilian population have intensified. Once again there have been numerous casualties in the last few days. At the same time a small contingent of Russian army units stationed on the territory of South Ossetia with peacekeeping aims has come under intense pressure. There have been incidents of fatal attacks on them, of attacks on military warehouses with attempts to seize equipment, or of outright seizure of equipment.

You know that at Russian Congresses of People's Deputies, and during sessions of the Russian Supreme Soviet, the question of the South Ossetian problem has been discussed more than once, because tens of thousands of refugees are fleeing to densely populated regions of North Ossetia, thus creating conditions for a powerful social explosion capable of spreading throughout the North Caucasus. Therefore, this conflict, this war being waged by armed formations in South Ossetia, cannot be regarded as a purely internal affair in Georgia. It directly affects the lives and interests of our people and the state interests of Russia. This is why-and bearing in mind that this problem directly affects the state interests of the Russian Federation-congresses of people's deputies and the Supreme Soviet have adopted many resolutions, in which the Georgian authorities are reminded that the expulsion of the South Ossetian population to Russia, in particular to North Ossetia, is unacceptable.

It must be said frankly that today these actions must be qualified as genocide and a massive expulsion of the South Ossetian ethnic group from its historic motherland. At the same time, striving to resolve this problem on a conflict-free basis with Georgia, which has had friendly relations with Russia for many centuries, the Russian Supreme Soviet has not examined the official appeal of South Ossetia concerning its joining the Russian Federation.

In the present conditions, when it is evidently intended to pursue a de facto policy through the expulsion of an entire people and the abolition of its autonomy, the Russian Supreme Soviet may be forced to study this question immediately, that is to say, with regard to the question of its joining Russia, in accordance with the will and desire of the people and an appeal by the South Ossetian authorities to the Russian Parliament. If the Georgian side does not want the events to head in this direction, we demand that it stop the fighting and find enough courage to sit down at the negotiating table, as was agreed somewhat earlier.

Surely the Georgian leaders must understand that the policy and practice of genocide, and provoking complications with Russia, casts suspicion on the Georgian people themselves, whose courage, kindness, and justice no one has ever doubted. The Georgian side must understand that all exiles without exception who are on the territory of Russia must be returned to their homes, and that it is utterly futile to shed blood over completely unattainable objectives. At the same time, we demand an immediate end to the acts of provocation against Russian soldiers and officers in South Ossetia, who are carrying out their military duty of protecting the civilian population.

We warn that otherwise, Russia is capable of taking immediate measures to defend its citizens from criminal attempts on their lives, and to render harmless those villainous groups that have been shooting to kill, both with regard to the civilian population and Russian soldiers.

3.19 Rutskoy Party Leader Slams Foreign Policy

Vasiliy Lipitskiy

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 26 June 1992 [CD Translation]

Editor's Note: Vasiliy Lipitskiy is chairman of the Free Russia Party (Aleksandr Rutskoy's party). He and his party represent a particularly virulent brand of the national-patriotic point of view in their harsh critique of all of Yeltsin's executive branch policies. Lipitskiy expresses the strong feeling of nostalgia for the status and power of tsarist Russia felt by the radical nationalists.

One cannot accuse our government of inactivity in the international arena. But policy, and above all diplomacy, does not consist of actions alone. It entails a system of objectives and priorities united by a common thought or concept. And it is these components that one can follow only with great difficulty in the rush of events.

One gets the impression that the collapse of the USSR has not been followed by any reassessment of values in our foreign policy strategy. Relations with the former republics and now independent states—both those that belong to the Commonwealth and those that do not—have yet to become a priority for our diplomacy, as they should. And this is costing us.

Take the Baltics, for example. Only recently their striving for independence, treated with hostility by the old center, had the full support of the Russian leadership. And so the latter's actions since the center's collapse are all the more puzzling. It seems to have inherited the hard-line policy that it opposed in the past so effectively and with such effect. And, as then, the result of this policy has been directly the opposite of what was intended. The tactic of “turning the screws” (primarily with respect to supplies of energy resources) has indeed caused domestic political complications in these countries and provoked government crises; at the same time, however, it has worsened their relations with Russia.

It is this tactic that-at different times but for the same essential reason-led to the fall of the Prunskiene Cabinet in Lithuania and the Savisaar Cabinet in Estonia, which were optimal partners for us from the standpoint of long-term cooperation. They have been replaced by far more intransigent politicians, and the economic problems designed in Moscow have only hastened those countries’ reorientation toward the West.

One can now assess the result conclusively: Russia has lost the Baltics, a region traditionally significant to it, for a long time.

But is a hard-line approach to relations with our former Union partners our Foreign Ministry’s fundamental concept? Hardly! All around we can see a striking spinelessness in resolving with other states issues in which Russia’s interests are seriously threatened.

Until recently, the Foreign Ministry in effect failed to notice the war in the Dniester region, into which Russia was drawn long ago, whether we like it or not. I note parenthetically that the rejection of A. Rutskoy’s plan for using the 14th Army to separate the warring sides has already cost hundreds of human lives. Even greater myopia can be seen where Ossetia is concerned: Talks on transferring weapons to Georgia are pouring oil onto the conflict's flames.

In Central Asia, the Foreign Ministry contemplates with a certain sense of doom the peaceful expansion of Iran, Turkey, and even Afghanistan-an expansion that encompasses the lands that are closest to Russia, as well as their leaders. Commentaries like "east is east and west is west" are viewed only as an admission of the ministry's own impotence.

This is the state of affairs on our immediate frontiers. What is the situation farther away?

Not so long ago, in addition to the Union, we had the "socialist commonwealth," which constituted, if we discard the ideological baggage, a bloc of countries economically oriented toward Moscow. What is left of it today? Severed ties, colossal bilateral losses, growing anti-Russian sentiment, and the total complacency-or rather indifference-of the Foreign Ministry.

A typical example is Bulgaria, whose economy was perhaps the most specialized in terms of serving Russian consumers. We still have an acute need for the products of Bulgaria's agriculture (as well as of Hungarian and Polish agriculture), which produces considerable surplus food. To put it bluntly, that country offers a way-given an effective system of mutually advantageous contacts-to ease our food difficulties.

Bulgarian producers, in turn, are consumers of Russian oil. In 1991-92, President Zh. Zhelev repeatedly sent personal messages to the Russian president proposing that Russia supply energy resources on terms exceptionally advantageous to us. But nothing has happened. Russia isn't meeting its commitments, and we're not receiving Bulgarian products (vegetables, fruit, tobacco, wine, cheese, etc.). Work on a Russian-Bulgarian cooperation treaty has come to a standstill. There is a rapidly growing hostility among Bulgarians toward their erstwhile brothers, and pro-Western political circles have acquired an array of arguments in favor of blaming all the country's economic difficulties on us.

Eastern Europe, along with Vietnam and Mongolia, whose representatives in Moscow are simply ignored, are also becoming inauspicious areas from the standpoint of promoting Russia's national interests.

One is disturbed by an overall desire to follow the beaten path, without proper regard for the changed situation in the world and Russia's real place in it. To what countries are we turning for help in solving our immense material problems? To the United States, where a presidential election is around the corner and the government is preoccupied with domestic difficulties. To Germany, whose capabilities are being gluttonously swallowed up by its new states-the former German Democratic Republic. To Japan, where aid to Russia will invariably be linked to Japan's territorial claims. It is within this small circle that our country's diplomatic thinking revolves-thinking that is sustained, alas, by deceptive hopes for showers of gold in the form of new credits and investments.

Isn't it time to realize that the club of the strong of this world is burdened with its own problems, and that even if one believes that the club is 100 percent favorably disposed to us, there is little it can do to back up the way it feels? Indeed, chances are that it won't even want to do so, preferring instead to limit its cooperation to the bare minimum that allows Russia to remain afloat, but hardly to embark on any lengthy autonomous voyage.

At the same time, the world does present us with potential partners who have the available resources, are not inhibited by complexes with respect to Russia, and have interests that coincide with Russia's. Among them are Saudi Arabia and the Persian Gulf kingdoms-a path to which Russia seemed to have opened in early June, although this was done not by the Foreign Ministry, but by a Supreme Soviet delegation as well as Taiwan, which is searching for foreign markets. In terms of their financial capabilities, these countries surpass those from which we are seeking assistance many times over—in some cases by entire orders of magnitude.

However, Russian diplomacy is neglecting their potential. They do not fit into the accustomed westernist stereotype that is unthinkingly embraced by our Foreign Ministry. Moreover, some of the ministry's actions seem deliberately designed to prevent the very possibility of such contacts now and in the future. The Atlantic orientation presupposes close ties with Israel, which deters Arab partners. A new push for rapprochement with the People's Republic of China is afoot, something that could preserve the iron curtain in our relations with Taiwan.

The mentality of an enormous superpower, a nuclear giant whose attention is merited only by those with an equal number of warheads per capita, still hovers over the skyscraper on Smolensk Square. But this picture is far from reality. The new reality demands a different world outlook and different priorities.

Our country is one of the world's major suppliers of raw materials. Objective interests bring it closer to those that are in an analogous situation. For example, Russia could play a prominent role in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC—an entity no less prestigious and influential than the International Monetary Fund, but much more promising from our standpoint. Specifically, oil-producing countries have made concrete proposals for participating in efforts to tap the resources of Western Siberia—they don't want to let European and American energy consumers go in there directly. The ball is in our court. Wouldn't it be better to be a leader of the Third World than an outsider in the First World?

Such a shift in priorities would hardly mean abandonment of our Great-Power status. I already mentioned the leverage afforded by our oil exports, which directly determine the political situation in some countries. Russia has something that is in acute short supply throughout the rest of the world: stocks of mineral resources and untapped sales markets. To industrially developed countries in which shortages of raw materials and energy resources are combined with surplus goods production, we present an invaluable opportunity. We are the masters of the situation here-so why are we on our knees asking for charity?

Needless to say, these opportunities will not realize themselves on their own. Turning them into reality will take a lot of hard work. But most importantly, we need a new concept of Russia's national interests a concept that can make its actions in the international arena productive.

3.20 Stankevich Calls for More Assertive Diplomacy

Sergey Stankevich

Izvestiya, 7 July 1992 [CD Translation]

It's good that Russia's foreign policy is finally becoming the subject of a rather impressive public debate: Russia's parliament, its vice-president, and its minister of foreign affairs have all joined in. It's bad, however, that sometimes, instead of engaging in a serious, well-reasoned discussion, participants in the debate get sidetracked into combating caricatures of their own making and using too many stereotyped labels.

The interview with Andrey Kozyrev (Izvestiya, no. 151 [June 20-see Current Digest, 44, no. 26, pp. 3-5]) left me with the impression of an excessively defensive reaction and a certain nervousness that, in my view, was associated with some annoying inaccuracies.

The minister is hardly correct when he asserts that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' current "moderate" line, the only thing capable of "stopping Russia's slide into the abyss," is opposed by the "war party"-the solid reactionary mass of "red-browns" and their underlings, who "always have just one response-force."

Allow me the liberty of exclaiming: “There is no such party!” Leaving aside the clinical cases (because only a madman could deliberately drag Russia into a war), the problem can be worded differently: How, by what means, can Russia achieve long-term stability that excludes war in relations with its neighbors?

Even in the view of some quite calm, thoughtful, and well-intentioned people, something is wrong with our foreign policy.

Take the situation in the Dniester region. The crisis there has developed over many months and has taken on some very acute forms. Russia’s reaction has invariably been belated and weak, and in my view, it has frequently been mistaken.

For example, it is difficult to find any explanation of the CIS member-countries’ statement on the Dniester region from the standpoint of Russia’s interests. Without even being legally a CIS member, Moldova obtained the consent of Russia’s representatives to all its unilateral demands (the withdrawal of troops, the disarming of the Dniester region guards, and the restoration of “legitimate bodies of power”) without giving any simultaneous guarantees of a normal existence for the Dniester region’s residents.

This “moderate” line, which unties the hands of one side, promises the Dniester region’s residents only the stability of the graveyard.

There is serious doubt as to the advisability of Russia’s consent to a quadripartite formula for talks on the Dniester region (with Romania, but without anyone from the Dniester region). In the final analysis, the set of problems with which we are dealing is the collective legacy of the republics of the former USSR. And it is the heirs who must deal with it, in this case Moldova, Ukraine, and Russia. The inclusion of Romania in this process is de facto recognition of its special role and special responsibility for events on Moldovan territory, which clearly plays into the hands of supporters of Moldova's absorption by Romania. If this concession is not used now, then, like Chekhov's gun, it will quite likely be fired in the future.

The enlisting of outside forces in the search for a solution could be useful, but on a broader basis—for example, on the basis of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

All accords and declarations concerning a peaceful settlement of the Dniester region's problems are still invariably violated, since Moldova's current leadership has categorically rejected and continues to reject the only sensible solution, which proposes a federal system for the republic.

One can only regret that Russia has not yet insisted on an examination of this main question (either by four sides or by two). Misinterpreting the obvious indecisiveness and inconsistency of Russia's representatives, Moldova's leadership has put its stakes on brute force. The carnage in Bendery was a tragedy of international proportions, and to call it, rather delicately, an "overreaction"(!) and argue that the Moldovan army's full-scale military operation might have been a response to an ordinary exchange of fire is tactless, to put it mildly.

Force will never replace diplomacy and law, needless to say, but, to our great regret, no one has yet succeeded in completely eliminating it from the arsenal of instruments of state policy. If the punitive operation in Bendery had not met with a proper forcible rebuff, diplomats would now have nothing to negotiate about. The Dniester region would have been dismembered and crushed.

That didn't happen, thank God. But is it possible or moral to condemn and stigmatize those who stopped the butchery?

It's difficult to understand what is happening to us. We are told that 450,000 Russians live on the right bank of the Dniester, and right away we are ready to give in to blackmail: let the 150,000 on the left bank be slaughtered; if we make no effort to stand up for them, maybe the rest will be spared. Come on, Andrey Vladimirovich [Kozyrev], is it really appropriate to resort to arithmetic and argumentation as to who should have priority in being spared?

Indeed, the dilemma you present-either "occupy the territory of republics with troops" and "institute a savage reign of terror" or resolve everything in a peaceful and civilized fashion-can only be explained as a polemical excess. Of course, Russia should resolve all problems with all its neighbors in a peaceful and civilized fashion-if our partners agree and are prepared to act in the same way.

But if our partners, while holding nice diplomatic conversations with us, at the same time continue the ruthless butchery, and we agree to such a dialogue, very soon we will no longer be taken seriously, since we will agree to anything. Russia's task is not to "bomb cities" but to stop some very specific murderers and to show convincingly that the problems of ethnic minorities cannot be solved with bayonets and bullets, that Russia will not allow it. Only then will they negotiate with us properly. There is not a grain of an "imperial attitude" here. Looking a little further, this is exactly how war can be avoided, too. But if systematic murders are committed and the diplomatic brakes do not work, Russia has the right-pending intervention by an international court of arbitration-to apply unilateral sanctions.

Back in the 1970s, the world community adopted an important principle: human rights are extraterritorial, the systematic violation of human rights is not an "internal affair," and intervention in such instances is necessary and justified. If, however, there are indications of state terrorism, as there are in the Dniester region, it is even more impossible to conceal it by citing sovereignty. Intervention should be civilized and international, needless to say.

Perhaps I am mistaken, but in my opinion our diplomatic corps is not doing a vigorous enough job of conveying to the leaders of foreign countries Russia's concern over the situation of Russians in the "near abroad." How else can one explain the lamentable fact that in two months no one has officially responded to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' memorandum on human rights violations in the Baltic countries? In Estonia, a certain armed grouping that is controlled by the state is declaring war on Russian Federation military men and "colonialists," that is, civilians who are our spiritual countrymen. We, on the other hand, having never received any official written explanations from the Estonian government in response to our note—which was belated, as usual—are continuing bilateral talks, in particular, talks on economic ties that are quite advantageous to Estonia. Why this strange Tolstoyism?

A year and a half has gone by since Russia signed treaties with Estonia and Latvia, in which, among other things, the parties guaranteed full civil rights for all ethnic groups. Flagrantly violating these treaties, the parliaments of Latvia and Estonia have deprived 1.5 million Russian people of their basic rights. Nevertheless, Russia still has not insisted that this question be included on the agenda of bilateral talks with Baltic republic delegations. So where is the priority of "civilized methods"? For how many years will we try to get them to listen to us and to take our pain into consideration?

And how did it happen that the interests of servicemen's families were not taken into account when the agreement on procedures for Estonia's withdrawal from the ruble zone was signed? Why weren't Russian Federation services prepared for Estonia's switch to a strict visa system? These problems were anticipated, after all.

There are quite a few such questions. And they are being asked not by the "war party" but rather by the party of common sense, which is concerned about preserving Russia's dignity. Needless to say, behind all this are the transient working difficulties that are inevitable in a great undertaking. But they must be overcome quickly and effectively, because a buildup of such situations will do irreparable damage to Russia's long-term interests.

Finally, one has to say something about patriotism. What unthinkable shift in consciousness has made us turn this into a swear word and closely associated it with the image of a fascistic degenerate? Isn't it clear that only the selfless patriotic impulse of millions can wrest Russia from the grip of a very grave ailment?

And there is no reason to hastily disown what the state says. Unlike an empire, which presupposes the concentration of a country's manpower and resources on goals of external expansion, a state means that the country turns inward, renounces expansion, and mobilizes its internal forces and resources for an economic and cultural upswing and for a peaceful and civilized breakthrough to the level of the great powers.

I have a clear premonition that Russia will never again be an empire, but that it is bound to become a state. We should all do as much as possible to see that this happens.

3.21 Ambartsumov Foreign Policy Concept Viewed

Konstantin Eggert

Izvestiya, 8 August 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The following document offers a particularly poignant critique of the foreign policy recommendations by the chairman of the Russian Supreme Soviet International Affairs and Foreign Economic Relations Committee. Izvestiya journalist K. Eggert calls Ambartsumov's policy a "Monroe Doctrine," which would only lead Russia to war. The document is noteworthy for its depiction of the Russian parliament's position on the question of the country's vital sphere of interest. That position only hardened over the next three years. Furthermore, the concept of a Russian "Monroe Doctrine" has been popularized by nationalist politicians seeking an identity for Russia, and embraced by naive Russian citizens, yearning for strong leaders. The following document views Ambartsumov's policy recommendations from the democrats' vantage point, giving its contents the quality of a debate between the two forces shaping Russia's post-Cold War foreign policy.

"Gorbachev's perestroika and 'new thinking' signaled a fundamental move away from the idea of confrontation toward the idea of partnership. It should be pointed out, however, that this move as implemented by Gorbachev and Shevardnadze was seen by many as a disorderly retreat and complete capitulation before the West. A similar impression is formed when analyzing our foreign policy as implemented by Kozyrev."

This is not a quote from Sovetskaya Rossiya but an extract from a curious document now at the disposal of our editorial office. It is entitled "Recommendations on the Results of Russian Foreign Minister A.V. Kozyrev's Closed Hearings in the International Affairs Committee on the Foreign Policy Concept of the Russian Foreign Ministry (30 June 1992)." Its author is Evgeniy Ambartsumov, chairman of the Russian Supreme Soviet Committee for International Affairs and Foreign Economic Relations.

The document opens with the following statement: "the Russian Foreign Ministry does not have an integral concept of its foreign policy in either nearby or distant foreign parts." It is well known, however, that Minister A. Kozyrev does have such a concept-or at least its basic principles. It is equally well known that it is not to the liking of the present parliament.

The acknowledgement that the former Soviet republics have the status of equal partners, the reliance on painstaking talks rather than imperial blackmail, and the drawing closer to the developed Western democracies on fundamental issues concerning human rights and the curbing of aggression-these are the basic principles on which the Foreign Ministry's line has hitherto been based. There have been errors and defects, of course, although it would be simply impossible to expect the Russian foreign policy department's actions to be completely faultless. After all, the problem of Russia's relations with the outside world has essentially become a problem of how Russia sees itself. In other words, it has become the subject of domestic political struggle.

Evgeniy Ambartsumov's "recommendations" are interesting, but not because they graphically demonstrate with whose side the parliamentary leadership's sympathies lie everyone knows that anyway. No, something else deserves attention-the unprofessionalism of the guardians of "powerfulness" [derzhavnost] and their persistent desire to see the world as they would like it to be, rather than as it really is.

The following is undoubtedly the central tenet of the recommendations:

"As the internationally recognized legal successor of the USSR, the Russian Federation must base its foreign policy on a doctrine that declares the entire geopolitical space of the former Soviet Union to be a sphere of its vital interests (along the lines of the U.S. 'Monroe Doctrine' in Latin America) and strive to secure the world community's understanding and acknowledgment of its special interests in this space. Russia must also strive to secure from the international community the role of political and military guarantor of stability throughout the territory of the former USSR. It should strive to secure the G-7 [Group of Seven] countries' support for these functions of Russia, including hard currency subsidies for its rapid reaction forces (the Russian 'blue berets')."

The "Monroe Doctrine" is 169 years old. It was directed against interference by the European monarchies of the Holy Alliance, primarily Britain, in the affairs of states in the Western hemisphere. It has undergone considerable changes during its existence. Nowadays, the U.S. leading role on the American continent is determined primarily by natural reasons of a socio-economic nature, rather than by the "big stick" of the Theodore Roosevelt era. Russia should certainly aspire to a similar state of affairs.

But no, Ev. Ambartsumov calls us back to the "gunboat diplomacy" employed at the turn of the century, evidently forgetting that the Moldova and Estonia of today are not Panama in 1903 or Mexico in 1916. A Russian version of the "Monroe Doctrine" is untenable because the price paid for imposing it on the former Soviet republics could only be war, which would mean the end of Russia's democratic development. In these conditions, it is ludicrous to expect the world community-which has only just begun to build a system of genuinely collective security-to voluntarily give Moscow the role of "Eurasian gendarme" and, moreover, finance it from its own pocket.

This does not worry the head of the parliamentary committee, however. He continues:

“The texts of future agreements on the CIS and of bilateral agreements must include the idea of Russia as guarantor and, in particular, give Russia the right to protect the lives and dignity of Russians in CIS countries. There should definitely be a special provision regarding the status of Russian troops in CIS countries, in order to prevent a precedent with the 14th Army in Moldova, which has no right in the eyes of the law.”

The stationing of troops in CIS countries is referred to as a long-term option and, moreover, in connection with “protecting the dignity of Russians.” Clearly, it is a question of imposing a Russian military presence on our neighbors. This approach can only wreck the timid steps toward militarystrategic cooperation and integration that have recently appeared. No one will want to have “human rights guarantors” with submachine guns ready in their territory. Russia is undoubtedly obliged to protect and will protect the interests of its compatriots abroad, using the entire arsenal at its disposal except one-military force.

Russia’s policy in so-called “distant foreign parts” is given literally half a page in the document:

“We must be clearly aware that in distant foreign parts, Russia cannot play the USSR’s former role, which was based on military might, ‘undermining imperialism from within’ (a reference to the KGB in the Third World-Africa, Asia, Nicaragua, Cuba, Angola, and Vietnam), and subsidizing ‘fraternal communist parties.’

“Hence the need for partnership with the United States and the other G-7 countries, while preserving an independent foreign policy line.”

It is hard to find fault with any of this, especially as the Foreign Ministry takes exactly the same stand at present, but the conclusion that follows is surprising:

“China could serve as a national model for Russia’s independent foreign policy, as it has equally stable relations with Russia and the CIS, and the United States, and the G-7.”

It is not at all clear why China has been chosen as an example for emulation. Beijing’s relations with Moscow and Washington are totally undynamic, static, and moreover, very far from ideal. The apparent balance is the result of the present communist Chinese leadership’s reluctance and, what is more, inability to develop its relations with the outside world beyond a certain point. We must not forget that the ideological reasoning behind China’s foreign policy is radically different (or, at least, should be radically different) from that of the Russian leadership. Proposing that our Foreign Ministry follow the Chinese model in its activity means forgetting this fundamental difference.

Even if you agree that Russia's present foreign policy lacks conceptual depth, Deputy Ambartsumov's proposals are unlikely to improve the situation. Rather, it is the opposite: If this approach prevails, Russia can expect only wars, crises, and international isolation.

3.22 Russia Is Again Receiving Compatriots From Abroad

Izvestiya, 7 September 1992 [CD Translation]

Editor's Note: The national-patriot movement is partially organized around strong feelings among Russians concerning compatriots "caught" living in foreign countries after the dissolution of the USSR. Part of the imperialistic Great Power movement is dedicated to defending the rights of Russians living in the "near abroad." This defensive mission has been broadened, however, to rationalize the nationalpatriots' desire to regard all Russian-speaking peoples as compatriots deserving dual citizenship, and to extend Russia's peacekeeping role throughout the CIS. As the following document shows, Russians are aware of the sensitivity connected with interference in other states' internal affairs, but they view "Russianism" as a cultural distinction-deserving a special status within the commonwealth they are trying to build.

The second congress of compatriots opened on 7 September in St. Petersburg. Representatives of more than 10 million people of Russian Federation origin who live outside their homeland [the reference is apparently to those who live outside the former USSR-Trans.] are attending it. One of the main items on the agenda is discussion of the underlying principles for a law on state policy with regard to compatriots. The principles were drawn up by a group of experts from the Independent Institute of International Law under the direction of Professor Igor Blishchenko.

The scholars define compatriots as people who were subjects of the Russian Empire or citizens of the USSR in the past (and their direct descendants), who do not hold Russian citizenship at present, who belong to one of Russia's ethnic groups, and who consider themselves spiritually, culturally, and ethnically linked with Russia. The experts believe that there should be no distinctions in legal status between compatriots who live in the republics of the former USSR (who number nearly 26 million) and those who live in states outside the borders of the former USSR. On applying to a Russian consular institution, all should be issued the same certificate.

However, it's not all that simple, the legal experts from the Independent Institute of International Law warn. One difficult problem is the question of citizenship, the resolution of which will largely determine the situation of Russian compatriots abroad. One solution to the problem is to recognize the institution of dual citizenship.

Another difficult question is, what rights should compatriots be given? It must not be forgotten, the institute's legal scholars point out, that compatriots are usually citizens of another state. And so we should take a cautious approach to granting them rights because an imprudent step could be viewed as interference in [that state's] internal affairs. In such cases, it should be stipulated that in exercising the rights conferred on him by Russia, a compatriot must remain loyal to the state of which he is a citizen.

What does compatriot status do for a person? On the basis of the certificate he receives, the person possessing it can enter Russia at any time on a visa-free basis; is entitled on Russian territory to equal treatment under civil law in the areas of everyday life, entrepreneurial activity, property relations, and freedom of movement; and has the right to use a simplified procedure to obtain Russian citizenship.

As regards privatization, the scholars believe that compatriots should have a preferential right to buy property that they used to own directly or obtained by inheritance. It is suggested that this right would have to be exercised within a certain period of time after the beginning of privatization. Other possible rights include preferential treatment in capital investment and entrepreneurial activity, exemption from some taxes, and other privileges (in all other respects, they would be on equal footing with foreigners).

For its part, Russia is obliged to provide protection for its compatriots. The law should have a special provision on protecting the rights and interests of people of Russian origin, including assistance in finding employment. And here, in addition to general international legal principles in the area of human rights, it is essential to define the rights and responsibilities of Russian officials in providing aid and assistance to people of Russian origin.

The scholars are convinced that a special section of the law should stipulate the right of people of Russian origin in the ex-Soviet republics to automatically obtain Russian Federation citizenship as a second citizenship (citizenship of Russia and of the state in which they live). In the event of repatriation to Russia should a compatriot choose only Russian citizenship, the law should require the Russian government to demand that the state the repatriate is leaving compensate him for all material expenses associated with his resettlement and accommodation in Russia and guarantee the repatriate's right to dispose freely of property he owns on the territory of the state in which he formerly resided.

The experts from the Independent Institute of International Law believe that the adoption of a law on state policy with regard to compatriots will help draw to Russia the intellectual potential of all people of Russian origin and their capital, technical and other knowledge, and ability to manage modern-day production and engage in business operations.

3.23 Rutskoy Article Views Nationalist Trends, Sovereignty

Aleksandr Rutskoy

New Times International, 10 March 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

Editor's Note: Former Vice-President Aleksandr Rutskoy was an early leader of the national-patriot faction in parliament. In October 1993 he led the parliament in forcefully resisting President Yeltsin's attempt to dissolve it and call for new parliamentary elections. Rutskoy was imprisoned for his role in the parliament's armed attempt to capture the Moscow radio tower and several other strategic institutions. After leaving prison, Rutskoy established the political party "Power" (Derzhava), which has gained a strong following.

Today's reality keeps us permanently on edge due to newspaper publications, TV news, and all that happens around us. The main tensions are connected with "hot spots" because they are a manifestation of troubles in the intra-national relations.

My calculations reveal a total of over 180 actual and potential "hot spots" on the territory of the former USSR, with various degrees of civil unrest. Ethnic tension in the form of open hostilities has already reached Russia's borders and now, having crossed them, is spreading over onto her territory (Ingushetia, the Chechen Republic, North Ossetia).

The system of multilateral agreements, including the CIS Treaty, isn't working. Moreover, relations between the states that we call the "near abroad" were built on mutual distrust from the very outset of their independent existence.

The disintegration of the USSR aggravated the problem of the "Russian-speaking population" and of the status of the army in countries that emerged on the territory of the former USSR. The struggle against "migrants," "occupationists," and others, assuming various forms, shifted from the plane of moral, psychological, and social pressure to the state and legal level and is in many cases raised to the status of official policy.

A dangerous combination of seemingly incompatible tendencies is taking shape. The ex-Union republics carried on the struggle with the former omnipotent central power under the banner of the necessity to broaden their peoples' rights and of securing the right to national self-determination. Having come to power, the same forces not only began to profess the principle of territorial integrity, they started conducting a policy akin to a struggle for “racial purity” coupled with onslaughts on universal human rights. The situation in some Baltic states is undergoing a dangerous metamorphosis: Nationalist passions are whipped up under the guise of a struggle for democracy, while our Foreign Ministry complacently looks on, trying to “talk” Latvia into having mercy upon her “Russian-speaking” population.

We are facing an increase in the stream of refugees into Russia caused by many factors (the number of refugees has exceeded 1 million people, and it is growing daily). Among them are people of diverse nationalities. The state must pay out vast sums of money to support and accommodate them. What’s more, it gives rise to social instability felt in the political atmosphere. Sadly enough, these realities have not yet been fully realized by the country’s leadership and the uncontrolled accumulation of explosive material threatens to reach a critical mass. Unfortunately, social and ethnic tensions are growing in regions of ethnic conflict.

Enter Mafia

What triggered these conflicts? The reasons for them were common to a number of states in the “near abroad.” The most important are: aggravation of the economic and political situation, border problems, traditional ethnic conflicts, violation of human rights, ill-thought-out and uncontrolled migrations that took place in the past, and the environmental crisis.

One more important factor promotes the escalation of conflicts-this is the struggle between local elites and mafialike groups assuming the form of ethnic conflicts.

The circumstance that impairs settling such conflicts is their irrational character, incomprehensible to an uninvolved onlooker, which limits the possibility to influence these developments from the outside.

That people have become accustomed to the tragic nature of events is also very dangerous.

Some symptoms of the oncoming danger are already being observed in Transcaucasia, North Caucasus, Moldova, Georgia, and Tajikistan. I name only the most dangerous and obvious hotbeds of confrontation.

It's also clear that current controversies won't disappear in the near future and that state and public organizations must do their best to settle them by peaceful means. All of us have to learn restraint, mutual understanding, and the art of compromise. A paradoxical situation arises: Many newly born states, ex-Soviet republics, successfully establish friendly relations with many countries of the world, but can't come to terms between themselves. History has made all of us neighbors, we have been neighbors for centuries, and we'll be neighbors in the future. The culture of interdependence is a prime necessity to our states, a sine qua non of survival.

Not Just a Large Country, but a Great State

The disintegration of the USSR has left in its territory a number of states, the Russian Federation being the largest among them in terms of territory, size of population, and scientific and technical potential. Russia has lived in the past, and is now living through great hardships, yet she goes along her path as a great power. In her ordeals, she has suffered considerable losses, yet she has largely preserved her colossal potential and her international authority backed by her economic might, cultural traditions, and scientific achievements. Getting rid of stagnation tendencies that degraded our society from above, we must preserve our historical achievements inculcated in popular tradition. If we manage this, we will continue as a great power; if we fail, we'll leave the historical scene. I see nothing wrong in the desire to remain a great power. Being a great power is a result of advancement in the key branches of human activity. It's evidence to the fact that a nation has found its path among civilizations of the world. This has nothing to do with chauvinism. Pride for one's country is a natural and worthy feeling.

Russia is a sovereign state today. Its economic organism has become more integral and its social and cultural landscape smoother and more comprehensible. On the other hand, Russia has "retreated" from its former borders, losing many of its seaports; many of its traditional economic and other ties have been ruptured.

We in Russia must take all this into consideration in searching for the place our country is to occupy among the new sovereign states. We must embrace the whole range of relations, but we must give priority to Russia's own interests, striving wherever possible for their overlap with other countries' interests.

I believe that, in formulating Russia's policy vis—vis the countries of the "near abroad," we must proceed from the premise that, apart from separate interests, there are also factors dictating the necessity to consolidate comprehensive relations between these countries, the most important among these factors being the historically determined interdependence of their economies, the problems of their common "Union" heirloom, traditional, cultural, scientific, and other ties, and the multinational character of their population.

Formulating the principles of mutual relations with countries that have emerged instead of the former Union republics, it is necessary to take into account that the steps we make today in this direction will determine the nature of relations with these countries not only in the near future but in the remote future as well. These relations are only being initiated now, but they are going to be of great importance, and therefore they require circumspection, as well as mutual honesty, good will, a principled attitude, and recognition of each other's lawful rights. Unfortunately, this is not happening. Too many accusations are hurled at Russia against the background of unrestrained praise for Turkey, Japan, the United States.... I'd say it is immoral to reduce Russia's role in the history of peoples of the former USSR and the role of, I emphasize it, the former Russian empire to the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact alone. It is noteworthy that Russia, unlike a great many countries of today's "near abroad" and some republics inside her, does not abuse historical arguments in justifying her position. Such attempts must be avoided because the ensuing disputes always assume a heavy and dragged-out nature. Yet Russia has something to counter her popular description as the "prison of peoples." Yes, Russia did wage unjust expansionist wars, but which nation or country has not? However, it will be extremely unjust to reduce our history to them alone.

Not to Build Dams

I often consider the question: Is it possible to establish normal interstate relations and even to create a new closeknit alliance on principles differing radically in comparison with the Soviet Union? A rather close one, to the point of creating a unitary confederative state? Certainly, this is not a task for the near future, but it is quite realistic. And, in any event, establishing civilized relations will be an obligatory stage in this process.

This being so, a new integration can start from a rather low level, even ground zero. Already today political practice shows that one cannot intercept the former Union republics halfway on their route to sovereignty. The ensuing process must be carried through and, hence, it would be wiser to support these powerful streams, rather than to build dams in their way.

With those who are prepared for this integration, the establishment of confederate relations can be realized at the interstate level; with those who are not, good-neighborly relations can be developed.

The new type of ties and relations between the countries formerly in the USSR must be built on the principles of mutual economic space. It is not only desirable but necessary for Russia to base her formal relations with these states on the same principles as with any other country of the world.

We must become accustomed to this politically and psychologically new situation in which Russia's relations with former Union republics will henceforth be relations between sovereign states with all the attendant consequences. Trade and diplomatic relations, payments, and border and customs control must be carried out on the basis of these republics' sovereignty. There must not be any "blockades," "sanctions," etc., that could serve as pretexts for blaming Russia. Russia has its own national interests to follow, using all its resources to the advantage of its people. No concessions against the country's interests are admissible.

A few remarks in this connection, concerning the idea of "transparent borders," are being actively discussed at various levels today. On the surface, this idea looks democratic and alluring. Yet the question of to whom and for what our borders will be transparent is not an idle one. We uphold transparency for the sake of freedom of human contacts. But we know that the present openness and uncertainty at our borders daily causes the country enormous damage. They export from Russia whatever they want-suffice it to quote the example of Estonia, which, having no deposits of nonferrous metals, has become one of the greatest suppliers of them on the world market. Many other "undesirable" goods, such as weapons and drugs, are imported to the country through Estonia. Russia is totally unprotected against industrial and any other kind of espionage. We do not want this sort of “transparency.”

Sovereign Russia must have completely equipped state borders with all countries, regardless of its current relations with them.

It is too early so far to abolish state borders. The Russian leaders and citizens must unfailingly observe Russia's and its people's interests. We must also secure that these relations take on a normal form and that human rights, including freedom of travel, be observed in all countries.

To Protect the Rights of Russians

Demanding the observance of a normal frontier, we should remember that 25 million Russians and 3 million representatives of Russia's other peoples live outside the Russian Federation: 43.5 million so-called Russian speakers live in the “near abroad.” In short, it is inexpedient to restrict freedom of travel both for “universal humanitarian” reasons and proceeding from the concrete situation in what once was the USSR.

And yet it must be noted that today it is the Russian citizens living abroad who need protection and not the other way around. The neighboring countries must frankly admit that they have no grounds for blaming Russia in this respect. But working out and implementing a conception of protection for the rights of Russian citizens abroad in conformity with the norms of international law is urgently needed. A special concern is protection of economic rights of those ethnic groups whose only historical motherland is Russia and who recognize it as such. One more special concern is introduction of the economic responsibility of foreign countries for the fate of those of their residents who have decided to take Russian citizenship.

The social approach that has been prevalent thus far has suppressed the factor of a person's national identity. The approach from the point of view of human rights implies the unquestionable esteem for it.

To Avoid a New Yugoslavia

The demand for national self-determination has become one of the most important ones in the present political situation.

However, this just demand plays a destabilizing role in today's political practice. If urgent measures are not taken, this will, in the near future, bring about a total confrontation over the national issue in the country, a second edition of Yugoslav-type developments on a larger scale and with more tragic consequence for the entire world.

In this connection, the urgent task today is to start a struggle with the dangerous stereotype deeply rooted in the mass mentality and according to which the right of nations to self-determination is interpreted exclusively as their right to create national states. This is precisely the nature of many such demands (by Germans of the Volga Region, the Crimean Tatars, the Armenians living in Russia, etc.). The danger of such demands is not duly appreciated.

The principle of creating national administrative formations within Russia has been a historical mistake whose destructive consequences have yet to be fully realized. It has no future for a variety of reasons, including those giving rise to the problems of "indigenous" and "non-indigenous" peoples, border problems, territories, status of such formations, etc. The mounting demands to create national states within Russia result in a growing opposition from the population on whose lands "encroachments" are made; ethnic claims are multiplied and are further whipped up.

The only solution possible in present conditions, promising the possibility to settle similar problems in the future, is to approach this problem from the point of view of individual human rights, to endow the demand of national rights with real weight, that is, to really observe these rights in the cultural, religious, economic, and other spheres. It is also necessary to take into account the psychology and specific economic biases of certain peoples.

Assessing the situation in the country, one should proceed from the fact that Russia is not an artificial but a historically formed entity. It is a unique state in its size and its multinational character.

In the situation of disintegration of the USSR and declaring state sovereignty by former Union and autonomous republics, we must proceed from the idea of the country's sovereignty recognized by all citizens of Russia, which, in our opinion, must be regarded as a unitary state of all peoples living on its territory.

We believe that building a state not on the principle of national statehood but on that of its division into administrative-territorial units is more fruitful, more in keeping with the worldwide practice, and not contradicting Russia's historical experience. In our opinion, this principle has a future.

If we follow it, our country will be able to avoid national conflicts in the future.

At that, the transition to this system should be carried out in stages and must be accompanied by the establishment of new and the restoration of old economic ties and large-scale cultural educational work. This transition can be carried out only by means of consolidating economic, cultural, and administrative independence of both national and nationalstate formations, and administrative regions and entities, so that they could obtain true rights as parts of Russia.

Some people in the former autonomies fear this prospect without any reasons at all.

If complete and consistent observance of national rights becomes a reality, the problem of national statehood, as it is conceived today, will become less acute. The transition to dividing Russia into administrative-territorial units will become organic and devoid of conflicts.

This is precisely the basis for securing equal rights of peoples, regardless of their numerical strength, and for creating a genuine commonwealth of nations.

We have to admit with regret that the disintegrational processes resulting in the crash of the USSR now also affect the Russian Federation. The state is faced with a real danger of disintegration with all the ensuing political, economic, and social consequences. We have reason to believe that preservation of normal ties and relations within Russia is particularly important for the development of regions as a consequence of historical, economic, and other interregional ties having long-standing traditions.

Under Damocles's Sword of Disintegration

On the other hand, destabilization of the situation in any of Russia's regions will immediately affect the whole country. Tension has been growing in other regions as well. We have all reason to affirm that the range of social conflicts based on national factors has dangerously grown, and if the critical line is crossed (the danger of which seems to become more and more real), this may cause more serious consequences than those which accompanied the disintegration of the Soviet Union, primarily because the interests of these regions are much more painfully and closely connected with the age-old Russian territories.

One of the realities of our present life is the obvious weakening of Russian statehood. The role played by the state and its influence on society have diminished; vitally important institutions of statehood have grown weaker. This process was initiated by the struggle of certain social forces against the all-embracing role played by the state apparatus, which controlled practically all spheres of social and individual life for decades.

At a certain stage this struggle degenerated into a struggle with the state as such and led to anarchy and disorder in many areas of social life. This tendency is extremely dangerous, all the more so since society is not duly aware of it as yet.

National rights are doubtless one of the most important components of human rights in general. The national factor includes many aspects of human personality: mentality, the ethno-cultural type, religion, social priorities, ideological bearings. Given all that, it is necessary to admit that protection of human rights, in general, unavoidably presupposes protection of human rights of people precisely as representatives of a definite national community, since there are no abstract supranational human beings.

Let us ask ourselves the question: Can former autonomous entities in the Russian Federation claim state sovereignty today, that is, the same rights as Russia has? I do not think so. Russia is sovereign; not so its parts. It is inadmissible to make the Russian statehood and civic concord in the country objects of possible blackmailing actions. Autonomous formations will not be satisfied with sovereignty; they will seek new alliances and will find them.

All peoples inhabiting Russia and the former USSR

raise the question of their national peculiarities, traditions, and national self-awareness. The most numerous of the nation, Russians, have until recently remained the only ones unaffected by these processes. The situation is changing now. The rise of Russian national self-awareness is already a fact; it will unavoidably gain momentum and exert a tremendous influence on the situation in the country.

The responsibility for mistakes in the nationality policy and for crimes committed against a number of peoples is not infrequently laid on the Russian people. Complex historical events are far from impartially interpreted to the latter's disadvantage; present generations are blamed for real or ostensible faults by the leaders who ruled their ancestors' state. Of course, I do not mean whole nationalities, but in some regions there are forces professing such views they play a conspicuous role and affect the social and political situation there in the most negative way. Some politicians have made nationalism their banner, trying to come to power and retain it with its help.

The accusations of Russification and anti-Semitism become louder and louder, which resembles the situation in the 1920s on the eve of such tragic events as the dispossession of peasantry and the mass repressions against the core of the Russian nation. The danger of such accusations is that they may give a second breath to the idea of "the Russian republic," which will mean a new stage of "national squaring-off of accounts" and a direct threat of civil war in the country.

After the disintegration of the USSR, and as Russia's sovereignty was consolidated, the demographic situation in our country radically changed; this applies first of all to the place and the role of the Russian people in society.

In the USSR the latter made up about 40 percent of the state's population. In the present Russian Federation Russians constitute over 80 percent of the population. Today no other people in the country can compare with Russians in numerical strength.

Certainly this does not entitle Russians to a special legal status. The Russian Federation has been and remains a multinational state. The principle of equal rights for all citizens of a state, regardless of their national identity, must be observed unquestionably as one of the basic premises of a democratic society.

Yet the above peculiarity of the country's ethnic composition cannot be disregarded in formulating social, cultural, and political strategies. In particular, no efforts in economics can be successful without it. The policy of reforms can be successful and beneficial to the people, not when it copies a foreign model, but when reforms are worked out and implemented on the basis precisely of this people's historical experience, traditions, business ethics, and mentality. Russia's revival is possible only on this basis. Russia is not a dwarfish state or a banana republic. Unfortunately, the situation is aggravated by the recently initiated scholastic yet dangerous disputes, for instance, whether the Russian nation at all exists. The notion "the Great Russian nation" has come into being and is currently rather popular. These discussions aggravate the already explosive situation against the background of the growth of other people's self-awareness.

The rise of the Russian people's national self-awareness should not be interpreted as an upsurge of jingoism. Today no people in Russia, numerous or otherwise, having a national statehood or not, can be denied the right to national revival. Common approach to each nation and its rights is the obligatory condition for establishing genuinely equal rights.

In conclusion, we note that we have dwelt mainly on what disturbs us today in Russia's relations with the countries of the "near abroad." There are obviously many problems here, yet there are positive changes too....

3.24 Ambartsumov on the Shaping of Foreign Policy

Interview by Sergey Tikhomirov

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 29 May 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: As the split between President Yeltsin and the Russian Supreme Soviet became wider, journalists and public alike began to identify Evgeniy Ambartsumov with the parliament's competing foreign policy doctrine. Ambartsumov was a prominent spokesman for the nationalpatriot foreign policy position prior to the Supreme Soviet uprising on 3-5 October 1993.

[Interview with Evgeniy Ambartsumov, chairman of the Russian Supreme Soviet Committee for International Affairs and Foreign Economic Relations, by Sergey Tikhomirov.]

[Tikhomirov]: Earlier this year the long-awaited concept of our state foreign policy emerged from the depths of the Russian Foreign Ministry. Quite recently we also learned of the concept on this topic elaborated by the Russian president's Security Council. It would be interesting to learn your opinion of these documents and also whether the Supreme Soviet has an analogous concept.

[Ambartsumov]: No normal state can or should have two or three concepts of foreign policy. It is simply irrational, the sign of an anarchy-ridden state. That the government and the Supreme Soviet may, for example, have disagreements over particular provisions of it is another matter. However, the disagreements should be removed, eliminated by coordinating their positions and elaborating the optimal solution.

[Ambartsumov]: A paradoxical situation has come about, you know. The concept confirmed by the president is a classified document. And although our committee and I, in particular, took part in its completion, I have not seen it since it was approved by the president. And I personally do not understand how we can put this concept into effect when we do not know what it consists of.

As far as I am aware, the concept was drawn up as follows. There was Yuriy Skokov as leader of the Security Council Foreign Policy Committee. Its apparatus, with the participation of various departments, above all the Foreign Ministry, and parliamentary committees, particularly the International Affairs Committee, prepared the concept. It then clearly underwent some changes and was signed by the president.

Meanwhile Skokov had left. Whether this might seem to repudiate the document in some way I do not know. I ask myself that question. And I have no answer to it. But the concept has been confirmed and has acquired legal force.

When I asked at the Foreign Ministry where the concept was, it was explained to me that it is a classified document.

Clearly, the document could contain, let us say, some formulations that it is inadvisable to spread around. For example, it might say that some state cannot be trusted, that friendship will not be possible with another, and so forth. Naturally such things should form a classified section of the document.

Incidentally, the foreign policy concept elaborated by the Foreign Ministry does differ with respect to certain questions and in its form from the one prepared by the Security Council, although there are no particular inconsistencies in the approaches. I would specially observe (I express my own standpoint) that I see no point in the existence of two organs-the foreign policy commissions of the Security Council and the Foreign Ministry. There should not be two foreign ministries, as it were. That the president should in current conditions, with the inevitable strengthening of the presidential principle since the referendum, have his own apparatus, something like aides on security, domestic, and foreign policy problems, is another matter. They should pay more attention to foreign policy strategy and defining immediate goals and priorities.

[Ambartsumov]: Well, people are born and live their lives. They do not at the beginning work out a concept for themselves. In general they live without one. The postulate that we get nowhere without a program is a purely socialist brainchild.

I observe that the Security Council document is more incisive or, rather, more candid and pragmatic, and is also considerably shorter than the Foreign Ministry one.

[Tikhomirov]: So the latter is not currently operating, then?

[Ambartsumov]: No, why should it be operating? The document says that the Foreign Ministry concept was discussed and approved as a whole at a session of the Foreign Ministry Council for Foreign Policy with the participation of members of the parliamentary Committee for International Affairs. The Foreign Ministry reported on the document to the president and proceeds on the basis of its provisions in its practical activity. Incidentally, there has been no official endorsement of it by the president, although it may not have been required.

Again we are talking about confusion in our state here. Yuriy Skokov strengthened his position, as it were, and set up his own foreign policy commission. When he was organizing it, I asked Kozyrev what sort of commission it was, and he said that he did not know. At the time it seemed that Skokov was gathering strength and influence, but you see how it ended. However, as the saying goes, the man may have departed, but his work lives on....

[Tikhomirov]: Yugoslavia is on everyone's lips today. The events in that unfortunate country are being interpreted in different ways in Russia. Our Foreign Ministry has its own perspective. What is parliament's position?

[Ambartsumov]: We do clearly have differences with our diplomats, above all over how they see the situation in Yugoslavia. Until recently our Foreign Ministry regarded it through the eyes of the West. But that viewpoint is not always sufficiently objective or appropriate. And the story of our attitude concerning the events in Yugoslavia is quite typical in this regard.

We clearly supported premature recognition of Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, although the latter had never existed as a single state. And its emergence as a single state is at variance with its previous constitution. In my view, this premature recognition served to spur on the grievous ethnic war. Incidentally, I warned eighteen months ago—even earlier in fact—that this step should not be taken.

And now, for example, my counterpart from the West German Bundestag (and he is not alone) agrees with me that it was a mistake. Most of our partners in talks support such a stance.

Moreover, take the well-known decision on sanctions made in May last year. The Serbs' responsibility for ethnic cleansing and killing people is indisputable. But all the warring sides-Serbs, Croats, and Muslims-are guilty, albeit to varying degrees. Sanctions, however, were taken only against Serbia.

In this situation the Supreme Soviet proposed modifying our diplomatic service's course and opposed the sanctions. And, after all, they have really come to nothing to date, and have resolved nothing. Despite all this, the Supreme Soviet has never sided unconditionally with Serbia. Some members-yes. And now modification of the Foreign Ministry's course has occurred. Even a short while ago the Foreign Ministry would certainly have supported the proposal on armed Western intervention in the conflict; however, the Kozyrev-Churkin plan, which was drawn up with our participation, is based on the need for a political solution of the problem.

In other words, the differences in approaches have led not to the victory of one or the other but to parliament's view of the problem being taken into consideration to a considerable extent.

I will take yet another aspect. Long before my election as committee chairman, treaties regulating bilateral relations were concluded among the member states of the former Union. It turned out, however, that the concepts of those agreements were not properly studied. Yes, we granted the new states independence-it was not won by them. Without the support of democratic forces and actions in defense of the inhabitants of Tbilisi or Vilnius the acquisition of independence by the new states would have been very problematic.

Thus, even before the disintegration of the USSR, when bilateral treaties began to be concluded they did not take account of one essential element, namely, the rights of our fellow-citizens. The shortsightedness of both the Foreign Ministry and parliament told here. No strategy for the defense of the Russian-speaking population or for its equality in the countries of the “near abroad” was elaborated. Our fellow-citizens ended up second-class citizens against their will.

We all have to work on this now. At the start there was intense pressure on the government and the Foreign Ministry by deputies. And now the Foreign Ministry itself is taking appropriate steps-witness Kozyrev’s refusal to attend the last session of the Council of Europe, where Estonia was admitted.

[Tikhomirov]: What specifically are you and your committee proposing?

[Ambartsumov]: Well, given that the Soviet Union was dissolved with such haste and lack of prudence, it is essential to proceed from the new realities. From the very outset I regarded the disintegration of the USSR as a mistake. No, I do not mean that it should have been preserved, but that the process of the “divorce” should have been conducted more smoothly. Incidentally, I recently met with the former German foreign minister, Genscher, and he asked me: “But why did they destroy the Soviet Union?” To which I said: “In my opinion, in order to get rid of Gorbachev.” He was surprised: Was not that too high a price? Yes, the cost of the collapse of a great power was indeed too high a price to pay.

Thus we have to take an active part in the political negotiating process with the new states based on the realities, which is being done by our committee members. We have, by the way, played a large role in the talks on the Dniester region, the Moldovan question, Ossetia, and so forth.

We are simultaneously calling for cooperation by the parliaments of the new states. We have begun with the exchange of delegations. We will together search for ways of resolving urgent issues.

[Tikhomirov]: Please say why you did not support Kozyrev when he refused to travel to the Council of Europe in Strasbourg.

[Ambartsumov]: Why did I not give my support? Of course I would have preferred the Council of Europe to have refrained, or deferred the question of Estonia’s admission. But I do not think that Kozyrev’s demarche was an appropriate method. We have experienced all these boycotts, ostentatious walkouts from sessions, and so forth. I prefer civilized methods in politics.....

3.25 Academics Present Report on CIS Integration

Marat Salimov

Kommersant-Daily, 15 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The article below is included as evidence of the academic institutions in Russia that have encouraged the growing conviction that the collapse of the Soviet Union was the cause of the economic malaise being experienced by each former republic. Instead of analyzing the inherent weaknesses of the former system of centrally controlled trade and economic linkages, and pointing to that system's responsibility for the post-Soviet economic situation, many statistical reports have been skewed to emphasize the reduction in "deliveries" (not real trade) and to use this as evidence of the need for reintegration.

At yesterday's press conference, academicians Oleg Bogomolov and Stepan Sitaryan presented a report on "Problems of Reintegration and the Establishment of the Economic Union of the CIS Countries." The report suggested that processes of disintegration are still growing in intensity within the territory of the former USSR, and that Russia has to make a much more vigorous attempt to restore trade and economic ties between the Commonwealth countries in this context.

The report was prepared jointly by the "Reform" International Fund and the academy's Foreign Economic Research Institute and International Economic and Political Research Institute. The authors advocate quicker reintegration in the post-Soviet zone. Their arguments are based on the premise that the disruption of cooperative relationships and trade contacts lie at the base of the exacerbation of the economic crisis and the recession in the CIS countries.

The following statistics were cited as corroboration. Whereas commodity exchange between the union republics in 1988 constituted (in terms of the GNP) 13 percent for Russia, 27 and 29 percent for Ukraine and Kazakhstan respectively, and from 34 percent to 50 percent for the other republics, the indicators are now less than half as high as they were, and the reduction of reciprocal deliveries is exacerbating the recession in the CIS countries. The authors of the report referred once again to statistics that were popular at the time of the "rebirth of the Russian state," indicating that the complete severance of economic ties between the former republics of the USSR would lead to a situation in which Russia could secure the production of 65 percent of the final product independently, with respective figures of 31 percent for Azerbaijan, 27 percent for Kazakhstan, and 15 percent for Ukraine.

The academicians' conclusions are clearly delayed, because data obtained by Kommersant-Daily's experts suggest that the low point of disintegration has already been reached in the CIS countries. Specific economic policy moves provide evidence of this. The countries are already working on the creation of supranational administrative bodies for the economic and payment union, not to mention the persistent efforts of Belarus and Tajikistan to become part of the ruble zone. The academicians are correct in their assumption that the speed of reintegration and the correspondence of this process to Russia's national interests will depend primarily on Russia's own position on this matter, especially now that there are new political leaders in Kiev and Minsk.

3.26 Rutskoy Discusses New Opposition Movement

Interview by Petra Prochazkova and Jaromir Stetina
LidoveNoviny, 25 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

We met Aleksandr Rutskoy at the meeting of opposition politicians in Moscow. The general had the seat of honor in the first row.

[Lidove Noviny]: Do you recall the Lefortovo prison often?

[Lidove Noviny]: Are you not afraid that you might be heading back there?

[Rutskoy]: What can I do? I served time in a Pakistani prison. Now I have spent some time in ours, one can survive anything.

[Lidove Noviny]: As opposed to Ruslan Khasbulatov, you have returned to political life, appear at the opposition meetings and demonstrations. ... Is it revenge against the present leadership, or some other motivation? [Rutskoy]: My role in this process is completely different now. I am working very hard on the establishment of a social-patriotic movement called Derzhava (Power).

[Lidove Noviny]: Why the name Power for the movement you are organizing?

[Rutskoy]: The principal point in the program of this movement is the revival of Russia as a power.

[Rutskoy]: His ideas are completely different. I heard, for instance, that he wants to wash his boots in the Indian Ocean [reference to Zhirinovskiy's autobiography-the statement refers to Russian soldiers washing their boots in the Indian Ocean]. The program of my movement will be published in about a week. It discusses the revival of Great Russia in detail. I have been considering it for almost two years.

[Lidove Noviny]: You are not alone. Calls for a confederation or some other kind of union of the former Soviet republics are heard in Russia ever more frequently....

[Rutskoy]: No confederation can regain stability in the geopolitical space where the USSR used to stand. Look what happened to the Commonwealth of Independent States-it disintegrated even before it started to exist. There is no place in nature for confederations or some peculiar commonwealths. The only possibility is the unification of nations and nationalities into a single nation. A single economic domain and ruble zone must be created within the 1915 borders.

[Lidove Noviny]: What about the states that will not want to enter such a union?

[Rutskoy]: They will have to subject themselves to international norms: that is, trade in world prices, customs, and borders. If they insult us, we will close all their taps, channels, and electric-power network. And we will congratulate them on their complete independence. After just two months, these “sovereign” regimes, which rule there today, will be toppled by their own people, who will join us. Thus, we will gradually create a power that used to exist. It will be done peacefully in a civilized manner.

[Lidove Noviny]: So, you want to revive the USSR?

[Rutskoy]: That is an oversimplification. If we look at the map of 1915, we will see that there are no independent states, and even fewer states on which nothing depends. There is only Russia a great derzhava. There is only one possibility-the revival of a state power uniting all nationalities in a single large family. It is the return to the historical truth, to Russia of 1915. Since a lot has changed, however, only a revival within the USSR borders is feasible.

[Lidove Noviny]: What do you need to attain these goals?

[Rutskoy]: Power. The main goal of my movement is to take over the power. As long as we do not have power, we cannot achieve a thing. Our minimum program is to obtain a majority in the next election.

[Lidove Noviny]: It is no secret that you are also preparing for the presidential elections. What kind of a president do you think Russia needs right now?

[Rutskoy]: Since time immemorial, Russia has been ruled by a strong personality. Everything depended on what kind of a person he or she was. When it was a moral and intellectual person, who loved his or her country, Russia flourished. When it was someone with a crooked character, Russia was debased, just like it is today. Russia again needs a positive figure.

[Rutskoy]: Russia today is reminiscent of a one-way street everything flows out and nothing comes back. Our country is being systematically insulted. They insult the Russians in the former USSR republics, deprive them of the basic human rights, and, at the same time, these states use Russian raw materials, Russian crude oil, Russian natural gas, electric power. And we are just watching. It should be stopped now.

[Rutskoy]: To create a Russian power and society of real socialism-not a society of social egalitarianism, but of social justice. We want to give the people a chance to live in a dignified manner. Dignity rather than humiliation, that is the objective of our movement.

[Lidove Noviny]: What is the opposition really?

[Rutskoy]: It is a highly organized association of people with a single leader, a clear program, and mass support. If such an opposition with a single leader had existed in October last year, the White House bloodshed would not have occurred. The opposition must unite. Today, one speaks about nationalism, another about the Russian issue, yet another about the Soviet Union, someone claims that we do not need a president, and someone else calls for a parliamentary republic. It is the same at this session. They spoke about generating some funds, about membership dues. Are we building some kind of a trade union? When I look at this cabal, I think it would be funny if it were not so pathetic.

[Rutskoy]: All their squalor derives from their not respecting the law and not knowing the meaning of responsibility. Nobody is responsible for anything here, no one is subordinated to anyone, no one has to render an account of his actions to anyone. Look at the Duma. What does it do-I myself do not know. To whom is it responsible? Nobody.

[Lidove Noviny]: Are you in contact with Ruslan Khasbulatov? Do you intend to cooperate with him in your organization Power in the future?

[Rutskoy]: I meet Ruslan Imranovich [Khasbulatov] relatively often. Neither he nor I, however, have ever planned joint political activity. He helps me a lot. He is a doctor of science, and I have always held him in high esteem. We have prepared the declaration of the Power movement together, and we are working on the program now. If he can contribute to our movement, he will do so.

[Lidove Noviny]: Do you have any idea of when the almost disastrous situation in Russian society could turn to the better?

[Rutskoy]: As soon as law is put in the forefront, the economy and politics become stable, and production, work, and business discipline can be revived. Until then, we will float like chaotic molecules in space [sentence as published].

3.27 Text of FIS Report Presented by Primakov

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 22 September 1994 [FBIS Translation]

[Unattributed account of report delivered to Russian and foreign journalists by Evgeniy Primakov, director of the Russian Foreign Intelligence Service.]

Notwithstanding the clear differences in opinions regarding the future of the CIS and Russia's place in the Commonwealth, two approaches have of late been clearly seen in the West: one based on cooperation with the Russian Federation as an equal partner and the other based on a “unipolar” world in which Russia is given the role of a country with a strictly limited range of interests and tasks. This conclusion was reached by analysts from the Russian Federation Foreign Intelligence Service [FIS] in an open report entitled “Russia- CIS: Does the West’s Position Need Modification?” which was submitted to Russian and foreign journalists at the Foreign Ministry Press Center by FIS Director Evgeniy Primakov.

We are publishing his report.

The main avenue of contemporary development in the international situation is highlighted by a move away from “Cold War values” and a reorientation to civilized interstate relations. But all that does not render the world less complex, does not preclude failures of various countries’ national interests to intermesh, and sometimes even conflicts between various countries’ national interests. The inertia of thinking and the enduring stereotypes of past practice also take their toll to some extent.

Tracing the development of various processes and trends in the international arena, the Russian Federation FIS could not overlook the fact that influential circles in a number of Western countries interpret the role that Russia may play in uniting the republics of the former Soviet Union as “imperial” and integration as a process aimed at the restoration of the USSR.

Some foreign analysts are promoting with increasing vigor the idea that the irreversibility of the move away from the “Cold War” is directly dependent on keeping the former Soviet Union in a disconnected state. At the same time it is claimed (by Brzezinski and others) that separate CIS states are needed to balance the tendency for Moscow’s positions to gain strength. The prospects linked with the results of the recent elections in Ukraine and Belorussia [Belarus] are also being viewed from the viewpoint of the undesirability of centripetal processes on the territory of the former USSR. The conclusion is drawn that the policy of the leading Western countries vis—vis the CIS area should be modified with a view to preserving the status quo that took shape following the breakup of the Union. On the one hand, these opinions hid real fears that centripetal processes within the Commonwealth may revive the Union state in its former capacity as the enemy of the West and, on the other, clear pointers regarding the “need” to prevent Russia’s growing stronger as a world power.

Needless to say, all Western leaders are not so definite and unequivocal. But even the fact that this topic is being discussed by political circles in the United States and certain European states, along with the calls for a reappraisal of the West’s strategy in the sphere of security and for changes to their policy toward Russia and the other CIS countries, is viewed by FIS experts as serious reason for analysis.

I. Wholesale Generalizations and Reality

The idea of Russia’s changing and as yet undefined relations with the former national Soviet republics as “Moscow’s imperial ambitions” is not a matter for theoretical dispute. Policy may be-and in a number of cases already is-behind that assessment.

U.S. congressional experts, for instance, rightly point out that in the past year Russia's foreign policy has become more independent, regarding its own vital national interests as being of paramount importance. One can and must concur unequivocally that this change does not revive the "Cold War" era. However, the conclusion that this change in Russia's policy does nevertheless represent a "kind of challenge to the United States" stems from the logic that indeed prevailed during the "Cold War" when one side's defense of its own interests was necessarily regarded as a minus by the other side.

Russia's safeguarding its vital interests is by no means an alternative to its desire for partnership relations with the United States and European and other states. On the contrary, the durability of these relations is ensured by their equitable nature, which manifests itself in the partners' ability to grasp the essence of one another's national interests and uphold them in a non-confrontational climate.

Typically, many foreign experts mainly associate the threat to Russian-Western relations with Russia's stance on the so-called "near abroad."

Some shift of emphasis can be noticed here. The question of whether the centripetal tendencies within the Commonwealth will develop within or outside the democratic process may indeed be worrying both Western politicians and public opinion in the "far abroad." However, often the emphasis is placed on something else: Will the CIS survive at all in its disjointed form or will there be reintegration on its territory? Here the former is seen as beneficial to the West and the latter as contrary to its interests.

Current information indicates that the arguments behind this stance are mainly that:

- reintegration will destroy the sovereignty of the states within the CIS;
- it will at the same time weaken democratic processes throughout the Commonwealth;
- Russia, using its resources, which are incomparable to those of the other CIS countries, will start “flexing its muscles.”

These arguments are unfounded.

First, all attitudes toward the breakup of the Union notwithstanding, the tremendous stability of the new states' sovereignty remains an immutable fact. Its attainment is virtually irreversible.

Second, any significant political organizations that condemn the breakup of the USSR do not aim to restore it in its previous form and capacity. Awareness of the irreversibility not only of the CIS countries' state sovereignty but also of the emergence of private ownership throughout the greater part of the former USSR and the development of a mixed economy is growing among these organizations and forces.

Third, the idea of Russia's striving to "take in hand" the other CIS states, using its economic and other advantages to this end, is untenable. The fairly widespread views in the national republics of the USSR that "assets were pumped" from the provinces to Russia and that Moscow "inculcated" excessive centralization in cadre and other decisions initially or historically, so to speak, paved the way for this kind of talk. The latter did indeed take place in the past but the "resumption of Moscow's diktat"-and all serious experts are aware of this-is impossible following the changes in Russia and the former USSR republics' acquisition of sovereignty.

It would be wrong to claim that "integrationist" views and sentiments hold complete sway at present in the CIS countries. There are certain forces in Russia itself and the other CIS states that disregard or underestimate the objective nature of the centripetal tendencies forging their way through various parts of the former Union. In Russia, hypothetically speaking, the "neoisolationists” rely on “conclusions” that economic integration on the territory of the former USSR would weaken their sovereignty, strengthen Moscow’s influence, and complicate the development of relations with other states.

Both groups consider that they express the national idea. And Russian “neo-isolationists” can indeed, for instance, cite the fact that in 1993 alone deliveries to other CIS countries for which no payment was made reached around $10 billion, which is in excess of all the aid that Russia received from the IMF and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development [World Bank]. (Is that not a counterargument to the big talk regarding the machinations by Moscow, which is allegedly thinking of establishing its own supremacy throughout the Commonwealth!) The “neoisolationists” believe that Russia should “distance itself” from the other CIS countries because their egotistical credit and monetary policy is dangerously whipping up inflation in Russia.

All that is indeed happening. However, “neo-isolationist” ideas and currents run counter to objective processes. What is more, they harbor considerable potential for conflict. At the same time, according to the Russian FIS’s information, a desire is arising in leadership circles in a number of leading Western countries and states in the Muslim world to view “neo-isolationist” currents as a possible mainstay when implementing their policy on the CIS.

II. Economic Realities

There are a whole series of factors in favor of creating a common economic area in the Commonwealth:

- the traditionally high level of production sharing that has developed over the decades: In the late eighties the RSFSR (now Russia) sold almost twice as much of its output via interrepublic union commodity turnover as it did via trade with foreign countries while the other former Soviet republics sold roughly seven times as much;
- the single technological area that developed over the decades, the unified standards, and the fact that national processing capacities were tied to certain categories and grades of raw materials and semimanufactures;
- the republics' vital need to maintain employment by preserving mutual deliveries and also the very existence of their own industry, whose output, with the exception of cheap natural raw materials, is as yet uncompetitive on the world market;
- the need for investment cooperation in opening up and processing natural resources, and the joint use of important installations, particularly infrastructure;
- the advantages of a coordinated strategy for the conversion of the defense industry;
- the impossibility, given the "transparency" of the borders, of total economic isolation;
- the sizable material losses owing to illegal imports and re-export; the absence of a coordinated financial policy, and difficulties in mutual settlements;
- the unfeasibility in the coming years of a real influx of foreign financial and industrial capital, given the instability of the situation in the CIS countries and the high degree of commercial risk.

Lastly, there is no reason to believe that the CIS will stay aloof from worldwide practice, which demonstrates the advantages of a large-scale economic area for the development of productive forces. It was awareness of these advantages that led to the conception and broadening of economic integration processes in various parts of the world-be it the European Union, ASEAN, NAFTA, or other integrationist groupings.

Naturally in the present conditions, in view of the sovereignty of the CIS states, it is impossible to mechanically restore the economic ties in the forms that existed within the single Union of the past. The movement toward the creation of a common economic area in the CIS is not straightforward and cannot occur without irregularities, digressions, and retreats. Suffice it to say that the formation of a common economic area within the Commonwealth is altogether impossible without in-depth economic reforms in the USSR's former national republics and without squaring their economic mechanisms with the Russian model.

The stage-by-stage resolution of the issue of forming a common economic area is dictated not only by the uneven development of elements for the transition to a market economy in the CIS countries but also by the demands of this process itself. The creation of a common market, including freedom of movement for goods, capital, and the work force, is proposed as the immediate objective followed by the unification of the infrastructure to ensure the normal functioning of the corresponding sectors of the Commonwealth countries' economy.

The creation of a common economic area in the Commonwealth is by no means an easy matter. However, it is hopeless to resist the centripetal tendencies within the CIS, which are particularly manifest at present in the economic sphere.

And counterproductive at the same time.

The creation of a common economic area in the CIS is virtually the only way of reducing tension in interstate relations in connection with the fact that following the breakup of the Union there are around 25 million Russians and so-called Russian speakers who gravitate toward them outside Russia.

III. Security Realities

A number of factors are prompting the CIS countries to create not only an economic but also a common defense area designed to guarantee their security.

The change in the military-political situation in the world, characterized by a reduction in tension on a global level, the Russian Federation's and other CIS countries' renunciation of the concept of permanent enemies, and the beginning of cooperation with NATO does not mean the elimination of potential threats to their security. The world community is now at a stage where the geopolitical configuration is changing, the militarization of a number of "Third World" countries is continuing, and many nuclear and "threshold" states are situated on or near to the CIS borders, the conflict zone is expanding, encompassing the center of Europe and part of the "outlying areas" of the former USSR.

1. Conflict in the CIS Countries

The interethnic and interstate conflicts that have broken out in the CIS states directly and in adjacent countries are tending to expand. The situation is aggravated by a number of factors.

First, in postwar history this is the first time that crisis has simultaneously enveloped a host of countries in direct proximity to or bordering on states on whose territory contemporary destructive arms and highly complex technical production units are located. In these conditions the settlement of interethnic and interstate conflicts is a particularly pressing task.

Second, a considerable proportion of the CIS conflict zone is adjacent to Afghanistan, where there is no sign of the situation stabilizing in the near future. In view of the ethnic features (the northern part of Afghanistan is inhabited mainly by Tajiks and Uzbeks) Afghanistan's destabilizing effect on the Central Asian states is intensifying. Moreover it is threatening to the state security of a number of countries, primarily Tajikistan, followed by Uzbekistan. Russia's FIS has information to the effect that there are forces in Afghanistan that want to break the north away and that are striving to create on that basis a Farsi-speaking state incorporating Tajikistan.

Third, the situation in the CIS "hot spots" has been aggravated as a result of states other than Afghanistan, primarily Iran and Turkey, becoming "embroiled" in them. Both these countries are seeking to broaden their influence and are aspiring to the role of regional superpowers. As a result of their "involvement" in the conflicts on CIS territory-and this is of significance not only for Russia alone-there is a "swing to the right" taking place in the alignment of forces in Turkey and Iran.

Fourth, Islamic extremism has a highly negative effect on the crisis situations on CIS territory.

FIS analysts believe that under no circumstances should it be associated with Islamic fundamentalism, which does not presuppose the forcible spread of Islam, much less terrorist methods. However, of late, Islamic extremism has intensified as a movement aiming to spread Islam by force, suppress forces opposed to this, and change the secular nature of the state.

The "effect" of this extremism has manifested itself in both Tajikistan and the Caucasus conflict zone. However, the problem of the spread of Islamic extremism is not locally confined.

Fifth, despite a host of statements, in actual fact an inadequate reaction can be discerned on the part of the world community to the conflict situations that have developed near Russia's borders. For instance, for all the comparable number of victims of the Yugoslav crisis and in the CIS "hot spots," major differences are emerging in peacekeeping diplomacy toward these two crisis zones. The United Nation's sharp reaction involving the use of force to capture several units of combat hardware in Bosnia rubs shoulders with a "polite reference" to the death of Russian border guards when repelling gangs' attempts to infiltrate the Afghan-Tajik border.

2. Peacekeeping Actions on CIS Territory

All the Commonwealth countries have an interest in their implementation.

Russia's active involvement in settling conflict situations is attributed to its vital interest in a stable situation on its borders and in preventing conflicts having a provocative influence on certain regions of the Russian Federation. People in Moscow cannot close their eyes to the violation of the rights of the Russian-speaking population and the fact that armed operations result in the death of Russian citizens. Refugees are streaming toward the Russian Federation, and huge financial resources are needed to look after them, while their migration is exacerbating the social and crime situation.

Despite the indisputably positive results of the peacekeeping actions in South Ossetia and the Dniester Region, their important role in Tajikistan, and the favorable start to the operations in Abkhazia, they elicit a more or less negative or suspicious reaction in many capitals of the "far abroad." There is criticism of Russia's "special role" in peacekeeping actions on the territory of the Commonwealth countries and the idea that its vital interests are linked with a state of stability in the other CIS countries.

On the poor international-legal base for peacekeeping operations on CIS territory. In reality Russia's commitments under the UN Charter, the corresponding UN Security Council decisions, and other international treaties and agreements, including within the CIS framework ("On Collective Peacekeeping Forces in the CIS" of 20 March 1992; "On Collective Peacekeeping Forces and Joint Measures to Provide Them with Material and Technical Support" of 24 September 1993, etc.) constitute the international-legal basis for its participation in peacekeeping activity.

The possibility of the use of Russian peacekeeping contingents abroad in accordance with Russia's international commitments is envisaged in the Russian Federation Law "On Defense" of 24 September 1992 and the Russian Federation presidential edict "On the Basic Provisions of Russian Federation Military Doctrine" of 2 November 1993. The draft law "On the Procedure for the Provision of Russian Personnel for Participation in Peacekeeping Activity" is being examined by the Russian Federation parliament.

It must also be particularly emphasized that no peacekeeping action in the CIS has been conducted without the consent of the conflicting parties although the United States, for instance, has carried out operations in Panama and Grenada without any approval from these countries' authorities.

On the fact that Russia allegedly pits its efforts against the activity of the United Nations and other international organizations. By way of confirmation I can cite in particular the words spoken by U.S. Secretary of State Christopher, who said bluntly when addressing the U.S. Senate on 2 March of this year: "We (the United States) do not recognize their (Russia's) right to take any actions in the new independent states save those which are carried out following coordination with the United Nations and other international organs and in accordance with the norms of international law."

On the lack of neutrality among the Russian forces when implementing individual peacekeeping operations on Commonwealth territory. There are usually references to the Russian military's "inconsistency" in Abkhazia and Tajikistan. However, the neutrality of the Russian forces involved in resolving conflicts is guaranteed by the pledges made by the Russian Federation when coordinating the terms and framework of the peacekeeping operations with all the interested parties.

On the predominance of Russian subunits in the Commonwealth's peacekeeping contingents. This cannot be put forward as an accusation purely because in practice it is not yet possible to ensure full-fledged participation by the other CIS states in peacekeeping operations. The overwhelming majority of states of the "far abroad" are not prepared to send peacekeeping forces here, and the United Nations is not prepared to pay for peacekeeping operations.

On the inadequacy of international monitoring of Russia's peacekeeping activity. This is completely refuted, for instance, by the fact that the CIS countries' peacekeeping operations in Abkhazia and Nagorno-Karabakh will be monitored in total by several hundred international observers. UN and CSCE [Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe] missions have already been operating in the Dniester Region, Georgia, and Tajikistan for a long time. The large Minsk Group of the CSCE on Nagorno-Karabakh has been functioning since 1992. They all have practically unlimited access to the information they require.

On the inadequacy of the negotiation process in settling conflicts. Not a single Russian peacekeeping operation has been carried out without preliminary work to organize talks between the parties to the conflict.

Moreover, the military phase of the settlement, involving the sending in of disengagement forces (South Ossetia, the Dniester Region, Abkhazia) or the countering of outside aggression (Tajikistan) is always aimed at creating the conditions for intensifying talks with international participation (the United Nations, the CSCE). That talks to find a peaceful resolution to crises should be prolonged is a normal phenomenon in world practice.

Thus, Russia is observing all the internationally recognized conditions of peacekeeping taken together.

3. The Problem of the “Transparency” of External and Internal Borders

Following the USSR’s collapse and the formation of the CIS, the question of how to ensure a quality relationship between CIS external borders and the internal borders of Commonwealth countries has sharply arisen. With “transparent” internal borders there is no doubt about the need to protect external borders. At the same time, in the absence of an overall defense area including functions such as a unified system for protecting external borders, there is a need to delimit and demarcate the Commonwealth’s internal borders. And this is by no means easy.

The demarcation of Russia’s borders with neighboring CIS countries will require huge financial expenditure—which could substantially hamper the reform of the Russian economy and stoke the already tense socio-political situation. The demarcation of Russian borders would be liable to lead to the emergence of new “hot spots” in the CIS—for instance, Ossets, Lezgins, and so forth, would find themselves on both sides of the state border.

Thus, the measures to step up controls of the Russian Federation border with Azerbaijan have shown that in this sector hundred of citizens from Iran, Pakistan, Iraq, and other countries are illegally entering Russia along with contraband, including weapons. As a result of the “holes” in our border protection and visa regulations, and of the lack of coordination in immigration policy between the CIS countries, the number of illegal migrants from various Asian and African countries coming to Russia has increased sharply.

This situation is making it necessary for Russia to stabilize the situation in the “near abroad” through joint efforts with the CIS countries and to restore order on the Commonwealth’s external borders, while simultaneously equipping the Russian border-bearing in mind that the approach taken to determining the arrangements in the various different sectors should depend on local circumstances and should rule out the possibility of any damage being done to integration processes on CIS territory.

4. Features of Military Organizational Development in the Leading States That Were Formerly “Enemies” of the USSR

The current phase of the development of international relations has some specific components that Russia and the other CIS members cannot fail to take into account. The United States, Britain, France, and China have currently not only given up their strategic offensive weapons but are also implementing a range of measures to modernize their landbased ICBMs, their submarine-launched ballistic missiles, and their strategic aviation.

Under present-day conditions these states have not missed out on the trend common to all former Cold War participants toward a reduction in military spending. New emphasis is being laid on military doctrines, dictated by the current military-political and military-strategic situation.

The United States’s new nuclear strategy, which emerged after the end of the Cold War, preserves the basic principles of the utilization of nuclear weapons-the comprehensive combat use of all components of the “triad”; the provision of conditions for neutralizing enemy defenses; collaboration among different U.S. combat arms; and close coordination of their efforts with the NATO allies.

The single operational plan for destroying the presumed enemy’s strategic targets (Strategic Intelligence Operations Plan) envisages supplementing the range of new scenarios and unusual targets. There is a planned transition to “adaptive” planning, which makes it possible to clarify virtually in real time the operational plans for the use of nuclear weapons in response to a changing situation.

While preserving and modernizing their strategic offensive weapons, the United States, China, Britain, and France are emphasizing the development of their national forces. And the United States, with the most powerful strategic offensive weapons systems, is continuing to provide guarantees to a number of non-nuclear powers both within NATO and outside it. For instance, there is a paragraph to this effect in the U.S.-Japanese Security Treaty.

The existing practice, linked to improving strategic offensive weapons and the continued provision of guarantees by the United States, is due to a number of factors:

- the “uncertainty” of the domestic political situation in Russia;
- the continuing presence of nuclear weapons on the territory of Ukraine and Kazakhstan, where the domestic political situation has also not stabilized;

- the need to “restrain” China, particularly in the Asia-Pacific region;
- the acquisition of nuclear weapons by a number of countries, including India and Pakistan;
- the continuing work to develop [sozdanie] nuclear weapons in other states (the relevant “indications” of the situation in this sphere in North Korea and Iran are received particularly painfully).

With certain overtones the list of these factors also features in any explanation of political decisions in the sphere of military-strategic organizational development in Britain and France.

China too argues that its policy has an eye to the “need to safeguard its national interests.” One way or another, all the measures to improve national strategic offensive weapons are presented as an appropriate reaction to the new dangers of the post-Cold War period.

Irrespective of the weightiness of the reasons behind this practice, it is a reality that Russia-and, clearly, the other CIS countries-cannot ignore. The conclusion has been drawn from this practice that it is necessary at this stage to preserve and develop one's own strategic offensive forces.

5. Other Present-Day Security Requirements

These primarily include the problems of overcoming the environmental crisis which is getting worse throughout the Commonwealth. And the fight against the causes of this crisis requires joint efforts from all the CIS countries for the simple reason that many of the sources of environmental disasters and difficulties are found in several different states (the Aral Sea, for instance).

The same joint efforts are required in the fights against epidemics, which have become particularly dangerous in the context of the deteriorating socio-economic situation in a whole number of areas and the lack of any proper publichealth measures appropriate to the "transparency" of our internal borders and the "holes" in the Commonwealth's external borders-particularly in the Central Asia and the Caucasus.

Close coordination of the CIS countries' efforts is also needed in order to successfully combat organized crime. It is necessary to pool efforts in this area because of the "international" nature of organized crime, which came about during the USSR's existence and persists today. We could also conclude that, without effective collaboration between law-enforcement organs and the

CIS countries' special services, there will be no chance at all to improve the crime situation on the territory of the former USSR-a situation of increasing alarm not only to the population of the Commonwealth but also to the "far abroad."

IV. Likely Scenarios for the Development of the Situation in the CIS

Scenario A

Centripetal processes intensify within the CIS. The prerequisites for a common economic area are created and then the area takes shape. General rules of "economic behavior" and unified systems in the sphere of lending, money supply, customs, taxes, arbitration courts, and so forth are elaborated and formalized. Transrepublican companies are set up. While retaining their state sovereignty, the CIS countries "delegate" part of it to the suprarepublican structures required for the functioning of the common economic area.

Along with economic integration (or lagging slightly behind it) there is integration in the military sphere, and a defense area is formed with a unified command and unified subunits designed to protect external borders, undertake peacekeeping missions, and deter potential enemies.

It is not ruled out that in the process of further development the prerequisites will appear for political integration, the most likely form of which could be a confederation.

Events could develop differently under this scenario. Most probably the process would begin with the implementation of agreements on an economic union initially between several CIS members, with the others joining later.

The development of events under this scenario would lead to stabilization, democratization, and the advancement of reform, and could include a transition to a federal system in a number of CIS countries-which would reduce still further the threat of interethnic and interstate conflicts on Commonwealth territory.

The development of events under this scenario would lead to an increase in the power of the CIS, its ability to develop independently, and its competitive strength in international markets. But at a time when democratic processes and economic reforms are developing in the former USSR, this will not result in the clock being turned back to the era of confrontation with the West. On the contrary, this scenario creates the best opportunity for stabilizing the situation throughout the CIS, nullifying the danger of “chaos in a nuclear-weapon state” and producing the necessary conditions for expanding economic cooperation-including by attracting foreign investment.

Scenario B

With direct or indirect outside support, forces advocating “separate development” gain the upper hand in Russia and other Commonwealth countries. This compounds the economic crisis in the former Union national republics and increases the socio-political tension in them. The breakdown of national economic ties and the abandonment of production sharing could become irreversible. The unemployment problem will become acute and the transition to boosting production will be complicated.

The emphasis on nationalism will be accompanied by an intensification in authoritarian and undemocratic trends. The criminalization of society, the infringement of ethnic minorities' rights, and mass violations of human rights will be additional destabilizing factors.

The positions of Islamic extremists in the CIS states with Muslim populations will grow stronger. The intensification of separatist trends will help bring about the collapse of certain states.

Theoretically for Russia the conditions for getting out of the economic crisis could improve in a very short period of time. But the economy does not develop in a vacuum. The question of the need to completely eliminate the "transparency" of borders will arise and will require enormous expenditure. The flow of refugees from certain CIS countries to the Russian Federation will increase. The new geopolitical situation will require considerable additional amounts of defense spending. Finally, Russia will lose its traditional markets, which will be particularly painful just when we are emerging from the crisis and beginning to boost production.

The overall destabilization in the CIS will pose a threat to the world community's security.

Scenario C

(Rather, you could call it a “subscenario,” since the development of events implied by it would inevitably lead in the final analysis to either Scenario A or Scenario B.)

One of the CIS states (but not Russia) undertakes “unifying” functions. Several republics of the former USSR (without Russia) move closer together. Integration processes begin within the framework of this group of states. One option would be development, whereby definite impetus is given to integration processes on the territory of the entire CIS, and the original group becomes part of a general integrated area. Another option would be that the group turns in on itself [zamykaetsya v sebe], which would inevitably push it toward external “centers of influence.”
[Scenario C ends.]

The influence of leading countries of the “far abroad” on the processes taking place in the CIS is indisputable and, consequently, the scenario that the development of the situation in the former USSR follows will, to a certain extent, depend on those countries.

In recent months there has been a wide divergence of opinions in the West about the future Commonwealth. A great deal will be determined by which approach prevails: reliance on cooperation with Russia as an equal partner (given the irreversibility of democratization and the objective nature of the reintegration processes on CIS territory) or reliance on a “unipolar” world in which the Russian Federation is given the role of a country with a very limited range of interests and tasks. The second approach is unacceptable to Russia and, one way or another, it will reject it.

But, in the main, of course, the prospects for the CIS depends on the Commonwealth countries themselves and, primarily, on the Russian Federation.

3.28 Primakov Reflects on Intelligence Role

Trud, 15 October 1994 [FBIS Translation]

[Preface to forthcoming book on Russian intelligence by Academician Evgeniy Primakov, director of the Foreign Intelligence Service, “slightly abridged.”]

The Mezhdunarodnye Otnosheniya Publishing House is preparing for publication six volumes of Sketches on the History of Russian Foreign Intelligence [Ocherki Istorii Rossiyskoy vneshney Razvedki]. Academician E.M. Primakov, director of the Russian Foreign Intelligence Service [FIS], has written a preface to it. Trud was authorized to be first to publish the text of this preface (slightly abridged), which, in our view, is of significance in itself and is of undoubted interest to our readers.

The intelligence service is a necessary mechanism that resolves a whole series of very important state problems. History has proved that. The present day is proving it too.

Is it possible to talk about a distinctive Russian intelligence service with characteristics typical of it alone? Of course there are a whole series of characteristics that distinguish an intelligence service regardless of its national allegiance: its methods and means of operation, a structure enabling it to obtain materials of a political, military, scientific-technical, and economic character, the use of the so-called human factor—in other words, its agents and confidential links—and the use of characteristics of the Russian intelligence service. It may be (I hope that foreign readers will not criticize me for saying so) that they have more patriotism and selflessness than the rest, that (for both subjective and objective reasons) the work of its intelligence agents is less susceptible than the rest to material influences, and that they show a greater tendency toward self-sacrifice for the sake of their people.

At every stage in history, under every system, and in all circumstances an intelligence service has protected the interests of the state. Is that not why the emphasis is being placed on the depoliticization of the intelligence service, a course that we have now consciously moved toward in the post-Soviet era? Of course this depoliticization is relative, because the state has always protected and continues to protect the interests not only of the whole nation but also of the ruling groups. The intelligence service has always been and remains a reflection of the state. As the reader will see, P.I. Rachkovskiy, a Russian intelligence agent at the turn of the century, served the interests not only of the fatherland but also of the tsar's police department by keeping the Russian political émigré movement under surveillance. Nor was the intelligence service insulated from the tragic repressions under Stalin. But it is important to note that because it was not a law enforcement agency it was less to blame than the rest for what happened and, through being very much connected with foreign countries, it absorbed the elite of the armed forces and suffered more than the rest from the bloody repressions. Tens, even hundreds, of intelligence agents were dismissed from their jobs, arrested, and shot.

The questions of depoliticizing and deideologizing the intelligence service are especially important and relevant nowadays. What form do they take? The intelligence service-and this must be said with the utmost firmness-is not involved in Russia's internal political life. Of course, each intelligence officer and employee not only can but is bound to harbor sympathies for this or that political or public force in the Russian Federation. The mankurt [the zombie in Aytmatov's novel], the robot, devoid of feelings, emotions, affections, and hostility to things he considers bad, cannot be an intelligence agent. But neither can he be guided by his own political sympathies or antipathies in his daily work. In that work he has to think solely of the country's national interests-paradoxical as it may seem, that is what the depoliticization of the intelligence service means. At the same time, of course, the intelligence officer must be dedicated to democratic values and obey the law-that is extremely important for everyone without exception.

Now a few words on repudiating the ideologization of the foreign intelligence service. This term did not exist at all before 1917. In the USSR's lifetime, however, the intelligence service, like any other state instrument, could not avoid being ideologized. The Cheka, the NKVD, and the KGB, including the foreign intelligence service, were weapons of the party, and it was in that capacity that they conducted their activities under Marxist-Leninist slogans.

The best sources and foreign aides were obtained by Soviet intelligence on ideological grounds. As a deputy director of the USSR Academy of Sciences' Institute of the World Economy and International Relations, I was a good and close friend of Donald MacLean, a senior staffer there. He was one of the most intelligent and well-educated men I have ever met in my life. D. MacLean used to work for Soviet intelligence. As director of a British Foreign Office department he had prime information, sometimes of crucial value to Moscow, which he transmitted to us. As a descendant of seven Scottish lords, D. MacLean was not guided by material considerations. No matter how we view our ideological past today, it is the ideas of that past that brought MacLean and many like him into Soviet intelligence.

Many people predicted that the deideologization of the FIS in present conditions would prevent us from being able to enter into cooperation with foreign information sources. That has not proved to be the case. We are not talking now about the acquisition of foreign assistants. But many people's political interest in cooperation-no longer with Soviet intelligence but with Russian intelligence now-continues to operate. This is because of the dislike of an "unipolar" world, the fear of a possible unilateral reorganization of Europe's postwar borders, and the understanding of Russia's role as a factor of stability in Europe and the world as a whole.

The deideologization of the intelligence service has therefore certainly not eliminated or even undermined it as a major instrument of Russian policy.

Whether the intelligence service is necessary or not is a purely rhetorical question. No reasonably large state, let alone a great state, can or could ever do without one. Clearly it will cease to exist when the state ceases to exist, but such a prospect is purely hypothetical and has nothing to do with reality. Yet there have been two distinct periods in the history of the Russian intelligence service when people either did not realize or doubted the need for its existence. The first period was the formation of the Russian state, and during that period the intelligence service had not yet been formed as an autonomous institution of state power but emerged and developed not only “within the walls” but also as a component of the edifice of diplomacy. We witnessed the second period for ourselves in the recent past, when the euphoria of the end of the Cold War was so mind-boggling that some people in Russia began preaching the abandonment of the intelligence service in the era of “civilized relations” toward which the world was moving.

In 1992 I was interviewed by a British journalist who asked me whether I thought that Russia was ready to stop conducting intelligence work against Britain if Britain did the same toward Russia. In our close, interconnected, and interrelated world, of course, such a question cannot be resolved bilaterally. But what if all the countries jointly decided to abandon intelligence work? Well, then we could talk about it, but to be honest only irremediable daydreamers can believe in such a prospect.

The characteristics of the Russian intelligence service include continuity and a loyalty to the best traditions of the specialist agencies that preceded it. We have never repudiated nor will we ever repudiate all the good, useful, and important work done for the state, society, and the people over many decades and centuries in Russia by the precursors of the FIS including, of course, those in the Soviet Union. But the recognition of this continuity certainly does not mean that we have lost our critical attitude toward our history. What has the intelligence service been doing since the end of the Cold War, what problems has it been resolving, and on whose altar have its officers been sacrificing their strength, their health, and sometimes their lives?

You may think that at the end of the twentieth century Russia is experiencing one of the most difficult stages in its history. The economic crisis, the unregulated relations between the Center and a part of the periphery, the threat of territorial disintegration or, at any event, the separation of individual parts of it, the resistance to the processes of reintegration on CIS territory, the political need to defend the positions of an independent great power in the international sphere, the fear that the Russian Federation is entering the world economy primarily as a raw materials producer at a time when other great powers have already set course and are successfully heading toward the development of scienceintensive, high-technology production-all these are signs of difficult times. But even when things were at their most difficult there has not been a single mature politician who believed that Russia, with its vast human potential, great history, outstanding contribution to world civilization, incalculable natural resources, and great basis in fundamental science, could possibly get stuck at such a stage. It was, is, and will remain a great power. Throughout the history of the Russian state the intelligence service among the other major state mechanisms has helped the state to overcome difficult periods.

Furthermore, the process of emerging from the crisis situation of the 1990s, which is a legacy both of the past and of the mistakes and omissions of the time when these lines are being written, has been happening in an international situation that is far from clear-cut. Yes, the 1980s and early 1990s saw the end of the chapter in international relations when two ideologically different forces stood on opposite sides of the barricades preparing to do battle. The division of the world into two systems ceased to exist; consequently the grounds for Russia to have predetermined permanent enemies also disappeared. But the world did not become less complex because of that. Our state's national interests, which were previously relegated to the background and were often sacrificed to the struggle against the permanent ideological enemies or to support for our permanent ideological allies, became of paramount importance and came to the forefront. This had at least two consequences: a sharp intensification of the search for areas where those interests coincide with the interests of other states and, if they did not coincide, the identification of ways to protect national interests by nonconfrontational, political means.

However, was that always possible? The complex character of the answer to that question is reinforced by the fact of the considerable expansion of the zone of regional conflicts after the disintegration of the USSR-a zone that spread to the territory of many national republics of the former Union.

The danger of conflicts expanding has sharply increased because they have developed in conditions of the proliferation of mass destruction weapons and the growth of international terrorism. The long-running and extremely tense situation in Afghanistan has had the most negative impact on these conflicts-the Central Asian conflict zone has now reached as far as this country's borders-and clearly will continue to do so for a long time to come.

The destabilizing influence of Islamic extremism, that is, the violent forms of spreading a militant Islam whose goal is to introduce an Islamic state model, has extended not only to the Central Asian conflict zone but also to the Caucasus conflict zone and will obviously continue to spread for a long time to come. In the post-Cold War period there has been an intensification of interethnic contradictions as well.

Of course, the Russian foreign intelligence service at all stages of its development provided the country's top leadership with reliable and largely advanced information as well as analytical assessments by its experts based on that information. The main area of its work here was and remains the monitoring of all those processes that could damage Russia's interests if things turned out badly for it. As our century draws to a close, the following threats may be named:

- the activity of external forces trying to aggravate or simply exploit the weaknesses of Russia itself and its disagreements with other states that formerly belonged to the USSR; one of the priority tasks of the intelligence service in the mid-1990s is to neutralize the efforts aimed at halting the centripetal tendencies both within Russia itself and within the CIS;
- the prospect of the growth of the “nuclear club” and of a number of Third World countries’ gaining access to various systems of mass destruction weapons, and the adoption of political decisions in some of them to begin moving toward the acquisition of nuclear weapons;
- the likelihood of countries previously involved in the Cold War gaining access to new, destabilizing weapons systems;
- intelligence must promptly notify the corresponding Russian state structures about the development and introduction of new types of arms and combat hardware in other countries.

One of the important tasks of the intelligence service here has been and remains to assist the pursuit of an active Russian foreign policy toward both the West and the East (China, India, the Arab states, Asia and the Pacific, and so forth).

The most important task of the FIS in the past, the present, and the future is to help to increase Russia's defense potential and accelerate its socio-economic development.

3.29 United States Trying to “Force Russia and Ukraine Apart”

Boris Filippov

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 28 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

In November 1994 L. Kuchma made his first foreign visit as head of state not to Russia as was expected and implied from his pre-election speeches, when he tirelessly spoke of the need for integration with the great neighbor when trying to win the electorate’s sympathy in the east of the country-but to the United States. The point is not that Kuchma and his team would like to play the “American card” in their relations with Russia. It is simply that it is now vitally important for Ukraine to win the favor of the Western world’s leader with the aim of obtaining real financial aid to carry out economic reforms, becoming stable in the current multipolar international relations, and solving other important questions. Nevertheless the development of U.S.-Ukrainian relations cannot be considered without taking account of the Russian factor.

The Clinton administration highly rates Kuchma’s activity since he assumed the post of president for successfully solving two problems that, in Washington’s opinion, will determine Ukraine’s future: primarily these are economic reforms and nuclear policy. Ukraine is getting rid of the nuclear warheads left on its territory following the Soviet Union’s disintegration and is joining the Nuclear Non-Proliferation treaty, which accelerates the process of cutting nuclear weapons within the framework of the Start I treaty. The United States and Russia are naturally relying on expedited implementation of this treaty.

The United States has now openly started talking about the importance of expanding trade and investment relations with Ukraine, and it has been given trade concessions in accordance with the General System of Preferences.

As of today the total sum of U.S. aid to Ukraine stands at $900 million. Ukraine has become the world’s fourth-largest recipient of U.S. aid after Israel, Egypt, and Russia. The United States has already given Ukraine $282 million for economic and humanitarian purposes. It intends to give an additional $200 million in the form of technical assistance for structural reorganization and the development of democratic institutions. Furthermore, the United States has decided to allocate an additional $100 million for settling the balance of payments and clearing the Ukrainian foreign debt, and $25 million is being given in the form of a loan to import food from abroad.

During Kuchma's visit to the United States its commerce secretary, Ronald Brown, and Serhiy Osyka, Ukrainian minister of foreign economic relations, signed a joint statement under which the United States is to start viewing Ukraine as a country with a transitional economy.

The World Bank president, Lewis Preston, stated in turn that if Ukraine continues to move toward the stabilization of its economy and market reforms it could receive credits totaling $500 million to strengthen such sectors as health care, agriculture, and power engineering. At the end of last year Ukraine obtained a $371 million IMF loan.

On the initiative of the United States a special plan concerning Ukrainian energy requirements as a whole as well as a solution to the problem associated with the continued operation of the Chernobyl AES [Nuclear Electric Power Station] was adopted at the July 1994 G-7 meeting in Naples.

The process of developing U.S.-Ukrainian cooperation is continuing even though Republicans, who are in favor of cutting foreign aid levels, have won the majority of seats in Congress. However, this is no threat to Ukraine for the time being, because it is known that the Republicans are much more afraid than are Democrats of Russian intentions to play a leading role in the post-Soviet area and are more favorably disposed toward Ukraine than are Democrats.

When analyzing the state of U.S.-Ukrainian cooperation, especially if it concerns economic, technological, and financial questions, its one-sided nature is striking. But these are serious investments for the future. By giving aid to Ukraine the United States is trying to create a favorable climate for its own wholesale penetration of the region.

When working out its strategy on the political plane, Washington is also trying to drive Ukraine and Russia as far apart as possible in order to reinforce the geopolitical situation that has developed since the USSR's disintegration. Influential lobbies among Americans of Ukrainian extraction are putting pressure on the U.S. government in this direction.

Conversely Moscow, despite the fact that its relations with Kiev are burdened by the problems of non-payments, the Black Sea Fleet, and the Crimea, will do everything in its power to entice Ukraine toward closer cooperation within the CIS framework.

3.30 Korzhakov's Role in "Party of War" Viewed

Golos, no. 5, 30 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The following document criticizes the so-called "War Party" operating from within the Russian

White House. This group gained influence during the period between October 1994 and February 1995, when Russia's Chechnya strategy was being deliberated. Its leading figures, General Aleksandr Korzhakov, head of the president's Security Council, and Oleg Soskovets, first deputy prime minister, hold the greatest power. Other key figures are Oleg Lobov (secretary of the Russian Security Council), Nikolai Egorov (deputy prime minister and minister for nationalities and regional affairs), and General Mikhail Barsukov (head, Chief Guards Administration of the Russian Federation and Kremlin Commandant). This group, in close association with the three Russian "power ministers"- Defense Minister Pavel Grachev, Minister of Security Sergei Stepashin, and Minister of Internal Affairs Viktor Yerin constitute the power behind Yeltsin's throne and would undoubtedly like to set the Russian policy direction for the next twenty years. The “War Party,” according to some conservative Russian commentators, sought to replace Viktor Chernomyrdin as prime minister with Oleg Soskovets, and have partially succeeded in altering the political and economic direction of the country. This group has pressed, successfully, for activist policies aimed at restoring Russia’s lost “Great Power” status, challenging the Western orientation of democrats such as First Deputy Prime Minister Anatoliy Chubais and Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev. (Chubais and Kozyrev were both forced to resign their positions in January 1996.) The adherents to this group’s ideology frequently represent the national patriotism of the Soviet period and “Eurasionist” thinking which is often virulently anti-Western and stresses Russia’s Asian roots. The group’s mood and outlook can be described as fundamentally imperialist.

Throughout the country in January Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin’s televised appeal to the citizens of Russia was heard, in which he said that the government’s main goal was to stop the bloodshed [in Chechnya]. The message was not heard, however, by the “party of war,” that is, the power-wielding ministers and their supporters. It was just as in December, when they did not accept President Boris Yeltsin’s instructions to stop the bombings in Grozny.

At the same time, the prime minister spoke of the Russian leadership’s preparedness to conduct negotiations on creating neutral zones with all interested sides in the Chechen Republic, but negotiations were broken off, battles continued, and the director of the Federal Service for Counter Intelligence, Sergey Stepashin, issued a directive to deliver a Russian flag to Grozny. The latter was erected over the heavily bombed presidential palace on 19 December.

These “proponents of force” are employing a concept that combines aggression with national dominion to counter the calls by the intelligentsia to use political methods for settling the crisis. It is the hallmark of their “signature.” For example, the chief of the Russian Federation Service for Presidential Security, Aleksandr Korzhakov, expressed his opinion during an interview with Argumenty i Fakty when he stated that the liberal intelligentsia has “shown a lack of understanding for the necessity of decisive action in critical situations, and the need to consolidate the nation during times of trial” Turning our attention to the general’s lexicon, we find that it is identical to statements made by national-patriots, from Zhirinovskiy to Barkashov. Thus, the question over the political sentiments of these representatives is made clear.

As a result of the fact that Boris Yeltsin has become distant from the press, commentators have in recent times sought answers to burning issues more and more often in the book Memoirs of the President. Today the section of Yeltsin’s candid admissions has become highly relevant in which he describes the vacillation of the army and militia on the eve of the suppression of the revolt in Moscow on 3-4 October 1993. The board of the Ministry of Defense “began to discuss taking the White House,” wrote the president. “Chernomyrdin asked, ‘So what are the proposals?’ In response there was a heavy, somber silence. Unexpectedly for me, the chief of presidential security, Korzhakov asked for the floor.... He asked that the floor be given to his officer from the Main Administration for Protection, who had a specific plan for taking the White House. ... Perhaps, it was precisely at the moment ... that a sudden ethical transition occurred.”

There is no doubt, however, that the decisions to take the White House and to send troops to Chechnya were made by the Russian president. It is important, though, that fellow countrymen know of those “heroes” who are pushing the head of state to adopt decisions bearing such tragic consequences.

Today General Korzhakov is disowning his involvement in the decision to send troops into Chechnya and storm Grozny. To inquire about the latter he recommends asking “presidential advisers, the chief of the president’s administration, the former FSK [Federal Counterintelligence Service] deputy director, who has spent a great deal of time in the region, and members of the Security Council... .”

We asked presidential advisers. On 11 December, the day troops were sent into Chechnya, the chief specialist among them on conflicts between nations, Emil [Pain], called the decision “suicide for Russian authority,” and condemned it. The director of the presidential administration, Sergey Filatov, explained his position to me nearly ten times both before and after the beginning of the military operation; a position that he adopted based on the conclusion of a council of experts and analysts under the chief of state. The council’s conclusion essentially consisted of setting up a Provisional Council within Chechnya under the leadership of Umar Avturkhanov and creating acceptable living conditions for people within the part of the republic controlled by Dzhokhar

Dudaev's opposition. Such conditions would include providing pensions and measures for social support—thereby weakening the criminal regime of President Dzhokhar Dudaev. Five months before the beginning of the military operation, on 11 August 1994, Boris Yeltsin, while setting out on a trip along the Volga, stated to us, the journalists accompanying him: “If we use force in regard to Chechnya there will be such turmoil, there will be so much blood, that we will not be forgiven for it.”

The president understood everything. He foresaw the tragic consequences of applying force, which the democrats never tired of telling him. In no way did either of his advisers, or Sergey Filatov, have any part in inciting him to pursue the path of war.

Is this not the reason for the blatant hostility demonstrated by those promoting force toward the "so-called analysts," and the "inconsistent liberals," as Aleksandr Korzhakov terms the intelligentsia, for its "one-sided and changing interpretation of protecting human rights?"

When we analyze the "signature" of the "War Party," from my point of view as a graphologist, it is marked by the loss of an ethical position, a lack of humanism, a failure to acknowledge the unconditional value of human life, and a blasphemous gap between words and deeds. How can one perceive any differently the statement made by the secretary of the Security Council, Oleg Lobov, that "our goal is to preserve the lives of Russian citizens in Chechnya"?

Those "peacekeepers" in need of burying "loose ends," that is, evidence of their lack of professionalism both in conducting reforms in the army, and in exposing organized crime, terrorist acts, and ordered killings, had a vital interest in a "small victorious war." It was not all for naught that at the height of the Chechen operation there was an information leak organized by the FSK to the effect that the airborne assault soldier suspected of killing journalist Dmitriy Kholodov was not stationed in Chechnya. As they say, all is written off in war. Also, in accordance with long-standing logic, generals who are victorious are not tried.

However, as all those following the events concur, there will be no victors in the Chechen war. "We will not be forgiven," Boris Yeltsin predicted last August.

It is precisely this, however-forgiveness for the thousands of lives ended in Chechnya-that the “party of war” will not be asking for. It has other methods. It will strive to force the press, Russian society, and the entire world into silence.

There is one gratifying and reassuring side to the anger demonstrated by those promoting force, however: They cannot conquer public opinion. To the cries and demands of the authorities to support the actions of these gallant generals, the people prefer the quiet voice of an intelligentsia member, the bespectacled Sergey Kovalev, the inconsistent liberal, whose conscience has not been broken by either prisons, exiles, or presidential order against “sobbing.”

3.31 Press Coverage of CIS Espionage

Editor's Note: Although the next two articles do not represent Russian national-patriot thinking per se, they investigate an issue that hard-line Russian nationalists are trying to trump up as an excuse for reinstituting the Soviet-era KGB. That issue is interstate espionage among CIS states, especially the alleged spying of the “near abroad” on the Russian Federation. Le Figaro journalist Isabelle Lasserre correctly interviewed several knowledgeable experts on the issue. Her conclusion that many of the spies being caught by Russia may actually be “mafiosi” from other CIS states may be close to the truth. The non-Russian CIS states must be desperate to know what Russian enterprise managers are planning and what Russian economic policies are in the making. Nevertheless, in January 1996 the national-patriots began to make a case for “reconstituting” the old KGB (which was split into two parts, domestic and foreign, in 1991) and for lodging the entire agency within the powerful President's Security Service. The following articles provide insight into Russia's continued existence as a "national security state" and presage what could come in the future if Russian nationalists gain control of security policy within the CIS.

Espionage Between CIS States

Isabelle Lasserre

Le Figaro (Paris), 16 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

"Certain republics of the former Soviet Union are carrying out operations against us. This year our services have arrested more foreign agents than the KGB and the Interior Ministry combined." Sergey Stepashin, president of the FSK [FCS, Federal Counterintelligence Service—formerly the KGB—is furious. "We have common roots and the same training, and now these people-our brothers-are working against Russia!" Even the press is indignant: "The unity of the CIS countries is now just an illusion."

These are the new spies, the post-Cold War spies. The experts say that since Russia is no longer felt to be a threat to the West it no longer attracts agents from the West. "Anyone can gain access to information now. Everything is in the press," explained Aleksey Arbatov, director of the Institute for the World Economy and International Relations.

New agents from the "near abroad" have slowly replaced the "traditional enemies from the West." According to the Russian counterespionage service, the number of agents from Eastern Europe, Asia, Islamic states, and especially the countries neighboring the CIS, is growing continually. Ukraine, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and the Baltic countries have now taken the place of the United States and Western Europe in the dock.

Espionage between the former Soviet Republics is a paradoxical consequence of the collapse of the USSR. According to an FSK spokesman it can be explained by “the fact that Russia, which was one of the most secret societies in the world, suddenly opened up. The freedom of speech makes espionage more accessible.”

These new spies make the former KGB General Oleg Kalugin smile. “All this is ridiculous. What do you think Estonia-with a population of one and a half million-can do to our country, apart from trying to assess the threat posed by Russia with regard to the sovereignty of the Baltic countries? Moreover, this is not of much interest to us, because Moscow's intentions are unpredictable.”

“Mafiosi”

Judging by what the experts say, the so-called spies arrested by the Russian services may actually only be “mafiosi.” “No CIS republic has the experience or the resources to have secret services worthy of the name,” Aleksey Arbatov said. Oleg Kalugin felt that the reason for the publicity in Moscow about CIS spies is the poorly internalized changes in the raison d'être of Russian espionage. “In my time espionage was a war of the intellect. All that is left today is vulgar economic espionage.”

Along with many experts he felt that the FSK is now tending “to invent” spies. “Sergey Stephashin wants to preserve the old spirit of espionage. He wants to prove that Russian espionage is still efficient. During the Cold War the KGB was an elite. Today the espionage services feel a bit miserable. I would never go back.”

Spying by Former Republics Claimed

Mikhail Rostovskiy

Moskovskiy Komsomolets, 26 November 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The question of whether the former fraternal republics are spying on one another is a very unsavory one, if only because just a year ago most of those who work for and head the secret services of the now-sovereign, ex-Soviet republics operated in a single organization. Tragic incidents like the following are therefore possible in the near future. An ex-cadet at the KGB school in Moscow, now an officer with a new secret service, arrests a former mentor in espionage who has remained to work in Russia....

Moskovskiy Komsomolets decided to learn what the relations are among “agencies” of the sovereign states today.

The response to our inquiry, received from Russia’s Ministry of Security after exactly a month of stonewalling and procrastination, stated the following: “We collaborate with and have no complaints about our partners. The details are classified information.”

An event in which Aron Atabek, a leader of the Kazakh nationalists and editor of the newspaper HAK-published, strange as it seems, at the Kolomenskiy Rayon printing office—suffered is apparently among these “classified details.” According to the official version, on 29 July of this year Atabek, who resides in Moscow, was attacked by unknown persons, who tied him up and searched his apartment for five hours. “Unknown persons” simultaneously visited the printing office in Kolomna. Atabek was released and accused Kazakhstan’s state security service of committing the incident. He went to Baku, where he was granted political asylum. Kazakhstan’s National Security Committee declared that it absolutely could not comment on this violation of the law, since it had occurred “on the territory of another state.” But at the Russian Ministry of Security I was advised to ask ... Alma-Ata. An employee at the Kolomenskiy Rayon printing office whom I interviewed, however, told me right away for whom the “unknown” persons worked: “People from our agencies and Kazakhstan’s.”

The MB [Ministry of Security] appears to have derived a lesson from this incident, however. When a dissident from another of the sunny republics, Uzbekistan, recently received a similar visit, the Russian and Uzbek security agents did not bother to put on masks but arrived completely in the open.

Chechnya is another “classified subject” which the MBRF [Ministry of Security of the Russian Federation] prefers not to discuss. An employee of the ministry’s Public Relations Center informed me that the “Ministry of Security is over all of Russia’s territory, and Chechnya is a part of the Russian Federation, so there is nothing to discuss.” It seemed fairly strange to hear this, since that very day one of the large Moscow newspapers held a briefing at which it referred to the “intelligence agency of the Chechen Republic.”

The MBRF’s game of silence is absurd also because it is no longer a secret to anyone in the Caucasus today that the Chechen leadership has not only declared “war on Russian and Georgian imperialism” but is even taking action in this direction. It is curious that Chechnya is using Comintern methods in this area and following the guidance of representatives of other Caucasus peoples as a “nation of the victorious dream.”

Finally, the most regrettable decision of the Ministry of Security: It labeled as “containing state secrets” a report on the true capabilities of the Chechen leaders, who have repeatedly promised to create a “little Beirut” in Moscow.

Another Russian heir to the KGB, the Foreign Intelligence Service (SVR), has different ways of doing things. Yuriy Kabaladze, chief of the SVR press service, and Tatyana Samolina, its press secretary, refused to answer my questions.

“Is the SVR engaged in operations involving adjacent foreign countries?”

“On the contrary, we collaborate with them. In April the SVR signed an agreement with the secret services of seven CIS countries (Ukraine and Armenia are apparently going to join it later), one of the main points of which is the rejection of operations against one another. In addition, we reached agreement on cooperation in the exchange of information and the joint training of personnel.”

At the same time, in a recent appearance on national television, Andris Krastins, a deputy chairman of Latvia's

Supreme Council, offered Western intelligence agencies use of the republic's territory as a base for operations against Russia. The Latvian deputy speaker explained his idea quite candidly: "It is no secret to anyone that serious intelligence forces against Latvia have been established in the Russian intelligence service headed by Primakov."

The Russian Federation's MID [Ministry of Internal Affairs] sent a statement of protest to Latvia's MID. Evgeniy Primakov, chief of Russia's intelligence service, himself spoke out on the subject, however: "We regard those states that are withdrawing as foreign states, and if operations against Russia are initiated somewhere, we shall of course take some sort of counteraction."

The response to these threatening statements was another statement by Krastins, in which he accused Russia of engaging in "psychological warfare against the Latvian Republic."

Russian "competent departments" are allegedly treating Azerbaijan even worse. Azerbaijan's minister of foreign affairs, Iskander Gamidov, was even able to state the exact number of Russian spies apprehended in his republic: "Six during the first five months of 1992." The largest of the alleged operations, conducted by Russian secret services, also involved Azerbaijan.

At the beginning of May of this year the Baku newspaper Azadlyk carried the following report (attributed to an unnamed employee of the Ministry of National Security): "With the approval of Ayaz Mutalibov and with the direct participation of workers with Russian military intelligence (the GRU [Main Intelligence Directorate]), a plan has been worked out for a coup d'état in Azerbaijan.” Such statements have long since become commonplace in the republic, so that this one too seemed headed for rapid oblivion, if not for ... a coup d'état did in fact occur in Azerbaijan on 14 May (the new administration managed to hold out for only twenty-four hours, to be sure). Right now, unfortunately, it is impossible reliably to assess the extent of participation by Russian agencies in the change of government. The GRU prefers not to talk to journalists, and all of the Russian Federation's “overt” departments say in unison that all assertions of participation by the GRU are “not consistent with reality.”

The only thing reliably known is the fact that when Ayaz Mutalibov, “president for a day,” arrived in Moscow, he was put into a special government hospital, and several dozen Russian officers, according to Azerbaijanis serving in the Main Intelligence Directorate of the General Staff of the Russian Federation's Ministry of Defense, were forced hastily to change stations. Russia has now even announced an investigation of Mutalibov.

For now this covers all the well-known incidents involving the Commonwealth's new “cloak and dagger” knights. This does not mean that there will not be more, however. Can anyone say that Azerbaijan's Ministry of National Security is not engaged in operations against sovereign Armenia, that Georgia's Intelligence Service is not interested in knowing how many weapons remain at Russian garrisons in the republic, that Moldova's secret services are not continuing operations against "left-bank separatists," begun so brilliantly (and ending so poorly) with the kidnapping of Igor Smirnov, currently president of the Dniester Region, in 1991? What is more, the Union came apart only a year ago, and many states (particularly in Central Asia) may simply not have had time to set up new, operational secret services.

3.32 Intelligence Chief Views Changed Priorities

Moscow Television, 19 December 1995 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Studio interview with Evgeniy Primakov, director of Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service, by correspondent Andrey Razbash; from the "Rush Hour" program-live.]

[Razbash]: Hello. Tomorrow, Russia's intelligence officers will mark the seventy-fifth anniversary of their departments. Today, "Rush Hour" welcomes in the studio Evgeniy Primakov, director of Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service. Hello.

[Primakov]: Hello. [Passage omitted.]

[Razbash]: Will you carry out an analysis of the results of the elections among your staff? Do you pay attention to this issue?

[Primakov]: You know we do not vet political beliefs either among the staff subordinated to us, or among our colleagues. Of course, we will do no such thing. Intelligence departments have been depoliticized. Every member of staff can have his beliefs and sympathies, but they must have no influence whatever on his professional work. [Passage omitted.]

[Primakov]: The priorities have undoubtedly changed. I can tell you, for instance, that our department never used to be concerned with the task of preserving Russia's territorial integrity as acutely as we are facing it now. We are not an internal intelligence department after all. We are gathering foreign intelligence. But, after all, some external forces wish Russia's disintegration. We need to know their intentions. We must try to neutralize their intentions. This is just one of our directions. I can list many other priorities that we are currently pursuing but that we did not have before. For instance, we are now extremely interested in centrifugal tendencies developing on the territory of the former USSR. Not because we want to eradicate the sovereignty conquered by various republics. But while this sovereignty should be preserved, it is necessary to develop some integrational processes in economic and political spheres. Our intelligence department is not only in favor of it but also working in that direction.

Then, take crisis situations. Never before has Europe been covered by crisis areas to that extent. We thought that the Helsinki agreements guaranteed to a maximum the security of boundaries and so on. And now look: There is a crisis in the south. The intelligence department has shown its good sides there, I think. Generally, we are trying to obtain urgent and accurate information, which ideally is documented, and to report it to the supreme political leadership of this country who need that information to adopt political decisions.

[Razbash]: Evgeniy Maksimovich, several times I came across some shocking articles in the press. They described interaction between intelligence departments that have been known to oppose Russia in a fundamental way. For instance, interaction between Russia and the United States, Russia and Great Britain. And this is described as partnership of intelligence departments. Is this true? Does this partnership exist? If it does, what are its aims?

[Primakov]: You know, there are common spheres of interest among states. Therefore, certain intelligence departments may also have common spheres of interest.

For instance, combating organized crime, international terrorism, the drug mafia, as well as exposing dangers that may exist in hot spots and that may lead to destabilization of the situation in large areas. So, we tend to exchange relevant information. We have such partnerships. They mean interaction-not an alternative to intelligence activities.

[Razbash]: I see. Are there any common spheres of interest in the “near abroad”? I know there are agreements banning intelligence activities of one CIS country against another. How do you obtain information, say, about the security of nuclear sites in Ukraine or Belarus, or about the Baykonur space station in Kazakhstan?

[Primakov]: I will tell you unequivocally that if we have such information from some of our sources abroad, we immediately give that information to our Ukrainian or Kazakh partners. But we do not carry out recruiting activity. Nor do we conduct any active intelligence work there.

[Razbash]: I understand that one of your department’s priorities is the country’s security. The Black Sea Fleet, for instance, is probably an es security in the south.

[Primakov]: We have certain sources in third countries through which we can obtain information. Naturally, we are in the know of the processes developing in the “near abroad.” But we do not use any specific intelligence methods against those countries. There is a complete ban on it. And we have unanimously agreed that we must not work against one another. [Passage omitted.]

[Razbash]: With the disappearance or rather the defeat of communist ideology in the USSR, the ideological basis for recruiting fellow-thinkers, people who believe in communism, has vanished. So, do people want to work for intelligence because of material considerations?

[Primakov]: I think you are wrong there. Even before there was not just an ideological but also a political basis for recruitment. [Passage omitted.] And this political basis still exists. I do not think many people in the world would now want the United States to be the only power dominating the world and imposing its decisions on everybody.

[Primakov]: Yes, a balance of power in the world, and the certainty that Russia is a great power and can therefore play a stabilizing role.

[Razbash]: So, pardon me for asking you, but what is the role of money? Everybody was shocked by the figure of 2.5 million, when the Ames case was reported. What is the role of material incentives?

[Primakov]: Material incentives exist, of course. Many of them have a role to play. But in most cases, I think there are many reasons why people are recruited. I cannot comment on Ames, whom you have mentioned. I cannot comment in any way on his affiliations, I mean his or anybody else's connections with our intelligence department and our intelligence network. This is simply banned by law. But judging by the U.S. press, and judging by Ames's interview, he always stresses that his reasons were not just material, that after meeting

Soviet people, after his personal impressions, as he had been here in 1992, he understood that the hostile and aggressively hostile policy of the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] was wrong. Ames said that this also played a certain role in his decisions.

[Razbash]: Why is the budget of the intelligence bodies not published? After all, they exist on the taxpayers' money. They are funded from the state budget. Should not the taxpayer know how his money is spent?

[Primakov]: He has the right to know, but he can find this out in various ways: from widely disseminated publications or from the members of parliament he has elected. The State Duma has created various committees. The budget committee or the subcommittee for intelligence that existed in the State Duma Foreign Affairs Committee can inform him on the subject. [Passage omitted.]

[Razbash]: At the beginning of our conversation you spoke about the forces, without naming them, that are not interested in having stability in our country, about destabilizing factors and centers. In that respect this coincides with the way the Communist Parties criticize the leadership of this country, which, they say, in dancing to the West's tune, has instituted chaos here, as they call it. Tell me, have you noticed in your work examples showing that our top-ranking functionaries, including those working in the state apparatus, are acting under the influence of somebody or something?

[Primakov]: As for the state's top leadership, I can tell you firmly that they are patriots, who are, without any doubt, taking the country along the path free of any sustained influence from Western forces. But at the same time, many are compelled to take account of the international situation. And you know, those who divide people into those who want confrontation with the West and those who do not want it are wrong. The division is between those who want to settle into normal relations with our former Cold War opponents but to keep these relations on a basis of equality, and those who believe that all methods should be used to move away from the Cold War and to enter European society-all methods, even a ride on the shoulders of one Western country or another-following it as it were-is acceptable. That is the situation. [Passage omitted.]

3.33 Yeltsin Appoints Primakov as New Foreign Minister

ITAR-TASS, 9 January 1996 [FBIS Translation]

President Boris Yeltsin on Tuesday signed a decree appointing Evgeniy Primakov foreign minister of the Russian Federation, the presidential press said.

Before the appointment, academician Primakov headed the Russian Foreign Intelligence Service, the foreign branch of the former KGB.

Primakov will replace Andrey Kozyrev, who was dismissed by President Yeltsin from the ministerial position in connection with his election to the State Duma (lower house of the Russian legislature).

The report of the press service did not say who will replace Primakov as Russia's foreign intelligence chief.

Primakov was born on 29 October 1929 in Kiev in, a working-class family and spent his childhood in Tbilisi.

He graduated from the Moscow Institute of Oriental Studies in 1953. After completing a post-graduate course at Moscow State University in 1956, Primakov worked as a correspondent, desk deputy chief editor, and then chief editor at the State Committee for Television and Radio Broadcasting under the USSR Council of Ministers.

In 1962-70, he was a news analyst, deputy editor, and communist daily Pravda's own correspondent in the Middle East.

In 1970, Primakov changed over to active scientific work. He was appointed deputy director of the USSR Academy of Sciences' Institute of the World Economy and International Relations. He was elected a corresponding member of the Academy in 1974 and academician in 1979.

From 1977 to 1985, Primakov worked as the director of the Institute of Oriental Studies and headed the Institute of the World Economy and International Relations in 1985-89.

A Communist Party member since 1959, he was elected an alternate member of the party Central Committee at the 27th party congress and promoted to full membership at the April 1989 Central Committee plenum.

From 1989 to 1991, he chaired the Council of the Union (one of two chambers of the Soviet parliament) and was a member of the USSR Presidential Council and member of the USSR Security Council.

In September 1991, Primakov was appointed the head of the KGB's first main directorate (foreign branch) and the first deputy chief of the KGB. In November 1991, he was appointed director of the USSR Central Intelligence Service and in December the director of Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service.

Primakov is married with a daughter and grandchildren.

3.34 Vladimir Lukin on Obstacles to Democracy

Interview by Yuriy Shchekochikhin

Literaturnaya Gazeta, 25 November 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Shchekochikhin]: One day, quite recently, at the start of Moscow's summer, a friend, also a journalist, came up to me and said: "I fear that the idea of democracy in Russia is dead. It has not worked out.... Everyone is becoming increasingly excited by national patriotism .. ." Perhaps he is right. There is today no stronger word of abuse than the word "democracy.” And people whose names were previously symbols of democracy (Popov, Afanasyev) are today either out of a job or (like Sobchak) being subjected to the most savage criticism....

[Shchekochikhin]: Symbols they may be.... But at approximately the same time some woman on the street shouted at me: “Democrats.... What have you done to my country ....” Of course, I console myself, perhaps she was a little out of sorts, but it made a strong impression, all the same. ...

[Lukin]: I have a similar story. When I was leaving the Sixth Congress, a woman with eyes bulging approached me and said: “Why are you destroying the Russian people?” I asked: “Who? Me personally?” She became flustered and said: “I do not mean you personally.... You generally ...”

Still, it is a question of symbols, words.... The word “democracy” was in vogue and then went out of style. And in actual fact people are thinking not about democracy or national patriotism but about actual life, existence, prices, crime, and safety on the streets.

[Shchekochikhin]: But remember-and this was quite recently, before and during the First Congress of People’s Deputies of the USSR-the enthusiasm of life and the hopes of democracy that simply wafted in the air....

[Lukin]: But the enthusiasm had been implanted not by the structure of the congress itself and not by the principle of elections itself but by the words uttered at that time-and the mere fact that they could be uttered in public. But this was not democracy, this was glasnost: It had been concocted grandiloquently, but quite accurately. Democracy is primarily a form of existence of the state and a certain correlation between the authorities and the civil society, with a particular separation of powers.... We did not have such democracy at that time, only hopes for it. And now, when you say that democracy has gone out of style, it is in fact the people who were at that time the symbols of democracy who have gone out of style. Why? Because they made very big advance payments for a rapid solution of problems, and the advance payments have simply remained advance payments. Do you remember Shmelev's article "Advance Payments and Debts"? The advance payments have become debts, and this is the tragedy of the people who made them and of us all.

[Lukin]: This is why Yeltsin also is now less popular. This is part of that same process .... Let us, therefore, investigate.

America and the West generally were the example for the people who promised rapid solutions. Remember how they said: "We will now eliminate all the idiotic aspects of our state: the CPSU, the dogma of ideology, the command system in the economy-and all will be in order, as in America...."

This was quite a naive and primitive ideology initiated by certain symbols. One symbol was democracy, which was not true democracy, and for this reason the slogan “Long Live Democracy” was reminiscent of the slogan “All Power to the Soviets.” Another symbol was America, which had nothing in common with the real America. It was thought for some reason that as soon as the CPSU had been eliminated, America would automatically be on our side.

But we could not have become a part of the Western world merely by having cleared away the symbols of the old power, about which so much was being said at that time by Yuriy Afanasyev and, even more, Yuriy Vlasov.... Vlasov is today with exactly the same passion saying things that are the direct opposite, but passion is, evidently, the principal content of his nature. And were the national socialists to come to power now and good fortune were once again to fail to arrive, Yuriy Vlasov, an honest man after his fashion, would, most likely, just as passionately begin castigating these new authorities also.

[Shchekochikhin]: But it is democracy and the people who were its symbols that are being subjected to the main ordeals as yet. Whence the feeling that things once again have not worked out....

[Lukin]: They have not worked out for the first wave of democrats (I have many friends among them, each of whom I like as an individual), but their problem is that they were ultimately the balalaika players of perestroika. They thought within the framework of their Western-democratic romanticism that it was sufficient to carry out in the country two or three of the simplest social operations, and everything in the country would change for the better. And nothing came of it. Now they are blaming “dark forces” for everything and consoling themselves with the fact that they must be in eternal opposition to the authorities, and let the bureaucrats remain in power. But the question is: Why did they so aspire to power?

[Shchekochikhin]: In case, for that matter, they were accused of only being capable of drawing sketches of a beautiful life and of themselves, having proclaimed the way to them....

[Lukin]: But this is ultimately what has happened! Many of our democrats make it a rule to embark on something and then make a complete mess of it, after which they make a statement to the effect that they need to be in opposition and then to head some party laying claim to head the state. This is the classical condition of the Russian marginal intellectuals who came with the first wave of rejection. I greatly respect them for the role they performed in the destruction of the first stratum of totalitarianism. But then came the next phase, for which, I repeat, they were not prepared. But what is it that is so dreadful that is happening now?

We have a popularly elected president, we have, imperfect, yes, but, for all that, a parliament, we have a multiparty system, albeit very weak (not because anyone is preventing the formation of new parties but for entirely different reasons purely Russian). We do not have the problem of whether to speak or to hold our tongues, that is, we have freedom of speech. In short, there are all the prerequisites for very serious democratic development. And the talk to the effect that all democrats must go into opposition is simply not serious. And the perception that democracy in Russia has lost and died is connected primarily with the subjective sensation of the stratum of people who have done their work, but who have not themselves come to power, and this power itself has not brought us closer to general happiness as quickly as they expected.

[Shchekochikhin]: Vladimir Petrovich, each of us, most likely, has experienced this feeling of helplessness that comes when one has been approached by people (I refer to my experience as a deputy primarily), and one has not in practice been able to help them. I believe that that has been and is now the case with you at deputies' receptions when you are in Moscow. But what power do the deputies have? And people have gradually begun to grow disenchanted with the fact that their hopes of our electing whom we wanted and of these being our democratic authorities have proved worse than transparent. And public opinion has begun increasingly to incline toward the necessity for some strong, very strong, authoritarian, dictatorial power.... This is today's contradiction, possibly. On the one hand there is a desire for democratic authorities, on the other, a strong, strict authority, banging the table with its fist.

[Lukin]: I do not see a contradiction here since I am a supporter of both. I am convinced that no changes for the better are possible in Russia without the participation in these changes of the state. Reforms have never been implemented in Russia such that the state itself has not strictly regulated the reform processes. That the process will proceed of its own accord (I quote a prominent figure) is another illusion. And we need to rid ourselves of this illusion, but not with the aid of hysterical shouts. It is essential to agree to certain compromises.

[Lukin]: State administration in Russia has to be exercised by bureaucrats, which does not, naturally, rule out the fact that people of a democratic frame of mind should be in the upper echelons of power and should strategically coordinate the changes in society.

But what is the main tragedy of our society? We have no real, sound bureaucracy. When I met with Roh Tae-Woo, president of the Republic of Korea, he gave me several pieces of advice, which I subsequently conveyed to Boris Nikolaevich [Yeltsin]. And his main advice was this: In order for economic reforms to be successful, an effective administration, that is, a strong bureaucracy, is needed. Even if you make a wrong decision, you can, relying on the bureaucracy, quickly revise and adjust it, and, most important, it will be implemented. But if such a bureaucracy is lacking, you could adopt any decision, a brilliant one even, and it would not be fulfilled, all the same.

It is the lack of such a bureaucracy which we are experiencing at this time.

We cannot have an unmanageable state. Russia's historical and genetic background is too ponderous. Otherwise Russia will collapse into tiny parts, to the pleasure of so-called democrats. After this, any person with a mustache would, with the aid of a far-reaching civil war, with tremendous bloodshed, once again combine it into a unified state.

[Shchekochikhin]: But voices calling not only for the preservation of Russia as it is today but also for a restoration of the Soviet Empire are being heard increasingly loudly at this time. And the voices of those who previously were fierce supporters of democracy and the independence of each Soviet republic are being heard in this chorus also.

always been a supporter of the democratic path of development and have always been an opponent of the country's disintegration. At the First Congress of People's Deputies I voted against having Russian laws take precedence over Union law since I realized full well that there are no first-class laws and second-class laws. I have always been a supporter of unified armed forces and greatly regret that this has not been achieved. I was not a supporter of the country's division, but since things have turned out this way, let us at least keep our state—the Russian Federation—intact. If you consider that even this is an empire, I am for empire. We will forcibly retain nobody, but turning the country into a leopard's skin and making out of the country a further fifteen countries would mean condemning people, both Russians and non-Russians, to bloodshed....

[Shchekochikhin]: But even now Russia is not the great power that earlier figured on maps as the USSR. Nor are we regarded as we were before.... Leafing through American papers, I have convinced myself of this yet again. Sometimes for several days running they do not have a single report from Moscow, which means only one thing-we are no longer that great power on which the attention of the whole world was focused, but simply a state. This is both a cause of the explicable nostalgia for past greatness and a pretext for political speculation....

[Lukin]: But this will again depend on what Russia will be. What was Japan when it had an empire and what is it now? And France? The parting with Algeria was a tragedy for it. But can you say that both Japan and France are now weak powers? Could Russia with its boundless territory and 150 million people become a powerful country with exceptional influence in the world? Yes, of course!

[Lukin]: You see, I am not sure that economics is the main thing. The main thing is our souls. And we are now sitting with bowed heads and whining. Democracy is finished, democratic slogans are played out. ... But we must not just moan! Why, following a devastating defeat in the war, have the Japanese created a powerful state? Because they had the idea of national creation and they wanted to show that even a country without military might can achieve greatness! And de Gaulle reinforced the idea of France's greatness when the empire had really fallen apart.

[Shchekochikhin]: But I fear that under our conditions the idea of national greatness is becoming the idea of nationalism, Russian nationalism, which is being counterposed increasingly to the idea of democracy.

[Lukin]: The national idea has not been formulated with us in practice, and this is why cretinous interpretations of the national idea are appearing. But where are there not cretins?

France's upturn was possible because creative national ideas appeared in the depths of French society. Yes, de Gaulle trampled parliament beneath him and changed governments like gloves, but he won a strong role for France in the world! But de Gaulle did not isolate France from the West, since politics cannot make a civil society isolated from ideas! ...

[Shchekochikhin]: But, in my opinion, the process of opposing democracy as a symbol and national patriotism as an idea that is taking possession of the masses in just the same way as did the idea of democracy when, earlier, Boris Yeltsin was in opposition has no longer just been discerned, but is under way to the utmost....

[Lukin]: I see another process.... First, I do not believe that the idea of extreme nationalism has taken possession of the masses that strongly.... Look at the youth! It has American subculture in its nostrils!

Russia has its own history, its own traditions, and its own national interests. And however many resolutions there are, there will be these interests, just the same, as there were after October 1917, as there were, albeit in distorted form, under Stalin. On the other hand there is also the Russia that has always looked to the West. And it was not, incidentally, the left-wing Chernyshevskiy but Dostoevsky who said that the soul of the Russian man had two sides-Russian and European-that live within and tranquilly get along. So it would be better for us to give some thought to a synthesis of these ideas instead of proposing Marxist extremes.

[Lukin]: Very simple! National interests are those that Russia should pursue to the same extent and with the same degree of intensity as any democratic country in the world. What do you think-is America a masochistic country sacrificing its national interests?

[Shchekochikhin]: Of course not.

[Lukin]: Why, then should Russia become a masochist country abandoning its traditional national interests? It by no means follows from this that Russia should be on the side of Saddam Hussein and fight with everyone who disagrees with it! Here is the boundary between imperial ambitions and national interests. There is a balance of interests in democratic countries, serious, tense, sometimes dramatically fine, sometimes not evident, which makes them on the one hand a community, on the other, countries that are each concerned with their own national interests. The problems of the relations of America and Japan and America and Saddam Hussein are at a different level. We also should be a country in which problems between Russia and Japan or Russia and America fit within the framework of world civilization, and support for all dictatorial regimes, like that of Saddam Hussein, does not.

[Shchekochikhin]: You are right, of course, but this is theoretical rightness. But there are, in addition, inner feelings: Many people today feel themselves to be people who have lost, and losers want revenge. When we met with Zbigniew Brzezinski, he said (and his words were quoted in Literaturnaya Gazeta): “Russia has lost the Cold War just as Germany or Japan in World War II.”

[Lukin]: It was with this issue that I came to America, incidentally. Who had lost and who had won? Was it communism and totalitarianism that were defeated or was it Russia?

[Lukin]: If you adhere to a purely imperial consciousness, Russia sustained a defeat since it lost many of its territories, some of which were imperial, some that simply could not be deemed imperial .... And if there are at all any empires today, it is the republics that have snatched Russian territories only on the grounds that the administrative borders had been carved entirely arbitrarily. Which is why they are today howling that Russia is plundering them, reminiscent of a fellow who has murdered his father and mother and who is demanding of the court clemency on the grounds that he has been left a total orphan .... Yes, I repeat, Russia has sustained a defeat, proceeding from the imperial consciousness, but it also paid a very high price, of course, for deliverance from communism and totalitarianism. But Russia has acquired also an opportunity to become a modern, civilized, democratic country.... As far as Brzezinski's assertions to the effect that Russia was defeated in the Cold War are concerned, then, to be honest, we were defeated not by the West but by ourselves. Or we conquered ourselves- there is a very complex dilemma here.

[Shchekochikhin]: But I would like to take you back once again to what I have been thinking about continually of late. Owing to a lack of confidence in the democratic outlook, appeals are being made increasingly often-and by an increasingly large number of people-to the idea, as salvation, of a strong authority that is based on the imperial, nationalpatriotic idea, in which democracy occupies the last place-both democracy as a symbol and democracy as the essence of state rule. I am afraid that were August 1991 to be repeated now, few people would stand in front of the tanks outside the White House....

themselves to show that this was not the freedom they were dreaming of, that there is another, more ideal....

[Shchekochikhin]: It is easier to gather people in the squares today under national-patriotic slogans than in defense of freedom and democracy....

[Lukin]: There should be no slogans, no mass meetings. We need to learn to govern in such a way as finally to make the streets clean.... But this is boring, this is unromantic, and the intelligentsia in Russia is romantic. If there is a slogan, it is unfailingly "Away with!" If there is a speech, it is necessarily, "We are on the edge of the abyss." Whence: "Everything needs unfailingly to be restructured and started from scratch...."

What does this indicate? That we, the intelligentsia, are part of the very flesh of our insufficiently civilized people, by no means that the intelligentsia with us is splendid and that the people are not and need to be replaced....

[Shchekochikhin]: But, Vladimir Petrovich, it was the intelligentsia that both prepared the reforms and supported the reformers. Today, it seems to me, it has come to be in the way of the authorities, the same that it made such, and there is nothing left for it but to return to the kitchen.

[Lukin]: Well, splendid! The main thing in democracy is not (I quote Bulat) that some people burst forth into the governing authorities. Democracy is quite different. It is when there is air so that the intelligentsia might freely express its viewpoint precisely as an intelligentsia. And ideals have collapsed for many people today precisely because the intelligentsia has not become the governing authorities. And what is special about this? Tragedy will come when a totalitarian regime is installed and the intelligentsia is prevented from existing precisely as an intelligentsia, not as the governing authorities from the intelligentsia....

[Shchekochikhin]: I still believe that the disenchantment is not on account of the fact that Russia has not in several years become America. No one seriously entertained this, I believe. No, it is simply that many people have the feeling that they have been deceived .... Advantage has been taken of democratic slogans by the old apparatus forces, which have remained in power by making use of these slogans....

[Lukin]: So what? Politics is a cruel business. Yes, the former party nomenklatura is today availing itself of democratic slogans. What, our intelligentsia did not prior to this avail itself of the Marxist-Leninist dictionary in order to live a quiet life, write books, and obtain handouts from the authorities in the form of trips abroad? People should now play the fool or what? So the partocrats, in order to survive, are availing themselves of the new, democratic slogans. After each revolutionary commotion, not only do new people come to power, but the old ones remain! This is the usual historical pattern, and we want something ideal. So we need to work, and the intelligentsia's work is not cleaning the streets but cultivating constructive foundations in society.

[Shchekochikhin]: You now remind me of some figure from the Agitation and Propaganda Department of the Central Committee of the old days .... They even had the term: "Criticism should be positive .. ."

[Lukin]: But I am talking to you about support for democratic institutions, about what the West calls a system of trust, orientation, and a systemic approach to problems. Today even those who know how to work lack criteria for which they are working and earning money. What, merely to amass cash and clear off to America? Or to make their country civilized?

This is how, after all, the Germans and the Japanese and the South Koreans developed. This is what Westernism means to me! Take a look, even the new forms of economics are acquiring some deformed, preposterous nature with us. Why? They lack light and soul. And introducing such is not the business of the Agitation and Propaganda intelligentsia. But this is also the professional work of an intelligentsia cured of the romanticism of democracy.

[Shchekochikhin]: I also am for the intelligentsia being cured of romanticism. But for me this is something a little different. There was a time when the intelligentsia identified itself with power. Our people, intelligent, refined, understanding, had arrived.... It seems to me that today it would be better to go back to the kitchens since it was the kitchens that engendered the normal Russian diarchy of strength and soul.

[Shchekochikhin]: If democratic work means the mass meetings, these are attended less and less often...

[Lukin]: Democratic work begins when the mass meeting ends. The meeting is the incubator of totalitarianism! Have you ever seen a mass meeting at which one person says one thing, and another, the direct opposite? The opposite is hooted down. But after the meeting there are two roads. To take one is to create a civilized society. To take the other means crossing from one mass meeting to another until there finally appears a mustachioed or bearded individual, who speaks at one meeting and breaks up another. This is when totalitarianism begins.

You say, back to the kitchen, that is, once again counterposing the intelligentsia to power. And what is to be done with the beggarly and unsettled old people, with the young people who do not know where to go.... Will we then, sitting in our kitchens, counterpose ourselves to the new Kremlin occupants?

[Shchekochikhin]: I hope that the kitchen is not visited by persons with a search warrant....

[Lukin]: If the intelligentsia merely sits in its kitchens, it will necessarily ultimately be gobbled up....

3.35 Bogomolov on Economic Reform, Foreign Policy

Oleg Bogomolov

Novaya Ezhednevnyaya Gazeta, 11 June 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

In academician Oleg Bogomolov, as in any normal homo sapiens, one can probably find a large number of shortcomings that I am unaware of. But there is one thing of which I am absolutely certain: He was always a very wise and very decent person and was never a conformist. As long ago as 1979, when ardent anti-communist Boris Nikolaevich Yeltsin was heading the party organization in Sverdlovsk Oblast, academician Bogomolov sent the Politburo of the CPSU Central Committee a letter in which he attempted to prove the disastrous nature of the decision to send troops into Afghanistan. At that time he got away with his action and, apparently sensing his own impunity, the academician threw aside all restraint: Thirteen years later he spoke out against the guiding and directing force, this time in the person of the president and prime minister. At that time, in April 1992, he, Georgiy Arbatov, Nikolay Petrakov, and Svyatoslav Fedorov, who had previously been considered true adherents of social reforms, followed one another onto the rostrum of the Supreme Soviet and gave the president and the government a tongue-lashing for their “program of fundamental economic reforms.” The democratic public was shocked, and the press immediately reared up, christening what had occurred as an “academics’ mutiny” and branding those academics as persons with retrograde views and as conservatives. After that, the group of insurgent academics for a long time disappeared from the television screen and newspaper pages, and Bogomolov, Arbatov, Fedorov, and this time also Nikolay Shmelev (who also was out of favor) were removed from the President’s Consultative Council probably because of their insufficient loyalty.

Currently the voices of these scientists, practically speaking, cannot be heard. But it is not because they are remaining silent. Rather, it is because they are being hushed up. As one can see, even the free press has its blacklists.

In general, this is understandable. The fathers of the nation are completely amenable to an opposition, but not every kind of opposition. Instead, it must be only its extreme forms. If Anpilov or Isakov did not exist, it would be necessary to invent them, in order (a) to have someone to fight with, (b) to have someone to frighten the West with, and (c) to appear, by comparison, to be much more decorous. A moderate, constructive opposition is a completely different matter, since it is difficult to discredit it. It is intelligent, convincing, and, unlike the frenzied opposition, does not terrify the ordinary citizen. Therefore the four disgraced academics are much more dangerous for the president than Anpilov with his entire army of old ladies.

However, we consider freedom of speech to be unjust only for fools and we open up, by means of the article that follows, a new rubric, “The Constructive Opposition Club.” Because the nation has the right to know not only the point of view of M.N. Poltoranyan, but also of those who do not agree with him. At least sometimes. We shall invite as contributors to this rubric intelligent individuals whose opinion “does not necessarily coincide” with the Kremlin’s opinion. The first article in this series is by Academician Oleg Bogomolov, director of the Institute of International, Economic, and Political Research.

How This Began

What was begun by Gaydar and approved by the president was nothing new for economists. Versions of a transition to the market had been discussed long before August 1991. One might recall at least the end of 1990-the conference with the participation of Gorbachev and Ryzhkov, when Abalkin, who was vice premier at that time, reported on the paths for the transition to the market and considered three different alternatives: slow crawling into it; shock therapy; and finally, the so-called moderate-radical alternative. Having agreed in the opinion that the shock alternative would be extremely dangerous under our conditions, most of those present stated that they were in favor of moderate-radical reform. Incidentally, representatives of industry were also present there, and Chernomyrdin made statements.

At that time, just as, incidentally, the current situation is, none of us had any doubt about the need to create markettype economy or about democratization. The measures that were necessary for that purpose were obvious and had even been tested in the practical situation-in the East European countries: privatization; the demonopolization of the economy; liberalization of prices and foreign trade; reform in the tax system; the elimination of the budgetary deficit; the improvement of the monetary system; the development and support of entrepreneurship. The entire question was reduced to the sequence in which to carry out this series of measures. On the eve of the making of these critical decisions-as long ago as the autumn of 1991-both at sessions of the President's Council and in conversations with Gaydar, my colleagues and I expressed our warnings concerning their possible consequences. We asked why it was necessary to begin immediately with the liberalization of prices and wages-two things that would inevitably cause prices to rise sharply and then would cause hyperinflation. It was necessary first to create some kind of competitive environment, so that there would be conviction that the prices would not break loose like an unbroken horse feeling his oats. Unfortunately, no one paid any attention to these warnings. Gaydar's face constantly bore a condescending, skeptical smile, and the president, in my opinion, was under the strong impression exerted by that team and completely trusted it.

But until a certain time we were actually left with the sensation that, at the proper moment, Gaydar would pull some kind of trump card out of his sleeve and everything would change. However, that did not happen. Then there occurred those same hearings at the Supreme Soviet where we proposed making major adjustments in economic policy. Today everything that we spoke about then is being confirmed in real life and the results of that policy are emerging more visibly. Prices are increasing every month by 20-30 percent, labor is underestimated, to a greater and greater extent the worker is losing any real motivation, and the entrepreneur does not want to invest his funds in the development of production. All this already appears to be very serious. And although we continue to hear reassuring statements that the decrease in production has almost stopped and that price stabilization will occur at any moment, these statements do not agree well with the real facts.

I have never tried to frighten anyone, but if one takes Western criteria, cutting production in half and lowering the standard of living to one-third the previous level over the course of two years can be viewed as a real catastrophe. We are rescued only by the extreme adaptability of the nation, by its ability to survive. "What's good for the Russian is death for the German." And our protest is completely Russian: Inflation is robbing you, so go ahead and rob others if you can. This explains the crime, the thievery, when people steal everything they can from their neighbor and from the state. Thievery always existed in ancient Russia, but today it has become a standard of life.

How do we manage to survive? We sell abroad everything that we can—raw materials, girls, scientists—for a song. We plant vegetable gardens and sometimes even keep chickens on the balconies of city apartments. But go into any rayon social security office and listen to old people who will share their survival experience. Your eyes will fill with tears.

Of course there will be no apocalypse. With our astonishing adaptability and inventiveness, we will come through this somehow. But there will also occur, and is already occurring, a gradual and imperceptible dying out of persons who have not adapted, there will be a moral and physical degradation of society. There is no medicine to prevent this. A person possibly will survive, or he will die. He will starve to death, will slowly expire, even though he might have lived a little longer. Little children are ailing. Unfortunately, from the point of view of anyone in the West, this is already a catastrophe.

People and the nation are attempting to survive. But on the whole this is very humiliating, because we actually are a tremendously rich country and we have a tremendous intellectual potential.

Concerning Gaydar's Government

In his speech at those memorable parliamentary hearings, Arbatov ended with an old Odessa anecdote: "There were two houses of prostitution across the street from each other. Things were going fine in one of them, but were going poorly in the other one. The madam in the latter one repainted the house and changed the curtains, but still the customers didn't come. Then she asked her more successful neighbor what else she should do. Her neighbor said, 'You have to change the girls!' "

So, let's discuss the question of the "girls." The government's actions from the very beginning were like the actions of a group of sect members that is convinced of its rectitude and that does not want to listen to others who might interfere with that group's carrying out its plans, because those plans are the correct ones. They also were given conviction concerning this by advice from the IMF. And that sectarian position, that isolation of economic science from practice, caused a large amount of unrest.

We wrote to Yeltsin that it was, of course, a good thing to have a government of people with the same views, when policy is absolutely true and has been worked out in all details. But just imagine that that policy is erroneous, and you have a government of people with the same views, and, moreover, you want to create a parliament of people with the same views!

I think that we are dealing specifically with the situation when they are all linked together in a mutual coverup: they have taken an oath to that policy, it is not working, but they continue to try to convince us that a major breakthrough will occur at any moment. But that breakthrough is not occurring. ... But the critics are not being allowed to open their mouths. This is the reverse side of the unanimity of views that we already had plenty of at one time. Gaydar was criticized not only by Rutskoy and Khasbulatov. Many scientists expressed extended views on the policy he conducted. But that was simply ignored. No one responded to it.

Gaydar launched myths one after the other. For example, he asserted that, when they began their reforms, the situation in the economy was such that there was no other way out, and if there had been no price liberalization, things would have become even worse. That argument is one of those that might convince a few people, but that are impossible to prove. Serious analysis attests to the fact that the situation would not have been so bad, and that there had been several decisions, but the one that was chosen was the worst one. And certain of Gaydar's people said in general that the main thing was to begin chopping, and it was not important which end to begin. Is that really the right approach?

It is obvious to any specialist: Attempting to stabilize finance without previously defining what the ruble zone is, and without having any control over the republic's banks that are continuing to issue ruble credit, is, in general, a risky business. But it was important for them to display decisiveness. Yeltsin needed obedient followers. Yavlinskiy refused, but Gaydar agreed.

Unfortunately, the press, in my opinion, frequently provides a distorted picture, evaluating everything only in two colors-black and white: Gaydar is a reformer, and those who call for greater control, for increasing the role of the state, are conservatives. The rebirth of the most elementary functions in evaluating and planning the economy, that which previously was done at Gosplan and that which must be done by every state, because without forecast work, without the development of some kind of strategy, a modern state cannot exist-all this is called “a turning back.” Well, then, will the invisible hand of the market put everything in its proper place, will it promote the conversion of production and the preservation of some necessary standard of living for the population? That is simply naive. This does not happen anywhere on earth. The state everywhere executes definite and very important functions.

Gaydar and his team introduced the conviction that the market will do everything for us. This is the well-known American concept of the Chicago school—liberalism in its extreme form. But in its pure form the concept has never been embodied anywhere. Reagan was an adherent of it, but only rhetorically, because when he was in office the state kept under its control a very large number of aspects of life. But Clinton currently wants to depart from that and to intensify even more so-called state interventionism. As for the Europeans, for the most part they are adherents of the Keynesian views, according to which the state must introduce an active policy and exert an influence on supply and demand. In Japan and Italy the state has its technical policy and strategy, and strictly monitors the way in which those statewide, national concepts are implemented through private business and a number of drive belts.

But what does the invisible hand of the market mean, if we are talking about social protection? This means the dying out of people who cannot feed or protect themselves. And this also does not happen anywhere else in the world. So the role of the state in the economy is very great. I am not even talking about military production orders or the military industry, or about conversion, where, without state interference, it is completely impossible to achieve any results at all. But in our country the VPK [military-industrial complex] constitutes half the industry.

That is why I consider radical liberalism a very dangerous error. Its adherents represent one extreme, which is perhaps just as dangerous as another one-the national-patriots and orthodox Communists, who want to revive the past....

About Foreign Policy

If one takes foreign policy, scientific institutions have also expressed extremely serious criticism in this area. We evaluated negatively those drafts of the foreign policy concept that our government proposed, because of their excessive orientation toward the United States and their underevaluation of the European continent and its role in our priority system, not to mention Eastern Europe and the “near abroad.” The relations that took first place were those with America, and those in last place were with Ukraine.

We do not have an intelligent structure or mechanisms for formulating foreign policy. Foreign policy is born in many government offices simultaneously, frequently in an uncoordinated manner. In formulating its principles and in the decision-making process, power structures were involved: the general staff, the ministry of defense, and sometimes also various regional groupings such as GSVG [Group of Soviet Forces in Germany]. In addition, the parliament was a participant in working out international policy, which, in my opinion, was impermissible in such a large analytical job. The parliament should not establish ties, monitor the situation, or issue instructions to embassies. Finally, there exist foreign policy subdivisions within the framework of the president’s staff.

However, it seems to me, these links are insufficient if we want to have a foreign policy that is carefully weighted, that is thought out down to the smallest details, and that takes into consideration every kind of long-term consequence. What we need is a serious, scientific base. Previously those functions were fulfilled by the Academy of Sciences, with its international institutes: IMEMO, our institute, and the Far East, Eastern Studies, Africa, and Latin American institutes, which were engaged in studying the state of affairs in individual regions and countries.

Incidentally, I have already mentioned the attitude taken by the authorities to the potential for a scientific approach. They proceed from the assumption that the truth is already known and the only thing left to do is to propagandize it.

About five years ago the newspapers wrote: change your approaches to developing foreign policy; it is necessary to discuss, weigh, and analyze the consequences and to choose from a number of decisions the optimal one. But that has not yet occurred. I do not remember an instance when two different foreign policy approaches collided, when there was any kind of debate. This does not necessarily have to be done publicly. Other forms exist: the holding of various hearings, even closed ones, without broad coverage, at which there could be an analysis of all aspects of a particular foreign policy problem. The results of those hearings should then be used to make the particular decision, resting upon the opinion of the most knowledgeable specialists.

This kind of system is absent in our country, and the existing one operates very weakly. Moreover, it seems to me what is occurring is a certain profanation of the “scientific substantiation” of various decisions. Various centers, foundations, and institutes of “strategic research” are springing up like mushrooms.... But my experience tells me that a serious scientific research group can take about ten years to form. Creating in a single year a research center that will operate at the appropriate level is simply unrealistic.

I am very troubled because, when new “centers” of this kind are created alongside serious institutes in the Academy and in counterbalance to them, this destroys the respectable science and favors very dubious sources.

Maybe this is the grumbling of an old scientist who does not understand young people, but it is completely possible that we are present at a process when a serious scientific base is being replaced by pseudoscience, risking the commission of a large number of errors in foreign policy or, even worse, absolute blunders.

Incidentally, certain foreign policy turns taken by the president even today can inspire amazement. Can one really imagine that the president of the United States, having decided suddenly to stop the activities of the U.S. Congress, would send the following request to the FRG [Federal Republic of Germany-West German] chancellor, “In view of the fact that our parliament is very reactionary, I have decided to disband it. Could you please make efforts on our behalf over there in Europe to see that we are supported....” That is simply not done. But that is what happened in our country. The press reported that, on the eve of his “message to the nation,” the Russian president requested Helmut Kohl to support the decisive measures being planned by him. And the West, through the mouth of U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher and others, was actually given to understand that it supports Yeltsin. But that is completely unprecedented! Maybe some downtrodden developing country can allow itself to suffer that, but Russia...

Although recently it is beginning to appear to me that our leaders’ ideas about morality do not agree-not to mention principles-with the most elementary moral principles of Western politicians. French Prime Minister Pierre Bérégovoy shot himself to death because he was persecuted. And he was persecuted because of what we would consider to be a mere bagatelle: In order to buy an apartment, he obtained interestfree credit from an acquaintance. Our people would certainly consider him insane. Because things are generally done differently in our country-if you have climbed your way to power, you have to scrounge, you have to take bribes, you have to use any blessings that you can steal

About the West’s Position

We all counted on the West for moral support of the reforms and the process of democratization in the country. But that, first of all, presupposed correct understanding of what was occurring and support for what was working and yielding results. It would have been good if the massive support from the West, including support with money, had actually been a factor in reviving the country. Actually, however, we are rushing farther and farther downward: This policy is not working.

At one time the Marshall Plan was counted on to consolidate Europe and eliminate the enmity between the British and the Germans, and between the French and the Germans. But are we really to believe that at present Western aid is directed at restoring our ties with Ukraine or with Kazakhstan? They have not considered this at all. It is important for them to break us apart. When I begin talking about this, people immediately tell me, “You are repeating the assertions of the national-patriots and the Den newspaper concerning agents of influence.” But I am only repeating what I repeatedly heard with my own ears from those very influential conversational partners from the European countries. Because the West wants, as rapidly as possible, to make this process irreversible, and they don’t give a damn about what effect this has on the nation. It is important for them to have private property, and they are not concerned about who will seize it. Well, they reason, at one time we also had our Rockefellers and Du Ponts. But why should we take that path?

The thing that the West fears most is the bugbear of communism. Therefore it was sufficient to say that the parliament consists of reactionaries who are attempting to restore the communist past. When the West immediately began to regard Khasbulatov as a gangster and the leader of a gangster group, all their favors were given to the president and those who, together with him, are fighting against the parliament. But who is fighting? The same Communists, the same Bolsheviks, but with a reverse sign.

About What Will Be

I am not inclined to fall into extreme pessimism. Our society is learning somewhat from what is happening to it and is becoming more mature and more capable of weighing all possibilities. I do not believe that any of the extremes will prevail-leftist-radical liberalism, the national-patriots, or the orthodox Communists. The more sober and more serious approach to reforming society will inevitably triumph because the bulk of the leaders of industry and economic structures, and the scientific intellectuals, have not lost their common sense. And if they are sometimes forced to assent to what is happening today, in the final analysis they will still be able to correct the course of the reforms.

This is especially true since the country's reserves are tremendous. We have already reduced military expenses and shall reduce them even more. For the time being, perhaps, there has been no tangible benefit from this, inasmuch as conversion requires more money than it is capable of giving. But after a certain period of time we shall sense a result. The military-industrial complex is still a glutton that has eaten away a considerable part of the national income.

But the chief prerequisite for rebirth is still linked, in my opinion, not so much with a specific economic policy, with conversion, or with the creation of family farms in agriculture, as it is with state construction, because the chief crisis that we are experiencing today is a crisis of the state system. In essence, we do not have a state, and that which does exist is not monitoring or managing the situation. Laws are promulgated, but not executed. Bureaucratism is monstrous. Bribetakers and criminals remain unpunished. The army is subordinate to no one knows whom, and has already been transformed, in my opinion, into an independent force. Regions are attempting to distance themselves from the Center's unpromising policy.

It is necessary to form a strong state authority and an authoritative state system, which require a re-election of both the parliament and the president. We need political reform, the liquidation of the congress, a two-chamber parliament, the correct distribution of functions between the parliament and the president, that which is called “checks and balances,” that is, we need a system of restraints and counterbalances to assure that all the power does not become concentrated in any one of the branches and to assure that there is reciprocal monitoring. It is only on these foundations that we can overcome the scourge of our state system and economy-the crime and corruption that are depriving the entire country of its moral health and making a criminal out of both the authority and the economy. And then it will be necessary to improve the institutions of authority themselves-by means of selection.

After the referendum, this path, if it is not closed, will be moved aside. Once again we are in a stalemate situation, and the president again has the temptation of unconstitutionally implementing his will, of forcing upon the country a constitution that would give him powers that are close to those of a monarch and would reduce the role of parliament to window-dressing. I am extremely depressed at the way that our Supreme Soviet, and even more the congress, are operating. But at the same time I am very troubled by the attacks on the embryonic beginnings of our parliamentarianism. We are not beating up the specific bearers of conservative views. Instead, we are beating up parliamentarianism, freedoms, and the embryonic beginnings of democracy. It is clear that it will be necessary to return to the resolution of these problems, and I would like to hope that they will be resolved in a civilized manner, rather than by having a narrow group of people who are in power force their will on the majority of the population.

Unfortunately, there lives in our genes an orientation toward an idol, a tsar, an orientation toward worshiping some individual, a tendency to be all atwitter because that individual has shaken your hand-we begin to speak breathlessly about him and are even ready to flatter him, as Ryazanov flattered the president. The intelligentsia here is serving as a poor example. All this is so, but, at the same time, time takes its toll, and our chances for authoritarian government are currently very small. Just try to go too far by even the slightest extent and the regions will immediately break off and run in different directions, and this will paralyze the entire central authority. In addition, the army, after all the recent events, will scarcely get involved in the political struggle or take one side or another.

So other times are still coming. True, we do not see any leaders. If only our Russian de Gaulle were to appear, most of the population would trust him-he would be an honest person who would serve the nation, rather than himself and his coterie. That would be much easier. Many people, including myself, would be in favor of that kind of enlightened authoritarian power. Actually, we need the strong hand of a wise politician with a state mind. We don't have anyone like that. We do not even see a state mode of thinking. Gorbachev, incidentally, had that way of thinking. He is a completely different figure, although in his time we were very dissatisfied with many aspects of his activities. We had the feeling that, in his constant maneuvers, he had outfoxed himself. But what can one do if our past leaders did everything to assure that, after they shot their cannon blast, no one would appear to replace them, or if such a figure did appear, he would immediately be stifled.

The natural path is the improvement of democracy. It is completely possible that the pre-election campaign will reveal possible candidates whom we do not yet know, and with the aid of the current mass media we will be able to understand the value of each of them.

And, finally, we have to have a very serious adjustment of economic policy. It is necessary first of all to create those conditions that will assure that the emerging private capital does not go toward trade or into speculative operations, but into production. Today our producers are heavily burdened with taxes. The taxes are such that, if you pay them honestly, you cannot work-it will ruin you. Therefore the evasion of taxes is today the chief concern of any entrepreneur. Even Gaydar himself, who now is giving interviews, says that our tax burden has reached its limit and we have nowhere else to go. But this is nonsense. It is a stupid system and we must change it. Consequently, it is necessary to lower taxes, in order to create an incentive for increasing production, and consequently, as a result of the increased mass of output, you will derive, even with lower tax rates, a greater amount of money.

In addition, we must have serious support of private enterprise, especially in small business-tax holidays and other forms of incentive. This principle is declared constantly, but is never implemented.

We need a sober approach to credit policy: pressuring the bank to make sure it does not issue credit, but, using a selective approach in the area of credit, putting into action a production apparatus.

[We also need] an income policy. If you keep the wages and monetary income of the majority of the population around $30 a month and the retail prices approach the level of worldwide prices, then you must know ahead of time that your industry will not have a market. Because people who get $30 to $40 a month will spend that money only on food. They cannot even think of buying a television set, a car, or a dacha. Consequently, it is necessary to increase people's income in order to create demand. Otherwise your industry will suffocate—those are the ABCs of economic science.

But, first of all, of course, it is necessary to analyze the real reasons why this hyperinflationary increase in prices is occurring, why production is falling, what lies at the bottom of the drop in the standard of living and the impoverishment of the bulk of the population, and how the social differentiation is occurring in society. This requires an objective and public analysis. The nation must know its heroes. Because we still do not know anything about how the government has made decisions, about who is responsible for various errors and failures, or why the promises that were made were not fulfilled. This is not bloodthirstiness. It is the normal practice for any normal state: If you have proposed, insisted upon, and implemented something that failed to yield results or that led to worse results, then you must be held answerable for it. Otherwise we will continue to know nothing, just as we knew nothing during the times of stagnation. Why are ministers being replaced? How has policy changed since the arrival of new people in government? We hear and read that, within the government, there are various points of view, but the thing that this resembles most of all is a fight behind the scenes.

3.36 Vladimir Lukin on Relations with the CIS and with the West

Vladimir Lukin

Segodnya, 2 September 1993 [FBIS Translation]

We are perhaps now left with the last chance to extricate ourselves and society from the quagmire of self-torture, reciprocal attacks verging on hysterics, and the sapping of all state offices without exception. We must at long last stop quarreling and destroying. We must summon our strength, rally together, and build-build our home.

When asked what the post-communist ideology is, I usually reply: I think it is an ideology of building a home and running it wisely. A home with a small and capital “h.” A home for yourself and your family. A home as your smaller world, the place of your work and your community. A home meaning the region or area when you live. Finally, a home with the capital “h” meaning Russia. For each and every person to concentrate on building such a home is a complex process, a hard and multifaceted experience: You have to find the building material and money, while simultaneously finding the home inside your soul, to overcome the Ivan-with-no-home complex, to stop wandering aimlessly among the absolutes, and return to the concrete soil.

The topic is all the more important because questions of Russia’s foreign and security policy are going to occupy a very sizable place in the coming election campaign despite society’s being so engrossed in domestic-primarily economic-problems. This has already happened, in fact. The current ruling structures are being bitterly blamed for the “breakup of the Union,” for their inability to reliably ensure the security of Russia and its people who find themselves in the newly independent states, and for a “one-sided contest” in relations with the West.

Taking objective stock of Russia’s foreign policy over the first “500 days” and summing up experience gained in the meantime are necessary not only to build up intellectual muscle in the election campaign, but also to produce a more effective future strategy—a strategy that is both effective and supported by the Russian people. Let me dwell on two important problems, the main trouble spots of the impending election the “breakup of the Union” and “the giveaway game with the West.”

The proposition that the “present leaders broke up the Union” is not true. First, it was broken up mostly under the communist leadership, including during their period of agony under Gorbachev. Suffice it to recall the well-known chain of events: the Baltics, Ukraine, Georgia, then Armenia. Second, the Union in its former shape was doomed historically, and the only issue was which path its remaking was going to take—through evolution or explosion. The problem is that the reserves of an evolutionary path were not completely exhausted. For me there is no doubt that they could have been put into effect more skillfully. The possible alternatives like, say, a blend of the British Commonwealth and the EC (in our original packaging, naturally) would have been much safer for making the transition from a unitary state. The stance taken, however, was different—the Belovezh Forest one, which was explosive, established in one fell swoop not only by the well-known decision, but also by the sluggish reaction to its serious consequences, which were absolutely unavoidable and obvious to any professional from the start. Both revolutionary impatience (a temptation to cut a tight knot instead of assiduously undoing it) and the leaders’ personal rivalry, as well as political errors, also played a role there. I am going to discuss them separately because we are not completely free from them yet.

All the difficulties and failings (including tragic ones) of the sudden secession affecting borders, the army, the economy and finances, a single legal and democratic space, and a single science and culture seem to have been colossally underrated. Finally, there is the future of Russia itself, which has always been both a territory and a nation. This underrating, in my view, was due to some romantic peculiarities of the radical-democratic mindset that was the hallmark of our initial policy.

The hope that disarming our new neighbors by being kind and magnanimous and counting on their eternal gratitude for having freed them from the yoke of the “imperial center” and the belief that they could only love a repentant Russia led by democrats who broke with the “accursed past”-that all this would lead to a new close-knit family of independent sovereign democratic states that would quickly and easily materialize on the entire post-totalitarian space of the former USSR-ran counter to historical experience and was unrealistic. As should have been expected, reality proved much tougher: self-interest instead of gratitude, militant anti-Moscow sentiments instead of new affection, old suspicions harking back to the Soviet and more distant past, and sharp contradictions and conflicts instead of universal fraternization. And, sometimes, also outright cheating (the latest example is the demarche to Lithuania involving the bilateral agreement). We sobered up in time but wasted much time and many opportunities when you consider that relations with the West at first took the front seat in foreign policy while we neglected our main problem-the problem of our neighbors, the problem of the near, internal circle of Russia.

In particular, no serious attempt was made to coordinate economic reforms in our countries to create-not just in words but in structures-a single economic space (something attempted by G. Yavlinskiy and others and consigned to “criticism by mice”). There was a clear delay in creating Russia’s own army, in protecting the Russian-speaking minorities in the adjoining countries-this became the domain of the “national-patriots.” There was no mechanism providing for urgent analysis and resolution of conflicts between the countries of the “near abroad” (no room was even provided for this purpose in the Foreign Ministry or the Security Council). Instead, sporadic, one-day summits were held, in whose wake issues that seemed to have been resolved became hopelessly “suspended.” Policy increasingly lagged behind events. One of the latest examples is the bloody raid on the Russian border post on the Tajik-Afghan border. Was it really difficult to foresee and to prepare for-especially given our Afghan experience-retaliatory actions by the Islamists after their expulsion from Tajikistan?

As a result of the government’s latest efforts, the priorities and style of our policy-primarily as regards economics-have begun gradually to turn toward realism and common sense. Integration sentiments concerning the economy and politics, and even security, have simultaneously started to grow under pressure from the grim reality among our close neighbors after the initial euphoria of boundless autocratic independence. All that is now creating conditions for sharply stepping up our efforts to ensure Russian interests in the “near abroad.” True, launching joint actions now would be much harder given greater disorder, economic recession- 50 percent of which is attributed to this disorder-and multiple social problems.

Russian strategy in the CIS offers several options that should be decided on as soon as possible. The first one is neo-isolationism, which is essentially a logical conclusion of the very same radical-democratic romanticism whose hopes for an idyll of a new internationalism collapsed (“Ah, if that’s the way you want it, we are leaving”). In both cases emotions prevail over reason, and political affectation prevails over an ability for routine statesmen’s work. What would be the real significance of Russia’s leaving Central Asia and the North Caucasus? First, changing the border involves a multitude of costs. A more important price to pay is political new borders would cut through the Russian-speaking population (primarily in northern Kazakhstan) with all the unpredictable consequences. Second, removing the Russian presence and influence from there would mean denuding the strategic approaches into the very heart of Russia, creating in this critically important space a strategic vacuum that would be filled by other forces, possibly hostile to Russia.

Third, this would mean leaving to the mercy of fate the weak, fledgling political regimes in the neighboring countries, to virtually doom them to chaos or authoritarian-nationalist degradation. Even forgetting about morals, this would be damaging to the interests of Russia. It can hardly survive as a democracy amid the chronic instability and political turmoil that would poisonously seep into the Russian space through many avenues-border conflicts, streams of refugees, political influence on the provinces, etc.

No less dangerous is, of course, a “national-patriotic” variant to the solution of the CIS problem-an attempt to restore in one form or another the “Russian-Soviet empire.” It is unthinkable either technically, without prohibitive sacrifices and costs, or politically because Russia would then find itself in a hostile isolation even more dangerous than that of the Cold War era, if one considers the new alignment of forces and our changed geopolitical situation.

All this says nothing about whether this variant is compatible with preserving democracy in Russia. Happily, Russia does not need this variant: as far as the past is concerned, we need security and economic ties rather than a unitary state. Anyway, the past can be restored only in a slumber or a dream. This does not happen in politics or history.

A real solution to the whole raft of the “near abroad” problems as far as Russia is concerned is striking a complex balance between at least the three factors: Russia’s legitimate interests in this space, Russia’s realistic changes to realize them, and the interests of our neighbors and partners.

A common formula for this balance can be the system of “neighborliness,” long tested everywhere in the world, especially in America. It, however, implies not simply abstract good relations between neighbors as is often imagined here in this country-but a rather definitive system of mutual obligations between big states and their smaller neighbors, who receive guarantees of security in exchange for their recognition of the “big neighbor’s” special interests and influence in proportion to its geographical proximity, and strategic and economic weight. This system of “soft” strategic leadership by Russia in its special interest zone may prove acceptable both to our new neighbors and major partners in the West and East, provided of course that it has been constructed flexibly and ably.

This is a matter requiring many years and involving many things we cannot manage either today or even tomorrow. However, in order to be able to manage them the day after tomorrow, the necessary prerequisites should start to be created today while still retaining these new countries in our area of influence.

The immediate task here is to settle and prevent armed conflicts, to protect the Russian-speaking population, and then to convert this zone, on a collective basis, into a belt of mutual security. The long-term ultimate task here is to create, by stimulating the natural integration processes rather than by compulsion, close allied relationships of a confederative type. Russia needs to have an internal ring of friends in addition to an outer ring of partners.

The level of our relationships with friends should as a rule be qualitatively higher than that of our relationships with our partners, and the level of relationships of our partners with our friends should be qualitatively lower than that between us and our friends.

This hierarchy should not stress form but substance and contents; it should be based on reality and be achieved mainly by positive, that is, political and economic, means. There should also be a mechanism in place—ideally a collective one with a Russian basis—for resolving extreme situations with the use of force as a factor. The more convincing this factor is, the less it would have to be resorted to.

Finally, the formation of such a community of states in a democratic Russia's zone of natural gravity would promote not only security and economic progress for all its members, but also their orderly and joint entry into the world community, as opposed to a humiliating crawl or forcibly dragged into it either as a form of reward, or the opposite-not being dragged into it as a kind of punishment.

As for our relations with the West, the principled line of the top Russian foreign policy officials toward finally overcoming confrontation and achieving rapprochement with the West has undoubtedly been correct. This has helped retain a positive continuity regarding our policy of the late 1980s and given it a serious boost. Unfortunately, inertia and continuity have also been retained with regard to the haste in giving in without bargaining for reciprocal concessions. Apart from a lack of professionalism, this trend has also demonstrated the aforementioned romantic aspects of the radical democrats' mentality. They firmly believed and loudly asserted that once Russia "renounced the old world," knocked communism off its feet, and took on the role of the obedient ally of the United States, the thankful and generous West would at once introduce its profligate daughter to "the Western world," and in any event it would not let us down, but would drag us ashore where the land flows with milk and honey. When it turned out that life is not quite like this, they scrambled to make belated adjustments to this policy, but dual damage has already been done: pampered from the outset by an easy life with a new Russia (and even earlier by Gorbachev and Shevardnadze), our Western partners proved unprepared for an independent Russian policy, and a part of our public, offended by the withholding of the promised Western assistance, has turned away from the West and even started seeing it as the main cause for our woes. Anti-Western and especially anti-American sentiments are in vogue once again and have become a political reality that hinders reasonable policy making. These sentiments have been widely exploited by the forces of the past, which have been calling on the country to start a new “cold war” with the fatally hostile West, which is haunted by the desire to ruin Russia.

This is a war that we are, first, incapable of waging, and, second, do not need whatsoever to pursue our real interests.

The satanic West as presented by our communists and the right wing is an ideological myth just as the ideal West of our romantic democrats; the latter have been lying about it out of ardent love no less than the former did out of animal hatred. The actual West is a complex web of fairly egotistical calculations and apprehensions regarding us. These include:

- not to allow too close a reintegration of the CIS or the restoration of a kind of “Soviet empire” or “Soviet threat” on this basis;
- at the same time, to avert collapse, chaos, and dangerous instability throughout this space;
- to assist in setting up democratic structures on a purely national basis;

- to liquidate nuclear chaos and to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons;
- for domestic policy reasons, to achieve all this at minimum financial and political cost by not doing anything that is burdensome.

This set of interests is far from always being contrary to our own and in many instances corresponds to them. By sticking with the strategic course I outlined earlier, we will not fall out drastically with the West unless we revert to a dictatorship. There will be some periods of chilliness, which is fairly natural. Most importantly, we should not fall into verbose and confrontational hysteria, but rather we need to keep explaining, persuading, and going our own way. If we are strong, everyone will recognize us as such, and some will even pretend to love us.

Another conclusion to be drawn from this is that we have to rely on ourselves above all. Let us finally become realistic-we should not expect any lavish aid (Tokyo appears to have been a culmination of these efforts); moreover, we are unable to make use of what little aid we have. What we need most from the West is the recognition of our legitimate interests in the “near abroad” (preferably with any assistance it can provide in integration processes under way there) and the removal of obstacles preventing Russia from full participation in world trade and economic cooperation. This cooperation will require from us much greater sophistication and consistency in defending our trade and economic interests. Our own firsthand experience has already shown that a political partnership with the United States or other Western countries by no means rules out serious competition in trade and economic relations. One has to be ready for this. In this respect we will not be able to persuade anyone by begging. Hence, we need to act on our own and aggressively.

If, however, Russia is to achieve any serious success in this business that is historically new for our country, it will need something more than just a knowledge of the subtleties of world trade and proficiency in economic diplomacy. What it needs is a national willpower that is set forth in a long-term national strategy and reflected in the clear, thoroughly thought-out actions of an efficient and cohesive leadership. This is the main secret of the startling success stories of postwar Japan and later of the “Asian tigers,” which have managed to subordinate everything to a single overriding objective of conquering foreign markets, progressing gradually from low-tech export “niches” to ever higher ones.

Our resources and human capacities will be much greater than those of postwar Japan only, of course, if we maintain the unity of our country and ensure at least some security outside and law-and-order inside. As for national willpower and a single-minded team of governing statesmen, these things are woefully lacking. Without strengthening “the back end” of our foreign policy-its strategic backbone provided by the state—neither ideas, even the best ones, nor tremendous resources will help us achieve success in the international scene. In this respect, Russia’s reasonable and strong foreign policy does indeed “begin at home.” So, restructuring the Russian house, constructing new good neighborliness, and forging mutually advantageous partnerships with countries of the West and the East—these are the basic priorities of our policy that are closely intertwined with one another.

And one last point-on public support for this policy. We do not have any secrets here. People have enough common sense to figure out where they are being dragged by all sorts of advocates of Russian interests. This is why they are skeptical about the romantic illusions of the radical democrats and have so far not taken the bait of the radical nationalists’ alternative. Demand for a reasonable foreign policy, as it is for a domestic one, is immense. If broad support is to be won, the policy has to be aimed substantively at defending the interests of the majority of Russians and be stylistically intelligible and consonant with their sentiments.

This majority is squarely in the center. What they want from their government are simple and understandable things: They are little concerned about human rights in Tibet or the difference between the left wing and the right wing in Peru-although for me these issues have importance-but they are very concerned about the plight of their relatives and friends who have found themselves outside Russia; they are not overly eager “to made the world safe for democracy,” but they are very troubled by the security of Russian borders; they give much more thought to domestic disarmament than to international disarmament, wishing that submachine guns would finally cease firing in the streets where their children play. They do not curry favors with the West, nor do they threaten it with revenge; they do not assume a holier-than-thou attitude, nor do they want to be considered worse than any one else; they are not against joining the world community, but they prefer to do this not by crawling on their belly, but by retaining the sense of dignity that behooves a great people with a great history and culture. Let us stick with this policy that is natural for Russia; then it will be accepted both in the country and in the world. And then our people will start respecting us.

3.37 Russia Tells British Embassy It Controls Caspian Sea Resources

Russian Federation Ministry of Foreign Affairs
The British Embassy No. 120E, 28 April 1994

Editor's Note: The letter below is an exact copy of a letter sent by the Russian Foreign Ministry to the Embassy of Great Britain and Northern Ireland with regard to projects dealing in Caspian Sea oil and gas. It is an example of Russia's foreign policy of exerting maximum economic leverage over its CIS neighbors, especially in order to obtain political advantage. Russia demands the right to reject all Caspian oil projects that its former Soviet neighbors are negotiating with Western companies.

The letter was evidently designed to stall a British Petroleum-led consortium that was concluding a $7 billion oil deal to transport oil from Azerbaijan to the West. Russia had been trying for months to gain more control over the oil-rich sea by calling it an “inland lake,” owned collectively by all states with borders touching its perimeter. The letter also threatened two other massive projects, both in Kazakhstan-the $20 billion Tengiz oil project and the “Caspishelf” oil and gas venture. Tengiz had been awarded to the American company Chevron, while Caspishelf was being run by a consortium which included Mobil, BP, British Gas, Agip, Statoil, Total, and Shell.

In 1992, the Caspian's oil and natural gas reserves were dispersed among Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and Russia. But in 1994, Russia started demanding equity stakes in Western energy projects in the region. Lukoil, the largest Russian oil company, secured a 10 percent share in the BP consortium in Azerbaijan. Moscow also achieved in principle a stake in a giant British Gas/Agip venture at Karachaganak in Kazakhstan. Russia was also seeking a stake in the Tengiz project.

The assertion of pre-emptive rights over Caspian Sea resources was the first time Russia provided concrete evidence that it intends to control the flow of oil and natural gas from the ex-Soviet Union to the west. The letter is included here as an example of Russia's potential economic leverage over the other CIS states. Oil and natural gas constitute by far its greatest political-economic source of manipulation and influence over its neighboring states. The politics of energy are certain to be an important determinant of any future organizational form assumed by the Commonwealth.

The Russian Federation Ministry of Foreign Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and has the honor to inform it of the following:

On the 23rd of February 1994 the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Republic of Azerbaijan signed a memorandum on cooperation in the field of power engineering between the two countries, which provides for the holding of talks and the conclusion of an agreement on cooperation in the region of the so-called Azerbaijani sector of the Caspian Sea.

The Russian side would like to draw the attention of the British side to the fact that sectoral demarcation of the sea bed does not exist in the Caspian.

By its very nature the Caspian Sea is an enclosed water reservoir with a single eco-system and represents a object of joint use, within whose boundaries all issues of activities, including resources development, have to be resolved with the participation of all Caspian countries.

Taking the above into account, any steps by whichever Caspian state, aimed at acquiring any kind of advantages with regard to the areas and resources of the Caspian Sea, run counter to the interests of other Caspian states and cannot be recognized.

The Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs hopes that the above stance will meet with the understanding of the British side, which will bear in mind that any unilateral actions on the Caspian are devoid of legal basis, with all subsequent consequences.

The Ministry takes the opportunity to reassure the Embassy of its great respect.

3.38 Moscow's CIS Policy Changes Assessed

Valeriy Solovyev

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 9 February 1995 [FBIS
Translation]

Editor's Note: The following article gains its significance from its insights concerning Russian foreign policy shifts toward the CIS as a result of the Chechnya war. That war, says the author, has brought ambiguous results for Russia and especially for President Yeltsin. The key point here is that a failure with internal policy is very likely to produce a more aggressive external policy among Russia's policymakers, even though other CIS member states are likely to be much more wary of Russia's role in the CIS and may try to form "sub-alliances" that might act as counterweights to Russia's potential intervention in internal affairs.

In January the Russian leadership, which seemed to be occupied exclusively with the resolution of the Chechen problem, took a number of important steps in the sphere of integrating the post-Soviet space. Important agreements with Belarus and Kazakhstan are rather obvious. These concern, first, serious economic problems, which for Belarus are multiplied by its total dependence on the deliveries of energy sources from Russia; second, the presidents of these two countries ran into an acute internal political crisis, that in Kazakhstan is further aggravated by increased ethnic tensions.

However, while Aleksandr Lukashenka and Nursultan Nazarbaev are realizing their long-standing and continuously declared aspiration for a closer union with their neighbor, movement by Russia to meet them halfway was rather unexpected. In the course of the last half year, the Kremlin emphatically shunned the Belarusian leader, who continuously emphasized his readiness for the boldest unifying initiatives and urged Russia toward them, and it also repeatedly, in a crude way, rejected the Kazakhstan leader's global integration plan.

What had changed by January 1995? What circumstances obliged Russia sharply to accelerate integration activity? Is it possible to say that Russia is adopting a new strategy in the “near abroad,” or is this strictly a tactical maneuver?

The Political Context

Many analysts have predicted that the military operation in Chechnya will put an end to the prospects for reintegration of the post-Soviet space. But it is exactly the prolongation of the Chechnya “expedition,” which almost certainly was planned as a blitzkrieg, that is forcing the Russian leadership to compensate for the serious failure in internal policy with effective steps concerning foreign policy (what is meant is the “near abroad”). Especially since the growing caution of the West with respect to the possible drift of the Yeltsin regime in the direction of an authoritarian government and, accordingly, the prospect of worsening relations between Russia and the West, force the Kremlin to find a counterbalance to this event. It cannot be ruled out that the Russian leadership is sending the West a signal through its reintegration activeness: Continue to support us, or we will start to restore the destroyed empire. The latter is viewed by the West as one of the main threats to its key interests.

The desire to avoid an interpretation of the war as the beginning of a conflict of civilizations and the fear of ethnic and religious ruptures inside the country compel Russia to strive for a “special” relationship, specifically with the formerly Turkic-Islamic Kazakhstan. If it is assumed that the strategic union of Russia, Belarus, and Kazakhstan started to be formed in January 1995, then, according to its socio-cultural and ethnic-religious parameters, it is essentially different from the Belovezh Agreement—this is not a Slavic, but a Eurasian union.

Very important circumstances also exist that are not associated with Chechnya. In taking steps to meet Belarus halfway, the president is playing on getting ahead of parliament, which proposes to conduct a joint meeting of the Russian and Belarusian parliaments in March. In a broader sense, Yeltsin is strengthening his position before an examination in the Duma of the question concerning the denunciation of the Belovezh agreements (the anti-government opposition, after repeated attempts, succeeded in getting it on the agenda).

And, finally, it is possible that this is what is most important. It is likely that the acceleration of the reintegration processes constitutes the start of Yeltsin's preparations for the new presidential elections. Inasmuch as the question of the blame for the destruction of the USSR and the demand for reintegration will inevitably occupy a very important place in the course of the election campaign, then, by correcting the error of December 1991, the president of the Russian Federation knocks out the ground from under his actual critics and potential rivals.

The Military Strategic Factor

Since [the outbreak of conflict in] Chechnya, not only has the possibility of the expansion of the NATO bloc in an easterly direction increased significantly, but Russia's chances of preventing this have been reduced practically to zero. The threat of the appearance of NATO on the border of the former USSR provides Russia with an incentive to restore an integral defense infrastructure and to form a single military-strategic space. For the time being, only the first step has been taken in this direction-payment for the use of military bases and test ranges has been abolished-but the creation of combined armed forces under the aegis of Russia in the near future can already be seen.

Economic Motives

Agreements on a customs union and free trade without confiscations and restrictions will greatly promote the revival of the national industry of the three republics, although the effect of the implementation of these agreements for the Russian economy will obviously be ambiguous. On the one hand, Russia almost certainly will have to supply the noncompetitive and energy-intensive Belarusian enterprises with cheap energy sources. On the other hand, Russia has consolidated control over oil and gas pipelines and other communications that cross Belarus and that are strategically important to it, and it retains the right to duty-free transit for energy sources-Russia's main export resource-to Central and Western Europe. As for Kazakhstan, Russia guarantees its participation in the development of the rich oil of the Caspian shelf and gas deposits in Karashaganak. It appears that in this case the greatest gain is achieved by the Russian fuel and energy complex, which is steadily and consistently establishing its strategic control over the oil and gas wealth and the pipeline system in the post-Soviet space. The formation of a single market on the territory of the three republics will put the conclusion of a payments union between them on the agenda (an agreement on the mutual conversion of national currencies has already been signed). In view of the considerable stability and strength of the Russian ruble in comparison with the Belarusian zaichik and the Kazakhstan tenge, this will lead to the domination of the Russian monetary unit and the expansion of the incomparably stronger Russian financial capital. In a strategic perspective, Russia will not only tie the national economies of Belarus and Kazakhstan closer to itself (despite all the efforts of the latter to weaken or disrupt this dependence, they did not succeed), but it will ensure the actual domination of Russian capital in them.

Russian-Ukrainian Relations

The meeting of the Russian and Ukrainian presidents did not constitute a “breakthrough” in terms of reintegration, and there are weighty reasons for this. Although Ukraine is in a no less disastrous economic situation than Belarus and Kazakhstan, and Kuchma has begun a prolonged political squabble with the Ukrainian parliament, in mutual relations with Moscow, the free hand of the Ukrainian president is seriously restricted by the mood of Ukrainian society. Accelerating a union with the “Muscovites” will undoubtedly cause a tearing away of western Ukraine from authority, split Ukrainian society, and provoke a serious political crisis in the republic.

It is probable that Moscow will also be afraid of including Ukraine in a “trilateral agreement.” The economic costs of a close union with the latter look too demanding. It is one thing to supply cheap energy sources to a comparatively “small” Belarusian economy. It is another thing to keep afloat the inefficient and non-competitive Ukrainian industrial giant. The Russian locomotive can easily pull the Belarusian economy behind it, but will it also be able to pull the Ukrainian “coach”? And, indeed, to assist Belarus and Kazakhstan with the relative stabilization of their national currencies is far easier than to assist Ukraine.

However, integration tendencies are also growing in the Russo-Ukrainian relationship. The meeting of the managers of the Russian and Ukrainian border oblasts with the participation of the deputy prime ministers of both countries requires that their countries conclude a customs union. An agreement on the principles of trade and economic cooperation in 1995 proposes the establishment of Russo-Ukrainian oil refineries and timber processing complexes, the creation of joint financial groups and companies and transnational corporations, and also joint-stock facilities that represent a mutual interest in exchange for the delivery of Russian energy sources and the postponement of payment settlements for state credits. Ukraine is opening up somewhat to Russian financial expansion.

Russia's New Strategy?

Thus, the reintegration activity of Moscow in January 1995 is the result of a number of factors that are both situational, incited by the war in Chechnya, and strategic. Inasmuch as their combination is of a dynamic and unstable nature, it is difficult to come to an unequivocal conclusion about whether or not the new Kremlin policy will become consolidated.

However, if the "trilateral agreement" begins to be put into practice, then this will signify a cardinal revision of the conceptual principles of Russian policy in the post-Soviet space, and that we were dealing with complete improvisation and situational reactions. But, actually, it is not that important whether it was conscious or spontaneous; Russia maintained a strategy of isolation, although also not without some substantial vacillations and deviations. This policy was cloaked in CIS declarations, and it alternated with sporadic flare-ups of activity in the defense of Russian military-strategic interests.

Russia sent a signal in January about its readiness to shift from an isolation strategy to an integration strategy. This in itself is already an event of principal importance. But it is no less important to understand exactly what type of reintegration Russia intends to implement. Although reintegration undoubtedly carries mutual advantages, it is hardly possible to talk about a “union of equals” with respect to the post-Soviet space. By moving to integration and assuming a significant share of its economic and financial costs, Russia, as the “trilateral agreement” shows, will probably try to consolidate and intensify its objectively dominant position in the economic and military spheres. It will lock in and partially subordinate adjacent economies and national currencies to itself, and it will take control of the system of defense of allies. For the latter, this will mean the infringement of economic and partly political sovereignty. But they objectively have no other way out.

This will not be either a reanimation of the Soviet empire or the revival of the Russian empire. Russia has no need to erase state borders or to consolidate the state-political structures of the new independent states. The Russian ruble and Russian energy sources will successfully replace the general secretary of the Communist Party. This will be an empire of a “new” type, a “velvet” empire, that establishes itself on the financial-economic and military dependence of the post-Soviet republics on Russia and, owing to this, that ensures the political hegemony of Russia in the post-Soviet space. It looks as if it is exactly this kind of objective that the present Russian leadership is setting for itself, and that it is exactly this type of reintegration that it intends to strive for.

3.39 Lukin on the Dangers of Self-Determination

Segodnya, 17 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Vladimir Lukin's rationale for the dangers of self-determination are convincing and extremely pragmatic. Lukin, however, uses arguments against unleashing the nationalist feelings of every small ethnic minority group to imply that the CIS, without cultural, economic, and political integration administered by the dominant interest group (Russia), is unfeasible. The article ends up as a carefully crafted rationalization of the Great Power point of view in Russia, using modern history rather than Russian imperial tradition to support its line of reasoning. The article is important because it illustrates how widespread the support is within Russia for some version of a restoration of Russian dominance and power over the former Soviet space. By 1994-95 very few, if any, Russian intellectuals were extolling the virtues of a self-contained, democratic Russian state that respects above all the rights and sovereignty of other independent nations, as Andrey Kozyrev and Boris Yeltsin had in 1991.

What took place on the banks of the Sunzha was a terrible tragedy. Who can justify the present methods of resolving the Chechen conflict, the bloodshed on a mass scale, the innocent and the guilty amidst a sea of human suffering? But in this twilight of existence, in the ruins of the beautiful southern city, at least one serious factor arises, one problem on a truly global scale. Or rather-a dilemma: national self-determination or state unity.

Two visual images from my recent diplomatic experience come immediately to my mind. In the center of Philadelphia, among the narrow streets, like museum walls, there is a forgotten bell, erected over two hundred years ago, at the time of American independence (that is, separation from Britain, a stormy, bloody separation). And a grandiose monument, on the pediment of which it is written that the nation presented it to the person who preserved the unity of the country, towers majestically over the nation's capital, its thirty-six columns rising toward the heavens.

The Philadelphia bell and the Lincoln Monument embody the two main principles of today's international life-the principle of a nation's right to self-determination and the principle of preserving territorial wholeness. Both principles have their adherents, martyrs, and heroes. When one speaks of the United States, in the pantheon of national heroes over the Philadelphia insurgents—in the memory of the people and in the opinion of professional historians-one person towers mightily, a person in whose memory there will always be mass demonstrations by adherents of civil rights-a person who razed flourishing Atlanta to the ground for the sake of the country's unity.

In most recent history, both these principles are close neighbors, sometimes even in the same “political credo,” for example, in President Wilson's famous “Fourteen Points” (January 1918). The sixth point, dedicated to our country, speaks of the need to observe its territorial wholeness, of a “united and indivisible” Russia. The point dedicated to Austro-Hungary calls for realizing the rights of its peoples to self-determination. Closer to our era, in 1975, the countries of Europe and North America vowed, in the Helsinki Pact, to preserve the territorial status-quo, but fifteen years later they promoted the dividing up of the SFRYu [Socialist Federated Republic of Yugoslavia], the USSR and the ChSFR, into twenty-two new state formations.

True, the West did not immediately change its principles. Let us remember-back in the summer of 1991, President Bush, appearing in Kiev, called on Ukraine to preserve the unity. At that time, the United States declared its support of Yugoslavian unity. It took the Belovezh Forest tragedy and Germany's determined intervention (Slovenia and Croatia were recognized in that same December 1991) to make the West start swimming through the waves of the events and agree, “with hindsight,” to recognize the legitimacy of the rights to self-determination. Even today, however, it is best not to talk to the French about Corsica and Normandy, to the Spaniards about Catalonia and the Basque region, or to the English about Scotland and Wales. In conversations on this subject, bombastic Americans usually give a taciturn smile. General Sherman, with his “March to the Sea,” which singed the heart of the Southern states, closed this question for the United States.

This silence is understandable. In today’s world, in over three-fourths of the 180 existing states, there are minorities numbering over a million people. If all the minorities were to put into effect the principle of self-determination, especially to take it to the level of creating their own state, the world would turn into bedlam. We see reflections of this bedlam on television screens everyday, and in the current stormy decade they have become almost the main ferment of international life.

If we acknowledge, as before, that the latent value of both principles is “equivalent,” we risk falling into a minefield, with no end in sight. The question is quite difficult. Was the dismemberment of the former Yugoslavia worth a quarter of a million dead and several million refugees? Superimpose these proportions on our country, make the calculations, and it will turn out that we are just at the beginning of a tragedy that will lead straight to Armageddon!

Let us remember that the superseding of the principle of ethnic self-determination over the inviolability of borders by the last decade of the twentieth century was not restricted to the territories of Europe and the former Soviet Union. The process “proliferated,” on an even broader scale. For the first time in many years, the West came out as the initiator of dividing up states that it, strictly speaking, had created and recreated, and whose territorial wholeness it had long guarded. Ethiopia is possibly the most graphic example. After many years of discussing separatism in the world as a whole, and in Africa in particular (look, for example, at the attitude toward the attempts of Katanga to leave Zaire and of Biafra to leave Nigeria), the West, in 1993, sanctioned the division of Ethiopia. For the first time, it openly and even demonstratively violated the principle of territorial wholeness in favor of the principle of “proto-national” self-determination, even when the “self-determining nation” did not have the traditional prerequisites for a state (common history, territory, emotional-psychological community, etc.). Potentially, the appearance on the political world map of a former part of Ethiopia-Eritrea is an event of extraordinary significance for the future. The world will scarcely survive fragmentation to the level of the sovereign Andorra or Liechtenstein, to the level of the island-state of Nauru (9,300 inhabitants) in the Pacific Ocean. The example of Eritrea is before them, and the flow of arms from the industrial centers of the West and Eastern Europe to the world of ethnic hostility is only increasing. Eritrea is in its own way a symbol, and almost an invitation to the tribalist world to call forth the old gods. This is a very great threat, not only to the half-forgotten “new world order,” but also to creating any order in the system of international relations.

We must gather enough intellectual integrity and moral strength to pose in earnest the question of the cost of the process of self-determination for mankind and the main thing, for the individual. One gains the impression that, in 1992-93, the bewitched world, as if wavering from within, kept silent about the real price of self-determination for the inalienable and generally acknowledged rights of the individual. Only last year did the original shock begin to pass, and the problem of self-determination, of the human cost of this self-determination fall into the focus of public discussion. A certain euphoric lift slips away when nationalism has given world history such a particularly and unequivocally progressive turn. From tragic experience comes the realization that the triumph of the principle of self-determination over the constitutional-geopolitical foundation of statehood opens an enormous potential for conflicts. Orientation toward the principle of self-determination is fraught with selfdestruction for the world as a whole, for Europe in particular and especially for the unstably modernized Eastern Europe. One must obviously agree with the opinion of Lord Acton, that the principle of the universal right to national self-determination is a step backward in historical development. In today's world, movements that blindly pursue the goal of self-determination at any price undermine the potential for democratic development in the new independent countries and endanger the foundations of sovereignty of the people in democratic states. The time has come to deprive most of them of moral approval and see them for what they really are-a destructive force, drawing the world into the gloomiest eras of the past.

All economic theory calls for market expansion, and the national groups bursting for state self-determination are dooming themselves to progressive lagging behind. No less bleak is the cost of destroying the socio-psychological conditions that constitute the natural living environment of many generations. The destruction of this medium inevitably calls forth a crisis in morals, self-awareness, and culture. Does not true democracy demand variety, not the sacrificial likemindedness dictated by national intoxication? States that are thought up in someone's head, just like the "cerebral" dismemberment of state expanses into regions, are based on legitimizing the rights of groups and clan interests, to the detriment of the immemorial, basic rights of a person and a citizen. It was not for nothing that communist totalitarianism extolled this troglodytic-prehistoric right. In order to keep the world community from dashing off into the abyss of national frenzy, we should place the rights of the individual, of the citizen, above the rights of a group, a clan, a type, or a family given to fanaticism. At the same time, all the rights of national-cultural autonomy are naturally inviolable.

Integration, not national separation, protection of the rights of the individual, not sacrificially ancestral, ethnic romanticism, should be the basis when determining the political map of the world in a century of dissemination of nuclear weapons, partial paralysis of the United Nations, and the pressure of the local nationalist elite with mercenary interests, whose ideal is to have its own army and its own treasury, and not least, although it is laughable, its own international protocol “at full volume.” Not Lincoln’s principle: “A government of the people, by the people, and for the people.”

3.40 Importance of Russian Interests in “Near Abroad” Stressed

Sergey Kolchin

Mirovaya Ekonomika i Mezhdunarodnaya Otnosheniya, April 1995 [FBIS Translation]

[Article by Candidate of Economic Sciences Sergey Vsevolodovich Kolchin, head of the section on the “CIS States” at the Institute of International Economic and Political Research of the Russian Academy of Sciences.]

With the disintegration of the USSR in the early 1990s a fundamentally new geopolitical reality emerged in the post- Soviet space: Fifteen new independent states appeared. The rise of virtually all, with the exception of Baltic countries (relations with Baltic states are not examined within the framework of this article), and of the successor of the former Union-Russia-was due to the collapse of the USSR, not to the natural logic of their national state development.

The following are grounds for such a conclusion:

- the absence in a number of countries of historical traditions of independent development within the framework of national state formations. In recent history the experience in such a development is limited to several post-revolutionary years and not even in all of them;

- the lack of development of a political system (government institutions, political parties, and so forth). The state system, borders, and internal territorial division, basically, were inherited from former USSR republics, which, essentially, served as decorative formations within the framework of a single Union;
- the extremely high degree of integration of their economies into a single national economic complex and dependence on Russia. In the USSR in 1988 interrepublic trade made up 21 percent of the gross national product (in the European Community, 14 percent). Whereas Russia in isolation from other republics can ensure two-thirds of the production of the final product, for example, Azerbaijan, 31 percent, Kazakhstan, 27 percent, and Ukraine, 15 percent;
- the lack of development of indispensable institutions and functions of an independent state (army, foreign trade, personnel training, and so forth) and, instead of them, dependence on Russian potential.

Furthermore, the specific features of the present situation in the new states lies in the fact that representatives of the old national ruling elite, which was formed during the period of the USSR's existence, are in power in most of them. The brief stay of representatives of nationalist opposition movements in power (Z. Gamsakhurdia in Georgia and A. Elchibey in Azerbaijan) and the rapid collapse of their regimes only confirm this tendency. In reality, out of the present top leaders of the new independent states only Kyrgyzstan's president, A. Akaev, does not belong to the former nomenklatura, but he also experiences a strong pressure from it. A. Lukashenka, Belarus' first president, is also a new figure.

Whereas in these states the internal political situation has not changed greatly, marked shifts have occurred in the positions of the largest member of the commonwealth-Russia. For it the disintegration of the Union and the rise of new independent states signify a new and, more often, unfavorable combination of political, economic, social, and other factors.

On the geopolitical plane Russia has encountered the appearance on its borders of a whole group of states, which are quite unstable and by no means always conduct a pro- Russian policy. Thirteen ports on the Black Sea and five in the Baltic Sea have been lost. Russia is separated from Western Europe over a wide area by a double cordon of countries of the former Warsaw Treaty and former neighbors in the USSR.

In the military-political area the entire security system must be revised fundamentally. Facilities for early detection of enemy missiles remain in Latvia and Azerbaijan. Troop withdrawal from Eastern Europe was followed by a departure from Baltic states. Now the Moscow Military District has become a border district and the question is being raised of establishing a new military district in the west with headquarters in Smolensk.

In the economic sphere Russia, as before, is forced to carry the burden. On 1 June 1994 the total debt to Russia of countries in the "near abroad" totaled 3.241 billion rubles, of which Ukraine accounts for 54 percent, Belarus, 17 percent, and Kazakhstan, 15 percent. While mechanisms of former internal Union economic relations have been dismantled, new ones (of interstate relations) operate poorly.

In the social sphere the problem of Russians who now live in the new independent states has become acute. According to the 1989 census, almost 25.3 million Russians and more than 11 million people of other nationalities, who considered the Russian language their native tongue, lived outside the RSFSR.

There are also a number of other factors determining the need for Russia's special attention to states in the "near abroad" and for an active formation of its policy with respect to these countries.

Changes in Policy

Evaluating the change in the priorities of Russia's foreign policy, it may be said that the shift in the policy's center of gravity to states in the "near abroad" emerged in 1993- 94. In the official line and political debates more and more attention is paid to Russian interests in the space directly adjoining the country's borders.

In our opinion, the basic reasons for such a turn are the following:

1. Russia has begun to realize the change in its status in the geopolitical disposition of forces. "According to the state of socio-economic development," the scientific report of the Center for Foreign Political Research of the Institute of International Economic and Political Research of the Russian Academy of Sciences notes,

“Russia cannot be classified among the superpowers and at the present moment it does not need this status, which is beyond its power. It now copes with great difficulty even in the role of a great power, because it does not have the political, economic, and military resources necessary for this. Russia is not in a position to conduct a global foreign policy similar to that conducted by the former Soviet Union and to bear responsibility for global international security.”<sup>1</sup>

A more realistic approach predominates in the country’s foreign policy now. This is primarily an orientation toward problems directly affecting the situation in Russia, to which, undoubtedly, relations with neighbors in the post-Soviet space belong.

2. The course of events has confirmed that the “civilized divorce” with the former Union republics has not removed from the agenda the need for the development of an integral strategy for Russia’s relations with them, and for daily close attention to the situation in these countries. It affects the situation in Russia too severely. Furthermore, relations between Russia and these countries are more profound and vast than ordinary interstate relations. Russia remains the center of attraction in the post-Soviet space and not always in the positive sense. As, for example, RF Prime Minister V. Chernomyrdin notes, “Russia’s territory seemingly has become a vacuum cleaner, which absorbs everything that is bad: the drug business and arms smuggling-things that, previously, we never heard about.” 2

3. Matters concerning relations with neighbors and the protection of Russian interests and rights of compatriots in the new independent states have become a trump card played by various opposition powers and forces in Russia itself. Having overlooked these matters at one time, the official leadership (the president, the government, and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs) is forced to make up for the lag, restoring their image of defenders of Russian interests. The population’s natural dissatisfaction with the crisis situation in the country is channeled by the opposition into criticism of the “anti-popular” and “treacherous” policy of the authorities.

The concept of “Russia’s national or special interests,” the zone of which is called the “near abroad,” has appeared and has become firmly established in the official political vocabulary. This term itself was borrowed from the Americans, who used it widely, including in the well-known “Monroe Doctrine.” During the time of the USSR officials did not use the concept of “national interests,” because Marxist dogmas affirmed the principle of internationalism and the primacy of class interests. During the later Gorbachev period the theme of “a return to general human values” was put in the forefront of Soviet policy. Now the time has come for Russia to become aware of and to protect its national state interests.

In February 1993 Russia’s President B. Yeltsin put forward the proposal that the United Nations and other international organizations give Russia a mandate for the performance of activity in the sphere of its interests in the territory of the former USSR. It was a matter of the conduct of peacemaking operations, rendering of humanitarian assistance in zones of conflicts, protection of ethnic Russians, and political settlement through Russian mediation. Russia’s military doctrine published in November 1993 stresses that the geopolitical space of the former USSR (with the exception of Baltic countries) is the zone of Russia’s vital interests and special responsibility. The program speech by the RF minister of foreign affairs A. Kozyrev at a conference of Russia’s ambassadors to CIS and Baltic countries in January 1994 noted the following: “This is where Russia’s vital top priority interests are concentrated. The main threats to these interests also originate there.”

Finally, the February (1994) message by the RF president “On Strengthening the Russian State” openly points out that a “consistent advancement of national interests through openness and cooperation and ensuring favorable conditions for internal development and the continuation of reforms are the main goals of the policy of the Russian state in 1994.” It points out that the CIS is the “sphere of special responsibility and special mutual interests of Russia and its neighbors.”<sup>4</sup> Let us pay attention to the fact that the president talks about “mutual interests,” softening the sharpness of the statement by the minister of foreign affairs.

Attempts at theoretically substantiating Russia’s special role and responsibility in the post-Soviet space have been made. Such a substantiation of the distinctive “Russian Monroe Doctrine” is presented in an especially clear manner in articles and speeches by A. Migranyan, member of the RF Presidential Council.<sup>5</sup> At the same time, whereas the matter of the content and nature of Russian national interests in relations with CIS countries is debated, the very fact of the existence of such interests is essentially not called into question. The authors of the cited report note the following: “States of the so-called ‘near abroad’ represent a priority zone for safeguarding Russia’s national security and, therefore, an all-around development of cooperation with them, a study of the socio-political and economic processes occurring in them, and an effect on them, with due regard for Russia’s interests, represent the most important task of Russian foreign policy.”<sup>6</sup>

On the whole, Russia’s vital interests in the “near abroad” can be reduced to three fundamental concepts: security, stability, and cooperation. The main goals of Russian foreign policy with regard to the new independent states are also determined on the basis of this. In the most concentrated form these goals are indicated in the basic provisions of the concept of Russia's foreign policy approved by the RF Security Council in April 1993. The organization of stable positive mutual relations with countries of the "near abroad" was declared the main content of Russia's foreign policy and the prerequisite for its preservation as a great world power. The actions aimed at undermining integration processes in the CIS were included among the main political threats and challenges to Russia's security. The protection of the rights and interests of national minorities representatives of RF nations in countries of the former USSR-was considered one of Russia's vitally important interests. 7

Reaction in the West

Russia's efforts to reach these goals in relations with CIS states encountered quite a contradictory reaction in the West.

On the whole, a negative, guarded attitude toward Russia's role in the post-Soviet space predominates there. In the most concentrated form this was expressed by Z. Brzezinski, former U.S. national security adviser. 8 There were also many other similar comments on the part of officials and experts. For example, A. Juppé, France's minister of foreign affairs, stressed that "little by little Russians are beginning to lay their hands on everything in the entire territory of the former Union." In an interview with the newspaper Croix he noted the following: "It is possible to understand that Russia is interested in what is happening around it and that, undoubtedly, it must play a special role in what today is called the CIS. However, it does not at all follow from this that it can do this as it wishes. Russia is not destined to play the role of a gendarme in all azimuths."

In the opinion of the newspaper Segodnya, "Russia's policy with respect to the 'near abroad' has recently evoked concern on the part of Western countries, including Germany. Recognizing the legitimacy of Russian interests in the CIS, the West is trying to prevent the 'reimperialization' of Moscow's foreign policy." 9 True, other signals are also received from the West. I will mention the well-known statement by President Clinton that the United States would not object to the unification of former USSR republics provided there is voluntary participation and a free expression of the people's will. In our opinion, the West's apprehensions regarding "Russia's imperial aspirations" do not correspond to the real state of affairs.

Having taken the course of restraining Russia in the post-Soviet space, the West should have in mind a number of basic factors. The post-Soviet space is a special kind of space, and such unconventional criteria or clichés as “empire” are hardly applicable to it. Russian national outlying districts nearly always lived better than the “metropolitan country,” receiving dividends from the exploitation of Russian resources.

Russia continues to carry the heavy burden of assistance to neighbors in economic and military areas. The West’s opposition can lead to the fact that it will have to assume this burden. Furthermore, the regimes in the present CIS republics cannot be called regimes conducting a more democratic and market-based policy than Russia. Russia’s displacement from the post-Soviet space will create a vacuum, which countries in no way belonging to Western democracies (for example, Iran and China) will be able to fill quickly.

Thus, if the preservation of stability in the region and support for positive transformations, not the suppression of the former enemy and competitor, are the real goals of the West’s policy with regard to Russia and its neighbors from the CIS, this policy should rather promote, not counteract, Russia’s efforts in its attempts to somehow cement the disintegrating post-Soviet space.

Policy Priorities

Whereas Russia’s geopolitical interests and the goals of its policy in the “near abroad” have been defined, each of the spheres of state activity (military, social, economic, and so forth) has its own specific nature requiring a more detailed examination. Defense and security, humanitarian (ethno-social) interests and the protection of citizens' rights, and the economy and interstate economic relations are the basic groups of interests and policy directions.

Defense and security. Despite the fact that with the end of the cold war the general international climate around Russia has improved and the danger of large-scale armed conflicts has declined, with the disintegration of the Warsaw Treaty Organization and then of the USSR the status of the security and defense of the Russian state arouses serious apprehensions. NATO continues to exist and even Russia's entry into partnership relations with the bloc does not signify complete harmony of the parties' military interests. In particular, the scenarios of probable conflicts developed in NATO headquarters attest to this.

One of them is presented in the newspaper Vek: "An authoritarian government, which immediately begins to intimidate small republics of the former USSR under the pretext of observance of the rights of Russians scattered over all CIS states, comes to power in Russia. Thus, Moscow, with the support of Minsk, demands that Baltic states grant autonomy to Russians. During one and a half to two months, tension increases steadily. Then eighteen Russian divisions with the support of six Belarusian ones will strike a blow along the Polish-Lithuanian border. Lithuania will turn to NATO for help, which at first will deploy 'rapid reaction forces' and then eighteen divisions and sixty-six tactical air squadrons in Poland. In ninety days Western countries will gain the upper hand." 10 Such is scenario No. 7 from the report by the U.S. secretary of defense.

The disintegration of the USSR also signified the breakup of the entire defense system created over decades. Its disorganization and the loss of key infrastructure facilities signify a marked weakening of Russia's military security. Furthermore, the burden of peacemaking operations in the CIS is placed on its armed forces. Under these conditions it is possible to understand Russia's intensified activity regarding the preservation of its military presence in CIS countries, formation of a collective security system, and border protection....

At the same time, the establishment or preservation of Russian military bases must not contradict the norms of international law and must be carried out with the consent of states. The practice of direct or indirect pressure on countries not interested in Russian bases in their territory must be eliminated. The interests of CIS countries in this matter are different. This is exemplified by the Transcaucasus, where in Armenia and Georgia Russian presence receives the support of the republic leadership, and in Azerbaijan, does not. At the same time, Russia is disturbed by the prospects for the appearance of troops of third countries there (for example, the statement by Turkey's minister of defense on readiness to send troops to Azerbaijan indicates such a possibility).

According to press data, the presence of twenty-eight Russian military bases in the new independent states is anticipated.”<sup>11</sup> In the course of the visit by the RF defense minister Grachev agreements were reached on this point with Armenia and Georgia....

The problem of safeguarding security in the territory of the former Union is not confined to Russia's military presence. A joint protection of commonwealth borders is an important task. After the disintegration of the USSR Russia received more than 11,000 kilometers of new land borders, while border troops lost up to 40 percent of the military potential, equipped stationing locations, and the necessary infrastructure. Judging by the latest reports, CIS states reached an agreement in the matter of the joint protection of former borders without the introduction of a standard border regime in Russia's new frontiers. The question of the Russian-Azerbaijani border remains open for now (in practice, the border between Azerbaijan and Iran is open and is not protected by Russian border guards).

The adoption of the concept of collective security can solve the entire set of problems connected with safeguarding the interests of CIS members with respect to defense and security. The meeting of CIS ministers of defense in July 1994 resulted in the preparation of the text of the concept for subsequent initialing and examination at the meeting of heads of states. The establishment of regional subsystems was envisaged: East-European (Belarus, Kaliningrad Oblast, and western RF oblasts) with a tentative center in Minsk, Caucasian (Transcaucasian republics and the North Caucasian Region of the RF) with a center in Rostov, Central Asian with a center in Tashkent, and East Asian (Siberia, the Far East of the RF, and eastern oblasts of Kazakhstan). Participation in regional subsystems states that did not sign the 1992 Tashkent Treaty on Collective Security of CIS Countries, that is, Ukraine, Moldova, and Turkmenistan, is anticipated. 12

Humanitarian interests and protection of citizens' rights. The situation of ethnic Russians living in former USSR republics has become one of the most acute problems of Russia's mutual relations with these republics. After the dismemberment of the formerly common Russian ethnic space, a large number of Russians in the "near abroad" have turned into second-class citizens or into stateless persons. Displacement of Russians from former Soviet republics is taking place. In Russia itself the "Russian problem" has become a factor in the internal political struggle. 13

The acuteness of this problem cannot fail to worry the Russian leadership. The above-mentioned presidential message stresses especially: "Russians' interests in CIS and Baltic countries will be safeguarded only if internationally recognized standards in the area of human and national minority rights are observed throughout the space of the former USSR. "14

At the same time, negative tendencies in the outflow of ethnic Russians from the new independent states predominate for now. In Russia by now there are more than 2 million refugees, forced resettlers, and so-called economic migrants. Experts at the Center for Economic Conditions and Forecasting under the RF government estimate the minimum influx of those seeking refuge in our country in 1994-96 at 800,000 people and the maximum at 4 to 6 million.<sup>15</sup>

Naturally, such an influx is a heavy burden on the Russian economy and complicates the social situation where there has been the most active influx of migrants. Russia is preparing a program for the protection of the interests and support of ethnic Russians living outside the RF. According to the latest reports, the program is ready and an edict putting it into effect is expected.

In the opinion of the RF Federal Migration Service, negative tendencies in the interrepublic migration within the framework of the CIS are connected with the general socioeconomic crisis, with the lack of legal protection for persons of non-indigenous nationality, with the incompleteness of the process of state “demarcation” of countries of the “near abroad” and the weak integration activity in them, with the continuation of the political struggle, in which the “national card” is played actively and the stereotype of enemies as represented by the non-indigenous population, which provokes its immigration, is formed persistently, and with the enhancement of the role of religion in the life of society, which is accompanied by the emergence of interconfessional conflicts.

To this we will add direct armed conflicts in the CIS. More than 500,000 forced resettlers (141,000 from Tajikistan, 86,000 from Georgia, and 82,000 from Azerbaijan) arrived in Russia by the middle of 1994.

In Russia's relations with CIS countries in the area of the population's interstate migration the following basic groups of countries are singled out:

1. Azerbaijan, Tajikistan, Georgia, and Moldova, where military operations are conducted and the outflow of speakers of the Russian language is especially intensive.
2. Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, where the outflow is going on, despite official statements on the lack of a problem.

3. Kyrgyzstan and Turkmenistan, where migration is growing mainly as the consequence of the deteriorating economic conditions of life for the Russian population and, in part, owing to domestic nationalism and the lack of knowledge of the language. There is readiness on the part of a number of countries to sign an agreement on dual citizenship (which has already been signed with Turkmenistan).

4. Belarus, Ukraine, and Armenia, where there are no signs of a discriminatory policy with respect to Russians and the outflow occurs for purely economic reasons.

Under these conditions among ethnic Russians in the CIS the following alternative behaviors are possible: an attempt at assimilation, despite the sharp decline in the social status; expectation of Russia's support (legal, cultural, social, and so forth); return to the historical homeland or emigration; fight for a reunification with Russia.

Obviously, all four alternatives will be combined in practice and precisely such a sensible combination corresponds to Russia's interests. Every relatively taken alternative is associated with negative consequences.

Economy and interstate cooperation. In accordance with the basic gradation of advocates of the economic course into "statists" and "followers of the market" evaluations of the tasks of and prospects for Russia's mutual relations with countries of the "near abroad" also differ. The former focus attention on losses and damages from the rupture of previous economic relations, concluding from this the inevitability of reintegration. They usually cite figures and arguments to the effect that, according to the data of the intersectorial balance, Russia imported products of 102 sectors and exported products of 104 sectors, that it met 23 percent of the needs for machine-building products and one-third of the needs for metallurgical products through import from other Union republics, that the main raw-material base of Russia's nonferrous metallurgy remained in the territory of other CIS countries, and so forth.... 16

Their opponents draw attention to the heavy burden of the economic patronage with respect to the CIS republics for Russia. The figure of the hidden subsidization of these republics in 1992-$17 billion-is well known. Furthermore, they point to the different direction of the courses of economic reforms in CIS countries and Russia, the existing inefficiency of management in neighbors, and non-equivalent conditions of the interstate exchange. As the report of the institute headed by E. Gaydar notes, the "close economic integration among the former Union republics will be directed in large measure toward an exchange of goods not competitive on the world market, reviving the autarkic type of national economies similar to the national economy of the former USSR." 17

Unfortunately, in both cases only one aspect of the problem of economic interaction within the framework of the CIS is singled out, although quite correctly. On this basis, in accordance with the authors' ideological biases, conclusions are drawn on the correspondence or non-correspondence of the integration with neighbors to Russia's economic interests. There is no overall unbiased analysis or computation of specific economic effects, including indirect consequences. After all, even activities in the post-Soviet space not related directly to economic interests have consequences for Russia's economy. For example, the conclusions and recommendations of the State Duma based on the results of parliamentary hearings "On the Rise of the CIS and Its Present State and Development" (July 1994) note that the establishment of new borders will cost Russia 1 billion rubles per kilometer and in the number of the customs personnel (35,000 people) it has already outstripped the United States twice. 18

Present interests and opportunities in the sphere of the economy and strategic interests and objectives should be differentiated. For example, the treaty on the economic union with Belarus, sharply criticized by pragmatists, which portends appreciable losses for Russia at the present moment, is capable, from the strategic point of view, of significantly improving its situation (outlet to western borders, access to markets, stability of Russia's western frontiers, and so forth)...

Without this, the very observance of Russia's national economic interests is unrealistic. The losses of the Russian treasury alone from non-registered export-import operations carried out through transparent borders with CIS countries amount to billions of dollars.

It is also necessary to decide what industries and commodity markets in neighboring countries are of real interest to Russia and to take specific measures to support and develop them. General talks about a common market and the restoration of economic ties should be transferred to the plane of specific, economically substantiated decisions.

Russia cannot be interested in the existence of an economic calamity zone as represented by the former Union republics. Therefore, definite assistance for them is unavoidable in the very near future. However, Russia, itself being in the most serious economic crisis, should be most attentive to the efficiency of this assistance and seek maximum opportunities for a reciprocal satisfaction of its economic and social needs.

Specific Nature of Russian Interests and Policy

Russia-Ukraine. Ukraine-the largest of the republics of the former Union-undoubtedly is the most important in the post-Soviet space. It was the one that initiated the disintegration process in the USSR. Within the framework of the CIS,

Ukraine takes a special position on most questions, and Russian-Ukrainian relations, perhaps, have been the most complex in relations among CIS countries. Not long ago Russian experts noted the following: "Kiev's present policy is directed toward creating within the CIS and Eastern Europe a counterweight to Russia's influence in order to isolate it geopolitically." 19

Problems of nuclear weapons, the Black Sea Fleet, and the Crimea are the most acute problems in bilateral relations. The first two relate to defense and security and seriously complicate the general climate in the CIS. In the opinion of many experts, the problem of the Black Sea Fleet is not so much military as political.

The Crimean question represents a headache for both powers. Objectively, it is difficult to consider Crimea an age-old Ukrainian territory-it became a part of it only in 1954. Russia's support for Crimean separatism also threatens to aggravate similar processes in its territory, and a military conflict with Ukraine.

Presidential elections in Ukraine, on the whole, have softened Russian-Ukrainian contradictions. The new leadership triumvirate (Kuchma- Moroz-Mosol) has often declared its aspiration to restore normal relations with Russia, although to interpret L. Kuchma's victory as the success of the pro-Moscow lobby is a simplification. The new president is forced to take the entire range of political forces in the country into consideration in his policy.

Fortunately, serious interethnic contradictions between Ukraine and Russia have not been observed. It is paradoxical, but regions with a large share of the Russian population, which supported L. Kuchma, are by no means the zone of Russian economic interests. The Donets Coal Basin and East and South Ukraine are saturated with non-competitive industries and potential unemployment. Russia is in no way interested in Ukraine's disintegration, or in including these economic crisis regions in its budget.

The specific nature of Russia's and Ukraine's economic interests lies in the fact that oil and gas pipelines to the West pass through Ukraine, which it has often used to its advantage. Ukrainian ports on the Black Sea, which handle large export and import flows, are also of considerable interest to Russia. Recently, Ukraine's role as a source of cheap manpower for Russian enterprises has intensified. Undoubtedly, it is still early to talk about a fundamental change in the climate in Russian-Ukrainian relations, but prospects for their development are more favorable now than under L. Kravchuk.

Russia-Belarus. In an environment of acute Russian-Ukrainian contradictions, Belarus played the role of a distinct counterweight to Ukraine. Here the traditions of the union with Russia are quite strong and stable, nationalist forces do not enjoy wide support (Z. Poznyak, leader of the Popular Front, picked up only 13 percent of the votes during presidential elections), and 58 percent of the Belarusians unequivocally came out in favor of an economic union with Russia. After the presidential victories of L. Kuchma in Ukraine and of A. Lukashenka in Belarus, its previous significance for Russia may abate. In any case, Belarus can hardly be viewed in economic terms as a superfluous load for Russia. Objective interests in strengthening relations remain, and specific prospects depend on the coordinated efforts of both sides to strengthen economic interaction. It should be noted that even after the change in leadership, Belarus outweighs other republics in the importance of its bilateral economic relations with Russia.

Russia-Transcaucasus. The main principle of Russia's policy in the Caucasus was formulated as far back as tsarist times: "Russia in the Caucasus has no eternal friends or eternal enemies, it has only eternal interests." A. Kozyrev, Russia's minister of foreign affairs, confirmed this old principle to a certain extent in an interview with the magazine Stern: "We cannot leave this region so simply. We have historical and geopolitical interests here."

Security is Russia's main interest in the Caucasus. The military conflicts occurring in the territory of all three republics make the situation in the region extremely explosive. A tangle of inveterate problems has emerged here. A stream of refugees, weapons, and criminal activity constantly flows from this region to Russia.

On the economic plane Russia is interested in exporting Azerbaijani oil abroad, and is striving to retain its control. Armenia occupies a special place. Several recently signed agreements (on diamond processing and so forth) attest to good prospects for the joining of Russian raw-material resources and Armenia's skilled manpower.

Russia-Central Asia. The Central Asian region, which is quite dissimilar in a number of ways, is of special interest to Russia, first of all, from the standpoint of security. This problem is connected primarily with Tajikistan, where there is a great probability of a repetition of the Afghan events. If Russia withdraws, the country's disintegration, transfer of Islamic fundamentalism to the territory of neighboring republics, and a sharp negative change in the balance of power from Russia's viewpoint are quite possible here.

The problem of displaced ethnic Russians from the former Central Asian republics and Kazakhstan is no less serious. Even in such a relatively calm republic as Kazakhstan the outflow of the population into Russia amounted to 200,000 people in 1993. Russia, which is now not going through the best of times, is vitally interested in stopping this negative process.

On the economic plane Russia pays attention to the problem of exporting energy resources from Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, which is strategically important to Russia. As E. Pain, member of the RF Presidential Council notes, “attempts by Russia’s quite influential political and economic groups to counteract the plans for the transportation of Kazakh and Azerbaijani oil through Turkey and the conclusion of agreements between Kazakhstan, Azerbaijan, and Western companies on the development of oil fields, were a factor in the artificial restriction of the independence of a number of CIS states and in pressure put on them to reintegrate.” 20

During the period following the disintegration of the USSR the special role of the “near abroad” for Russia’s state interests and its direct effect on the situation in the country were determined objectively. Despite recognition of this fact, the official political line of Russia’s leadership is still being formed, is quite unstable, and is subject to momentary changes....

The solution of the Chechen problem by force introduces new elements into Russia’s relations with neighboring republics. On the one hand, it causes natural concern over the aggressive actions of the Russian leadership. Ukraine’s expresident, L. Kravchuk, predicts an intensification of imperial ambitions in Russia’s policy in the “near abroad.” On the other hand, the position of official authorities in CIS countries on the Chechen problem is very cautious. Similar examples of regional and national separatism exist in many of them. (The Dniester region in Moldova, Abkhazia in Georgia, Crimea in Ukraine, northern oblasts in Kazakhstan, and so forth). Russia's actions in Chechnya intensify the temptation to adopt similar measures in order to suppress these separatists and in any event create an additional precedent for solution by force of internal state problems in the post-Soviet space.

At the same time, the Chechen crisis, obviously, has also illuminated the inefficiency and hopelessness of such military solutions. The lack of public support for them, huge costs for the economy, which is weak as it is, and unprofessional actions by power structures should serve as a warning both for the enthusiasts of the dissemination of the "Russian experience" in CIS countries and for Russia itself in its policy in the "near abroad." One would like to hope that these lessons will cause a transition from political demarches and rash decisions to laborious and very necessary work on the organization of economic interaction and normalization of the social situation in the territory of the former Soviet Union.

3.41 Chernishev on Caspian Demarcation and the Transcaucasus

Interview by Lusik Ghukasyan

AZG (Yerevan), 29 April 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: To an overwhelming extent, the strategic economic arguments for controlling energy resources and their export routes underlie the pragmatic viewpoint for a restoration of "Great Power" Russia. Russian nationalist ambitions are uncompromising on the Caspian Sea, exports of Kazakh and Uzbek oil and gas, and Chechen oil. The pursuit of these interests poises Russia for conflict not only with the energy-producing CIS states but also potentially with Western countries that have economic interests in contributing to the development of these rich energy deposits. The "great game," or the contest for the resources of Transcaucasus and Central Asia, has started all over again and will be a key determinant in the politics of these regions for at least the next decade. Russia has a great many sources of bilateral economic and military leverage over the states of the Transcaucasus and Central Asia, and as pointed out in the following example of pragmatic nationalist thinking, its leaders will resort to any measures they consider necessary to protect their interests.

The following article is also important for its "internal market” rationale for a reintegration of former Soviet republics. The twenty-first century will be a scramble for markets, and Chernishev correctly points out the advantages to Russia of having ready-made markets for its goods within the former Soviet space, where it will have a competitive edge for some time.

[Interview with Albert Chernishev, deputy foreign minister of the Russian Federation, by AZG correspondent Lusik Ghukasyan in Moscow.]

According to a report by the IRNA [Islamic Republic News Agency], these days representatives of the five states bordering the Caspian Sea—Russia, Iran, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and Azerbaijan—are discussing issues related to the protection of the environment and the utilization of Caspian resources.

[Ghukasyan]: Mr. Chernishev, recently, Azeri president (Geydar) Aliyev and Turkish prime minister Tansu Ciller signed an agreement whereby Turkey was given an additional share in the consortium for the development of Caspian oil. What is your position on that accord?

[Chernishev]: Our position is that those who own that oil can extract it, and if they do not have sufficient funds to do it then they can form consortia. Clearly, each of the sides has certain rights that it can exercise on its own or that can be transferred to anyone else. Therefore, in principle, we do not object to the fact that Azerbaijan has transferred 6.25 percent of the consortium [to Turkey], especially since the dominant role in the consortium is played not by Turkish but American, British, and French firms. Russia’s Lukoil company also has a substantial share: 10 percent. Iran has lost the share given to it by Azerbaijan as a result of Western pressure. However, we reject the contention that the oil will be extracted from Azeri shoals. The truth is that some of these fields are in the deeper portions of the sea and so far from the [Azeri] shore that the Turkmen are saying that it is their territory, not the Azeris'. Therefore, this or that oil-bearing zone cannot be declared the property of one country or another without a prior agreement. We do not object to the main agreement, but such an agreement cannot say that the fields in question belong to a certain state because that immediately becomes a subject of dispute. We have stated this to the Azeris quite candidly and firmly. It must be noted that during the Soviet period, as in all countries, some resources were taken and utilized but some were reserved for the future. Today because of severe economic conditions, the Caspian states have turned their eyes on this oil and are rushing to exploit it.

[Ghukasyan]: In your opinion how should the Caspian Sea be shared? What criteria must be used? Where does the issue of settling the status of the Caspian Sea stand?

[Chernishev]: As you know, there is an international Law of the Sea treaty that defines certain parameters of sea rights. However, there are no standards for sharing the Caspian Sea because, strictly speaking, it is a lake. In this matter much depends not on the international community but on how the five states resolve their differences with one another. There are precedents such as Lake Chad, Lake Victoria, the Great Lakes, and so forth. In all those cases the states concerned have established special conditions. We have still not reached a mutual understanding with the other states in order to do something about the disputes over the status of the sea. There are big differences [between the sides], with proposals ranging from a simple partition to leaving everything as it is. Our starting point is that this is common property and that an agreement is necessary on the joint utilization of these resources so that everyone can benefit. On this point, Iran stands close to our position for the moment. Turkmenistan and Kazakhstan prefer centralization [as published], while Azerbaijan clearly favors partition and taking possession of a portion of the sea. At present the status of the sea is defined by two treaties signed between the Soviet Union and Iran, in 1921 and 1940. It is understandable that a new status is needed now, but as long as a new status does not exist and we have not reached a new accord, the provisions of the old agreement, though imperfect, cannot be disregarded.

[Ghukasyan]: In a recent speech you said that if developments on the issue of Caspian oil take a course that is objectionable to Russia, then Russia would be prepared to use all means of pressure at its disposal. What are those means?

[Chernishev]: Obviously when a country defends its interests it tries to show what it has. No, this is not a threat. When they tread upon our interests we must defend ourselves. However, we must also understand the interests of others. If some parties do not understand our interests or how they are linked to other interests, we can find various means of applying political and economic pressure. For example, how can anyone sail out of the Caspian Sea? One can reach the Black Sea through the Volga River or the Volga-Don canal. We are not saying that we will begin to apply pressure immediately. But if you behave that way and do not take into account our interests or welfare, we will think about how we will behave toward you. We are prepared to take into account your interests and welfare, but let us agree on that. We must think about how everyone can benefit and profit without sacrificing our own interests. Then we can open the gates to the foreigners-the Americans or the British.

[Ghukasyan]: Does Russia have a blueprint for its interests in the Transcaucasus, or is that in its formative stages?

[Cherishev]: When reference is made to a blueprint or a formulated set of interests one should not interpret that as a document that was put together, say, in 1991, and that we act in accordance with that document. As a professional I know that a blueprint may be good for today but not a few days later. Regarding the Caucasus, our interest is the following: We must work on the security of the region jointly with other countries. The issue is not so much our military bases as the need for these countries to feel secure about their defenses. Those countries have inadequate armed forces-that is, for example they may have many soldiers but no air defenses, and that is no security [sentence as published]. However, security also has political and economic dimensions. The military bases constitute only one of many elements. Those bases and the joint defense of borders are essential at some stage. We have sustained enormous political, economic, and other costs because of the transparency of many borders. The reason for the economic cost is that we are so tied to each other that any break in ties may mean the annihilation of entire branches of industry.

[Ghukasyan]: That has already happened.

[Cherishev]: Yes. Perhaps not completely but largely. Had the Soviet Union been a federal state, at least formally, then its economy would have stayed unitary. In my opinion we have gone too far in terms of division. From this perspective, Western nations are setting an example for us by forming unions, the level of which has already reached 50 percent. In the Soviet Union that level stood at 80 percent. It could have dropped to 50 percent. Why was it necessary to go further? We were used to each other. Besides, our not so high-technology goods are needed only in those republics, and their products are needed in Russia. With their goods we do not need to go to outside markets. In any event, even with high-technology goods outside markets would not let us in because the markets are already parceled out.

[Ghukasyan]: One very important question is: What route will the new oil pipeline take to reach the West? Many observers see links between that question and the political developments in the region. What do you think?

[Cherishev]: On the issue of building a pipeline there are two factors that are important for Russia: economic feasibility and political realities.

If there is a war in that region then the pipeline cannot be built. It may be possible to build one only after peace is established. In addition, oil is needed to build a pipeline. At present that oil does not exist, and in that sense perhaps we are only theorizing. According to our information, estimates, and intelligence, even Westerners think that a pipeline cannot be built before 2000 to 2005 because money needs to be obtained first. For the time being it is necessary to use and expand what already exists. Thus Russia has said that it is possible to talk about where the oil will go, but since at present it is not flowing, Russia's existing facilities can be used.

[Ghukasyan]: What facilities did you have in mind?

[Chernishev]: It is possible to connect with our pipeline and deliver the oil to the West. The oil can also be transported by tankers. For the initial period we are proposing that they use partly the pipeline going to the West and partly the pipeline that ends in Novorossiysk. That [port] is relatively small. Certain investments are needed to build the necessary storage facilities there. However, this option can be met in the next two to five years while plans are developed for a new pipeline.

I understand the Turks very well. They want the oil to go through their country. They have excellent modern storage facilities at Yumurtalik, which, in the past, was used for Iraqi oil. Today there is no Iraqi oil flowing, and that facility is idle. Very well, that option can also be used, but how can we get to that point?

[Ghukasyan]: Via Armenia.

[Chernishev]: We are not excluding that option, nor are we saying only via Armenia. The pipeline can pass through Iran, but Westerners do not want that because of political considerations. The oil should pass wherever it is most favorable economically and feasible politically.

[Ghukasyan]: Do you think that a Russian military base in Armenia would contribute to the security of the oil pipeline if it passes through Armenia?

[Chernishev]: That issue was not taken into consideration when the bases were being planned. The objective for the bases was different: to ensure the security of the region and a certain balance of forces. In one sense the base by itself does not solve general security problems. It only signals that if something unexpected happens then certain agreements or provisions take effect. It should not be viewed in an absolute sense. It is rather a symbol, though a very important one.

[Ghukasyan]: Here is what I wanted to clarify. As is known, Russia is interested in having the oil pipeline pass through its territory. On the other hand there is an economically more favorable route that passes through Armenia. However, the situation on that route is unstable. According to your remarks, the oil must not go through that route as long as there is instability. Now, is not Russia interested in the stability of the region by acting as a peacemaker and mediator to settle conflicts in the region? Could you please clarify this situation?

[Chernishev]: The truth is that at the beginning they wanted Russia to withdraw from everywhere, physically as well as politically and psychologically, because we were seen as symbolizing the Soviet Union and imperialist Russia. Although it was insulting, that happened to some extent. I believe that we went too far on this issue.

Let me say candidly that all relatively small states, especially those that face chaos and especially war or crisis, always need the help of someone from outside. Their gazes turned to Europe and the United States, but apparently they did not find anything there. Nobody took this task to heart as much as Russia did-nor will anyone ever do so-because they question what they gain by getting involved in some conflict. As they say, this is a case where “it costs one ruble to get in, two to get out.”

Troubled by our initial expulsion, we took the following position. Now you are inviting us in, but we are sorry. Please do not ask for what we could give you in the past through the Soviet format. Now you are independent and distinct, and we are sorry to say that we must comply with certain principles. All these issues are being gradually settled. Relations are being clarified on the basis of mutual understanding and interdependence, and these will become more tangible in the future in a positive sense. That is why we are engaged in mediation missions in conflicts in Abkhazia, Karabakh, and Tajikistan. Unfortunately mediation is, to put it lightly, a very thankless task. It is a noble but thankless task.

[Ghukasyan]: What are the reasons for the OSCE's involvement in the settlement of the Karabakh problem and the active posture it has displayed recently?

[Chernishev]: Initially there was a noticeable intent to drive Russia out of the mediation process. The objective was the following: Russia must not be allowed to establish itself and express its interests in that region. Our position, on the other hand, is this: If you want to help and are genuinely capable to do so then you can participate in a realistic and concrete manner. But if you want just to stand on the sidelines and tell someone else what to do without getting too deeply involved then you should not mediate.

In this case Russia (I do not wish to speak about the other sides) agreed that the OSCE participate on the same basis and contribute to the settlement of the problem. There was a time when there were misunderstandings on their part and suspicions on ours. However, eventually we were able to iron out our differences. In Budapest we came to an agreement that this would be an OSCE operation and that it would have two copresidents. That is very good. Now let us begin to work, and let us work such that we do not step on each other's feet. Now Sweden is being replaced by Finland as one of the copresidents, and we need to work with them well. The Swedes have been there for a long time, while the Finns are just coming in. Newcomers are always unaware of the details of any given moment. However, we are hopeful that with some effort these differences will be settled over time and the work will go forward.

[Ghukasyan]: There is another question that has always intrigued me. I am referring to the roles of Russia and Turkey in the Transcaucasus. Ankara has declared on several occasions that these two countries are the guarantors of the region. It is interesting. On what grounds does Turkey, a relatively less developed country, aspire to have an equal role with a great power like Russia?

[Chernishev]: Of course Turkey has a certain role in this region. That cannot be ignored or denied. On the other hand, it is essential that no one object to the participation of Turkey in the talks on an equal footing with everyone, including Russia. We know that Armenia, and naturally Karabakh, are opposed to such active participation by Turkey. Thus in this case Turkey's role is neither that of an onlooker from the sidelines nor that of a full participant in the process, although it is represented in the Minsk group and the OSCE. Turkey does have a certain, though not so important role, but that is not in any way comparable to the role of Russia or, for that matter, Sweden and now Finland, who are copresidents [of the Minsk group]. On the other hand, Turkey has influence over Azerbaijan and therefore has an impact on the Karabakh problem. That cannot be ignored and must be viewed as a reality that we need to circumvent.

[Ghukasyan]: It is known that as the deputy foreign minister of the Russian Federation you are responsible for Middle Eastern and Transcaucasian countries, including Armenia. For a long time you were the ambassador of the Soviet Union and later Russia in Turkey. Does not that experience have any impact on your current work? Does it not hinder you? Or does it help you?

[Cherishev]: It helps me because Turkey is not an ordinary country. At present it faces a chaotic situation in terms of economic development as well as events related to the Kurdish and other problems. Turkey is surrounded with numerous problems: disputes related to northern Iraq, Cyprus, the Balkans, and Greece. Consequently, my experience in working in all these directions as the ambassador of the Soviet Union and later Russia naturally helps me now. After all, everything was and is of interest to us. Turkey is very close.

Until recently we were neighbors. I can sense quite distinctly what the Turks want on this or that issue. That requires specialization-when all appearances are swept aside, and you see under real light what the Turks think and do.

This has nothing to do with whether Chernishev is pro-Turkish or anti-Turkish. To engage in politics on such issues, one needs to sense and know clearly, without journalistic assumptions or accusations, what can happen really in this or that matter. Consequently, that experience only helps me and does not hinder me.

[Ghukasyan]: I remember the time when the Turkish press published your private conversation with [Turkish president Suleyman] Demirel. In response to one question you spoke in favor of a Kurdish federation. The Turkish president responded immediately and declared that Turkey has been, is, and will always be a unitary state.

[Chernishev]: The exchange was milder than what was presented. There has been talk about the cultural autonomy of the Kurds for many years. Then the Kurds, as they say, expanded their demands, and said that now we must talk about not just administrative and cultural autonomy but a federation. Naturally the journalists were interested in my views, as ambassador. I said that this is generally your own internal affair. We support the principle of the political and territorial integrity of all states in this region, that is, all of Eurasia. You can examine all the alternatives, from cultural autonomy to a federation. Whatever you decide is what will happen. But for them it was painful even to hear the word “federation” from me.

3.42 Russian Minister Previews Summit

Interview by Yuriy Popov

Rossiyskie Vesti, 24 May 1995 [FBIS Translation],

Excerpts

Editor's Note: In the following interview, Valery Serov, Russian minister for CIS Cooperation, outlines Russia's goals for reintegrating the economies of the former Soviet republics. Serov is a pragmatic nationalist, conveniently arguing that as time passes, all of the CIS countries agree on the need to restore close economic ties. The interview is especially interesting because Serov suggests that his Russian Ministry for CIS Cooperation should be made part of the Interstate Economic Committee, which is the only CIS institution that has been granted supranational powers.

Serov argues that the few existing skilled “specialists” capable of designing an “integration mechanism” for CIS economic cooperation are collected within his ministry. He is probably referring to former “central planning specialists” who controlled the central planning apparatus of the former Soviet Union. In fact, the “integration mechanism” to which Serov refers, and the customs and payments unions which Russia is pressuring the other CIS countries to join, would deeply impinge on the economic sovereignty of other CIS states.

It sounds suspiciously like a variation of the old centralized planning model.

[Interview with Valeriy Serov, Russian Federation minister for cooperation with the CIS states, by Yuriy Popov.]

The next session of the Council of CIS Heads of State takes place on 26 May in Minsk. On the eve of the Minsk summit our correspondent Yuriy Popov asked Valeriy Serov, Russian Federation Minister for Cooperation with the CIS States, to talk about the current state of integration processes in the CIS.

[Popov]: There are those who believe that the unification process in the CIS countries' economies is in many ways attended by a disproportionate contribution by Russia. It is bearing a major burden to the detriment of its taxpayers. Isn't this process, to a large extent, intended to help Russia?

For the republics of the former USSR, including Russia, three years of sovereign life have been an important stage in the recognition of their nation-state interests. This process has been a pretty agonizing one. There was a time when it seemed to the young states that their fundamental interests lay entirely outside the CIS, while the Commonwealth itself was seen merely as a means of "civilized divorce." Now barely a trace remains of these illusions. Economics and other factors have taken over.

It took only a year to see that the wreckage of mutual links could not be rebuilt overnight, and in many cases it was simply inadvisable. Recognition of this fact is our common achievement, for which we have paid a high price. It is now clear that the CIS members have entirely objective and long-term economic interests vis —vis one another.

Russia has them too. Suffice it to recall that as part of the USSR it would import 23 percent of the machine-building products it required from other republics, together with more than one-third of the ferrous and non-ferrous metallurgy products, approximately one-fourth of the chemical and light industry products, and practically 100 percent of many types of non-ferrous metals and rare-earth elements, cotton, locomotives, cars for electric trains, corn- and beet-harvesting combines, and so on. So if Russia is helping anyone by participating in integration it is primarily itself, since it will be very difficult to recreate a powerful Russian state quickly outside the CIS.

Naturally, our partners have their own, entirely material interests vis—vis Russia. Incidentally, therein lies an essential prerequisite of effective and mutually advantageous collaboration. We intend to coordinate these interests, in accordance with the accepted procedure in world practice, while endeavoring to prevent one-sided advantages-for one side or another.

[Popov]: Is it possible to create in practice a single economic area on the territory of the former USSR when a genuine market has not yet been established either within the CIS countries or in relations between them? Maybe we should preserve the old system of division of labor and leave it at that?

[Serov]: Your question is entirely natural. In fact, in accordance with economic theory, a single market area presupposes developed market relations both within the cooperating states and among them. It is true also that in both cases market mechanisms are in the process of formation.

But allow me to ask a question in return. How are we to exist today, how are we to implement even traditional trade and cooperative deliveries, without which no national economy in the CIS can function normally? We can no longer cooperate in accordance with the old, “union” principles since states are not interested in resurrecting the old system.

As we see it, the solution is to create a single economic area gradually, as the market foundations in the CIS countries grow stronger. In so doing it is extremely important to ensure the future compatibility of national economic systems. And to achieve this you need to coordinate the transformations being conducted by the countries. This work has already been done in the areas of forming customs and payments unions.

As for resurrecting the old system of division of labor, you are unlikely to find any CIS state that would want this. Of course, a whole range of areas of their specialization will certainly be retained, since they are based on natural conditions or on a high level of production. Elsewhere we are all in for radical restructuring, including with respect to cooperation.

[Popov]: How are the CIS countries fulfilling their commitments under interstate agreements? Is it not the case that the most “disciplined” is Russia?

[Serov]: You have touched a very tender spot in our mutual relations. I would describe the situation as regards the fulfillment of international agreements as unsatisfactory. The actual results of trade and economic cooperation in ensuring interdependent deliveries in 1994 are as follows. According to “Roskontrakt” data, our partners fulfilled by 39 percent (in value terms) their commitments in imports of goods from Russia. And although this figure varies from country to country (Uzbekistan is 74 percent, Belarus 48 percent, Ukraine 30 percent, Kazakhstan 11 percent), the picture cannot be described as rosy.

Russia carried out 43 percent of export deliveries to the CIS states in terms of the value set by contracts, that is, we have nothing particular to shout about either.

It would be unfair to say that this situation is due to the partners' reluctance to fulfill their commitments. There are objective difficulties (crisis and decline in production), but there are also instances of a negligent attitude toward them as well. Clearly, this adverse trend must be eradicated. We need a mechanism that would ensure by economic means the meticulous fulfillment of mutual commitments. We are working on this at the moment.

[Popov]: In Almaty there was serious criticism of the sluggish way decisions already made by the CIS countries with respect to integration are being implemented. This applies in particular to the organization of the Interstate Economic Committee [IEC]. How do things stand at the moment?

[Serov]: In fact, the big hopes the Commonwealth countries are pinning on the creation of the IEC and the entire course of the implementation of the decisions to establish it make a poor match. Suffice it to cite the following example. One IEC presidium session had to be postponed merely because not all the participating states had submitted their plenipotentiary representative candidates by the appointed time. Need I say more....

Now things have gotten moving somewhat, and several sessions of the IEC presidium and collegium have already taken place. At the same time, the committee is not yet fully operating. There are problems with premises and funding. But the main problem is the formation of the apparatus. It turns out that the number of highly skilled specialists capable of tackling the complex tasks of creating the new mechanism of cooperation in the CIS is extremely small. Essentially, they are all concentrated in the Russian Ministry for Cooperation.

This suggests the idea of making the Ministry for Cooperation part of the IEC apparatus, which will enable us to keep cadres together and provide the IEC with quality people. Interestingly enough, there have been similar proposals before from our partners. I think we should heed them. Particularly as our ministry is already effectively performing the IEC's functions.

[Popov]: What about the implementation of the recent summit's other decisions?

[Serov]: The Almaty meeting of CIS heads of state and heads of government made a number of fundamentally important decisions.

I would single out the question of recreating a common scientific area. We are well aware of the role of scientific technical cooperation in present-day integration processes. For example, in the EC it was the engine that actually powered the participating states to a qualitatively different level of development.

A provisional working group of CIS countries' representatives has now been set up to implement the accords that were reached. It is elaborating such fundamental documents as a blueprint for the recreation of a common scientific-technical area, a program of coordinated actions to implement it, and a draft agreement on it.

The "Principles of the CIS States' Customs Legislation," adopted by the Council of Heads of State, are equally significant, particularly in connection with the formation of the customs union. What we have on the agenda now is the CIS countries' task of bringing their customs codes into line with the "Principles.. ." Belarus and Kazakhstan have already done this work. According to available information, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan have embarked on similar work.

The Almaty meeting also adopted another two important documents aimed at harmonizing national economic systems. I am referring to the blueprint for the mutual legal regulation of economic relations and leveling out of the conditions of economic activity in the states of the Economic Union and the agreement on comparable methodologies and the creation of a common statistical base for the Economic Union.

I don't think there is any need to say a great deal about their significance for the development of integration in its modern form.

The relevant groups and commissions have already embarked on the practical implementation of the adopted decisions.

[Popov]: What practical forms is the integration process currently assuming?

[Serov]: I have just answered that question, in fact. All I can add is that we are actually completing the stage of devising a model for the integration mechanism and are embarking on putting it into practice. The next target is the creation of customs and payments unions, which we see not only as means of removing all manner of artificial barriers in the way of cooperation, but also as a significant step toward a single market area.

[Popov]: What is preventing the independent CIS states from rapidly creating their own "common market"?

[Serov]: There are many factors. First, the extent of the collapse of mutual ties in the period immediately after sovereignties were declared. Restoring them turned out to be a far more complex task. Second (and this derives from the first), the deep crisis in production is hampering this work in a major way. A common market is incompatible with a lack of goods. But the latter is a fact of our life.

Third and last, over the past three years each of the states has carried out reforms according to its own taste, so to speak, without really consulting or considering its partners. As a result our economic systems do not fit together and our task now is to bring them close together, to harmonize them. I have already said how we intend to do this.

The upcoming Minsk summit on Friday I believe will be another step on the road to integration in the CIS. Of course, there are no easy and simple solutions to matters such as these. This is indicated by the agenda, which includes an item on the trouble spot in Tajikistan.

Nonetheless there are grounds for believing that both the general and the specific problems of cooperation among the Commonwealth states will be positively resolved. And that will enable us to forge ahead. All I will mention is the meeting participants' intention to jointly invest in the Yelabuga Truck Plant and also to implement the idea of replacing gasoline with gas in transport.

3.43 Zyuganov's Report to Third CPRF Congress

Address

Sovetskaya Rossiya, 24 January 1995 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[“Political Report of the Communist Party of the Russian Federation Central Executive Committee and the Party's Tasks,” delivered by Gennadiy Zyuganov, chairman of the Communist Party of the Russian Federation Central Executive Committee, at the Third Communist Party of the Russian Federation Congress in Moscow on 21 January 1995.]

Comrades!

On opening our third congress today we, Russia's modern Communists, have to reflect and ponder: Who are we, where do we come from, and where are we going?

Our roots are in a party that sacrificed the lives of its best sons and daughters for the people and the fatherland, for the fatherland's independence and its state and cultural grandeur. It is a party whose members crushed fascism and broke through in outer space. It is a party that did not and will not bend under any blows by fate. It is a party whose ranks included Stakhanov and Gagarin, Sholokhov and Leonov, Panfilov and Zhukov, Korolev and Kurchatov, and millions of honest Communists-toilers and patriots.

There is also another party-a bureaucratic party of national betrayal, the party of Trotsky and Vlasov, of Gorbachev and Yeltsin, which always looked upon Russia as its own fiefdom. Now it has cast off its mask, joined an alliance with the criminal bourgeoisie, and destroyed the Soviet state, and is trying to rule the country autocratically and despotically.

Our main historical error and guilt lie in the fact that we cohabited for too long with this party of betrayal in a formally unified organization, we failed to distance ourselves in good time and resist it, we put up with its omnipotence, which inflicted such grave trials on the people and the state.

Now, having reaped the bitter harvest of credulity, carelessness, and lack of political will, the Communists must-in conditions of emergency that do not leave a moment's pause for breath-resolve several tasks at once: to restore the party that essentially means to build it anew, to interpret the lessons of history and map out a program for the future, to counter the actions of the anti-people regime, and to wage a desperate struggle for the survival of Russia and all its peoples.

During the two years since its Second Extraordinary Congress, the Communist Party of the Russian Federation [CPRF] has traversed a long path of struggle and hard trials. Overcoming the difficulties of persecution and proscription, within a brief period of time the CPRF restored the activity of its central and local structures, consolidated itself, and emerged as a statewide political force. It has a sizable representation within organs of legislative power and within local organs of executive power.

The CPRF today comprises 88 republican, kray, oblast, and okrug organizations, over 2,000 rayon and city organizations, and about 20,000 primary party organizations uniting more than half a million Communists.

Considerable theoretical work has been done. A largely innovative draft Party Program has been prepared and submitted for discussion at the Congress today.

The party has preserved its image and firmly upholds the Communists' principled positions on the most important problems of domestic and foreign policy. It is striving to be the unifying element in creating a bloc of state-patriotic forces.

With each passing day, the party's voice is heard increasingly loudly and convincingly, and it is being heeded both by the powers that be and by influential political forces abroad.

But while taking note of all this, can we actually feel complacent? Of course not, because so far we have not achieved the main goal—we have failed to even slow down the country's slide toward the abyss where it is being driven by the incumbent anti-people regime, we have failed to remove this regime from power. Until this is done, we will owe a great debt to the fatherland.

Let us ponder once more the essence and content of the destructive processes now under way in the country.

We are duty bound to examine this question from the broadest possible angle. Today we are talking not only, and not so much about the dismantling of the socialist social system but about the targeted subversion of the foundations of Russian spirituality and statehood in general. Russia today is not being built even on the foundations of capitalist relations. On the contrary, the selfish element that has been let loose is being used to destroy the great Eurasian power whose very existence has hindered the implementation of the “new world order” plans.

The security of any state rests on the “three pillars” of protecting its territory, protecting its people, and protecting the population's way of life. Let us look at today's Russia from this angle.

Territory. The country has been pushed four hundred years in the past, within its sixteenth-century borders, and it has been deprived of the results of centuries-long development and its access to the world's trade routes. Vitally important international economic ties have been broken.

Tens of millions of our compatriots have been left outside the Russian Federation's borders as second-class citizens. Checkpoints and customs points have been installed in places where borders never existed and are unnecessary, and they are simply lacking in places where they are needed.

Russia in fact no longer exists as a unified and integral state organism. We are left with its individual elements, with weak legal and organizational links and without any coordination of their activity. We are left with individual links of an economic mechanism that was torn apart while still alive. We are left with territorial formations that increasingly fall under the influence of regional and departmental “elites” pursuing their own selfish interests.

The people. Already in 1993 the birth rate had dropped to 1.3 births per woman, while it should be at least 2.1 to achieve the simple replacement of the family. Average life expectancy has dropped to sixty-five years, which is ten to fifteen less than in developed countries.

By the end of last year the minimum pension stood at less than one-half of the subsistence minimum. Prices are going through the roof. Vodka is the only exception—compared with bread, it is now eight times cheaper. The people are being deliberately fed alcoholic and spiritual moonshine. The nation's health has been subverted. Morbidity is rising at a disastrous pace, primarily congenital morbidity. Only 14 percent of children are healthy.

Everything that citizens of the USSR and Russia enjoyed-guaranteed right to work, free education and health care, protection of motherhood and childhood, and much else-all this has been sacrificed so that a handful of compradors can get richer.

In terms of living conditions for the bulk of the population, the results of the past three years fall below the universally accepted definition of genocide.

Way of life. Since time immemorial, our compatriots have lived in a communal world, in a spirit of comradeship, mutual assistance, and collectivism. Nowadays everything is being done to destroy this foundation of the people's lifestyle and deprive them of the very opportunity of reciprocal contact between people.

Transportation prices are sky-high, and people cannot afford to attend family funerals.

Crime is rampant-nobody feels safe, and all lock themselves away from the rest of the world behind iron doors and bars.

Vouchers were distributed-sit tight and hold onto Chubays's "two Volgas," keep competitors at bay.

The richness of human contact is being increasingly replaced by the solitary television set, instilling in people the idea that Russia's history is just a senseless chain of mistakes and crimes, that their lives have been lived in vain, that lies and theft are the basis of morality, and that Judas is the ideal human being and citizen.

In order to render the state's collapse irreversible, numerous "mines" with vast destructive power are being planted beneath the state's foundation. Here are just a few of them.

Social mine. Society's stratification in terms of the incomes of the strata representing the richest and the poorest 10 percent has reached the proportion of 23:1, which is several times higher than the socially permissible level and threatens to explode at any moment.

Legal mine. Today the country lacks even a single federal organ of state power whose legitimacy is beyond all doubt. Total lawlessness is supplemented by total chaos in the system of real power. Governability has declined to such an extent that arbitrary rule and violence are the only remaining methods.

Geopolitical mine. Deprived of its natural borders and reliable access to warm seas, the country is losing its state autarky and is doomed to seeing its regions, primarily its raw-material regions, being sooner or later attracted to different systems of economic ties and detached from it.

Technological mine. The exportation of industry's fixed assets has exceeded all permissible bounds of security. The degradation of production could at any moment evolve into a terrible catastrophe, even involving planetwide consequences.

Food mine. The country has for all intents and purposes lost its own resources for supplying its population with foodstuffs. The destruction of the agro-industrial complex has made it totally dependent on imports.

Biological mine. All diseases from the Civil War years—typhus, cholera, diphtheria, and scabies—have reappeared in Russia today. Teachers say that there is not a single school without lice. At the same time, the health-care system is being destroyed, primarily the well-organized system of preventive and hygiene services and our country's pharmacological base.

Virtually all of society's vitally important spheres are in a state of imbalance and threaten to collapse. Bluntly speaking, the situation is unique, unknown, and without even a remote parallel in history.

There is no doubt that the initial push here was given by the bourgeois counterrevolution. But it is also obvious that the matter certainly does not rest here. What is happening is not akin to even primitive capitalism. Here we need some different terms: kleptocracy, universal sellout, pilferage, destatization, dehumanization.

Historical parallels can help us interpret the situation. Let us recall how Russian lands devastated by Teuton and Mongol invaders were gathered bit by bit around Moscow, the land-gathering that was practiced to overcome the evil Time of Troubles in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the opening of a "window to Europe" by Peter the Great, Chancellor Gorchakov's famous words that "Russia is consolidating," the re-creation of state unity and the country's economic might following the collapse of the bourgeoislandowning system in 1917, and finally the headlong revival and attainment of leading positions in the world following victory in the Great Patriotic War.

Despite all the historical and social diversity of these situations, they all have something in common.

First, the extrication from crises was distinguished by special features of the stabilization period. Mechanisms for mobilizing all of society's potential were switched on, priority attention to domestic problems of social recovery and national revival was guaranteed, and the state's external activeness was reduced to a reasonable minimum.

Second, obvious priority was given to nationwide and statewide interests. A social force, well ahead of its time, was always found and these interests were most fully and most consistently embodied in its activity. Its leading role made it possible to rally the bulk of the people, to awaken their energy and focus it on the most important fulcrums where force had to be applied.

Turning back to the present, we conclude that the country is going through a period when its main tasks are associated with the struggle for national-state self-preservation. At the same time, the objective conditions are such that this struggle fuses with the struggle waged by Communists for real power by the people, for social justice, for socialism. Hence our conception of immediate and long-term tasks.

The first task—in terms of both priority and essence—is to awaken and rally the people and all their social strata, to create an effective alliance of patriotic forces to struggle against the national-state catastrophe.

As our draft program notes, the Communists' real and potential allies in the cause of national salvation are the political parties and movements from the socialist, patriotic, centrist, and consistently democratic spectrum, the trade unions, the workers', peasants', women's, veterans', youth, entrepreneurial, educational, and creative organizations, the Russian Orthodox Church, and religious communities of all confessions.

The common goals that we set are evident from what has already been said. They are simple and obvious:

- to protect Russia's state integrity and the Russian people's unity. This, in turn, dictates the necessity to voluntarily recreate a single union state;

- to achieve not just an economic recovery but a qualitative breakthrough on the basis of the supreme achievements of scientific and technical progress;
- to protect the physical and moral health of the nation and to uphold the traditional values of the people's way of life;
- to restore legality and law and order in the state;
- to ensure civic peace in society, calm and security in each home, prosperity in each family.

The removal of the incumbent anti-people regime from power is a decisive condition for attaining these goals.

Not a single even slightly responsible politician in Russia and abroad can any longer risk describing this regime as "democratic" or as reflecting the opinion and will of the majority of the country's citizens. This is a regime of personal usurpation of power, and it is propped up by bayonets-not so much the army's bayonets, but those of power structures especially created for this purpose. This is a regime of whipping up fear, stepping up political terror, stifling the citizens' democratic rights and freedoms, and destroying society's social gains.

The subjective selfish logic of its behavior is obvious. Being politically weak, it is trying to prop up its power by physically breaking society's backbone and eliminating the most important political institutions in the course of creeping civil war.

The incumbent anti-people regime has no future. If it is forced to exist for a certain period of time in conditions of peaceful and non-violent development and legal stability, it will be immediately swept aside by the opposition. And the entire country is essentially in opposition to it....

As far as Russia's Communists are concerned, the essence of this regime and the ominous consequences of its dominance were obvious from its very inception, and they have always and consistently opposed it.

In the past we said that the proclamation of the supremacy of the Russian Federation's sovereignty over the Union was a dangerous insanity which would inevitably lead to the disintegration of the USSR and then of Russia itself.

We opposed the introduction of the institution of presidential power, adducing proof that in a multinational federal state it would not be a stabilizing factor at all but a source of endless conflicts and arbitrary rule, a factor intensifying the destructive processes.

We warned that the policy of shock therapy would lead to an unprecedented economic collapse.

All this happened long before the party's second congress, during a period when it was only just being reborn and was struggling for the restoration of its right to exist. But the period under review also abounded with struggle against the anti-people policy.

The efforts of party organizations, which were only just getting up on their feet, were aimed at protecting the soviets virtually throughout 1993.

Whereas the March attack by presidential structures against the soviets was successfully repulsed through joint efforts, bloody October and the shoot-out with the Supreme soviet turned into the worse defeat of people's power in Russia's history. It also proved that the Communists and their allies are the most consistent supporters and defenders of democracy.

Incidentally, I think that it is high time to restore this term's true meaning and cleanse it of all the filth that has stuck to it from the dirty paws of the people's butchers and their stooges.

It can be said that we realized in full the meaning of being an opposition party precisely in the wake of October 1993.

Over the past two years I have traveled the length and breadth of virtually the entire country. Wherever I went, I saw the selfless work being done by my party comrades. Without an apparatus, without premises or office equipment, they honorably perform their civic and patriotic duty as Communists. After all, ours is a genuinely people's party, a party of zealots, a party of wholehearted people, a party that is joined not for a career's sake but in answer to a call of the heart. I see many familiar faces in this hall. Many, many thanks to you, comrades, and to the entire detachment of party officials and rank-and-file Communists, to our supporters and friends.

In these difficult conditions the party is learning and is mastering the full arsenal of forms and methods of political struggle. Paramount importance is attached to the very difficult decision to contest the Federal Assembly elections, made by the October 1993 party conference. We were perfectly well aware that the parliament being created within the incumbent regime's framework would be virtually powerless. Its legislative powers are constrained by the executive power's dual censorship and are not backed up by functions to monitor the execution of laws or the government's activity.

Nonetheless, today we can claim that the policy of contesting the elections has been vindicated. The election campaign offered an opportunity to test the combat ability of party organizations, and their ties with the population were strengthened. With just over 10 percent of deputies' seats, the Communist Party exerts noticeable influence on parliament's work.

We entered parliament with a clear-cut program to restore legality and overcome the consequences of the coup d'état. It was further developed into the concept of ensuring civic peace, adopted by the all-Russia party conference in April last year. We said at the time, and still assert today, that it is a real alternative to the so-called Treaty on Social Accord that has been assigned the pitiful role of a fig leaf for presidential dictatorship.

Even within the narrow framework of Yeltsin's constitution, which has been imposed on the country, we are striving to do everything possible to restore and protect people's power. We are talking primarily about amending a series of articles of the constitution with a view to stepping up parliamentary monitoring of executive power. The arbitrary rule by executive authorities and their lack of accountability, which have reached the point of total chaos especially over the past few months, prove that the constitution as a whole must be changed.

Our efforts to ensure immediate adoption of laws on Duma elections, of forming the Federation Council, on presidential elections, and on referendums follow the same track. Three of these laws have already been given their first reading. Obviously, we have to think about adopting yet another law, the need for which may arise at any moment. This is the law on the Constitutional Assembly, empowered to adopt a new constitution.

The party does not look at its parliamentary activity only from the angle of lawmaking. As far as the Communists are concerned, the Federal Assembly is also a rostrum, a means to ensure the cadre reinforcement of party structures, and a major school making it possible to accumulate experience in affairs of state and to constantly keep a finger on the country's pulse. Without such a school, all the talk about coming to power is nothing but bragging.

Growing importance attaches to the activeness of Communist deputies in electoral districts and labor collectives, and their work among the population. In just one year they have visited virtually all regions in the country, telling people the truth about the authorities' pernicious policies and helping to organize the masses in opposition to the regime.

This means that parliamentary work is most closely linked with extraparliamentary struggle, without which our activity is altogether unimaginable. Just like before, our party is firmly committed to the viewpoint that, given a certain turn of events and the regime's switch to overt dictatorship and repressions, decisive importance will attach to the different forms of actions by the masses.

The experience of the parliamentary elections was also utilized and expanded during the elections to regional organs of power. They proved that the mood of the masses is clearly leaning to the left. Wherever the Communists acted in an organized manner, rallied all patriotic forces, and effectively monitored the observance of electoral legislation, success was almost always forthcoming.

It is typical that, out of the elected deputies who openly declared their party affiliation, 46 percent are Communists. Even the authorities are forced to admit that the opposition forces dominate the majority of local dumas and assemblies today. The "Red Belt" is getting ever tighter around Moscow, reaching up from the south, and extending ever further eastward.

In compliance with the second congress instructions, the Central Executive Committee [CEC] constantly focused its attention on denouncing the Belovezh Forest agreements and re-creating a renewed Union of Soviet Peoples. This was the aim of our repeated initiatives at the Duma, the conferences of fraternal parties, and the First and Second Congresses of the USSR Peoples.

Of course, each and every one of us is aware that the path of re-creating a single country will not be easy. This becomes especially obvious in the light of Russia's impending disintegration. The events in Chechnya, which are fanning the hotbed of a new Caucasian war and a Slav-Muslim confrontation along Bosnian lines, cannot be perceived as anything but the latest step toward the breakdown of Russia-wide unity. You are familiar with the CEC's stance in this regard. We resolutely demand a cessation of combat operations by both sides, the holding of necessary negotiations, and an investigation into the causes of this unprecedented slaughter.

While recognizing each people's legitimate right to determine its own fate, at the same time we believe that any attempts to break down and split the country are contrary to the people's genuine interests. We believe in the common sense of our compatriots. Russia must be a single state, in which the interests of people of all nationalities will be reliably protected.

We perceive the Chechen adventure as yet another provocation against the army and other power structures. The army has been "set up" yet again, and it is being besmirched. On behalf of all Communists, I declare: We believe that people in uniform will remain loyal to their duty to the people. We will do everything to uphold the honor of the fatherland's defenders.

It is an open secret that the imperialist circles are eagerly awaiting the time when they will be dealing with a Russia that has been torn apart and bled dry. In pursuit of this goal, they are prepared to embark on any adventure, up to and including the introduction of foreign troops on Russian territory under the pretext of "peacemaking" or the safeguarding of nuclear and other potentially dangerous facilities. For the time being, people abroad and in the "fifth column" circles are only hinting at that, but these hints may materialize tomorrow. This is why the ideas of Russian patriotism and of the motherland's deliverance from disintegration and devastation today have not only domestic but also foreign political overtones.

In this context I would like to speak at greater length about our assessment of Russia's international position and the world situation as a whole. The development of crisis processes in the socialist countries also produced serious negative consequences for the international situation. It was not just the Soviet Union's state unity that was destroyed, the balance of forces in the world arena, on which international peace was based for over four decades, was also destroyed. The bipolar system of international relations was replaced not by the multipolar system that was the big vision of naive political dreamers, but by a monopolar system meaning global U.S. domination. The results of World War II have been de facto revised. The myth about the pan-European home also burst like a soap bubble.

The Yeltsin-Kozyrev foreign policy course is based not upon a sober appraisal of the realities of contemporary international life but on propaganda utopias in which even our Western "partners" themselves have never believed. Russia has gradually lost all its allies and its international positions. Any timid attempts to bring up Russian interests are cut short with harsh bellows, as happened recently in Budapest. On the other hand, the adventurism and unpredictability of the Russian authorities in their internal affairs are pushing our East and Central European neighbors into NATO's embrace.

In the face of these circumstances, we define our proposals in the sphere of international policy on the basis of two fundamental objectives: To restore the state unity of Soviet peoples and to democratize the global system of international relations.

The country's new foreign policy would mean a return to the protection of national interests, restoration of traditional ties of alliance in all regions of the world, and international solidarity with the countries and peoples struggling for the preservation of their state sovereignty, against the policy of the "new world order."

Wars have recently become again an inalienable factor of international life. But, even in these conditions, the ideal of peace and international cooperation remains immutable as far as the Communists are concerned. We will continue to strive to exclude war forever from the arsenal of means for solving international problems. The principle of peaceful coexistence as a basis of international relations still retains its value today; it has withstood the test of time.

Comrades!

The regime's anti-people policy is largely and personally linked with the individual occupying the president's seat. The CEC has openly declared that Yeltsin's policy and personal behavior denigrate the dignity of our great people and are an insult to the sacrifices made by millions of Soviet people for the sake of mankind's liberation.

This is why the party could not have failed to launch the initiative of collecting citizens' signatures to a petition demanding early presidential elections and non-extension of the powers of the incumbent Federal Assembly. This appeal was heeded by people. Over a period of three months (between 21 September and 21 December 1994), about 3 million citizens signed this petition. This is three times the number required under the still unrepealed RSFSR [Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic] Law on Referendums and 1.5 times the number required under the president's draft Law on Referendums.

These are the results: The CEC Presidium and the Communist faction in the Duma issued a statement saying that Yeltsin has no right to ignore the population's opinion and must either resign or call early elections. Otherwise, we reserve the right to demand that a referendum be scheduled in line with the norms existing in all international acts on human rights.

But the pseudo-democrats are also trying to exploit the critical moment of the utmost exacerbation of the crisis of power, especially in connection with the war in Chechnya. This goes a long way toward explaining their strange-at first glance-transformation into fierce critics of their own disgraceful practice of political arbitrary rule.

There are many signs that the stage of the regrouping of forces in the ruling camp is almost over, and that preparations to emerge in the arena are being made by political figures whose main strategic objective is to retain the property and power already acquired by the comprador strata at all costs, including by means of removing the incumbent leadership from power and using strong-arm methods.

The interclan struggle within the ruling grouping forces them to resort to methods of misguiding public opinion like, for example, claims about the coalition nature of the existing government.

In this context we reaffirm the immutable stance of the CEC October Plenum that, for as long as the present antipeople policy is pursued, there cannot be any talk of Communists' participation in a government that is guilty of destroying our great country. It is not a coalition government because coalitions are created as a result of agreement between political forces, not of individual decisions by various people. This is why non-party member V. Kovalev, a member of the CPRF's Duma faction, was expelled from the faction when he agreed to his appointment as minister.

Only if there is a policy change and a government of people's trust is formed will the CPRF leadership, following consultations with party organizations and its closest political allies, be able to make a decision about participating in the creation of such a government.

The systemic crisis raging in the country is called systemic because it has struck all spheres of life without exception and has reached the line beyond which destructive processes become irreversible.

Nonetheless, the key problem that a government of the people's trust will have to resolve is economic normalization. For it is essential primarily to make a correct diagnosis.

It is not enough to speak of the pernicious nature of the present economic course-we must understand that this course is logical and realistic in its own cannibalistic way and is pursuing clear potentially attainable goals. What are these goals?

The present economic policy is, as we know, being pursued in response to the dictates of the IMF and that organization has never engaged and is not engaged in creating in the countries under its tutelage an effective Western-style market economy. Its real aim is completely different-forming an economy of a type that cannot exist without sliding into huge foreign debts but that is at the same time capable of paying the interest. The IMF is not interested in the price at which that is achieved.

As proof let us divert ourselves for a minute from our affairs and turn to the experience of countries that have undergone a full course of "treatment" as prescribed by the IMF.

Thus, Venezuela once had the highest per capita income in Latin America. It held important positions among world oil exporters. Since the IMF's intervention Venezuela's foreign debt has increased from $29 billion in 1980 to $35 billion in 1990. Here the country has had to pay $31 billion in interest alone over the ten years. At the same time the export of capital, including the illegal export, was assessed at $35 billion.

One more Latin American country-Peru. It is known that the consumption of calories in food varies for one person from the minimal level of 2,400 to the optimum level of 3,500. In Peru in 1970 this figure was 2,300 while in 1980 it was about 2,000 and in 1990 it was even lower. The poorest strata of the population consumed only 800 calories in 1991, which is less than the amount given to an inmate of Auschwitz.

Michel Camdessus, managing director of the IMF, expressed himself as follows regarding Peru's position: "We believe that the successes achieved in Peru are of extreme importance. This is a program of unusual importance to the whole world. It is a model for the rest of the world. The IMF program cannot be changed on the pretext of fighting poverty."

How can we fail here to recall the words of the wellknown U.S. economist and entrepreneur Lyndon Larouche addressed to all those Friedmans, Hayeks, and Sachs and other "pillars" of monetarism: "Since the Nobel Prize for Economics was founded it has been received exclusively by those whose 'fundamental works' in this field have turned out to be flagrantly incompetent and only when this incompetence has been confirmed by some national catastrophe resulting from adherence to this doctrine."

The above-mentioned results are painstakingly concealed from the broad public but they cannot fail to be known to the pupils of the IMF figures-to the Gaydars, Fedorovs, Chubayses, and Yavlinskiys who deliberately mislead the people regarding the thrust of their "reforms."

The socio-economic course they have steered since 1992 has led the country to total collapse. The national income has been nearly halved. For virtually all production indicators, for production efficiency, and the living standard of the majority of the population, Russia has been cast back several decades.

The draft budget for 1995 continues the “tough credit and finance policy.” Its real expenditure is halved. Peasants, miners, the military-industrial complex, the army, science, education, and the entire social sphere have essentially been left to the tyranny of fate. The indexation of wages and pensions is envisaged only twice a year, with a 40 percent lag behind the rise in prices. Commodity producers are oppressed by taxes and the Russian market is essentially being destroyed.

In this connection the CPRF faction in the Duma has voted unanimously against the draft budget for this year and also expressed its lack of confidence in the government.

They claim “there is no way” other than that dictated to Russia by the Western well-wishers. That is a lie. There are other options that ensure not in words but in reality a way out of the catastrophic situation, but the government is dismissing them.

What do we offer and demand? Absolutely nothing supernatural merely what is dictated by common sense and elementary calculations.

First, it is essential fundamentally to alter monetary and credit policy by substantially easing it. Despite what is drummed into us, the money supply in the country has been reduced today below any conceivable limit. The shortage of rubles in circulation is compensated by the total dollarization of Russia’s economy, that is, it works to service the U.S. internal debt. According to available estimates something like $100 million in cash is circulating on the market and that is 400 trillion rubles [R—nearly three annual budgets. Some R150 trillion are tied up in non-payments. All this hits the enterprises’ working capital. It is the shortage of working capital that lies at the basis of the breakdown of national economic relations.

Second, a fundamental change in taxation policy is required. It is essential to repeal or substantially reduce for real commodity producers the value-added tax, which is the main factor provoking the spiraling of inflation. As a whole, tax pressure on production should be reduced as early as this year by a minimum of 15 to 20 percent and in the next few years it should at least be halved. Otherwise collapse and bankruptcy await virtually all Russian enterprises.

Third, order must be introduced in the state's foreign economic activity. According to the calculations of the Duma committee for economic policy, that will make it possible to attract something like R80 trillion into the budget.

Fourth, we must really ensure a state monopoly over the sale of alcohol, tobacco, and some other products. All these sources of income should be used for the country's urgent needs and not to enrich speculators.

Fifth, we must proceed from the premise that so-called privatization is often implemented counter to public interests and with the most flagrant violations even of existing legal norms. All of Russia's national property has been assessed at a ludicrous sum equivalent to $300 million.

These are, I repeat, elementary measures that would make it possible to lay down the prerequisites for stabilization and to switch to the real reform of the economy in the people's interests. And reforms are essential. Convinced of the need for and the inevitability of Russia's socialist development, the party in no way wants the mechanical reproduction of the path that has been traveled. Our call is not back to socialism but forward to socialism. And that is, if you like, the leitmotif of our program.

3.44 Vladimir Zhirinovskiy Reviews the Era of Gorbachev and Yeltsin

Vladimir Zhirinovskiy

Trud, 1 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Vladimir Volfovich Zhirinovskiy emerged as a powerful far-right force in early post-

Soviet politics. His Liberal Democratic Party of Russia (LDPR) represents the most extreme form of “Great Power” thinking in Russia, ultra-nationalist, neo-fascist, and anti-Western. Zhirinovskiy was born on April 25, 1946, in Alma-Ata, Kazakhstan. He was educated at Moscow State University. Until 1983 he worked with the USSR Ministry of Defense, with the General Staff of the Transcaucasian command and with the Soviet Society of Friendship and Cultural Relations. From 1983 to 1989 he worked as a legal consultant to Mir Publications. In 1989 he founded the LDPR and built it to such an extent that in the Russian presidential election of 12 June 1991 he came in third out of six candidates, with more than 6 million votes. He is described as an anti-Semitic demagogue, although there have been numerous suggestions concerning his own Jewish background, including one that until the age of eighteen, his surname was Edelstein. Thanks to his clever campaigning prior to the Duma elections of December 1993, the LDPR unexpectedly gained 23 percent of the vote. His political ideas, which include annexation of the Baltic States, Afghanistan, and parts of Alaska, Finland, and Poland, were elaborated upon in his book The Last Thrust to the South, published in Moscow in 1993. As a member of the Russian parliament Zhirinovskiy travels widely, openly attacking and vilifying the United States at every opportunity, using phrases such as “American carrion crows,” and pledging to fully support rogue nations, such as Libya and Iran. He did poorly in the 1996 Russian presidential race. The following article, full of hackneyed, overdramatic statements and phrases, vividly exemplifies Zhirinovskiy’s political views.

[Article by Vladimir Zhirinovskiy, leader of the Liberal Democratic Party of Russia, under the “Viewpoint” rubric: “From Gorbachev to Yeltsin and Beyond”-first three paragraphs are Trud’s introduction.]

Judging by the predictions of many Russian politicians, the spring of 1995 will be stormy. But however high the floodwaters of the possible political events may rise, one date will certainly not go unnoticed. It is directly associated with everything that happened here in the last years of the USSR’s existence and that is happening now-in Russia and the CIS. April 1995 will see the tenth anniversary of the beginning of perestroika.

To say that this date arouses mixed feelings in our former fellow citizens is putting it mildly. For some people it is a holiday, for others a "jubilee" of mourning. But in any case it was a milestone that marked a sharp historical turning point in our country's history, and indeed in world history and it cannot be ignored....

Some items in Trud have already touched on this theme. And now the LDPR [Liberal Democratic Party of Russia] leader Vladimir Zhirinovskiy, who always wants to be the first to have his say on everything, has offered Trud his observations in connection with this special date. Observations that are not, of course, uncontentious. Their style is hard-hitting, emotional, and outwardly paradoxical. True to the principle of openness and seeking to present the widest possible spectrum of socio-political views and sentiments, we offer this contentious article for our readers' judgment.

[Zhirinovskiy begins] The tenth anniversary of perestroika is approaching. Anyone who feels so inclined will soon be writing and speaking on this topic. Or keeping quiet. It all depends on the situation. I will try, as has become traditional, to get in first, and open the season of reflection on the historical role of Mikhail Sergeevich Gorbachev and his perestroika.

Gorbachev is one of the key figures of the century, if not the millennium. He stands at ease alongside Napoleon, Peter [the Great], and Lenin. His reign influenced the entire world and turned that world upside down. It is another matter to ask at what price and with what consequences, who won and who lost, and what did the Russians gain from Gorbachev's global game. And that is what we are going to try to find out.

The system that Gorbachev first shook was absolutely rotten. It was dying. It had sullied its very nature and sunk into bureaucracy. It was a model of a war economy, appropriate to the era of rebuffing outside aggression. But with the appearance of nuclear missile weapons, the real probability of foreign aggression fell sharply. Economic reforms should have been launched. But for thirty years we marked time. Stalin and war were embedded forever in the brains and nervous systems of the then leaders. But now they were gradually dying out. And the young General Secretary Gorbachev, who had never smelled gunpowder, was beginning to shake the system.

People say we should have taken the Chinese path, step by step, with no sudden movements. But that is not for Russia. Russia does not like doing things gradually; here it is either one thing or the other, either hot or cold, either we are all identical atheists or we are all believers to a man, either we are all communists or we are all monarchists, either we all turn out for the subbotnik [voluntary Saturday work] or we are all running commercial stalls. No, the gradual approach is not for us. Kosygin wanted phased reforms in 1965, and he came unstuck. So Gorbachev had a choice-go all the way, or turn back; give birth, or abort the embryo. He gave birth.

A professional politician is always particularly interested in tactics. In this respect Gorbachev and his colleagues were pretty skilled. In general the CPSU trained its cadres well in just one art-that of survival in apparatus wars, the art of maneuvers and intrigues. The party did not teach strategy. It did not tolerate strategists in its ranks. That was why it died.

But in 1985 the CPSU was still alive. And how! In 1985 Gorbachev took a sharp ax and started hacking away at the tree. Let us look at how he did it. On the left, he let loose the “Democratic Union,” where I began my own political career. The “Democratic Union” rallies in Pushkin Square became famous countrywide. Official propaganda lashed the “Democratic Union,” but that only made it more famous. This handful of people did not constitute any kind of social force, but they were spoken of as a serious organization. Even when I realized that this was what someone at the very top wanted.

On the right, Gorbachev let loose “Pamyat,” with its patriotic slogans. Inside the party, the detonator, by a whim of fate, was the argumentative Yeltsin. In fact, Gorbachev wanted to use Yeltsin to try to split the party’s ruling clique and at the same time to clarify feelings in the Central Committee. The proof? Very simple. Gorbachev, as he himself has said, knew that Yeltsin was planning to deliver a hardhitting speech. And for some reason, he gave him the floor right at the beginning of the Central Committee plenum. At that time nobody mounted the platform without the general secretary’s say-so. So Gorbachev wanted this aggravation.

That Central Committee plenum, where Yeltsin barely muddied the water, showed Mikhail Sergeevich [Gorbachev] a lot. He realized that the Central Committee was a monolith, an assembly of experienced party people who saw perestroika as just another campaign, of which there had been dozens in the years of soviet power. These party people would pin any general secretary to the wall, especially him young and provincial as he was.

So Yeltsin had to be sacrificed. But, take note, Gorbachev did not send Yeltsin as ambassador or adviser to Mongolia, where he would have been forgotten within the week; he left him in Moscow, where he quickly became the hero of the “new” press and the “Vzglyad” TV program. And so the two of them set off through perestroika together-Gorbachev and Yeltsin, apparently adversaries on the surface, but fatally necessary to each other. Yeltsin became a mighty hammer in the hands of Mikhail Sergeevich, with which he struck at the party system. But according to the laws of dialectics, Gorbachev was raising his own rival and grave-digger. However, to stifle that rival would have meant, for Gorbachev, stifling perestroika itself, tearing up his own political mandate, and being left with those who would never forgive him his “idiosyncrasies.” What a dilemma.

Mikhail Sergeevich, convinced that the Central Committee could not be reformed, began to create a parallel structure-the Congress of People's Deputies. The time was ripe for this. A whole brigade of haughty professors, writers, and artists were waiting their moment. For three years they had vied with one another to criticize the CPSU in the pages of Ogonek and Moskovskie Novosti, in the heavyweight journals, and as guests of the "Vzglyad" TV boys. While the obkom [oblast party committee] members were pursuing acceleration and still sweating blood over completely useless party and economic activists, Gorby handed over the hearts and minds of the public to others-to those very same professors and writers. He did this not from weakness, but deliberately. Thanks to glasnost, he secured a parallel power structure-the congress, which set a course of combating the already decrepit Communist Party.

One of the most enigmatic themes from the era of Gorbachev's rule is the story of interethnic conflicts and separatism. In 1988-90 the system was still in control, and any instigator, agitator, or troublemaker could have been put well out of the way. But nobody was touched. People's Fronts were formed and spoke out openly on the air, in the newspapers, and in the parliaments. To make a stronger impression, acts of bloody carnage were started. The turning point was the election of the Russian Supreme Soviet, which immediately began to pull the rug out from under Gorbachev's feet and define Russian sovereignty.

When the echoes of all these events had died down and the Union had broken up, it began to emerge that many active members of these People's Fronts, these all-out nationalists, had apparently been cooperating with the KGB for a long time. Scandals broke out in one place after another. An interesting sign, wasn't it?

And what of the breakup of the Warsaw Pact bloc? Notice that all the East European revolutions took place almost at the same time, as if by order. But why did I say "as if." It was indeed by order. By order of Moscow.

But why did Gorbachev, Shevardnadze, Kryuchkov, and Yakovlev do all this anyway? Why did they hand over Eastern Europe, connive with separatists, and provoke the outlying areas' secession from Russia? There was something objective and very serious behind all this: It was becoming increasingly unsustainable to feed the outlying areas, to supply cheap oil and energy to the "shopwindows" of socialism in Europe. So we were happy to abandon them. Frankly, we "dropped" them, we palmed them off with a "dolly" [bundle of paper cut to look like banknotes] as used to be the practice in the hard-currency "Berezka" stores. They grabbed this "dolly" in the form of sovereignty, fled, opened it, and found just pieces of paper. Look what we are seeing in the "independent" states now. Poverty, down-and-outs. Production is falling, there is no proper business, just wars and forebodings of war. Yet remember how it was ten years ago. They were kings....

There is another aspect too: The kindling of nationalists among small nations inevitably evokes a corresponding upsurge in Russian nationalism, a mighty, Great-Power nationalism. Back in Lenin's day it was Russian nationalism that the communists feared. The USSR was built on playing up to the small peoples' national feelings (look, here's your very own republic, your own government, your own script, your own writers), combined with total suppression of Russian chauvinism. But the communists knew that they had to give the Russians something. And so they lulled them—using the writers—with a gentle, mawkish whispering about Mother Russia, the villages, the forests, the fields. Petr the bayan player, and Marfa the milkmaid. On television, toothless old crones sang folksy little rhymes. Various bearded types sighed over the loss of the people's traditions. And not a word about Russia's historic might, its influence on world affairs, its amazing wealth. True, in the era of stagnation there was one man who reminded us, to some extent, that Russia is not a land of drunken peasants, but an empire with the sparkling palaces of Petersburg, great historical traditions and achievements, brilliant thinkers, and an advanced culture. That man was called Ilya Glazunov; his chauvinism was combined with no beard, smart foreign suits, and Marlboro cigarettes. They didn't like Glazunov. But I liked him. Many years ago I realized that diehard, “bearded” nationalism puts people off. Russian nationalism should be modern, intellectual, aggressive-fashionable, if you like. Russian nationalism should never be taken to extremes, because extreme nationalism is the road to death. Nationalism is like fire. But you have to know how to handle fire if you don't want to start a conflagration.

In recalling Gorbachev and his perestroika, we clearly perceive a historical thread. Gorbachev destroyed an efficient system, shook the party to pieces, and, by fostering nationalism and separatism in the republics, separated numerous parasites and “younger brothers” from Russia. With the help of anti-Sovietism he separated us from our “allies in the socialist camp.” Yeltsin, with one stroke of his bear’s paw, finished these jobs off well and truly, and started gradually reviving Russian autocracy. After undergoing serious operations, Russia is thin, emaciated, limping on both feet, but it has come back to the gym to flex its biceps and compete in the world championship again. And here, in the world championships, it needs a deft and quick-witted trainer, because the era now beginning is the era of the division of spheres of influence in the world, where the early bird catches the worm and the rest will have to suck their thumbs for many years to come. Apparently neither our smart economists nor our politicians, worn down by daily cares, understand this. Wake up, boys! Put your glasses on! You can learn to produce the best products in the world, but they’ll never let you sell it and they’ll find thousands of pretexts. And that cannot be stopped by economic means.

You have to play the world's game-threaten a bit here, cajole a bit there, and in some cases, if you'll pardon the expression, ram it down their throats. And remember the example of Gorbachev again. He did not know how to haggle and make deals. He had an opportunity to extract hundreds of billions of dollars from the outside world for the global concessions that, after all, we would have had to make, because it had become too difficult to feed all that crowd. But Misha was "civilized." He couldn't do that. He wanted to be liked in Paris and in London. The Russians' fate was of less interest to him. Apparently he was not very interested in the economy either, where he made so many hasty mistakes. From 1985 onward, money was not invested in the petrochemical industry, which had always brought in foreign currency for us. Wine and spirit production was destroyed. But that was doubtless part of the overall scenario of perestroika, since, paradoxically enough, reforms can be implemented more easily and more quickly when there is no money, so that there is no alternative to reforms. But that is not the way we are. We are different. And if we withdraw the Russian troops from the Central Asian "states" let us get, in exchange, the money to house officers in proper military encampments, not tents. And let us take the Russians out of these "states." All this talk of the fraternity of peoples in the Soviet period-let us leave that to Pravda.

One last thing. Not so long ago, since his resignation, Gorbachev became head of an international ecological organization. An interesting move. I wrote some time ago that it is in the ecological field that internationalism will be revived. An era of nationalism, an era of the right, is beginning in the world today, because a reshaping of spheres of influence is at hand. But at the beginning of the next century green parties will begin to rise throughout the world. An ecological army and ecological police will be created. Countries will be subjected to international sanctions for damaging the environment. Ecological ideas will grip the world just as communist ideas did at the beginning of the twentieth century. But more of this another time. For the moment.... Keep an eye on Gorbachev, he'll still spring some surprises.

3.45 Zhirinovskiy Brands Kozyrev, Gaydar "Evil Democrats"

Interview by Wolfgang Briem

News (Vienna), 9 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The following article provides a valuable insight into Zhirinovskiy's contradictory assessments of Boris Yeltsin. In the preceding article, Zhirinovskiy accused Yeltsin of destroying Russia. In this article, he calls Yeltsin a "patriot." Zhirinovskiy is actually supporting Yeltsin's Security Council, which is viewed by alarmed reformers as Russia's new Politburo, quietly usurping power from a withdrawn Yeltsin. The Chechnya War has clearly enhanced the power of this institution, giving it enormous clout over political and military problems, while Prime Minister Chernomyrdin handles economics. Zhirinovskiy identifies with the council's chairman, Oleg Lobov, and obviously seeks to ingratiate himself with council members, which include the prime minister, the ministers of defense, foreign affairs, and interior, the chief of counterintelligence and the speakers of both houses. The council's decisions do not require parliamentary approval.

[“Exclusive” interview with Vladimir Zhirinovsky by Wolfgang Briem in Strasbourg.]

[Zhirinovskiy]: It was a mistake that our tanks and planes did not pulverize Grozny. We should have left nothing but a big crater.

[Briem]: The military leadership grandly announced: Everything will be over in a few weeks.

[Zhirinovskiy]: We said we will capture Grozny quickly. We have captured the presidential palace and driven out Dudaev. Now we will clear Chechnya from the mafia.

[Briem]: Is the army crumbling?

[Zhirinovskiy]: Our army does not have any problems. The armed forces are the best in the world. Only the Moscow democrats and the press are denigrating them.

[Briem]: Soldiers are deserting the “best army in the world.”

[Zhirinovskiy]: There is no desertion. Whenever unpatriotic cowards ran away, they were punished. Paratrooper elite units executed these criminal elements according to martial law.

[Briem]: Generals like Aleksandr Lebed have voiced harsh criticisms.

[Zhirinovskiy]: Lebed's statements are wrong. There is only one commander in an army. In the Russian army this is Defense Minister Grachev and certainly not the mad Lebed. He is abused by the democrats and is only boasting.

[Briem]: Does Grachev now have to pay the bill for the failed war?

[Zhirinovskiy]: Never, because he is an excellent commander, a tough guy who stands no nonsense. He will dispose of the gangster Dudaev and his clan. He will completely eradicate the Chechens. But the democrats want Grachev's head. With this they are destroying the entire Russian army.

[Briem]: Does the disaster in Chechnya have any consequences?

[Zhirinovskiy]: We must rearm. Gorbachev and Yeltsin have starved our army. The West demanded disarmament, and we followed like obedient sheep-a perfidious maneuver. Now we have to think back to our real strength. We need new weapons. The armament industry must work at full speed again. As in the past, it must once again be the state's goal to expand our troops strength. We will build new tanks and aircraft. The Russian army is the guarantor of world peace. Where would Europe be today without our soldiers? Vienna, for instance, would certainly be occupied by the Turks today. The Germans would still be in Paris. The West should be grateful to us instead of criticizing our policy. Over the past five to six years, the democrats have tried with great success to destroy our armed forces. But this will change now.

[Briem]: Who are the "evil democrats"?

[Zhirinovskiy]: In particular, [former] Prime Minister Gaydar and Foreign Minister Kozyrev.

[Briem]: Where does Boris Yeltsin stand?

[Zhirinovskiy]: At first, Yeltsin was one of these democrats. But now he is on our side, on the side of the national, patriotic forces.

3.46 Zyuganov on Religion, Russian Idea

0. Nikolskiy

Pravda Rossii, 5 October 1995 [FBIS Translation],

Excerpts

[Interview with Gennadiy Andreevich Zyuganov, leader of the Communist Party of the Russian Federation, by O. Nikolskiy; place and date not given....]

[Nikolskiy]: Just a list of the troubles Russia has experienced would probably take up all the columns of Pravoslavnyaya Moskva. But still, Gennadiy Andreevich, tell us what disturbs you most of all.

[Zyuganov]: All the great times of trouble that befell Russia lasted, as a rule, seven to eight years. Now this period is coming to an end. But I am disturbed by the fact that the enemies of the fatherland could once again lead the country into a web of violence and destruction. The preconditions for such a turn of events are in evidence. There are forces of evil that never wanted anything good for Russia and now are extremely disturbed by the fact that under these incredibly difficult conditions the people are beginning to see the light.

Our fabled Ily Muromets slept on top of the stove for several years and then stood at the intersection of three roads. One road was to transform the entire country into a big Chechnya, the second led to a criminal state, and the third was the path of the good and the just. It is very important to take this last path. After all, during the twentieth century alone we have been at war four times, we have lost almost 100 million of our compatriots, and any internecine warfare will end in tragedy for the Russian people.

[Nikolskiy]: Frankly, believers are cautious about modern communist movements, including the Communist Party of the Russian Federation. And there are quite justifiable reasons for this, including historical ones. Therefore we have a crucial question: How does your party feel about religion and the Orthodox Church now?

[Zyuganov]: I would not say that the attitude of believers toward our party is cautious. Recently my colleague, Deputy Zorkaltsev, who heads up the State Duma Committee on Public Relations and Religious Denominations, and I spent almost two hours talking with His Holiness the Patriarch of Moscow and all Russia Aleksiy II. We discussed questions related to legislation in the area of freedom of conscience and problems pertaining to land laws. We discussed with alarm the penetration of foreign religions into Russia. And his attitude toward us was extremely positive. I have regular contact with the metropolitan of St. Petersburg and Ladozhskiy Ioann, and wherever I am I meet with the local bishops of the Russian Orthodox Church and find understanding and support among them.

A politician who does not understand the colossal and largely unique role played by the Orthodox faith in the establishment and development of our state and culture does not understand Russia itself and cannot lead the country out of its crisis. The history of the fatherland must be considered as a whole, as played out over the millennium. By Christianizing Rus, Saint Vladimir, a prince coequal with the apostles, laid the foundation for internal unity based on the extremely high morality of Orthodoxy. Without this it would have been impossible to live through all the hardships of our history. During the period of 1055-1462 alone the Russian land was subjected to 245 invasions. The decisive power in the difficult life of Russians was not their wealth but the power of the spirit, as perceived and reinforced by Orthodoxy. When I studied history I was struck not only by the vision of Saint Sergey Radonezhskiy, but also by his personal courage. Saint Sergey blessed Peresvet and then he began the Battle of Kulikovo and opened up for his comrades-in-arms the path to a great moral victory accomplished in the name of salvation of the people. I was surprised at the endurance of Patriarch Germogen, who during the Time of Troubles sat in a dungeon surrounded by enemies and called for the people to drive out the Poles. The citizen Minin, Prince Pozharskiy, and thousands of Russian people listened to him. They formed a home guard and drove the enemies out of the capital. And during the Great Patriotic War when the Fascists had seized our country by the throat, the Orthodox Church raised its voice in defense of the fatherland. This played an enormous role in our victory.

Karamzin's "History of the Russian State" would not have existed were it not for the chronicles created in the monasteries. And the architecture, the iconography, the church singing! I have spoken with Vondarchuk about how magnificently the choir sings "War and Peace." He said that it was a church choir from Zagorsk, whose singing was filled with the spirit.

We have respect for Orthodoxy. We recently adopted a new program and regulations where it says that religious convictions are the private affair of a party member. Indeed, in the history of our country the CPSU has gone through various periods in its attitudes toward the church, but we have drawn the appropriate conclusions and will not repeat our mistakes.

[Nikolskiy]: Gennadiy Andreevich, many of our politicians speak about the Russian idea, sometimes including diametrically opposed content in this concept. In your opinion, what should the Russian idea be based on?

[Zyuganov]: I recently edited a large study devoted to this question. And that is what it is called-“The Russian Idea and the State.” Historians, legal experts, sociologists, and religious figures participated in its creation. At the basis of the Russian idea lie two fundamental values-Russian spirituality, which is unthinkable without the Orthodox world view, and awareness of our true purpose on earth, and Russian power and statehood. Without moral purification, without spiritual strengthening, stabilization of the situation over the immense expanses from the Baltic to Kamchatka will be impossible.

It is very important to understand the historical peculiarities of Russian civilization. It includes traditions of tolerance and respect for our neighbors. Our expanses were not assimilated as land was in the New World. We proceeded not with the sword but with the cross. We brought literacy and knowledge, and not destruction. Therefore all the peoples living here since ancient times have remained in Russia. What binds us together, what our state was created from, is the Russian people. And without its spiritual rebirth, the rebirth of other peoples of the country will not be possible.

It is very dangerous to use the banner of the Russian idea for unworthy purposes. I see how people who have turned into patriots overnight are trying to use it today. It is not important to them which God you pray to; the main thing is that the money must come in.

[Nikolskiy]: Iniquity, which runs counter to the spirit of Christianity, is increasingly encompassing our society. How can we oppose this?

[Zyuganov]: Russia has successfully driven away those who have come with a sword trying to take over our land and our wealth and to destroy our faith. But we have ended up defenseless before the new types of aggression the aggression of lies, iniquity, baseness, and greed. The people are very trusting. Now that it is possible through the television screen, the radio, and the mailbox to penetrate into each home, to each family, and deceive the people every hour and every minute, it is difficult to separate the wheat from the chaff.

Look at the lies that surround us, how everything is being misinterpreted! They talk about openness and popular rule, but openness has long been transformed into manipulation of public opinion, and popular rule has degenerated into omnipotence of bureaucrats. They say that we have a democracy, but the president has concentrated in his own hands more power than the Russian tsar and the Soviet general secretary did taken together. And at least the tsar feared God....

We are paying a terrible price for our trustfulness. The population of Russia last year decreased by 940,000. The lifespan is decreasing; for men it was fifty-nine years. They are not living long enough to receive their pension! The people are drinking themselves into oblivion. Last year Russians drank an average of 14-16 liters of alcohol, and if the level of consumption exceeds 8 liters, the nation begins to degenerate. There is a war going on in the south of Russia; there are 6 million refugees in the country who have been driven out of their homes. Some 25 million Russians have ended up outside the state's current borders. Many of them are being subjected to unheard-of persecution and degradation.

The population has been fleeced. First they "deregulated" prices, and savings disappeared. Out of every 1,000 rubles they took 998. Then they deceived the people who, believing the advertising on state television and radio, acquired shares in a multitude of funds and banks that no longer existed.

They took away the social rights of the people, who were actually deprived of freedom to travel. Previously 12 million people went to Crimea alone each year. Now half the health resorts in Yalta are empty at the height of the season. The majority of people cannot go there—a pass costs more than 2 million rubles, and a one-way ticket, 800,000.

But still I think that we will withstand this invasion in which slander and money are the main weapons. The people will begin to figure out what is what. Even fools can guess that you can eat only as much as the stomach can digest, wear only as much as you need to keep warm, and everything else is the devil's work....

[Nikolskiy]: A litmus test with which it is easy to determine the orientation of a state system is its attitude toward the church. Gennadiy Andreevich, do you think the Russian Orthodox Church occupies a proper position in our country?

[Zyuganov]: On the surface, it would seem so. The strong of this world honor the church. But at the same time foreign denominations are making a terribly strong attack on it, and the present authorities are doing practically nothing to protect the country from all kinds of foreign preachers. They are not doing anything to stop the battle against the Orthodox Church, which is now being attacked with greater fury than the CPSU was in its day. I understand quite well why this is being done. If they manage to destroy the spiritual foundations of society, Russia will be defeated. At one time Goebbels, when forming his doctrine regarding our country, said that it is possible to rout the army, to win territory, and so on, but it is impossible to conquer this people without implanting “our own” faith in each village. Now they are trying to implant a faith that does not correspond either to our spirit or to our traditions. From day to day, even on Orthodox holidays, they broadcast foreign preachers on television. There is a dirty invasion by false prophets.

Unfortunately, the State Duma has not yet adopted laws that give priority to traditional religions. Barriers must be placed on the path of penetration of foreign denominations. The country’s nation interests demand that the state policy provide support for three world religions-Orthodoxy, Islam, and Buddhism-religions that are traditional for Russia, which have placed spiritual-moral values above mercantile-consumer ones. And this is what disturbs the forces of evil that are trying either to crowd out the traditional faiths or to sow hostility among people who believe in them. The war in Chechnya, incidentally, is an attempt to set Orthodox against Muslims and thus aggravate the situation throughout Russia. We are categorically against such a development of events. Christians and Muslims can and must live together in the world.

[Nikolskiy]: It is no secret that at the present time the material position of the Russian Orthodox Church is difficult. The construction and restoration of temples destroyed or half-destroyed by the state at one time, philanthropic activity-all this costs a colossal amount of money. What possibilities do you see for the state to render financial support to the church?

[Zyuganov]: Many cloisters and temples are national property. There are holy places that are dear and close to each individual, and the state must do everything possible to keep them in good condition, help the church to repair them, etc. On the other hand, many people would be willing to make donations to restore temples but they cannot do so because of their property. And this is a matter for the state, which should implement an economic policy whereby citizens would not be poor.

[Nikolskiy]: One of the most pressing problems of modern Russian life is the millions of abortions. What do you think about this phenomenon?

[Zyuganov]: A woman is meant to be a mother. And when because of bad circumstances, poverty, or a lack of employment or housing she chooses an abortion, this is a very bad thing. It is necessary to support women. We in the Duma are adopting laws on minimum wages and compensations. But if the economy does not work, where will we get the money for social programs? Now every [other] working woman does not even receive her wages promptly.

[Nikolskiy]: The church simply regards abortion as murder. Murder of an unborn child. Do you agree with that?

[Zyuganov]: A person conceived in his mother's womb has the right to see the light of day and live out the time he has allotted to him. But was it not the state that put the woman in a position where she simply cannot clothe or feed her children? I have met with women in Ivanovo oblast. Almost all the textile combines there are standing idle, and in many families nobody has a job. One woman said to me, "I do not wake my children up in the morning-I have nothing to give them for breakfast." So when I see how difficult it is for a woman with even one child, I begin to understand her. She is simply afraid that another one will appear and then she will not even be able to feed the baby.

[Nikolskiy]: Do you not support the idea of a legislative ban on abortions?

[Zyuganov]: There is a time and a place for everything. First let us stop the ruin, the trouble, let us restore the spirituality and culture, let us reach a more or less bearable level of support. I am confident that then our women will make the correct moral decision.

[Nikolskiy]: Gennadiy Andreevich, I would like to know your opinion [about] the restoration of the temple Christ the Savior.

[Zyuganov]: I have thought a lot about why they tore down that temple. How could they .... The Temple of Christ was built with public money to mark the great victory of the people, and it had a majestic appearance. It was a symbol of the spiritual force and might of the fatherland. Russia's enemies destroyed precisely these kinds of temples and monasteries.

I am in favor of restoring justice. The temple must be restored. But while the sacred places of Orthodoxy are being restored, I would not want to destroy sanitariums or to close down hospitals or palaces of culture. They must supplement one another.

[Nikolskiy]: And the last thing. Tell us something about yourself, about your family.

[Zyuganov]: I was born in the Orel region, way out in the country. My parents were teachers. My grandfather also taught in a parish school. There were many pedagogues and VUZ [higher educational institution] instructors in our family-their combined tenure was almost three hundred years. My wife works as an engineer at a watch plant. We have children-a son and a daughter. My son graduated from Baumanskiy University with distinction and is now in graduate school, and my daughter has also shown an inclination for scholarship.

I have traveled throughout the country a great deal. I have been almost everywhere-from Kaliningrad to Vladivostok. I know about life in Russia firsthand. I am convinced that if things are bad in the country for the clergyman, the teacher, the policeman, and the doctor, they cannot be good for anyone else.

3.47 Zyuganov Argues for Review of the Left's Tactics

Gennadiy Zyuganov

Sovetskaya Rossiya, 14 October 1995 FBIS

Translation]

The autumn session of the State Duma, which opened 4 October, will be dominated, one way or another, by the rapidly approaching parliamentary elections. The Duma hall of sessions will inevitably be used as an arena for the election contest, but you would have to be either very naive or else an inveterate political hypocrite to be upset or indignant about this.

In a state that has I will not say a democratic form, but even a representative form of government, any political force must gain its share of influence on state affairs exclusively by means of free elections. Consequently the elections are not some kind of "diversion," but a central component of the functioning of the state mechanism. Their preparation and holding and the implementation of their results give political life its chief content. Any step in the political arena constitutes a direct or indirect influence on voters, an appeal for their support. That is elementary democracy.

So why all these calls not to turn the Duma platform into a platform for propaganda and agitation? Why the renewed talk of postponing or canceling the elections?

The whole point is that elections are by their very nature a peaceful, non-violent way of retaining power or conceding it to one's political opponents. But the events of recent years, particularly the "Black October" of 1993, demonstrate unequivocally that the present ruling regime and the president who heads it are not capable of retaining power by non-violent means, but still less do they intend to concede it to anyone, in any circumstances. After all, the next stage in the destruction of the Russian state is in full swing-selling off and placing under foreign control enterprises that play a key role in the functioning of leading sectors of industry, such as "Rybinskie Motory," for instance. A study of Chubays's list of twenty-nine major state enterprises offered for sale leaves not the slightest doubt-the fate of strategically important sectors is being placed in foreign hands. For some reason, figures like Chubays or Kozyrev remain "unsinkable" amid all the reshuffles in court circles. Here interests and forces are involved for which the principles of democracy and the rule-of-law state are mere words.

Hence the attempt to discredit the very idea of elections, the very principle of free expression of the people's will. Hence the feverish search for the slightest pretext or excuse to cancel the elections-from the deterioration of the Chechen crisis to integration with Belarus.

So the main problem for us today is not going to be the question how the voter will vote on 17 December, but the question whether he will be able to vote at all, and whether the results of the voting will not be trampled underfoot by jackboots and crushed by tank tracks.

How people will vote is becoming increasingly clear. It would be wrong to indulge in victory euphoria, but it is a fact that the public mood is patently moving leftward. The elections to the Volgograd City Duma have already been dubbed the “Battle of Stalingrad,” and not for nothing. The Communists’ victory in twenty-two electoral districts is certainly equivalent, in terms of its moral and psychological significance, to the routing of twenty-two divisions of [German commander] Paulus's army. And as you know, the Battle of Stalingrad was followed by the Battle of Kursk....

But what must be done to ensure that a possible victory for left-wing and patriotic forces is not stolen away, that the transitional period of the handover of the levers of state management passes off peacefully? To be honest, any hopes that the regime is prepared even to comply with the constitution that was written by the regime to suit itself are minimal. These gentlemen have grown used to a different language, not the language of law. Therefore it is very important right now to determine whether a force (or forces) exists that is strong enough to paralyze the dictatorial regime's desire to derail the elections or ignore their results. And if such a force exists, how and at what point can it be utilized most effectively, without allowing it to get out of the people's control and establish a new dictatorship? These questions, which go far beyond the bounds of election procedure as such, are nonetheless, in our situation, vital preelection problems that require careful study and discussion by all interested parties. I believe that the discussion of this group of problems must certainly continue. But for the moment let us return to our first thesis: The sittings of the last Duma session will be decked in the colors of the election contest.

The only question is what methods will prevail in this contest-short-term populist demagoguery, or the accurate examination of the main political issues and the detailed presentation to society of one's own political line for the immediate and longer term.

It is not hard to predict that the temptation to follow the first path will prove very strong. There is, after all, fertile soil for this: the mass non-payment of wages and pensions (which are miserly anyway), the dire situation in the entire government-funded sphere, the unpreparedness of entire regions for the winter, and so forth. All these are urgent problems that must be tackled immediately. But tackled how? That is where the trap lies.

An orgy of socio-economic populism, an auction of meaningless promises, a torrent of impracticable pledges to anyone and everyone, irresponsible draft laws and resolutions costing trillions, even quadrillions, of rubles-that is exactly what is expected from the Duma in general, and from all its factions, by the "democratic" and pro-government mass media, which are preparing to enjoy themselves deriding the upcoming comedy, the purpose of which is to discredit parliamentarianism once and for all in the population's eyes, as a futile talking shop. The country is being psychologically prepared for the advent of a "firm hand."

It is a matter of political dignity for the Communists not to allow themselves to be drawn into these games. We say beforehand to the gentlemen from the print and electronic media: Yes, you're absolutely right-it will be a comedy, a vulgar farce. But why a farce? Because all its participants know very well that within the framework of the existing regime and the course it is pursuing, it is impossible to do anything to alleviate the people's situation or rectify the economic situation. No trillions of rubles, even if by some miracle they could be found, will rectify the situation so long as conditions are being imposed in the country that make productive labor disadvantageous in those key sectors of the national economy that ensure independent and stable economic development in the future; society's cultural and intellectual resources are being destroyed by attrition; and the country's fundamental national-state interests in the international arena are being betrayed.

Therefore the CPRF [Communist Party of the Russian Federation] and its Duma faction are still convinced that the key to overcoming the crisis and avoiding disaster lies in the nature of the authorities and the need for a replacement. And the composition of the government is not the crucial question, in a situation where one person exercises uncontrolled and absolute power. The renunciation of office by the present president—that is the point of intersection at which all problems converge at this juncture. Our faction has not forgotten its own summer initiative on this point and has resumed the collection of deputies' signatures in favor of creation of a commission to bring charges against the president.

People might object that we should not inflame the situation, since it is only a couple of months to the Duma elections, and then the presidential elections will not be far off. Our answer is that even a couple of months could play a decisive role here, since the scientific, technical, cultural, and moral potential for the future, the potential for development accumulated by the country in previous decades is being swept away, lost on the wind, with disastrous rapidity. Until such time as it is finally lost we can look forward with hope, but its loss will mean that Russia is struck off the list of countries capable of autonomously tackling the exceptionally complex problems that the twenty-first century has in store for mankind. The key task of preserving and augmenting that potential and creating the conditions to ensure its freest possible exploitation is the basis of the CPRF's election platform.

As for the government, at this Duma session it must without fail report on the results of the first three-quarters of the year, first and foremost on the problems of defaults, the budget deficit, delays to wages and pensions, and the status of food supplies and preparations for winter. The government is hardly likely to be sincere on these points, but all the same a report-and particularly the discussion of it-will help to reveal the true picture and the true cost of so-called stabilization. Then it will become clearer what this year's budget is worth and what should be expected from the 1996 budget.

Today's government financial policy is built on two disingenuous ruses. First, specious methods of "combating" inflation, whereby commodity producers and workers in the social sphere are simply not paid for work already done, so that overt inflation is turned into hidden inflation, which is significantly more dangerous, with the risk of an uncontrolled explosion at any moment. Second, the blatant exaggeration of "successes" in this struggle and the formulation of unjustifiably optimistic predictions, which then become the basis of the new draft budget. It is not hard to grasp that attempts to stay within the framework of bogus predictions at all costs will once again generate specious methods of reducing inflation, and so the vicious cycle is repeated. But what do we not know is whether the country's high technologies and defense, science and culture, education and health care, and social protection will survive this next round. The hearings held in the Duma the other day on the draft 1996 budget took a very uncomplimentary view of it. One of the findings is characteristic: No budgetary (read: monetarist) contrivances will help so long as the present economic policy continues, because the budget is only an instrument of policy, not vice versa.

Those who talk about the desirability of having the budget approved this year by the existing Duma are clearly trying to preserve a course that has proved bankrupt and to impose it on the country even in a period in which the correlation of forces in the political arena will tolerate substantial changes, that is to say, they are trying to turn policy into an instrument of the budget as well as making policy hostage to it.

This attempt is hardly likely to culminate in success. But even if it does, nothing can stop the sensible majority in the new Duma, when approving the premier's candidacy, from setting as a condition a substantial change in financial policy and a review of the principles of budget planning.

The changes should emphasize two interconnected points: incentives for the Russian commodity producer and commodity turnover; and social support for those who are not well-off-which means basically expanding the market for those same Russian commodity producers. In the first case, apart from the establishment of elementary payments discipline, this presupposes a reduction in the ruinous taxation, the adoption of protectionist measures in foreign trade, and the fixing of energy prices and transport tariffs; in the second, legislation to set the parameters of the minimum consumer "basket," the linkage of wages, grants, and all forms of social payments to those parameters, and state-guaranteed prices for essentials: bread, milk, baby food, apartment rents, and mail and transport tariffs.

But all this is for the future and will happen only in the event that, not only in the two chambers of the Federal Assembly, but also in the regions' representative bodies, left-wing and patriotic forces have a solid majority capable of markedly influencing the executive power's line, if the executive powers themselves are re-elected centrally and in the regions. Judging by the statements of a number of authoritative leaders, the prerequisites exist for the formation of a coalition of left-wing and patriotic forces in the State Duma and in the regions.

But, I repeat, that is precisely what the present ruling group is most afraid of, and it is trying to derail the normal democratic process of alternation of power. The most characteristic illustrations are the postponement by presidential edict of elections to regional legislative organs and of heads of administrations, and the president's freezing of the law on the procedure for forming the Federation Council, which was approved by both houses of parliament. The motives are absolutely clear. In the first case it was the desire to prevent the formation of local organs of power capable of ensuring honesty in the holding of presidential elections and the summing up of their results. In the second, it was the president's wish to have a Federation Council that is in his pocket, appointed by him personally, as a counterweight to the new State Duma and an obstacle in its path.

It is in this respect that the present Duma could do much in its remaining two months of work. At the opening of the Duma session, our faction proposed that efforts be concentrated on the formation of a legal base for real, not illusory, people's power. Apart from the problems just mentioned, concerning which deputies have already submitted questions to the Constitutional Court, our proposals envisage the creation of a medical commission to investigate the health status of contenders for top state posts, amendments to the concept of parliamentary immunity so that a deputy's mandate cannot be a shield for criminal elements, and the compulsory declaration of officials' income. These are rather modest but realistic proposals, and it is certainly within the powers of the present Duma to implement them. But the more decisive steps-the introduction of amendments to the constitution to widen the control functions of the legislative power and increase the executive's accountability-must be taken by the newly elected deputies.

The CPRF election platform states that the upcoming parliamentary and presidential elections may be the last chance to change by peaceful democratic means the present political and socio-economic course, which has led our fatherland into dreadful tragedy. Our tactics are entirely within the framework of the course of peaceful development. But it is well known that it is no use begging for peace on your knees. It takes strength, too. That strength is the strength of the cohesion and organization of all society's sound, patriotic forces, the strength of the combination of parliamentary and various extraparliamentary forms of political struggle-up to and including a general political strike, the prerequisites for which are developing slowly but surely. Finally, it is the strength of flexible tactics innocent of both appeasement of the fatherland's destroyers and adventurism.

We must be fully aware that the left-patriotic opposition could very soon cease to be pure opposition in the people's eyes, at least in parliamentary terms. It will bear an even greater responsibility for the country's fate, and protestations of parliament's impotence are no longer going to impress anyone. In these conditions a major review of the tactics followed hitherto is needed. The past few years' experience has taught us much, but we still have even more to learn.

Pravo, 27 December 1995 [FBIS Translation]

[Interview with CPRF chairman Gennady Zyuganov by Vera Ivanovicova in Moscow; date not given: "You Would Not Talk About Reforms in Your Republic-We Call It Genocide."]

[Ivanovicova]: How does your Communist Party of the Russian Federation [CPRF], which was victorious in the recent elections to the State Duma, differ from the former CPSU?

[Zyuganov]: The CPSU was a system of control, not simply a party. Our party is one of many. It is the strongest and most organized. Its membership exceeds that of all the other parties put together, but it is still a party.

[Ivanovicova]: How does it function?

[Zyuganov]: We have gotten rid of the bureaucratic apparatus; all the secretaries get paid where they work. We have an up-to-date program that accepts as its legacy all the best and proper things: friendship among peoples and respect for those who work. At the same time, it proceeds from a patriotic-state position: It respects the ethnic composition of our multiethnic country and allows for reality both in the West and in the East. It takes the very best not only from the Soviet era but also from the one thousand years of Russian history and takes all the advanced things from the history of the West and other countries. It looks forward and not back, as is sometimes emphasized in the West.

[Ivanovicova]: Do people in the Czech Republic have any reason to fear the return of the Communists in Russia in view of our experiences from the period when we were part of the Soviet bloc?

[Zyuganov]: I would say that you have not learned from these experiences. You are now getting ready to enter a new military bloc. The system of military blocs has become absolutely outdated. It only led to unprecedented hectic armament, confrontation, and the devastation of the planet's resources, to the destruction of all its protection systems, ecological and to an energy and demographic crisis and so on. So, it is necessary to take other realities into the new century. I would say good education, elevated culture, and a qualitatively new strategy, in which, on the basis of collective security in Europe, it is possible to balance interests.

[Ivanovicova]: What is your view on NATO enlargement?

[Zyuganov]: It is a bad solution. I will submit to you one of the variants. The decision will be made, and the Baltic republics will enter NATO. But 500,000 Russians, Ukrainians, and Belarusians live together in northeastern Estonia. A referendum will be held there in accordance with international standards, and the people will decide to join-in accordance with international norms-the Russian Federation, because their human rights are being violated systematically and children cannot study in their own language and have no freedom of movement. What will you do then with your NATO? Will you fight Russia over it? No, you will not. There will be no confrontation, however. We do not like it. This is a bad policy.

[Ivanovicova]: What do you see as the main reason for reviving the Soviet Union?

[Zyuganov]: Well ... let us suppose that someone had taken the Czech nation and divided it into fifteen pieces. How would you have dealt with this?

[Ivanovicova]: But we separated from Slovakia.

[Zyuganov]: The Czechs and the Slovaks separated themselves. But 25 million Russians were left outside the borders of the Russian Federation. So, work it out. We think this is distressing for a nation.

[Ivanovicova]: So, what do you intend to do?

[Zyuganov]: We will resume contacts stage by stage-economic, cultural, and others. At the same time, however, we will not attack anyone's political sovereignty or foist our will on anyone, but we will restore the will of the people. The people will express their opinion. Customs barriers have to be removed. We will live together, but everyone's political institutions will function independently.

[Ivanovicova]: Does your party have plans for solving Russia's economic difficulties?

[Zyuganov]: Yes. We have an economic program, a program to deal with crime, a socially targeted policy. We have already submitted a whole series of laws to the current Duma, but, so far, they have not been passed.

[Ivanovicova]: Which of the implemented reforms do you reject and toward which do you have a positive attitude?

[Zyuganov]: Look-if in your republic, as a consequence of the reforms, output had been reduced by half, everyone had been deprived of all the money they had, and a tide of refugees had been created—and we have 6 million refugees-you would not be talking about reforms. We call it genocide, actual genocide.

One positive outcome is that it is clear to everyone that no one kept anyone in the Union. Everyone worked for the common weal. True, it was not always distributed fairly. Now it is clear that no one will protect himself. Even the until recently wealthy Ukraine, the not always diligent Belarus, and big Russia. They will have to put their potentials together. It is clear that the mass media, which has been monopolized by a narrow group of people, operates as a very destructive force. It is manipulating public opinion and misrepresenting all our history. This is also clear.

[Zyuganov]: The most important thing is to resume dialogue and to do so without preliminary conditions. It is important that all the warring sides take part in the talks. Then, the status of the talks should be raised to the level of the first deputy prime minister. It is also necessary to halt the movement of the arms that are continuing to pour into this region. Another of our principles is to interest the neighboring republics in settling the crisis in Chechnya.

[Zyuganov]: We are discussing this situation, and we will make a decision in a joint forum of our party and with our allies. There are now far too many people in our country who are willing to accept various functions, but they do not want to bear the responsibility. When we carry out a function, we will want to bear the responsibility for our activity. Therefore, we will make a very well-considered decision.

4 Foreign Policy in the Non-Russian States

Introductory Notes

Parallel with Russia's great power debate documented in Chapter 3, the leaders of the non-Russian CIS states have reacted in diverse ways to Russia's attempts to reconsolidate the former Soviet republics. As their economies have faltered and security issues in the region have become more pressing, some non-Russian CIS leaders have moderated their initial negative reactions to Russia's integrationist policies. In some instances, leaders who initially rejected the CIS as a permanent, supranational organization led by Russia have been replaced by others who have adopted a cooperative, even a subservient, approach to Russia's vision of the CIS. In other instances, leaders of states that do not belong to the CIS have shifted from their original attempts to defend their total sovereignty to a proclivity born of necessity to look for ways to relink their economies with that of the Russian state. These shifts away from primary positions and toward more conciliatory ones can be detected in the documents selected for this chapter. Only Ukraine, considered in the next chapter because of its unique perspective and its sensitive geopolitical position, has so far consistently resisted Russia's pressures to conform to its demands for reintegration.

Although each CIS country's reaction to integration has been colored by its own historical and post-communist circumstances, several trends appear to be taking shape.

In some cases, leaders of CIS members have supported Russia's tactics to strengthen the Economic Union and the Collective Security Treaty. In other instances, opposition groups have formed within CIS states and have registered statements of their own against capitulating to Russian pressures. Both these groups' positions are documented throughout this chapter to illustrate the debate in these countries over how to react to Russia.

One of the more effective political reactions of non-Russian leaders has been the use of their new constitutions to avoid compliance with CIS agreements and protocols. Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan, for instance, have avoided the "dual citizenship" clause for Russians living in their countries (which Russia includes in every Friendship and Cooperation Treaty) by pointing out its unconstitutionality. By making its own constitution supreme over all other laws, each CIS state avoids implementing CIS regulations that would constrain or co-opt its sovereignty. This continuation of the pre-CIS "war of laws" is documented in the Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan sections.

Another tactic has been to emphasize bilateral treaties as alternatives and supplements to CIS agreements, along with membership in smaller, regional associations. Non-Russian CIS leaders know these alliances do not necessarily challenge Russia's enormous power and may mean relatively little in the face of Russian imperial pressures, but at this point they do somewhat mitigate Russia's influence within the CIS. Several documents that reflect the emphasis on the bilateral approach to integration appear in this chapter.

Certain leaders have adopted the point of view that CIS integration is inevitable-but over time. They point out the length of time it took the European Union to create its unified customs arrangement and the trouble it is having now reaching agreement on political and even monetary coordination issues. President Mircea Snegur of Moldova, in particular, has used this argument in an attempt to delay the rapid integration being sought by Russian, Kazakh, and Belarusian leaders.

Even when placating Russia's demands for closer economic and military integration, some CIS leaders resist signing an agreement until it has been made essentially toothless-hence the contradictory and often confusing situation within the organization, which cannot consistently implement the more than four hundred agreements it has concluded. As a countermeasure to this tactic, however, Russia has succeeded through its bilateral agreements with CIS states to extract binding economic or military commitments from many leaders. With this bilateral networking approach, Russia obviously hopes to make CIS integration a fait accompli.

Several documents in this chapter reveal another contradiction in goals between Russia and the other former Soviet republics. Several non-Russian CIS leaders would like Russia to provide financial assistance, enter into joint ventures, and extend favorable pricing policies on essential commodities and energy supplies as part of their integration agreements within the framework of the CIS Economic Union. Russia, on the other hand, would like to conclude a CISwide customs union agreement, a centralized banking system, a unified currency, and certain other parallel economic systems within the post-Soviet space, which would guarantee its own vital national economic interests. Russian leaders, however, do not want to risk a slowdown in their own economic recovery by tying their budget and resources to the weak and grossly underdeveloped frontier economies of other CIS countries. Moreover, Russian leaders are reluctant to become burdened with the necessity to prop up other state budgets, which would almost automatically transpire under a unified monetary system within the former Soviet space. As a result, Russia has backed away from its original insistence on preservation of the ruble zone.

In spite of the interdependence of CIS enterprises, the contradiction in state economic interests described above imposes a constraint on CIS political and economic integration. Central Asian leaders in particular have sensed Russia's desire to maintain a distance from their economic development needs and have responded with their own regional contingency arrangements, which are documented in Chapter 6.

In general, Russia's integrationist pressures have been most successful in the military sphere. The main issues concerning CIS military integration have been: (1) the ambiguous role of Russian "peacekeeping" and "peacemaking" troops in the CIS; (2) the positioning of Russian military bases and border troops on CIS internal and external borders; (3) the CIS Collective Security Treaty; (4) Russia's option to use force to protect the rights of Russian-speaking peoples in other CIS states. By late 1995, Russia had succeeded in signing military assistance agreements for bases, officer training, border troops, or peacekeeping troops with every CIS country except Ukraine. Tajikistan, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia have had little choice but to accept the presence of Russian troops on their territories. The one area of resistance has been in the signing of the CIS Collective Security Treaty, which six countries had still refused to do as of September 1995. These countries still balk at defining their national borders as the "external borders" of the CIS.

Chapter 4 provides articles, speeches, and interviews documenting the attitudes and policy reactions of the non-Russian CIS states (except Ukraine) on major integration issues being debated in the CIS. The documents demonstrate how Russia employs a bilateral approach to its advantage in pulling other CIS countries into its orbit, using CIS debates as a forum in which to consolidate its bilateral victories. The documents collected here also give an important sense of the evolution of these debates, in some instances in the words of the leaders themselves, and in others as perceived by a generally free press, CIS-wide. The real debates within the CIS, of course, are occurring behind the scenes at CIS summits and presummit meetings of ministers and other CIS officials. Nevertheless, an attentive press has been able to present a comprehensive picture of these leaders' activism and the results of many of their internal squabbles and discussions.

Central Asia

The first article in the Central Asian section provides an overview of Central Asian countries' policies toward their Slavic populations.

The documents for Kazakhstan focus on President Nursultan Nazarbaev's support for the reintegration of the former Soviet republics into some kind of confederation. As shown in these documents, Nazarbaev's personal relations with the Yeltsin government have been tense. Nazarbaev considers Yeltsin a weak and ineffective CIS leader, as implied in the 18 February 1994 Kuranty article. One of the most contentious early issues between Almaty and Moscow was Russia's recall of all pre-1993 ruble notes, which almost forced Kazakhstan out of the ruble zone. Nazarbaev responded by saying that Russia "does not know what it wants." Another confrontation occurred over Nazarbaev's firm demands for equal treatment and consideration from Russia in the dismantling of its nuclear weapons. In general, Nazarbaev has responded to the abrupt twists and turns in Russian policies with great caution. Kazakhstan's population is almost 50 percent ethnic Russians and Nazarbaev advocates a strong economic, military and political partnership between his country and Russia. Unlike the other former republican leaders who have embraced independence, Nazarbaev has consistently opposed the Beloveh Forest Agreement of 1991 and has supported former President Gorbachev's concept of a more decentralized union. Nevertheless, he has at times taken a moderate position, defending the rights of other CIS members to control their own resources. A noteworthy article by the director of Nazarbaev's Strategic Research Institute, criticizing Russia's energy politics in the Transcaucasus and Central Asia, appears in the Kazakhstan section of this chapter. Because it is written by one of Nazarbaev's strategic advisors, this article carries the president's tacit approval.

President Askar Akaev of Kyrgyzstan has supported deep integration within the CIS and bilateral integration with Russia. Akaev was one of the first leaders to sign the CIS Collective Security agreement. He has fully integrated the Kyrgyz and Russian armed forces, and Russian border guards are positioned in Kyrgyzstan. Akaev, like Nazarbaev, champions the concept of a confederal Eurasian Union, which would include the establishment of a Soviet-type division of economic labor. In March 1995, however, Akaev suggested that Russia was reluctant to enter into extensive economic relations with Kyrgyzstan, presumably fearing that it could end up bearing the burden of Kyrgyzstan's economic recovery. Russia's reluctance to reciprocate for compliance with its wishes by upholding what other leaders perceive as its integrationist responsibilities and "promises" could put Russia in a badly compromised position down the road. Tajikistan's reactions to Russia have been determined largely by the war raging on its territory between political factions fighting for control of Tajikistan's government and future foreign policy positions, particularly toward Uzbekistan. Sergey Kurginyan's revealing article "Islamic Line" explains the thinking on the "Islamic threat" that some Russian political circles are espousing to explain Russia's policy along its southern perimeter. <sup>1</sup>In another article, President Emomali Rakhmonov expresses his hopes that Russia will guarantee Tajikistan's economic recovery after the war. In still another piece the Tajik press documents Russia's backing away from a "special" ruble zone arrangement with Tajikistan, which it had agreed to some months before, illustrating the contradictory role Russia is sometimes assuming in these countries' internal affairs.

Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are in stronger positions to resist Russian integrationist pressures because of one's enormous oil and gas resources and the other's size and sophisticated military capabilities. As the speeches by Presidents Saparmurad Niyazov and Islam Karimov make clear, both countries have pursued policies of attracting as much Western investment as possible, as a means of both developing their economies and escaping total dependence on Russia. Nevertheless, Niyazov has shifted from delivering strong and outspoken speeches in 1992 and 1993 that defend Turkmenistan's neutrality and economic independence, to statements stressing the need for economic integration. Likewise, President Karimov's reactions have evolved from initial rejection of the CIS to joining the CIS and endorsing the need for accelerated economic integration, albeit without supranational institutions. The documents selected on these countries highlight this evolution in leadership views and pinpoint the stance these two leaders take on the issue of dual citizenship for Russian speakers, which continues to be an irritant in Russia's relations with every Central Asian state, except Tajikistan.

4.1 Nazarbaev Favorably Views Talks with Russia on the Ruble Zone

Evgeniy Dotsuk

Komsomolskaya Pravda, 13 August 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Nursultan Nazarbaev considers his latest trip to Moscow to have been successful. Although the fact that Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan will remain in the ruble zone has not yet been stipulated in detail (the government has two weeks to elaborate the mechanism of its functioning), an accord in principle on this does exist. This is, at least, a real step toward the creation of an economic union, in which the Kazakhstani president continues to believe.

Economic uncertainty and the tension in Russian-Kazakhstani relations in recent months caused him once again to undertake a number of energetic actions—a meeting with Karimov, a joint attempt once again to gather together the CIS heads of state, and, finally, the meeting in Moscow. Against a background of disappointment, the Moscow agreement on the preservation of the ruble zone nonetheless looks like a victory.

Kazakhstan felt the obvious danger of being forced out of the ruble area in June, when the Russian-Kazakhstani governmental talks failed, and Vice Premier Fedorov declared that “for Russia, Kazakhstan is a country just like any other foreign state outside the former Union.” This was probably the first time the Russian side had spoken so frankly. It has to be admitted that this came as a surprise both to the Kazakhstani government and its president, since the talks seemed to everyone to be making progress, albeit slowly.

Kazakhstan was clearly faced for the first time with the need to survive on its own. It was then that rumors of the introduction of its own currency began to circulate.

As regards the technical aspect of the matter, according to certain data, the Kazakhstani currency is already almost ready. It could be introduced as a last resort, but this, in the opinion of a number of experts, would still further complicate local problems. Like Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan has nothing with which to back up its own money: It does not have in reserve sufficient gold, hard currency, or commodities. After weighing all the “pros” and “cons” of the unpleasant June situation, it was decided to continue the attempts to reach agreement with Russia.

This summer Nazarbaev has repeatedly experienced unpleasant moments in connection with the abrupt turns made by Russian politicians.

As a high-ranking official in his entourage joked, for example, just the statement of the “Slav three” was like the hole of a doughnut sent to Nazarbaev with Shokhin’s visiting card-for the statement employed almost all the Kazakhstani side's integration proposals that had been rejected by Ukraine, above all, for approximately eighteen months. Nazarbaev was also stung by the business of the Russian circles' interpretation of the Istanbul meeting-the desire to portray it as an attempt to create a new Asian economic union. This was why the entourage around the president reacted far from unequivocally to the Moscow visit and its results. Some officials close to Nazarbaev were inclined to believe that Russia had shown its disregard for Kazakhstan and that further integration steps were not only humiliating but also useless. It was repeatedly suggested that Nazarbaev think seriously about the prospects for further relations with Russia and take a careful look at Asia. But the sober-minded section of the top power structures in Kazakhstan insists on a more fundamental logic of relations between the two states not dependent on the political sentiments of two to five Russian leaders.

Incidentally, in the situation that had taken shape Nursultan Nazarbaev was most likely relying very much on his good personal relationship with Yeltsin and Chernomyrdin, who, according to him, consider Kazakhstan "a most close and friendly state to Russia and are ready to help it in every possible way." But problems in relations between the two states, as seen from Kazakhstan, start at the level of the deputy prime ministers and ministers.

Also, according to certain data, this time serious tension had again been on the point of arising between the two governments' representatives in Moscow, and the latest dialogue might once again have gotten nowhere. But intervention by the two states' first persons led the talks out of deadlock. As a result, according to unverified information, Kazakhstan has even received some assurances that there will be no unpleasant surprises from the Russian side in the immediate future.

Gerashchenko, chairman of the Central Bank of Russia, arrived in Almaty yesterday and met with the president in connection with the recent Moscow accords on employment of the ruble.

Incidentally, for Kazakhstan the ruble agreement will most likely mark the start of a series of complex new compromises with the Russian government. The terms on which Russia will supply its rubles to Kazakhstan are not yet entirely clear. But one thing is for sure: These terms will be quite tough on the republic. Some people at home will again accuse Nazarbaev of waiving state sovereignty by retaining rubles in Kazakhstan. But Nazarbaev has long relied only on his pragmatism. The political dividends, it turns out, are far cheaper.

4.2 Nazarbaev: New Currency Is Not a Break with Russia

Amangeldiy Akhmetlimov and Gennadiy Kulagin
ITAR-TASS, 19 November 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The introduction of the national currency in Kazakhstan “does not mean Kazakhstan’s departure from integration in the framework of the CIS economic council and the breakup of its ties with Russia,” said the Kazakh president, Nursultan Nazarbaev, at a meeting with leaders of Kazakh northern regions as he was completing his visit to these regions on Friday.

Nazarbaev called on Russia and Kazakhstan, “as eternal neighbors, to live in friendship, unity, and confidence as before.”

Speaking on the monetary reform, the Kazakh president declared that “it is necessary to ensure stability of the Kazakh national currency and its convertibility. Therefore, speculation and other shadow transactions with it should be prevented by all means,” Nazarbaev said, adding that this was especially important as regards the Russian ruble.

“By organizing the exchange and sale of the Russian currency through currency exchanges we shall create a normal liquidity market for its purchase and sales to carry out organized imports of goods from the Russian Federation that are necessary for Kazakhstan,” Nazarbaev said.

4.3 Nazarbaev on CIS Ties, Trade, and Disarmament

Interview by unidentified Interfax reporter; from the “Presidential Bulletin” feature compiled by Andrey Pershin, Andrey Petrovskiy, and Vladimir Shishlin; and edited by Boris Grishchenko

Interfax, 26 November 1993 [FBIS Translation]

[Interfax (IF)]: Many believe that your statements and recent CIS summits are an indication of a growing split between CIS states on all fronts. To what extent do you hold with such views?

[Nazarbaev]: The ideology of the Belovezh agreement was divisive rather than creative. But I do not yield to pessimism and am still convinced in the need to work toward a CIS economic union now handled by experts.

During last year’s summit in Bishkek, I put forward proposals for monetary and customs unions, a CIS bank and a coordinating committee made up of leading CIS states.

In a recent article in the Izvestiya newspaper, I wrote that now was the time to examine the experience gained in the creation of the Maastricht union. I also spoke of a supranational currency, calling it by the widely recognized name of altyn. After all, they have ECUs in Europe, don’t they? As if by chance, the ruble zone collapsed on the same day, 2 November, as the Maastricht treaty came into effect.

I am very sorry. We have sacrificed our strategic prospects for one-time considerations. To repeat, Kazakhstan and Russia must not be allowed to separate from each other. All talk about the ineffectiveness of our business alliance is nothing but politicking and paraeconomic arguments by the have-beens of the state planning committee who are not in possession of real figures.

Our economic union can evolve along the same lines as the European Community-we must examine carefully the ways in which the European Parliament, Eurogovernment, and commissions operate. They called theirs a European Union. But didn't we fight tooth and nail against the word "union" here? If we cast all ambitions and pipe dreams aside, we will be able to create a common market of former Soviet republics.

The advantages of such a union include common borders, vital supply routes, and great demand for one another's exports. Where on earth can Russia sell its combine harvesters now? Ukraine relied heavily on the prospect of exports to Europe, but there is a glut in the European market just when we are badly in need of Ukrainian products whose shortage led to widespread stoppages in Kazakhstan. We are also in need of imports from Russia, which has now put up trade barriers and forced us out of the ruble zone. Kazakhstan is rich in minerals, which are in great demand on the world market. But our problem is in being a landlocked country, and the problem of transport will always remain.

[IF]: In other words, you are trying to examine potential buyers of Kazakhstan's raw materials far beyond the borders of the former Soviet Union? How many foreign companies are seeking cooperation with your country?

[Nazarbaev]: Quite a lot. Avalanche is the word to describe it best. None of the CIS countries can boast striking such deals as Kazakhstan did. The huge project with Chevron (Tengizchevroil) aims to produce a total of one billion tons of crude oil. Even the first stage of the project spread over twenty-five years will help earn $170 billion in revenues, with 80 percent of this being Kazakhstan's share.

The list of the world's leading companies operating in Kazakhstan include Shell, Mobil Oil, France's Total, British Petroleum and British Gas, and Agip. Chase Manhattan opened its branch here some time ago, and I will meet the Citibank president soon after this interview. Citibank also wants to open a branch here. The Kazakh-Turkish and Arab-Kazakh banks have opened up in Kazakhstan, and a total of 1,500 joint ventures are in operation locally. The world's biggest companies are all represented here.

South Korea's Samsung has been entrenched in this country for some time, and Kazakhstan is self-reliant in the best quality refrigerators now. Other Korean companies have installed assembly plants for color TV sets.

There are enormous opportunities. German and Japanese companies are trying to break into the local market with the best intentions.

Following the introduction of our own currency, we have received substantial support from the IMF, the World Bank, the Asian Development Bank, the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and the Bank of Japan totaling $1 billion. This is to help prop up the som [Uzbekistan's currency] in the next two years.

My policy is not to go cap in hand. I always say: come and work here but to mutual advantage. Australian and U.S. companies are involved in gold-mining projects here, and Kazakhstan's annual gold production will reach 50 to 60 tons by 1995-96, which is enough to replenish our gold reserves. We have enough gold. That is why we introduced our currency unit, the tenge. We are capable of producing an annual one thousand tons of silver, which we export to Russia.

[IF]: All of this means greater orientation toward business partners outside the Commonwealth?

[Nazarbaev]: Which way we turn depends entirely on Russia. Should we turn south, we would be met with outstretched arms.

Kazakhstan is ready for wide-ranging cooperation with Russia. But if the vital supply routes including oil and gas pipelines are closed, we will have to turn southward. The southern countries are ready to accept and finance us, but this will deepen the rift with Russia. There is no other option but to try to turn toward the gulf. Central Asian republics are now working on an extensive program to lay down oil and gas pipelines and railway routes toward the Indian Ocean.

However, we want to work together with Russia, including joint ventures in oil and gas production. Why should we try to attract companies from France or other countries instead of Russian ones? We announce a tender and pick the highest bidder. Russia can easily become this. For its part, Kazakhstan is ready for sweeping cooperation and rapprochement of our economies on all parameters. But here again, everything depends on Russian politicians and economists.

Hard as its own plight may be, Russia as a big state should move closer to us rather than fence itself off from other republics. Moreover, we in Kazakhstan and I myself are doing our utmost to strengthen rather than break off the existing contacts.

[IF]: There are some in Russia who accuse Kazakhstan of dilly-dallying with the problem of nuclear disarmament. To what extent do you think such allegations are true?

[Nazarbaev]: Kazakhstan's policy on the issue remains unchanged. It has no intention of becoming a nuclear power, though it has been made to taste all "the delights of nuclear testing." The Lisbon protocol was signed by all states deploying nuclear weapons. Kazakhstan had signed the START I agreement and was the first to ratify it. However, the Lisbon protocol provides for unified strategic forces, which were unilaterally stripped down by the Russian defense ministry in contravention of the protocol. Ukraine can easily argue it was not in breach of the protocol first. I don't really know why Russia behaved that way.

Second, Kazakhstan wants its own share of payment for the enriched uranium that the Americans have pledged to buy.

And finally, we would like to receive assurances from the world community that it will contribute to the elimination of the aftereffects of forty years of nuclear testing in Kazakhstan and provide whatever research or technical assistance is needed.

[IF]: Will you be seeking a treaty on comprehensive military cooperation with Russia?

[Nazarbaev]: Last March, Yeltsin and I signed a paper instructing our defense ministers to prepare such an agreement to be signed at a heads of state level. But this is not ready yet.

[IF]: Has your perpetual optimism ever been frustrated?

[Nazarbaev]: Much too often. And yet, I remain an optimist.

I think common sense will prevail in the end. Some of the statements by Russian politicians give me the creeps. I realize Russia is going through an economic and political crisis. I am well aware of how hard this can be. Russia and Kazakhstan are destined to be neighbors, and everything must be done to preserve that.

Our ancestors used to live side by side, and so must those who come after us. We must try to remain good neighbors and sincere friends. In such cases, you must wish your neighbor something you might wish for yourself. So my wish for Russia is: May its democratic forces who aspire for national unity and prosperity win the December election. Kazakhstan will always be close to such a Russia.

4.4 Almaty Views Russian LDP Statement as Provocation

Interfax, 27 November 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Kazakhstan's foreign ministry has described as a provocation a recent statement on Russian television by leader of the Liberal Democratic Party [LDP] Vladimir Zhirinovskiy's attacks on sovereign Kazakhstan and its president.

The ministry could not afford to turn a blind eye to the speech by a candidate taking part in Russia's election marathon, Kazakhstan's deputy foreign minister, Konstantin Zhigalov, told Interfax. He said Zhirinovskiy's statements contained "insulting attacks on President Nursultan Nazarbaev and opened territorial claims to Kazakhstan" and were aimed at fueling ethnic strife both in Russia and Kazakhstan.

The Kazakh official said that no Russian government or foreign ministry officials condemned Mr. Zhirinovskiy's anti-Kazakh statements or his brazen insinuations against President Nazarbaev.

Zhigalov said that a large number of candidates involved in Russia's election campaign were trying to use the status of Russian-speaking communities in Kazakhstan and other countries as a trump card. “Applied to Kazakhstan, this is totally unacceptable,” he stressed. The official said Nazarbaev was elected as Kazakh president two years ago after winning 98.6 percent support on the ground including from the local Russian-speaking community.

On the prospect of bilateral relations after Russia had squeezed Almaty out of the ruble zone, Zhigalov said that “no subjective factors will be able to shake our economic or political ties in the future.” Kazakhstan depends on Russia for 66 percent of its imports and the same share of its exports. “Our contacts are by far the closest of the rest of the former Soviet Union,” he said.

4.5 Nazarbaev on Baykonur and Military Ties with Russia

From the “Presidential Bulletin” column
Interfax, 1 February 1994 [FBIS Translation]

President Nursultan Nazarbaev told Interfax that a military cooperation treaty with Russia would be signed shortly. He had sent a draft of the treaty to Russia’s Boris Yeltsin “last March,” following which the two governments were going to finalize the document.

The document “tackles the issues of military cooperation and use of testing grounds in Kazakhstan and the Baykonur space launch pad.” Nazarbaev explained that the treaty also provided for training of Kazakh officers in Russia, cooperation in manufacture of weapons, and coordination in drafting a common military doctrine.

“If we are to create a common defense space, which is what Kazakhstan wants, we have to cooperate very closely in border protection, personnel training, military doctrine and other areas,” the president said.

In his view, the Russian army would have to spend huge sums of money to build new testing grounds if it ceased to use those in Kazakhstan. In the past over 32.5 million hectares were used for testing grounds, but making such large areas available for military needs is out of the question now. Kazakhstan is prepared to lease the installations there on mutually beneficial conditions.

The Kazakh president dismissed the reports that Almaty had demanded that Russia pay $7 billion yearly rent for the Baykonur launch pad. He emphasized, however, that Russia was not the sole country that kept Baykonur in working order. Kazakhstan supplied 1 billion kW hours of energy yearly to Baykonur, which also used underground water, which "is in short supply in the Syr-Daria River." New buildings in Baykonur were constructed of Kazakh materials. "For this reason, the expenses of renting Baykonur for joint operation by Ukrainian, Russian, and Kazakh rocketry are being computed," Nazarbaev said.

(Interfax note: Russian and Kazakh negotiating teams in the talks that started in Moscow Monday are discussing the text of a new agreement on the status and operation of the launch pad and the town of Leninsk. According to a spokesman for the Russian Space Agency, the treaty on the lease of Baykonur and the issue of which legislation would be in existence in the areas rented from Kazakhstan will be discussed shortly.)

The president thinks that discussion of the status of Russian troops in Kazakhstan would be premature at this stage. He said that he had an understanding with Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin-with whom he had met in Davos, Switzerland, during the World Economic Forum-on having experts meet in early February in order to hammer out an agreement on the issues involved.

Nazarbaev rejected accusations of conservative thinking leveled at Chernomyrdin and his new government by the Russian press and recalled that Chernomyrdin's activities during the Moscow events of 3 and 4 October, when he was unambiguously on President Yeltsin's side, had been welcomed by the mass media. Now it is wrong to describe him as a hard-liner even before the government has announced its program, the Kazakh president said.

Currently any Russian government "will have to stay on the course of reform," Nazarbaev thinks.

4.6 Nazarbaev Rejects Dual Kazakh-Russian Citizenship

Interview by Manfred Quiring
Berliner Zeitung (Berlin), 11 February 1994 [FBIS Translation]

[Quiring]: You reject dual citizenship. Why?

[Nazarbaev]: I am afraid that this infamous dual citizenship would split our society. With a recently issued ukase I have fundamentally changed some unfortunate passages of the Kazakh Law on Citizenship. I passed on to Boris Yeltsin and Viktor Chernomyrdin the draft treaty on principles associated with the acquisition of citizenship in Kazakhstan and in Russia. We should adopt laws that facilitate this.

[Quiring]: On the eve of elections in Russia statements by Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev that Russia wants to protect the interests of its fellow citizens in the former Union republics caused excitement. How do you see this today, after Zhirinovskiy's election success?

[Nazarbaev]: The key phrase is "on the eve of elections." An election campaign has its own laws. However, I am also quite sure that such statements have not at all reassured the Russians who live in national republics-in particular not those who never had these problems.

[Quiring]: In Kazakhstan almost 50 percent of the population are Russian. What is your point of view about this fact?

[Nazarbaev]: I am completely calm when I think of the fact that in Kazakhstan there are eight million Kazakhs and five million Russians. Some people in the media want to see a problem where there is none. Often there is talk of migration. However, this process is unavoidable under normal circumstances, and all the more so when an empire collapses.

Kazakhstan, like Russia, is a multinational state. For many centuries Kazakhs here have lived together not only with Russians but also with Ukrainians, Belarusians, Germans, Poles, Uigurs, Dunganese, and since the fateful time of the Stalinist deportations-also with Koreans, Chechens, Ingushes, and Turko-Mezhets. I am convinced that there will be no ethnic conflict in Kazakhstan.

[Quiring]: But emigration continues to increase.

[Nazarbaev]: I am seriously worried about that. Many Germans, for instance, are leaving us. As regards the Russians, I can give you the following figures: Last year more than 200,000 left the country, not only for Russia. By 1990, 80,000 to 100,000 people left our republic every year. An approximately equal number came to us. However, when listing the current migration figures, one forgets-for whatever reason-to note that last year about 160,000 Russians came to Kazakhstan.

[Quiring]: Among the political personalities who brought about the end of the USSR, you are considered one of the most far-sighted. Most recently, you have distanced yourself from Moscow. How do you see the development of relations with Russia?

[Nazarbaev]: Thank you for the compliment, but I was not invited to “seal the end.” In fact, I have always advocated integration in all spheres of our life. Now, also, I am of the view that only together can we find a way out of the crisis.

I cannot agree with the second part of your question. We are not distancing ourselves from Moscow. On the contrary, we are striving for closer contacts within the framework of the CIS. For this purpose, however, we must bring our laws closer together; we must form a common parliament and a common government, which one could base on the Consultative Coordination Committee of the CIS. We must immediately establish customs, banking, payment, and other unions, as they are envisaged in our treaty on the Economic Union.

[Quiring]: For a long time you were one of the most active advocates of the CIS. After the collapse of the ruble zone, do you still believe that the CIS has a future?

[Nazarbaev]: The introduction of an independent currency as I have often said - was a forced step. Right to the end we hoped to find a joint solution with Russia for the ruble problem. However, the conditions proved unacceptable. However, nothing bad happened for anybody. The difficulties, which are linked with the introduction of national currencies, are unavoidable in view of the temporary delineation. However, it cannot be ruled out that we can achieve a commonly circulated currency in the future, perhaps even to the creation of a common currency, following the model of the European Union.

[Quiring]: In contrast to Russia, the parliament and the local soviets in Kazakhstan have dissolved peacefully. Still, is this a rejection of parliamentary democracy?

[Nazarbaev]: Not at all! Now more than ever the republic needs a professional, constantly working parliament, which is able to adopt laws of a high quality and thus to establish a reliable basis for the reforms, which we are implementing. The special powers given to the president are valid only until a new parliament is convened and apply only to issues linked with the economic reform. The elections for the new parliament will be held on 7 March 1994.

4.7 Nazarbaev Style and Handling of “Russian Question” Examined

Mikhail Shchipanov

Kuranty, 18 February 1994 [FBIS Translation]

There is every reason to suppose that our extremely fluid public opinion will clash in the near future with the failure of still another perestroika legend-the legend about the wise reformer and spontaneous democrat, the great friend of free Russia, Nursultan Nazarbaev-nicknamed “the red emir.” It is always extremely unpleasant to part with legends, especially against our background of massive disappointments in simple, but radical decisions, the aspiration to the panacea of a firm label. But it is simply necessary to understand from where the legend about Nazarbaev came.

However, to start with it is nevertheless necessary to understand to what extent our prophets, who in spite of the well-known parable have multiplied prolifically in our homeland, are inconsistent. To illustrate, we will take two political figures, who at various times have caused a considerable stir in Russian minds-General Pinochet and the lawyer Zhirinovskiy. Both of them have been treated as fascists without any special reasons, since neither the one nor the other in a strict sense meets the classic national-socialist definitions. But the essence is not to be found in this disappointing misunderstanding.

The embarrassment lies in the fact that the same eloquent prophets, artists at heart, whom from the moment of safe glasnost they invited to the Russian throne of their own Pinochet, called upon to cut with a dexterous stroke, in a fully Chilean manner, all the knots tied by the communists, have fallen into despair, abusing their own people as “not yet mature for democracy,” having seen in parliament Zhirinovskiy with his falcons. It would seem that they conjured up a fascist la Augusto Pinochet-and a fascist, according to their definition. They received instead of gladness, vulgar language. Or are no two fascists alike? There are fascists who are ours and who are not ours.

The problem, of course, lies elsewhere. In the example of V.V.Z. [Zhirinovskiy] it has become quite evident that many of our creators of public political theories and images do not think with arguments and concepts, but with models, so to speak; they put feelings higher than logic and concrete knowledge. Strictly speaking, there would not be anything surprising in this since Bohemians have started to come out into political boundaries in the garbs of prophets, and recent theater critics-have made their debut in the capacity of newspaper political scientists.... A whole direction of thought has arisen that can be fully defined as political Bohemianism. The legend of N. Nazarbaev can be explained precisely by the views of this stratum.

In the case with Nazarbaev, the image of the progressive ruler, established during the epoch of the ecstasy of perestroika, completely concealed the real state of affairs in Kazakhstan for many Russian lovers of political literature. To this day, many in Moscow are prepared to close their eyes to the openly authoritarian order of the republic with the blue flag and the absence there of-in the Gaydar sense-real economic reforms, to the national socialism that is gathering force there, and the edge aimed against the Russian community. And Nazarbaev is forgiven a great deal because he is ... Nazarbaev.

Naturally, Nazarbaev gained a great deal from the fact that, at the moment of the collapse of the Union, he was already a well-known and recognizable politician. He had enough intellect if only to follow in the wake of Gorbachev, but to keep his distance, giving rise to rumors of an independence unknown in the Union. That mask of the independent “perestroika-politician” helped Nazarbaev in the beginning to avoid the Gorbachev trap of the vice presidency, and then not to go to the bottom with the retinue of the last general secretary.

The Belovezh agreements became the first strike at the prestige of the “red emir.” On the one hand, he was shown his place, not even having been informed about the plans of the Slavs. But, on the other, it was incredibly comfortable for Nazarbaev behind the cracked walls of the USSR. Nursultan Abishevich, earlier than the other colleagues from Central Asia, understood that an Eastern ruler on his own accord is of little interest without the magical power of the Union looming behind him. And the state of the Union’s semi-disintegration made it possible for Nazarbaev once more to “shine,” coming out with his own initiatives for the reconciliation of the Center and the republics. Taking into consideration the fact that even President Bush at that moment was an opponent of the liquidation of the empire, the mediator Nazarbaev collected points in the larger world game. He was recognized and well remembered. And the longer the period of semi-disintegration lasted, the more the residues of the might and authority of the Union would be “privatized” by the Kazakh, who had understood the methods of Shevardnadze very well. But Shevardnadze at this moment had virtually departed into non-existence and all the laurels went to Nazarbaev. For this reason, the rapid disintegration of the Union became for N.A.N. [Nazarbaev] the strongest personal defeat. In the economic sense, he already did not add anything to it; in the political sense, the losses were obvious.

Vague and temporizing was Nazarbaev’s position during the days of August 1991, but he left the Union with the international reputation of a politician of wise, balanced, and open reforms. The latter circumstance, strictly speaking, in no way assumed concrete form. But the image is really more precious than money. Somehow in the bustle it was forgotten that the liberation of prices, already widely announced, was held back precisely at the insistence of Nazarbaev, and to this day it is unclear what the cost of the ultimatum of the “reformer” of Russia was.

Later the insurance policy of its own natural resources benefited Kazakhstan, in contrast to some of the other post-Soviet republics, the burden of the transition period, and the interest of Western investors in the power of Nazarbaev was hastily proclaimed as the best proof of the effectiveness of the reforms begun under his wise leadership. About the policy that so actively fought for the formation of the CIS nothing bad could be written at all. Either good, or not at all.

passion for reform or even state democracy (naturally democratic proprieties must be observed), but only political stability.

And as a result, the simple end of stability began to justify any means: the suppression of any free thinking, suppression of the press, the pleasing of Kazakhstan's own nationalists, the forcible change of the demographic situation, and bans even on national-cultural autonomy. Nursultan Abishevich drew conclusions from yesterday's masochism of his Russian colleagues, who for the past two years, as it were, specially tested their own fate, discussing abroad the threats of the red-browns, apparently unaware that in so doing they merely decrease the chances for capital investments from the outside. Nazarbaev, on the contrary, quite in the Soviet manner, likes to talk about the unity of the people of Kazakhstan.

But precisely here the "Russian question"-the fate of the Kazakhstan Slavs, who constitute nearly 50 percent of the republic's population-presents a special danger for the building of the Nazarbaev prosperity. The slightest allusion to the coming aggravation of international relations in the "red emirate," threatening unprecedented shocks-and the ephemeral reformist curtain, put up with such oriental art by Nazarbaev, simply comes tumbling down. The projects of the century will remain unrealized, but the king (more correctly-"emir") risks turning out to be naked. A laughingstock before everyone.

The realization of such an indisputable fact during the past several months is clearly obscuring Nazarbaev's reason. Meanwhile the crisis in his relations with the Kremlin is slowly ripening. Strictly speaking, Nazarbaev received the first strike from Russia at the moment of the breakdown of the de facto ruble space. Not having received the requested supplies of Russian rubles of the new pattern, Nazarbaev, the "successful reformer," was deprived of one of the bases of his ostentatious economic prosperity-permanent Russian subsidies. The time of prosperity was over.

Since that time, Nazarbaev and Yeltsin have practically not had a single personal meeting, even during the CIS summit meetings. Recently in Ashkhabad Nazarbaev found time to meet and talk tete—tete even with Leonid Makarovich [Kravchuk], but by no means with Boris Nikolaevich. Nazarbaev with all his might is demonstrating his dissatisfaction with the policy of Moscow, which has revealed, with some delay, the millions of our own compatriots in the outlying districts of the former empire. A new turn for Nazarbaev in the demonstration of character is the problem of dual citizenship for Russians, who by the will of fate have unexpectedly turned out to be emigrants.

And here Nazarbaev displayed, for a refined and variegated oriental ruler, an unprecedented inflexibility. His unbending “No” clearly troubled Andrey Kozyrev, who with all his might tried to observe diplomatic etiquette. Moreover, Nazarbaev not only does not allow his Slavic subjects to adopt a second Russian citizenship, but he also is among those who are now exerting pressure on A. Akaev, who has already given his assent to the Russian proposal. Why is Nazarbaev so confused by the specter of a second passport among his fellow citizens who are residents of Kazakhstan? Is it not because the queues in front of the Russian embassy better than anything else tell about the real achievements of his regime?

The introduction of dual citizenship clearly does not suit Nazarbaev for two reasons. First of all, the very logic of authoritarianism does not leave the subjects (we are not talking about citizens) room for maneuver. It is no secret that not only Russians are aspiring to Russian citizenship everywhere, but also many “indigenes”-titular nationalities. The classic example is Armenia. Second, dual citizenship, under any propagandistic rubric, is the acknowledgment of national trouble smoldering behind the smiles of Nursultan Abishevich. Indirect support for the “Russian question,” an act whose existence can undermine the “Nazarbaev system” the “red emir,” who counted on the attractive, painted curtain of complete political and ethnic stability, cannot allow under any circumstances. The comedy of masks must be continued as long as possible. For the time being, large dollar flows are not coming into Kazakhstan, although those in the entourage of the “emir” are evidently counting on this. The West, having become the hostage of its own money, would be forced to support any eccentricities of the ruler.

However, it is not enough for Nazarbaev simply to refuse the Russian proposal for the introduction of the institution of dual citizenship. It is necessary for him to receive directly from the Kremlin the assurance that no “Russian question” of any kind exists in the Kazakhstan subordinated to his will. There cannot be because there can never be one! And this is why, as people in the know assert, Nazarbaev demonstratively procrastinates about the long since announced personal meeting with his colleague Yeltsin, trying to attain, they say, from the Russian president public confirmation of the “international purity” of the policy of Nursultan Abishevich. To cave in to such a concession to Nazarbaev would be a strategic error for Yeltsin. Especially in the present conditions, when even for the defense of the faraway Serbs, the parliamentarians are ready to become a friendly and inviolable wall.

And for this reason, one can expect from Nazarbaev in the near future unexpected unfriendly improvisations with respect to Russia. It is not out of the question that the “red emir” will blame some of his domestic difficulties on the intrigues of Moscow and simply Moscow inflexibility. Variations are possible. But one thing is obvious, many in Moscow will have to part with illusions regarding the wise and just oriental ruler.

P.S. Incidentally, already in America Nazarbaev cautioned against the extension of assistance basically to Russia, whose policy is becoming increasingly more rigid in relation to the so-called near abroad. N.A.N. [Nazarbaev] wisely counseled to support Moscow depending on its faithfulness to democracy....

4.8 Nazarbaev: "Nobody Knows What Russia Wants"

Interview by Enrique Serbeto
Madrid ABC (Spain), 23 March 1994 [FBIS
Translation]

The 8 March parliamentary elections were regarded by international observers as a departure from the high level of democratic guarantees. This is the first blot on the record of this leader with a reputation of being moderate and sensible, who defends himself by saying that “when you speak of democracy in Central Asia, in Kazakhstan, it cannot be compared with France, Spain, or other countries. If we are speaking of European standards, it must also be said how many years it took to achieve them. It must be borne in mind that women in the United States did not have the right to vote until the beginning of this century. But these states have two hundred years of history, and France, Spain, and Britain have thousands. We have only been independent for two years. We are heading for democracy and the market economy step by step. If we try to turn the democratic cart too quickly, we will risk overturning it.”

[Serbeto]: The economic reform and privatization are proving very difficult in Russia. Has Kazakhstan used the lessons of this Russian experience in order to design its own model?

[Nazarbaev]: After many centuries of totalitarian rule, people are accustomed to collective methods of leadership and production, and so, from a psychological viewpoint, it is very difficult suddenly to accept private ownership. But, despite everything, we are prepared to hand over part of Kazakhstan’s resources to the country’s population. We are conducting not a chaotic privatization but one under the regulation of the government, which is accelerating the privatization process, since it is very difficult from the grass roots. In agriculture, we are not yet considering the total privatization of land, although this is our medium-term aim.

[Serbeto]: Are you in favor of the so-called shock therapy, or of delaying radical decisions to the utmost in order to preserve social peace?

[Nazarbaev]: We started with “shock therapy” when we decided to liberalize all prices, but we must be very vigilant because the process could go wrong at any time. The monetarist prescriptions against inflation are not sufficient in themselves. In the West, they must realize that they reached this situation after many years of evolution. For instance, in Spain Franco left everything ready, but we had no Franco.

[Serbeto]: What is Kazakhstan’s nuclear policy?

[Nazarbaev]: Kazakhstan is fulfilling its pledges on the elimination of nuclear weapons. We were the first CIS state to ratify Start I and the Lisbon protocol. The only delays were due to the fact that we were trying to secure guarantees that this is our lawful property and that we will be compensated for the cost of the enriched uranium in our nuclear warheads.

[Serbeto]: The presence in this country of a large population group of Russian origin is viewed as a factor of instability. To what extent do you believe that this is a grave danger to coexistence?

[Nazarbaev]: It would be incorrect to say that this problem does not exist. Some Russian politicians wish to use this for their own ends, but we will not accept this in Kazakhstan, because the Russians of Kazakhstan are our citizens. It cannot be said that human rights are violated here, but if anybody believes this, we invite all

UN delegations to check this. In my opinion, people's main concerns are a result of the disintegration of the USSR. The fall of a great empire is always painful, and so it has always been throughout history. I know that Yeltsin and Kozyrev are very experienced people, but these politicians should have thought about the Russians left outside Russia when they signed the Slav treaty dissolving the USSR.

[Nazarbaev]: Just imagine if the Russians, who are 52 percent of the population, had two passports in their pockets. They would have one foot in Russia and the other here. That would destabilize the situation in Kazakhstan. Why do they say nothing in Russia about the violation of the rights of the non-Russians living in Russia? A million Kazakhs live in Russia. Have they opened any Kazakh school in Russia? In Kazakhstan, 65 percent of schools operate in Russian, and last year 78 percent of the students starting high school did so in Russian. All the state bodies use Russian, and I myself am speaking to you in Russian. Can any other CIS state say that it respects linguistic minorities as we do? We will resolve all the problems of the Russian-speaking Kazakhs, because this is an internal problem of ours—not that of any other country. Nobody can concern themselves about the Russians better than we can, and we want no assistance from Russia.

[Serbeto]: Russia is trying to attract other CIS states into its military and economic sphere of influence. Have you noted this trend with respect to Kazakhstan?

[Nazarbaev]: Nobody knows what Russia wants. They lack a policy in this respect. It would be better to ask the Russians what they want. We are a sovereign country and are not dependent on Russia for either oil, coal, or food. Since we introduced our currency, we have been living completely independently, and Russia has understood this. We have oil, gas, wolfram, gold, diamonds, and uranium. Russia's relations with Ukraine and Belarus cannot be compared with those it maintains with Kazakhstan....

4.9 Russian-Kazakh Commission Discusses Baykonur Base

Viktor Gritsenko

ITAR-TASS, 12 August 1994 [FBIS Translation]

A special Russian-Kazakh commission has been working these days at the Baykonur space station on practical implementation of the agreement on “principles and requirements for Baykonur space station utilization” and on the preparation of the space station for winter.

Representatives of eleven Russian ministries and departments had been placed on the commission by the Russian president and the prime minister.

The Baykonur agreement was signed on 28 March of this year and ratified by the two countries’ parliaments in July. Now the task is to make the agreement work and to draw an accord on the lease of Baykonur to Russia. The Russian and Kazakh experts have finished alternative drafts of the latter accord. It is scheduled for consideration by official delegations of the two countries in September.

Now, as the dispute over the Baykonur’s status is about to be settled, hardships of the space station are coming to the foreground. Last winter, many homes in Leninsk, the urban center of the space facility, suffered from irregular supplies of heat, fuel, water, and power. Locals say the town will be unable to stand another such winter, nor will the space station be served adequately by this town residents.

Another challenge is the irregular financing of Baykonur under Russia's budget scheme. In the future, space station maintenance will be performed on a shared basis by the Russian military space forces and the Russian space agency. The logic behind it is that the Russian space sector has in fact split into civil and military segments.

4.10 Kazhegeldin on Integration with Russia

Remarks by Akezhan Kazhegeldin recorded by Nail Ishmukhadmerov in Almaty

Express-K, 14 December 1994 [FBIS Translation]

In yesterday's issue Ekspress-K reported on the press conference held by the country's Prime Minister A. Kazhegeldin jointly with First Deputy Prime Minister N. Isingerin on the results of the conference of heads of CIS governments in Moscow. The subject under discussion was new approaches to integration processes between Commonwealth countries.

Kazakhstan had many issues that require the signing of agreements, including on Baykonur, problems of exploitation of military test sites in Kazakhstan, and the status of Russian servicemen in the republic. We also discussed questions of cooperation in the area of radio engineering, defense, and military technology. In addition, also on behalf of the heads of the two states-Russia and Kazakhstan-and as a follow-up on the March agreements between N. Nazarbaev and B. Yeltsin, the issue of simplified procedure for granting citizenship. Positions have been coordinated by experts; it is hoped that in the next few days the document will be initialed and that it will be signed this year.

In principle, the nineteen documents presented for the heads of governments' consideration (mainly dealing with the new superstructure organ-the IEC [Interstate Economic Committee] of the CIS Economic Council) were adopted without long discussions. "This makes me optimistic; this time I felt especially acutely that integration processes have indeed begun, because the states began to give up on full sovereignty and transfer some of their powers to such interstate organs as the IEC."

What Does Integration Mean for the Former Union Republics?

"We are facing so much work that we would not have had to do had we not played the fool since 1985. What does integration mean for former USSR republics? It means extra work! It is work that could have been avoided at the time. Had the CPSU together with Mikhail Sergeevich not missed this chance, had there been no crazy escapades in Riga and Tbilisi, after which no minister could tell what exactly had happened. ... Russia was the first one to ask for sovereignty. From whom? Belarus-that I can understand, from whom. Ukraine also seemed to have reasons to ask for it. From whom did Russia want to become sovereign? That is, the opportunity was lost.

"Essentially, we-our generation, especially economic managers and financiers-will have to fix the mess the politicians have made. Now we are embarking on another part of the job. We have to dig out from the mess inside the country, and on top of that we have this interstate integration work to do.

"We gave the IEC all the powers we could. Russia is very much leaning toward integration; Ukraine is changing right in front of our eyes-the state that all these three years had its own special opinion. But there are still questions: Belarus, Moldova. Turkmenia is still sticking to its special opinion.”

Two Main Principles of Integration: Capital and Property

Integration processes between Russia and Kazakhstan go much deeper. “What were we talking about? About creating between us transnational, industrial-financial, joint-stock, and other companies and legal entities that would agree to merge property. It is my conviction that merging capital and property will always push us farther in the direction we are going.”

“We told the RF [Russian Federation] government that we are ready to give up blocks of stock in all radio electronics plants, and require in return only one thing: that the plants not be idle and that taxes be paid on time. Russia appears to be interested in this, and it does not make sense for it to fuss with building new plants.

“We were asked to speed up somewhat the creation of joint banks. Frankly, Kazakhstani banks so far have not been able to enter the Russian market. The tenge is only a year old; a currency must gain strength, and there should be enough of it to conduct intervention in the foreign market. At the same time, we are getting tired of receiving technical loans and credits that sink into the sand and do not return. Therefore we are very interested in strong Russian banks finding their place in our market and providing loans for sectors that need it in RF goods and services for Russian rubles.

“We in the Cabinet of Ministers adopted an appeal to the parliament to speed up the adoption of legislative acts, because if we do not synchronize our market steps and legislation with the RF, we will fall behind it, and subsequently we will face the eternal question-why? Why do they have higher incomes, a better life, and so on.”

Why Did Customs Barriers Arise?

Immediately after signing an official agreement on Baykonur, A. Kazhegeldin had a meeting with Russian Prime Minister Chernomyrdin and the new deputy prime minister, A. Bolshakov, who is responsible in the RF government for liaison with the CIS. “We discussed questions of a mutual strengthening of external borders and eliminating internal customs borders between Russia and Kazakhstan, adapting the legislative base and synchronizing the market steps of the governments so that there would be no need to separate ourselves with customs borders.”

Why do customs barriers exist? After the republics acquired sovereignty and were recognized by the world community, they obviously did not have the ability to influence each other's exports and imports. So runaway illegal re-exports began all over the territory of the former Union; the states that suffered most in this were Russia and Kazakhstan. Therefore Russia was the first to start drawing borders and introducing the institution of customs control. Today there is a preliminary agreement. If on 23 December in Almaty the heads of state initial the documents on the foundations of customs legislation and customs statistics, on the basis of this, national laws will be adopted on customs and customs statistics, which in turn will allow us to produce a so-called customs union of CIS countries. Later, if each country that is party to the agreement undertakes protection of external borders of these countries, then the border between these states is removed. “That is, we have to undertake an obligation that we cannot export Russian goods anywhere without Russia having special rights.”

What Will Kazakhstan Get from an Agreement on

Karachaganak?

“I am convinced that if capital flows here and we find mutual interests in merging property, the customs questions and others will be resolved automatically. Evidence of this is our agreement on Karachaganak. We deliver the entire output from this deposit for processing at Russian plants. We will receive for the domestic market exactly as much as we need. An agreement has been reached with the Russian Gazprom on construction of two gas pipelines to the east and southeast of Kazakhstan, that is, to the capital.... In about two months we will already have the necessary volume we have agreed on. It will be a total of 14 billion cubic meters of gas per 14 million tons of condensate. For the first stage, to the middle of 1995, we undertook an obligation to deliver 4 billion cubic meters and 10 million tons of condensate to the Russian market. The price is great for us! It is not the $55 we have in the south it is only about $13. Jobs for both sides, although essentially more for us, since the deposit is on our side. The advantages are obvious. We are installing the final link in the gas network, creating a common market of gas consumption-and questions that have been under discussion for two months essentially have been removed.

“Naturally, the Karachaganak agreement will become a catalyst in the struggle between Russian oil and gas companies for Kazakhstan’s market. And our problem will be how to make the right choice.”

Where Are We and with Whom?

“I thought that the latest CSCE meeting and B. Clinton’s speech at it had a sobering effect on many CIS politicians. I saw a great desire to integrate among those who lately have not particularly supported our integration processes.

“All of us and each republic separately must decide where we stand. Life compels us to do this. Where are we? All of us probably will simply not be admitted into NATO. Because they already are not admitting us into the market. They do not want to give us a lot of money. First, they do not particularly want to part with the money. Second, they have enough of their own problems. Third, we did not spend it wisely. Fourth, generally there is no prospect that it will be repaid. So they want to spend precisely as much as is needed to keep things calm here. We have to understand this. And if we sit complacently in the expectation of this for another three years, we will quietly turn into a banana republic.”

P.S. In the course of the press conference A. Kazhegeldin made a remark we liked very much: “There are no leashes long or short. Only interests!” We gladly subscribe to it.

True, this is not the first time our rulers have talked about integration, while the cart remains where it was. There is, however, a difference today, and a very substantial one. New people are not in the government offices across the commonwealth expanse.

4.11 Russian Foreign Policy in Caucasus and Central Asia Viewed

Umirserik Kasenov

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 24 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Articles about the threat to Russia from the south, referring to the Transcaucasus and Central Asia, are fairly common in the Russian press, but no single state in these regions or all of them together can or will ever pose any kind of threat to Russia.

Then what kind of threat is this? Apparently, it is the danger that Moscow will lose its earlier total control over everything that happens in the former Soviet republics of the Transcaucasus and Central Asia and the danger that other states will become more active in the economy there.

In other words, it is the danger of the loss of spheres of influence, in the language of the “Cold War” era of confrontation, and of the need to view the new independent states in these regions not as autonomous participants in international relations, but as the targets of the acquisitive policies of their neighbors and more distant states.

When the Russian political establishment defines its foreign policy line in the Transcaucasus and Central Asia, it apparently proceeds from the following assumptions:

- the continued sovereignization of the Transcaucasian and Central Asian republics and their establishment and development of foreign policy and foreign economic ties with neighboring southern states will do much to weaken Russia's status as a great power;
- Russia is losing access to sources of raw materials and control over the richest natural resources (primarily energy resources) and gold, non-ferrous, and rare metals of strategic value;
- Russia is facing the real threat of the loss of its monopoly in transportation in connection with the completion of the Trans-Asian Railroad and the plans for oil and gas pipelines and highways to the south;
- while the CIS has been virtually idle, the participation of Azerbaijan and the Central Asian states in the Organization for Economic Cooperation (OEC) has expanded and has taken increasingly concrete forms;
- the vacuum in the Transcaucasus and Central Asia is being filled quickly by the Western states, by virtue of the strength of their oil companies and other firms, and by Turkey and Iran. The economic presence of states in other regions is also growing there.

From the vantage point of Russian politicians and analysts, Russia is losing patience with the constantly growing influence of other states in a territory that Russia views as a sphere of its own vital interests.

What has Russia done in the past, and what can it do now, on its southern flanks to prevent these undesirable geopolitical and geoeconomic changes?

Russia clearly disapproves of the construction of a pipeline from Azerbaijan to the oil terminals near the Turkish city of Ceyhan on the Mediterranean Sea, running through the territory of Iran and Turkey or Armenia and Turkey.

If this pipeline or some other means of transporting oil from Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan to other states, bypassing Russian territory, is built and begins operating, Russia will lose an important source of income and a means of exerting economic pressure on these oil-rich states.

In the opinion of Russian analysts, when Turkey imposed restrictions on the oil tankers crossing the Bosphorus on 1 July 1994, it was concerned less about the ecological safety of Istanbul than about the possibility of urging the construction of a pipeline through its own territory. They feel that this was the explicit purpose for the strict limits on tankers crossing the Bosphorus.

Thus, Russia is using all available leverage to urge Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan to transport their oil only through Novorossiysk. The work on plans for a pipeline through Greece and Bulgaria-i.e., bypassing the Bosphorus has already begun.

The construction of oil and gas lines stretching hundreds of kilometers will require colossal capital investments by Western investors, and these will be conditional upon their complete confidence in the stability of the states where the pipelines will be located.

The destabilization of the Transcaucasian and Central Asian states could block the flow of new foreign investments, particularly in the oil and gas industry and in the construction of pipelines stretching to the south.

The findings of an expert group from the Moscow State University Independent Institute of Socio-Historical Research and the Soros Fund are interesting in this context: "Through their oil companies, the Western countries are beginning to exert influence in the oil-bearing regions that recently 'opened their doors to the West.' They are penetrating Azerbaijan and Central Asia and setting up 'windows' to the Mediterranean there. Only the possibility of social, economic, or political instability in these regions could stop the process, because Western businessmen are unlikely to invest their money in a high-risk venture" (Izvestiya, 19 October 1994).

It is completely obvious that if the situation in the Transcaucasus were stable, there would be no insurmountable obstacles to the construction of a pipeline from Azerbaijan along the northern or southern slopes of the Caucasus, but the present Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict has precluded any major decisions of this kind.

The continuation or escalation of the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict is objectively helping Russia prevent the construction of a pipeline from Azerbaijan to the Turkish port of Ceyhan on the Mediterranean, because one of the key sections of the future pipeline—the 30 kilometers of the plans to build alternatives to Russian oil and gas pipelines to the south—will have serious and unavoidable geoeconomic consequences.

It is a fact that Kazakhstan's search for alternative pipelines has been fostered by Russia's own actions, such as the limitation of shipments of Kazakhstan's oil to Novorossiysk and Tyumen oil to the Pavlodar Refinery. Turkmenistan's efforts to promote the construction of a gasline to Iran are due in part to the fact that the CIS countries pay only 60 percent of the world price for Turkmen gas or do not pay for it at all, as in the case of Ukraine and some other states.

Ignoring the objective nature of the processes of diversification in the foreign economic relations of the new independent states of Central Asia that were formed as a result of the breakup of the USSR, as well as the stimulation of this process by Russia's own actions, some Russian analysts are wasting their time propounding the myth of some kind of "Turkic belt" that is supposedly meant to separate Russia from the rich raw materials and energy resources of the Central Asian zone and from transportation arteries to the south.

In reality, the Central Asian states have no desire whatsoever for separation from Russia in the economic, military-strategic, or spiritual sphere. This is clear from their relations with Russia throughout the period since the breakup of the USSR. On the contrary, there is more indication that Russia is trying to distance itself from Central Asia in the economic sphere while it is simultaneously striving to preserve its military-strategic presence and external borders there.

Furthermore, this is being done at a time when, according to A. Nikolaev, commander-in-chief of the border troops of the Russian Federation, it costs more than a billion rubles to fortify a single kilometer of the border, and Russia's new borders along the northern Caucasus and the borders with Kazakhstan, Ukraine, Belarus, and the Baltic states-is 13,500 kilometers long.

As long as Russia lacks fortified borders of its own and the money to pay for this, it should be supporting the economies of other CIS states as much as possible instead of pursuing a tougher economic and financial policy in relations with them. This is not such a high price for the reliable protection of the external borders of the CIS, which are also Russia's own borders at this time.

A harsh decision was recently made on the denial of new Russian credits even to Tajikistan, where the border with Afghanistan is regarded as Russian and where the leadership also complies unconditionally with all of Moscow's demands. The Ministry of CIS Affairs informed the Tajik delegation that "Russia cannot afford to keep the Tajik economy afloat with its own money, and Tajikistan might as well start circulating its national currency" (Izvestiya, 30 December 1994).

Clearly, two incompatible goals cannot be pursued simultaneously: Russia cannot withdraw from the Central Asian economy, calling it a "burden," while it secures its militarystrategic interests in the same region. Another clearly unattainable goal is the restoration of the situation in which the economies of the Central Asian states were subordinate to Russia's interests, with no consideration for their own-in other words, the perpetuation or augmentation of their role as a "raw material appendage."

Russia, the Transcaucasus, and Central Asia, as well as the neighboring states of Turkey and Iran, are closely interrelated by common and conflicting economic interests.

There is only one way to avoid the exacerbation of the completely understandable conflicts of economic interest. A balance must be struck by securing a prevalence of common interests and reducing the number of contradictory interests. This policy has already been pursued with some success. Some examples are Azerbaijan's inclusion of the Russian Lukoil Company in the Caspian oil contract and Kazakhstan's Karachaganak partnership with Russia's Gazprom.

The Transcaucasian and Central Asian states must share their natural resources with Russia now and in the future, but only on reasonable and mutual beneficial terms, firmly defending their own legal economic interests and their right to diversify their foreign economic relations for the purpose of safeguarding their economic, energy, and ecological security.

The natural course of historical events will lead unavoidably to Russia's renunciation of its claims to a dominant position in the post-Soviet territory and to its "special prerogatives" to maintain order in this zone. If Russia supports, rather than undermines, the independence of the new states that came into being in this zone after the breakup of the USSR, they can be its strongest partners and allies. This will provide the strongest possible momentum for the reintegration of the post-Soviet territory on the basis of the still unfamiliar, and therefore still unbolstered, democratic principles of relations between states.

This is the only possible way of escaping the “black hole” and the intergovernmental conflicts that could reduce the whole post-Soviet territory to ashes.

4.12 Kazakh Government Hails Russia’s CIS Policy

Interfax, 26 September 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The government of Kazakhstan has given a positive response to Russia’s new strategic policy aimed at cementing CIS ties.

“I see no dictate from Russia toward CIS states [in this document-Interfax editor],” Kazakh Prime Minister Akezhan Kazhegeldin told a news conference in Almaty on Tuesday.

He said that at last there were some people in Russia who realized that there were other states surrounding their country with which it was necessary to build good relations.

The prime minister said Russia’s earlier focus on the West or America alone appears to be on the way out.

He described as justifiable Russia’s drive for taking its own place in what used to be the Soviet Union, though Moscow must work hard to try to make its partners accept this.

Kazhegeldin spoke of a reversal in the views of the Russian political elite. "Things evolve in a way we wish them to," he said.

4.13 President Akaev Interviewed on Moscow Visit

Interview by Aleksandr Peslyak

Moscow Russian Television Network 28 May 1992

[FBIS Translation]

The first and main question is about the purpose of your visit to Moscow. What have you been doing here?

[Akaev]: My purpose is quite prosaic. Last week, or should I say throughout May, nature has been dealing powerful blows to our republic-torrential rains of unprecedented intensity have occurred, accompanied by mudslides many meters deep. Then an earthquake measuring a seven [on the Richter scale] took place in the south of the republic. They have brought the situation in the republic, which was hard enough without them, to a critical point. I will name just a few figures.

More than ten thousand houses have been damaged, 80 percent of them almost totally destroyed; in a word, some eighty thousand people have become homeless. Most of them have no clothes or food because the powerful mudslides not only destroyed the houses but also swept away everything that was inside the houses. In connection with this, naturally we immediately turned our eyes to Russia, because, earlier, when we were part of the USSR, Russia helped us in the event of such natural disasters.

I am very grateful to the Russian government and to the Russian president, Boris Nikolaevich Yeltsin, for the very substantial help they have given us. I hope this will help us to overcome the difficulties facing the republic. That is one side of it. But today we-both the people of Kyrgyzstan and the people of Russia-feel, as Boris Nikolaevich Yeltsin also said at yesterday's meeting, that we need to raise our relations to a new and higher level, and to conclude a treaty of friendship and cooperation between the Russian Federation and Kyrgyzstan.

Those then are the two aims I was pursuing when I met President Boris Nikolaevich Yeltsin, State Secretary Gennadiy Eduardovich Burbulis, and Deputy Prime Minister Egor Gaydar. We agreed on a timetable for the preparation and signing of a friendship and cooperation treaty between Kyrgyzstan and the Russian Federation.

[Peslyak]: Can you reveal the timetable?

[Akaev]: Yes, I can. I hope it will happen in the second half of June.

[Peslyak]: Askar Akadievich, on behalf of the viewers, I would like to express our sincere sympathy in connection with the disaster that has occurred. Could you perhaps explain what forms of aid and interaction were discussed at the talks?

[Akaev]: We raised four main questions. First, we urgently need a favorable long-term loan because we will have to build schools and hospitals. We settled the question of providing a favorable ten-year loan at an annual interest rate of 10 percent.

[Peslyak]: How else will Russia show its active solidarity?

Kyrgyzstan during May up to 1.5 billion [currency not specified], which will pay for pensions, student grants, and wages to those who have not been receiving them for two or three months. In addition, there will have to be resowing; for this Russia is allocating up to twenty-five thousand tons of petroleum products. Finally, because of the threat of epidemic, medical supplies are needed, and large deliveries of them are expected from Moscow.

Those then were the main-very specific-things that we need today like we need air. We have appealed to many states of the world with whom we have recently established not only diplomatic but also trade and commercial links, and they are also sending us aid. The Japanese government, in particular, has sent us 20 tons of medicines and transferred $100,000 to us. Now the Turkish government has allocated 1,000 tons of flour for us. We are also expecting help from other countries of the world. But the principal issues have naturally been tackled here in Moscow.

[Peslyak]: In his recent interview the Kazakhstani president, Nursultan Nazarbaev, said that a treaty on friendship, cooperation, and mutual assistance that is being concluded with Russia is the first large-scale interstate treaty. If you are aware of major points of that treaty, and a draft that Kyrgyzstan and Russia have drawn up, are there any similarities and specific points?

[Akaev]: I think that the treaty that we are now preparing together with Russia will be on the same level as the treaty between the Russian Federation and Kazakhstan. The scale is different, of course. The history of mutual relations between Kyrgyzstan and Russia goes back exactly 205 years this year. Two hundred and five years ago farsighted representatives of the Kyrgyz nobility sent their ambassadors to St. Petersburg for the first time in order to come under the protection of the Russian empire. Our friendship and cooperation date back to that time. Of course, I am far from idealizing these relations. Of course there have been bright moments and moments that now give rise to controversy. Nevertheless, something eternal, bright, and kind is characteristic of our mutual relations.

Last August, when the State Committee for the State of Emergency emerged, we the Kyrgyz people, without a moment's hesitation, were among the first to take the side of democratic Russia and President Yeltsin, who courageously fought the forces of reaction who wanted to return us to the era of totalitarianism.

[Peslyak]: Taking into account Kyrgyzstan's serious particularity, which implies possible natural disasters or technogenic catastrophes, could we speak about there being a possibility of retraining and arranging a serious conversion of the army toward its peaceful preventive use in the event of such accidents and disasters? Could this become a solution to the issue of social protection for the army, while retaining its security function?

[Akaev]: First, I would like to say that Kyrgyzstan has adopted a decision not to create its own army. We are, perhaps, the only CIS country to have made a decision not to create an army of its own. We will limit ourselves to setting up a national guard numbering around eight hundred people. We are only just setting it up, and we have laid down the idea that you have just set forth, Aleksandr Mikhailovich. We would like to use this national guard most often since we have frequent earthquakes, mudslides, and avalanches, and we would like this national guard to become a rapid deployment force that could be used to eliminate the consequences of natural disasters. It is known that we are among the six CIS member-countries that have signed the Collective Security Treaty. All this, I believe, provides us with firm guarantees of security.

[Peslyak]: A few words about the economic situation, please.

[Akaev]: Both in industry and agriculture, the rate of production decline amounts to about 12 to 15 percent. But we hoped that this year we would be able to somehow improve the state of affairs in agriculture.

[Peslyak]: We are hoping to maintain industrial and agricultural production at the level of previous years. We are also hoping to continue and successfully develop our reforms.

[Akaev]: First and foremost, we would sincerely like to see the successful advance of reforms in Russia because our economies have common circulatory systems and the heart lies in Russia. So naturally the success of reforms in Russia is of great importance. Then our reforms in Kyrgyzstan will also be successful. I believe that our economy will start to pick up, literally this year or the beginning of next year.

4.14 Military Questions Need for Own Armed Forces

Anatoliy Ladin

Krasnaya Zvezda, 5 June 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The army's problems are, as you know, directly dependent on the state of the republic's economy.

In its turn, the army can only expect to receive funds that the budget has at its disposal. In order to appreciate the “wealth” of the budget today, let me cite just a few figures.

In the first quarter of the year Kyrgyzstan’s GNP fell 27.5

percent. National income stood at 75.8 percent of the figure for the corresponding period of 1992. Many production units are being axed, and industrial and trading enterprises are “gobbling up” the last remaining stocks of material resources. It is therefore becoming harder and harder to supply the troop units and establishments that switched to the republic’s jurisdiction following the breakup of the USSR Armed Forces with all they need.

The worsening problems have forced the republic’s military leadership to tell the president, the Supreme Soviet chairman, the prime minister, and the vice president of the difficulties that are retarding the development of the national army. The letter says in particular that an answer must be found in the immediate future to the main question that is primarily worrying officers—does Kyrgyzstan need its own armed forces? The point is that, during an official visit to Japan, Askar Akaev said that Kyrgyzstan is the only CIS member state that will not in the future have an army of its own. At the same time the constitution, which parliament adopted fairly recently, says that “Kyrgyzstan’s Armed Forces will be developed in accordance with the principle of self-defense and defense sufficiency.” And Article 47 says that “the president of the Kyrgyz Republic is the commander-in-chief of the Armed Forces, and appoints and replaces the supreme command of the Kyrgyz Republic’s Armed Forces.” All this gives us grounds to think that Askar Akaev is today ready to sacrifice the Armed Forces in order to find a way to break the economic deadlock for his sovereign state and cut spending primarily at the army's expense. It is logical that many units and establishments under the jurisdiction of the State Committee for Defense Affairs are currently short of 30-50 percent of their full complement of officers.

I learned from conversations with officers in various positions in the republic's State Committee for Defense Affairs that most of them see the solution to the army's problems in the further development of integration ties in the defense sphere with Russia and the other CIS signatories to the Collective Security Treaty. Obviously, it is hard for Kyrgyzstan to solve its security problems alone.

4.15 Akaev: Reforms "Impossible" Without Russian Cooperation

Boris Mavnaev

ITAR-TASS, 10 June 1993 [FBIS Translation]

"Today we mark the first anniversary of the Treaty on Friendship and Cooperation between the Russian Federation and the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, which is of great significance to us," said President Askar Akaev during his meeting with Russian Ambassador Mikhail Romanov.

According to Akaev, it will be impossible to achieve reforms in Kyrgyzstan without close cooperation with Russia. Old economic ties that had been severed are now being restored on a qualitatively new basis, which is in the interest of both states.

Only culture can strengthen the fraternity of the CIS states, underlined the president. Therefore the republic places great importance on the opening of the Slavonic University and the conservation of a single information space within the CIS.

4.16 Akaev: Russian Aid Needed for Economic Independence

Interview from the “Presidential Bulletin” column
Interfax, 28 January 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Kyrgyz President Askar Akaev believes that his country can truly become economically independent only with assistance from Russia. Speaking at a press conference in Bishkek on Thursday [27 January], the president emphasized that the arrival of Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev and the visit of Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin planned for February “would assist with settlement of the issues concerning support of Kyrgyz industrial enterprises that directly depend on economic relations with Russia.” “If we break these relations, there is a risk that the Kyrgyz will return to their traditional nomadic life as cattle breeders,” the president pointed out.

For the time being, it is impossible to resolve the current economic issues, like supplies of equipment and fuel material and lubricants, without the assistance provided by Russia. This also threatens the future of agriculture.

In connection with this, the president emphasized that dual citizenship would conform with the interest in preserving the economic potential of Kyrgyzstan, since this would help to maintain the working potential of plants where most workers were Russians. He refuted the assertion that this might lead to destabilization of interethnic relations.

Commenting on the changes in the Russian government, the Kyrgyz president said that the situation should not be exaggerated. "The reforms in Russia will continue since now they are irreversible," Akaev pointed out. In his opinion, Chernomyrdin was the man who could carry out the policy of economic reforms in Russia.

Akaev said that if he won the 30 January referendum on confidence in him he would take resolute steps to speed up the reforms. "Kyrgyzstan can't afford to waste any time because it has huge debts, which could go on snowballing,” he said.

He said the referendum, called on his own initiative, had three goals: first, to confirm the authority of the head of state, who, under the new constitution, must be the guarantor of stability and of a balance between the three branches of government; second, to confirm the policy of reform; and, third, to stabilize the political situation in the republic.

The president said he would never dissolve parliament, for it had been elected by the people, although under the former regime. “Only the people themselves can determine the future of parliament,” he said.

Akaev, during his trips within Kyrgyzstan, said that he had come to the conclusion that the population supported the reform policy but was dissatisfied with the form privatization was taking. For this reason, he was going to take measures to set up bodies for combating corruption and strengthening the republic’s economic security, he said.

The same day, Akaev addressed the nation on television and radio. He said the main objective of his policy was to reach ethnic conciliation in the republic and that he would “step up his efforts to establish civil peace in Kyrgyzstan.”

He said that, as head of state, he had been doing his best to mitigate the effects of the economic crisis and the social and political shocks experienced by the republic. “My conscience is clear,” he said.

He said economic problems that had been taking shape for decades could not be solved within a few months. Today “all citizens of the country, all political parties and movements, both left-wing and right-wing ones, both communists and centrists, stand for market economics, for freedom for the powerful and support for the weak,” Akaev said. He said the disagreements were over how rapid the reforms should be and over their social ramifications. There was a need for compromise, he said.

Akaev said the mechanism to control the economic situation was being put into operation “slowly but surely.” He said that, by introducing its own currency, Kyrgyzstan had evaded many economic upheavals. The country had also managed to restore its economic ties with other former Soviet republics, in particular Russia, Uzbekistan, and Kazakhstan, the first step toward which was the lifting of customs barriers, the president said.

“We are in the process of forming a single economic area with Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan,” he said.

Akaev said that, if he won the referendum, he would take immediate measures to strengthen discipline, give an impulse to the agrarian reform, solve energy and transport problems, support medium-sized and small businesses, create an atmosphere of social partnership between the government, business and trade unions, and improve the position of the pensioners.

4.17 Akaev on Ethnic Issues, Relations with Neighbors
Igor Rotar

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 22 March 1994 [FBIS
Translation], Excerpts

During our nearly two-hour conversation, the Kyrgyzstani president managed to shake my skepticism somewhat about the future of Russians in his country. Sadly, my interlocutor asked me not to turn on the tape recorder: "Let it be an unofficial conversation, and you will write an article after you have traveled around our country."

Yet I managed, not without difficulty, to secure Askar Akaevich's consent to publish excerpts from our conversation.

Akaev believes that Kyrgyzstan is vitally interested in the comfortable existence of a Russian ethnic minority, not out of purely humanist considerations. In its ethnic composition, Kyrgyzstan differs appreciably from the other Central Asian states, where Slavs account for a relatively small share (some 10 percent) of the country's population. Tranquility in Kyrgyzstan rests on a precarious ethnic balance between the three most numerous peoples of the state: Kyrgyz (nearly 50 percent), Uzbeks (more than 10 percent), Russians and Ukrainians (nearly 25 percent). In this ethnic "crucible" the Slavic component fulfills the role of a stabilizer that maintains harmony between the peoples. A massive outflow of Slavic people would tip the ethnic balance in the republic, and the probability of interethnic clashes would grow sharply. [Passage omitted.]

The main reason for the Slav emigration is low living standards. The Kyrgyz leader thinks that Western countries have proved in practice totally indifferent to such notions as democracy and freedom of speech and prefer to invest money in countries where they can earn a profit. "We are being helped only by America and Japan: as for Europe, I do not visit it,” Askar Akaev added with sadness. As for Kyrgyzstan’s neighbors, which have much richer natural resources, they are securing credits all over the world.

The other important specific feature in the life of Kyrgyzstan’s Slavs is that, unlike their fellow Slavs in the other Central Asia states, most of them work for defense. The disintegration of the Soviet Union left virtually all workers of the military-industrial complex without a job. The Kyrgyz president pins great hopes on an understanding with Boris Yeltsin on creating an investment fund to turn the enterprises where Slavs work into joint enterprises. “This would finally provide jobs for our Slavs, and they would not be leaving for Russia,” Askar Akaev said.

Finally, there is the dual-citizenship problem. In the president's view, it can be granted only to local Slavs and Germans. The granting of dual citizenship to Uzbeks and Tajiks would, Askar Akaev thinks, lead to unpredictable consequences. The Kyrgyz president reminded me that Tajikistan had made territorial claims on his country not so long ago. If one granted dual citizenship to Tajiks, who densely populate areas close to the Tajikistan border, a territorial division would be inevitable.

4.18 Russian Troop Commander Due in Bishkek to Sign Agreements

Boris Maynaev

ITAR-TASS, 1 April 1994 [FBIS Translation]

General Andrey Nikolaev, commander of the Russian frontier troops, is expected to arrive in Bishkek on Friday to sign a package of agreements on the legal basis for the stay of Russian frontier guards in Kyrgyzstan territory. The documents to be signed include the treaty on the number of Russian frontier guards in the Kyrgyzstan State National Security Committee, the treaty with the Kyrgyzstan Defense Ministry on regulations for Kyrgyz recruiting service in the ranks of Russian frontier guards in Kyrgyzstan. A meeting between the Kyrgyzstani president, Askar Akaev, and General Andrey Nikolaev is planned.

The commander of the Russian frontier troops arrives in Bishkek upon the conclusion of his visit to Tajikistan. He had made a fact-finding trip to the Tajik-Afghan border. General Nikolaev intends to report on the situation in the region to a forthcoming meeting of CIS heads of state and to note the need for the observance of arrangements on joint protection on the border. At a news conference in Dushanbe, Nikolaev said that Russia has strategic interests in the region and noted that Russian frontier guards are not to be withdrawn from Tajikistan's territory in the years ahead.

4.19 Akaev's Views on Democracy and Other Concerns

Interview by LG Editorial Board

Literaturnaya Gazeta, no. 43, (26 October 1994) [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Editor's Note: In the following interview, Kyrgyz President Askar Akaev strongly supports Nursultan Nazarbaev's concept of a Eurasian Union, with supranational structures. Kyrgyzstan and Kazakhstan are part of the firm "integrationist" faction within the CIS. They were even "out in front" of Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev on the integration issue. Russia, in fact, may be allowing these two republics to do some of its work in convincing other CIS states of the necessity of closer integration.

On the other hand, the Russian administration is unsure of just how far it wishes to integrate on the economic front. On this issue, Kyrgyzstan and Kazakhstan have been the source of some unwelcome pressure on Russia itself.

Akaev also discusses the interethnic pressures plaguing Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and Uzbekistan. These problems, as he knows, will not disappear and they provide much of the rationale for those republics' acceptance of Russia's military "assistance."

When he was already a mature man, Askar Akaev had the imprudence to write his dissertation on the associative reasoning of computers. That topic was considered super-secret, closed, and Akaev became ... stuck in his groove. And so he would probably have remained, a strict ivory tower scientist, if life itself had not required his talent on other, political, soil.

And so, upon graduating from the Leningrad Institute of Exact Mechanics and Optics, at which he subsequently worked for a long time (he gave the city on the Neva seventeen years), Akaev returned to his native Kirgizia [Kyrgyzstan], where, having by that time passed through all the stages of a scientific career, he was elected president of the Academy of Sciences. From there he was elected president of Kirgizia ... twice: in October 1990, as a result of parliamentary voting, and exactly a year later, by the people of the republic.

At night, it is said, the president conducts computer analyses on political topics. But generally speaking, Askar Akaev began his working life as a metalworker. The president intends to mark his fiftieth birthday, which is coming up in November, among his most immediate circle; there will be no celebrations in honor of the occasion in the republic, as they say.

[Akaev]: Perhaps I will in a way be breaking with your tradition, but permit me to have the first word as a guest of your newspaper. I am a reader of Literaturnaya Gazeta of long standing, perhaps from the end of the 1960s. I still keep at home many years' worth of clipped articles devoted to the reform of science and conversations with outstanding scientists, "Science Wednesdays.” I consider it a great honor to meet you, and I .am ready to answer all questions.

[A. Udaltsov, editor-in-chief]: Let us begin with the CIS: I personally do not completely understand-do we have this or not? In practically all the republics, two currents are struggling: one for full independence, and the other for reunification, maybe even in the form of the former USSR.

As a scientist, could you not give us your prognosis, not for the distant future, into which we have all ceased to peer, but for the very nearest. Which forces, in your view, will be victorious those that are drawing us apart or those that strive to reunify us?

[Akaev]: I think that in the near future, our Commonwealth will be preserved. I personally believe in this and strive to do everything that would promote a closer and more effective integration of our countries. At the same time, one cannot fail to see the truth. We have already adopted more than four hundred documents, but the majority of them are not being implemented at all, or their effectiveness is insignificant. You know that I am in Moscow in connection with a regular meeting of leaders of CIS countries, at which we signed, in addition to other things, the document “On the Intensification of Integrationist Processes in the Commonwealth.”

It was at that Moscow summit that President Nazarbaev’s idea on the creation of a Eurasian Union was first submitted for free discussion, or, speaking in the language of the documents, “for the first reading.” My misgiving was borne out. The majority of CIS members are not ready today to support that idea. As a result, it was tabled until that same distant future into which, as you have said, we have already gotten out of the habit of peering. But that is unfortunate. Peer we must. I was and, as you see, remain, the only one who openly, out loud, supports the idea of President Nazarbaev. Why? Because Kyrgyzstanis, like Kazakhstanis, feel the need for closer integration. And if one of the ways that integration can be strengthened is through the Eurasian Union, whose supranational structures would be able to guarantee effective realization of joint decisions, and if that Union itself were able to merge with the commonwealth, and possibly even become its nucleus, then would the one really exclude the other? In our view, the direct opposite is true: We are talking about mutually complementary systems here.

Now about the long term: The world of the future, in my opinion, will consist of multiple associations, to speak in the language of mathematics. There is the Eurasian Union; it is not being broadened. There is the CIS, and in the next several decades, all of us who are its current members, undoubtedly, will give priority to collaboration within the framework of our commonwealth. Perhaps that commonwealth will in the future indeed grow into the Eurasian Union.

[Udal'tsov]: Soon the Belovezh agreements will be three years old. Since that time, much blood has been spilled; it is being spilled even today. Belorussia [Belarus] is just about the only peaceful one. What do you think—are these miscalculations of policy, or, to be more precise, of politicians—but of which, exactly, and in what, exactly? Or is this an objective natural law, connected with the disintegration of the USSR? It is easier for you to answer since you had the Osh events, after which, it seems, things did seem more or less to calm down in that region. Do you think we could have gotten by without bloodshed?

Throughout the whole world, an ethnic renaissance has taken place and is taking place. It matured in a leisurely fashion, like a volcano, and then the eruptions began. Everywhere, of course, there were their own additional reasons some in Tajikistan, others in Nagorno-Karabakh, still others in Bosnia and Herzegovina.... But to connect this ethnic renaissance only with the boundaries of the former socialist camp is, I believe, incorrect, for its geography is much wider. The disintegration of Yugoslavia or the USSR could, of course, to a certain extent accelerate regional conflicts, but it is hardly worthwhile to seek their main, decisive reasons in this.

The 1990 Osh tragedy could have taken on a scale greater than that in Nagorno-Karabakh: In two days, several hundred people perished there. Thanks to joint efforts with President Karimov, we were able then fairly quickly to neutralize the most dangerous breeding grounds of the conflict. In Kyrgyzstan, practically a front-line state, it is calm today. But for how long? As president, I learned a lesson from the Osh events. I consider international accord within the republic to be the main, priority task of my policy. And today it looks as though we can be reassured. And a recent sociological poll showed that 80 percent of citizens evaluate interethnic relations in the republic as “normal” or “normal, but with a little tension.” For a republic whose people comprise twenty-five major ethnic groups, this is a good sign, you must agree. And still, the danger remains of a new explosion where this already happened once. As a legacy of Soviet power, we have been left with an administrative repartition of the Fergana Valley that gave two of its oblasts-Dzhalal-

Abad and Osh-to Kyrgyzstan; one-Leninabad, now Khudzhandto Tajikistan; and the three remaining-Namangan, Fergana, and Andizhan-to Uzbekistan. Conditional boundaries became state ones, and they by no means always coincide with the ethnic ones. So now three states bear joint responsibility to see that, from a source of heightened danger, Fergana should be transformed into common home for Kyrgyzstanis, Uzbekistanis, and Tajikistanis ....

But in answer to your remark, I must say this: there has not been a single refugee from Kyrgyzstan, and I think that there are no dissidents, either. Migrants, yes. Out of Kyrgyzstan's population of more than 4 million, there lived 1.1 million Slavs, including 900,000 Russians, 130,000 Ukrainians, and 13,000 Belarusians. Today 900,000 Slavs remain, of whom 750,000 are Russians. Such a high migration has greatly troubled us, and we have undertaken all possible measures to stop it. And today it is even reversing itself! The number of those leaving Bishkek in eight months of 1994 in comparison with the same period of last year decreased by a factor of five, and during the same time, the number of Russians returning grew by a factor of four. And those people who today are leaving for Russia are no longer selling their houses and apartments, as they were doing before, but are keeping them, leasing them out. That is, they are leaving for Russia or other countries of the CIS to make money, having decided in advance that they would return.

In order to gain an understanding of the reasons for migration and to take the necessary measures to contain it, we held a conference, "Russians in Kyrgyzstan," this year.

Last year we opened the Kyrgyz-Russian Slavic University, with four departments where a course of lectures is also given by professors whom we have invited from Russia.

At the beginning of the 1990s, the high outflow of Russians from the republic was riding the wave of the ethnic renaissance, the affirmation of national statehood, and Kyrgyz as the state language. Sociological polls of the time showed that the language problem was the main reason for migration. Today it is in sixth place; economic problems have emerged in first place. That is, people most of all need work, employment. But here is a concrete illustration: we have approximately thirty enterprises of the military-industrial complex, which employ 70 to 80 percent Russians. These enterprises, which are capable of producing articles that are unique and necessary to Russia, are standing idle. I took Minister Kozyrev, General Gromov, and other representatives of the Russian military-industrial complex there. I did not ask, and do not ask, for assistance. I am proposing to create a joint Kyrgyz-Russian investment fund, which is beyond the power of Kyrgyzstan alone today. We are prepared to give the Russian government or the Russian partners of our enterprises parcels of stock, even controlling ones. Our proposal: Russia will pay R25 billion into the fund and will lend us the same amount; that is our payment, and Kyrgyzstan will return it. President Yeltsin has supported this idea, but there the matter ended. You are worried about the fate of your countrymen in the “near abroad,” but after all, these are citizens of Kyrgyzstan and an irreplaceable cadre resource of the republic-do I really have less of a reason to ache for them? So would it not be better for us and you, instead of wrangling with each other, to seek mutually acceptable solutions? ...

[I. Gamayunov, observer]: It is known that almost all of your Communist Party secretaries occupy important posts even today. To what extent has your nomenklatura been revived, and what are your relations with its old segment?

[Akaev]: I have good relations with them. The thing is, we have no choice. It is Russia that has a choice. It is rich in cadres; it has a remarkable intelligentsia, colossal intellectual potential, and natural resources. Russia is predestined by fate to be reborn into a great power.

But we had no choice. We, perhaps, are the only country in the CIS that did not disperse the Communist Party. The Communist Party of Kyrgyzstan even today is the most organized political force in the country, for the rest of the parties, and we have only ten of them, remind one more of party clubs. All the former Communist Party secretaries even today are in prominent posts in the government and parliament.

What guided me as president, when I made such a compromise? Last year we had a government crisis. I proposed to parliament to nominate everyone it considered necessary to include in the government. Thirty people were nominated, among whom were communists, social-democrats, republicans, and many others. First, the candidates were named by the parties themselves; then they held a straw vote and distributed the portfolios depending on the rating of each candidate. The highest rating was received by Amanbaev, the final first secretary of the Communist Party, who once worked as agriculture secretary. He got the post of first deputy prime minister for agriculture. For five years, before him the first party secretary was Masaliev-he headed the committee on mining. Earlier still, the party in the republic was headed for twenty-five years by Usubaliev-today he is a people's deputy around whom a large deputy group has rallied.

I understand democracy this way: it is obligated to work with those people who are brought forward by legitimate organs of the people's sovereignty ....

[Moroz]: Is it true that the Tajik-Afghan border is guarded primarily by Russian border guards? Why do you not participate in this, despite the signed agreements? What consequences for the republics of Central Asia, for Kyrgyzstan in particular, could result from the probable withdrawal of Russian border forces from Tajikistan?

[Akaev]: We are simply, for modesty's sake, not making a show of our participation. But I must say that we are observing the spirit and the letter of these agreements with precision. Quickly upon concluding the agreement, our Kyrgyz battalion was the first to arrive at that border. In winter, it executed a rapid march over snow-covered mountains. It is there to this day. We have reinforced it three times. That is the only strategic road by which the provision of all the Pamirs travels. Jointly with the Russian border forces, we monitor the security of this road, in order to prevent the transport over it of arms and narcotics ....

Our som is convertible. Without false modesty, I can say that our currency today is the strongest in the CIS. When we introduced it, a year and a half ago, inflation amounted to 17 percent. Today it is 0.2 percent. On the black and the interbank markets, the currency rates are practically indistinguishable. From the very beginning, we began to conduct a tough monetary-credit policy- and we held out. Of course, we would have had a very hard time without dollar reinforcement. But from the initial financial stabilization, we were able without a break to make the transition to the three-year program of structural transformations in the economy approved by the IMF and the World Bank. Now the som continues to gain strength.

[G. Tsitrinyak, observer]: Your neighbor, Nazarbaev, speaks out categorically against dual citizenship. He says that the people will not understand it. What do you think?

[Akaev]: In 1992, Kyrgyzstan was the first to sign the treaty with Russia on Friendship, Cooperation, and Mutual Assistance, which contains a clause on the granting of dual citizenship on the basis of bilateral agreements. But in our constitution there is no such statute; it did not pass in parliament. So we still need to resolve that question ....

All this is all the more vexing in that in the beginning we worked very cordially with our parliament. I note in passing that Russia does not make sufficient use of its parliament. How otherwise to explain the fact that S.S. Alekseev together with his collaborators helped us to write the drafts of many laws, which we passed first and which were then recopied, just about word for word, in other CIS countries? Privatization, land reform, reconstruction of the banking and financial system they gave the impetus to all these processes and changed people's outlook. And then in that moment when the greatest mobility was required of the Kyrgyzstan parliament, it became incapable of functioning; its conservative segment began stubbornly to apply the brake to the reforms. What was left for me to do as president? I did not make use of my right to disband parliament, but simply set new parliamentary elections. This is exactly the wish of those deputies whom I call the reform wing. I am sure that the October referendum will become pivotal for Kyrgyzstan, and that the new parliament, which now, per the Russian model, will become bicameral, will continue the course of reforms and the democratization of life in our republic.

4.20 Deputy Foreign Minister on Relations with Russia, CIS

Interview

VKontse Nideli, 4 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

A whole range of bilateral relations between Kyrgyzstan and Russia will be under consideration during the coming visit of the Russian deputy foreign minister, A. Panov, to Bishkek. Intense preparation of all the necessary documents is currently going on.

Our correspondent met with Kyrgyz Deputy Foreign Minister Alikbek Dzhekshenkulov:

[Correspondent]: How would you describe the present Kyrgyz-Russian relations?

[Dzhekshenkulov]: They are fairly dynamic. Both sides are interested in close friendly relations, which is owed to our history and traditional economic, cultural, and scientific ties as well.

Unfortunately, in recent years there have been losses too. Mostly this is explained by the quick and, for many, unexpected collapse of the Soviet Union. All the citizens of a single huge state woke up one day as citizens of different countries. And the former Soviet republics, having gained their independence, for some time literally relished their freedom. And in this understandable condition of euphoria they somehow forgot about real people. On this wave, some ill-considered and badly prepared laws were adopted, and the outflow from the republics of able-bodied people and highly qualified specialists in many different spheres began. It became clear that this abnormal situation must be changed.

[Correspondent]: Probably all of us now realize that some of the laws that were adopted need correcting.

[Dzhekshenkulov]: That is why we are preparing agreements on various items: cultural and scientific cooperation between Kyrgyzstan and Russia, the main principles for the creation of joint financial and industrial groups, regulations concerning problems of citizenship, the protection of the rights of migrants, the establishment and activities of information and cultural centers, and the establishment of a customs union. Of course, this is not a full list, but all the issues, we hope, will be resolved in a spirit of good will and mutual understanding.

Incidentally, our ministry has good contacts with the Russian embassy. Twice recently Ambassador M. Romanov visited the foreign ministry with all his services. It is easy for us to find a common language.

[Correspondent]: Russia and Kazakhstan recently signed important agreements, thus greatly stimulating the integration process further. And specialists and political scientists have again begun to speak about the idea of the Eurasian Union, put forward by Kazakhstan's president, Nursultan Nazarbaev.

[Dzhekshenkulov]: Of course we are happy with such developments in relations between Russia and Kazakhstan. All of us, the former inhabitants of a single Union, are united by many things and this is what should determine the policy of the leaders. Once again such relations are the cornerstone of our foreign policy, especially toward the CIS countries.

And as for the Eurasian Union, [President] Askar Akaevich [Akaev] was the first CIS president to support Nazarbaev's idea.

[Correspondent]: Some newspapers have reproached Kyrgyzstan's foreign ministry for not issuing a special statement about events in Chechnya.

[Dzhekshenkulov]: Throughout the world there is a definite order. The foreign ministry is not obliged to issue a press statement. In most cases we use diplomatic channels and our offices abroad and foreign embassies in Bishkek to express our position.

Our position from the very beginning has been clear: It is Russia's internal affair. Of course, we cannot remain untroubled by war and deaths, especially of civilians. We expressed our concern and at the same time our hope that the situation will be settled by political means.

[Correspondent]: Since we have started talking about hot spots, we cannot avoid Tajikistan.

[Dzhekshenkulov]: I visited Dushanbe recently as part of a delegation headed by Deputy Prime Minister Ibraimov. We reached agreement on most issues concerning bilateral relations, but some problems remain unsolved. First of all, the problems of land use in border regions. But the negotiations will continue, and we hope that mutually suitable solutions will be found.

The situation in Tajikistan, of course, is very complicated. We are worried about the situation on the Tajik-Afghan border. The acute problems do not pass our country by: the drug business, refugees, the condition of the Kyrgyz diaspora in Tajikistan. The foreign ministry is permanently monitoring the progress of events and informing the country's leadership about them. [Passage omitted.]

4.21 Akaev on the Economy, Policies, and Integration Interview by Aleksandr Shinkin

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 25 March 1995 [FBIS Translation]

[Shinkin]: Askar Akaevich, the lives of people today are increasingly dominated by worries about their daily bread.

[Shinkin]: Askar Akaevich, the lives of people today are increasingly dominated by worries about their daily bread.

Naturally, my first question is: What is the economic situation in Kyrgyzstan, for which total bankruptcy was being predicted some time ago?

[Akaev]: The situation in our economy is grave, as it is, incidentally, in all former Union republics: major slump in production, enterprises coming to a standstill, unemployment.... We are experiencing all this. But the situation is not hopeless.

Over the last few years we have laid down firm foundations for a market economy and have created institutions of private ownership and entrepreneurship. Privatization and destatization of property are actively under way, as is the restructuring of enterprises.... To put it briefly, all the prerequisites exist for ensuring the start of the republic's economic recovery. For example, we are expecting noticeable growth of light industrial output already this year.

We are pinning great hopes on the gold extracting sector, although the crisis has not bypassed it either. But gold output started rising already last year. And the quantity of gold obtained from auriferous gravel increased fivefold compared with the previous year. Whereas now we are producing just over 3.5 tons, in some three to five years' time, when the mines are fully operational, in terms of gold production Kyrgyzstan will rank third among CIS countries and twelfth or fifteenth among the world's gold-extracting countries. True enough, for the time being, this is like a bird in the bush. But we are attracting all sorts of foreign investment to ensure that this bird ends up in our hands.

[Shinkin]: And you are thus providing ground for the accusations leveled against you that you are allegedly selling off the country.

[Akaev]: The country is being exported and sold off by criminals and corrupt functionaries. In contrast, the investments and credits are helping us only to consolidate Kyrgyzstan's economic potential. Without them we will be unable to revive our cities and get our industry and countryside back on their feet. After all, the country's economy was founded on intra-Union division of labor-major machinebuilding enterprises and mining and metallurgical combines that depended entirely on deliveries and orders from outside the republic, on the one hand, and an agro-industrial complex that was primarily geared to raw materials, on the other hand. When the Union disintegrated, our national economy was doomed to come to a standstill.

As a matter of fact, the accusations you mentioned are diminishing. The people are now aware of the truth about the republic's potential and are beginning to realize that nothing is handed out free like manna from heaven, and nobody is going to dish out free meals. But the main lesson lies perhaps elsewhere. People are beginning to realize the simple truth. Our lives are not likely to start improving if we continue to live and work as in the past.

Opening up new deposits using our own resources seemed unimaginable in the past. Things have changed nowadays. The “Solton-Sary” gold deposit, which lies at an altitude of 3,500 meters, was planned, developed, and built using only our own resources, without involving anyone from the “near abroad.” We assimilated unique technologies. Furthermore, it took only ten months from the time we drove in the first pegs until we started producing metal. Thus, the help from international financial organizations and leading developed countries is just a backup for the main work we are doing in order to extricate ourselves from the grips of socio-economic crisis.

[Shinkin]: Askar Akaevich, some time ago you drew fire on yourself by introducing your own currency unit. This was done, as the critics claimed, for the sake of receiving the financial aid in question. Is your som not letting you down nowadays?

[Akaev]: The national currency’s introduction was certainly not prompted by any desire to receive large credits from international financial organizations. Nor was it done in secret. The problem was discussed with many Russian economists and members of government. The point is that confusion and migration processes within the ruble zone are advantageous for some and not for others.

Kyrgyzstan was in the second category. We added up and saw for ourselves. In 1992 we lost 13 billion [rubles] (I well remember this amount) just through ruble exchange rate fluctuations. This was a vast amount at that time. Furthermore, it increased the budget deficit by almost two-thirds. This calculation convinced me that it was necessary to introduce our own currency.

There was, of course, a lot of confusion to begin with. But we ended last year with inflation at 87 percent. We are planning to bring it down to 30 or 40 percent this year. Let me also note that one out of every two sums is backed either by gold or by Treasury bonds held in U.S. banks. The currency exchange rate is virtually identical on both the black market and the interbank market in our country.

I assume that the collapse of the ruble zone proved advantageous for all. The CIS countries established new relations. And the economic union can now be built on the honest and fair basis of national currencies.

[Shinkin]: In the course of interviews, the leaders of other republics do not fail to mention the problems caused by the disruption of economic ties with Russia. You have kept silent about them. Has it not affected Kyrgyzstan?

[Akaev]: What can I say that is new? Our largest enterprises were geared entirely to consumers who were located mainly in Russia. Now these enterprises have no end of troubles. There are no orders. There are no supplies. The majority of them are standing idle. Workers have not been paid their wages for months ....

There is only one way out-the creation of joint production units and financial-industrial groups. I even offered Russia the opportunity to buy the controlling blocks of shares in our twenty-nine largest enterprises. Yeltsin and Chernomyrdin backed this idea. But the president's agreement is to this day "doing the rounds" of bureaucratic offices. A Kyrgyz-Russian joint-stock company for developing the "Sary-Dzhaz" lead and tungsten deposit was recently set up with great difficulties.

You must realize that the point at issue here goes further than just mutual advantage. Russia's prolonged absence from Central Asian markets will only help to squeeze it out of here.

Of course, Kyrgyzstan would not like to see this happen. Any break in ties with Russia would be painful for us. I recently conversed with leaders of Bishkek's Lenin Machine-Building Plant. The shop producing combine harvester chains has reopened there after a lengthy idle period. Its familiar output has been augmented by new products-chains for Zhiguli and Moskvich cars. The main consumer is Russia, which supplies the metal. The plant now urgently needs skilled workers, but they cannot be found.

[Shinkin]: Alas, Askar Akaevich, skilled workers and specialists are now, as a rule, refugees. They were the first among Kyrgyzstan's Slavs, as you said, to leave the republic. The outflow is still going on. According to unconfirmed data, more than two hundred thousand of them have left.

[Akaev]: Let me note that there has not been a single refugee from Kyrgyzstan. Nor, I hope, dissidents. Migrants-yes. But that is a different story.

We have experienced two main stages of migration.

The first followed the well-known events in Osh-a tragic conflict. But, thanks to joint efforts with President Karimov of Uzbekistan, we succeeded at the time rather quickly to neutralize the dangerous hotbeds. The second outburst of Slavs' departure was prompted by the euphoria of independence and sovereignty. As president, I learned a lesson even from the Osh events. I consider interethnic accord in the republic the main task of my policy. And I am making all efforts, doing everything possible and impossible, to halt the migration flow.

Here are just some of the measures. Our parliament adopted a law code providing that the land belongs exclusively to the Kyrgyz people. As president, I vetoed it and returned it on three occasions until I succeeded in gaining the support of the majority in parliament. The injustice was eliminated. I did the same with the deputies' amendment to housing legislation, which again was detrimental mainly to the Slavs.

[Shinkin]: But you must agree that your efforts are not sufficient on their own. There is nothing more frightening for the non-indigenous population than local nationalism. The quiet survival of the “foreigner,” which cannot be noticed by outsiders.

[Akaev]: I think it was [George] Bernard Shaw who said that nationality is like the spine—a healthy person never notices that he has one. But even if someone in our country does suffer from this plague, all the symptoms of recovery are present. Let us assume that the language problem used to rank first among the factors causing migration. Current sociological polls indicate that it has slipped down to sixth place. At the top of the list, incidentally, the question of cooperation with Russia has been joined by economic difficulties; in other words, people need work most of all.

[Shinkin]: It seems to me, Askar Akaevich, that we have overlooked one of the most acute problems facing Kyrgyzstan's Slavs—dual citizenship. Back in 1992 you signed with Russia a treaty on friendship, cooperation, and mutual assistance, which contains a clause about the granting of dual citizenship. But to this day nothing has actually been done.

[Akaev]: Unfortunately, it is not easy to solve this problem. There is no such provision in our constitution; our parliament did not pass it. There are weighty arguments in favor of doing so. Non-indigenous peoples account for almost half the republic's population of more than 4 million. In addition to Russians, Ukrainians, and Belarusians, we also have large Uzbek, Tajik, German, Dungan, and Uyghur communities.... There is a total of about twenty-five large ethnic groups and a further fifty smaller ones. Which one should get preferential treatment? All of them? But then there would be no Kyrgyzstan. The Russians? But would such an exception be fair to all the rest? In my view, the best possible solution was reached by Russia and Kyrgyzstan, which recently concluded an agreement on a simplified granting of citizenship.

The adoption of a law on dual citizenship would not be sufficient to maintain Kyrgyzstan's multinational composition. I think that it would be much more important to ensure that the organs of state power provide fair representation not only for the "indigenous" nation but also for the other peoples. In my capacity as president, I will personally take care of this. Otherwise it would be difficult to expect the building of a truly democratic society in the republic.

[Shinkin]: Strange. You talk about market economics and democracy, and in the same breath you speak of the Lenin plant. A pristine monument to Lenin stands in downtown Bishkek as if nothing has happened. Are Lenin and democracy coexisting?

[Akaev]: Let me also add that we are probably the only CIS country that has not disbanded the Communist Party. It remains the best organized political force in the republic. All its former secretaries, even the very last one, held eminent positions in the government and in parliament.

In the wake of the government crisis some eighteen months ago, I suggested to parliament: Nominate all those whom you consider necessary for inclusion in the government. The parties nominated their own candidates to begin with. A total of thirty persons were nominated. The deputies then took a straw poll and distributed the portfolios according to each candidate's rating. Consequently Amanbaev, a former Communist Party Central Committee first secretary, became vice premier, while another-Masaliev-headed the committee for mining affairs. And the skies did not fall in Kyrgyzstan because of this. Democracy makes it incumbent upon me to work with people nominated by the legitimate organs of power.

[Shinkin]: As far as I know, in your capacity as a scientist, you were successful in making light particles obey certain rules and bringing them into a state of accord. But accord in society is evidently difficult to achieve. There is a powerful opposition in the republic. You are perhaps the favorite person of the free press. It tirelessly praises the president's personality, your wife, and your relatives. Are you, Askar Akaevich, not afraid that you might fall victim to your own popularity?

[Akaev]: What can you do—this, as a rule, is the fate of all reformers. But, as a matter of fact, it is not a question of my own personality. When we started building an independent sovereign state, we began with the universal prescriptions of democracy-development of parliamentarianism, separation of powers, freedom of the press. The time has now come to put all this in order and check it against the main criterion of democracy-human freedom. And yet some other CIS countries opted for taking a somewhat different path. But if we want a genuine democracy rather than a cheap imitation of it, we have to drink up all of this cup. If they are to be capable of running their own lives and shaping their common fate, people must first of all learn to freely express their opinion.

The fact that we have a strong opposition is not bad, either. Whether constructive or non-constructive, whether its criticism is to the point or is nothing but propaganda passions-these are the opposition's problems, so to speak.

Ultimately, people can see very well who is sincerely on their side and who is promoting his own ambitions. I regret just one thing: Tolerance and civic spirit are not always present in public debates, even though the authorities and the opposition alike must obey the law's demands.

[Shinkin]: Tell me, have you ever had the idea of following the advice of Griboedov's hero: Get all the troublemakers together and apply the force of authority against them? After all, you would more than likely gain quite a few supporters.

[Akaev]: I am not too sure. I think that there will hardly be anyone likely to force the Kyrgyz people to abandon their freedom of thought. Respect for authority [chinopochitanie] was never a trait of our national character even in the past, let alone today.

Here is a typical detail. Whenever I get a free moment, I love browsing through the pages of our national epic poem "Manas," whose millennium will be celebrated this year. Right through the book the great troop leader Manas, who laid the foundations of national statehood, is accompanied by his advisor, who is constantly squabbling: Don't do this, don't listen to them, don't choose those knights.... As you can see, we not only honor the freedom of speech but also are accustomed to criticism.

[Shinkin]: But why is there talk about the president's dictatorial manners in the republic?

[Akaev]: Of course, Akaev has been and remains a champion of democracy. It is a different matter that the experience of our statehood has shown that, taking into account our specific economic and social features, culture, and mentality, we have different democratic priorities from the West. In my view, Kyrgyzstan's democratic ideology must combine the West's liberal-democratic ideas with our own people's sound democratic traditions.

I, for example, am convinced that-for the foreseeable future-a developed local self-government is as important as, if not more important than, parliamentarianism. Local communities themselves are capable of most adequately expressing the public interests and will. This is the social area where the political actions of the country's leadership can be really supported or rejected.

Today I put forward this thesis: Strong executive power, local administration, and self-government must be the backbone of the state.

[Shinkin]: Turning back to some more global problems, what is closer to your heart, the CIS or the Eurasian Union?

[Akaev]: Those who are actually striving for the effective integration of our countries will naturally opt for Nazarbaev's idea. But I would not pit the CIS against the Eurasian Union. If CIS integration could be strengthened through the Eurasian Union, whose suprastate structures could be capable of ensuring reliable implementation of joint decisions, and if such a union could be capable of flexibly joining the commonwealth and possibly becoming its nucleus, why should the one rule out the other? After all, in mathematical language, we are talking about complementary systems.

We must take into account realities. The CIS exists. Over the coming decades we, all its members, will give priority to cooperation within its framework.

[Shinkin]: Nonetheless, a special Central Asian bloc does exist in the region, comprising Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and Kyrgyzstan. And it is gathering strength.

[Akaev]: We have never striven for isolation. This union is vitally important for us, for all three states. Look at Kyrgyzstan. All the communications linking the country with the outside world-railroads, gas pipelines, and international highways-run across the territories of Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan. We have virtually no oil or gas. Economic integration with the framework of these three states gives us an opportunity to solve these problems. In exchange, Kazakhstan receives our electricity. Nobody is worse off as a result of this. Nor should you forget that our three states are also linked by centuries of shared history and similar mentalities. This is why, and in addition to all else, we have established not only purely business relations but actually human relations, when neighbors are prepared to help their neighbor.

4.22 Bishkek Welcomes Moscow Decision on CIS Relations

Interfax, 26 September 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Kyrgyzstan welcomes Russia's new strategic policy to strengthen interstate relations within the CIS.

Russia's president, Boris Yeltsin, issued a decree on 14

September to enact a document entitled “The Strategic Course of the Russian Federation with the CIS States.” The degree asserted the need to “intensify integration within the CIS and to improve coordination of Russian executive bodies’ activities in this direction.”

The head of the international department of the Kyrgyz presidential administration, Baktybek Abdrisaev, told Interfax on Monday that the decree “reflected the Russian leadership’s realization of the importance of restoring ties, established through many decades in the former Soviet Union.”

Since proclaiming independence, many CIS states have realized the need to turn to each other, he added.

Abdrisaev said the Russian leadership “builds its relations with former Soviet republics in a well-balanced and soberthinking fashion.”

Abdrisaev emphasized that “not only purely market economic relations should dictate the conditions of our mutual relations, but also those cultural, historical, and human ties that we must preserve at all costs.”

4.23 Russian Delegation Head on Islamists

Interview by Dr. Hamdi ‘Abd-al-Hafiz
Al-Sharq, 30 August 1993 [FBIS Translation]

[Sergey Kurginyan interviewed by Dr. Hamdi ‘Abd-al-Hafiz in Moscow: “Has the Confrontation Between Russia and Islam Begun?”]

“I welcome Islam and greatly respect it. I know its fundamentals, its past and its present, and I do not oppose Turkey’s involvement for the good of its people, as long as it does not interfere in Russia’s internal affairs. But when Turkey puts its hands on Kazakhstan, considering it within its sphere of vital interest, I must speak out and remind it that these lands are in Russia’s sphere of influence, and that Turkey has no business there. There are powers aiming to make tense the relations between Russia and Islam; our mission is to thwart that confrontation. If extremism continues and denounces everything Russian in the Islamic republics as blasphemous and reprehensible, then much blood will be shed. Russia must find partners for itself in spirit and faith, in an un-American way, to join the “current” world. Here we might touch on the role of the Arab League or Russian foreign strategy or other matters, but there will be a void as long as Russia keeps to its current path.” These were some of the replies of Sergey Kurginyan, president of the Ibda’i Research Center Fund [name as published], who is serving as head of a delegation of Russian academic experts who recently visited Tajikistan to study the situation there in the light of recent events in this republic. The delegation prepared a huge report, examined by Al-Sharq, on the situation in Tajikistan and the future of its development. Al-Sharq met the man and asked him numerous questions. The text of our conversation follows:

[‘Abd-al-Hafiz]: What was your delegation’s mission in Tajikistan? Which experts comprised it?

[Kurginyan]: Speaker of the Russian Parliament Ruslan Khasbulatov gave us this mission, in light of his unease about the danger of recent events in this republic and the chances of the situation there deteriorating. Of course, no effective steps can be taken in this delicate situation without complete knowledge of it in all its details. Also, I consider Khasbulatov a skillful politician with a clear view of the true situation. That may be because of his familiarity with Islamic matters, because of his background. Also, Ruslan Khasbulatov sought the assistance of the Tajiki leadership as related to this exploratory trip. We went to Central Asia accompanied by a group of political, economic, and party experts, and there we were joined by other experts. The group was able to do much in just four days, to meet with religious and political figures, with military men, sectarian leaders, armed groups, security and interior officials, and all those involved.

We benefited much from the information and study base available to us, such as the study of Islamic movements in the Soviet Union beginning in the early 1970s, and, based on open sources, the Soviet and foreign press. The trip was the crowning achievement of the work that had come before. It is also natural that all news and data remained at the margin of the report, because we are not only trying to cover events, we want to influence them, too.

[‘Abd-al-Hafiz]: You mentioned in your report that you have some things that may not be published. Who imposed the ban on publishing? What is the subject matter?

[Kurginyan]: No one, but I can prevent them from being published because I am an independent expert. I support the speaker of parliament, because I consider him to be one of the greatest political figures in Russia today, and the most dedicated to the interests of the country. That is why I support him. But I myself decide what I will or will not publish. It is only natural that many things have remained in the dark until now, such as the dimensions of the Isma’ili sect’s activities in Central Asia.

[‘Abd-al-Hafiz]: Why the ban on publishing?

[Kurginyan]: Three things are banned. First, not mentioning names and facts, because researchers do not broadcast secret data. The second relates to the familiarity of the Russian reader, who naturally does not require us to overwhelm him with data about the Isma'ili sect or the Agha Khan and the difference between him and Sayyidi Mansur, or the role of the Isma'ilis in Pakistan, otherwise we would have produced a book. The third thing relates to secret and military data, or data from unnamed sources, since the content at times would reveal precisely who the source was. That could lead to evidence threatening that person's life in Tajikistan's civil war conditions. We cannot reveal sources until after the end of the civil war and the advent of peace. On top of that there is the ethical aspect. For example, we know the practices of the Sufi brotherhoods, but we may not make them public because the Sufis consider them “not for publication.” Thus we would not have the right to violate these ethics, even if they were our enemies. And so we may summarize the principles of the ban as follows:

1. No unnecessary examples or details.
2. No revealing of news or information sources.
3. Deference to the level of cognizance of the subject.
4. Adhering to ethics.
5. Not publishing any false or unconfirmed news or information.

[‘Abd-al-Hafiz]: In your report you level an accusation against Western circles, that they have run a conspiracy to provoke confrontation and conflict between Russia and Islam. Do you have any evidence or proof?

[Kurginyan]: We have proven facts. There are old plans to make Russia turn its attention to the south, after having stripped it of some western territories, so that it will not be watching its northwest. Second, some politicians in Estonia made these plans public in 1988, in the newspapers. They said that the Karabakh issue served to detonate the relations between Armenia and Azerbaijan, to make Russia rely on the Armenians, with the Islamic world getting involved in the conflict, as it was linked to Azerbaijan. Many Estonians, behind whom stand certain interests, exposed this plan. There have also been other statements from Pope John Paul II and former U.S. president Ronald Reagan regarding directing events in Poland. But we have other evidence and statements regarding developments in Afghanistan and the people involved in those events.

Who can fight the Russians today? No one but the Islamic countries, because America would have an all-out political crisis after the first one hundred casualties its soldiers would suffer, whereas the Islamic people are spiritually ready for the sacrifice. The Muslims are ready and so are the Russians. As to the rest of the people living in peace and amity, they are no longer able to fight a war by themselves and mean to win without shedding their children's blood. So now false environmental and population issues are brought up, such as population growth in the South, environmental pollution in the Third World, or its very high birth rates-all meaning that a time bomb is ticking underneath today's world. According to this plan, Russia must become a tool with which to confront the Third World, now that its energies are spent and its strength exhausted.

The United States has said that Turkey is now a regional superpower, though it can be "super" only at Russia's expense. At the same time, we note that things have come to a head in the Crimean peninsula, the northern Caucasus, southern Russia, Bashkortostan, and Kazakhstan-it all looks like a wide-ranging plot. I do not believe that all the powers of this region are anti-Russian. There are in fact some powers loyal to us. It is a question of support and financial, media, and political aid given only to anti-Russian forces, even though they may appear to be anti-American.

Let us consider Azerbaijan. The leader of the “Gray Wolves,” Raturkashi [name as published], went to Azerbaijan, and the Azerbaijani interior minister, Iskandarov, received the credentials of the leaders of this organization before representatives of the Western countries. Would it be possible for the citizens of Egypt or any other Arab or foreign country to watch, on their television screens, their interior minister and the deputy head of the ruling party receiving the credentials of an international terrorist organization?

The Gray Wolves group is anti-American—but it is anti-Russian and destructive to Russia. It is likely that the rigid old thinking still dominates the minds of American policymakers, that they are supporting groups opposed to the former Soviet Union, even though the latter has changed directions, as if it had become a criminal group, or cannibals.

I would like to point out here that there are in America individuals personally linked to the present secretary of state, whose importance has been on the rise, and whose methods are never understood, and who has become extremely close to his Russian counterpart as well as to Russian Defense Minister Grachev.

There are of course financial factors, bearing in mind that Minister Grachev’s relatives receive not inconsiderable aid from American organizations involved with Russia, though this relationship does not stem only from financial factors there is a political side.

I welcome Islam and greatly respect it. I know its fundamentals, its past and its present. I do not oppose Turkey's involvement for the good of its people, as long as it does not interfere in Russia's internal affairs. But when Turkey prevents the transport of oil through the straits and puts its hands on Kazakhstan, considering it to be within its sphere of vital interests, I must speak out and remind it that these lands are in Russia's sphere of interests, and that Turkey has no business there. There are powers aiming to make tense the relations between Russia and Islam; our mission is to thwart that confrontation.

[‘Abd-al-Hafiz]: What is the future of fundamentalism in Russia in light of recent events in Tajikistan?

[Kurginyan]: There is the Islamic Revival Party founded in Bashkortostan and Tatarstan. It is a time bomb in its activity, and if this sort of extremism continues, accusing others and everything Russian of being blasphemous and reprehensible, there will be three phenomena, or three leading forces, the first of which will lead the poor classes of people, described as countercommunism, anti-Russianism, and a false Islamic nature. The second is the nationalistic bourgeois force such as the Islamic Revival Party in Dagestan and Tatarstan, which adopted the slogan of "the (nationalist) community" instead of the slogan of Islam. The third is nationalist democracy; you will hear more talk of "Westernized" Islamic democracy, and all principled people, who will number 70 to 80 percent according to the latest censuses in light of current reforms in the former Soviet Union and the gains made, will oppose these forces. Much blood will be shed in the regions of the Soviet state and similar movements will evolve in Russia itself, as the Russian people cannot be silent for long in the face of these events, the violation of Russian rights, and the march of refugees who today number one million.

In addition, there are in Russia, for example, five million persons who have lived with refugees and say to themselves, they tortured us, expelled us from our homes, and discriminated against us, and their numbers will soon multiply if conditions go from bad to worse.

Because of the clash of these movements and after government pressure through the game of referendums, the constitution, and the like, wars will break out on the borders of these entities, that is, between Bashkortostan and Tatarstan, or between Tatarstan and Russia, or between Russia and Kazakhstan, but after this period of schism there will be a period of unity: the state will become a cauldron in which these conflicts will boil. The wood is now burning under this cauldron, and it is getting hotter. Some of them assassinated Vice-President Victor Bulanishku [name as published], without taking serious countermeasures, and of course he is not the first or the last on the list.

In the wake of the spread of crime and accumulation of weaponry, the future looks very dark. Events cannot be limited to this “sixth of the globe.”

Firemen know that forest fires can be fought only with counterfires, started in front of the big fire, and for this very reason a southern Islamic border zone will be set up, and within it the counterfire from Russia will burn. It will suit the federation of the Baltic and Black Sea countries for the same reason. Western Europe is thus planning to build a wall to protect itself from the Russian fire; though this plan is a fantasy, an illusion. It is impossible to fight this fire: it will spread everywhere.

It will lead inevitably to a catastrophe. It appears that some people are looking for quick gains, and don't trouble themselves with the implications of what they are doing and its effect on the future. Every person is acting in his own interest, but the result of these interests will be chaos and conflict.

[‘Abd-al-Hafiz]: Are you fearful of the collapse of the Russian Federation?

[Kurginyan]: Is Russia's unity holding now? Isn't

Tatarstan's position tantamount to secession from the federal entity? Stability is hanging by a thread. All that needs to happen is for confidence in Russia's currency to fail, and here we are sanctioning fiscal reform! The fate of the federal entity is sealed. It will collapse when Russia's provinces forbid the use of the ruble and replace it with local currency. It is likely that the catastrophe will happen within three or four months, because the ruble will not maintain its current price for more than three or four weeks, or a month, and bear in mind that the government's reserves are nearly exhausted. In these circumstances, the Russian Federation will collapse but subsequently reunify, because the exit of the Republic of Yakutia, for example, from Russian administration, would mean the exodus of Russians from it, but they will return if they notice the features of reconciliation between it and Japan, which covets its diamond resources, for example.

I say that whoever plans for the situation in the country to hit bottom, with 100 million Russians fleeing their homes and going back to them angry, is a criminal, whatever he is called: the American secretary of state, the Russian foreign minister, or the Russian president. What we are now witnessing in Russia is nothing but a massive international crime. Sooner or later there will be a Nuremburg trial to consider the personality of those who organized this dangerous, terrible socio-political experiment in a country filled with thousands of nuclear warheads, millions of trained soldiers ready to fight and bristling with arms, and dozens of deteriorating nuclear reactors. Couldn't there have been reform of some other kind that would not require dropping the reins of this headstrong horse? Was it necessary to let the genie out of the bottle without knowing what it would take to get him back in?

[‘Abd-al-Hafiz]: What is your view, as a researcher and a politician, of the reasons for the emergence of fundamentalism as a political phenomenon?

[Kurginyan]: I consider fundamentalism a normal thing. On the one hand, it expresses a people’s resistance to the tribulations being inflicted upon them, and the existence of a certain limit beyond which these tribulations may not go. This limit is called “fundamentalism,” but it is not proper to use fundamentalism in normal circumstances as a means of leading a country.

Fundamentalism has the following functions:

1. As a bulwark against the racist policy adopted by the United States for its own interests, which violates the will of other peoples.

2. As a means of leading and controlling the situation (it is an indication of inability).

3. There are those who would use fundamentalism to serve their interests. We may mention in this connection the story of the last shah of Iran, who had huge bank accounts abroad, which were very tempting to some, and when after the revolution Iran asked that they be returned to the country, they were frozen; only a fifth was returned to Iran. The remaining four-fifths remained outside the reach of the people of Iran.

We may say that fundamentalism is a tool for controlling Islamic peoples and preventing their unity. It is a way of keeping them in their current place. There is another cultural aspect of fundamentalism, which at times expresses people's opposition to the march of Western culture and its godless spirit. I warmly welcome this other aspect, because non-Western peoples will perish without their heritage, its spirit and civilization. It is likely that the West has an immunity to godlessness and lack of spirituality, though it may not be conferred on other peoples. I bid "welcome" to fundamentalism as a spiritual revolution and a way of restoring the link to heritage, as a revival of human vision. I consider fundamentalism a vast field for philosophical, social, and cultural study.

I re-emphasize here that it is up to the peoples of the Islamic countries to understand that the events in Tajikistan are very remote from fundamentalism. One might describe them as a false fundamentalist phenomenon!

[‘Abd-al-Hafiz]: You touch on the likelihood of a clash between Russia and Islam. Is it a certainty or not? What can we do to prevent it? [Kurginyan]: I believe that we are heading toward a multicultural world that will be built on bases unlike those of the Western model and that Islamic culture will regain the greatness it deserves. The Russian Orthodox culture will become great, too. They have a chance to cooperate, and I would like to mention here the Istanbul conference, in which the heads of the Russian Orthodox Church and leaders of the Shiites participated. It is very clear that Turkey is now pushing in a certain direction and that its attention is centered on a Western-style peace. This is a road leading to a new Russian-Turkish war to “absorb” the conflicts threatening the West now. In these circumstances, we must understand the dimensions of the danger and its repercussions on all sides, and conduct a dialogue on the basis of the peace we want—one that is ready for cooperation and dialogue with Russia. I believe that Iran has been Russia’s traditional ally since early in the last century. I may say that a large part of the Arab world will, in my opinion, soon be in solidarity with Greece. All this means that Russia must review its foreign strategy. I am now speaking as a person who considers our present foreign policy crazy and meaningless. Its very basis is, necessarily, the evolution of new alliances stemming from a different view of the present world and all the sudden changes in it.

They may be political, economic, military, and diplomatic alliances. Russia must also find itself partners in spirit and religion, but not in the American way, to join the current world. Here we might allude to the role of the League of Arab States or Russia's foreign policy, or other matters, though the gap will remain for as long as Russia follows its present course.

I am not calling for a return to the past-I would consider that a dangerous and terrible step. No, Russia must find its way and orient its policy to the southeast on the St. Petersburg-Tehran and Balkan-Far East axes.

On the Tajikistan front, let me again point out the need to learn the lessons of these events so that the blood of those victims will not have been shed in vain.

Otherwise, the outcome will be even more terrible, meaning that our Lord will have turned His face away from us all.

[‘Abd-al-Hafiz]: Some have accused you of having created the background for the August 1991 coup. In light of that, how do you see Russia's future?

[Kurginyan]: A political struggle is occurring in the country now, and it requires the creation of political beliefs and theories and directing the media to call for certain ideas and their promotion, as well as finding legitimate sources of funding.

Since 1986 I have said that people's morale is more important than technical means. A tank is just iron without a trained crew. I have constantly called on the Communist Party to examine itself and become some kind of Christian- Islamic-Socialist alliance, to focus its efforts on its popularity, because the crew of that tank will not defend the regime as long as it reads the pages of democratic newspapers and can take no organizationally effective measures before the achievement of this basic ideological goal. Neither Mikhail Gorbachev nor anyone else was accused of that at the time.

I once said to Mr. Khrushchev at a conference, “Your plan consists of an attempt to perform an operation with a bad scalpel, which will break and cut the surgeon himself.” And on 17 August I raised my voice to say that resorting to force in those circumstances would be a sign of weakness on the part of those using it or resorting to it. I would have welcomed dictatorial rule if I thought it necessary to save Russia, but Yeltsin is not a popular man, nor has he any power or ideology. As to his document on the results of enrichment, it is absolutely without basis. A new coup in these circumstances would lead only to the ongoing destruction of the country. I condemn all attempts to use force as long as it lacks a well-established ideological center. This ideological center will be created in a year or two, and the next situation will require decisive steps against crime, even a declaration of war on it, in the way that Algeria once did.

We must fight crime in every possible way, including mobilizing special forces for that purpose and forming special organizations. No one is planning to begin fighting the opposition in these ways, but the government needs to expand the political arena and keep people informed of what is going on in the corridors of power and politics.

It has been said before, on television, that there is no need for Russian society to fear Yeltsin's authority or the authority of Ruslan Khasbulatov, or the communist opposition. It should worry about the likelihood of the advent of a criminal government regime, with mafia chiefs taking over the reins of power in the country. They would turn the country into a second Lebanon, and the only way to fight them would be with fire and steel. I believe that Russia will enter that phase in approximately 1996. As far as the coup goes, if I had wanted it, I would have accomplished more than the 19 August 1991 coup did.

4.24 Rakhmonov Favors Strengthening Ties with CIS States

Interfax, 13 April 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Tajik leader Emomali Rakhmonov, at the forthcoming Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) summit, plans to propose restoring and strengthening economic ties between Tajikistan and other CIS countries, above all, Russia, his aide Saidmurod Pattoev said.

Pattoev told Interfax on Wednesday that, before the summit, to be held in Moscow, Rakhmonov hopes to meet Russia's president, Boris Yeltsin, to discuss the possibility of Tajikistan's joining the ruble zone and of strengthening the Tajik-Afghan border.

The Tajik leadership hopes to receive assistance to restore and stabilize the republic's economy, ruined by the civil war, Pattoev said.

He said Rakhmonov was very interested in the proposal of Kazakhstan's president, Nursultan Nazarbaev, for a Eurasian Union, a community of former Soviet republics closer than the CIS. But the Tajik leader would make no statements on it before he made a detailed study of it, Pattoev said.

4.25 Eurasian Highway a "Historic Chance" for Tajikistan

Abdugani Mamadazimov

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 3 November 1994 [FBIS Translation]

[Article by Abdugani Mamadazimov, sector head, Institute of World Economy and International Relations, RT (Republic of Tajikistan) Academy of Sciences, under the rubric: "Project": "Construction of a Eurasian Highway Will Consolidate Tajiks: The State Will Have Yet Another Opportunity to Move Ahead in Conducting Reforms."]

The strategic location of Tajikistan, which is situated in the center of Asia, at the crossroads where the basic world cultures and civilizations come into contact, should not convert Tajikistan into a "front line" or "buffer" of one civilization (for example, post-Soviet civilization) with respect to the others. On the contrary, Tajikistan, taking the entire real-life situation into consideration, should play a substantial role both in the West-East (Europe-Asia) dialogue and in intercivilizational interactions of the Western and East Asian cultures.

I might recall that Tajikistan, which, like Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan, is part of the CIS, borders on one of the Asian giants-China-and on the south with Afghanistan. In addition, the republic has rather good opportunities for gaining access to influential Asian countries like India, Pakistan, and Iran.

The eastern countries, which have been on the periphery of historical development for several centuries, are gradually coming into the forefront. One hears expressed with increasing conviction the assertion that “the twenty-first century is Asia’s century.” Even now the eastern part of Asia is contending with the West for economic supremacy over the rest of the world. It is precisely here that one observes the fusion of the Eastern and Western cultures, a fusion that is yielding staggering results and prospects for progress in this region of the world. If one recalls that after the great geographic discoveries Asia gradually yielded its position to Europe, when the world’s trade paths shifted from the “Silk Route” on land to maritime, Atlantic paths, then the rebirth of the “Great Silk Route” would symbolize the restoration of Asia’s lost positions. The times call for the construction of a Eurasian transcontinental highway. Without even mentioning the global nature of this project, but considering its completely economic side, one can assert that, according to computations made by specialists, the transporting of freight from China’s eastern shores to Europe over the existing railroads of the Russian Federation alone will be 20 to 30 percent less than the cost of shipment by sea through the Suez Canal, and the transportation time will be cut in half. But the project for the transcontinental highway in the Central Asian sector must be distinguished from a railroad that encompasses chiefly the northern part of the Central Asian states as it runs across the great steppe of this continent. These adjustments are of a cultural-historical and geostrategic nature.

First, despite the tremendous scope of Central Asia, it is precisely in its central part that one finds the most fertile land, almost all the old cities, the basic architectural and historical monuments, and the bulk of the region's population, and therefore the construction of a highway across that sector will lead to a rapid flare up of business activity on the part of the local population, simultaneously resolving acute problems of a socio-economic nature.

Second, if one recalls that the entire length of the "Great Silk Route" from China to Europe used to be controlled by the Sogdians-Rakhdonites-ancestors of the Tajiks-then we have the historic right to be a direct participant in this project. (Rakhdonite is the Tajik word rokh, "road," and don, "knowing," that is, "knowing the caravan road.") We are convinced that the Tajiks, who currently are living in an isolated position, have not lost their historic experience or their ethnic proclivities for establishing economic-trade and cultural contacts with the outside world.

Third, the construction of the road across Tajikistan will lead to Iran-by way of the shortest highways and railroads Dushanbe-Tedzhent-Meshkhed-Tehran-to the Persian Gulf ports or, by way of Turkey, to Europe. Then the transcontinental road through Tajikistan's Badakhshan to the east—across Kulma Pass (Murgabskiy Rayon-reaches the Karakumskoe Highway. This motor route provides a unique choice: one direction is China and, through it, the countries in the Asia-Pacific region; and the other is to Pakistan and an exit to the Indian Ocean. The dreams that Europeans have had for many centuries will come true-there will be an exit by land to "warm water." In the future the IGA [Islamic State of Afghanistan] has a good opportunity for annexing itself to that highway by constructing a bridge on the Nizhniy Pyandzh-Shcherkhan sector and across Ishkashimskiy Rayon. The inclusion of a greater and greater number of Asian states in the use of the Eurasian highway completely justifies its name and purpose.

Fourth, Russian rubles will function on the territory of Tajikistan. For the time being, the Russian ruble is demonstrating its greatest stability as compared with other new national monetary units with respect to the American dollar and other first-rank currencies. This circumstance is encouraging the establishment of the most effective operations through shipment and the buying-selling transaction, and the rendering of all types of services on the republic's territory. Although Tajikistan is experiencing an acute need for rubles in cash form, the implementation of our project will fundamentally change the situation. With the breakthrough to the east, to the Karakumskoe Highway, Tajikistan will become the connecting link between the countries in the Asia-Pacific region and South Asia, on the one hand, and the CIS and the Middle and Near East, on the other, and through them to Europe.

Fifth, the most important thing, in our view, is that this sector of the transcontinental road across the territory of all of Tajikistan will act as a Tajikistan-wide road of consolidation. Of the three highways linking the capital with the regions, two have a seasonal nature: the passes through the Turkestan, Zeravshan, Gissary, and Darvaz ranges continue to serve as something like demarcation lines between the basic regions of our mountainous republic, reducing to a minimum the contacts among the people inhabiting them. The construction of a Tajikistan-wide road as an inseparable part of the transcontinental one will link all the regions, drawing them into a single economic system.

Since the current level of the republic's financial-economic, material-technical, and intellectual power does not make it possible to implement the entire volume of operations simultaneously, we shall take on as standard equipment the local explosive model of economic development. This model has demonstrated its effectiveness in many countries of the world, but it is especially typical of the rapidly developing countries of the Far East. Therefore we propose implementing our project in two phases:

During the first phase, it is necessary to construct a total of 40 kilometers of road through Kulma Pass ... and connecting with the Karakumskoe Highway. This 40-kilometer sector connects with the Toktamysh-Murgab highway, and in Murgab we connect with the Osh- Khorog-Dushanbe highway. The rapid growth of that region as a result of the border trade and the through shipments to Dushanbe and farther destinations will promote the gradual weakening of the role played by the state, which, by encouraging the private sector and small- and medium-scale business with the participation of foreign capital, is directing its attention to the second phase in the construction of the road.

During the second phase-the Dushanbe-Khudzhand road, the basic obstacle of which is Anzob Pass, is to be rebuilt. By constructing a tunnel under the pass we will link the capital with Zeravshan Valley, and this will provide a powerful stimulus to the sharp improvement of the road through Shakhristan Pass, with an exit to Leninabad Oblast. As a result we shall emerge from isolation immediately in several directions. To the north, the road connects with the transcontinental railroad; to the west, it will be possible in the future to connect with Iran; to the east, an exit to the Karakumskoe Highway; and to the south, in the future we shall connect with Afghanistan.

Thus, Tajikistan, by standing up for an international cause-the cause of constructing the Eurasian transcontinental highway-has a historic chance of consolidating the entire nation, since a section of this road will unite all its regions.

4.26 Rakhmonov on National Issues and Ties with Russia

Interview by Sergey Ovsienko

Rossiyskie Vesti, 26 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Emomali Sharipovich, I would like to start our conversation with questions currently of interest to Russia. What is Tajikistan's reaction to the events in Chechnya?

[Rakhmonov]: I have to say immediately that what is happening in Chechnya is Russia's internal affair. As for the Tajikistan people's reaction, it is as follows: All "hot spot" problems must be resolved without fratricidal bloodshed. The Tajik people, who lost 100,000 people during the civil war and saw the republic suffer economic damage to the tune of US$7 billion, reached this conclusion the hard way.

Things are difficult for Tajikistan. But the general political situation is currently tending to improve and gradually normalize. This is also evidenced by the fact that 870,000 refugees have returned to Tajikistan in the past two years, including 90,000 from Afghanistan. Some 7,000 Russians have also returned to the republic.

[Ovsienko]: But the opposition is not abandoning its attempts to seize power in the republic by force.....

[Rakhmonov]: I'm not sure it will succeed. Recent years have shown that Tajikistan's problems need to be resolved by peaceful means alone, through negotiation and compromise. Tajikistan's leadership is prepared for this, but the opposition leaders aren't.

Here are just a few examples. Since the agreement “On a Temporary Cease-Fire and the Cessation of Other Hostile Actions on the Tajik-Afghan Border and Within the Country” came into force the opposition has violated it more than fifty times and staged twenty-one armed attacks on border posts....

[Ovsienko]: Mr. President, you are accused of persecuting your political opponents, introducing strict censorship in the national media, and establishing an authoritarian regime. How would you respond to this?

[Rakhmonov]: These accusations against me are nothing new. They appeared literally the day after I was elected head of state at the Sixteenth Supreme Council session in December 1992. My political opponents are still trying to accuse us of things that have never happened in our republic. We are building a rule-of-law, secular state. This means living within the bounds of legal norms prescribed by generally accepted laws and norms of communal living. As for the mass media, they operate within the limits prescribed by the law on the mass media. We simply have no other legal or other norms governing the activity of the media.

[Ovsienko]: What is official Dushanbe’s current relationship with the republic’s regions-Gorno-Badakhshan, Leninabad Oblast, the Gissar group of rayons? ...

[Rakhmonov]: Since a constitutional system in Dushanbe was first restored, we have been seeking to maintain equal relations with all the republic’s regions. You can see this in both the economic and the personnel policy pursued by the republic’s central government. All the republic’s regions the Gorno-

Badakhshan Autonomous Oblast, Leninabad, the Karateginskiy Valley, and the Gissar group of rayons-are equally represented in the new government. I am confident that our policy in this respect will not change in the future either, because we realize that a violation of traditional regional policy could lead to the destabilization of the situation in the republic.

[Ovsienko]: You will agree that this is not the only way that the problem of the opposition, including the armed opposition, is being resolved. I am thinking about the process of disarming them....

[Rakhmonov]: The republic's leadership has declared four amnesties and let off more than six thousand people. An edict on the voluntary surrender of weapons was adopted recently. Weapons have been handed in by fifteen hundred gunmen. In one month alone, the population of the Pamir surrendered three hundred firearms.

And in the space of two years government groups have seized around fifteen thousand firearms.

[Ovsienko]: Tajikistan has declared itself to be a democratic, rule-of-law, secular state. In what direction will the republic develop as a result?

[Rakhmonov]: Tajikistan does not intend to copy either a Western or an Eastern model of state system. In the long term we see our republic as part of the CIS.

And the people support the leadership here. The referendum on the new constitution conducted on 6 November last year showed that 95 percent of the population of Tajikistan support this policy of the president. And-an extremely important point-70 percent of the population of the regions where opposition influence is strong came out in favor of the new constitution.

At the same time let me note that the commonwealth itself is still far from perfect. During the years that the CIS has been in existence, more than four hundred different agreements and documents have been adopted. Not all of them are being fulfilled.... For example, a number of agreements on the CIS countries' collective security, principally on strengthening the commonwealth's southern borders, which is extremely important for our republic, have not been fulfilled. The Tajik-Afghan border keeps the situation tense not only in our republic but throughout Central Asia.

It is also necessary to take account of the fact that there is no air defense system along the entire length of the border. Violations of Tajikistan's airborder are extremely dangerous for CIS countries too. It cannot be ruled out that a border violator could show up in Russian airspace. I have raised the air defense issue with the Russian Ministry of Defense and leadership several times ....

[Ovsienko]: Under an agreement concluded with Russia, the funding of all measures to protect the Tajik-Afghan border is based on parity. But to the best of my knowledge, Tajikistan is meeting only 15 percent of its commitments ....

[Rakhmonov]: This is indeed the case. But there is an explanation for this that we find persuasive. Tajikistan is the smallest state in Central Asia. But it has the longest southern border, more than two thousand kilometers, mostly with Afghanistan.

The present economic situation in the country, which I talked about at the beginning of our interview, makes it impossible for us to create our own border troops and maintain them. This is why Tajikistan counts on assistance from Russia.

On the other hand, over 80 percent of border post personnel are Tajiks, who are protecting the border along with Russian border guards. We are of course obliged to fulfill our contractual agreements, but at present we find it economically impossible.

[Ovsienko]: Since the conversation has turned to Tajikistan's economy, allow me to ask you-does the republic's leadership plan to introduce its own currency?

[Rakhmonov]: If our parliament gives the go-ahead. As yet only preparatory work is being done.

[Ovsienko]: In building its relations with Russia does Tajikistan intend to cooperate with it within the framework of the CIS or on a bilateral basis?

[Rakhmonov]: One form of cooperation does not preclude the other. After all, around 80 percent of all the republic's economic links are with Russia. Tajikistan benefits from cooperation with Russia, and Russia benefits too, particularly now. One example confirms this: Ivanovo weaving factories are standing idle without cotton. We are prepared to grow cotton for the Ivanovo weavers, but the republic has a fuel shortage ....

[Ovsienko]: A few days ago you signed an edict on the formation of a Slavic university in the republic. Does this signify a return to the teaching of Russian in Tajikistan's schools and higher educational establishments?

[Rakhmonov]: This is now the second year that Russian has been taught in the republic's preschool establishments, schools, and higher educational establishments. However, the edict on creating a Slavic university opens up broader prospects for the republic to train the proficient specialists that Tajikistan needs so badly right now.

Construction of the Rogunskaya hydroelectric power station which will earn the republic around US$700 million in income in a single year, is nearing completion. Central Asian countries and neighboring Islamic states are waiting for electricity from the power station ....

There are a considerable number of such economic projects in the republic. This is why I made the decision to create the Slavic university, to which we intend to invite teachers from Russia.

4.27 Moscow Prompts Tajikistan to Withdraw from Ruble Zone

Konstantin Levin

Kommersant-Daily, 12 April 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Last year the idea of reviving the ruble zone seemed finally to be buried. One only had to uncouple the last ruble car- Tajikistan-but Moscow again promised to prolong for an indefinite period the circulation of the Russian cash ruble on the territory of the Central Asian republic. Having secured the continuation of Russian financial assistance, Dushanbe nonetheless decided in early April to reorient its currency policy and to stop using the Russian currency. Yesterday the group of Russian advisors in Tajikistan also in effect approved the republic parliament's decision to pull out of the ruble zone. [Passage omitted.]

Russia's economic assistance to Tajikistan is, strictly speaking, not a solution to integration problems in the CIS. By rendering Dushanbe not only military-political but also financial assistance, Moscow pursues primarily geopolitical interests in the Central Asian region. Ruble injections into Tajikistan's war-devastated economy are unprecedented. In addition to non-cash credits, the Russian Central Bank has already made 120 billion cash rubles available to the Tajikistan National Bank, and there were plans to provide another 20 billion. The price of political interests, however, has proved too high for Moscow, and therefore it effectively prompted the Tajikistan parliament to adopt the decision to introduce a national currency in the republic.

4.28 Nation's Non-CIS Links Said to Be Favored over CIS Links

Sergey Tsekhmistrenko

Kommersant-Daily, 20 November 1992 [FBIS Translation]

In the last week the growing foreign policy activism of Turkmenistan has attracted attention. On the basis of an analysis of the meetings and visits that took place (and did not take place), the conclusion can be drawn that a concept of the republic's foreign policy, defined by President Saparmurad Niyazov as a policy of "positive neutrality," has begun to take shape.

On 11-12 November the official visit to Ashkhabad of the president of Moldova, Mircea Snegur, was noted. During this visit, a bilateral treaty on friendship and cooperation was to be signed for the first time in the history of relations between Turkmenistan and Moldova. But the visit was postponed until the start of the next year at the initiative of the Turkmen side. As the foreign minister of Turkmenistan, Khalykberdy Ataev, reported, this decision was the result of “matters that appeared right after his visit to Turkey.” After this announcement many observers drew the conclusion that Ashkhabad is gradually changing over to a policy of isolationism in relation to its nearby neighbors in order to turn toward distant countries. It is no accident that recently President Niyazov has been limiting his international contacts to discussing potential for investments in the local economy with foreign visitors.

The isolationist trend appeared in the rejection of the proposal of the head of the Russian MID [Ministry of Foreign Affairs], Andrey Kozyrev, who came to Ashkhabad on 6 November, to take part in settling the Tajik crisis. The Turkmen position was formulated in this way: “what is happening in Tajikistan is an internal affair of that state.” The refusal to participate in the Russian initiative is related not only to the low effectiveness of the Russian MID’s activity in Central Asia. The CIS countries experiencing profound economic crisis are not of interest to Turkmenistan as potential investors. And it is precisely on the basis of this ability that President Niyazov is evaluating his partners at this time.

The Muslim brothers from the Arab countries, including the general secretary of the Organization of the Islamic Conference, Khamid al-Gabid, were the most valued guests of Niyazov in November. After meeting with the secretary on 13 November, the “Turkmen bashi” [chieftains] proposed to open a branch of the Conference in Ashkhabad with the status of Committee on Cultural and Social Problems of Central Asia and Kazakhstan. Behind this proposal is the intention to get special aid for Turkmenistan from the Muslim world. It is not impossible that these plans have already received support of rich Arab countries which are influential in the Islamic Conference. According to information from "X," the Saudi King Fahd recently promised Niyazov $3.5 billion in credit. And the influential Kuwaiti Sheikh Abdul al-Baptin, who met with Niyazov on 13 November, reported that under his proposal a number of leaders and businessmen of the Arab countries are creating a Committee to Promote the Development of Turkmenistan.

Turkmenistan's achievements in relation to those of the countries of the West do not look quite as impressive against this background. Western investments have not yet justified the expectations of the Turkmen president. At a meeting with American businessmen held on 16 November, Niyazov accused them of penetrating the Turkmen market too slowly. "You are making a mistake, since Turkmenistan has a favorable position as the gates to Asia and the underbelly of Russia," said the president to Michael Said Ansary, who heads the Mic Corporation, and the former U.S. secretary of state, Alexander Haig, the head of the corporation's "USA-CIS" organization, who had both arrived in Ashkhabad.

Most likely the Western orientation in Turkmen foreign policy will be supplanted even further by the Eastern one after Saparmurad Niyazov's visit to China on 19-23 November. Chinese representatives have repeatedly offered their help to the Turkmen side in the construction and gas and oil-refining spheres, emphasizing the cheapness and quality of their services. In the opinion of observers, for President Niyazov such reasons are always decisive when determining the foreign policy course. But according to information received by correspondent “X” from some associates of the Chinese embassy to Turkmenistan, Turkmen-Chinese economic ties are experiencing substantial difficulties at this time. They are tied to the fact that the Chinese side is proposing cooperation in the sphere of small and medium-sized business, but the centralized character of the Turkmen economy does not really allow that.

4.29 Russians to Help Establish Turkmen Air Force

Turkmen Press

Watan, 5 August 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Today Turkmenistan's president, Saparmurad Niyazov, met with a military delegation from the Russian Federation headed by Vladimir Zhurbenko, deputy chief of the general staff of Russia's armed forces. Heads of Turkmenistan's military leadership examined questions connected with the further strengthening of Turkmenistan's armed forces. A decree was passed on establishing a national force for air defense on new foundations of command. Orders will be carried out by Turkmenistan's president and the Ministry of Defense.

Other facets of further cooperation greater than that gained in earlier talks about military relations were also discussed by both sides. In the context of these relations questions of joint action connected with the status of Russia's officers serving in Turkmenistan's armed forces were also defined.

"Turkmenistan's military doctrine will remain one of defense," said S.A. Niyazov in the course of the discussions. "Turkmenistan has a policy of positive neutrality, and this has been confirmed in the practice of its own independence. But, as an independent state, it must have a well-equipped army, including an air defense force."

During the talks, representatives of Russia's military delegation said, "In all aspects of building a state, including the military, Turkmenistan has taken an especially honorable and worthy path; a path that considers the interests of its own people.”

4.30 Niyazov Reassures Russian-Speaking Population

Lyudmila Glazovskaya

ITAR-TASS, 17 January 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Whoever we may be by blood, we are all brothers in spirit, brothers in our purpose-it was with these words that President Saparmurad Niyazov of Turkmenistan addressed the Russian-speaking population of Turkmenistan today.

Speaking at the congress of the National Revival Movement, the head of state assured the Russian-speaking population that in the state he heads, there will be no infringement of their civil rights or of the national feelings of all those for whom Turkmenistan has become the motherland. From the lofty tribune of the congress, the president declared that the state and the government guarantee equal democratic rights to all their citizens, regardless of nationality. He pointed out the importance of the Turkmen-Russian agreement on dual nationality, which was signed recently, stressing its role in further strengthening peace, stability, and national accord in Turkmenistan.

4.31 Niyazov Opposes Tough CIS Structures

Interfax, 14 April 1994 [FBIS Translation]

President Saparmurad Niyazov of Turkmenistan told Interfax Thursday that Ashkhabad was against tough structures within the Commonwealth of Independent States.

“We [CIS countries-IF] have efficient bilateral structures, but the strengthening of independence should not be interfered with by new tough structures. The CIS role should be enhanced, but without those structures, he said. We need to integrate but in a civilized way,” he said. Asked about his attitude toward Nazarbaev’s proposals on the creation of a Euro-Asian union, he said that “the idea was not new. We should understand the very essence of the idea. One center should not be replaced by another one. If it is a matter of the creation of a new coordinating center, Turkmenistan is opposed. If a new structure will help strengthen independence and our relations, the idea should be analyzed,” said Niyazov.

He believes that it is premature to consider the idea of a Euro-Asian union.

Niyazov said that partners should not be sought overseas. CIS partners and Russia are top priority partners for Turkmenistan. “We are grateful to the Russian people that they helped our republic to achieve cultural and other progress,” he said.

4.32 President Prefers Bilateral Links with CIS

From the “Presidential Bulletin” column, compiled by Nikolay Zhrebtsov and Andrey Petrovskiy; and edited by Vladimir Shishlin

Interfax, 6 September 1994 [FBIS Translation]

President Saparmurad Niyazov reiterated his republic’s preference for bilateral links with CIS member states over multilateral links in the CIS framework.

He believed that agreements that enable CIS centers taking over some of the national sovereignty were non-starters.

[IF Note: Niyazov advocated bilateral cooperation and kept his country away from multilateral agreements until Turkmenistan joined, for many observers unexpectedly, the CIS Economic Union treaty at last year's Ashkhabad summit. He is believed to regard the transnational political structures of the Eurasian Union proposed by Kazakh president Nursultan Nazarbaev as centers to which sovereignty would be delegated.]

The Turkmenistan government discussed the agenda of the CIS Advisory and Coordinating Committee [ACC] meeting scheduled to be held in Moscow Wednesday [7 September].

The ACC meeting attended by deputy prime ministers is to lay the groundwork for the meeting of the CIS Council of Heads of Governments, scheduled to be held in Moscow on 9 September. The meeting will be chaired by the Russian deputy prime minister and economic minister, Aleksandr Shokhin, whose mandate of ACC chairmanship expires on 31 December.

Officials in the Russian government's machinery told Interfax that the ACC meeting draft agenda consists of over twenty specific issues in three large fields. Above all, the ACC will discuss joint preparations for celebrations of victory in World War II, in particular, a draft CIS program commemorating the war dead.

Analysis of the implementation of the Economic Union treaty is expected to be the key item on the agenda. The deputy prime ministers will discuss and, possibly, approve the guidelines for the Interstate Economic Committee, which would work for closer integration in the CIS framework and coordination of economic links. [IFNote: It was Turkmenistan that vetoed setting up such a committee at the latest CIS summit in Moscow.] Mutual conversion of currencies of CIS member states and a draft of a payment union agreement will also be on the agenda of the meeting.

The ACC will also analyze the implementation of the decisions made by the CIS Councils of Heads of State and of Heads of Government, in particular the Guidelines and Outlook for CIS Integration in 1994-95.

Adoption of legislation in CIS member states on benefits for the families of those who were killed in Afghanistan and other countries where the USSR was engaged in hostilities, an agreement on cooperation in the petrochemical and chemical industries, replacement of locomotives and rolling stock, and the Eurasian Patent Convention will be among the items on the agenda.

The Turkmenistan delegation is expected to discuss with Russian officials the details of Niyazov's visit to Moscow in October.

[IF Note: One of the issues in the talks will be an agreement on protection of the Russian-speaking minority in Turkmenistan and a similar document on protection of Turkmen staying in Russia.]

4.33 Russia Seen as "Guarantor of Its Independence"

Igor Barsukov

ITAR-TASS, 1 October 1994 [FBIS Translation]

The former Soviet Central Asian republic of Turkmenistan sees Russia as a guarantor of its independence, which also promotes its economic development.

"Russia is our key partner. Turkmenistan is a natural ally of Russia and is also absolutely independent in adopting decisions," deputy prime minister of Turkmenistan Boris Shikhmuradov told TASS on Saturday [1 October].

He participated in the 49th UN General Assembly and then visited Washington to meet U.S. officials.

“Cooperation with Russia has become more elaborate and mutually advantageous. We are very grateful to Russia that it not only is the guarantor of our political independence, but also promotes our economic development,” Shikhmuradov said.

“Without any reciprocal claims we actively cooperate in the oil and gas industry and in transportation networks,” he said, adding that Russia participates in the important Turkmen project of constructing a gas mainland to Europe via Iran and Turkey.

The president of Turkmenistan, Saparmurad Niyazov, is to visit Moscow at the end of the year to sign a whole package of agreements to promote the equal and mutually beneficial relations, according to Shikhmuradov.

He stressed that in the United States he again became convinced that President Boris Yeltsin takes into consideration the interests of CIS partners while protecting the interest of Russia. “All talk about an alleged division of spheres of influence is an invention. Evidently, some people want to aggravate the situation connected with the development of newly independent states after the collapse of the former Soviet Union,” Shikhmuradov said.

At the same time, he stressed that Turkmenistan believes it is premature to speak about creating any CIS governing bodies.

Shikhmuradov said that while visiting the U.S. State Department on Thursday he handed over the declaration about Turkmenistan’s ratification of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation treaty. “On that day the treaty came into force for Turkmenistan,” he stressed.

4.34 Niyazov on Political Course and Leadership

Interview by Yuriy Solomonov

Literaturnaya Gazeta, 23 November 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Solomonov]: Mr. President, to recall Kipling’s famous phrase: “West is West, and East is East ... .” Was he not referring to democracy? What do you think, does it incorporate universal values or do we need, for all that, to distinguish British, Russian, and Turkmen democracy?

[Niyazov]: The simplest answer is that democracy is the power of the people. But, you will agree, it explains little in relation to your question. Of course, the discussion should begin with values common to all mankind and the rights and liberties of the individual, regardless of religion, nationality, and country of residence. The right to life. Freedom of movement. Right of ownership. Right to choice of religion.... Can it be a question of differences and specifics here? The path toward a democratic society is another matter. Each state has its own. Here Kipling's formula works, so to speak. The East has its own morals, customs, and rules of behavior that have been formulated over centuries. Account has to be taken of this. All attempts to append the European mold right away to the Eastern tenor of life are fraught with serious difficulty. And when the West sometimes tells us that we are lagging behind in the speed of democratic transformations, I always quote the example of the scuba diver: If he comes up from a great depth quickly, wishing to see the sun sooner, he could perish from the well-known bends. Don't rush us. Turkmenistan is moving in the same direction as the world. But you should know the mentality of our people, who are only just beginning to recognize their own statehood, in order to understand why we do not want to and will not blindly copy the experience of others. I do not wish to speak ill of anyone, but you can see what the consequences of haste in this country or the other are.

[Solomonov]: You have one party, no opposition ....

[Niyazov]: Yes, one party as yet. The time will come when people have matured for a civilized multiparty and opposition system-all this will come. Some people are, certainly, condemning us at this time, although the numbers of those criticizing us diminish with each political explosion in this former Union republic or the other, it is true. In the West also. I remember that five persons came to see me in 1989, bringing with them the charter of a people's front: Let's form one, they said. The charter was copied letter for letter from the Estonians. Is this serious? I remember that Georgiy Shakhnazarov, an aide to Gorbachev, tried to persuade me: People's fronts need to be created in all the republics, but they will be managed by the state and controlled by the party. There were, after all, people from the Union KGB among those that proposed a people's front with us. Should I call all this the "shoots of democracy"? No, we do not at this time have either a multiparty system or an opposition, but we have no political prisoners either.... We are told in addition: You have censorship. Rubbish! We publish everything, but when anti-Russian or anti-Semitic articles appear, what would you advise me to do?

[Solomonov]: Several years ago I would probably have strenuously objected. Now I recall the marches of our Russian fascists, the fence around the Russian parliament building daubed with scurrilous inscriptions, insults against the president, calls for national battles.... But, Mr. President, do not be offended with me if I say that such a form of rule has reminded me personally of the power of the CPSU and its general secretary, Politburo, and so forth.

[Niyazov]: I am not offended because you are wrong. In the waning period of the USSR I took part, as you know, in the work of the Politburo. I would sit there, as the representative of a small republic, quietly, detached, remaining silent, and listening to others. And I have to tell you that we could not get anywhere with this “collective intellect.” It was clear from these “clever” speeches that the CPSU and the USSR were doomed. This was my first discovery of those times. The second might appear altogether naive, but I have for many years perceived the general secretary as a person who had been popularly elected. Or, at least, elected by all the communists of the Soviet Union. But the choice had been made by about fifteen such persons as himself! The choice that was made by the Turkmen people, entrusting the presidency to me, was surely different from the personnel intrigues in the upper stratum of the CPSU.

[Solomonov]: So you are not one of those that regrets the disintegration of the Union, the demise of a great country?

[Niyazov]: No, I do not. I recall that a year before the Emergency Committee I was vacationing in Foros, at the same time as Gorbachev and Yazov. The general secretary once invited the minister and me to tea. We spoke about many things. I said in some context or other that the first person in the state should know precisely who his associate is, who his secret enemy. A year later, on 9 August 1991, I called Yazov to seek a deferment of army service for young shepherds. I inquired at the same time why he was not vacationing with Mikhail Sergeevich. “I never did vacation with him. Last year this was a coincidence,” Yazov said hastily, and I wondered as to why this reaction. The putsch occurred ten days later.

It was clear that it was doomed. It was an attempt to save not the USSR but those that were in power themselves.

I do not regret what happened. The empire was at the end of its working life: temporal, ideological, economic. The reason for the disintegration was not the personalities of individuals. It was a historical inevitability caused by a violation of justice. I have observed repeatedly that our country obtained much as a part of the USSR, primarily in terms of education. But Turkmenistan was never an equal republic. We produced oil and gas, but no one ever knew where it went or at what price. We only knew that we received commands-ship it out, pump it out, send it out... Not one person in Turkmenistan knew where the profit from the sale of 70 billion cubic meters of gas, 15 million tons of oil, and I million tons of cotton went. The Center had the nerve to rank us as a backward republic here. And I should regret this?!

But I would like to emphasize here that we are not today casting aspersions on those with whom we lived together. Everyone suffered, it was bad for everyone. Let us build new, equal, bilateral relations. We recently conducted negotiations with the president of Ukraine and reached an understanding on the human level as regards both gas and the debt. We understand Ukraine is not now in a position to immediately pay off its debts running into the billions. We need to seek a way out together, therefore, but to talk as equals. Today, following the disintegration of the USSR, we have states with different economic levels, a different degree of disintegration of the internal infrastructure, and, finally, with different notions of reforms, but this does not mean that we should not cooperate. We cannot avoid one another. We actively support the CIS, therefore. A union of independent states is a sensible mechanism. It is too late now to stigmatize those who thought this up, and to propose endless scenarios of something new is foolish. The idea of the CIS should be welcomed if only because it saved the enormous territory of the former Union from conflagration. The CIS should today be seen, therefore, as a framework mechanism, as a mode of reproduction of civilized relations between equal states of the commonwealth. And the responsibility for participation in this union should be equal. Many people still adhere to the stereotype of Moscow, Russia, being the locomotive that pulls the whole train. It does not! Russia also is experiencing colossal difficulties. If we have conceived of the CIS as a railroad train, each car today needs an engine ....

[Solomonov]: Mr. President, how would you comment on the judgments to the effect that Turkmenistan, like other Central Asian republics, has since the disintegration of the Union turned to the East and is moving in the direction of the Islamic world ....

[Niyazov]: Listen, I have a Russian wife, my children are Russian! Where am I going? When you hear such talk, try to think: Whom does this benefit? Turkmenistan and Russia are bound by special, uniquely evolved relations, whose severance or winding down is hard, impossible, to imagine. Russia is a most important economic, military, and trading partner and, if you will, a pillar of our independence. Today, and this needs to be acknowledged by both us and the Russians, trade turnover between our countries has declined. And there is immediately increased talk to the effect that Turkmenistan has moved to the East! But let us look at the root of the matter. Here is an example: It is not directly connected with Russia, but it explains much. In Iran we purchased two hundred buses for $19,000 each, fine diesel buses. I could have purchased the same in Lvov and thereby strengthened Turkmen-Ukrainian relations, only I would have had to pay $200,000 per bus. What, pray, has Islam got to do with this? Russia wants to purchase cotton from us at 70 percent of the world price, Turkey and Iran, for 100 percent.... Yes, the volume of trade with Russia has fallen 12 percent, but no one in Russia is giving any serious thought as to why this has happened. Using talk about Islamic fundamentalism as a cover is easier than learning to trade in civilized and mutually profitable manner.

When, however, we are asked about fundamentalism, we have, to be honest, a hard time understanding the point at issue. We do not have such a problem. The Turkmen have a very solicitous attitude toward Islam as a religion that essentially saved the nation and helped it to recognize itself and begin to build its life on the basis of the highest spiritual and ethical ideals and principles. But for the Turkmen Islam was never a source for feeling superior to people confessing another faith and it never taught irreconcilability with them. I personally generally believe that Christianity and Islam are religions that are very close to each other. We essentially have the same prophets, the same spiritual and ethical precepts. Both religions, unless ill-intentioned adjustments are introduced to them, presuppose primarily man's intimate conversation with the Almighty. For this reason attempts to somehow politicize Islam are doomed with us. Yes, we are now attempting to revive our religion, but this revival poses no threats to anyone because the purpose of this work is the revival of the culture and history of our people. As far as manifestations of religious or national intolerance are concerned, they will be cut short most strictly as long as I am president...

4.35 Niyazov Favors "Speeding Up" Trade Deal with Russia

Interfax, 7 April 1995 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Turkmenistan's President Saparmurad Niyazov thinks it necessary to speed up the development of a long-term, at least five-year, trade and economic agreement with Russia. He said this on Friday in the course of a five-hour conversation with members of Russia's government delegation headed by Deputy Prime Minister Aleksey Bolshakov.

Bolshakov declared to Interfax that in the course of this meeting the parties discussed a wide spectrum of issues, as the fulfillment of this long-term agreement depends upon their successful solution. In particular, it concerns cooperation in the field of surveying and production of oil and gas, development of transport communication, and military-technical cooperation.

As Bolshakov said, Niyazov appointed Turkmenistan's deputy prime minister Valeriy Otchertsev head of the permanent acting combined commission on developing this long-term agreement and its further implementation.

Bolshakov underlined that "we have reached complete mutual understanding with Niyazov on all issues." In addition, Niyazov expressed great interest in further strengthening and expanding comprehensive cooperation with Russia.

In the course of the conversation, the officials also discussed issues related to military-technical cooperation which, to quote Turkmenistan's deputy prime minister Boris Shikmuradov, "do not contradict the positive neutrality to which Turkmenistan adheres."

Shikmuradov underlined that specific agreements on these issues would be reached during Niyazov's official visit to Moscow where he is likely to come to "immediately after the celebration of Victory Day in May...."

4.36 Shikmuradov Views Niyazov Appeal for Neutrality Status

Interfax, 11 April 1995 [FBIS Translation]

President of Turkmenistan Saparmurad Niyazov has officially appealed to the world community to support the idea of granting his country the status of a neutral state. Ukraine was informed of this by Turkmen Foreign Minister Boris Shikmuradov.

"We have the support of many Asian countries, the question has also been agreed with the leaders of several European nations,” he said. The minister stressed that there is understanding on this matter in Russia.

During the talks between Ukraine, Turkmenistan, and Iran in Tehran on 8-9 April, Ukraine also supported Turkmenistan’s desire to be a neutral state.

“We are ready to play the role Switzerland has been playing,” Shikhmuradov said. He stressed that such a status would not mean his country would sever ties with the CIS. He also added that at the first stage bilateral consultations would be held with different countries. “Later everything will be registered through appropriate UN structures,” the minister said.

Shikhmuradov stressed that Turkmenistan can be given the status of a neutral country on the basis of the 1907 international covenant formulating the key principles of neutrality.

The minister stressed that Turkmenistan has been pursuing a policy of “positive neutrality” for several years.

Uzbekistan

4.37 Karimov Press Conference on CIS Relations, National Borders, and Other Issues

Interview by Vitaliy Portnikov

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 15 May 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Question]: Mr. President, what position will Uzbekistan take on defense matters at the upcoming meeting of CIS heads of state in Tashkent?

[Answer]: Uzbekistan's position has been an open one from the start. Kazakhstan and other republics agreed with the approach we announced at the meeting in Minsk. Basically, every republic should have its own armed forces-nominal armed forces (in particular, Uzbekistan does not intend to have a force of more than 25,000 to 30,000 men), and they will form part of the OVS [Combined Armed Forces] under the command of Shaposhnikov. At the same time, we believe that the existence of strategic troops is a matter to be decided independently, and we have contributed our bit to that decision. At previous meetings I spoke in favor of the arrangement adopted in NATO. And the fact that Russia, along with Kazakhstan and the other republics, is creating its own armed forces indicates that everybody accepts this arrangement now. Obviously, we will come around to it. It would also be a good idea to conclude a regional agreement on mutual security, a proposal that was made at the meeting in Bishkek. We believe that Russia, as the biggest state, could, by means of such an agreement with the Central Asian republics and Kazakhstan, guarantee stability in the region. The idea is still being worked out. If successful, it would guarantee the inviolability of the borders of the former Union in our region. It would guarantee stability that all the states of the region could endorse ....

[Question]: How do you view the prospects of Uzbekistan's cooperation with Turkey and Iran?

[Answer]: When Uzbekistan, as an independent sovereign state, is faced with the dilemma as to which path of development to follow, which path would meet our interests, I say unequivocally that the Turkish path of development is more acceptable to us as a secular, civilized path of society's development. What we need to do is work out our own way, drawing on Turkey's experience. The Iranian model is not right for us. We had occasion to exchange ideas about this in Bishkek and in Ashkhabad, and it seems to me it is the opinion of Central Asia.

[Question]: When you were at the conference of heads of state of the CIS in Kiev, you were in solidarity with Ukrainian approaches to the question of the future of the CIS. Weren't you disappointed that the Ukrainian president, Kravchuk, did not attend the meeting in Tashkent?

[Answer]: Ukraine's position is well known-there's no vacillation there. As for my attitude toward it, I think that every republic, every state in the CIS, must find its own way, and we must respect these paths of development. At the same time, I do recall that when Leonid Makarovich called the CIS a myth I stated, at the same press conference, that CIS is a necessity. Uzbekistan's position on this matter is unequivocal: The CIS must exist. We don't need a return to the old structures that Gorbachev talks about; he has a different understanding. He would like to go back to his Novo-Ogarevo options. Uzbekistan is against that....

[Question]: How do you assess the future of economic cooperation within the CIS?

[Answer]: A lot of people in Uzbekistan think that the CIS should continue to develop, provided that every state remains independent and sovereign. That is the condition for further development of the CIS. Cooperation, interaction, mutual aid-these are all components of its future, as long as the states can build their own independence. But the Russian government under the leadership of Gaydar- I emphasize, under the leadership of Gaydar-has done a lot to speed the transition to market relations and develop reforms. It is by no means confiding its next steps to us. This disturbs us greatly. What will the reform come up with next? What will the Russian government revise tomorrow? And what position will that put us in, since we're functioning in a unified ruble system? If we want to retain the ruble zone we will have to resolve several issues. The banking system, at least, must not be in Russia's hands. That would be wrong; the system should be placed at the CIS level. The printing of money, and monetary circulation generally, should be the province of the CIS rather than any particular government, which could bring any state it pleases to its knees—could do so tomorrow. I will admit that we are getting ready to have our own currency, but when it will happen I can't say. The Baltics, which have been announcing their own currencies for two years now, have yet to make it a reality. The introduction of our own currency is not something ordinary, to be taken lightly. It is tied to all aspects of our life. Unless it is carefully prepared for, it could lead to economic collapse. We will not introduce our own currency without figuring out all the consequences.

[Question]: A lot of people are saying the Russian government is not paying attention to Central Asia, that Russia's influence here has been weakened.

[Answer]: That depends on how you view Russian influence. If it is through the prism of imperial thinking, then we're glad that it is becoming weak here. The principle we advocate and vote for is the full independence and sovereignty of each state, and in this regard I fully endorse Ukraine's position. As for economic, cultural, and human relations, though, I am against weakening those ties. We need to be with Russia in all the complex situations that await us on the path of independence, on the path of Uzbekistan's entry into the world community. These relations must be on the basis of equality in all respects....

4.38 Interview with CIS Leaders

Ostankino Television, 16 April 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Karimov]: I would like to add something to what Leonid Makarovich has said. I am aware there is currently very great agitation in Moscow and in Russia as a whole among forces suffering from nostalgia for the old Union. Many central publications are, generally speaking, openly attempting to blame all those who in their eyes destroyed the Union and saying that the only way out of the present situation in all our states is to return to the old system and to create a USSR.

As a representative of Uzbekistan, I want to say that we have no such nostalgia. We will never return to the past. For us the only way is forward, only forward. I wish to assure you that in this respect we fully support what is being done by the executive authority under the leadership of President Yeltsin. I am not saying that I am a 100 percent supporter of all reforms. I understand the many mistakes and difficulties involved in effecting reform in Russia. But nonetheless I state categorically that we are equally interested in the victory of reforms, the implementation of reforms, and the implementation of the course being followed in Russia. I am speaking in the name of Uzbekistan.

In this respect, I would like to declare that when it is sometimes said that things are bad everywhere and that there have been no good signs anywhere since the collapse of the Union, I categorically disagree with that.

Many people even forget that, alongside the difficulties we have in the economy, there is a great deal we have worked to achieve, a great deal we have fought for and won since the Union ceased to exist. It is this aspect to which I should like to draw your attention. And the people who live as sovereign, independent states understand full well where that independence came from. There will be no going back. And so when we speak such a lot of economic difficulties, we must understand that a transition from one system to another is never easy and never happens so well that we live better than we did before.

Therefore we must give this its due and we want to say: independence relates not only to the economy.

Independence also means spiritual independence.

Independence is above all the independence of nations, the independence of states. In this respect, there is no way back for us. And all those who try to campaign for that quite simply do not know the situation, I think, do not know how people in our regions feel. They do not know the situation or the mood of the people who live in Uzbekistan....

4.39 Karimov Reports on the Economy and Rejects Dual Citizenship

From the "Presidential Bulletin" column compiled by Andrey Pershin, Andrey Petrovskiy, and Vladimir Shishlin; and edited by Boris Grishchenko
Interfax, 29 December 1993 [FBIS Translation]

President Islam Karimov on Tuesday made a report to parliament on reforms in the republic.

The achievements made by Uzbekistan were the result of peace and stability, he said. But "processes in neighboring countries exercise a strong influence on the social and political situation in the republic.” He expressed concern over the results of the last parliamentary election in Russia, where “chauvinistic groups are rearing their heads.”

Karimov reaffirmed his negative attitude to the idea of dual citizenship. “The introduction of dual citizenship would give rise to inequality between the native population of the republic and the ethnic groups having the citizenship of two countries. In addition, it would weaken their patriotic spirit with regard to the republic where they live,” he said.

[IF Note: Dual citizenship was a key issue at negotiations between Karimov and Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev early in December. Kozyrev insisted that the Uzbek leadership ensure all rights for the “Russian-speaking population,” including the right to dual citizenship.

Karimov once again stated his intention to pursue an economic policy coordinated with those of other Central Asian states. He said that he would visit Kyrgyzstan early next year, and that soon after that Uzbekistan would be visited by President Nursultan Nazarbaev of Kazakhstan.

Karimov named privatization, both in industry and agriculture, as Uzbekistan’s main economic task.

He paid considerable attention to the introduction by Uzbekistan of its own currency. He rejected “destabilizing” rumors that som coupons would be abolished and that banknotes of five thousand and ten thousand som coupons would be removed from circulation.

He said the som coupons would be replaced by a permanent currency around next July.] [IF Note: The current parliament session approved a budget for next year. It also passed laws on elections to the Oliy Madjlis (the new parliament), on the taxation of individual property, and on income bases for Uzbek and foreign citizens and stateless persons. The elections to the 150-seat Oliy Madjlis will be held next summer, after the term of the present 500-seat Supreme Soviet expires. The new law allows only political parties and governmental bodies to nominate candidates to the new parliament and prohibits members of the armed forces, officers in the Interior Ministry and national security service, clergy and members of religious political parties from running for parliament. Civil servants are allowed to run, but they will have to leave their posts if they are elected.]

4.40 Karimov Discusses the Economic Situation

From the "Presidential Bulletin" column compiled by Nikolay Zharebtsov and Andrey Petrovskiy; and edited by Vladimir Shishlin

Interfax, 12 April 1994 [FBIS Translation]

In a recent exclusive interview with Interfax, President Islam Karimov described the forced transition to a local currency as the biggest problem of his country. He claimed that Uzbekistan resisted the withdrawal from the ruble zone for a long time. He said the worst consequence of the change was the spiritual separation of two million ethnic Russians from their native land. He favored a discussion by interested members of the CIS of the formation of a common monetary system with Russia.

Meanwhile, observers say the president is taking additional steps to stabilize the local currency. Karimov signed a government resolution stopping all transactions with Russian banknotes as of 15 April.

The purpose of the decision is to strengthen the circulation of som coupons and increase their purchasing power. The document permitted all legal entities (public and private) as well as individuals to sell goods and offer services for hard currency on the condition that all transactions are registered.

In keeping with the decision, after 15 April the exchange rates of the som will be determined through regular trading at the Uzbek Currency Exchange. So far exchange rates have been set by the Central Bank of Uzbekistan on the basis of the data supplied by the Central Bank of Russia.

The document provides for the formation of a network of exchange outlets for the public and allows private individuals to exchange currencies provided they have a license from the Central Bank.

Under the decision after 15 April all companies must sell to the Central Bank 30 percent of their foreign currency returns out of which 10 percent will be purchased by the Ministry of Finance for the Uzbek currency reserve and 5 percent by the government of Karakalpakia (an autonomous republic of Uzbekistan) and regional administrations for the formation of local currency reserves.

After 1 May, in keeping with the decision, settlements with companies in other former Soviet republics will be conducted only on a clearing basis or in hard currency.

[IF Note: At the moment in Tashkent the Russian ruble sells for 10-11 som and $1 for 200,000-22,000 som.]

4.41 Russian Banknotes Cease to Be Legal Tender

Shakhnoza Ganieva

“Novosti” newscast, Moscow Ostankino-1 Television
13 April 1994 [FBIS Translation]

A new decision by the cabinet has been published in Uzbekistan. The decision stipulates that banknotes issued by the Central Bank of Russia will no longer be accepted for any form of payment anywhere in the republic from 15 April onward. However, commercial organizations and enterprises, as well as private individuals, will be allowed to sell goods and services for freely convertible currency. Exchange rates between the som coupon, the national currency, and foreign currencies will be fixed in regular auctions at the Uzbek currency exchange, bearing in mind the need to maintain parity between prices on the domestic and foreign markets.

In order to establish a gold and hard currency reserve in the country, all enterprises, irrespective of their form of ownership, will now be obliged to sell the Central Bank 30 percent of their hard currency earnings. Beginning 1 May, all Uzbekistan’s settlements with CIS countries will be transacted solely through clearing or in freely convertible currency.

4.42 Karimov Says Russia Has a Great Future

Interfax 14 April 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[IF]: ... it seems, Uzbekistan, is one of the former USSR republics that has not experienced a substantial industrial recession recently and witnessed even a kind of raising in several fields of industry. Does it mean that you have found a recipe to fight with economic misfortunes?

[Karimov]: ... We act given the people’s wisdom

“Having not yet built a new house, do not destroy the old one.” Nobody intended to immediately destroy the previous system, toward which the new radical democrats feel hatred; the question is, rather, one of its gradual restructuring because it is impossible to force this process. There is no secret. I am convinced that all reforms should be implemented gradually and that one should not blame the old system for all mortal sins. We followed a creative road but not the path of destruction of everything what was created before.

I believe that the decision of the Russian authorities to widely celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the victory of the Soviet people over fascism is absolutely just. Now Russia cannot live without the army, without the mighty militaryindustrial potential that enabled it to support the balance in this bipolar world.

Those republics that primarily shipped raw materials to the former USSR have suffered less since the destruction of economic ties within the collapsed Union than those that produced manufactured goods. For example, Belarus, which has no natural resources, depended entirely upon other Union republics. Such a dependence is extremely dangerous.

Over the past few years by means of barter, in exchange for cotton and other products, Tashkent managed to receive those industrial goods that help to maintain rather a high level of production. But the main thing is that nobody in Uzbekistan intends “to break the old world down to its foundation and then to build a new one.”

[IF]: To what do you attribute the relative success of Uzbekistan?

[Karimov]: I believe that everything depends upon those at the helm of this state. For example, “chiefs of laboratories and chief research employees who pretended to be leaders of this nation were ignorantly fulfilling their duties. For example, who could Azerbaijan’s former president, Abulfaz Elchibey, a historian, know of economics and policy? This man worked all his life among dusty book shelves.”

An analogous situation was found in Georgia as well.
In

this republic a philologist, Zviad Gamsakhurdia, was heading the state. For example, I am not going to write poems and to play piano as did, say, the former head of the Lithuanian parliament, V. Landsbergis. When professional politician Algirdas Brazauskas came to power, life in the republic began to return to normal.

There existed a threat that incompetent people would come to power in Uzbekistan in 1989-90, as happened in the Caucasus.

I must say with great regret that such a negative situation obtains in Russia now. The unwillingness of the people to participate in the elections testifies to this fact. And if the people do not trust their ideals, then reforms cannot be implemented. This is a sad fact because Uzbekistan cannot flourish if Russia does not also flourish. I have said this many times.

[IF]: According to available information, about 40 percent of Uzbekistan's citizens do not know the Uzbek language, which is the national language.....

[Karimov]: As many as twenty-two million people live in Uzbekistan, of which 77 percent are Uzbeks, Tatars, Kazakhs, Tajiks, Kyrgyzers, Turkmen, and the so-called Russianspeakers representing about 10 percent of the total population comprise other nationalities living in the republic. The overwhelming majority know the Uzbek language; some of them do not speak fluently, but there are some people who do not speak it at all. On the other hand, there are Russians in the republic who speak the Uzbek language brilliantly, for example, Vitaliy Segedin, director of the Akmal'yk miningmetallurgical plant.

The Uzbek language decree is a liberal one-the authorities do not demand that all people should freely possess the language, but I believe that they should demonstrate respect for our language because this is sign of respect for the people. I think that the republic's citizens should possess the language at least on the level of everyday association.

By the way, almost 99 percent of Uzbeks know the Russian language, whereas this percentage is much lower in the Transcaucasian and Baltic states. Uzbekistan is an example of respect for the great Russian language....

[IF]: What is the state of the republic's foreign economic relations?

[Karimov]: The interest of foreign capital in Uzbekistan is great, and it seems to me that the Russian leadership perceives this with some jealousy. More than twelve hundred joint ventures are operating in the republic now, including large international corporations. There are branches of six prestigious foreign banks in the republic, and several reputable firms have opened representative offices in the republic.

I believe that Uzbekistan can teach Russia in some areas, for example, in the field of infrastructure construction and in foreign economic policy and transition to market relations. By the way, I have written a book on this problem. At present Tashkent has currency deposits in the world's best banks totaling more than $700 million. What CIS state can boast such a reserve in hard currency created within one to two years? It's my secret how Uzbekistan has managed to achieve this.

Achievement of trade parity with Russia is on today's agenda. Unfortunately, Tashkent buys practically everything from Russia without selling anything to it. At the same time one should not perceive Russia as "a milk cow." It is the richest power, and Russians can be proud of its potential.

[IF]: What is your assessment of the case on corruption in Uzbekistan's supreme echelons of power investigated by the USSR general prosecutor's office and Sh. Rashidov's role (the late first secretary of Uzbekistan's Communist Party- Interfax)? According to the investigation, the greatest number of millionaires [in the USSR] lived in the republic. Where is their money?

[Karimov]: You are right-there was corruption in the republic. The main root of the corruption was the upward distortion of the results achieved in the production of cotton, which were later on transferred into money by Uzbekistan's leaders, who were gaining great profits. However, I believe that the Union authorities were combating these illegal actions by vicious methods, and they did not observe laws themselves.

Nobody took into account that the republic had its own constitution, its own supreme soviet, its own legislature. They arrested deputies of the Union parliament violating their status. Those suspected were hunted with dogs; they were handcuffed without any sanctions of the attorney general.

I believe that the methods used by the investigators of the general prosecutor's office, Telman Gdlian and Nikolay Ivanov, personified complete lawlessness. Such ignorance of the national dignity of the republic's citizens led to the bloodshed in the course of interethnic clashes in the Fergana Valley. In my opinion, all Uzbekistan and, probably, all Central Asia could have exploded as a result of this. The republic could not control Gdlian and Ivanov. They were acting on the order of the CPSU [Communist Party of the Soviet Union] Central Committee.

I believe that an additional investigation of this case should be instituted in the near future. The thing is that funds earned honestly were confiscated from the people accused of corruption at that time. Women were deprived of wedding rings and jewelry received from their ancestors. This was pure humiliation. Where has all the confiscated jewelry disappeared to? How much has remained in Mr. Gdlian's pockets and in the pockets of other investigators? They have not handed over anything to Uzbekistan's Treasury. I think that Tashkent can raise this issue today. Nevertheless, we do not want to trouble people in this difficult time....

[Karimov]: Never in my life did I think that I would be a leader of such a scale and carry a colossal responsibility for the fate of the whole country. For a long time I worked in planning and financial organizations-I was deputy chairman of the government and headed the republic's State Planning Committee. After the discussion of my candidacy in the Politburo of the CPSU Central Committee and at the plenum of the Central Committee, I was confirmed as first secretary of Uzbekistan's Communist Party. It happened just after the tragic events in Fergana. At the same time I believe that I am a member of the party by accident.

I am convinced that any society, even the most democratic one, is not immune to sin. Now, Uzbekistan is accumulating experience while building its statehood. I think that elements of an authoritarian system are needed during the transition period. If the people elected me president, it means that they are confident in my program and see that it will bring stability and peace to this nation. I believe that I must fulfill my duty to the people, that is, I must fulfill my program. I must admit that I have never resorted to independent methods. However, I think that sometimes it is necessary....

[IF]: The mass media often reports about the growth of anti-Russian sentiment in Uzbekistan....

[Karimov]: I do not want to use passionate words, but I'd like to underline that Uzbekistan always treated Russia with great respect and gratitude. This is a sincere feeling.

The expression the "near abroad" is widely used now. Frankly speaking, I do not understand what it means. I think that such terms artificially separate us from the Russian Federation. Authors of this term do not understand themselves what is hidden by this word combination.

Russia has a great future. After the collapse of the USSR, independent young states experienced a kind of euphoria. In some of the republics this independence turned into a fetish. But life has proved that sovereignty is not just loud statements and declarations. Now many people understand that Russia should be the guarantor of peace and stability in Central Asia.

Not long ago in Davos, the prime minister of Pakistan, Mrs. Bhutto, declared that today, when there is no more iron curtain and the republics of Central Asia are open to the outside world, it's high time to start an integration process in this region by creating an association in which Pakistan will be the leader. I categorically oppose this point of view.

I believe that the Commonwealth of Independent States is a serious organization and one must take it into consideration.

4.43 Karimov Says Russia Is "Losing Uzbekistan's Market"

Vyacheslav Bantin

ITAR-TASS, 17 May 1994 [FBIS Translation]

“Russia is losing Uzbekistan’s market,” Uzbek President Islam Karimov warned in an interview with ITAR-TASS today. The president arrived for a four-day visit to Japan on 16 May.

“It appears that Moscow does not realize that Russia could be squeezed out of Uzbekistan as a result of intensifying international competition for the emergent market in our republic,” the president said.

“Furthermore, we are eager to win foreign investment in order to develop our economy and to establish close ties with foreign enterprises and attract them to our market.” Islam Karimov stressed that Uzbekistan wanted “to retain former links with Russia, but on a new basis.”

The president of Uzbekistan called for the establishment of Russo-Uzbek joint ventures based on close ties between industrial enterprises in the two countries dating from the Soviet period. “We are establishing joint ventures with firms in various foreign countries. There are now about fifteen hundred joint ventures in our republic, but there is not one Russo-Uzbek company,” the president noted. He pointed out that Russian President Boris Yeltsin also fully agreed that the two republics should set up joint ventures.

Islam Karimov stressed that “the peoples of Russia and Uzbekistan are bound by close spiritual ties.” “The Russian people have always stood beside us during those times in our history when things were very difficult for us, and we shall not forget this,” the president said.

4.44 Moscow Evening News Programs to Be Cut

Moscow Echo Radio Station, 4 June 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Uzbekistan plans to stop transmission of all news from Moscow. Beginning next week the main Ostankino evening news programs will be cut. The republic's national television and radio company intends to fill the slots with entertainment programs.

4.45 Karimov Discusses CIS Meeting, Tajik Elections, and Foreign Aid

News Conference, Uzbekistan Television

29 November 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Karimov]: The third question I want to draw your attention to is the question connected to the meeting of CIS heads of state that took place, as you know, on 21 October 1994.

This CIS meeting examined issues of the further deepening of integration and also agreed on measures to resolve the problems that exist today. I will make use of today's presence of the diplomatic corps and representatives of the press to express once again, to repeat, my attitude to the principle questions, in our view, connected to the prospects for the development of the CIS.

Unlike the supporters of the creation of various kinds of new forms of associations proposing that work begin on forming suprastate political structures and superstructures like the so-called Eurasian Union, in Uzbekistan we believe that today there is no alternative to the CIS, despite the weak points that can be noted in it, and that it meets the national state interests of all its members.

A somewhat paradoxical-I would say incomprehensible-situation is forming: They want to lead the public of the CIS, all CIS countries, into delusion. The fact is that CIS countries that exist today in the post-Soviet area are experiencing various degrees of crisis-politically and economically. It is precisely the disastrous situation of people that sometimes causes nostalgia for those times when the USSR existed. They want to use this to create the impression that at one time everything was good, and now independent princes, as they say, have appeared-independent principalities that are incapable of dealing with their situation. In this sense various forms of association are proposed that will supposedly save the situation; namely, the creation of various suprastate political structures such as a single parliament, a single citizenship, and various suprastate executive structures. But they are given a certain decorative democratic nature, and with this they want to lead everyone who lives in the post- Soviet area into delusion.

Tell me, please, if there is a single parliament, a single citizenship, a single armed forces, what should this state be called? And various, I would say, vagaries around this issue have a single nature-and I will repeat it once more-to bring ordinary people into delusion.

In our view integration has to begin with the economy. As I said at the CIS meeting in Moscow, a house is not built starting with the roof; a house is built starting with the foundation. And the foundation in all times has been the economy. It is economic integration that will create the prerequisites that will allow and ensure integration in all other areas, first and foremost in questions of culture, spirituality, and in questions connected as a whole with cooperation between the states that today make up the CIS.

This tendency comes up against those decisions that were taken at the CIS session, such as on the basic directions of CIS integrational development, the prospective plan for the integration and the development of the CIS, the creation of a payments union, and also the creation of an interstate economic committee. We believe that the formation of these structures is that beginning which will ensure profound integration, primarily on economic questions.

I would like to draw your attention to this fact- everybody, when much is being said about the Eurasian Union, when they speak to their electorates about the need for integration, indeed do little to implement their declarations with specific, practical steps. The creation of an interstate economic committee must ensure economic integration and the implementation of the document adopted eighteen months ago on economic union. More than a month has passed since the decision was made to create the economic committee, but no practical steps on starting the work of this body are being taken. This latest decision may really become the 401st decision made by the CIS that remains on paper. [Word indistinct] to those who say an awful lot and loudly at all forums about integration but in deed do virtually nothing. In the solution of all these problems, the role of Russia as a great power is very significant, but in practice Russia does not go beyond declarations.

The Transcaucasus

The Transcaucasus is a more ethnically explosive geopolitical region than Central Asia. Leaders such as Armenia's Levon Ter-Petrosyan and Georgia's Eduard Shevardnadze have been forced meekly to submit to Russia's bilateral military pressures and to its basic prescriptions for CIS integration as they try to re-establish order and stability in their war-ravaged countries. For Shevardnadze, this represents a significant shift from his initial refusal even to join the CIS or to accept its role as a supranational organization. The documents selected for this region illustrate the evolution from rejection to acceptance in the attitudes of the three principal Transcaucasian leaders. Nevertheless, the extracts chosen also depict each leader's subtle rejection of Russian domination. Azerbaijan tends to display the strongest opposition to Russia's tactics, being one of the most richly endowed with natural resources. Soon after the collapse of the Soviet Union, Abulfaz Elchibey, a non-communist member of the Azerbaijani Popular Front, was elected president of Azerbaijan. A recurrent theme in Elchibey's speeches, as shown here, was Russia's intervention in the ethnic quarrels brewing in the Transcaucasus. Nevertheless, following the political isolation of the Popular Front, he was driven out of office by the leader of the Azerbaijaniv Supreme Soviet (who was also the former Communist Party leader and a KGB general), Geydar Aliiev. Aliiev overrode Elchibey's CIS policies, signing the CIS charter in October 1993. Aliiev has positioned Azerbaijan thoroughly within Russia's political and military orbit, although once in power, he too became more independent-minded about exploiting Azerbaijan's rich oil and gas reserves. The Azerbaijan documents depict his attempts to form an energy consortium with Western partners without Russia's approval, which has led to his own troubles with Moscow. Aliiev's energy policies tie in directly with Russia's move to control the energy resources of the Caspian Sea, as documented in Chapter 3.

Armenia

4.46 Steps for Creation of Army Urged

Mark Harutyunyan

GAMK, 29 October 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Armenia has a problem defending its borders, but it has no army. A qualified general, Norat Ter Grigoryan, has been invited to become the commander of Armenian forces. He will organize the Armenian army gradually with modern concepts relevant to military science. Armenia is implementing a conscription. This means that there is a need for an army, which is a common-sense reality.

The people of Armenia are defending their homes, villages, and farms, especially in the border areas, to the best of their abilities, with the organization of an expeditionary force. The expeditionary force consists of volunteers. It is an auxiliary force, but it is not an army. In this period of getting on our feet, the expeditionary force is playing an important role, but it is not a state solution even if it has the natural backing of the government.

This assessment does not mean that Armenia is completely deprived of armed forces. There are a few regiments, each composed of approximately fifteen hundred soldiers. According to expert opinion, Armenia needs an army of forty thousand soldiers to be able to defend its borders, especially since it does not have the benefit of natural borders with its neighbors. The need to defend the homeland with armies is inevitable until the establishment of peace and cooperation.

The formation of an army is inevitable. Even Switzerland, which has declared its neutrality and which knows that it is not subject to any external threats, has a very modern army. Armenia has insecure borders and cannot be defended with the good will of others. General Norat Ter Grigoryan is expected to express himself as a specialist to provide numbers, an estimate of costs, and the qualitative nature of the army.

The development of the people's civic awareness is of vital importance in this regard. Vazgen Sargsyan faced a negative disposition by the people with regard to conscription during his term as minister of defense. The young men did not respond to their conscription calls, dealing a severe blow to the national aspirations of Armenians. These negative attitudes do not help the reconstruction of our homeland. It is time to leave the narrow circles of power to win the confidence of the masses, by words and deeds, that Armenia and the Armenian nation will be led by basic national values. Such moves will lead the masses to respond positively to conscription calls.

We must contribute to the formation of an Armenian army not out of humanitarian or philanthropic considerations but out of the knowledge that only Armenian platoons, brigades, battalions, and companies can defend the Armenian homeland. Nations have always known to respond positively to the call of patriotism when leaders inspire confidence-as the French did in response to General Charles de Gaulle's call on 18 June 1940. In a democratic system the army is not a political tool. This must also be explained to the people.

There is a large number of Armenian officers and soldiers in the former Soviet and the present Russian army who can return to Armenia and serve in the Armenian army. Because of developments in the Caucasus, Armenian officers and soldiers may not be viewed in a positive light as the descendants of a nation that is destabilizing the region. However, Armenian authorities must offer the families of these soldiers housing which is not so easy-in order to entice them to return.

Another basic problem is the procurement of military material for the army. The departing Soviet army has transferred arms and ammunition [to Armenia] (although Azerbaijan has benefited more because there were a larger number of military units on its territory). It is evident that military technology is developing very rapidly and that arms are becoming obsolete very quickly. Armenia must eventually produce its own military means and make use of advances made overseas. There is a drive in that direction because the regional powers, especially Azerbaijan, are not standing idle.

This patchwork of thoughts can have meaning only when it is decided in Armenia to form a modern national army, different from a border-guard force. Azerbaijan already has a national army. It does not hide that fact and benefits from the specialized assistance of Turkish officers.

Armenian authorities must recover the time they have lost and hasten the pace of forming a national army. This is not a question of militarism; self-defense and upholding national rights are imperative obligations. This is neither a disposition of aggressionism nor a plot against peace. This is not a easy task, and it will not be easy, but we cannot evade it out of populist considerations.

4.47 Ter-Petrosyan on Foreign and Domestic Affairs

Interview by M. Bchakjian

Haratch (Paris) 20-24, 29 October 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts [Question]: Which states are friendly to Armenia?

[Ter-Petrosyan]: I can without any reservation consider Iran a friend. Today Iran is the only state that is truly interested in having to its north a state like Armenia; it would be advantageous for Iran to have a strong and stable state [to its north]. I do not see a similar disposition among our other partners.

Russia has interests in Armenia, or rather in our geographic region. Although Russia is today preoccupied with its internal problems, it seems that it feels subconsciously that it must secure its presence here. That cannot be described as a concrete policy or strategy by Russia. It is more a subconscious feeling because Russia has had aspirations in this region for nearly three hundred years. Therefore it feels subconsciously that perhaps it is too early to terminate its presence in this region. Perhaps in the future Russia will re-evaluate the basis of its foreign policy, and perhaps it will withdraw from here. However, at this time it has not yet formulated such a policy.

[Question]: At present what is the Russian presence in Armenia? What is its level and scope?

[Ter-Petrosyan]: Today our borders are guarded by Russian armies. Russian armies guard the borders of the CIS. Apart from guarding borders, Russian armies are in all republics of the former Soviet Union. That is the only element of Russian presence. Of course, Russia has other means of leverage, such as in finances-Russia is entirely responsible for policies on the ruble. It also has the means to influence the republics through prices-especially the prices of basic materials. It has many such means of leverage....

[Question]: Did you have the same approach when you were a member of the Karabakh Committee?

[Ter-Petrosyan]: No, my views were completely different. At that time we had completely different objectives and we fought, sincerely and steadfastly, for the reunification of Nagorno-Karabakh with Armenia. Why? Because at that time Armenia and Azerbaijan were part of the Soviet Union. Those internal borders were not unalterable from a perspective of international law. They could be changed, and it was possible to change them. The world would very easily accept such an internal change of borders. We believed that through the political pressure we were applying on Armenian and Soviet authorities through protest demonstrations and strikes, we could bring about such changes. However, now that Armenia and Azerbaijan have become independent states, we have to adopt the rules of the new game. Today we cannot talk to the world with similar slogans. Today we have to come to terms with the rules of international law. Obviously our objectives were different then. [Passage omitted.]

4.48 Ter-Petrosyan Reviews First Year in Office

Armen Khanbabayan

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 13 November 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

A year ago, the first president of independent Armenia was sworn in.

The eleventh of November marks one year since the first president of Armenia took his oath of office. In this connection, Levon Ter-Petrosyan reviewed some of the results of his presidency and gave his own evaluation of socio-political events.

During his meeting with journalists, the president remarked that the most serious economic situation in Armenia today prevented him from talking about any achievements. However, the main positive phenomenon, in his view, is socio-political stability, which became possible not so much through the effort of the administration as because of our people, who can foresee the possible catastrophic results of destabilization. The president also emphasized the existence of a civilized opposition in Armenia, whose members do not go to extremes in their rivalry with the government. The situation in the republic is controllable, and its democratic freedoms are developing without being threatened. Work continues on the new constitution.

Our republic managed to overcome the militarist hysteria that, after the summer defeat in Nagorno-Karabakh, could have tempted the republic to become involved in a largescale war with Azerbaijan. This did not happen because the parliament declined the proposal to give formal recognition to the independent Nagorno-Karabakh republic, but it did not refuse to continue negotiations, as this would also mean a refusal to seek a compromise solution. "The Supreme Soviet decreed that Armenia should not sign any international documents naming Nagorno-Karabakh part of Azerbaijan," said the president, "and this decree deprives us of the possibility of a political maneuver. Meanwhile, I suggested that this idea be phrased differently: Do not sign any documents that contradict the right of the Nagorno-Karabakh people to self-determination. However, the opposition version was accepted because I was not insistent enough."

The president sees Armenia's participation in the CIS structures as an important aspect of its foreign policy. However, Levon Ter-Petrosyan thinks that any further strengthening of the commonwealth may be possible only after the current relations among the former republics are transformed into normal international ties. This is the only chance the CIS has to become a European-type commonwealth. Levon Ter- Petrosyan feels gratified by the level of development in relations with Russia. He has no reason to think that Moscow is conducting either a dishonest or a deceitful policy with respect to Yerevan. "I want to emphasize this circumstance especially," said the president, "because quite contrary statements appear rather frequently in our print media. Meanwhile, the only misunderstanding to cast a shadow on Armenian-Russian relations was related to the violation of military parity between Armenia and Azerbaijan last summer, when the Azerbaijani side captured military warehouses on its territory, and Moscow gave in to pressure from Baku. But later, parity was restored in general, and now Armenian-Russian relations are not tarnished by anything." Levon Ter-Petrosyan feels optimistic in his thinking that the stronger the positions of the Kremlin reformers, the better bilateral relations will be.

The president nevertheless feels optimistic in his expectations that the economic situation will improve with time, especially after Armenia manages to overcome the transportation blockade. Intensive negotiations are going on at present concerning the use of Turkish and Iranian transportation infrastructures by our republic. Trade recovery will lead to qualitative changes in the people's living standards, because today's main problem lies in the fact that Armenia can neither import food and raw materials nor export its own manufacturing goods costing tens of billions of rubles.

As for the current clash between the executive and legislative power, it will disappear gradually after the new constitution is adopted. Nobody is going to try and pull the blanket over to his side by demanding any extraordinary powers. A draft of the new constitution will be presented for public discussion as early as next year. When asked whether he thinks it necessary to introduce direct presidential rule during the transition period, Levon Ter-Petrosyan replied that he was against such measures because “the worst of democracies is still better than the best of dictatorships.”

4.49 Armenia Thinks “Caucasian Home” Concept Is Premature

Karen Topchyan

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 18 June 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Peace, democracy, cooperation-this was the motto of a meeting of political parties from the three Transcaucasian countries held in Tbilisi the other day. The Georgian Justice Party was behind it. The forum was also attended by the Georgian People’s Front and Green Party, the Armenian “Dashnaktsutyun” revolutionary federation, the “Constitutional Law” Union, the Republican Party, the “Zharang” national conservative club (all of them from Armenia), and also the Azerbaijani “Yurdash” party. Note that they are all in opposition to their countries’ leaderships.

According to the Armenian delegation, the Tbilisi meeting was productive on the whole. As one of the forum’s participants, Yervand Gasparian, said, the Georgian and Azerbaijani sides proposed the signing of a declaration they had prepared on the advisability of creating a “Caucasian Home,” which our delegation refused to do. The reason is that the idea of a “Caucasian Home” is clearly premature, so it is still too early to talk about it. Before discussing any specific action to unify the Transcaucasus, the current contradictions and problems among our peoples have to be resolved, in particular, the conflicts in the region have to be stopped. Moreover, the Armenian representative believes, the explanation of the proposal for a Caucasian home had a distinctly anti-Russian flavor. So an effort was being made to blame imperial forces in Russia for the present situation in the Transcaucasus. Disagreeing with this interpretation of the reasons for today's highly dramatic situation in the region, the Armenian delegation observed that the conflicts and unresolved matters in the Transcaucasus have deep historical roots, rather than having been introduced from outside. And if we are talking about interference by other states in the region's affairs, we must be talking about Turkey, which is actively involved in the confrontation in the Transcaucasus.

In the end the sides signed a joint communiqué in which the meeting participants, despite considerable contradictions, “expressed a wish to seek an end to the wars in the Caucasus and contribute to the creation of political mechanisms in the resolution of conflict questions.”

4.50 Armenian Premier Proposes Collective CIS Currency

Sergey Bablunyan

Izvestiya, 30 April 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Armenian prime minister Hrant Bagratian has sent a letter to all the CIS prime ministers.

It states, in particular, that financial transactions between the CIS countries have become considerably more complex as a result of the introduction of national currencies. The Russian ruble is used as a single currency for many trade deals between states. The CIS countries look to Russia for loans to execute their transactions, thereby increasing the Russian budget deficit. The prime minister thinks that the way to ease financial difficulties lies in the broader use of national currencies and also proposes setting up a collective currency for the CIS countries, in which it is proposed to carry out all transactions in a CIS interstate bank.

4.51 Bilateral Agreements with the United States Not Ratified

Snark (Yerevan), 29 May 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The Armenian Supreme Council has not ratified the bilateral agreements with the United States concluded in 1992. In his interview with Snark, the chairman of the Supreme Council's Committee on Foreign Relations, Davit Vardanyan, said that the Armenian government's delay is a violation of international rules on the introduction of such documents to legislative bodies. According to Vardanyan, the committee has returned the texts of all three documents to the government requiring them to correspond to international norms. The texts had to be in the languages of both parties. But the commission received the texts of the three agreements in English without any explanation. The chairman noted that after returning the texts to the Armenian government, the committee inquired about their fate. The American embassy in Yerevan is concerned about the documents' fate as well. To this day the government has not responded.

4.52 Financing of Russian Military Bases Too Expensive

Snark (Yerevan), 30 May 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Davit Vardanyan, chairman of the Armenian Supreme Council's Committee on Foreign Relations, believes that because Armenia is in a state of war, it is not able to finance 50 percent of the expenses for Russian military bases. Moreover, in his interview with Snark he stated that the agreement's clause on 50 percent financing contradicts international standards of foreign base activity, because each country in the world finances its own military bases. Another problem is that weapons of the former USSR were not equally divided among the Soviet republics. After the USSR's disintegration, Azerbaijan received 28 percent of the Caspian fleet's weapons, 130 military planes, and 10,000 vans with ammunition, which by far exceeds Armenia's share.

4.53 Impact of Minsk Summit Analyzed

Karen Topchyan

RespublikaArmeniya, 31 May 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The uprooting by the presidents of Russia and Belarus of a post on the Belarusian-Russian border was, seemingly, to have been the symbol of the latest, 17th [as published], meeting of leaders of the CIS, which was held last week in Minsk. But Yeltsin declined to dig up the post, saying that it was not "kingly work," and the post itself was stuck fast in the ground. Chernomyrdin, who substituted for Yeltsin, had, therefore, to confine himself to the cutting of a ribbon symbolizing the state border. Salt was also rubbed into the wounds of Lukashenka, who had been hurt by Yeltsin's refusal to pick up a spade, by Minsk students, who first put up the new-old Belarusian flag with the modified Soviet symbols so beloved by the president at a public restroom and then burned it.

Failing even more to correspond to the planned symbols was the Minsk summit itself. Unlike the Belarusian president, who is literally forcing himself into the guardianship of Russia (at Russian expense, naturally), the other leaders of the CIS displayed no particular zeal on this matter. President Kuchma said that he would wait to break up the border posts, otherwise, he might be doing something "completely stupid." As a result, Ukraine and also Uzbekistan, Moldova, Azerbaijan, and Turkmenistan refused to sign a treaty on joint protection of the external borders of the CIS. A number of Central Asian members of the CIS, and also Azerbaijan, proceeding from their particular view of human rights, rejected the Convention on Human Rights and Basic Liberties offered at the meeting for consideration. Generally, with every meeting it turns out that some country or group of countries has a dissenting opinion on an increasingly large number of questions. The absence from each successive summit of some head of state has become a regular feature. Saparmurad Niyazov and Nursultan Nazarbaev “took ill” and did not go to Minsk on this occasion.

But the very location of the meeting-Minsk—required that the hosts’ diligence with respect to land integration be marked somehow. Boris Yeltsin, of course, could not have failed to Lukashenka. “Our integration has gone considerably deeper with Belarus than with other countries of the CIS.” But, first, it could just be a question of Lukashenka and, second, of whether the other CIS countries are ready for integration. Any more or less tangible results, on the other hand, may, most likely, be expected only in respect to so-called dire business. Thus, in particular, the leaders of the CIS voted unanimously for extending the stay of the collective peacekeeping force in Tajikistan and Abkhazia. A currency committee also was created without any particular disagreements (only Turkmenistan abstained), but there are still many questions here also. The main one is which currency might be the likely medium of payment in settlements among states of the CIS. The ruble would, in any event, hardly be seriously quoted as a kind of CIS ecu, considering the not particularly respectful attitude toward it in the majority of states of the commonwealth.

The next top-level meeting will be held in Sochi at the start of November. The leaders of the CIS do not, in all probability, greatly miss one another if they are planning their next meeting not for two months hence (as was the case in the first years of the formation of the commonwealth) or three months hence (as was the case at somewhat later rendezvous) but merely after the passage of more than five months. It is a perfectly reasonable assumption, therefore, that several heads of the post-Soviet states invited to the November summit will once again prove to be “unwell.”

4.54 Russia's Regional Policy Eyed and Assessed

Aleksandr Krasulin

ITAR-TASS, 2 April 1992 [FBIS Translation]

“The Slavic Card in Russia's Caucasian Policy” is the topic of a news conference given at the Azerbaijani mission in Moscow on Thursday [2 April]. Scientists, representatives of public organizations uniting various groups of the Azerbaijani population and Azeri reporters took part.

All the states that were included in the USSR and in whose territories conflicts broke out turn to Russia, regarding it as the force that can settle their problems promptly and in a final way, said Akhmed Iskenderov, corresponding member of the Russian Academy of Sciences and editor-in-chief of the journal Problems of History. He said Russian leaders are slow to work out the national policy and agree to “incomprehensible compromise entailing sacrifices.”

The participants in the news conference reproached Russian news organizations, which, in their opinion, do not give enough coverage to Azerbaijan’s problems and do not reflect precisely the situation in Nagorno-Karabakh and the position of various ethnic groups in Azerbaijan. They noted that people of various ethnic groups, among them nearly half a million Russians, live in Azerbaijan and regard themselves as its citizens. Statements about the departure of considerable numbers of Russians from Azerbaijan were described at the news conference as groundless rumors.

4.55 Presidential Adviser Not Optimistic on Future of CIS

From the “Presidential Bulletin” column compiled by Andrey Pershin, Andrey Petrovskiy, and Vladimir Shishlin; and edited by Boris Grishchenko
Interfax, 26 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The president’s international policy advisor, Vafa Galuadze, thinks that, in all likelihood, the CIS cannot be preserved in its present form. In his opinion, the commonwealth may only have a future as a consultative organ. Commenting on the meeting of commonwealth leaders in Minsk, at which Azerbaijan participated as an observer, he said that “there is more than one evaluation of this meeting: Certain participants of the summit see it as a success, but the West on the other hand thinks it was without results.” The advisor also remarked that several commonwealth states negatively reacted to attempts to interfere in their domestic affairs through various joint documents.

According to Galuadze, however, Baku thinks it would be worthwhile for Azerbaijan to participate at CIS forums as an observer. This, he is convinced, will enable the country “to keep a hand on the pulse of world policy.” The republic, however, has principally decided against joining the commonwealth, the advisor stressed.

Azerbaijan’s relations with Russia were described by Galuadze as close and friendly.

In the advisor’s words, government experts are now developing the question of Azerbaijan’s position regarding the treaty, signed in Minsk, on the creation of an interstate bank.

With regard to the results of the visit to Baku by chairman of the Minsk CSCE conference on political settlement of the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict, Mario Rafaeli, the president's advisor said: Baku is in favor of diplomatic and political settlement of the conflict, but "each step on this path to peace is torpedoed by the Armenian side."

When discussing the outlook for the Minsk meeting and ways to settle the conflict, the Azerbaijani side, the advisor said, [believes] that Yerevan should announce its rejection of any territorial claims on Azerbaijan. Baku leaders think that it is necessary first to annul the resolution to unite Nagorno-Karabakh with Armenia, which was passed by the Supreme Soviet of Armenia in 1989. Galuadze thinks that the Armenian side does not yet appear ready for a Minsk conference. In order for the conference to take place, he thinks, Armenia should end military activities on Azerbaijani territories and remove its troops from Shushi and Lachina.

[IF Note: At the meeting last Friday with Mario Rafaeli, Azerbaijani president Abulfaz Elchibey emphasized that the process of political settlement of the conflict is developing slowly, because large states are in no hurry to actively participate in settling the conflict. Elchibey accused Armenia of violating all agreements reached earlier through international mediation.]

4.56 Abulfaz Elchibey Comments on Russia's Role in

Caucasian “War”

Report on Interview by Pazit Rabina

DvarHashavua, 28 May 1993 [FBIS Translation],

Excerpts

In Baku it is said that President Elchibey is barely in control and that his coalition is hanging by a thread. There is no room for gentle professors at the top of the Azerbaijani leadership. In an interview at the presidential palace at the beginning of May, however, the president reveals himself to be a man whose sharp tongue is at odds with his immaculate manners and quiet tone of voice.

“To my great regret,” Elchibey says, “the war between Armenia and Azerbaijan long ago ceased to be a war between two rivals from the Caucasus. This is a war in which the combating peoples have become the pawns of mightier powers. Russia is stirring up a war in the Caucasus,” Elchibey asserts. “Looking back,” Elchibey says, “we can enumerate one by one the Russian military officers and KGB personnel who were actively responsible for bringing about the deterioration in the situation. People who once operated within the framework of the Soviet state are now acting as part of the Russian republic and raking in huge profits by selling weapons to the areas of fighting in the Caucasus.” Elchibey claims that “the recent Armenian victories in the war can be chalked up to the presence of the Russian Seventh Army, which is stationed in the region and is helping the Armenians in their struggle. Russia has a vested interest in the continuation of the war,” the president said, noting that “the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan gives the Russians a foothold in the Caucasus.”

Elchibey averred that the very week of our talk there had been an indisputable example of Russia's role in fanning the fires of war in the region. Six Russian soldiers, who were taken captive after bloody battles in the Kelbadzhar area, were brought to trial before a military court in Baku. The six Russians were accused of slaughtering thirty-three Azeris with axes and blunt instruments. In addition to murder, they were also accused of planting explosive charges, attempted kidnappings, and terrorist attacks against the local population. From the beginning of the week, rumor had it that the six Russians would be executed. No meaningful attempts to save them were made. Since the soldiers' capture, the Russian government has disclaimed any responsibility toward them, claiming that they were mercenaries, not soldiers. But the six Russians testified that they belonged to Russia's Seventh Army stationed in Armenia. Last week it was officially reported that the six men have been sentenced to death. All the attempts to swap them for six Azeri prisoners have so far been unsuccessful. If the soldiers are executed, it will be the first time in the post-Soviet era that any country has dared to execute Russian soldiers. It is hard to predict the consequences, but anything is possible in the Caucasus.

To counter the existing Russian presence in the Caucasus, Elchibey is planning to form a small, efficient, and modern Azerbaijani army. "Yes," he says, "we are planning a new army that will be based on weapons from Turkey, the United Kingdom, and the United States."

Elchibey is full of praise for Western-style capitalism: "I thank the American oil company, Amoco, and the British oil firm British Petroleum for their extensive investments in the entire region, especially in Azerbaijan.”

A group of Pakistani pilots, navigators, and airmen, wearing their flight suits and carrying their instruction manuals, were photographed a day before the interview with the president. In response to an indirect question about Pakistan, a fellow Islamic state and potential ally that could help Azerbaijan build up its Air Force, the president reiterated that he prefers the British, Turks, and Americans. He is right to a great extent. After all, the United States built up Pakistan’s Air Force, and the corps structure, not to mention the ranks and uniforms of the Pakistani Army, is a legacy of British colonialism. The initials of the Pakistan Air Force, which are emblazoned on the center of the wings stitched to the pilots' flight suits, are an accurate replica of the British Royal Air Force's logo.

The building of a modern army is the dream of every military industry. The state of war in Azerbaijan offers such an opportunity. The creation of an entire army from scratch would be a veritable gold mine for the economy of a country like Israel, or even the United States, for many years. Therefore, and this is only stating the obvious, many are showing interest, including Israel.

President Elchibey preferred to elegantly avoid the question of why Azerbaijan should not make use of the good services of the State of Israel. However, sources in Azerbaijan and Geneva this week confirmed that nightvision equipment for aircraft had been found in the areas of fighting in Nagorno-Karabakh. The equipment was taken from Turkish helicopters that had crashed in the region. The assessment is that these are Israeli systems or components to enable helicopters to fly over wadis and streams under very difficult flying conditions and to fly close to enemy troop concentrations and carry out commando attacks. Vafa Galuadze does not mince words. Referring to Arkadiy Volskiy, the man appointed by Mikhail Gorbachev to mediate between the warring parties in Nagorno-Karabakh, he says, "He is a filthy man." [Passage omitted.]

When asked about sales of Israeli arms, presidential advisor Galuadze denied the reports saying he never met David Kimche [former Israeli foreign ministry and Mossad official]. But Galuadze has met other Israelis. Last year Galuadze conducted a secret visit to Israel. News of his visit leaked, however, and was published by Armenian journalists in France. In Israel, Galuadze says, he met with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and proposed cultural and scientific exchanges. “You are leaving a vacuum for Islamic fundamentalism in the region” was Galuadze’s friendly warning. “We need more student exchanges between universities,” he said. Peres, Galuadze said, agreed with every word. [Passage omitted.]

4.57 President Aliev on the Present Situation and Joining the CIS

Interview by Aydyn Mekhtiev

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 14 October 1993

[FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Mektiev]: Mr. Aliev, first of all, allow me to congratulate you on your election to the post of president of the Republic of Azerbaijan. Could you speak about the reasons for holding early presidential elections after Elchibey’s election half a year ago?

[Aliev]: When on 17 June this year former president Abulfaz Elchibey left his workplace, in fact ending the execution of his presidential duties, he himself transferred the powers of the head of state to the parliamentary chairman. On the following day the Milli Mejlis [the parliament] confirmed the transfer of these powers. Ways to overcome the crisis were sought. We tried to convince Elchibey of the need to return to his duties, but those efforts were unsuccessful. Delegations of representatives from the intelligentsia went to the village of Kalaki, where Elchibey had taken refuge behind several cordons of security forces, and appeals were sent there in writing, but all was in vain. Therefore we, proceeding from the principles universally recognized in world practice, made a decision to hold a republic-wide referendum on confidence in the president. The results of the poll are known to you: 97.5 percent of the population expressed distrust in Elchibey. As you see, we made this move even though the republic's constitution contains provisions giving grounds for the immediate removal of the president from office for violating the country's Fundamental Law. After the referendum results were announced, a decision was made to hold early presidential elections. The conditions were created for all political forces to participate in the election campaign and to nominate their candidates. Several times I personally appealed from the parliamentary rostrum to the People's Front and its leader-Elchibey himself-to field his candidacy. Yet Elchibey did not do that. On the other hand, representatives of two other political movements declared their wish to run for the post of head of state. Many work collectives and other public organizations also nominated me as a candidate.

[Mekhtiev]: Mr. President, a whole number of opposition movements, and in particular the People's Front, announced their intention to passively boycott the elections and proclaimed their results invalid in advance. How do you assess this?

[Aliiev]: I believe that the presidential elections were held under exclusively democratic circumstances. During the election campaign all conditions were provided to ensure freedom of expression. Observers from thirty-five countries and also from such an authoritative organization as the CSCE [Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe] monitored the conduct of the elections on 3 October as well as the 29 August referendum. Heads of foreign missions also acted as observers. The fact that the People's Front, with all the above conditions, calls the elections illegitimate is very characteristic. The People's Front has been so spoiled by the fact that its members could violate laws and indulge in arbitrariness that it continues to think that it is the opinion of only this organization that is the ultimate truth. However, if the People's Front believes that it has decisive influence on public opinion, why then did more than 98 percent of the electorate vote for the new president?!

[Mekhtiev]: Recently the mass media reported an attempt on your life. Could you elaborate on that?

[Aliiev]: My recent observations-and this is confirmed by public opinion polls-show that some extremist political forces, including the People's Front, are not happy with a stable socio-political situation in Azerbaijan. In the past, too, they wanted to destabilize the situation, so the present normalization of the situation in Azerbaijan is obviously not to their liking. This is why they are resorting to the use of force. It was not the first time that they have done so. As you probably remember, while I was working in Nakhichevan last October, they tried to overthrow the legally elected power bodies of the Nakhichevan Autonomous Republic by armed force. For that purpose they mobilized more than three hundred People's Front members armed with automatic rifles and other weapons, but they failed to carry out their plans because voters came out to defend the parliament, and though they were not armed, their number exceeded fifteen thousand. Members of the People's Front threatened me with terrorism. There were reports about acts of terrorism being prepared against me. All these reports were checked. This latest incident is, of course, outrageous, and it well characterizes the People's Front ideologues. It appears that they hired a man-a Turkish citizen, a member of the Gray Wolves organization-and they brought him to Nakhichevan and trained him for more than a month, including target practice and training sessions, and provided him with a sniper's rifle with optical sights and with grenades. They studied the route of my movements and the time of my coming and going to work. As is apparent from the testimony of the suspects, attempts to use a grenade to blow up the car in which I was traveling were not ruled out. I had no doubt that the People's Front, which emerged in its time as a popular movement and which, incidentally, was trusted by many in Azerbaijan and on which many pinned their hopes, has turned into a terrorist organization. No political party or political organization in the world usually has armed units, whereas the People's Front in recent years has formed many armed groups, though I do not know where the funds to support them come from. This puts the People's Front outside the framework of all humane principles and outside the scope of the law and the constitution.

[Mekhtiev]: Is there any intention in light of this to suspend the activity of the People's Front?

[Aliiev]: Proposals on the need to terminate the Front's activity have been made, including from parliamentary deputies at recent sessions after the criminal actions by some members of the People's Front came to light. However, I did not agree with this approach and did not even allow this question to be discussed, based on the principles of democracy. At the same time the People's Front can no longer be called "the people's" as it does not represent the people....

[Mekhtiev]: Recently Azerbaijan has become a full-fledged member of the Commonwealth of Independent States. You, as the initiator of its entry into the CIS, were accused by some of an attempt to return Azerbaijan to the sphere of Russia's influence....

[Aliiev]: These allegations are groundless and biased. Such statements are intended to influence public opinion. I think that this is already impossible since, before joining the CIS, we repeatedly discussed this question at parliamentary sessions. Incidentally, all Milli Mejlis sessions are broadcast on television and the population can directly oversee the decision-making process. Based on public opinion research results, we have found out that an overwhelming majority of the population supports this move. The opinion of opposition leaders does not express the people's aspirations. They themselves understand that this act has been adopted based on Azerbaijan's supreme interests. Joining the CIS in no way means that Azerbaijan is falling under Russia's influence. I have no doubt, however, that Azerbaijan had to restore normal relations with such a large country as Russia.

[Aliiev]: That position of the former president completely contradicted the national interests and historical traditions of the good-neighborly relations between our peoples and did not relate to Azerbaijan's economic interests. Azerbaijan is linked with the regions of Central Asia and Kazakhstan by centuries-old relations. Many Azeris live on the territory of these states, and it is irrational to create artificial barriers in the relations with these states. We have fully moved away from this line. Moreover, I condemn this policy of the former leadership. At present we have reached agreement with all the leaders of the states in the Central Asian region and Kazakhstan on concluding direct treaties and establishing close ties. A package of agreements has been prepared with Uzbekistan, and one is pending with Kazakhstan. I have direct contacts with the presidents of all these republics, and

I have already met with them at the previous CIS session. I think that our relations with these states will develop on all fronts. This will benefit the Azeri people.

[Mekhtiev]: On 8 October you held talks in the Kremlin with the leaders of Russia, Georgia, and Armenia. One of the questions discussed at that meeting was the issue of unblocking transportation routes in the Transcaucasian region. Does the new leadership of Azerbaijan agree with the demand to lift the ban on railway freight transit through Azerbaijan to Armenia?

[Aliiev]: This demand cannot be considered outside the context of Resolutions 822 and 853 of the UN Security Council, which call for an immediate withdrawal of Armenian troops from the occupied territories. Neither is it possible to resolve the transportation issue without addressing the entire complex of questions related to the aggression by Armenian armed groups against Azerbaijan. After all, outside the former Nagorno-Karabakh Oblast a large territory of the Republic of Azerbaijan has been captured and hundreds of thousands of people have become refugees. Without resolving these questions, not only is the demand to lift sanctions not serious but it can even be seen as an element of aggression against Azerbaijan....

4.58 Aliiev Urges "Closer Integration" in the CIS

Interview by Pavel Alekseev

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 15 June 1994 [FBIS Translation]

It will soon be a year since you became president of Azerbaijan. Yet not many years ago most people were sure that G. Aliev's political career was over....

[Aliev]: You could say that I did not come here of my own volition. After leaving the Politburo in 1987 because of serious disagreements with the USSR leadership, including Gorbachev personally, I did not engage in political activity. When, in late 1990, I was not allowed to live in Baku and found refuge in Nakhichevan, again I did not want to get involved in politics. But in 1991 a very difficult situation arose. The autonomous republic [of Nakhichevan] within Azerbaijan is detached from the state's main territory and borders on Iran, Turkey, and Armenia, and therefore, as a result of the war, it found itself blockaded. For several days people held rallies in the squares, demanding that I become head of the republic's Supreme Council, and I was obliged to do so. I started work. It is a very complex region, and our life was not without its difficulties, but at least it is peaceful, unless you count minor border clashes.

There is no war there now either, and there is not the same level of crime as before. Turkey has granted Nakhichevan $100 million in credit. We immediately released $20 million of that to buy food, and that also alleviated the situation. And I thought that this autonomous republic would be my last abode.

But in June last year the power struggle in Azerbaijan intensified, and the republic found itself on the brink of civil war. Then the Azerbaijani leadership, in the person of President Abulfaz Elchibey, appealed to me to come and help lead the republic out of the crisis. I did not want to return, but then I decided that it is wrong to stay on the sidelines when your people are in trouble. Unfortunately, two days after I took office as chairman of the Azerbaijan National Assembly, President Elchibey left Baku in secret and has been in a Nakhichevan mountain village ever since. I was left alone. And for eleven months now I have been trying to sort out the situation in the republic.

[Alekseev]: What are the basic problems facing Azerbaijan at present?

[Aliiev]: We are going through a very difficult period. The transition from a situation in which we were all part of a single Soviet state to the achievement of independence and the consolidation of sovereignty is very difficult in itself. The situation is exacerbated by the fact that all the former USSR republics were very closely interlinked, especially economically, and the severance of ties had a very severe effect on Azerbaijan's economy. Then again, the republic is making the transition from one economic system to another, from a socialist economic system, and its laws and principles, to a free market economy. Finally, the third factor complicating the socio-economic situation in Azerbaijan is the war. It has now been going on for six years, some 20 percent of the republic's territory is occupied, and there are more than one million refugees.

[Alekseev]: What can you say about the causes of the conflict, and what must be done to stop it?

[Aliiev]: It was not the Azerbaijani side that started this war. There is no point now in analyzing what happened, but I will say one thing. When it all began, Azerbaijan was part of a single centralized state-the USSR-and therefore the Union leadership could have prevented the outbreak of conflict. Or else, if conflict had begun, it could have prevented it from developing.

Unfortunately, this did not happen. The Karabakh conflict was the first on the USSR's territory, and look how many hot spots have developed.

Azerbaijan is now waging a war to preserve its territorial integrity. But all this time I have been trying to put an end to the war through talks. There has been a cease-fire since 10 May. Talks are now under way with the participation of the CSCE Minsk Group and Russia. Maybe it will be possible at last to reach an accord to end the conflict, but on one condition: that the Armenian armed formations free all the occupied Azerbaijani territory, except, of course, Nagorno-Karabakh. Then we can conduct talks on the status of Nagorno-Karabakh.

[Alekseev]: During the Bishkek talks there was talk of disengagement forces....

[Aliiev]: Look, whatever happens, in order to stop the war, monitor compliance with the cease-fire accord, and ensure the withdrawal of Armenian armed formations, forces of some kind are certainly needed. The CSCE Minsk Group sees these forces as observers. Russia considers it possible to send in so-called CIS peacekeeping disengagement forces, but this question is still being discussed.

[Alekseev]: How would you assess the situation in the Caucasus? There has been much talk recently of how Russia still has no clear political concept with regard to that region.

[Aliiev]: It is hard for me to say whether Russia has a clear stance or not. But it is a fact that the Caucasus is a very complex region and requires a more thoughtful, considered, and intelligent approach. Russia is a great country. And the Caucasus has been part of it for more than two hundred years, be it tsarist Russia or the USSR, in which the Russian Federation was dominant. And Russia should have the same attitude to all the republics of the Caucasus. If there is a slant in one direction or another, it will lead to complications, and, naturally, the loss of its prestige in the region. There should, I repeat, be a very carefully considered approach, irrespective of whether Russia had closer historical links with one people, irrespective of religion. It seems to me that Russia will then have more prestige in the Caucasus, and the Caucasus will be assured of greater tranquility. And greater tranquility in the Caucasus means greater tranquility in Russia.

[Alekseev]: For two years now the former republics have been trying to resolve the problem of the severance of ties in the post-Soviet area within the framework of the CIS. How do you assess that organization's activity and future?

[Aliiev]: The organization has a future, I believe. It is needed so that each republic can develop more successfully. That is why, when I became leader of Azerbaijan, I made great efforts to create an atmosphere of trust in the CIS and the right conditions for joining the commonwealth.

To tell the truth, it was not easy. By virtue of various circumstances, a very negative attitude to the CIS had developed in Azerbaijan. I am not saying that everyone felt that way, but the vast majority did. First and foremost, the events of 20 January 1990 had very serious moral effects on the people. On the other hand, the People's Front, while in power, vigorously cultivated anti-Russian sentiments. So it took some months to overcome those sentiments in the public consciousness. And on 24 September last year we joined the CIS. I think it was a necessary and important step, and Azerbaijan should remain in the CIS in the future. But as for the Commonwealth's practical activity, I would not say that the organization has really become established or is functioning properly as yet. It seems somehow that during the meetings of heads of state, which last a day and a half or two days, the CIS exists, but in the intervals between meetings it does not. Therefore, in my view, very energetic measures are needed to enable the CIS to function more successfully.

[Alekseev]: And what does that require? Some kind of supranational structures, perhaps?

[Aliiev]: I do not consider that expedient. That implies the resurrection of a unified state, the possibility of impinging on national interests. The former republics are now independent states, and they cannot agree to that. But it is essential to have closer integration.

[Alekseev]: Previously, in the USSR, much was said about the friendship of peoples. In the CIS, they discuss every question under the sun except for this one. Does it not seem to you that now, of all times, this is what is needed?

[Aliiev]: The question is indeed very important. At the meeting in Ashkhabad, I stated officially that I consider it abnormal to have a situation wherein two states belonging to one alliance fight among themselves. But I got no response. A second time, in Moscow on 15 April, I again raised the question of how the CIS was created for the purposes of uniting to defend the interests of our alliance, which is why it is unacceptable for two members of the alliance to fight among themselves, and that such a thing had never been seen in world practice. And again this question was not discussed. But you know, alongside the military and eco-conomic aspects, the CIS needs a moral climate: What is needed is the strengthening of the friendship of peoples as a means of avoiding future conflicts and hostility toward one another. The CIS should extend its functions to the humanitarian sphere too, to the strengthening of mutual relations between nations and peoples, but in order to do this it is necessary for mutual relations inside the CIS itself to be warm and friendly.

[Alekseev]: In your short time as president, you have shown exceptional diplomatic energy. How would you describe Azerbaijan's political orientation in the international arena?

[Aliiev]: I consider a success that I managed to turn mutual relations between the Russian Federation and Azerbaijan toward a positive direction. I met with B. Yeltsin and V. Chernomyrdin and other officials. We signed a number of very important documents, and we joined the CIS. That is, my first steps were aimed at restoring good relations with Russia. And this policy will continue. For Azerbaijan, Russia is both a close neighbor and a large country with which the lives of many of the republic's citizens, living both in Azerbaijan and Russia, are linked.

Naturally, we favor the establishment of friendly relations with all neighboring countries-with Turkey, for instance. These relations were good before, but my visit to Turkey, and the treaty we signed, strengthened our relations still further. Another neighbor is Iran. We have a very long common border and traditional links. Admittedly, the previous leadership did not accord the necessary significance to relations with Iran, and a certain tension arose in our relations. But during a visit to Baku by President Rafsanjani in October, we signed a number of documents.

Georgia is also our neighbor-600,000 Azeris live there-and President Shevardnadze also visited us.

As for other countries, as we move along the road toward building a democratic, rule-of-law state, so we have a great need to develop relations with Western countries with traditions and experience in democracy and a market economy. Therefore, I accepted an invitation from the leaders of Great Britain and France, John Major and François Mitterrand, to visit those states, and we had fairly fruitful talks.

[Alekseev]: You spend a great deal of time on foreign policy, problems within the republic, the Karabakh conflict.... Who helps you in doing so? From the sidelines, just one figure is visible above Azerbaijan's entire political horizon-President Geydar Aliiev....

[Aliiev]: I have already said that I did not return to Baku of my own volition and I did not plan to get involved in politics. This probably sounds rather high-flown, but the people called me. Therefore, I did not bring any team of my own with me, nor did I prepare one. Admittedly, I know Azerbaijan well, but I left in 1982. Since then, an entire generation of leaders has been replaced. I have no party of my own. I work with the people who are there now.

4.59 Aliiev on Ties with Russia and Other Topics

Interview

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 20 August 1994 [FBIS]

Translation], Excerpts

In an endeavor to understand how the republic is living today, our special correspondents have spoken with all sorts of people. People repeatedly mentioned the Soviet Union, many of them experiencing feelings of nostalgia. Tell me, Geydar Alievich, what Azerbaijan nonetheless acquired on the USSR's disintegration. Do you yourself, incidentally, never long for the past?

[Aliiev]: Everyone has a longing, some more so than others. I am no exception. This is perfectly natural, but of course, the idea of creating a new Union is nonsense.

You ask what the republic acquired. The answer is simple: independence. Independence is the wish of every people. In the past we spoke of the collapse of the colonial system and said that the countries of Asia and Africa were finding independence. Some people still believe that the Union republics were colonies of Russia. I reject that. It is not true that socialism brought the peoples only misfortune. The economic, scientific, and intellectual potential that Azerbaijan has was created while it was in the Union.

But the movement for states' independence has now been under way in the world for many years. Why should those republics that united in the USSR in 1922 and later not be given the opportunity to set up on their own? Independence had a very high price, but still we achieved it....

[RG]: But there do not yet seem to have been any decisive steps in this direction.

[Aliiev]: I was transferred to Moscow in December 1982, and I returned in June 1993, eleven years later.

During this period the republic's leadership was replaced several times. Therefore there are objective reasons for the slowing of the reforms in Azerbaijan. Our next steps will be privatization and the creation of conditions for private enterprise. We are greatly encouraging foreign investments. This is our path.

[RG]: How are Azerbaijan's relations with Russia shaping up?

[Aliiev]: This is a very important question, and there are complexities here too. Aggression was committed against Azerbaijan in January 1990. It was committed not by Russia but by the communist leadership of the Soviet Union. I was living in Moscow at the time, and I was in isolation. But I knew perfectly well how many military units of the Soviet army were stationed in Azerbaijan. There were more than enough of them, and there was no need to send in additional forces in order, as Gorbachev said, to instill order.

A huge trauma was inflicted on the people. The people who did not want normal relations between Azerbaijan and Russia and who are now in opposition kept saying the same thing: the Russian army, the Russian army. But there was not a Russian army then, there was the Soviet army, and in it were serving Russians, Ukrainians, Azeris, Uzbeks, Kazakhs.... Nevertheless, anti-Russian sentiments were kindled. The People's Front, which came to power in March 1992, took an unequivocal stand: Russia is virtually the enemy. Understandably, relations between Russia and Azerbaijan proved cold. Azerbaijan was not a member of the CIS at the time.

I hope that the Russians know that I made a great effort to change public opinion here. For several months, both in parliament and in labor collectives, I spoke of the need for Azerbaijan to be incorporated in the CIS. This finally happened last September. My first official trip as chairman of the Supreme Soviet [Verkhovnyy Sovet], endowed with presidential powers, was precisely to Moscow. I sensed a reciprocal response from Boris Yeltsin and Viktor Chernomyrdin. Relations between Azerbaijan and Russia now are friendly.

Azerbaijan was part of Russia and the Soviet Union for almost two hundred years. Our ties are of long standing and should not be broken off-this is inadmissible. On the contrary, they must be developed. The absolute majority of our major enterprises are integrated in the Russian economy. The same thing in education, science, technology, and culture. As president of Azerbaijan, I am doing and will do everything to strengthen our ties. But there are forces trying to portray our policy in a different light. Certain Moscow newspapers carry articles that are essentially provocative.

[RG]: The state language in your republic is Azeri. At the same time Russian is used not only by representatives of non-indigenous nationalities, but the stratum, so to speak, of Russian-speaking Azeris is huge. People say that if they need to express a simple thought, they express themselves in Azeri, while knowledge [of that tongue] no longer suffices for expressing a complex thought-then they “engage” Russian. Not to mention the fact that the best-known Azeri writers write in Russian.... Is there not a problem here, in your view?

[Aliiev]: Not at all. You know, a national language is an attribute of statehood. Naturally, our state language is Azeri. This is the full extent of its “privilege.” It was the People’s Front that shut the mouth of anyone who spoke Russian, even though these very people expressed themselves badly in Azeri.

There was, of course, a complex situation, but I believe that I defused it. It is absurd to think that, by making everyone speak one language, you re-establish this language. Everyone is free to express himself however he deems it necessary. Before [parliamentary] sessions people used to ask me which language they should speak, but now they no longer ask they themselves choose. Those writers who are accustomed to writing in Russian-let them do so. There are more and more Russian-language programs on our television. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Ministry of Defense present all papers in Russian. When a foreign delegation comes to me, I speak the language that their interpreter is able to translate.

I am convinced that the Azeri people cannot be isolated from the Russian language. Our republic's multinational composition goes hand and hand with the Azerbaijani state's independence. Armenia sought a monoethnic state-and it secured it. Now no one, apart from the Armenians themselves, lives there. I do not consider this an indication of civilized behavior.

[RG]: You now represent independent Azerbaijan throughout the world. At the same time you are quite a rare type of leader, who returned to lead the republic a considerable time later. There is, of course, such a thing as diplomatic etiquette. Nevertheless, how, in your opinion, do your partners in talks see you? As a Politburo member who has "changed color"?

[Aliiev]: It is hard to say for sure. In those who judge a person mechanically on the basis of his biography and prepared information you sense wariness. But after personal contact has been established and after familiarizing yourself with my practical activity, I believe that you should not be left with any sense of my having “changed color.” I left the Communist Party with the same conviction as I served it. I left it, by the way, while the party was still in power.

When I tendered my resignation from the CPSU in Moscow, it organized a commission to check on all my past activity. Foreign correspondents started telephoning: “How do you react to this?” I replied that all this was ridiculous. In the Communist Party the supreme punishment is expulsion from the party. I expelled myself. I do not know what more could have been done to me.

4.60 Shevardnadze to Back Elchibey's Caucasus Idea

Interfax, 22 June 1992 [FBIS Translation]

The chairman of the Georgian State Council, Eduard Shevardnadze, supported Azerbaijani president Abulfaz Elchibey's idea to turn the region into a single Caucasian home.

Georgia will spare no effort to attain this goal, says Shevardnadze's telegram to Elchibey following the latter's election as president of Azerbaijan.

"It's too good to be true," said a Russian expert in this region commenting on this idea. There are many obstacles blocking the advancement to its implementation, he said, including the continuing bloodshed in Nagorno-Karabakh and South Ossetia, the crisis in relations between Armenia and Azerbaijan, and confrontation between Moscow and Tbilisi.

4.61 Shevardnadze Interviewed on Russian Leadership

Interview by Leon Onikova

Izvestiya, 22 June 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Onikova]: How do you view the consequences of R. Khasbulatov's statement on the situation in Georgia and the situation as a whole in the Transcaucasus and North Caucasus?

[Shevardnadze]: The consequences did not take long to make themselves felt. The statement has sharply exacerbated the situation.

I have already made a statement on the Russian Air Force's helicopter attack on guards' positions and Georgian villages in the Tskhinvali area on 18 June this year. It was an act of aggression that introduced an entirely different dimension to the conflict. The denials by Russian officials are groundless. The claim that it was a warning strike is in effect an admission that it was an unprovoked attack.

Rather less groundless was the threat made to Georgia by the Russian vice president in a recent phone call to me: "I will send planes up...." The reflexes of the Afghan bombardier prevailed over state wisdom.

In the light of recent events, Khasbulatov's statement constitutes the political and ideological preparatory fire for the infringement of our republic's territorial integrity and sovereignty.

That is precisely how all political parties, the public, and the State Council have described it.

For all my personal devotion to political dialogue and my incessant practical efforts to resolve the conflict by peaceful means, I too cannot describe these threats in any other way.

The 15 June statement sharply reduces the room for our peacemaking efforts and cuts the ground from under the Kazbegi agreements, while excessively expanding the bounds of distrust, aggressiveness, and extremism. Forces that are by no means advocating a political solution to the problem have become more active.

Our task has now become far more complicated. Khasbulatov's statement is of no use to anyone, except perhaps to extremists on both sides. There are leaders in the region who are prepared to give access to the conflict zone to forces operating from an anti-Russian standpoint. If this happens-and things are heading in that direction-then the entire North Caucasus would go up in flames. Together with the conflict already raging in the Transcaucasus, this would create problems for Russia that would make all the current sources of domestic tension fade into insignificance.

The statement, which admits in principle a unilateral revision of borders-in violation of norms of international law that have been ratified by Russia, and of principles accepted by the world community-is helping to revive territorial disputes, which could lead to a wholesale escalation of uncontrollable military actions. All this will have the most negative consequences for the Caucasus, the Transcaucasus, and Russia.

The main thing now-not only for Georgia but for Russia, too-is to take concrete action to restrict and localize the scope of damage done to Georgia and Russia, and then to eliminate it.

[Onikova]: Might Khasbulatov's statement negate B. Yeltsin's statements about the need to accelerate the preparation of a fundamental treaty on the principles of mutual relations between the Russian Federation and Georgia?

[Shevardnadze]: I do not think so. And this is not just a matter of President Yeltsin's incomparably greater influence on the shaping of the Russian state's domestic and foreign policy. Of no less importance is the objective and, one might say, historical need for such a treaty, which the Russian president well understands. I was able to see that for myself during our recent telephone conversation....

[Onikova]: What measures, in your opinion, could help to defuse the new crisis, if only partially?

[Shevardnadze]: You are right, the situation that has arisen over the past few weeks can be described as a new crisis. It is very important to trace its chronology-it explains a lot. I was in Tskhinvali 13 May and reached agreement on a cease-fire. A few hours later there was a rocket attack on the region where I and my colleagues were. I described it as an attack on our policy of finding a peaceful settlement to the conflict. A more destructive attack followed on 20 May. A group of Ossetian refugees were shot near Kekhvi village. The next day the economic blockade of Georgia began, and the conflict began to spiral even more tightly. On 10 June in the settlement of Kazbegi the leaders of Georgia and North Ossetia signed a protocol on joint action to settle the conflict and immediately embarked on its implementation. On 13 June there was an act of terrorism in Tbilisi and a clash in Gori between guards and servicemen from a tank regiment. Once again people were killed. There was yet another act of terrorism in Tbilisi on 17 June. Destructive forces inside and outside Georgia were clearly becoming more active. It was against this backdrop that Khasbulatov's statement was made. The Tskhinali region is witnessing an escalation of hostilities in which Russian army subunits are participating directly.

This gives some people the excuse to claim that we are not in control of the situation. I will not refer you to the numerous examples of uncontrolled situations within Russia and the CIS. I will not cite the sad experience of certain European countries where, despite all the efforts of their leaders and the world community, conflicts are not abating but merely flaring up with renewed force. Something else is more important to me-namely, explaining why, contrary to all our efforts, attacks are continuing and people are being killed. And nobody should try to prove that people are only suffering and being killed "on the other side."

The losses suffered by the Ossetians have been widely publicized. The information war has been just as immoral as the destruction of lives by force of arms. By emphasizing the ethnic origins of the dead, the writers of such reports are carrying out a second murder—murdering basic morality, human dignity, and justice. As if the dead Ossetians were not our citizens and fellow countrymen, as if their blood was, for us, merely water. It makes me sick. I would note, incidentally, that tens of thousands of Ossetians continue to live peacefully in Georgia—in the Kakhétinskiy region, Kazbegskiy and other rayons, and in Tbilisi—without being subjected to any reprisals. And, with us, they weep for the dead—be they Ossetians or Georgians.

It is amazing but true that propaganda is calling for blood. I prefer the voice of reason. If only to demonstrate how disastrous this senseless war is for both sides, I would mention that since the conflict began more than three hundred Georgians have been killed, around four thousand homes have been burned down, and fifteen thousand inhabitants of Georgian villages have been turned into refugees. Armenians, Russians, Jews, and people of other nationalities have also fallen victim to the conflict.

If I were to make anyone accountable, it would be the politicians who unleashed the conflict. And even if somebody tried to paint me and those who are of the same mind as I am as Ossetian-haters, then, without arguing with them, we would say that we want to save our people from senseless loss of life and suffering. Until the conflict is over, both Georgians and Ossetians will be killed. And an escalation of the conflict could spell doom for Georgia. Nobody but an imbecile could suspect me of wanting that.

The simplistic “black and white” view of the conflict and the popular political cliches are distorting the real picture and leading to irreparable mistakes.

A simple but substantive fact is being lost sight of. For two years people have been living on both sides in an atmosphere of mutual hatred fanned by the deaths of their relatives, the loss of their homes and property, and the impact of propaganda and news attacks. And on both sides of the line people can see no way out other than to destroy the “enemy.”

This extremism-I am thinking not of political sentiments but of the state of mind and the consequences of living under extreme conditions-encompasses the fighters too. They are living in the half-burned homes of those they are protecting, eating their bread and seeing their suffering. And it only requires a rumble of gunfire from the “other side” for them to start firing off volleys in retaliation.

Take a look out the window-the State Council building is surrounded by Georgian refugees. They are demanding revenge. The politicians are under constant irrational pressure. The armed formations in the conflict zone are in the same position, only under far worse conditions.

How can we control the situation? We need to do painstaking, delicate, and continuous long-term work. At the political level we need the four-party constructive dialogue that we have already agreed with B.N. Yeltsin. And this should be supplemented by a “lower-level” dialogue between representatives of the sides, be they the commanders of opposed armed groups or just ordinary citizens. We agreed in Kazbegi that the creative intelligentsia, women's and youth organizations, well-known athletes, and journalists from Georgia and North Ossetia would be involved in this work. For a political solution to the problem we need to improve the psychological climate, and we have started moving in this direction.

A four-party observation center has started work in Tskhinvali. We have delegated our own representatives to a joint press center. The other day I talked in Tbilisi with the leaders of the Union of Afghan Servicemen about the formation of an international peacemaking subunit that would keep the sides apart and help bring about a cease-fire....

Nobody has the right to accuse us of twiddling our thumbs. But then Khasbulatov's statement appeared, and everything has virtually come to a halt. I have heard claims from Moscow that "noisy propaganda steps regarding the Georgian side's allegedly persistent desire to solve the problem by peaceful means are being taken" in order to cover up the “strategic line of forcing the South Ossetians out.”

This is neither serious nor responsible.

[Onikova]: Given recent events, what ways do you see to settle the situation?

[Shevardnadze]: We have no choice but to seek a path to peace. I have already talked about certain measures we have proposed. We will seek others too, striving for dialogue and conducting it in a spirit of pragmatic compromise. I can clearly foresee two points. The first will be the impossibility of solving all the problems quickly. The second will be the impermissibility of delaying the resolution of the most critical and acute issues. I would include in this category a complete cease-fire, the creation of the most favorable psychological climate for beginning talks, and the return of all refugees-irrespective of their nationality-to their places of permanent residence. This is the first stage, which would allow us to break down the wall of distrust and enmity erected by the conflict. Once that has been removed, there would be scope for action by all our peoples’ healthy forces, who have built up many centuries of experience of living together in friendship. By granting these forces a most-favored status, we would reach our goal relatively quickly. If, of course, we are not hampered by people whose aim is to destroy-whatever posts or jobs they may hold.

4.62 Shevardnadze Interviewed on Conflict, CIS

Moscow Programma Radio Odin Network
21 June 1992 [FBIS Translation]

In an interview to the Turin newspaper La Stampa, Georgian State Council Chairman Eduard Shevardnadze expressed the conviction that agreement may be reached on the situation in South Ossetia in a relatively short time if the Russian leadership adopts a correct position and does not support the provocateurs and if President Yeltsin takes part in the talks.

He noted also that Georgia does not intend to join the CIS in the near future but it will strive to strengthen its relations with all member countries of the Commonwealth.

Eduard Shevardnadze reported that a draft treaty between Georgia and Russia is being elaborated now which will establish the legal basis of the stay of Russian troops on Georgian territory.

In reply to a correspondent's question on the fate of perestroika, the former minister of foreign affairs of the former USSR, one of the main architects of perestroika, pointed out that the very fact of the creation of fifteen independent states on the expanse of the Soviet empire has guaranteed perestroika a place in history.

4.63 Abkhazia, South Ossetia Appeal to Yeltsin to Delay Treaty

Vadim Byrkin

ITAR-TASS, 29 May 1993 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpts

The leaders of the Abkhazian and South Ossetian parliaments, Vladislav Ardzinba and Torez Kulumbekov, have appealed to Russian president Boris Yeltsin on Saturday [29 May] to delay signing a treaty on friendship and cooperation with Georgia until a comprehensive settlement of the conflict in Abkhazia and South Ossetia is achieved.

A joint statement to this effect says that “Abkhazia and South Ossetia can no longer remain a part of Georgia, which is unable to act as a guarantor of rights of the people of our republics.”

Ardzinba and Kulumbekov expressed concern about “the continuing supplies of weapons, ammunition and military hardware from Russia to Georgia.” “We are more concerned about Russo-Georgian talks, at which the Georgian leadership is attempting to decide the fates of Abkhazia and South Ossetia behind our back,” the statement said.

4.64 Shevardnadze Discusses Abkhazia and Joining the CIS

Interview by Daniel Lecomte

ARTE Television Network (Strasbourg) 8 October 1993
[FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Mr. Shevardnadze, you met Boris Yeltsin this morning, and following this meeting, Georgia decided to join the CIS, that is, this commonwealth of the states that made up the former Soviet Union. This, only a few days after you said, “After all that happened in Georgia and mostly after Russia’s betrayal, I think Georgia will not join the CIS.” Why did you change your mind?

[Shevardnadze]: This is linked to changes within the Russian government. Also, the situation in Georgia compelled me to take this step. Recent difficulties between Russia and Georgia, which became extremely serious with the conflict between Georgia and Abkhazia, were mainly due to these reactionary forces and to their policies. These forces are now isolated in Russia. So, I hope that our decision will help in establishing very friendly relations.

[Lecomte]: We will return to Georgia later, but if I understood your answer properly, last weekend's events [in Moscow] were instrumental in your reversal. [Passage omitted.] Mentioning Georgia, you said recently that the West did not do enough. Do you feel this was true also for Russia? Do you feel that the West is partly to blame? What would need to be done today to reverse the course of events?

[Shevardnadze]: The West's support to Russia is important, but I believe that it is insufficient. In the past six or seven years, since the revolution in the Soviet Union and Russia started, great changes have taken place on our planet, and I would say that this was the greatest revolution this century. International public opinion did not draw conclusions. At the end of the World War II, the United Nations was setup. Current developments are much more radical, and I think that we need something global now. This explains my dissatisfaction.

[Lecomte]: More importantly, you expect Western aid, I assume?

[Shevardnadze]: Aid too, naturally, since the West saved a great deal financially; it saved billions. There is no more confrontation between East and West. There are military, financial, economic, and moral savings. In fact, we, the states on the path to democracy, expect more ....

[Lecomte]: Russian troops in the region supported the Abkhazians. Why do you think they supported them, when, in a way, for the Russians this is playing with fire? Why did the Russians and Mr. Yeltsin decide on this support?

[Shevardnadze]: I should differentiate between two sides in Russia. On the one hand is the side headed by Yeltsin, and on the other-I would even use rather crude words there are the bastards, who did everything they could to raise Abkhaz separatism to the level of fascism. They were the ones who provided the financing, they were the ones who supplied all the modern armament. All the ammunition was supplied by them. Training was carried out with their help, and they even took direct part in the fighting. That is what I would call the policy of reactionary Russia.

I am sure that when the investigation into the putschists has been completed, everything will be clear about how the Abkhaz card was played and how the Georgian cards in general were played. We have been the victims of these games, of this confrontation in Russia. Unfortunately, I could not do anything to prevent this. They were huge forces, which Georgia had no chance of countering. That is why Sukhumi and Abkhazia have been lost and why there is a danger of civil war in Georgia. But I am really counting on the post-revolutionary period in Russia.

[Lecomte]: People have said for the Russians it had to do with access to warm waters, access to the Black Sea, so it was more a reflex from a has-been empire, an imperial reflex, rather than a democratic reflex.

[Shevardnadze]: When I stress the word democratic, I am saying that a democratic state never tries to obtain its aims [as heard]. The events in Abkhazia and Georgia are typical examples of what a totalitarian regime and supporters of totalitarian regimes can do. [Passage omitted: discussion of his role in Sukhumi.]

[Lecomte]: Mr. Shevardnadze, I would like to ask you a question that might seem trivial but is important for us: Who called whom? Did you call Mr. Yeltsin to ask to come to Moscow or did Mr. Yeltsin ask you to come to meet him?

[Shevardnadze]: The initiative was mine, but I also knew that it was also Yeltsin's wish and that he was ready for this meeting. I think that following these events in Moscow, Mr. Yeltsin once more realized that a united and undivided Georgia was more in Russia's interests. [Background video report on current nationalist unrest in the CIS.]

[Lecomte]: I recall that you met Boris Yeltsin this morning and the decision for Georgia to join the CIS was made. First, do you consider this a way to prevent the internal split in Georgia and what specifically did Boris Yeltsin have to offer?

[Shevardnadze]: I would like to say that the decision to join the CIS was not the decision of the parliament-I made this decision. There are certainly difficult times in history when one person has to take all the responsibility; today, I took this responsibility. Parliament might disagree. I must say that it will not be without reason, but I saw in this decision the last chance to rescue my people and my country while preventing its disintegration, preventing civil war, and enabling justice to emerge again in Abkhazia.

[Lecomte]: Thank you for having taken part in this program and for having given us your time to describe the situation in your republic. [Passage omitted.]

4.65 Georgia "Balkanization" Has Perils for Russia

Petr Karapetyan

Krasnaya Zvezda, 22 October 1993 [FBIS Translation],

Excerpts

Georgia is taking urgent steps to join the CIS. Some 121 parliamentary deputies (the minimum being 110)
have already signed a statement in support of Eduard Shevardnadze's proposal on joining the commonwealth. The next stage, apparently, will be the convening of the parliament, at which the decision to join the CIS will be ratified.

This is the second attempt by Georgia's leaders in its recent history to join the CIS. The "pioneer," if you recall, was none other than Zviad Gamsakhurdia. In December 1991, as soon as the artillery of the opposition rebelling against him opened up, he sent telegram after telegram to Moscow requesting Georgia's immediate, instant admission to the CIS. The plan was simple: Having neither the forces nor the capability to crush the opposition, Gamsakhurdia hoped to do this by bringing Georgia into the CIS collective security system. He did not get anywhere at the time.

Nearly two years of history have been repeated. Dismissing the very idea of the CIS following the overthrow of Gamsakhurdia, the new Georgian leaders did all they could to emphasize their independence from Russia and the other CIS countries, while not forgetting to make a big show of their inclination toward the West. Look how much mud was flung at Russia during the Abkhaz war! What humiliation and outrages Russian servicemen and members of their families suffered and indeed continue to suffer in Georgia! One terrible figure: In the past two years, seventy Russian servicemen-think on it, reader-have been killed in Georgia! Only once has the Georgian government deigned to offer condolences to the family of the dead.

And Russia, vilified and slandered, unlike Georgia's beloved West, which fobbed Georgia off with supplies of humanitarian aid and ten UN observers when asked to intervene in the Abkhaz conflict, took on the entire burden of peacemaking in the region.

Tbilisi ran to Russia (for the umpteenth time) when Georgia was at its wit's end. It must be remembered that Eduard Shevardnadze started talking about the CIS when the fate of Sukhumi was practically sealed. Consider the fact that after the fall of Sukhumi Eduard Shevardnadze immediately changed his position and said that there could be no question of joining the CIS. After all this "toing and froing" how can one explain his current burning desire to see Georgia in the CIS, and how come the parliamentarians, immovable until the subject of the CIS was broached, have become so compliant?

The explanation is simple: Tbilisi officials are also in danger because Zviad Gamsakhurdia has snapped up the whole of Western Georgia. Abkhazia is hard at work building fortifications on the borders with Georgia. South Ossetia is making a big show of independence from Tbilisi, and even Ajaria occasionally mentions autonomous status, albeit far more tactfully and diplomatically.... Georgia faces the danger of "Balkanization." Things are bad-so the Georgian leaders are prepared to vote for the CIS with both hands.

Are the commonwealth countries supposed to play the part of the collective boy who Georgia has decided will pull the chestnuts out of the fire?

Certainly Russia cannot stand aloof from what is going on in Georgia. If the Balkans are the powder keg of Europe, then Georgia is the powder keg of the Caucasus, and, unfortunately, in Russia's backyard in the south. Given this, political scientists believe, Moscow must first of all come to grips with what is happening in Georgia.

Russia's complex of strategic interests there, from geopolitical and economic to the problems of the Russianspeaking population and the grouping of forces, has taken shape over a long period of time. It is pretty clear that Russian policy in the region-not only in the foreseeable future, as far as that is possible at the moment, but in the very long term-should be shaped by concern for its own interests, rather than by the problems of the latest Georgian political leader, be it Gamsakhurdia, Shevardnadze, or someone else.

It is in this context, I believe, that the Russian foreign ministry decision to respond to Eduard Shevardnadze's request and send a troop contingent to Georgia to guard the Poti-Tbilisi railroad should be viewed. It is particularly emphasized that the contingent's mission is a peacemaking one and, naturally, it will not participate in combat actions on anyone's side. But one should not idealize the situation the Russian contingent could find itself in given that Georgia does not have a military cooperation treaty with Russia, is not a member of the CIS, and, therefore, as the Russian defense minister, Army General Pavel Grachev, said, "is not party to the adoption of joint measures on safeguarding security." On the Georgian front the situation changes at the blink of an eye, but the danger of Russians becoming involved in the conflict exists nonetheless. That is why when introducing the contingent into the conflict zone it is necessary to start devising a whole range of political, diplomatic, and, if need be, other measures to protect Russia's interests in the region.

In turn, Georgia, having invited Russia, as a foreign policy partner, to solve its internal problems, must guarantee observance of its interests.

4.66 Shevardnadze Discusses the CIS, Russia, and Other Issues

Interview by Nato Oniani

Tbilisi Radio Tbilisi Network, 27 December 1993

[FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Oniani]: We present our regular interview with the chairman of the parliament of the republic, Eduard Shevardnadze.

Batono [honorific title] Eduard, the Ashkhabad meeting of the heads of government of the CIS member states was last week's important event. When assessing the results of the meeting in a television interview, you said twice, convincingly: I believe the decision to join the CIS was correct and that its revision is not necessary.

[Shevardnadze]: Good morning. Thank you. I have already expressed my general observations on the Ashkhabad meeting. I shall confirm what I have said: that it was an important stage in the life of the CIS, which has existed only for two years, and from the point of view of unanimity and mutual understanding. Judging from the information I had, this meeting stood out from other meetings, although I was not present at other meetings, I can say so convincingly. Now about some of the conclusions after I got back. Does the CIS have a future? Does it have prospects? Is it viable? I shall touch on only some of the general principles.

In my opinion, the CIS will have a future and become a repository of trust and cooperation if Russia continues to follow the path of democracy and compromise. Even so, the center of the CIS, the key magnetic pole, and the initiator of the CIS is Russia, and the fate of the CIS's future will depend on Russia and the processes under way in Russia. If it does not happen this way, that is, if Russia does not follow the path of democracy, then, of course, the CIS will disintegrate.

I would also like to stress another point, that the CIS in itself becomes one of the factors behind the development of democracy in its member countries as well as in Russia. I have drawn such a conclusion from my own observations and the talks I have had. There are prospects that the CIS could become one of the factors and a major contributor to the development of democracy in these countries.

Third, the CIS will be viable if in practical terms it resists aggressive separatism and becomes in practical terms a solid guarantor of the territorial integrity of the CIS states.... Every CIS member desires that this organization become one of the guarantors of territorial integrity and for defeating aggressive separatism.

And one more thing. The CIS must become a necessary organization for everybody if it becomes the guarantor of the integration of its member-states' economy. None of the countries will be able to overcome the deep economic crisis without such integration; I am strongly convinced of this. They will not be able to create a market economy, or the principles of the economy. They will not be able to resolve social problems, and if they cannot resolve social problems then, naturally, social outbursts can always be expected that may become more dangerous than separatist movements if the countries fail to find a solution.

At the present level, social issues are the most palpable and the most acute. I think that within the limits of the CIS, it is quite possible to resolve many social issues on the basis of the development of the process of integration.

There are some other reasons [for joining the CIS], which is why I said that our decision to join the CIS was correct and does not need to be revised and does not require it. By the way, I quoted one of the factors: the document which I signed-that the CIS, and in particular collective securitythe principles of collective security and the agreement on collective security, the mechanisms of which we have enacted recently-says that the mechanism is one of the key guarantors of the territorial integrity and stability in these countries.

[Oniani]: You said that unless Russia pursues the path of democratic development, the Commonwealth will disintegrate. Will it disintegrate and the empire be restored? Is this what you mean?

[Shevardnadze]: No, the empire will not be restored. If the Commonwealth disintegrates, each country will go its own way. More emphasis will probably shift toward regional unions, for example, a union of Central Asia, of the Caucasus, or of some other region. And then, the Commonwealth, as we know it now, will disintegrate.

[Oniani]: Thank you. You met with President Yeltsin in Ashkhabad and I would like to quote an excerpt from your interview. You said there: As for Abkhazia, I think that now the Russian president fully understands how acute this problem is for us, the Caucasus and Russia.

A Russian foreign ministry delegation arrived in Tbilisi yesterday. Among other issues, you will probably also discuss with them the issue of Abkhazia. The recent elections in Russia produced both positive and negative results. By positive results I mean that the Ardzinba-Gamsakhurdia-Zhirinovskiy clan has been exposed and both Russia and the world saw the real threat of fascism. And by negative results I mean the heavy vote for Zhirinovskiy. What are the chances for solving the problem of Abkhazia? And also, does the strengthening of relations between Georgia and Russia coincide with Georgia's entry into the CIS?

[Shevardnadze]: I have already spoken about my impressions of my meeting with Yeltsin. A delegation arrived here yesterday. It includes reputable diplomats, as well as the military. My colleagues and I had our first meeting with them yesterday. Of course, we have two problems that are central to relations between Russia and Georgia. These are Abkhazia and Samachablo, [or] the Tskhinvali zone and South Ossetia [word indistinct]. This is not only our problem-but my impression is that this is also, in a certain sense and to some extent, Russia's problem. Therefore, Abkhazia and Samachablo are a touchstone that will test the firmness of our ties.

I do not mean that the issue of Abkhazia should be solved by taking only Georgian interests into account. Both issues, Abkhazia and Samachablo, should be solved by taking into account the interests of all citizens, including, of course, the interests of the Abkhazians. Despite the disaster that unfolded there and the fact that almost all the Georgian population was displaced, I nevertheless believe that there are now better prospects for a settlement than at any other time. This is because, based on my observation, Russia now better understands the danger for Georgia, the Transcaucasus, and the Caucasus region in general, including Russia, of leaving this conflict unresolved.

4.67 Further on Shevardnadze and the CIS

Tbilisi Radio Tbilisi Network, 1 March 1994 [FBIS Translation]

According to a report from the chief of staff to the head of state, information from Head of State Eduard Shevardnadze concerning Georgia's joining the CIS was circulated today among the deputies of the Georgian parliament. The information says: The Georgian parliament must make a significant decision today on whether or not Georgia should join the CIS. The significance of this step is indicated by the choice that our state is faced with today. Today each one of us must decide, as our conscience and intelligence prompt us, whether to follow the path of emotions, illusions, and-proceeding from this-dashed hopes, or to take a hard look at reality and adopt a pragmatic attitude to our everyday issues.

The break-up of the Soviet empire, on the one hand, created fifteen independent states, but, on the other hand, it created a new danger both for the development and existence of these countries and for the whole world. If events developed further according to this scenario, they would end with a complete catastrophe. This is what stimulated the search for ways out of the grave situation, and in my mind, the creation of the CIS was the result of this search.

In the beginning the CIS was not a structure that could effectively resolve the issues of Georgia and other countries, but, in the meantime, in the process of its self-determination, a whole range of significant issues were being worked out and mechanisms for comprehensive cooperation established. Georgia did participate in the work of different organizations of the CIS, but this was chiefly as an observer, which limited our influence on the process of adopting a decision, and our national interests were not fully observed.

During this period, Georgia tried to regulate relations with other former Soviet republics. A fairly strong legislative basis for bilateral political and economic relations was being dynamically created. However, in the new circumstances and against the background of the processes of regional integration, this did not prove to be enough. The development of the processes within the CIS has once again proved the truth that securing political, military, and economic interests can be carried out effectively only if a bilateral cooperation is replaced by the mechanisms of comprehensive cooperation.

The CIS may not represent a definite guarantee for security, but it is one of the factors for legally securing our territorial integrity and the inviolability of our borders.

The regulations of the CIS also envisage the creation of mechanisms for the member-states' collective security, eradicating conflicts, and peacefully resolving disputes.

The realization of the CIS regulations will help restore broken economic links and develop them on a completely new basis, which is a necessary prerequisite for the reforms for transition to a market economy.

Thus, becoming a member of the CIS will help our country to establish its place in the network of international and regional relations, to become a part of the mechanisms of comprehensive cooperation, and to use agreements on collective security and economic cooperation for reinforcing with laws the country's territorial integrity, influencing the development of regional processes, and creating prerequisites for overcoming the economic crisis.

By becoming a CIS member, our country is proving its aspiration for civilized development of international relations and is obtaining additional means for improving the country's social and economic situation; it is becoming a fully fledged member of the CIS with all relevant rights and, of course, responsibilities.

The CIS is in its initial stage of formation. The process of its formation is developing in quite a conflicting manner. Issues are seldom resolved without hot debates. Discussions are often uncompromising and severe.

Will the West react negatively to Georgia's joining the CIS? There are different points of view in Georgia's political circles on this issue. I have the following point of view: Many intergovernmental structures have been created since World War II. Most of them proved viable, and many countries poorer than Georgia have found their way out from crisis and poverty. The CIS must share this experience; there will then be less ground for doubts, and we can show everybody what we can do.

The fact that we have already signed comprehensive agreements on friendship, cooperation, good-neighborliness, and mutual assistance with most of the CIS states gives us the hope that on the basis of work with natural allies we will be able to set up the CIS as a civilized and integrated union, and Georgia can make its honorable contribution in this respect.

I am sure that our active participation in the CIS will assist in overcoming the current crisis, promoting stabilization, and halting the decline in the population's standard of living.

4.68 Shevardnadze Comments on the CIS Summit in Moscow

Interfax, 23 October 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

Georgian leader Eduard Shevardnadze said he considered the CIS summit in Moscow on 21 October “an event marking the beginning of an active process of interaction between the independent states.”

He said on national television on Saturday that he believed that the crisis that had hit all former Soviet republics could be overcome only through economic integration. Shevardnadze said none of the ex-Soviet republics could gain access to the world market on its own, but they could do so by joint efforts.

Shevardnadze said the time had not yet come to carry out the initiative of Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev concerning establishment of the Euro-Asian union. However, Shevardnadze said that such a union could be created in the future and that such countries as Mongolia and unified Korea could join it.

Shevardnadze said that during his meetings with Russian President Boris Yeltsin, Premier Viktor Chernomyrdin, and Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev, the issues of bilateral economic cooperation, establishment of the Georgian army, and settlement of the conflicts in Abkhazia and South Ossetia had been discussed.

4.69 Georgian Leaders Appraise Almaty Summit Results

Interviews

Trud, 17 February 1995 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Report of interviews with Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze; Georgian Foreign Minister Aleksandr Chikvaidze; Maj.-Gen. Valeriy Chkheidze, commander of the Georgian Border Forces; and Georgian Prime Minister Otar Patsatsia]

[Shevardnadze]: Let me begin by saying that, during our meetings with President Yeltsin, Premier Chernomyrdin, Foreign Minister A. Kozyrev, and Defense Minister Grachev, we concluded that the final stage in the settlement of the Georgian-Abkhazian and Georgian-Ossetian conflicts has arrived. Georgia's position on aggressive separatism as voiced in the special addendum to the text of the Memorandum on the Maintenance of Peace and Stability in the CIS, which was signed in Almaty, seems thoroughly justified and fair to me particularly in the context of events in Chechnya. Abkhazia and Chechnya are links in the same chain, and understanding has matured among the CIS heads of state of the danger harbored by aggressive separatism. Our objective assessment of events in Abkhazia and Chechnya elicited the correct response from the Russian leadership. The meeting in Almaty persuaded us that the speediest conclusion of the conflict in Georgia is in the interest of all CIS countries. That manifested itself in unanimous support for Georgia's position on aggressive separatism....

[Chikvaidze]: The Georgian delegation's wording went like this: The states must not support separatist movements in other member states if they arise, must not establish political, economic, and other ties with them, must prevent their use of CIS territories and lines of communications, and must not provide economic, financial, and other aid. This wording was not adopted straightaway-there were votes in favor of a milder version-but we succeeded in getting our way.

The question was unique: why aggressive separatism precisely and not any other kind? This is not merely a theoretical dispute, the problem is more serious. After all aggressive separatism is linked with military force and that is where it differs from Quebec, for instance, where there is also talk of secession but no bloodshed.

[Trud]: What methods will be used henceforth to combat aggressive separatism?

[Chikvaidze]: The states pledged not to create a breeding ground for the development of this phenomenon on their territories. Political, economic, and, if necessary, military barriers will be erected in its way. All member countries were unanimous in their agreement. [Chikvaidze ends.]

At our request Maj.-Gen. Valeriy Chkheidze, commander of the Georgian Border Forces, summed up the results of the work done in Almaty:

[Chkheidze]: We discussed the question of the concept for the protection of the CIS state borders. It is gratifying for us that the process of Commonwealth integration is deepening and the quest for a common denominator is successfully under way. That is the main point. However it is necessary to take into consideration the legislation of all member countries in our work so as to secure the sought-after unified legislation without detriment to the republics' sovereignty....

The States of the Western Region

In the Western Region, Russia has both its strongest ally, Belarus, and its strongest challenger, Ukraine. As these documents illustrate, Belarus's two presidents since the formation of the CIS have held opposing views on CIS integration. Stanislav Shushkevich, several of whose 1992- 93 speeches appear here, tried to maneuver an independent course for Belarus within the CIS in an attempt to establish more of a national identity, which Belarus has lacked since tsarist times. Nevertheless, like Azerbaijan's Elchibey, he was politically isolated by his prime minister, Vyacheslav Kebich, who leaned toward close integration with Moscow. In 1993, the Belarusians elected Aleksandr Lukashenko, who immediately redirected the country toward full monetary, economic, and military integration with Russia, forming the cornerstone of a new Slavic Union. The Belarus documents contained here have been selected to illustrate the dichotomy between Shushkevich's and Lukashenko's approaches to Russia and the CIS, as well as the extent to which Belarus had forfeited its sovereignty to Russia by July 1995. In his television address on 15 February 1995 (which is contained here), Lukashenko admitted that he had never supported the breakup of the Soviet Union and alleged that Yeltsin had not wanted the Union to dissolve either. In May 1995, Lukashenko signed a bilateral treaty with Russia creating the "Minsk/Moscow Axis" (see Chapter 6).

The third country included in the Western Region is Moldova, whose relations with Russia have been formed primarily by the often violent struggle on its territory over the Trans-Dniester region. The Moldovan documents depict President Mircea Snegur's view that Russia's 14th Army, which has occupied the Trans-Dniester region since Gorbachev's rule, constitutes interference in the country's internal affairs. Press articles confirming Russia's October 1994 agreement to withdraw the 14th Army from Moldova within a period of three years are contained here, along with articles alluding to troubles that have arisen more recently in connection with the withdrawal process. These documents reveal the lack of trust between Russia and Moldova, which is not likely to improve if Russia's generals continue to regard the Trans-Dniester region as vital to Russia's national interests. Another key issue between Moldova and Russia has been the movement to reunite Moldova with Romania.

One article included in this chapter records the signing of a Moldovan-Romanian cooperation agreement. This issue is likely to be a continuous source of antagonism between the two countries. Nevertheless, beset by war and economic disruption, President Snegur changed his decision to remain an observer in the CIS and joined the organization and its Economic Union in September 1993. The documents selected for Moldova also record certain key events in relations between Moldova and Ukraine, a country that is particularly important to Moldova and at one time incorporated part of Moldova. Ukraine announced in 1993 that it would participate in regulating the Trans-Dniestrian conflict. Several articles recording key developments between Russia and Moldova in the issue are contained here. Lastly, to document Moldova's strong orientation toward the West, a press article from 10 July 1995 announcing that Moldova would become the first CIS state to become a full member of the European Council, even before Russia, has been included.

4.70 Shushkevich Reflects on the CIS's Past and Future

Interview by Evgeniy Gorelik and Aleksandr Kryzhanovskiy

Sovetskaya Belorussiya, 29 December 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

“Thirty-Six Hours That Shook the World” was the title of the first interview-published a year ago-that Stanislav Shushkevich gave after Viskuli. Since then there have been many events in the life of the commonwealth, and many interviews. The first one remained the most memorable, though. Now once again, reflecting on the past and contemplating the future, the chairman of the republic's Supreme Soviet speaks to the journalists who met him a year ago right at the steps of the aircraft that came straight from Belovezha.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: Stanislav Stanislavovich, tell us-there, in Viskuli, was your offspring the way you had envisioned, as it now faces the public upon reaching the age of one?

[Shushkevich]: I am not an astrologer or a clairvoyant, but I must say that quite a lot of what had been envisioned is being implemented. However, it is indeed becoming increasingly fashionable to push the negative processes within the CIS to the forefront. We hear from left and right the moans about the worsening state of affairs in the economy, about the complexities in the relationships among the CIS member countries. No matter how much the CIS is criticized, however, no matter how much is said about the negative consequence of its creation, I am convinced that its significance undoubtedly is positive. This is manifest first and foremost in that we have been able, in my opinion, to forestall many negative processes associated with the crushing disintegration of the former Union republics.

I would like to note two factors, the first on a political or perhaps even moral, plane. I do not know of a single person in the republic today who would be afraid to express his political views. Our society has become more democratic; it is easier to breathe in it now, although so far it is difficult to live. It may be happening slowly, tentatively, but the process of democratic transformation in all the Commonwealth countries is moving forward; the right of nations to self-determination, which was for many years an illusion, is taking real shape.

As regards the economy, alas, the expectations have not been met as yet; production is declining; inflation is stubbornly climbing up; the cost of living is increasing. But who can say that it would have been better without the Commonwealth? I am convinced that it would have been much worse, although sometimes it seems that it cannot be worse than it is. Many parliament members see the existence of the CIS as the sole cause of the failures; they accuse us of bringing about the disintegration of the Union, which-and they know it perfectly well-had practically ceased to exist by the time of the Viskuli summit. For some reason, they forget that they themselves gave the Commonwealth the green light when they unanimously supported the ratification of the Belovezha agreements.

Without question, there could be more positive achievements, but neither can we dismiss entirely the fact that there are two global process going on in parallel today: a complete reorganization of the economy and a new statehood coming into its own. Do I need to tell you how complex and difficult to manage these processes are? Still, by using the Commonwealth levers-weak as they are—we have been able to resolve many issues in a normal, civilized way. Take, for example, transportation, communication, common informational space, and other sectors, where mutually beneficial partnership is gradually being established, and where old threads of economic ties and true market relations are strengthened and new ones emerge.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: Many politicians, including members of former president M. Gorbachev's inner circle, accuse Yeltsin, Shushkevich, and Kravchuk of bringing about the disintegration of the mighty Union. Did not Mikhail Sergeevich himself, though, make the adoption of a new Union treaty impossible by his actions-or rather inaction? Or was what happened in Viskuli a historic inevitability?

[Shushkevich]: Let us look the truth in the face. By the time of our summit in Belovezha, the Union was practically doomed as a single state, despite M. Gorbachev's spasmodic attempts to catch a "second wind” in the Novo-Ogarevo process. I do not think there was a force anymore that could have stopped the fully wound-up flywheel of centrifugal forces.

It was no longer possible to preserve the old “brotherly” family of nations. There was, however, still an opportunity to “divorce” without all-out “court battles,” to reach an amicable agreement with respect to the division of both the acquired household possessions and common debts. Unfortunately, the creation of the CIS still did not stem the disintegration processes in the economy and did not save the sovereign states from the flames of local interethnic conflicts. Apparently, it was futile to hope that the extremely complex problems that have been accumulating over decades could be resolved during the first stage of the commonwealth’s existence. The time when the old building still could be restored and rebuilt was gone, and could not return. And although the main architect of perestroika kept assuring us that it is this fundamental restructuring that he had been implementing all this time, in fact, everything was inexorably deteriorating.

The scenario of the disintegration of the Soviet empire could have been completely different-much more tragic and bloody-had the leaders of the states that became the commonwealth members not sought a compromise at the negotiating table, had they chosen other methods of resolving numerous conflicts and claims.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: If you do not mind, let us go back to Viskuli for a few minutes. What was the atmosphere of the summit? The famous secrecy that surrounded it begat many rumors. Some say, for instance, that all delegations brought ready drafts of the agreement. Others say that only Burbulis had a clear idea of the future CIS.

Cutting off communications with the outside world was explained by some as the desire to concentrate on the main topic, the task at hand. There are some, though, who interpret it as fear of the reaction by Gorbachev, who could send paratroops in helicopters. What really happened?

[Shushkevich]: A communications blackout, a helicopter, and so on are a figment of someone's imagination. We did not even think about it. The only suspenseful part of the summit, in my opinion, was that up to the last moment we expected N. Nazarbaev to come. We stayed in continuous contact with his airplane; everything was ready-a landing strip and a way to get to Viskuli quickly. He landed in Moscow, however, and got stuck there. Nevertheless, we believed that Nursultan Abishevich would come no matter what, because in February a four-party agreement was reached among Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, and Kazakhstan. On the basis of this agreement, there was only one document prepared in advance—a draft of a communiqué. And for me, for instance, it came as a total surprise that L. Kravchuk suddenly expressed willingness to sign it on the spot, right there in Minsk. Moreover, not only did he not object to closer integration, he even said he intended to go beyond that. For that “beyond,” however, to tell you honestly, we did not have anything except some general materials. It was then that the work got under way, as they say, “playing it by ear.” I still cannot be absolutely certain whether the Russian side had any draft prepared at home. If so, they must be the greatest conspirators. Or whether it truly was a first-class professional team: All formulae developed quickly; as soon as one of us proffered an idea, it was immediately translated into precise, legally valid stipulations. The night from 7 to 8 December showed an immense capacity for work on the part of the people, who were united by the same desire and goals.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: It is no secret that the Belovezha agreements are now being carefully and exactingly scrutinized by legal experts. Some specialists find faulty wording in them....

[Shushkevich]: It is always hard to argue with authorities in their field, but I want to point out that not a single international association of lawyers, and not a single UN or CSCE organ, has questioned the legality of the Belovezha agreements. I agree that these documents are not a dogma; new documents should be developed based on them. And such work has been done. Its result is the preparation of the draft commonwealth charter, which will be presented for consideration at the upcoming meeting in Minsk.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: We heard that the Belarusian side is not ready to sign this document....

[Shushkevich]: You see, every leader-if he wants to remain such-must be certain that his actions will meet with understanding on the part of the parliament's majority. When we went to Viskuli a year ago, we believed intuitively, deep inside, that the deputies would approve our actions, although we did not have much hope that the documents would be ratified without reservations. Today the situation is different, and there is no certainty that the charter-in the form it has been initialed by our representatives-will then be approved by the parliament. Why? Preliminary consultations with top-level jurists have confirmed our concerns that this document conflicts with some stipulation of the constitutional law-the Declaration of the State Sovereignty of Belarus. Therefore, although I have a constitutional right to do so, I cannot sign it without the approval of the Supreme Soviet. I will gladly do it-if not today, then tomorrow-if the parliament authorizes me. (When this article was being prepared for publication, it was announced that the parliament has authorized S. Shushkevich to sign the document on the CIS charter.-Author.)

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: By the way, speaking of the burden of leadership, both our press and the foreign press often promote the idea that the CIS today is holding together only because of the personalities involved. To support this contention, they point to Azerbaijan, which after the resignation of A. Mutalibov-a strong CIS supporter-immediately said goodbye to the Commonwealth. What foundation-one more solid and lasting than the authority of the first person of the state-should the Commonwealth be built on so that its stability would not depend on political storms and cataclysms in any individual country?

[Shushkevich]: The example you quoted does not mean that this is an axiom. No leader today can act only upon his own discretion. As to the Commonwealth's foundation, it should be purely legal, and include both control and sanction mechanisms. It is already clear to everybody that the structures that by now have been created within the Commonwealth framework are inadequate for closer integration and effectiveness of joint actions.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: About 250 documents have been adopted under the CIS banner. Most of them, alas, do not work. Is the main problem only the lack of coordinating organs in the structure? Or is the cause deeper and more profound?

[Shushkevich]: Tell me, did all the stipulations in the Brezhnev Constitution work? And, mind you, that one operated within a rigid, centralized system. I think that our regrettable past continues to have its impact: We produce beautiful agreements and then try endlessly to improve them, instead of adopting smart, effective laws from the start. Unfortunately, most of us so far have limited political experience in running a state; that is why, perhaps, we have not been able to avoid some purely populist decisions within the CIS framework. Look how many initiatives individual state leaders come up with. One gets the impression that for them the most important point is to proclaim an initiative. Instead, we should be taking care to implement concrete problems that cannot wait or be waived aside: for instance, to create an interstate bank, adopt restrictions on printing money, stop the export of goods in exchange for devalued money, and finally get things in order with respect to mutual clearing between subjects of different states.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: Judging by what you said, you are not against the creation of quasi-national structures. Still, we would like to clarify the position of Belarus, which did not support in Bishkek the idea of creating a Coordinating Economic Council [CEC].

[Shushkevich]: There is no contradiction here. We support extensive coordination, first and foremost with respect to the economy. But the original draft on the CEC contained quite a few points borrowed from former Union structures, in particular, the Gosplan [State Planning Committee]. We could not support it in that form. I repeat, unless we coordinate our actions, especially on the world market, we will suffer tremendous losses, which is already happening, with the commonwealth countries elbowing each other in a rush to export as much as possible of raw materials and the few competitive products, thereby bringing down their already relatively low prices. Unless we coordinate our efforts, we will be continuously and shamelessly robbed, now and in the future.

Coordination, as you well know, is impossible without appropriate organs, however. In this respect we cannot count on bilateral agreements because there are problems that can be resolved only on the basis of agreements that will include all the former Union republics. If the CIS wants to survive, it will not be able to avoid unpopular steps.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: What do you mean?

[Shushkevich]: May I answer your question with a question: Do you put money aside to save for the future? Of course not, because today it would be simply stupid. Everybody wants to get rid of money as quickly as possible because the banknotes shrink right before our eyes. This means that we have to find a way to boost the value of money, especially considering that the ruble remains the going currency in most states. We simply cannot do without a coordinated tax policy and effective control over the circulation of credit and cash. I would not preclude coordination with respect to a minimum wage, various benefits and subsidies, and other measures that do not add to the authority of governments and parliaments. Still, I think that we will have to accept it if we want in the final analysis to do good for our peoples. Surgeons often have to inflict pain on a patient in order to save him.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: As is known, many citizens of the former Union do not hide their liking for the “great and mighty.” It seems to us that the appeal for the creation of a confederation, issued by the congress of Russian deputies, is the result of an undying nostalgia for the past. What do you think of this appeal?

[Shushkevich]: I can only say that the time when a true confederation could be created has been irrevocably lost. Not least the fault for this lies with M. Gorbachev, who, in my opinion, did not delve in depth into these difficult problems. The current processes are irreversible; we cannot turn history back. Its development already is following a different course. The independent countries of the commonwealth already have received international recognition and have taken their place in the world community. Judge for yourself. Belarus is already recognized by more than one hundred states; it conducts its own policy; its voice is listened to by most authoritative international organizations, where it has become an equal and respected member. As to the appeal by our colleagues in the Russian parliament, it is the responsibility of our Supreme Soviet to reply to this.

[Gorelik and Kryzhanovskiy]: Over the past year of the existence of the CIS, the economic situation in most countries has not improved; the standard of living continues to fall. Can we then speak of any gains in the commonwealth as a whole and Belarus in particular?

[Shushkevich]: It is quite clear that an increased national self-awareness, the young republics' entry into the international arena, bringing some order into relations between the countries, and even coming to a realization that some of them live beyond their means—all of this can be put on the commonwealth's credit side. A year of being a part of it gave us an opportunity to adjust our notion of sovereignty, to outline the real shape of statehood, to see the future of our economic system. It has taught us to act in a new way in the changed conditions. I would like to believe that the results of the republic's national economic performance for November are a good sign of these changes. For the first time this year, many industrial sectors not only halted the production decline, but actually increased output. For instance, in light industry, this increase amounted to 6.4 percent; in machine building-2.6 percent; in food processing-3 percent; and in timber and woodworking industry-2 percent I think that this is not accidental; rather, it is an expected development that became possible thanks to building new bridges of mutually beneficial ties and good partnership with the help of the CIS. The same processes are under way in other commonwealth republics as well; if we manage to preserve calm and mutual understanding, the next year will become for the citizens of the CIS countries a year of many hopes and aspirations to come true.

4.71 Shushkevich Addresses Supreme Soviet

Minsk Radio Minsk Network, 9 April 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

I believe that we should create genuine democracy in domestic policy, ensure principal human rights, and protect citizens from violence by other citizens and the authorities. A law-governed state means a firm balance of the executive and legislative branches both in the center and in localities, based on the constitution and laws.

With regard to the economy, we should create a socially oriented market economy with different forms of ownership, including comprehensive support for individual and private initiative with preservation of the optimum level of social guarantees for the population.

In foreign policy, we should consolidate the independence of our state so that Belarus takes its rightful place in the international community. There can be various models of our state. For example, it might be a strictly national state, based only on the heritage of previous generations. A Slavic option is also possible as a three-path variant: Moscow, Kiev, and Minsk, or the Minsk-Moscow axis. Also, I support the third variant, which is a neutral and politically stable state, which does not have a distinct Eastern or Western orientation. In its political and economic strategy it strives to be a source of stability in the region. Today, we are clearly adhering to an Eastern orientation. We should see this as the reality. Although we should support and develop it, this orientation must not prevent us from establishing other contacts and contacts in the West. This is my understanding of the essence of this problem. ...

The majority of us in this hall are paying for the military industrial complex. The percentage of militarists and industrialists among the deputies is higher than among the ordinary population. I would like to stress what I have been talking about in the report. The components of a supracountry have disappeared in Russia. And we are an appendix to those components. We should change the structure of our industry, which was formerly working for the USSR military industry. We do not have to produce missiles, tanks, and to build submarines with such intensity for half the world. We will lose that industry. We must convert it. There is no other way....

Now I will talk about the collective security issue. I believe that the main mistake of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs is that it failed to adopt a scientific approach toward the collective security issue, based on international law. What is the main point here? Since August 1991, when we voluntarily declared to the whole world that we strive for neutrality, your experts and you yourself, Pyotr Kuzmich, should have remembered the Vienna Convention of 1969, which obliges states to abide by signed treaties and fulfill assumed commitments. So why should we not abide by them? There can be a change only if conditions change. Are we supposed to send threatening phone messages? That is the opinion of the military. I understand them. They will dig up anything in order to prove that we are threatened by Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, Russia-not to mention Ukraine. It is so frightening. We should serve as an example of opposition to military escalation and expenditures. We should show that when we now adopt a practically new military doctrine and move away from neutrality, the first reaction of Poland will be: if they act this way we have to reinforce ourselves too. And there goes an escalation. And I think that we should follow the example of other countries, like Poland, the Baltic states, Romania, and Moldova, and assume the status of neutrality [words indistinct] and declare that we have no claims. Assume the status of neutrality, declare that you are the same as us, that you have no claims. I think that we will eventually take this path.

As for NATO, they see that we do not agree to collective security, and I think that we should agree. The NATO generals would be unemployed if we did not have a union here. This is why I believe that the best guarantee of our security is bilateral agreements with Russia. We already have them. It is a more complicated thing to observe these agreements within the CIS and by joint command over our armed forces. Note the approach that we had. What is its superiority over others? We have assumed right away, I think, a very clear line. We said: There are no CIS armed forces on our territory. We consider these forces Russian-we recognize that they are under Russian jurisdiction-and hold negotiations with Russia. It has simplified the whole system. One does not have to meet with all the CIS countries, but only negotiate with the Russian government and the defense ministry. Look how we have straightened everything out. We have concluded all the treaties. We are consistently moving toward withdrawal of the troops. Foreign aid-Clinton has confirmed it now-will allocate houses in Russia for those troops. We are solving that issue. Why do we have to involve someone else in it? ...

We should only adopt political decisions because we have all the agreements in place. Let me remind you that in 1991, in Kiev, I signed a two-year agreement, which will be valid until 20 March 1994. This means that we already have collective defense. But we intend to take it step by step, because now we cannot help being in a collective defense and we are in one. What is the issue? We are dealing here with a political declaration of the Supreme Soviet about changing our political course. This is how the world will see it. What can one do in this situation when we have found ourselves faced with a stark choice....

4.72 Lukashenka on the CIS and the Belovezh Forest Agreements

Interview by Aleksandr Stupnikov
Moscow NTV, 15 February 1995 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpts

Editor's Note: In July 1994 Aleksandr Lukashenka burst onto the Belarusian scene. This former collective farm director soon made it clear that he regarded reunification with Russia as imperative. During his first year in office, he consolidated his control over Belarus-imposing media censorship, ignoring court rulings, and belittling the parliament. Soon after his election, the parliament was suspended due to insufficient electoral turnout. Having captured almost absolute power, Lukashenka proceeded to rule by decree, and to put into action his plan to annex Belarus to the Russian state. Since his ascendancy to power, Russian troops have reappeared in Belarus, the Belarusian language has been discouraged, the old "Soviet republic" Belarusian flag has been readopted, and Belarusian-language schools are being abolished. Lukashenka has accepted more than integration. He has tried to transform Belarus into part of the "Russian myth," culturally, politically, economically, and militarily. The following documents characterizes Lukashenka's "Russification" policies.

The agreements and treaties that we have signed with the Russian Federation recently permit us to declare unambiguously that the economic union with Russia has, in effect, been concluded. That's how it is. We sat down and sorted out which options suit them and suit us, too. What more does one need? That is, the main thing is interest. We have an interest in Russia. There is no altruism in the Belarusian president's policy here: it is absolutely in our interest.

Yes, as always, the opposition criticizes me for this-and not just for this, either-saying that in foreign policy I am selling our interest. You know, I'm an economist, not a photographer. I understand perfectly what interest is. Interest is subject to accounting. What is it that can't be understood there? Let's import oil from somewhere, they say. Excuse me, but it's not so simple. Everything has long been divided up in the world. So it's simpler to lose a sales market than to find one. But as for the moral aspect of the matter, I've already spoken about that-it is the unity of these peoples, the fraternal peoples....

[Stupnikov]: You were the first Belarusian Supreme Soviet deputy, the only one in fact, to vote against-it's in the past now-the Belovezh Forest agreements.

[Lukashenka]: Yes, I voted against them. And I'm proud of the fact that I cast my vote against the dismemberment of a great state. Time has shown that we committed a grave error. But those who say that three Belovezh Forest big shots got together to break up the state are taking a very simplified view of things. They had quite different aims. Moscow was at that time without power. Gorbachev did not exercise power. And it is hard to say how I, Lukashenka, would have acted had I been in Yeltsin's place. Yeltsin was fighting for power. And there had to be power in Moscow, so Yeltsin's aims were quite different....

Yeltsin was not in favor of the collapse of a great country, I am convinced. Why should Lukashenka and Yeltsin miss a chance to do a good thing, and thus live on as good leaders in the memory of the Belarusian and Russian peoples? I want to go down in the memory of your Russian and our Belarusian peoples as just such a leader. [End recording.]

4.73 Snegur Opposes Centralized Structures in the CIS

Valeriy Demidetskiy

ITAR-TASS, 27 September 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Moldovan president Mircea Snegur spoke out against the restoration of centralized structures in the Commonwealth of Independent States. In an interview with German radio he said he prefers the development of bilateral, political, and economic relations between the former Union republics.

Snegur said that Moldova's recognition by 120 countries, the creation of a national army with a defensive doctrine, and the people's striving to be free are the main proofs of the Moldovan state's viability. The Moldovan president said the Moldovan people favor the economic reforms and realize that the difficulties connected with reforms can be surmounted.

Snegur asserted that the third force had been involved in the conflict in the Dniester region. It often destabilized the situation to please those whom it served. However it was to conclude the agreement with Russia on settling the conflict in order to stop the threat to peace that was established.

4.74 Trans-Dniester Representative in Russia Interviewed

Interview by Vladimir Ryashin

Pravda, 16 December 1992 [FBIS Translation]

The Trans-Dniester tragedy is only a crisis to many politicians, but for the people who live there it represents hundreds of graves where the grass has not had time to grow yet. At a meeting with journalists yesterday, Igor Mikhaylov, special representative of the Trans-Dniester Moldovan Republic to Russia, reminded them that the people's wounds have not healed yet.

“The only option our republic is willing to accept,” I. Mikhaylov said, “is a confederate union with Moldova. Those who question the sovereign status of the Dniester region do not know much about history and do not want to abide by international law. The independence of the Trans- Dniester Moldavian Republic has been confirmed by the will of the people, expressed by them in a referendum. Besides, what kinds of claims can Chisinau have to the Trans-Dniester after the slaughter the armed forces of Moldova committed in Bendery and other cities and rural communities? The UN declaration on ethnic minorities specifically says that ethnic minorities have the right to secede from a state if crimes and acts of genocide are committed against them. Unfortunately, Russian diplomats have excluded our republic from the negotiations that will decide the future of the Dniester region. Furthermore, UN and CSCE structures often take the side of the strongest party in a conflict.”

[Ryashin]: What can you tell us about the 14th Russian Army?

[Mikhaylov]: This very day, 15 December, the parliament of the Trans-Dniester Moldavian Republic will be discussing a bill on its status, to legitimize the army’s presence in the republic. Of course, the decision to withdraw or not to withdraw the 14th Army must be made by Russia, but the Dniester region will do everything within its power to protect the Russian servicemen-from the resolution of housing problems to the guarantee of pension security.

I sometimes have to explain to foreign diplomats and journalists that there are only a few thousand soldiers in the 14th Army. The commotion over the threat they pose has been artificial. People in the Dniester region remember that units of this army liberated Tiraspol and Bendery from the Fascists in the Great Patriotic War.

People do not want the army to leave.

[Ryashin]: But then why did certain forces in Trans-Dniester try to discredit General Lebed, the commander of the army?

[Mikhaylov]: Yes, there was some friction, and it was reported in the press, but today the republic leaders are doing their best to prevent conflicts with the commander of the 14th Army.

4.75 Foreign Ministry Worried About Yeltsin Statement

Basapress, 6 March 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Moldova expresses its concern regarding the declaration of the president of the Russian Federation, Boris Yeltsin, on the occasion of the “Civic Union” congress on 28 February 1993, where he pointed out that “now is the right time for organizations with international authority, including the United Nations, to offer Russia special power in her role of guaranteeing peace and security on the territory of the former USSR,” as is mentioned in a press release of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. “The desire of a state to embrace the role of peacemaker in this area disagrees with the norms of international rights as long as none of the independent states grants Russia such a mandate. Furthermore, Russia’s military units are still present in several conflict areas including the eastern districts of Moldova,” the statement underlines.

Moldova feels that conflicts must be solved in conformity with the norms of international rights and with the active participation of all international forums, including the United Nations and CSCE, and is rejecting any attempt to interfere in its internal affairs, the statement concludes.

4.76 Parliament Authorizes Snegur to Sign CIS Accord

Mircea Dascaliuc

Radio Romania Network, 26 October 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

The presidium of the parliament of the Republic of Moldova, which ensures the current activities of this legislative body until the next parliament is set up, at today's meeting adopted a decision whereby it approves President Mircea Snegur's signing of the accord founding the CIS and the treaty on the creation of the CIS economic union. It also proposed that these two documents be examined in a later ordinary session.

During the discussions, this decision was motivated by the current participation of the government of the Republic of Moldova in more than two hundred multilateral accords and treaties that regulate questions of an economic, social, and legal nature, as well as by its cooperation with more than thirty interstate bodies stipulated in the statutes of the CIS states. It was judged that the postponement, by virtue of certain circumstances, of the ratification of the two documents in question, along with the uncertain judicial status of the Republic of Moldova among the CIS member states, have reduced cooperation possibilities with those states as well as the chances of buying energy sources, fuel, and raw materials needed by the Republic of Moldova.

It was also decided that this situation exerts a negative influence on the conclusion of economic accords for 1994 and on markets for selling the Moldovan products, which are delivered to the Russian Federation. The meeting also emphasized the fact that reason dictates the participation by the Republic of Moldova in the activity of the aforementioned bodies.

Also today in Chisinau, President Mircea Snegur met with leading representatives of the Russian community in the Republic of Moldova. During this meeting, the two sides discussed problems faced by this community, including difficulties in studying the state language—that is, Romanian. Mr. Mircea Snegur assured the representatives that all these shortfalls would be solved if at all possible and welcomed the fact that members of the Russian community were aware of the need to speak the state language, and that they have proved active participants in the process of democratizing society and consolidating the state independence of the Republic of Moldova.

4.77 Kravchuk and Moldova's Snegur Hold a News Conference

Kiev Ukrayinske Telebachennya Network 14 December 1993, [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Editor's Note: The bilateral, almost “fraternal” relationship exhibited in the document below is significant because it offers a potential counterbalance to the Moscow/Minsk axis, if not in military terms, then at least in political ones.

I would like to say that Ukraine supported, supports, and will continue to support the state unity of Moldova. This is a matter of principle. It is the concern of the Moldovan people to resolve their internal affairs regarding the status of their regions, including the Trans-Dniester. However, we are for oneness, for unity of the state, for its sovereignty, and for its independent development. We have declared it previously, and we declare it today-Ukraine will follow such a policy. If some difficulties arise, and Moldova finds it expedient to ask Ukraine for support, we are ready to be a mediator in any questions, following international norms and international documents, and analyzing the extent of accord in interaction with the state. [Passage omitted.]

[Boris Rzhnevskiy, Moldovan National Television]: I have two questions for the Moldovan and Ukrainian presidents. First, could you delineate priority provisions of the treaty for 1994? The second question concerns your attitude toward the preliminary results of the elections in Russia.

[Snegur]: I believe that all the aspects of relations between Ukraine and Moldova are of a priority nature, both economically and politically. The economic aspect, undoubtedly, prevailed. Principal import and export figures for 1994 were specified, and the prime ministers signed an agreement on this issue. I think that the issues of Moldova's property on Ukrainian territory and Ukraine's property on Moldovan territory are equally important. We are fully satisfied with the mutual understanding that we achieved on this issue, including the protection of property and the forming of joint-stock enterprises. We have drafted a blueprint for eliminating these problems, and appropriate departments signed an agreement. Ukraine's stance on regulating the armed conflict in the Trans-Dniester region should also be regarded as a priority issue-all the more so since tension in that area is being built up by those who do not agree to draw our stances on this issue closer to one another, regardless of the fact that we have reviewed the standpoint that we took a year ago. We suggest that special legal status be granted to that sector of our republic based on the principles of maximum local self-rule. We are ready to review the language situation that has developed in that region, taking into account existing realities. We have declared our readiness to agree to the activities of some legislative assembly in that region that would be entitled to draft and adopt local laws. Unfortunately, local leaders seem not to understand the changing situation, and one gets the impression that they are ready to reject all these proposals just to be able to call the Trans- Dniester region a sovereign independent state and a member of the artificial Moldovan confederation. Thus, I am going back to my initial postulate that the stance of Ukraine, our great eastern neighbor, is very valuable to us. Many aspects of our lives have intertwined in the course of history, and we have things to discuss. It is enough to mention that Moldovan railroads in many places stretch across Ukrainian soil. Problems do exist. When we lived in the former Soviet Union and were told what to do and carried out orders, there were no problems. Since our states won independence, these issues have emerged.

In fact, I was asked the second question at the airport yesterday when the results of the elections were not exactly known, although even today, we know only preliminary results. Of course, regarding the Russian elections, I believe that they made Russia and the other states think, because of the results. Leonid Makarovich will tell you that we discussed these issues yesterday, but we have not discussed them since, for me, these results were unexpected, to say the least. I want to say that this was a signal for democratic forces, I mean for my republic at any rate. Any turn in domestic policy is possible when dangerous trends are underestimated, and the Russian elections proved this. Perhaps, we should draw conclusions. I do not think that I can give a more detailed analysis at the moment. We will see how events develop in Russia, and we should be careful, especially since we are also on the eve of early parliamentary elections scheduled for 27 February in Moldova and for 27 March in Ukraine. There are forces trying to ban presidents from participation in elections. Some factions are already voicing demands that the president remain neutral and refrain from making statements. How can this be done if there are provocations and insults. The president cannot remain silent because later, he will have to cooperate with the legislature. I want you to understand me correctly, but if these processes are unattended.... Our state has the most democratic electoral system, and people should be helped to comprehend it. Voting will be conducted solely through party lists. The law also envisions independent candidates, but this is far from widespread. I think that people should have the difference between the former situation, when there was one candidate on the list, and the current one, when we have perhaps, ten electoral blocs, explained. I think that a more in-depth analysis of the results of the Russian elections could be provided later.

[Kravchuk]: I share President Snegur's standpoint regarding priorities as well as the second problem. I can only add that final assessments and declarations can be made only after the Russian National Assembly convenes its first session and adopts certain declarations and resolutions. We can react to decisions made by a state body. In this case, we are dealing with electoral competition and electoral platforms of political parties and political forces. Thus, I cannot and I do not want to analyze these platforms because every party has a right to voice its political arguments and programs. But frankly speaking, there is anxiety not so much for Ukraine as, forgive my arrogance, for Russia. I told you many times that I was in a very favorable political situation because democracy and sovereignty were initiated by Russia, by Boris Yeltsin, and other democratic forces. You remember that the first declaration on independence was adopted by Russia, and so were democratic laws, including the one on presidential elections. Other newly independent states took up the torch from Russia and adopted Russia's experience. In 1991, when the issue of the further development of states was being resolved, Russia unequivocally decided that it would develop according to democratic principles. Of course, I am worried. When six million electors cast their votes in favor of a great inseparable Russia within its pre- 1917 borders during presidential elections, I was worried. Today, this anxiety is greater. The idea of straightforward revanchism was promoted, and this fact should not be concealed. However, I hope that Russia's power, its president, and all forces will stand up to protect democracy and will not allow the ideas of revanchism to develop into a state concept. This can be a political trend of a certain group, but if it develops into a state concept, then I can state with full responsibility that this will be the beginning of great instability in Europe, involving partitions and repartitions. At this stage, I regard this as just populism and a political platform. However, the fact that so many people voted for this idea is alarming, as is the fact that so many people would like to restore the tsarist empire. This is what greatly worries me. I want to emphasize again that I believe in the Russian democratic forces' victory over this temporary political trend, this deviation from the line declared by Russia, a deviation caused by a difficult economic situation. Everybody is using this situation for demagoguery, including political leaders.

4.78 Foreign Minister on Russian Ties and Federation

Interview by Jerzy Haszczyński
Rzeczpospolita (Warsaw), 17 February 1994 [FBIS
Translation], Excerpts

When the Soviet Union was collapsing, the Moldovan authorities expressed their criticism of the concept of the CIS. But last year Moldova joined the CIS anyway. How do you explain the change of attitude?

[Botnaru]: Our links with the CIS are of a specific nature. We are a de facto member of the CIS's economic union, but not de jure, since we have not ratified the appropriate documents. My view is that from an economic standpoint, Moldova should be in the CIS's economic union since that is the real situation from which we cannot escape. Our economic relations with the West still leave a lot to be desired, but one must live somehow until that situation changes. Generally speaking, the economic relations of a new country should be multifaceted.

[Haszczyński]: Is Moldova interested in the CIS only from an economic standpoint?

[Botnaru]: We do not participate in the CIS's military and political structures. So far, we have not signed any agreements relating, for instance, to security. What is important is what shape the CIS will take in the future. Experience shows that countries that have traditionally been together can make their lots easier if they act together. But one should take part in such cooperation arrangements only insofar as it does not endanger a country's sovereignty.

[Haszczyński]: Do you not feel threatened by Russia?

[Botnaru]: I regard our relations with Russia to be correct, but there are still many problems inherited from the Soviet Union. First of all the problem of the 14th Russian Army, which is stationed in Moldova. In my view, all problems can be solved if both sides conduct a dialogue. I paid a visit to Moscow recently, where I spoke with Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev. We listed the unresolved problems in Russian-Moldovan relations, and we signed a bilateral agreement. Moldova has ratified it but Russia has not yet done so, delaying the resolution of other problems, for instance, the problem of gasoline supplies to former Soviet military personnel residing in Moldova.

A withdrawal of the 14th Army would have an exceptionally positive impact on the development of Russo-Moldovan relations. The problem of the Cis-Dniester region is linked to that.

We think that some elements of Russia's relations with the Cis-Dniester region could be described as interference in Moldova's internal affairs. I mean the issue of Russian aid for the Cis-Dniester region, both in material and political terms.

[Haszczynski]: Was there any specific date set during your Moscow talks for the 14th Army's withdrawal from the usurpatory Cis-Dniester Republic?

[Botnaru]: Moldova's position is that the Russian Army should withdraw by 1 July of this year. I regard that date as realistic. Despite everything, there are fewer [Russian] troops on our territory than used to be the case with Poland or other East European countries. The withdrawal should be unconditional and in accordance with international law and CSCE provisions. Talks are under way. Moldova is absolutely against having foreign troops stationed on its territory. I want to remind you that all countries recognize Moldova within the boundaries in which it proclaimed its independence in 1991, and that includes the Cis-Dniester region.

[Haszczynski]: How do you imagine a calming of the situation in the Cis-Dniester region? After all, fights have already erupted there a few times and hundreds of people have died. Is it possible, for instance, for Moldova to be transformed into a federation?

[Botnaru]: No. I think that the variety of nationalities and their distribution in the various regions make a federal state impossible. Moldova is a small territory (33,700 square km), which would be split into many small units if a federation was to be established. Besides, the base criterion of a federation is not completely clear, either. We used to live in the Soviet Union, and we were told then that it was a federation.

As far as the Cis-Dniester region is concerned, we granted very far-reaching concessions, and we guaranteed that if the issue of Moldova's joining Romania came up, then the people of the Cis-Dniester region could decide the territory's fate through a referendum. Almost all political forces in Moldova think that the Cis-Dniester region should have some kind of special status. The necessity of a decentralization is linked with that. Some amendments to our laws are indispensable, including the law on languages. We must talk about the possibility of using several languages in the country's offices: let us say one of them would be called the state language (Romanian), and the other two would be called official languages (Ukrainian and Russian). The new parliament and the new cabinet should start working on these changes soon.

[Haszczynski]: Do you really believe in a compromise? After all, the authorities of the Trans-Dniester region have announced that the region will take part neither in the parliamentary elections (27 February) nor in the referendum on Moldova's sovereignty and integrity (6 March).

[Botnaru]: We do not seek the authorities' participation, especially given that these are not lawful authorities. We are after the people's participation; the usurpatory authorities' control does not extend to the entire Cis-Dniester region. There are areas and villages that cooperate with us. According to what we have found out, the people living in the areas not under the control of the usurpatory regime will vote.

[Haszczynski]: In official documents, your country is known as the Republic of Moldova. Do the authorities of the republic (which gained independence more than two years ago) think that using the old name of "Moldavia" (which was used in the Soviet period, among others) is inappropriate?

[Botnaru]: "Moldavia" is a word of Russian origin. Right now, Romanian is our official language, and in Romanian our country's name is "Moldova." But we have nothing against someone using the Russian-derived name in newspapers, for instance, as long as the name is used with respect ...

4.79 Leaders View CIS Ties and Economic Issues

From the "Presidential Bulletin" column, compiled by Nikolay Zhrebtssov and Andrey Petrovskiy; and edited by Vladimir Shushlin

Interfax, 2 August 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

In the opinion of President Mircea Snegur, the main task for former Soviet republics is to form a common economic space with transparent borders and remove customs barriers. The leaders of CIS countries should concentrate their attention on that, Snegur told participants at an international marathon of disabled athletes in Chisinau on Monday.

In an exclusive interview with Interfax, Vice-Premier Valentin Cunev said the Moldovan leadership favors the speedy formation of a mixed economic committee of CIS countries, which in his opinion will help make collectively important decisions concerning the economy, finance, customs rules, and taxation. (The idea of an economic committee was proposed during the latest CIS summit in Moscow last May.)

Cunev remarked that the present circumstances do not permit Moldova to pursue an uncompromising policy with regard to its neighbors while Ukraine is trying to treat Moldova in that way. He said the exorbitant rates for transit across Ukrainian territory have become a serious problem.

In the opinion of the vice-premier, without a joint economic committee the overwhelming majority of documents drafted and approved by the commonwealth will remain unfulfilled.

4.80 Concern About Arrival of New Recruits in Dniester

INFOTAG, 10 July 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Three hundred recruits from the central regions of Russia arrived to join the Russian military contingent, stationed in Dniester.

The arrival of the Russian citizens to the former 14th Army was viewed by the local population as a big contrast to the situation that existed in that army when it was headed by Lt.-Gen. Aleksandr Lebed.

Before his departure for Moscow, Lebed said that during the three years he spent in Tiraspol, the Russian defense ministry had sent only six recruits to that army.

Welcoming the new recruits, the commander of the Russian troops, Maj.-Gen. Valeriy Evnevich, said that not only citizens of Russia but citizens of the former Soviet Union serve in his troops, as many of them had acquired neither Russian nor Moldovan citizenship. The general expressed hope that differences in the citizenship would not result in abuse of position.

The newcomers from Russia have been also greeted by the state secretary of the unrecognized Dniester Republic, Valeriy Litskay, and the military advisor of the Dniester president, Maj.-Gen. Stefan Chitac. The latter said that the soldiers would have “to defend the interests of Russia on Russian soil.”

4.81 Dniester and Abkhazia Urge Referendum on Joining Russia

INFOTAG, 12 July 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Delegations of the Dniester Republic and Abkhazia, which are participating in the sessions of the Congress of the Compatriots in Moscow, adopted a joint appeal to the governments and the supreme soviets of these unrecognized republics. The appeal stresses the need to hold referendums on their territories before the end of 1995 on the issue of “restoration of the united country and incorporation in Russia.” According to the INFOTAG correspondent in Tiraspol, the Congress of the Compatriots in Moscow was held under the auspices of the State Duma of Russia. The Dniester delegation was headed by Anna Volkova, vice-chairman of the Supreme Soviet.

The branch of the Movement of the Compatriots was established in Dniester only a few weeks before the congress in Moscow. The constituent session of the branch was held on the premises of the Dniester Supreme Soviet. Observers in Tiraspol do not rule out that the current Dniester authorities will hold the referendum on becoming part of Russia at the same time as the elections to the Dniester Supreme Soviet in order to attract more voters. Tiraspol acquired similar experience last spring when, along with the local elections, a referendum on the non-withdrawal of the 14th Army from the region was held.

4.82 Dissatisfaction with Yeltsin Decree on CIS Relations

Interfax, 27 October 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Moldova is unsatisfied with some provisions of Russian President Boris Yeltsin's decree regarding Russia's strategic policy toward the CIS countries, Moldovan Foreign Minister Mihai Popov told a press conference in Chisinau Thursday.

"The decree seems to be only an internal Russian document," Popov said. "Taking into consideration that Moldova is a member of the CIS, this document concerns Moldova's interests," he said.

"In our participation in the CIS we focus on economic cooperation. The military and political aspects of the CIS are likely to be put in place without us. We do not intend to take part in military-political unions," Popov said.

Popov said he thought after reading the Russian president's decree that Russia "will differentiate the CIS countries in terms of their loyalty toward Moscow" and build relations with the CIS countries proceeding from such loyalty. "Whatever documents are adopted in Moscow or in other capitals, Moldova will build its policy proceeding from its national interests,” Popov said.

Popov said the foreign ministers of the countries of the Black Sea region were scheduled to meet in Chisinau on 1 November. He said the foreign ministers would in particular discuss the creation of a legal basis for developing economic cooperation between the region’s countries.

5 The Ukrainian Perspective

Introductory Notes

Chapters 1 and 2 documented Ukraine's unique role in triggering the breakup of the Soviet Union. Chapter 5 will further document Ukraine's unique political role following the collapse of the Soviet Union. Ukraine's unwavering national consciousness, combined with its size, as the second largest former Soviet republic, and its national resource endowment, make its survival as a modern, independent European state a plausible prospect. Nevertheless, economic transition has been painful, and internal pressures from Russian-speaking sections of eastern Ukraine have challenged the political abilities of Ukraine's leaders, who must preserve the state's political sovereignty even as they seek long-term friendship and cooperation with Russia in order to soften Russia's imperial ambitions. Despite the pitfalls of such a balancing act, Ukraine has managed to maneuver within the CIS as an equal partner to Russia, insisting on reciprocity in compromise and full respect for its national integrity.

The documents in Chapter 5 reveal the influence of at least three important factors on the attitudes of the Ukrainian leadership. First and foremost, Ukraine was "independence-minded" long before Gorbachev introduced the concept of a "Union treaty." Second, Ukraine's fiercely independent western region has had to vie with a large Russian community in the east. Third, Ukraine's Slavic origins and strong identification with the Russian culture make many Ukrainians receptive to calls for reunification with Russia.

Ukraine's two post-Soviet presidents have had to weigh these three historical factors carefully in all of their political thinking. The two presidents have been strong leaders, with divergent leadership styles, but similar views on the merits of Ukrainian sovereignty. The first, Leonid Kravchuk, assumed the Ukrainian presidency with credentials as ideology chief in the Ukrainian Communist Party, but it was said that after reading materials made available in 1989 he became an unshakable Ukrainian patriot and state builder. As revealed in the speeches in this chapter, President Kravchuk used blunt language in his references to Russian policy from the outset of CIS collaboration. His use of phrases such as "Russian imperial arrogance," "blatant interference," and "Great Power chauvinism," and his emphatic rejection of the CIS as a permanent regional alliance system guaranteed tense relations between Ukraine and Russia.

One of the most important early issues between Moscow and Kiev was the division of Soviet military assets. The fate of the 380-ship Black Sea Fleet was a particularly strong irritant in relations between the two states. In the documents selected here, President Kravchuk challenges Russia's claim that it should own the fleet, declaring that a large portion should be ceded to Ukraine for its independent navy. On the question of ground forces, the Ukrainian government chose to create a 400,000-man army, to be selected from among the nearly one million former Soviet troops stationed in Ukraine. By February 1992, as recorded here, the Ukrainian press announced that this large army was “almost complete.” Demonstrating remarkable unanimity on the question of military independence, the Ukrainian parliament refused to enter a joint defense area with the other former Soviet republics or to sign the CIS Collective Security Treaty.

In February 1992, the Russian Supreme Soviet raised an issue which has continued to destabilize Ukrainian-Russian relations ever since-that of the return of the Crimean peninsula to Russia. In a resolution which stated that Nikita Khrushchev’s 1954 cession of the Crimea to Ukraine was “unconstitutional” (despite the fact that Russia had declared the Soviet constitution illegal), the Russian parliament challenged Ukraine’s territorial integrity. This issue still simmers today under Ukraine’s second president and promises to be a continual obstruction to improved Ukraine-Russian relations.

President Kravchuk pulled Ukraine even further away from Russia in September 1992 in reaction to a bilateral treaty, proposed by Russia, which would have positioned Ukraine irrevocably within Russia’s security orbit. The treaty was to have included Ukraine in a joint CIS military doctrine and would have awarded dual citizenship to Ukraine’s Russian-speaking population of almost twelve million people. The treaty would even have arranged Russia's payment for the transit of its oil and gas through Ukrainian territory in barter rather than hard currency terms. Ukraine's parliament emphatically rejected this treaty, proposing greater independence for both countries, as recorded here.

Several documents in this chapter allude to Ukraine's position on another important issue- that of disposing of the nuclear weapons Ukraine inherited from the Soviet Union. President Kravchuk at first tried to use these weapons as a bargaining lever to gain security commitments from the West and as a deterrent against a Russian attack-an approach which ultimately failed, only isolating Ukraine from Russia and the West.

President Kravchuk maintained his independent course throughout 1993 and the first half of 1994, although his prime minister, Leonid Kuchma, opposed his position against economic cooperation with Russia and the CIS. A speech to the Ukrainian parliament provided here documents Kuchma's contention that "Ukraine's acute economic crisis is a greater national security threat than any posed by a foreign country." In May 1993, Kuchma initialed several CIS economic projects with the prime ministers of Russia and Belarus, aimed at intensifying economic integration among the three countries. (The economic debates within the CIS, including this trilateral economic agreement, are covered in detail in Chapter 7.) Ukrainian nationalist leaders accused Kuchma of violating the state's vital interests by signing these documents. At the time, distrust was so strong of anyone close to the Russian political elite, as Kuchma was to Russian prime minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, that many Ukrainian democrats judged Kuchma to be little more than one of Russia's appointed "governors." Nevertheless, time would prove prime minister Kuchma to be correct about the need to cooperate more closely with Russia on economic matters, and rapidly to resolve the most contentious military and political issues between the two governments.

With the Ukrainian economy near collapse and no real assistance coming from the West, Leonid Kuchma's cooperative approach and focus on economic development began to win general acceptance within Ukraine. By the time the presidential election of July 1994 was held, Prime Minister Kuchma had garnered enough support to win in a very close race with Leonid Kravchuk. Excerpts found here from President Kuchma's inaugural address document his call for reconciliation with Moscow. He initially interpreted his election as a mandate for change, though he knew he would have to balance complex internal forces, some calling for a policy of radical independence from Russia, and others calling for virtual restoration of the Soviet Union. Appealing to the middle in his inaugural address, he said:

Ukraine stands on the threshold of essential changes in its economic and political course.... Ukraine is part of the Euro-Asian economic and cultural space. Ukraine's vitally important interests are concentrated on this territory of the former Soviet Union.... Ukraine's self-isolation and voluntary refusal to campaign vigorously for its own interests in the Euro-Asian space was a serious political mistake, which caused great damage, above all to the national economy.

To deal with Kravchuk's legacy of political tension and economic malaise, Kuchma promised to institute serious economic reforms and to cooperate with other countries in the CIS. To initiate this approach, he announced at his inauguration that he was preparing a bilateral Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with Russia. This tactic at first raised serious doubts among Ukrainian nationalists. Kuchma's later positions on matters involving Russia and the CIS, however, proved him an energetic defender of Ukraine's statehood and international stature as a key nation in the new Europe.

Despite his willingness to cooperate economically with Russia, President Kuchma has had his share of problems in relations with Moscow. In December 1994, Russia delayed indefinitely President Yeltsin's signing of the Treaty on Friendship and Cooperation, which was to have occurred in September. At a public briefing on 11 January 1995 contained here, Kuchma's Chief of Staff, Dmitro Tabachnyk, reveals that Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev blamed this delay on the participation of Ukrainian "mercenaries" in Chechnya. In February, Russia singled out disagreements over the Black Sea Fleet as a new pretext for holding up the treaty. As documented in the Komsomolskaya Pravda article of 10 June 1995 which appears here, President Kuchma made a serious effort to solve this stubborn problem in a meeting at Yeltsin's dacha in Sochi on 9 June 1995. Under the Sochi accords, Ukraine and Russia are each to receive half of the fleet, with Ukraine ceding almost 30 percent of its share in partial payment of its $2.5 billion debt for Russian gas. Under the agreement, Ukraine received assurance that Sevastopol is Ukrainian territory and the fleet's home base will be leased to Russia at an unspecified rate.

The Crimea is an even more threatening source of friction than the Black Sea Fleet. Despite Yeltsin's constant reassurances that the Crimea is an integral part of Ukraine, Russian politicians will not let the issue rest. As the statement written by Viktor Vishnyakov, chairman of the Russian State Duma's Subcommittee on Constitutional Legislation shows, some Duma deputies still strongly favor pushing Russia's territorial claim to the Crimea. His statement is a minutely detailed legal analysis and apologia for the reannexation of the Crimean territory.

To make matters worse, the chairman of the Crimean

Supreme Soviet, Sergey Tsekov, responding to an invitation from the Russian State Duma, delivered an appeal on 14 April 1995 to the Russian government, saying: "We have so far done our best to cope with the crisis ourselves, and we failed. Now we believe there is no way to solve the Crimean problem without Russia." The Ukrainian government immediately charged that the Duma's invitation to Tsekov represented an "unfriendly act." On April 17, Yeltsin once more delayed the Ukrainian-Russian Friendship and Cooperation Treaty, saying: "It will be correct to sign major political documents between Russia and Ukraine only after we are convinced that relations between Simferopol and Kiev do not infringe on the interests of the Crimeans," he announced. Because two-thirds of the Crimea's population claim to be Russians, Yeltsin went on, Russia has "considerable interests there."

On 18 April, a group of fifty Crimean parliament members denounced Tsekov and appealed to Kiev to dissolve the existing parliament. These members promised to form a new Parliament of the Autonomous Republic of Crimea and place it under Kiev's jurisdiction. The crisis subsided on July 5-6, when the Crimean parliament voted for the resignation of its speaker and elected Mr. Yevhen Supruniuk, who is loyal to Kiev and pledges that the Crimean parliament will follow Ukrainian laws. Kuchma prevailed in one of the toughest and most dangerous battles of his presidency.

In addition to problems with Russia, Ukrainian political elites must contend with pressures within the CIS and in their own parliament. Politically, President Kuchma must now stand against Nursultan Nazarbaev's Eurasian Union, Belarus's decision to submit to Soviet-style dependency, and the Kozyrev-Primakov-Chernomyrdin team in CIS institutions. At the May 1995 CIS summit, Russia, Belarus and Kazakhstan created a trilateral customs union. This is to become the "core" of CIS integration. While in Kazakhstan negotiating the agreement, Chernomyrdin publicly urged Ukraine to accede to the protocol. Instead, Ukraine led a group of republics including Moldova, Azerbaijan, and Turkmenistan in rejecting the agreements. Kuchma's firm rejection of a customs union is documented here as one more example of Ukraine's continuing tough defense of its political sovereignty within the CIS.<sup>1</sup>

On 9 January 1995 President Kuchma consolidated his bilateral relations with Georgia in a "Declaration on Prospects for Cooperation Between Ukraine and Georgia and for Joint Approaches to Foreign Relations Issues," the text of which appears here. Georgia and Ukraine have agreed to seek world attention for their countries in the United Nations and other international fora. Both presidents have several times addressed the United Nations, and excerpts from Kuchma's 22 November 1994 UN address are contained here.

Tensions in Ukrainian-Russian relations have continued to mount, pushing Ukraine further toward consolidating its orientation toward Europe. In May 1995 while visiting Riga, Kuchma signed a joint Latvian-Ukrainian statement in which both countries declared: "Threats and political pressure from a bordering state prompt many countries to want to join reliable and stable political alliances to ensure statehood and development.”

The documents that follow only begin to capture the complexity of Ukraine’s affairs within the CIS. They do, however, elucidate Ukraine’s growing determination to build an independent state and to preserve Ukraine’s special geopolitical status within the former Soviet space. They also show quite conclusively that Leonid Kuchma, who campaigned on a promise to draw closer to Russia, has upheld the Ukrainian people’s vote for sovereignty in the face of Russia’s great power ambitions and Ukrainian communists’ strong tilt toward Russia and a reconsolidated Soviet Union.

5.1 Kravchuk Comments on Russian Arrogance

Sergey Tsikora

Izvestiya, 16 January 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Editor’s Note: The first three documents in this chapter lay out the views of President Leonid Kravchuk on Ukrainian independence, Russian policy toward Ukraine, and the CIS. As President of Ukraine, Kravchuk viewed the Commonwealth as a transitional vehicle for maintaining trade relations among its eleven member states while dismantling the Soviet space.

Kravchuk often delivered impassioned warnings about the potential consequences of Russian interference in Ukraine’s sovereign affairs. He understood the signs of resurgent Russian nationalism, and he clearly placed sovereignty above trade opportunities. He insisted that he would “never take a single step in the direction of reducing Ukrainian independence.” Unfortunately, Kravchuk was slower to implement economic reforms than political ones, and Ukraine’s inflation rate rose to 80 percent annually by the end of 1994. Still, Kravchuk adamantly refused to take Belarus’s route and said openly that he considered Belarus’s policies a return to old ways. Economic worries did, however, undermine his political support-especially in Crimea and eastern Ukraine. To balance his vulnerability in these regions, he sought a strong relationship with the West. Western sympathies notwithstanding, not even Kravchuk’s tilt in that direction could solve Ukraine’s geopolitical worries about Russia’s power and ingenuity in exerting its leverage. Kravchuk’s balancing act is bound to be every Ukrainian president’s balancing act until enough time passes to confer legitimacy upon a sovereign Ukraine.

Kiev Ukrainian President L. Kravchuk devoted his address on republic television, 14 January, to the complex web of economic problems, the creation of Ukraine’s own armed forces, and the impermissibility of interference by its neighbors in the internal affairs of an independent state....

The main source of concern was the difficulties the republic has encountered in the transition to the market. Leonid Kravchuk acknowledged that in effect not one component of the machinery necessary for a switch to free pricing is working in Ukraine today-privatization has not been carried out, and Ukraine has not created its own system of credit and finance. It is Russia that has forced us to launch ourselves without preparation into the whirlpool of free prices, the Ukrainian president said.

We are today trying to defend our market by introducing ruble coupons [kupony-karbovantsy], Kravchuk continued, but lack of preparation and miscalculations in this matter have today led to prices on products in state trade often exceeding prices in the markets.

“The working people cannot carry incompetent leaders on their backs,” the Ukrainian president stated firmly, and added that the guilty men would get their just desserts at the republic Cabinet of Ministers session 16 January.

L. Kravchuk went on to say that, given the current complete indifference of some states of the CIS [Commonwealth of Independent States] to the interests of others, Ukraine is forced to look after itself, and hence intends to introduce its own money. It will be printed by the end of the current year.

It should be noted especially that the theme of current relations with Russia ran through the whole of the Ukrainian president's speech. Whatever issue Kravchuk raised, he without fail mentioned the position of the two republics. It must be noted with regret that mutual understanding has not yet been reached on many acute problems.

The Ukrainian president dwelt in detail on the topic of military building in the republic. He stated that Ukraine has not violated a single clause of the military agreements signed in Minsk and Alma-Ata. But an independent Ukraine will allow no one to dictate to it any conditions whatsoever, especially if they concern its security, the president stressed. We cannot agree to one republic today declaring its right to fleets and other armed forces, and also to embassies abroad. One state cannot be the inheritor and successor of everything to which the peoples of the former Union contributed their labor.

Touching on the currently acute problem of the dividing up of the fleet, L. Kravchuk stated that officially Ukraine has never stated that it is taking over the Black Sea Fleet. We say that we have a right to create our own fleet. And whether it will be formed from the Black Sea Fleet or built at the Ukraine's shipyards is the topic of a separate conversation. But the Ukraine is against the Black Sea being plowed by ships armed with nuclear weapons.

The fact that military-political problems between the Ukraine and Russia are still far from being solved is suggested by the latest news cited by Kravchuk during his television address. He said: Today I have learned that, on the representation of Marshal of Aviation Shaposhnikov, the rank of general has been conferred by Russian President Yeltsin on military men serving in Ukraine. We cannot agree with such actions, Kravchuk stated. This is the jurisdiction of the supreme council, government, and president of Ukraine.

However the most acute issue in the Ukrainian president's address was that of "the blatant interference of some Russian leaders in our internal affairs." Describing this as imperial arrogance, L. Kravchuk cited the latest example from the 14 January issue of Trud, which published an interview with Russian Minister Poltoranin. In this article the member of the Russian government allowed himself to use far from diplomatic expressions about the head of Ukraine. Describing his behavior as a display of Great Power chauvinism, “whose carriers in Russia were described as ‘small-town police thugs’ [derzhimordy] by the Bolshevik Lenin,” L. Kravchuk said that the Ukrainian government has officially demanded of the Russian parliament, government, and president an end to the whipping up of passions in relations between the two republics and peoples, and to interference in the internal affairs of another sovereign state.

This policy led to extremely serious consequences in the Baltic region, and has provoked conflicts in other regions. There is peace in Ukraine today, and we do not intend to put up with any interference in our life. We will carry out the policy with which the people entrusted us, the Ukrainian president said, and accept no correction from outside.

Further on Address

Mikhail Odinets

Pravda, 16 January 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Kiev-Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk has spoken on Ukrainian television. He dwelt on the problems of strengthening the economy and the monetary and financial system and of the structure of the armed forces, and touched in particular on the Black Sea Fleet.

At the same time a significant part of his address was devoted to instances of interference in Ukraine's internal affairs on the part of certain representatives of the Russian leadership and mass media. "Imperial arrogance is bordering on showing disrespect for Ukraine as a state," he said. Criticizing an interview given to Trud by M. Poltoranin, Russian minister of the press and mass media, L. Kravchuk quoted from the newspaper the words that M. Poltoranin is a reliable and longstanding comrade-in-arms of Boris Yeltsin, and stressed: "Even the Bolshevik Lenin was very sensitive to these questions, and called Russian chauvinists small-town police thugs, because he was very much afraid that they would inflict damage on the outposts of the Tsarist Russia of those days."

Addressing the Russian minister directly from the screen and remarking that his message would be conveyed to him, Kravchuk said: "Now you, pardon me, belong to just this category. I would not speak like this if you were the only one, and I would never descend to the level of quarreling with you by proxy. But in this case it has become an illness, a real problem.

You consider it your right to interfere in our affairs and interpret our policy; you consider it your right to view Ukraine as a part, an outlying area, of Russia. You liked it when Ukraine was obedient.... Then, of course, Ukraine and its leaders followed in the footsteps of such democrat representatives. But now the ‘nationalist’ Kravchuk is defending the interests of Russians, Jews, and Germans . . . and will continue to defend them, and believes that only here will they find protection and have equal rights. And the democrat Poltoranin and his ilk are taking a different position, and believe they have a right to impose and establish their ways, their laws... .”

It was this policy, L. Kravchuk went on to note, which brought extremely serious consequences in its wake in the Baltic, and it could lead to them in other regions. Winding up his speech, L. Kravchuk called the last part of it an emotional outburst of the sort he never allows himself. But everything has its limit, he declared; after all, this concerns not only the Ukrainian president, but all the Ukrainian people. And the “hanba” (disgrace, dishonor, shame, profanation) can be brooked no longer.

It goes without saying that the title of this article should be understood conditionally-the accusations are directed not so much against Poltoranin as against the attitude which, in L. Kravchuk’s opinion, has recently been displayed toward Ukraine. And nothing good, as we know, ever comes of conflicts.

5.2 Kravchuk Comments on Relations Within CIS

Interview with Ukrainian President L.M. Kravchuk by
Vitaliy Portnikov

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 30 January 1992 [FBIS Translation]

[Portnikov]: Leonid Makarovich, the first 100 days of your presidency have passed. I would first like to ask you what you associate with this initial period and how you see the country you have been elected to lead.

[Kravchuk]: If the people elect a president, they above all entrust him with defending their interests. The people must be content and believe that the president will do his duty. And the people's will today is to form an independent state. It is the most terrible thing imaginable for a man to betray a people who have agonized to secure this right throughout their history. That is why I will endeavor to do everything to defend their interests and their future. We can then say-albeit in six months-that we have not merely an independent Ukraine, but an independent, strong Ukraine, which will have its own armed forces, institutions of authority, and laws to meet the people's needs. Then we will say that there is a powerful, strong Ukraine. It will not be economically all that strong or rich-that will take time. But this is the main thing now.

A very interesting situation has taken shape in our country as a whole. The old structures have vanished: However we criticized them, and we did so with good cause, and however we criticized the old unitarian, stateparty ideology-they did exist. Now let me look at our state now. We have a Cabinet of Ministers. Who is tackling problems of ideology? No one. We have a Supreme Soviet. Who is tackling problems of ideology? No one. What about a presidential structure.... We do not have a philosophy and ideology for the new Ukraine. We want to develop a new, independent, democratic Ukraine, that is true. But we do not have a modern philosophy, one that calls up our roots and our traditions. Rukh [the Ukrainian popular movement] has now taken on the problem of ideology. The congress of Ukrainians, the forum of peoples of the Ukraine in Odessa, and Ukrainians' gathering together and unity are all elements of ideology. Admittedly, they do not have a broad philosophical base because no one has as yet thought about that in earnest. We must create an ideological base for the new Ukraine. Then things will be easier for us, then we will be able to create the appropriate structures, guided by this philosophy.

I think all the time: Well, we have gotten state levers. I can sincerely say that we have no experience behind us. There are no great state structures because Ukraine was in someone else's hands all the time. Our government and ministers worked within the bounds of their own jurisdiction, which extended to 5 percent of the real estate and involved carrying out the Kremlin's orders. The better it did this, the further it advanced. If it did not carry out orders, it went backward. That is why we must learn state leadership of the new Ukraine and state thinking. When someone goes ahead and plows you a furrow, you look for that furrow. But when you yourself have to do it, that is quite another matter. I may be more conscious of this than anyone else because I come to work every day and encounter this every day. I am not saying that everything is fine for Yeltsin, but the structures that he took on-whatever they were-have attained an international level while the former structures in Kiev never went anywhere. Moscow was the highest level that they had to deal with. They did not know a thing about Paris. Yet now we need to deal with other states and we have a totally different range of decisions to make on a totally different scale. Therefore, we need people to whom we can entrust the Ukraine-committed, competent people.

statehood may be differences of mentality between the inhabitants of different regions of the republic....

[Kravchuk]: This is rooted in our history. I know western Ukraine: I worked there and I was born in those districts. The constant hints that there is a Ukraine and a “semi-Ukraine” have generated in people’s minds such a desire for independence that it is hard to even imagine. I remember my first trip to Lvov. I dropped in at the “Elektron” plant. Things were very hard then, the stores were totally empty. Before that I had driven around several regions and, wherever I went, people spoke to me about that. So I was already geared to thinking that they would ask me about it. I went through one workshop, then another, and no one said anything. Then I myself appealed to people and they replied: That is not the most important thing for us. The most important thing is independence, that is the light at the end of the tunnel. I thought: What strength of will people have-not party leaders who have lived for this and spent time in jail for it, but the working man.

The main point in this was: here we have the Ukraine, here we have its strength, might, and unity, and here we have multiethnic collectives. At first people did not have such a powerful desire for freedom. My wife is from Sumy Oblast and if you go to a village there, their ideas are not quite as crystallized as they are in the west. People say: Certainly we need independence, but we must be together, within the Union. You will not hear this any more in the west. Although I agree that we must not split up, but live on equal terms.

[Portnikov]: Many people are talking about the Ukraine’s place in the Commonwealth of Independent States [CIS], but virtually no European policy is being elaborated for the country or its priorities ...

[Kravchuk]: The Ukraine as a European state has set itself the goal of integrating into European structures. We only say that we do not want to join any blocs. We are a nuclear-free, extrabloc, permanent, neutral state and that is our fundamental policy. We also say that, while integrating, we do not consider it necessary to destroy our ties with the states of the former Union. Our common structures have been built here; our common life is here. But it was based on monopoly. Russia, for instance, has a monopoly on oil, gas, and timber. We do not bear Russia a grudge for that; we just say that it will not be able to provide all the other republics with these products, even if it wanted to do so. The reason why we do not have enough of some things is not that Yeltsin is a bad man. Production has dropped sharply and these regions are already controlled by unknown people. If we continue to pursue the policy of gearing ourselves solely to Russia, at any moment someone-and times here are so revolutionary at the moment that any president may close the pipes at any moment-may be deprived of gas and oil. We will try to obtain these things and we are already working with Iran and other countries now. It is normal for us to seek reserves, and markets are not confined to a single region.

[Portnikov]: You have already spoken of differences between the structures in Moscow and Kiev. Yeltsin has a team effecting economic reforms today. Where is the Ukraine's team? Or will it depend on Russian reforms?

[Kravchuk]: We are not repeating and will never repeat Russian reforms. Our independence from Russia marks our independence from the ruble. The ruble space and the fact that we are tied to monopoly sources of raw materials forces us to follow Russia. But we will take the path that we have chosen. We have people who will be able to do this. We will not say that they can effect another revolution. This will be calm, well-considered, well-thought-out work. We do not want to overextend ourselves. A person in the public eye is not entitled to do that. He is too visible if he does do something.

[Portnikov]: I think that there are many misunderstandings in Russian-Ukrainian relations due to the fact that Moscow does not notice that the Ukraine has indeed become independent....

[Kravchuk]: Yes, undoubtedly.

[Portnikov]: Yet people in Kiev do not take this lack of comprehension into consideration....

[Kravchuk]: No, we are aware of that. I never tire of constantly repeating the same thing at sessions. As soon as Nazarbaev submits a proposal to set up some kind of common committee, I remind him that we represent a state, but our community is not a state. I tell Boris Nikolaevich and he listens. But it is not just a question of one man. There is his whole entourage. The mentality of the Russian leadership does not come from above but from them. I see them sitting at the table, I see them go up to him and say: Let us have the Andreevskiy flag and so on and so forth.... I am not accusing anyone, but I think that if people were buzzing around me like flies saying this and that was necessary, I would possibly be the same way because people are telling you eight hours a day that you are a great person and must take charge. Take the problem of the unified armed forces, for instance. That is not a technical but a political problem. Let us think of its possible consequences. Eleven states and unified armed forces. Which state leader will control them? Tell me, who?

[Portnikov]: The president of the largest state?

[Kravchuk]: Why? We will not instruct him to do that. I, for instance, would vote against it.

[Portnikov]: What about a committee then, like the Yugoslav presidency.

[Kravchuk]: Fine, fine. Let me tell you one thing then. If the armed forces are unified and there are 11 civilian bosses, the troops listen to one man. Then-like it or not-a military man, a commander-in-chief, will rise above all 11 republics. The armed forces will rise above politics. That is sure to happen. Armed forces and democracy are incompatible. Not because they are bad. A general cannot be a democrat owing to the logic of his post. Unified armed forces herald the end of democracy, the end of independence. Not because Shaposhnikov is bad. Logic is superior to different people's wishes. And if this military flywheel clashes with the logic of life, we are doomed.

To whom are our troops to swear loyalty? Why spend all your time drumming into a Russian that he is to swear an oath of loyalty to the Ukrainian people? The Ukrainian people include another 12 million Russians. Yet he is told: No, swear loyalty to those Russians living in Rostov. Why should he swear loyalty to the Russians of Rostov and not those in Donetsk? They do not say that; they deliberately egg people on, fueling the question of nationality with comments like: You are a stranger here....

[Portnikov]: You accuse Moscow Television of that kind of propaganda, but can it really be independent not just of its own government, but of the thinking of journalists living in Russia?

[Kravchuk]: I do not accuse it of that, but I do say something else. There are 56 hours of broadcasting per week. Divide 56 by 11 and you get six hours per state. I say: Give the Ukraine four hours a week. We will make the programs ourselves. But they don't want that. They want one independent person, as you say, to carry out one person's will. Yet I say, if this is a commonwealth, I must have my four hours and I will say what I want. That is my right. No Yakovlev [head of Moscow Television] can edit me.

[Portnikov]: Do you see a future for the Ukraine within the CIS?

[Kravchuk]: We have gotten accustomed to living with a center-to some extent Russia was decided as the center. Russians have mentally gotten accustomed to everything else being a part of Russia. Today they cannot surmount that barrier and are still acting as if this center still exists. We must tell them firmly and definitely that an independent Ukraine exists, an equal, full-fledged state that decides its policy itself and can only live in friendship with others on these principles. It cannot do so on other principles. We say this publicly and at the negotiating table. Hard as this may be, we have said that the problems of the Black Sea Fleet must be resolved. They did not want that. They wanted the Andreevskiy flag hoisted right away. We said no.... They agreed with us. So, we will gradually teach this great power that everyone is identical-small and great-and that there are no seniors and juniors, large and small. Everyone is equal. When everyone realizes that, we will start to live in harmony. I do not want people to conclude on the basis of any small or even large conflicts that this is the beginning of the end. A very difficult process is under way.

I have said officially and on television that, if we are equal, if we respect one another, if they do not encroach on our independence, and if no one aspires to dictate, no one considers us part of their territory or their people, the Commonwealth will exist. If they do not realize that, the Commonwealth will not be able to be strong. I hope nonetheless that life will make them realize it. If not, life will force us to take a different path. The Ukraine will not renounce its independence, just like Moldova, Belarus, and the other republics, because this constitutes the objective process of mankind's development. Not because some people want it. This is the people's common desire. Anyone who tries to stop it is destined to fail: The people will achieve it sooner or later. I would like this to occur without bloodshed, peacefully, and democratically, so that everyone is aware of this and does not create difficult situations where they do not exist. Ambitions cannot be placed above democracy.

[Portnikov]: I would like finally to diverge from politics. What do you remember when you manage to relax from all these battles, talks, and sessions....

[Kravchuk]: I had a difficult childhood. It was 1939 and reunification was under way. I remember the Soviet troops coming in. I remember collectivization in our village, the livestock being taken away and people crying, not wanting this to happen. Then they were evacuated "to live with the polar bears," as they said then. Then came the war. This also took place before my very eyes. Rovno was bombed, our village was bombed. We hid, first one set of troops came, then another. There were the executions in the church, which I witnessed. I was made to watch them kill Jews-the Hitlerites rounded everyone up to see this to make them afraid and see how they hanged people. I cannot even tell you how many lives were lost before my eyes. I saw the blood and the agony. I cannot convey it. My childhood memories have all this imprinted on them. Now when I am sick and have a fever, I dream of all these dreadful times again and shudder.... When the war ended we only learned in June when news reached our village. And I remember my uncle—my father died on the front—flew into the yard on his horse, his pride and joy, and said: The war is over. Everyone wept and I could not understand why. I was so happy then! That is my most vivid childhood memory—the end of the war. I thought that the sun would shine differently and people somehow would be different.

5.3 Background to Conflict over Crimea Viewed

I. Osokin

From the “Novosti” newscast, Ostankino Television 7 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Editor’s Note: The following document characterizes the intensity of the Russian parliament’s objection to Ukraine’s retention of Crimea. The post-Soviet movement for the return of Crimea to Russia developed with a referendum on 20 January 1991, in which the Crimean population voted for direct links with Moscow. On 23 January 1992 Russia’s parliament, catalyzed by Sergei Baburin, leader of the “Rossiya” faction, voted to challenge the legality of Khrushchev’s transfer of Crimea to Ukraine. They cited the ancient historical background—Catherine the Great’s seizure of Crimea from the Turks in 1772—as support for their decision. In a strict sense Crimea belonged neither to Russia nor to Ukraine, but to the amorphous Russian empire. In 1944 the entire Tatar population (about 200,000) was deported from Crimea in punishment of their alleged collaboration with the Nazis.

Crimea was originally inhabited by the Tatars. Russian troops conquered it at the end of the eighteenth century and the peninsula became part of Russia. In 1954 Khrushchev gave it to the Ukraine and Russia. But there is a new twist to this tale.

The Russian parliament has questioned the legality of the decision to transfer Crimea. Russian parliamentarians proposed that the Ukrainian parliament should also examine this issue. The answer was very harsh. Yesterday's parliamentary resolution says that Crimea is an inalienable part of the Ukraine. The resolution urges that the Helsinki agreements and the principle of the inviolability of existing borders be followed. The Supreme Soviet is reproaching Russian legislators for having committed actions that contravene previously signed treaties. The reproach looks serious; it is true that the agreements on the creation of the Commonwealth speak of the inviolability of existing borders. The Russian Supreme Soviet's decision on Crimea somehow does not really fit into this formula. But on the other hand it must be said that the Ukrainian leaders themselves are to a great extent responsible for the emergence of this issue by laying claim to the Black Sea Fleet. Furthermore, also in violation of agreements that have already been concluded, in the second half of January the Ukrainian General Staff again stated that the entire Black Sea Fleet must be considered as part of the Ukrainian armed forces. Then just after that a document appeared in the Russian Supreme Soviet, which the news agencies called Lukin's memorandum. Lukin is chairman of the parliamentary committee for international affairs. The document proposed that the disputes over Crimea be used to exert pressure on the Ukraine in order to make it renounce its claims to the Black Sea Fleet. And following that Russian legislators did in fact raise the issue of Crimea....

5.4 Ukrainian Leader Opposes Nation Status for CIS

Xinhua (Beijing), 11 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk said today that common work in the Commonwealth of Independent States [CIS] should not deprive Ukraine of independence, because CIS is not a state.

He told Pravda that Ukraine opposes attempts to change CIS into a national entity, but leaders of some CIS members seem to have forgotten this when they sit at the negotiation table.

The president stressed that CIS will have no future as long as there are attempts within CIS to reverse life to the empire times.

Kravchuk said the relationship between Ukraine and Russia should be made a priority because there are 11 million Russians living in Ukraine and 5 million Ukrainians in Russia.

The relations between the two countries are of great significance, Kravchuk said, adding that both sides should do everything possible to coordinate themselves well economically and politically instead of entering into quarrels. Every issue between them should be resolved through negotiation, he said.

Kravchuk complained that some persons around Russian President Boris Yeltsin regard Ukraine as part of an empire and not a sovereign state.

He reaffirmed the position that Ukraine has the right to own part of the Black Sea Fleet and that Crimea is part of Ukraine's territory.

Observers here noted that Kravchuk's statements came at a moment when CIS leaders are going to discuss certain tough problems at a meeting scheduled for 14 February in Minsk.

5.5 Supreme Soviet Statement on Crimea Published

Izvestiya, no. 27, 12 February 1992 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpt

Editor's Note: In 1954, Nikita Khrushchev ceded the Crimean peninsula from Russian to Ukrainian suzerainty, as a symbol of unity on the three hundredth anniversary of the Treaty of Pereslavl, which united Russia and Ukraine. Russian patriots now argue that the territory should be returned to Russia because the "unity" has been broken. Russia's policy on Crimea has been to follow a "divide-and-conquer" approach, similar to that exhibited by Russia in Moldova and Georgia. On 23 January 1992 Russia's parliament rejected the legality of the 1954 transfer of Crimea. Despite Ukrainian attempts to resolve the issue peaceably, by May the Crimean parliament in Simferopol had passed an "act of independence," to take effect if passed by public referendum. Since then, Ukraine and Crimea have lurched from crisis to crisis, with the ethnic Russian population of Crimea leading the militant "Russian Association."

On 1 July 1992 Ukraine passed a law giving Crimea the status of an autonomous entity but prohibiting it from transferring to another country without the approval of both the Ukrainian and Crimean parliaments. This eased the momentum toward a referendum for the moment, but tensions have been high between Ukraine and Crimea ever since. This issue is considered to be potentially the most destabilizing for Ukraine, and perhaps for the whole region.

The Ukrainian Supreme Soviet has asked the newspaper to publish its reply statement.

On 23 January 1992 the Russian Federation Supreme Soviet adopted a resolution in which it instructed Russian Federation Supreme Soviet committees together with the Russian Foreign Ministry to examine the question of the constitutionality of the 1954 decisions on the transfer of the Crimean Oblast from the RSFSR to the Ukrainian SSR [Soviet Socialist Republic] and proposed that the Ukrainian Supreme Soviet also examine this question.

The Ukrainian Supreme Soviet believes that these actions could destabilize the socio-political situation in the Ukraine and Russia.

The Russian Federation Supreme Soviet resolution of 23 January runs counter to Article 6 of the Treaty Between the Ukrainian SSR and the RSFSR of 19 November 1990, Article 5 of the communique on the talks between RSFSR and Ukrainian delegations with the participation of a USSR Supreme Soviet delegation of 29 August 1991, Article 5 of the Agreement on the Creation of the Commonwealth of Independent States [CIS] of 8 December 1991, and the Helsinki Final Act.

The history of our countries does not start in 1954, and the search for the truth in events of the past (particularly if it is a question of territorial problems) does not always lead to peace and concord or serve as a constructive road to the future. The Crimea became part of the Ukraine within the framework of the political and legal structures and the procedures and realities that existed in the former USSR at that time.

The Ukrainian Supreme Soviet confirms its adherence to the Helsinki agreements, particularly the principle of the inviolability of existing state borders, and rejects any territorial claims.

The Ukraine has no territorial claims on neighboring countries and hopes for a similar approach and support from all the Commonwealth states, particularly from the Russian Federation, which has traditionally been friendly toward us, in ensuring tranquillity for the population of the Crimea, which is an inalienable part of the Ukraine with the status of an autonomous republic enjoying full rights.

The Ukrainian Supreme Soviet shows its respect for the Russian Federation Supreme Soviet, understands its problems in creating a sovereign state, and declares its readiness for mutually advantageous, equitable cooperation and for constructive talks on questions whose resolution will be to the good of the Ukrainian and Russian peoples and all the peoples of the CIS.

5.6 Efforts to Preserve Joint Army “Useless”

Anders Steivall

Dagens Nyheter (Stockholm), 14 February 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

The Soviet Union no longer exists. But the member states of the Commonwealth of Independent States [CIS], which has replaced the old union, are still far from through with the division of the property.

The most dangerous thing is left-the division of the armed forces. Strong forces want to retain common defenses for the CIS, but disintegration of the 3.5-million-man army now seems unavoidable.

“All attempts to preserve a common army are useless, if you take the political realities into account,” Ukrainian Defense Minister Konstantin Morozov said in an interview with Dagens Nyheter.

Morozov, an air force general who is himself a Russian, is one of the central figures in a drama which the rest of the world is following with growing concern.

Ukraine, now an independent state with over 50 million inhabitants, has decided on a rapid buildup of its own armed forces.

This has led to increasingly acrimonious relations with Russia, which has 150 million inhabitants and controls the largest part of the old Soviet state's military and economic resources.

The conflict has focused above all on the Black Sea Fleet, to which Ukraine has laid claim but which Russian and the other CIS members want to keep under joint control.

Pessimists see the risk of a devastating civil war between two large nuclear states coming ever closer.

"I am convinced that we will find a compromise. The conflict has been blown up artificially," Morozov said.

Nevertheless, the row over the Black Sea Fleet, which has its home base in the Ukrainian port of Sevastopol on the Crimean Peninsula, and Ukraine's military ambitions have been the flame that has triggered many explosive outbursts from high-ranking officers.

At a stormy meeting in the Kremlin a month ago, the majority of the 5,000 officers present demanded that the armed forces be kept under joint control.

An opinion poll among these officers showed that 71 percent want to restore the Soviet Union which the politicians have abolished.

However, Morozov is not frightened by these threatening noises.

"This is a continuation of the old political line. First people tried to preserve the Communist Party, then they tried to preserve the union. And now, in the face of all sober thinking, they want to preserve the united army."

Together with four other members of the CIS-Belarus, Moldova, Azerbaijan, and Uzbekistan-Ukraine has decided to set up its own armed forces.

It is unclear how large the Ukrainian army will be. There has been talk of everything from 100,000 to 400,000 men.

Ukrainian leaders are trying to reassure the rest of the world by pointing out that what is happening is actually large-scale disarmament. The Soviet forces on Ukrainian territory total around 1.5 million men.

In January the process of transforming the Soviet units into a Ukrainian army began. All soldiers and officers were ordered to swear an oath of allegiance to Ukraine.

The decision caused conflict, because the majority of officers are Russian and the conscripts come from all the former Soviet republics.

However, when it came to the crunch, the drama failed to materialize. So far 90 percent of officers—with the exception of the Black Sea Fleet—have sworn their loyalty to the independent Ukraine.

“The majority of our officers support the political realities with which we are surrounded. Over 350,000 men have already sworn the oath,” Morozov said....

5.7 Fleet Upkeep Requires 500 Million Rubles

From the “Vesti” Newscast, 14 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

A representative of the Ukraine military department has stated that Ukraine is completely financing the upkeep of the Black Sea Fleet. It has allocated 500 million rubles toward this purpose. The money allocated by Russia for these purposes, he said, is not part of Ukraine’s budget and cannot therefore be used for this purpose.

5.8 Moves to Join East European “Triangle” Cited

Andrey Kamorin

Izvestiya, 19 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

“Ukraine’s path to Europe lies across Poland”-these words uttered in Warsaw by D. Pavlychko, representative of the Ukrainian Supreme Soviet Commission for Foreign Affairs, attracted the attention of foreign commentators, primarily because of the contradictory role which the Ukrainian delegation played at the recent meeting of CIS [Commonwealth of Independent States] leaders in Minsk.

The special stand that President L. Kravchuk took at the Minsk meeting on questions of cooperation within the framework of the Commonwealth is in clear contrast with the desire for integration shown by Ukrainian diplomacy in the “Central European salient.” The most vivid manifestation of this course was D. Pavlychko’s statement of Ukraine’s desire to join the so-called “triangle” formed by Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary. Let us elaborate that the “triangle” today does not constitute an organizationally drawn up regional formation. It is merely an agreement among three Central European states to coordinate their actions, primarily in respect of the EC, NATO, and the CSCE. There are also plans to extend economic cooperation, although there is still a long way to go to the formation of a small “Common Market” here.

The Polish Foreign Ministry responded promptly to Pavlychko’s statement, putting out an explanation that it does not seem possible to include Ukraine in the “triangle” at present because it “is at a different stage of postcommunist changes.” So as not to offend the Ukrainians, the Polish foreign policy department did not omit to point to a precedent: Last year’s request by Romania, which was also “delicately rejected.”

This refusal was perfectly predictable: The “triangle” countries, which recently became associate members of the EEC, have advanced quite a long way along the path of integration in all-European structures, and their being joined by a vast state, one that is still tightly “bound” by the knot of contradictions that exist in the CIS, could set this process back by several stages.

It seems, however, that, although they are keeping Ukraine on the threshold of the “triangle,” they are not closing the door in its face. All three member countries have stated their readiness to cooperate with Kiev in implementing specific projects. In particular, Ukraine has been invited to participate together with Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary in the “Jaslo-92” conference, which opens on Saturday [22 February] under the auspices of Lech Walesa.

Obviously, the signing of several quadrilateral Hungarian-Ukrainian-Polish-Czechoslovak agreements this week in the economic and cultural spheres should also be viewed in this context, our Budapest correspondent F. Lukyanov reports. The four countries agreed, in particular, to create free economic zones in regions bordering on each other, to set up a joint bank, and so on. So it cannot be ruled out that the “political geometry” of Central Europe will still change and the involvement of Ukraine here, with its tremendous human and natural potential, could become an important political factor in this part of the continent.

5.9 Retention of Nuclear Weapons Encouraged

Colonel V. Bogdanovskiy

Krasnaya Zvezda, 25 February 1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

The mass media in the western region of Ukraine continues to focus on questions concerned with the formation of Ukrainian armed forces. There is nothing surprising in this. Politicians at various levels regard the army as the structure which will enable an independent state to be built. What kind of army is it to be? If you refer to statements by parliamentarians and the president, their line is unambiguous. The Ukrainian armed forces are a state military structure designed for the armed defense of the republic's sovereignty and territorial integrity against external attack.

Both president and parliamentarians have repeatedly stressed that Ukraine has made the decision to remove tactical nuclear weapons by 1994. Everything seems absolutely clear and precise. However, as the mass media indicate, far from everyone is in agreement with this decision....

Some politicians and military men are ready, as we can see, to reject the concept expressed by the parliament and president of Ukraine, while certain others openly describe it as pacifist.

In particular, Lieutenant General V. Stepanov, commander of the Carpathian Military District, insists that nuclear arms reduction be carried out simultaneously rather than unilaterally in every country in the CIS which has them. While Major General of Aviation V. Antonets, commander of Carpathian Military District Aviation, considers that the threat of nuclear war has not been dispelled in the world and that if you renounce nuclear weapons voluntarily you therefore put yourself in a difficult situation.

5.10 President Kravchuk Explains Monetary Reform

Statement by President Leonid Kravchuk

Ukraine Television and Radio Company 12 November
1992 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Most esteemed compatriots. I am addressing you on an issue, which is very important to all of us, which is really key in implementing anti-crisis measures at the present stage and in implementing economic reforms. This is the reform of the monetary system, which will doubtless occupy a central place in the transition to a market economy....

Some people maintain that the introduction of a national currency would lead to the severing of economic links with partners in Russia and other states of the CIS. But at the same time they do not want to notice that everything that could be severed was severed a long time ago. And now it is necessary to create new links on new principles, and on principles of mutual advantage and partnership, on principles of protecting the interests of one's own people.

Another important point. The ruble has in fact not existed as a single currency for a long time now. Because in every state a significant difference exists in purchasing power. And this means that other levers for influencing the flow of goods between states do not exist either, only administrative interference. And so that extraordinary situation of a practically complete stopping of payments in interstate accounts, which was caused by delaying the introduction of the Ukrainian karbovanets and establishing its real rate in relation to the currencies of other states, has forced us into this. This was the main reason.

This is our opportunity to renew severed links with CIS countries and rebuild them on civilized principles of partnership. In establishing the rate of our own currency in accordance with its realistic purchasing power, we are preventing a multibillion [currency not specified] turnover of speculative capital, which operated as a parasite in making use of a single monetary unit under conditions of a complete difference in the level of prices in Ukraine and other states of the CIS. This is a very important point.

In this way the very introduction of the coupon into non-cash circulation allows us to develop mutually advantageous production links, necessary for the existence of the economy of Ukraine, with other states of the ruble zone. It is for this very matter that we are introducing a policy of internal conversion of the Ukrainian karbovanets in relation to the ruble.

This means that Ukraine is not leaving the economic space of the CIS, but intends only to introduce a system of economic regulation in its trade and economic relations with other states.

In introducing a national currency, Ukraine is entering a new stage of nation-building. It is acquiring the status of a state, which is in complete control of its own economic space. And it is because of this that I am sure that these steps will be perceived with understanding by the citizens of Ukraine, as steps that correspond to their national interests. Naturally, in my short speech I cannot dwell on all the details of the first stage of the monetary reform. But I would like to report that during these past few days members of the government, executives of the National Bank, and leading experts in financial matters, who will throw light on various aspects of the problem, will appear before you.

As president, elected by the people, I want to assure you all, esteemed citizens, esteemed friends, that the population will not incur any losses from the reforms. This is in fact the main purpose of my appearance. I call on everyone to implement this matter in an organized way, responsibly, in conditions of complete mutual understanding and public calm. ...

5.11 Learn How to Reach an Understanding with Russia ...

Rossiyskie Vesti, 18 November 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Prime Minister of Ukraine L. Kuchma paid his first visit to Moscow in his new capacity on 22 October. As a result of negotiations with E. Gaydar, acting chairman of the Russian Federation Government, three agreements were signed: on most-favored-nation status with respect to trade; technical assistance to third countries; and trade representations....

Looking for the proper tone in relations with neighbors-especially Russia-has been proclaimed as another important principle of the Ukrainian prime minister's activities. "We have to reach agreements with Russia on the level of independent states, banks, and enterprises," he believes. "We have to rein in the ambitions of those Ukrainian bureaucrats who yesterday were praying to Moscow and are now spitting on it."

It looks as if this principle will not be easy to apply: Many politicians in Ukraine have reached the pinnacles of power precisely by preaching a break with Moscow. Nevertheless, Leonid Danilovich is set in his intent. "The government will put an end to the 'cold war' with Russia," he says. And, again, he backs it with concrete actions-only nine days after being confirmed in his post he attends negotiations with Egor Gaydar.

Of course, it would have been naive to count on quick progress. Still, there is hope: A Russian-Ukrainian commission has been created; among its priorities will be to discuss the problems of repayment of external debt. There is a visible “light at the end of the tunnel” in other directions as well.

5.12 Kravchuk Accuses Russia of “Interference” on Sevastopol

Aleksey Petrunya

Ukrinform, 9 December 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Ukraine was never opposed to the Commonwealth. It is against its low effectiveness, said head of the Ukrainian state

Leonid Kravchuk. "We would like this organization to act in the interests of all its member states," Kravchuk told a news conference on Wednesday after meeting President of Azerbaijan Abulfaz Elchibey. The two presidents signed a treaty on friendship and cooperation. In Ukrainian-Russian relations, according to Kravchuk, "the main political problems stem from the Russian legislature."

"The Supreme Soviet of Russia decided to reconsider the document of 1954 on the transfer of Crimea to Ukraine and the Congress of People's Deputies of Russia instructed the Supreme Soviet to consider the issue of the status of Sevastopol," he recalled. "This amounts to interference by Russia's supreme legislature into the domestic affairs of Ukraine, including such an important sphere as the territorial integrity of our country."

Kravchuk highly assessed the prospects for cooperation between Ukraine and Azerbaijan. During Wednesday's negotiations, he noted, it was agreed in principle that Azerbaijan will continue deliveries of petroleum products to Ukraine in accordance with current agreements.

"Azerbaijan has concluded an economic agreement with Russia and considers it a strong partner," said Elchibey. "However, relations with Ukraine are a different story. There are many problems, on which our views coincide with those of Ukraine. It is primarily secession from the ruble zone, solution of economic and ecological problems. We also have similar views on issues of territorial integrity of the states. We also have a possibility to exchange experience in agriculture and oil production.”

5.13 Political Bloc Considers Signing CIS Rules “Treason”

Interfax, 26 December 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Right-wing democratic groups in Ukraine have vociferously protested Russia's actions and pronouncements within the CIS. The Congress of National Democratic Forces consisted of eleven democratically oriented political parties in Ukraine, which lobbied Kravchuk not to sign the CIS Charter as written.

To sign the CIS (Commonwealth of Independent States) Rules in the proposed version would be treason to Ukraine—goes a statement issued Friday by the Congress of National- Democratic Forces (CNDF).

“Russia's reactionary forces aim at turning the CIS into a new world empire,” insists the Congress' council. “The proposed rules are no less treacherous than the 1922 treaty and mean a new colonial yoke we'd never be able to throw off.”

The CNDF calls on all the parties and organizations to unite into “an anti-imperialistic democratic front” and urges the president, parliament, and government to refrain from signing the rules and thus protect the act of Ukraine's independence.

The CNDF is a bloc of over ten political parties and movements, including Ukraine's Republican and Democratic parties.

5.14 Europe Orientation Seen as Only Realistic Course

Dmytro Tuzov

Narodna Hazeta, no. 1, January 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

“We Are Europeans”

... We find the beginnings of a European identity as far back as the third century B.C. The Hellenic philosopher, Isocrates, called upon the Europeans to unite against Persia to defend the continent against Asiatic expansion. Isocrates was not heeded, and for many more centuries Europe remained torn between various blocs, alliances, and religious beliefs. The French historian Besancon describes the stratification of Europe as follows: “Historically, there were three Europes: the first, wealthy Europe stretches from Madrid to Vienna through London, Paris, Rome and Berlin. Between the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, there existed a second Europe-less brilliant, poorer, but nonetheless European-which included Poland, the Baltics, Ukraine, and Belarus. At times, Sweden and Hungary were part of this ‘second Europe.’ Muscovy comprises the third Europe-poorer still, remote, and ‘barbarian.’ “(Le Figaro [Paris], 6 September 1991).

The eastern portion of the continent, especially Ukraine and Belarus, is subject to significant influences from this Muscovite “Europe”: the eastern orientation of countries in the so-called Byzantine belt is traditional. Even the ancient Achaeans established ties mostly with Asia Minor, because the dangerous Adriatic lay across the route to the West. This is how Mykhaylo Hrushevskyy defines the strategic error made by Volodymyr the Great: “Volodymyr consciously and energetically pushed Rus’ in this direction [toward Byzantium] ... at that time it was not possible to foresee that Western culture was destined to flourish and Byzantine culture was fated to decline.” Ultimately, Moscow did no more than imitate Babylon, which in its time applied as an instrument of state-building the theory of empire proposed by Zeno the Stoic: “to live not as separate states governed by different laws, but together, under a single system, like a herd that grazes on a common pasture.”

“Spiritual Aggression”

All attempts to interbreed West with East produce only negative results. If the Norman influence on the formation of the English, French, or Ukrainian state is an internal phenomenon, as it were, today the hot eastern wind more often than not carries with it not the wisdom of the Koran or the cosmogony of Ramakrishna, which educated Europe has long known, but the acrid smoke of local and world conflicts and interethnic hostilities. The expansion of the East into geographic Europe has long since passed beyond the benchmark of mutually enriching cultural influences and, instead, recalls spiritual aggression. The export of violence to the continent, especially to Ukraine, is linked to the dividing up of spheres of influence by Asiatic mafias, which, as they set up their legal and illegal businesses, are preparing the infrastructure for new masters and binding the state to their interests with their capital, thereby pushing the state into the opposite direction from Europe—precisely at the time when various dreamers are claiming that we are drawing nearer to the West.

Those Ukrainian politicians who seek “free oil” must realize that Ukraine’s leading position in Asia is illusory. To consolidate such a position, it is necessary to wage wars for centuries with all neighboring states like the wars between Iran and Iraq, in which the participants have long since forgotten what originally caused the outbreak of hostilities. Clearly, we will not be satisfied with the colonial status of a “bamboo democracy,” in which the Asiatics thrive in business, while the indigenous population, most of which still fails to understand the rules of three-card monte, especially in light of privatization by auction, engages exclusively in circulating newspapers. In any case, there exists evidence that cannot be faked that we are part of Great Europe: anthropological, historical, cultural, linguistic, tribal, etc. Someone has even said that every one of our genes shouts Europe. But we also understand something else. There is a limit to how long we can keep relying solely on this evidence. After all, it is not only a case of the Soviets having traumatized the psyche of the population and destroyed its sense of private property, but the depth to which these deformations have penetrated social consciousness. A broken street light is evidence of the mental aberration of one specific person, but the inability to at least stabilize our own economy raises doubts regarding the normalcy of our society as a whole. Being transformed into another Turkey, which is not being permitted to join Europe as its applications to become a member of the EC are methodically rejected, will not only cause moral damage to Ukraine, but will make it more difficult for her to get out from under Moscow's influence.... Russia, whose influence on the European process must certainly not be ignored, is herself confused on the West-East issue.

Incredibly, of all the post-Soviet states, it is Russia that enjoys the highest degree of trust in the West-and not only because of the West's sympathies toward Gorbachev, the reformer of the "evil empire," and Yeltsin, the victor over the State Committee for the State of Emergency, but also as a result of historical factors associated with the Europeanization of the Muscovite empire that began under Peter I and was continued by his successors (especially the German, Catherine II). Not only have the Muscovites skillfully rewritten history, copied the Dutch flag, and refashioned a religious song into a hymn, but they farsightedly invested large sums of money into education, science, and culture. Small wonder that in Europe Russia is not identified with the Lenin epic and with wars of occupation but with the works of Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, and Solovyev. It is this kind of associative thinking that prompted international recognition of Russia as the legal heir of the defunct Union. But even though the elite European club demonstrates in every possible way its openness to new members, in all probability the Russian question will hang in the air for a long time or will be limited to associate membership. It is hardly likely that the EC will risk taking on the burden of the Eurasian giant.

There Is No Alternative

Of course, all this is a matter for the distant future. Today the Community's commissions are determining how much benefit will be derived from membership in the EC of Sweden, Austria, Switzerland, Finland, Ireland, Liechtenstein, and Norway-members of the European Free Trade Association, countries with developed market economies and established democratic systems. The members of the "Vysehrad triangle" [as of 1 January, undoubtedly a quadrangle-Ed.] are knocking with growing urgency at the door of Great Europe: Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia have already become associate members of the Community. The time has come for signing similar agreements with Rumania and Bulgaria. To be sure, the founders of the European union have not yet reached an understanding with the opponents of this union, of whom there are many. Proud old Great Britain is seriously troubled by the likelihood of losing its sovereignty, Denmark rejected Maastricht in a referendum, and all of Europe fears the prospect of waking and falling asleep to the sound of the rousing marches of Germany, which is not likely to abandon its economic hegemony over the continent. Thus when Prime Minister John Major of Great Britain hopes that after a period of time Western Europe will see “strong democracies, moving toward growth and full membership in the EC” in the East, he is not merely being polite. For the first time in many years, “brilliant Europe” has turned its eyes eastward in search of answers to questions about the continent’s future. Will a force be born there that will be able to extend the European vector from London, through Paris, Rome, and Berlin, eastward, and will it help to find the balance that is so badly needed in the whole world today?

Kiev, too, finally has an opportunity to gain an important voice in world politics, but only if it succeeds in ridding itself of its complex of "Hellenistic effeminacy," owing to which the building of statehood was replaced by dreaming and nostalgia for the past "when we were Cossacks." Unique economic reforms must become the foundation of the future Ukraine. New laws must stimulate the growth of production, the introduction of the latest technologies, and the influx of capital. This is not a new path. It is possible to avoid the fate of Third-World countries, the common pasture fought over by external forces, only by accomplishing an economic miracle. We simply have no other alternative.

5.15 Nationalists Reject Russian Cooperation Accord

Molody Ukrainy, 6 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The Ukrainian National Assembly strongly supported President Kravchuk's rejection of a Russian-dominated CIS in 1992 and 1993. At that time, the assembly was still predominantly composed of nationalist parties and movements, and former communist groups loyal to Ukrainian nationalist ambitions.

[“Statement by the Ukrainian National Assembly in connection with the intentions to sign the CIS Charter and the Russian- Ukrainian Agreement on Good-

Neighboring Relations, Cooperation, and Partnership”; issued in Kiev on 1 January.]

The Ukrainian National Assembly fully supports the policy toward full establishment of Ukraine’s statehood and its non-participation in blocs.

Following the decision adopted by Russia’s Supreme Council on the illegal aspect of the 1954 act on the transfer of the Crimea to Ukraine and the discussion of the status of Sevastopol at the recent Congress of Russia’s People’s Deputies, the Ukrainian National Assembly rejects, in principle, the signing of the CIS statute and the agreement “on goodneighboring relations,” until the position on these questions of Russia’s supreme legislative organs is changed.

In international practice, diplomatic relations are broken following such statements, and agreements on friendship or joining common blocs are not signed.

Russia needs the signing of the CIS Charter and the conclusion of a bilateral agreement to continue (using the agreement as cover) interference into Ukraine’s internal affairs.

Ukraine should, on the contrary, take advantage of the still-available openness of the Russian leadership to Western influences and try to attract attention to this matter by demonstratively refusing to sign not only the CIS Charter, but also the Agreement on Cooperation and Partnership between Ukraine and Russia.

[Dated] Kiev, 1 January 1993

5.16 Kravchuk Supports CIS Customs Union

Interview with Ostankino Television 16 April 1993

[FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Editor's Note: By April 1993, President Kravchuk's position on introducing a separate Ukrainian currency had changed. Although he still resisted joining a common CIS "ruble zone," he argued in favor of a "supranational currency." Ukraine's inability to pay its interenterprise debts and its difficulty establishing supplier and producer relationships with other CIS states, especially Russia, were already beginning to seriously threaten the viability of the sovereign state.

[Correspondent]: A question for the president of Ukraine. Leonid Makarovich, at today's meeting it was proposed that some kind of supranational structures be created for improving the coordination of economic cooperation among the CIS states. How do you envisage economic cooperation in the CIS?

[Kravchuk]: Today we did not discuss the question of the creation of supranational structures, but I would support a supranational formula by which a supranational currency would be created. A currency union should be created, for then there would be a currency capable of determining life within the framework of the CIS, of improving the settlement of accounts, of improving all economic ties in mutual payments, regulating financing, banking, and other structures. I would support that, although in questions of economic interaction, consultative, coordinating structures could be created within the framework of economic interaction.

I would like to say a few words since everybody knows my position with regard to the CIS and often link the prospects of the development of the CIS, its strengthening, or as journalists say and write, the disintegration of the CIS, with Ukraine's position.

Today I can state categorically that whether the CIS exists and what sort of entity the CIS is will depend on 25 April.

If Russia goes along the path of reforms, democracy, and strengthening the processes begun in Russia back in 1990, having confirmed this course in August 1991 before the whole world, if the people of Russia and Russia support this course on 25 April, the CIS will exist, will be a democratic formation, and will be a structure which will bring new life to us and to all. I believe that the people of Russia and Russia will stand up and support this course with all their might. If something else should happen-which I don't believe will be the case-then the CIS will not exist. I state this with full responsibility because the forces that are operating there today do not want the CIS but the USSR, and a return to the Union is not possible. Second, if somebody embarks upon that path, then that path will be watered with lots of blood. That can be said with full responsibility.

Therefore, the future of the CIS, its content and prospects, and the democratic future of all our states within the CIS, and not only within the CIS, today depend on 25 April. I am profoundly convinced of this, and I should like to state my conviction-the conviction of a man who has a particular position, and you know what my attitude is to the heads of state: I often criticize them sharply. But today I can say with firm conviction that 25 April will decide the fate of the CIS and the future of our peoples and of our states....

5.17 Ukrainian Cabinet Statement Defends Economic Union with Russia, Belarus

UryadovyyKuryer, 12 August 1993 [FBIS Translation]

[Undated "Statement by the Press Secretary of Ukraine's Cabinet of Ministers"]

Lately, quite often, deliberately or inadvertently, in speeches of some political figures and in the mass media, actions by the Ukrainian Cabinet of Ministers have been represented in a false light, and the position and intentions of Ukrainian Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma regarding the recent signing in Moscow by the heads of the Ukrainian, Russian, and Belarusian governments of the statement on the intention to create an economic commonwealth have been misrepresented. Here, the age-old underhanded machinations and the “telephone right” [decisions made by putting pressure upon officials through telephone calls] are resorted to. Particularly critical passions around this question flared up after the newspapers Uryadovyy Kuryer and Golos Ukrainy published one of the drafts of the “Agreement on the Creation of an Economic Union (Commonwealth).” This created grounds for holding, on 29 July 1993, a “roundtable” of political parties and public organizations where some of the participants in the discussion brutally slandered members of the Ukrainian government and its head. Besides, the publication was not the initiative of the editorial boards or of the Cabinet of Ministers Press Service. Moreover, the published material was a badly formulated draft variant of the document, which is just a Russian Federation proposal. The published text had not been worked on by specialists and, the main thing, it had not been discussed at a Cabinet of Ministers meeting. It did not incorporate the numerous remarks, additions, or corrections without which the Ukrainian government cannot accept the text of the agreement.

In view of the fact that problems with present economic ties and their effectiveness, as well as questions of economic integration, are extremely important and truly strategic for the young Ukrainian state, some politicians and journalists are trying to use them in a biased or openly mendacious manner in their dirty political maneuvers. They depict the actions by the Ukrainian prime minister as his personal position, which contradicts Ukraine's general state policy and interests and is at variance with documents that have been signed by the president of our state.

In this connection, I have been authorized to state this:

1. The actions by Ukrainian Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma that are aimed at intensifying mutual economic ties and economic integration constitute direct fulfillment of instructions of the Ukrainian government that are contained in the declaration adopted by the heads of those states that are members of the Commonwealth of Independent States and in other documents that were signed on 14 May 1993 by presidents of the states, including Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk. It was, in particular, written in these documents: "To authorize heads of governments of those states that are members of the Commonwealth to organize work on preparing corresponding draft documents ... ," and also "Heads of states that are participants in the Commonwealth find it necessary for this purpose to focus the efforts of their governmental structures and organs of the commonwealth on preparing, in the near future, corresponding documents and on making practical steps...."

2. Ukrainian Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma repeatedly stated and reiterates now his position to the effect that he will never sign a document directed against the Ukrainian people's interests or a document that in any way defies the Ukrainian state's sovereignty.

However, the policy aimed at the restoration and further development of mutually advantageous economic ties objectively conforms to the interests of the young Ukrainian state and to the interests of every family and of every citizen of our country, no matter what politicians of various levels and denominations who often know nothing about the economy or true human needs would say.

Besides, and this must be stressed in principle, Leonid Kuchma only signed a statement by the heads of the governments, more specifically, the declaration on intentions-a document that has no legal consequences, does not need to be coordinated with the parliament, but only testifies to the orientation of the government's intention regarding the restoration of precisely economic ties. The draft documents-treaties and accords-are presently being further specified and supplemented taking into account ideas, positions, and points of view or representatives of all branches of power in Ukraine, Russia, and Belarus.

3. The discussion and criticism of practical steps made by the Ukrainian government, as also by governments of any country of the world, must be freely conducted by all political movements, parties, and citizens, but without misrepresentation or deliberate falsification. The press service of the Cabinet of Ministers will continue to react accordingly to all attempts at elucidating the policy of the government and the position of its head in a non-objective or misleading manner.

[Signed] Dmytro Tabachnyk, press secretary of the Ukrainian Cabinet of Ministers

5.18 Further Russian Pressure Expected

Volodymyr Chemerys

Ukrayina Moloda, 29 October 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The results of the elections to Russia's Federal Assemblies will affect the political situation in Ukraine no less than the future composition of our own Supreme Council. For us the dramatic quality of the situation lies in the fact that-even without knowing ahead of time how many seats in the State Duma [Council] the party known as "Russia's Choice" will have, and how many the party of Shakhrai and Volskiy will have-we can already make the following statement: the "war party" will prevail in Moscow. And this will be not merely war in Tajikistan and Georgia, but also economic and (entirely real) military pressure on Ukraine.

The smashing of the White House in Moscow could become a Pyrrhic victory for Yeltsin unless he takes measures to "gain ground" around the Kremlin and assumes the ideological leadership of Russian chauvinism. This is being demanded of him not only by the "strong men" in the government, but also by the Russian Army, whose passivity in October signified a final warning to its own president. Yeltsin's advisors in their most recent broadcasts have been publicly demanding that he answer the following question: Will Russia's federal structure be a model for a future confederation of the former USSR republics?

Whereas victory for the Russian president's partisans in the parliamentary elections is a virtual certainty, a win for Yeltsin himself in the 1994 presidential election is still questionable. The inhabitants of Russia's outlying areas are alien to Gaydar's liberal phraseology and have started to lean toward a revival of the Union. They would welcome a "change of direction" in the Kremlin administration and would suddenly take back their trust in Yeltsin. At the present time, therefore, when Russia has expanded its influence in the Caucasus and Central Asia, we must anticipate that the Kremlin will step up its attacks on Ukraine during the interval of time between 12 December and 12 June. And taking into consideration the fact that the Moscow authorities have been using tough and even fiery language with their internal Russia opponents, we cannot reject the idea that they will now begin to use the language of tanks with Ukraine.

No matter how paradoxical it may seem, the United States is an ally of Russian imperialism. Clinton's statements and the recent visit by Secretary of State Christopher to the CIS countries have demonstrated very clearly that for official Washington the problems of democracy and human rights (among them-the right of a nation to create its own state) are subordinate to interests of state power. These interests demand that the bet be placed-first and foremost-on the force which is dominant in this region. Such a force within the CIS is, of course, Yeltsin's Russia. Therefore, the priority of Russia in American policy is understandable. It is also important to understand something else: why in the trade between the economically strong United States and the economically weak Russia it is the weaker country which is winning. In addition to granting a great deal of financial assistance, American government officials are also engaging in some shadowy dealings to Moscow's advantage. For example, Christopher's stopover in Riga and unequivocal warning to the governments of the Baltic countries; rejecting the Eastern European countries' bid to join NATO; the West's winking at Russia's military intervention in the Caucasus; and—finally—pressure on Ukraine. One gets the impression that the West is permitting Moscow to have its traditional sphere of influence—Eastern Europe and Eurasia, and—in addition to this—is untying Moscow's hands in this part of the world. A consequence of such a policy could be the revival of a state or quasi-state creation similar in form to the Russian Empire or the USSR, which—despite its dependence on Western aid—would be neither pro-Western nor pro-American. After gathering its strength, Russia would emerge from under the West's control. Whether Washington has an alternative to this course of events is not clear.

However, there are already tendencies which could be detrimental to the above-mentioned development of events. One of the persons expressing such tendencies is U.S. Secretary of Defense Les Aspin, who has called for a slowdown in granting Russia membership in NATO. Perhaps he is genuinely amazed at Ukraine's nuclear weapons, or it is possible that his eyes were opened by the many speeches made by the former Ukrainian defense minister, Morozov, during the latter's visit to America. A further obstacle to Moscow's expanding influence is Tajikistan, where the Russian Army could be bogged down, just as it formerly was in Afghanistan. Another interesting variant is likewise possible-a split in the ranks by some of the independent players in Western Europe, primarily Germany, whose interests are far from identical with America's interests.

One way or another, Russia's expansion is already proceeding in all directions, and none of the above-named variants is capable of stopping it without Ukraine's participation. The latter is the only one of the Eastern European countries which has the potential capacity to oppose Russia. Moreover, there is no longer any choice for Ukraine: If Russia continues to follow its presently clear channel, sooner or later Ukraine will lose its sovereignty.

Nowadays the possibility of foreign-policy maneuvering has been narrowed down for Ukraine in comparison with 1992. At that time there was a possibility of creating a bloc of certain former USSR countries around Kiev; and-as a result of this-Russia would have lost the mechanism for influencing its neighbors through the CIS. Today, however, Georgia and Azerbaijan have been driven to their knees and they are no longer Ukraine's allies. The non-intervention by official Kiev and the intervention by the UNSO [Ukrainian People's Self-Defense Forces] in the Dniester regional conflict have led to a strain in the relations between Ukraine and Moldova, along with the appearance of the Dniester Republic as a Russian staging area for penetrating Ukraine. Our government's absolute passivity with regard to establishing contacts with Eastern Europe (the Baltic states, Poland, and Hungary) has deprived Ukraine of further natural allies; the strengthening of these countries would not have been to Russia's liking at all. If we add to all this the demoralizing influence of the Masandrivka Protocols, the following conclusion may be drawn: The Ukrainian leadership is not prepared to protect and defend our national interests.

It cannot be said, however, that nothing is being done in Kiev to counteract the pressure from the East and West. These days Ukraine's nuclear arms constitute a kind of card game which is played by the president and the Supreme Council every time we have visitors from across the ocean: Kravchuk assures them of his readiness to get rid of the nuclear warheads, whereas Plyushch performs the thankless task of putting the brakes on the president's intentions. During Christopher's visit Speaker Plyushch, by strongly adopting the ideological stance abandoned by Konstantin Morozov, assumed the function of the principal opponent of the American emissary.

It is understandable that Ukraine intends to do everything possible to retain its nuclear weapons-practically its sole guarantee of the existence of an independent state and its stability. But the method of retaining them-playing a game around the ratification of SALT-1, unsupported by political or economic steps-is a strategical loser. Only future elections in Ukraine will be able to change the state of affairs. To vote for those forces which are ready to protect the national interests and capable of proposing a concept of an independent foreign policy, and, at the same time, advocates of democracy and economic reforms: No other choice remains for the citizens of Ukraine.

5.19 Further Kravchuk, Plyushch Comments [on Russian Military Doctrine]

Interfax, 5 November 1993 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpts

“There has never been a precedent set in the world whereby a state would defend people of any nationality if they are citizens of another state,” Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk said while commenting on the statement, at the request of journalists, of the Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev on the need to defend the Russian-speaking population in other countries. The Ukrainian president pointed out, referring to Grachev’s words, that the recently adopted Russian military doctrine contains this statement.

Kravchuk also said that, as he believes, “nationality has a subordinate meaning with respect to citizenship.” If one adheres to this principle, he added, “there is no need to defend anybody.” “Ukraine will defend Russians living in Ukraine,” he emphasized.

At the same time the Ukrainian president recognized that he had not seen the official text of the Russian military doctrine. “I don’t think that Russians have overstepped all norms of civilized behavior and humanism by writing in their doctrine that they have the right to use nuclear weapons first,” he declared.

Chairman of Ukraine’s Supreme Soviet Ivan Plyushch who was present at this conversation indicated that “one can understand when somebody asks for security but not when somebody proposes it.” In his words, “there is no need to defend the Russian-speaking population in Ukraine.” “I do not know of any case where a Russian addressed us with a request to defend him,” he underlined ...

5.20 Kravchuk on Intent to Possess High-Precision Arms

Ustin Gritsenko

Kommersant-Daily, 10 June 1994 [FBIS Translation]

It has become possible in the course of the ongoing talks on “the division of the Black Sea Fleet” to produce a draft agreement under which Russian ships would after all be deployed in Sevastopol. Kiev, according to Russian Ambassador to Ukraine Leonid Smolyakov, agrees to this in principle. But Leonid Kravchuk, forced to make concessions that do not add luster to his image as a “patriot,” put forward a new slogan in the course of his Zhitomir tour. In his words, “Instead of nuclear missiles Ukraine intends to have highprecision arms.”

The latest round of Black Sea Fleet talks discussed the division of not only the bases but also the shore-based infrastructure. By the start of the discussions, which moved from Sevastopol to Kiev, the experts, according to Admiral Feliks Gromov, commander-in-chief of the Russian Navy, had “basically determined” the parameters in accordance with which the division of ships will take place. Members of the delegations were briefed on the results of this work. Some, of course, had more ideas “up their sleeve,” hearing which Admiral Gromov thinks, “Different points of view on separate questions cannot be ruled out.” Agreement on Sevastopol, though, was on the whole sewn up. The programs for further talks include the division of the remaining naval bases along the Crimean coast.

Considering that the talks on the Black Sea Fleet would hardly be over by 26 June (election date), Kravchuk avoided serious statements about dividing the fleet. But on the other hand, he told the officers and cadets of the Zhitomir Air Defense Radio Electronics Higher Military School about new prospects of boosting the republic's military might. He pointed out that in Ukraine (as also "in Russia, and in the United States") "scientific exploration" is under way to develop some sort of "high-precision weapon with assigned parameters." Leonid Makarovich [Kravchuk] did not go into details, hinting vaguely that this weapon "is capable of engaging installations that carry danger and of protecting from weapons of mass destruction, nuclear weapons included." It is this secret weapon that Ukraine intends to add to its arsenal "instead of the nuclear missiles that are being destroyed." Interestingly, Kravchuk divulged this "military secret," attesting to the president's tireless care about the army and the military-industrial complex, precisely in the homestretch of the election race and precisely before the grateful audience of a military school. In the course of the Zhitomir tour, however, he also spoke to the workers of a woodworking combine (prospects of the sector's growth), and to those who work in agriculture (also prospects, but those concerning agriculture). Should Kravchuk continue to concentrate on similar problems (avoiding the less-than-advantageous subject of the Black Sea Fleet), there may appear a chance for Russia and Ukraine finally to agree about the fleet.

5.21 Kuchma Gives Inauguration Speech

Kiev Radio Ukraine World Service 19 July 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Inauguration speech by President Leonid Kuchma at the Supreme Council in Kiev-live relay]

Dear compatriots, esteemed foreign guests. Today's event is proof that the Ukrainian state lives, is getting on its feet, and is consolidating itself in the world. I would first like to thank you, the electorate, for placing such a high trust in me and electing me as the president of Ukraine. I am deeply grateful to the people of Ukraine for demonstrating such a high civic consciousness, for not being indifferent to the fate of the motherland, and for carrying out a civilized and democratic restoration of political power at the center and in the localities.

I would like to express thanks to the Supreme Council of Ukraine which, through legislation, guaranteed the process of political transformation on the principles of democracy and steadfastly abided by human rights, peace, and progress. I give due regard to Leonid Makarovych Kravchuk, who took the first difficult steps on the path of establishing Ukrainian statehood. During the elections the people of Ukraine expressed their desire to live in their own state. However, they would like Ukraine to be prosperous, democratic, and powerful.

Ukrainian statehood cannot be an end in itself. A state is for the people and not a people for the state. It is precisely this faithful thesis which should become our conviction and should be filled with real content. A state that is incapable of defending its citizens from spiritual and material impoverishment is worth nothing.

The Ukrainian state is not an icon to which one should pray. It is an exceptionally important institution which should work effectively in the interests of people and serve them. I am convinced that the entire state building should be subordinate to the task of economic and spiritual revival. As president of Ukraine, I see my main tasks as providing the citizens of Ukraine with safety, social protection, stability, and creating the conditions for cultural development and a dignified life on one's native land. First, though, it is necessary to renew the legal system. The torrent of irresponsibility and crime that has taken over Ukraine should be stopped. We should not allow crime, while fusing with part of the administrative apparatus, to seize power in Ukraine one step at a time. Measures are necessary, and I will take particularly tough ones in the near future, which the legislative base correspondingly allows. There will also be an end to the plundering of Ukraine.

Ukraine stands on the threshold of essential changes in its economic and political course. The need for such changes was confirmed by the people's active participation in the elections. People have placed the responsibility for conducting reforms on the single entire system of executive power headed by the president. I would like to assure you that I intend to persist with this aspiration and to use fully the powers given to me to conduct such reforms. A single realistic path has been created to overcome the socio-economic crisis in which the Ukrainian economy finds itself.

The time for reform came long ago. Its directions were determined. The main ingredient, the political will to implement it, was lacking. It will be necessary to demonstrate this will now. Marking time means death for the Ukrainian economy and the Ukrainian state. Only immediate and resolute actions by the authorities, implementation of budgetary and monetary reform, liberalization of taxation policy, bringing order to the currency regulation, and foreign economic activity can correct the situation. Reform should ease the people's lives, so it should be well thought out.

Ukraine can only exist as a social state, in which the strong are given the possibility of fulfilling themselves, and the weak are given social protection. If today, during the difficult transition period, the state does not give people more substantial support, then science, health care, culture and the life of the nation itself will end up under threat of final destruction. Under these conditions, ensuring the stability of the state should be a fundamental issue for Ukraine's political leadership. The policy of the president and government should be comprehensible to people and it should be consistent. People should again have the opportunity to look to the future with hope.

As president of Ukraine I will do everything possible to consolidate the nation and to overcome everything that violated the Ukrainian state's internal stability. This is the situation in Ukraine today. Therefore, one has to act quickly but carefully. The state does not have time for experiments, and the people do not have the strength or patience for them. I have always said, and repeat now: Our aim is not revolution, but systematic, resolute, and consistent renewal of the economic and socio-political system in Ukraine. The main means to achieve this are realism and common sense in both domestic and foreign policy.

When determining domestic political strategy today, what should first be understood is that Ukraine is a multiethnic state. Any attempts to disregard this fact threatens a deep split in our society and the failure of the idea of Ukrainian statehood. Ukraine is mother to all of its citizens, regardless of nationality or religion, regardless of what they consider to be their native language. In the near future I intend to propose a change to the current legislation with the aim of granting official status to the Russian language, while the Ukrainian language retains its state status.

[Applause]

We should repay our debts to Ukrainian culture, while simultaneously creating the best conditions for the free development of the national cultures of all people who live on the territory of Ukraine. We should consolidate, not break up, society at this critical moment in Ukrainian history. To work honestly for the good of Ukraine, for the glory of Ukraine: This is the main demand, which should be put to all of the citizens of our state.

Without a doubt, the conditions, without which reforms or any movement forward are impossible, are the formation of a strong and effective state power. This envisages the strengthening of a single executive vertical structure as the fundamental instrument for implementing statewide policy. At the same time, relations between all branches of power should be stabilized. The president, Supreme Council, and judicial authority should have one aim so that nothing hinders our common activity on behalf of the people.

The absolute priority of the constitution should be acknowledged in relations between bodies of power. Its clauses cannot be changed unilaterally. I repeat, its clauses cannot be changed unilaterally without mutual agreement. Taking into account the main political realities and the dynamics of socio-economic and political processes in our society, I, as president, consider it necessary to resume the constitutional process, having first elaborated in detail the mechanism for implementing it.

The other objective reality, in relation to which Ukraine's domestic policy will be determined, is the need for further development of local self-government and the extension of regions' rights and responsibilities, above all in the socioeconomic sphere. Market reforms are incompatible with tough administration, especially when it comes from one center. The competence and responsibility of all bodies of state power and the strengthening of various levels of administration should be clearly consolidated legally.

Ukraine will keep the continuity of its foreign policy in that part relating to its international obligations. It will steadfastly fulfill agreements and demand the same attitude from its partners. At the same time adjustments will be made to foreign policy so as to make Ukraine's international policy more dynamic and effective. Its efficiency should be determined not by the number of visits and agreements, but by concrete political and economic results.

The priorities of Ukraine's foreign policy should not be determined by ideology, but by the nationwide interests of our state. In concrete terms this means that realism, specificity, and pragmatism should replace political romanticism and euphoria and a certain vagueness, characteristics of the initial period of state-building.

Historically Ukraine is part of the Euro-Asian economic and cultural space. Ukraine's vitally important national interests are concentrated on this territory of the former Soviet Union now. These are also sources of necessary goods, raw materials, and energy-carriers. It is the most realistically accessible market for the products of Ukrainian producers. We are also linked with those countries, former republics of the Soviet Union, by traditional scientific, cultural, informational, and even family ties. Millions of Ukrainians permanently reside there. Ukraine's self-isolation and its voluntary refusal to campaign vigorously for its own interests in the Euro-Asian space was a serious political mistake, which caused great damage, above all to the national economy.

We should not simply be present in the Commonwealth of Independent States but should learn actively to influence policies within the Commonwealth and resolutely defend our own interests, while clearly not forgetting about our partners. If we will not take part in the established rules of the game then those rules will nevertheless be set but without us and to the detriment of our interests. I am convinced that Ukraine can assume the role of one of the leaders of Euro-Asian economic integration and establish civilized, mutually favorable relations between interested parties. In this context the normalization of relations with Russia, our strategic partner, is of principal significance. The signing of a comprehensive and broad treaty on economic cooperation with the Russian Federation, whose preparation is practically complete, could become the first step in this direction.

This treaty should also become a good basis on which to resolve those political and economic absurdities that have accumulated in mutual relations between Ukraine and Russia. Relations with Western countries should be filled with a new realistic content. We should be sincere and ready for fruitful cooperation with all countries and with every one of them individually. It is necessary to move from exchanging declarations to full economic cooperation as soon as possible and to abolish decisively the obstacles that have been devised. Particular attention will be paid to cooperation with those countries and international economic organizations that display true business interests in Ukraine as a developed industrial state. Our aim is to integrate with the international economic system, not as a deindustrialized raw material appendage but as a partner with full rights.

Dear compatriots, I do not have answers to every question because that is impossible. It was not in vain that Winston Churchill said that people who have all of the answers are not to be trusted with the leadership of the state. I have never promised and do not promise now that all our misfortunes will come to an end tomorrow. The economic and social situation has greatly deteriorated during the last six months. The country is almost on the verge of an economic catastrophe. In order to prevent it, it will be necessary to adopt difficult and unpopular measures. On no account must we succumb to the temptation of implementing pseudostabilization by means of cosmetic measures, close our eyes to the existing crisis, and deceive the people. At any rate, we are obliged to stop the slide into the abyss and the march to nowhere. It is only when we stop this fateful process of degradation, the dying out of our economy and society, that we will begin to stand on our feet and only then will we have a future.

I would like all citizens to know that there will be difficult trials and that not all of our misfortunes and our shortages have come to an end. But I assure you that I will do everything to change the situation. I am deeply convinced that we will attain this. The personal commitment and responsibility of the president of Ukraine will guarantee this. We will also survive the difficult autumn and winter. Ukraine will undergo the last and the most difficult period of trials, and we will have a country worthy of our industrious people, of our glorious past, and of our children and grandchildren. Only joint work and respect for laboring people will give abundant fruit....

5.22 Dubinin-led Delegation Arrives in Kiev for Talks

Interfax, 11 August 1994 [FBIS Translation]

A Russian government delegation led by special envoy Yuriy Dubinin arrived in Kiev on 11 August. The delegation will hold talks on the drafting of a treaty of friendship and cooperation between Ukraine and Russia.

Dubinin said he had arrived in Kiev in a good mood and hoping for constructive work. “We need to put on paper what has developed over many decades,” he said.

According to Interfax-Ukraine, the two sides intend to discuss concrete provisions for the treaty between the two countries, including the provision on dual citizenship.

Ukrainian legislation does not provide for granting dual citizenship to the republic’s inhabitants. But some Russian politicians insist on including the provision in the treaty.

It is expected that Dubinin will make a statement to journalists on 12 August on the results of the talks.

5.23 “No Change” in Stance on CIS Security System

Interfax, 17 August 1994 [FBIS Translation]

“There have been no changes in Ukraine’s position on the collective security system of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), nor are any changes expected in it,” the Ukrainian president’s official spokesman, Mikhail Doroshenko, said, commenting on media reports that the Ukrainian Armed Forces Chief of Staff Anatoliy Lopata has suggested stronger military ties with other CIS countries.

At a news briefing in Kiev on Wednesday, Doroshenko cited a statement made by Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma at a recent news conference he held jointly with his Kazakh counterpart, Nursultan Nazarbaev, to the effect that Ukraine would closely consider Kazakhstan’s proposals for more intensive integration within the Commonwealth. Kuchma, however, is not in a hurry to make up his mind about these proposals, the spokesman said.

Kuchma, at the same news conference, suggested giving priority to CIS economic integration.

5.24 Parliament Ratifies NPT with “Reservations”

Viktor Demidenko and Mikhail Melnik

ITAR-TASS, 16 November 1994 [FBIS Translation]

The Ukrainian legislators ratified the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty [NPT] by a majority vote on Wednesday. Ukraine joins the treaty with reservations, which we adopted in a law. The treaty “does not cover in full the unique situation which emerged after the USSR collapsed Ukraine's amendment states. The lawmakers also issued supplementary statement to the law.

Although Ukraine owns nuclear weapons it acquired from the USSR, these weapons will be dismantled and disposed of under state control to prevent reuse of nuclear material "Ukraine will use nuclear materials exclusively for peaceful purposes," the statement said.

However, the presence of nuclear weapons on Ukrainian territory as well as their proper maintenance until the complete elimination does not run counter to Articles 1 and 2 of the treaty.

Ukraine will deem any attempt at violating her borders territorial integrity by any nuclear power "as emergency circumstances which jeopardize her top priority interests.

The law on Ukraine's joining the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty will come into effect upon all the party state signing an international legal document to guarantee her security.

5.25 Text of Resolution [on Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty]

Kiev Radio Ukraine World Service 16 November 1994
[FBIS Translation]

[Text Resolution by Supreme Council, detailing reservations to Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, adopted in principle, at Supreme Council session in Kiev-live]

The law of Ukraine on Ukraine's accession to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty dated 1 July 1994.

On the basis of the provisions in the Declaration on State Sovereignty of Ukraine of 16 July 1990:

statements by the Supreme Council of Ukraine on additional measures with regard to guaranteeing Ukraine's acquisition of non-nuclear status of 9 April 1992;

resolutions of the Supreme Council of Ukraine on ratifying the agreement between the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics and the United States on the reduction and limitation of strategic offensive weapons, signed on 31 July 1991 in Moscow, and the protocols attached to it, signed on behalf of Ukraine on 23 May 1992 in Lisbon, of 18 November 1993 and resolutions of the Supreme Council of Ukraine on the implementation by the president of Ukraine and the government of Ukraine of the recommendations contained in Point 11 of the resolution of the Ukrainian Supreme Council on the ratification of the agreement between the USSR and the United States on the reduction and limitation of strategic offensive weapons, signed on 31 July 1991 in Moscow, and the protocols attached to it, signed on behalf of Ukraine on 23 May 1992 in Lisbon, of 3 February 1994; the Supreme Council resolves:

To accede to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty of 1 July 1968, with the following reservations:

1. The provisions of the treaty do not completely embrace the unique situation which has arisen as a result of the collapse of the nuclear state of the USSR;
2. Ukraine is the owner of the nuclear weapons inherited by it from the former USSR. After the dismantling and destruction of the given weapons under its control, and according to the procedures which will exclude the possibility of reusing nuclear materials which are components of these weapons, according to their primary purpose, Ukraine intends to use the aforementioned materials exclusively for peaceful purposes;

3. Until the nuclear weapons are completely liquidated, and also until corresponding work on maintaining, servicing, and liquidating the nuclear weapons is carried out, the presence of nuclear weapons on Ukrainian territory does not contravene Articles 1 and 2 of the treaty;

4. The threat or use of force against the territorial integrity and inviolability of the borders or the political independence of Ukraine on the part of any nuclear state, and equally, the use of economic pressure aimed at subjugating to its own interests the exercising by Ukraine of rights inherent in its sovereignty, will be regarded by Ukraine as exceptional circumstances that have threatened its highest interests;

5. The documents on Ukraine's accession to the treaty will be passed to the depositary countries after it has come into effect by means of this law;

6. This law takes effect once Ukraine receives security guarantees from the nuclear states formulated by means of signing a corresponding international legal document with Ukraine.

Kuchma Addresses Parliament on Accession

Kiev Radio Ukraine World Service 16 November 1994
[FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Address by Ukrainian president Leonid Kuchma on Ukraine's accession to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) to a Supreme Council session in Kiev]

In the USSR on the wave of perestroika we were called an African country, with the one difference that we had nuclear weapons. I do not know what they will call us because we have missiles with nuclear warheads that are beyond their expiration date. For this reason, I would like to turn to you, esteemed deputies, with a request to give me a little more time for my speech.

[Supreme Council Speaker Moroz]: Does anyone disagree with this?

[Deputies]: No.

[Kuchma]: Esteemed chairman, deputies. In addressing this problem I would like to remind you all that world experience has proven that people will forgive politicians for everything apart from untruths. The truth is that Ukraine today does not have the choice of being nuclear or non-nuclear. The choice has been made by the activity of the previous and present parliament, and by virtue of Ukraine's international obligations, and finally by the actual situation. The situation is as follows: The course of the world process of nuclear disarmament depends on our decision today. If we have decided to trade with the world community then we have chosen the most unfavorable moment and the most unsuccessful item of trade. We will surprise the civilized world, since the decision on the accession to the treaty is the concluding stage that logically is conditioned by all the previous political acts approved by the Supreme Council of Ukraine in 1994. This is the declaration on the state sovereignty of Ukraine that was mentioned today, the statements of the Supreme Council on the non-nuclear status, the resolution of the Supreme Council on the ratification of START I, and the Lisbon protocol that envisages Ukraine's accession to the NPT and the trilateral statement of 14 January 1994 that was also approved by the Supreme Council, in accordance with which the withdrawal of warheads to Russia will actually be carried out in two and a half years. This prevents them being used by Ukraine. Any further delay in resolving this issue would, in my view, cause the whole world community to stop dealing with us as a country that does not know how to honor its obligations.

So what are the gains that those politicians of ours who are effectively obstructing the process of accession or, what is more, coming out for Ukraine's nuclear status, are hoping for? Are they national security or the political and economic advantage and benefit?

I will remind those who, in a flight of artificial patriotism, have forgotten that Ukraine not only has no respective production, cannot use nuclear weapons in defense terms, and cannot even make use of the nuclear warheads inherited by it for power engineering purposes, because the dismantling of warheads, in accordance with nuclear safety requirements, is possible exclusively at the enterprises that manufactured them, i.e., in Russia, which was also recorded in the trilateral statement by the three states. Experts estimate that the creation and improvement alone of a safekeeping system for the nuclear weapons, which are present on our territory, can cost between $10-30 billion. That is as far as the economic benefit is concerned, as it were.

As for production of our own, to complete the nuclear warheads production cycle requires the investment of at least $160-200 billion over 10 years, which was also something that was recalled here today and was set down in the notice handed to you. So have we any choice, as we are trying to make out to the people?

Who from the advocates of nuclear games will stand up now and say who needs to sell and mortgage all of Ukraine's belongings in order instead to bring it the happiness of a nuclear arsenal of its own? ...

5.26 Kuchma Writes to Shevardnadze on Cooperation, CIS

Sakinform 29 December 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Eduard Shevardnadze has received a letter from Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma. In particular, the letter says that seeking efficient ways to overcome the economic crisis, stabilize home policy, and increase the standards of living of the population is a major task for Ukraine, Georgia, and other CIS countries. The letter says that in its striving to implement economic reforms, Ukraine considers developing the comprehensive cooperation with Georgia and other CIS countries as a matter of particular importance. "With regard to this, I support your idea within the United Nations, other international organizations, and the CIS," Leonid Kuchma writes. He emphasizes that he regards regular Ukrainian-Georgian consultations at the highest level as useful and therefore gratefully accepts Eduard Shevardnadze's invitation to visit Georgia.

5.27 Presidential Assistant States Political Priorities

Rayisa Stetsyura

Uryadovyy Kuryer, 7 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

"Ukraine's external political course will be oriented toward cooperation with CIS countries, first and foremost with Russia." This was stated by the Ukrainian president's first assistant at a briefing on 4 January at the Ukrainian Presidential Administration building. He believes that, this year, "the Russian factor in mutual relations will be a determining one for our country." Oleksandr Razumkov is convinced that Ukraine will sign a large-scale agreement on friendship and cooperation with Russia in the near future and that all problems regarding the Black Sea Fleet will be resolved.

In his opinion, Ukraine must exert maximum effort to raise Ukrainian-Russian relations to a qualitatively new level. This not only concerns the political aspect. Oleksandr Razumkov stressed that the idea of creating transnational corporations, with the participation of CIS countries, is very promising. It will also make it possible to avoid many political problems.

The first assistant to the Ukrainian president believes that such problems must also be urgently resolved within the state. A reorganization of state power must become the first step in this direction, as it will have a beneficial effect on economic processes. In Oleksandr Razumkov's opinion, they will be successful, provided that the vertical structure of executive power is clearly defined and a legal venue is created to rule out contradictions between the legislative and executive powers. This must be taken care of by the constitutional bill "On State Power and Local Self-Government in Ukraine."

5.28 Kuchma Warns 1995 Will Be Toughest Yet for Economy

Interfax, 12 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: During late 1993 and 1994 confusion and delay characterized the economic reform program in Ukraine. Most of the communist-dominated parliament objected to private property and distrusted far-reaching economic reform, preferring to continue state subsidy policies that could bankrupt the economy.

When Kuchma entered office in June 1994 he began to tackle the economy and to enforce sound fiscal and financial practices. The short press account below characterizes briefly the Ukrainian economic crisis.

“The year of 1995 will be the most difficult for the Ukrainian economy,” Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma told the editors-in-chief of the regional media in Zhitomir today.

Kuchma said that “either the situation will be changed for the better or we will face a complete crash.” “We have no more reserves,” he added.

Commenting on the draft state budget for 1995, Kuchma said it would be “the toughest one compared to all past years.” He said “allocations will be directed only to vital needs, including social security, law enforcement, health care, the army, and some others.” Kuchma said he did not intend to boost money supply and resolve economic problems by raising inflation.

Kuchma said the Ukrainian leaders planned to cancel “numerous tax privileges.” Furthermore, he said that in 1994 the total tax waivers amounted to 268 trillion karbovantsy, decreasing budget revenue by 38 percent.

5.29 Kuchma Adviser: Russia “Apparently” Halts Pact Talks

INFOBANK (Lvov), 13 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: By January 1995, it had become obvious to observers of the CIS countries that both the “war party,” which had prevailed in Russia’s policy toward Chechnya, and the national patriots, who essentially reject the Belovezh process in its entirety, were prevailing over Russian policy toward the CIS. These groups, which form the core of the Russian great power advocates, stalled the final signing of a bilateral agreement between Russia and Ukraine designed to improve relations between the two states by resolving the outstanding debt, territorial, and naval forces issues which continue to be a source of intense subteranean pressure. Were the agreement to be signed, it would go far to legitimize the Ukrainian state, despite its troubles, but the Russian patriots of Russia's supreme legislature-the State Duma-had not yet accepted this change in the post-Soviet geopolitical order. It could, judging from the insights and the attitude expressed in the following article, take a very long time for Russia to accept the realities of Ukrainian sovereignty.

At a briefing on 11 January, Dmytro Tabachnyk, chief of the presidential administration, stated that as of today, 90 percent of the text of a wide-ranging agreement between Ukraine and Russia has been accepted by the two sides. Nonetheless, the agreement is not likely to be signed in the very near future. Mr. Tabachnyk further stated that Russia has apparently decided to temporarily halt the negotiation process.

No consultations regarding this agreement have been held between Kiev and Moscow since the beginning of the year. Oleg Soskovets, a deputy prime minister in the Russian government, postponed his trip to Kiev, scheduled for late December, citing as a reason the complex situation in Chechnya. Mr. Soskovets was due to discuss the final wording of the text with Yevhen Marchuk, the Ukrainian deputy prime minister. Afterwards, the Russian Foreign Ministry issued a statement, in which it denounced the presence of Ukrainian mercenaries in Chechnya. Although it is well known that mercenaries from various countries are actively fighting in the Chechen war zone, the Russian Foreign Ministry decided to single out Ukrainian mercenaries. Perhaps Russia is, indeed, looking for a pretext to cancel any further talks on the subject of the nearly completed agreement as beneficial to Ukraine, since it will become yet another guarantee of Ukraine's security interests.

Once Yeltsin and Kuchma sign this document, the negotiations regarding the Crimea and the Black Sea Fleet immediately acquire a different character. In accordance with this agreement, Russia will only be able to lease the naval ports and facilities on the Crimean coast. Moreover, any further discussion on issuing Russian passports to the residents of the Crimean peninsula will be simply meaningless. At a time when Yeltsin is facing growing opposition at home to Russia's military invasion in Chechnya, the chances of concluding a Russian-Ukrainian agreement seem even more remote. Besides, Ukraine has yet to conclude an agreement on friendship and cooperation with Romania, whose territorial claims to Ukrainian soil are somewhat rhetorical in nature and, in any event, by far less intimidating than Russia's.

5.30 Declaration on Prospects for Cooperation Between Ukraine, Georgia

Uryadovyy Kurier, 19 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: As the war in Chechnya heated up and tensions between Russia and Ukraine smoldered, especially those connected with Ukraine's attitude toward genuine CIS integration along the lines espoused by President Yeltsin and other Russian politicians, Ukraine continued to seek out alliances with former Soviet republics and Western states. Such alliances, it is hoped, will buttress Ukraine's claims to independence and help Ukrainian leaders find support for their position in CIS debates.

[Text of declaration signed by Leonid Kuchma of Ukraine and Eduard Shevardnadze of Georgia:

“Declaration on Prospects for Cooperation Between Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia and for a Joint Approach to Foreign Relations Issues, Tbilisi, 9 January 1995.”]

Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia, striving to ensure the positive development of bilateral relations and to define the priorities of future cooperation, in order to endow this cooperation with the necessary dynamism on the basis of the Agreement on Friendship, Cooperation, and Mutual Assistance Between Ukraine and Republic of Georgia, confirming the historical and spiritual closeness of the peoples of Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia, recognizing that the existence of the democratic, sovereign, and territorially integral states of Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia is of fundamental importance to international security and to the strengthening of interstate cooperation and [effecting] historical changes in the system of international relations, · recognizing in particular the importance of wide-ranging friendly relations between Ukraine and Georgia for strengthening international security in the Black Sea region and in the Caucasus, as well as in the Eurasian corridor,

- based on the shared conviction and resolve of Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia to extend democratic processes and steadfastly proceed along the path of economic market transformations and civil accord in society,

- upholding the principles of equal and mutually beneficial interstate economic cooperation within the framework of the CIS and to the same degree with European and other international economic organizations and groupings,
- reaffirming their dedication to the universally recognized objectives and principles of the UN Charter, the Helsinki Final Act, and other fundamental documents of the CSCE,
- have signed this Declaration in order to build up friendly bilateral relations between them and to coordinate joint approaches to important issues in international relations, such as:

1. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia welcome the historic prospects that the restoration of state independence and sovereignty has afforded each of them with respect to their national rebirth and democratic development. They each steadfastly support the efforts of the other to create a society founded on the supremacy of law and full respect for the rights and fundamental freedoms of the individual.

2. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia attach great importance to the Agreement on Friendship, Cooperation, and Mutual Assistance that they concluded, the value of which has been demonstrated since the time that it was signed and ratified by the parliaments of both states.

3. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia will continue to expand the legal basis of bilateral cooperation for the purpose of comprehensively promoting the development of traditional economic, cultural, scientific-technical, and other relations.

4. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia believe that the principles of territorial integrity, inviolability of borders, peaceful settlement, and non-use of force or threats of force—together and in integral conjunction with other universally recognized principles of international law—are fundamental to regional and European peace and security.

5. In connection with this, they stress the extreme danger of any manifestations of separatism that resort to force within the boundaries of internationally recognized territorially integral states, taking into consideration the fact that such manifestations pose a real threat to stability and peace not only in the states in question but also in adjoining regions.

6. In accordance with the UN Charter, Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia recognize the right of any state to apply the necessary constitutional measures to safeguard its own political, economic, and territorial integrity.

7. At the same time, Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia believe that the effective settlement of conflicts can be guaranteed only through persistent and steadfast attempts by all parties to find peaceful negotiatory means to regularize such situations.

8. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia hold that the settlement of the Georgian-Abkhazian and Georgian-Ossetian conflicts on the territory of Georgia are the internal affair of the Republic of Georgia. The decisions of the Budapest summit with respect to the regularization of the situation in the zone of the Georgian-Abkhazian conflict and the condemnation of ethnic cleansing were reaffirmed.

9. Recognizing the conflict in the Chechen Republic to be the internal affair of the Russian Federation, Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia nonetheless express their concern over the reports of numerous victims, especially among the civilian population. They regret the fact that this conflict is growing in scale and resulting in mass bloodshed and call upon the parties to exhibit restraint and make an urgent effort to find peaceful means of resolving the conflict and to observe human rights.

10. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia call upon the UN, the CSCE, the European Union, other international organizations, the world's leading powers, as well as the CIS countries to devote more attention to the problems in the Caucasus and make additional political and economic efforts to attain an all-encompassing peace in this region. They express the hope that the world community will substantially expand the process of developing and implementing specific programs and measures designed to create the necessary conditions for ensuring stable and enduring development in this explosively dangerous region.

11. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia believe that the most important factors in strengthening stability, peace, and civil accord in their countries are the implementation of profound democratic transformations accompanied by the unconditional observance of the rights and fundamental freedoms of the individual, as well as the protection of the rights of ethnic and religious minorities.

12. Viewing bilateral relations as an important priority, Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia regard it as necessary to make effective joint efforts designed to perfect the methods of realizing the agreements they have reached in various fields of cooperation. At the same time, they stress the prospects of developing economic relations between regions in both countries.

13. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia will expand bilateral trade and economic cooperation. In doing so, they will devote particular attention to the development of new forms of industrial cooperation-production cooperation, joint business enterprise, etc.

14. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia believe that an important prerequisite of the development of broad economic cooperation between them is the creation of reliable transportation links. In conjunction with this, the parties believe it useful, jointly with other interested countries, to begin developing and realizing energy transit projects, as well as establishing a ferry service between the Black Sea ports of Ukraine and Georgia.

15. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia will coordinate their efforts more closely and cooperation in international organizations and structures, including the CIS organs. In connection with this, they will begin bilateral consultations on urgent issues in international relations and hold them on a regular basis.

16. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia agree that the principal tendencies in the member countries of the CIS confirm the priority nature of economic cooperation and the diversity of forms of participation by these states in the Commonwealth, including in CIS organs. They underscore that the CIS organs should be open to all member states and should develop as interstate rather than supranational bodies.

17. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia assess positively the prospects of developing the Black Sea Economic Cooperation [ChES], which unites countries that vary in size and potential. They attach special significance to multilateral cooperation in investments within the framework of the ChES, the potential of which has grown with the creation of the Black Sea Bank of Trade and Development, and urge all potential donors to support the establishment of this bank.

18. Ukraine and the Republic of Georgia will actively cooperate in promoting the transborder dissemination of information about national attainments in the spheres of culture, science, and education, expand cultural and information exchanges, and support the development of international contacts among young people.

5.31 Kuchma to Sign Trade, Economic Pact in Moscow

UNIAR, 23 January 1995 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

The signing of the major treaty between Ukraine and Russia has been postponed so far. Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma will travel to Moscow on 24 January, accompanied by high government officials, to sign a trade and economic agreement for 1995. They will also discuss the provision of critical imports of fuels and the granting of components for Ukrainian enterprises that are cooperating with Russia.

Observers believe that Russia is seriously concerned by Ukraine's ever increasing activity in establishing economic ties with republics of the CIS and by its growing political influence in the Caucasus. Russia recently signed several agreements with Belarus and Kazakhstan, which in effect signifies the creation of an economic union between these three republics. Russia can afford to delay signing of the major political and economic treaty with Ukraine, which has been in a state of preparation for such a long time.

In the view of the experts, Russia aspires to include Ukraine in those decisions that would be favorable to Russia in terms of transporting and fitting out future oil and gas pipelines from Azerbaijan and Central Asia. This could be viewed as Russia's reaction to the quite successful Ukrainian-Turkmen agreements, which disturb Russia both from the economic and political points of view. However, because Ukraine can secure certain influence in Central Asia and the Caucasus, it is able to defend its positions and achieve those compromise options where its political and economic interests will be taken into account....

5.32 Ukraine Attends Interstate Economic Committee Session

Kiev Radio Ukraine World Service 11 March 1995
[FBIS Translation]

A session of the presidium of the Interstate Economic Committee [IEC], which was set up by a decision of the CIS heads of state, got under way in Moscow on 10 March. A government delegation of Ukraine, led by Deputy Prime Minister Serhiy Osyka, is taking part in its work. Aleksey Bolshakov, chairman of the IEC Presidium and deputy prime minister of the government of the Russian Federation, greeted the participants in the session on behalf of the government of Russia. He wished them success in achieving the main goal of the Interstate Economic Committee-development and interaction of economies of the CIS member states.

Consideration of a draft agreement on setting up an Interstate Currency Committee [ICC] was among the priority issues at the session of the IEC Presidium. The ICC is supposed to promote multilateral cooperation in the field of currency and credit relations, development of forms and methods of coordinating the monetary, credit, and currency policies of the signatories to the agreement on setting up a payments union among CIS countries. As is known, Ukraine will join the payments union only after its national currency is put into circulation. However, at the current session the delegation of Ukraine submitted a number of fundamental proposals concerning the draft agreement on setting up an Interstate Currency Committee. In particular, these are proposals concerning the procedure of seceding from the ICC, which should be based on internationally recognized principles.

The activities of the Interstate Currency Committee will undoubtedly contribute to developing economic cooperation between the CIS countries, bringing their currency procedures closer to each other, speeding up mutual settlements, and regulating debt issues. The desire of all the participating sides to build their economic relations on the basis of mutual respect and equality should be regarded as the main factor in this process. The draft agreement on setting up an Interstate Currency Committee will be submitted for the consideration of the Council of the CIS Heads of State.

The session of the IEC presidium also addressed other important issues.

5.33 Ukraine Abstains from Joining CIS Customs Union

UNIAN, 11 March 1995 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

... At UNIAN's request, Ukraine's Deputy Prime Minister Serhiy Osyka commented on this fact as follows:

“Ukraine supports the idea of setting up the Customs Union in general, but the distance to it should be covered not at rocket-escape velocity, but at a normal pace.” According to him, the agreement on free trade, concluded between Ukraine and the Russian Federation, will contribute to coordinating the fiscal, taxation, and economic functions of the customs borders between the two countries. “The law enforcement and political functions of the customs borders will remain unchanged,” Serhiy Osyka pointed out.

In his opinion, the issue of Ukraine's accession to the Customs Union will depend on the effectiveness of the free trade procedure between Ukraine and the Russian Federation.

5.34 Yeltsin Considers “Tough Approach” Toward Ukraine

Article by Mikhail Berger; Report by Yanin Sokolovskaya

Izvestiya, 21 April 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The Russian-Ukrainian talks on the Black Sea Fleet are once again deadlocked. As distinct from previous similar situations, however, Russia, to judge from information disseminated by ITAR-TASS, is prepared to be tough with Ukraine. Boris Yeltsin's words in this regard, as reported by presidential aide Dmitriy Ryurikov, appeared as follows: Unless Ukraine moves toward us over the question of the Black Sea Fleet, Russia will take this as a sign to reconsider its economic and financial agreements with Ukraine.

A tough approach to foreign policy in the near abroad seems to be becoming increasingly popular in the top echelons of power. Politicians and journalists had not had time to react to Andrey Kozyrev's statement on the possibility of using armed forces to defend the Russian-speaking population in the CIS, when Boris Yeltsin threatened to revise the economic agreements with our closest neighbor-Ukraine.

True, things are going no further than declarations at present. But this is the very reason why there is still time to try to assess the possible consequences of such a policy if Russia were to make the transition from words to deeds. Let us consider the possible results of taking a tough approach economically, as something more specific and predictable than the use of military force.

Which agreements, in fact, can we be talking of? It is possible to assume with a high degree of probability that President Yeltsin had in mind the recently signed agreement on restructuring (deferring) the Ukrainian debt. This agreement elicited a highly negative reaction from many parliamentarians and is regarded by its critics as another "sale of the motherland." Meanwhile, in the opinion of a high-ranking staffer in the Russian government, this agreement is no less advantageous to Russia than to Ukraine. Until recently, the problem of mounting Ukrainian debts had gotten no further than the talks stage. But now Russia has already started getting real, live money from Ukraine. The terms of the treaty are so tough, the staffer emphasized, that it can be torn up on the very first delay in payments.

In other words, a certain ultimatum-like approach is already enshrined in the agreement with Ukraine, and an extremely tough approach can be taken regardless of the development of the talks on the Black Sea Fleet. So the introduction of an additional political excuse to revise the economic agreement seems superfluous.

Of course, it would create a mass of problems for Ukraine to declare itself bankrupt and incapable of repaying debts. The IMF, above all, might suspend the granting of reserve credits to Ukraine. Thus, the threat of "revision" is fraught with very grave economic consequences for Ukraine. But Russia will not get off lightly either. The point is that the agreement on restructuring the Ukrainian debt was part of Russia's complex, multimove game with the IMF, which resulted in reserve credits of $6.8 billion granted to Russia. It cannot be ruled out that, in order to "punish" Ukraine, Russia itself will have to accept punishment.

On the contrary, a solicitous attitude to the agreement on debts promises Russia big economic advantages. One of the leaders of the Ministry for Cooperation with CIS Member States told Izvestiya that Russia did not receive a single cent of the $600 million due from Ukraine last year. Without the agreement the result could be the same this year too. But Ukraine made the first payment three days early-27 March-and will pay $406 million before 1 September. The agreement on restructuring the debt of $2.7 billion, apart from securing a chance of actual repayment with interest, enables Russia to substantially increase gas exports to Europe, to resolve the problem of transit payments, and to participate in the privatization of Ukrainian enterprises.

Of course, the treaty also benefits Ukraine, and at first sight it seems possible to use it to exert pressure at the talks on the Black Sea Fleet. Tearing it up, however, could place Ukraine in such a desperate economic position that there will be no question of any “movement” toward us over the problem of the fleet.

Boris Yeltsin’s words, made public by Dmitriy Ryurikov, about the Ukrainian side’s supposedly unconstructive approach to the division of the Black Sea Fleet cannot be said to have alarmed Kiev politicians. They evidently had a premonition that these problems would arise. Kiev was far more troubled by the statement which the Russian president made four days earlier about his concern at the fate of the people of the Crimea. Ukrainian politicians perceived it as “disgraceful interference in Ukraine’s internal affairs.”

To date no statement by Ukrainian parties or authorities concerning Yeltsin’s “fleet” statements has been made public. Izvestiya was told at the country’s Ministry of Foreign Affairs that the information about Yeltsin’s position came through unofficial channels. It is now being checked out and elucidated by the Ukrainian Embassy in Russia. “If this information is confirmed, Kiev’s reaction will be consonant with it.”

The president’s staff has also decided not to react officially to the Russian presidential aide’s unofficial statement. Reliable sources have told us that this question was not discussed at all during the meeting which Leonid Kuchma and Yevhen Marchuk had with heads of deputies’ factions.

Ukrainian Acting Prime Minister Yevhen Marchuk himself says that he was satisfied with the results of his meeting with Yeltsin and Chernomyrdin. The contentious point of borders, included in the large-scale treaty, has at last been resolved with the Russian side. Henceforth it sounds as follows in the version proposed by Ukraine: “The sides respect each other’s territorial sovereignty and confirm the inviolability of the borders that exist between them.”

5.35 Kuchma News Conference Discusses Current Issues

Kiev Radio Ukraine World Service, 29 May 1995
[FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Moderator]: Today’s news conference ... deals with the results of [Kuchma’s] visits to the Latvian and Estonian republics and participation in the conference of the CIS heads of state in Minsk ....

[Kyselyov]: Esteemed Leonid Danylovych, I am Serhiy Kyselyov, Ukrainian office of the Literaturnaya Gazeta. During your visit to Latvia you said Ukraine could possibly change its non-aligned status. Several days after, Ukraine’s Defense Minister Valeriy Shmarov, while summing up the results of the Ukrainian-U.S. exercises at the Yavorov training ground, said that the peacekeeping exercises did not mean at all that our state will change its non-aligned status. Therefore, my first question is: How can you explain the difference between the above statements? And the second question in that vein is: In a week’s time you intend to pay an official visit to NATO headquarters in Brussels-what will be discussed there? What have you prepared for that meeting? Thank you.

[Kuchma]: Thank you. First and foremost, I am going there at the invitation of the European Union. So, I would ask you not to confuse things, as they say. If there is enough time-and I will take advantage of this-I will definitely visit NATO headquarters....

True, I did say that [changes thought], as a matter of fact, I reiterated something I have been saying all the time and everywhere. That is that no country has the right of veto, that NATO's doors should be open to any country, Ukraine included, and that we must really try to expand cooperation, including with NATO. The peacekeeping exercises in Lvov Region were held for this reason, so that we could understand each other better....

[Levytska]: URP-Inform and Za Vilnu Ukrayinu newspaper, Lviv, Levytska. Esteemed Mr. President, in Minsk a number of CIS states signed agreements on the joint protection of borders and on a common customs union. Does this mean that on 26 May the CIS split into two parts: the countries that became fully dependent on Russia and the countries that will cooperate on a bilateral basis? And the second question is: You visited the Baltic countries and met with Ukrainian communities. Were they asking for any protection, like the Russian-speaking population was doing, according to repeated statements by the Russian leadership? Thanks.

[Kuchma]: I believe you are politicians and political scientists, so draw your own conclusion on whether the CIS split into two halves. However, I think the fact that Ukraine, for example, did not join the customs union or the agreement on the protection of borders is our own business, first and foremost, because this is our policy. We understand that if there are external borders and no internal borders, there will be no Ukrainian state, there will be one state only. The same refers to the customs union because this is as lengthy a task as joining NATO, as they say, because it is necessary to update ....

... I had an official, so to speak, meeting with the Ukrainian community in Latvia and they met me unofficially in Tallinn on a square in front of the municipal council. And everywhere there was a warm welcome and open conversations. True, there are problems today, including those facing our diaspora. The main problem, as you know, is that of citizenship. I believe that we must show understanding of the situation that has taken shape in the Baltic countries. If there are fewer Latvians in Latvia, for example, than people of other nationalities, this is a big problem. We must understand their measures to resolve this problem. But when taking these measures it is necessary to ensure that the non-indigenous population, or national minorities, as they say, do not feel like guests, as a matter of fact. It is necessary to move in the direction of adopting positive decisions to deal with the issue. And there were conversations both with the president of Latvia and the president of Estonia. I do not want to mention the steps which have already been taken, but they have been taken and they give me grounds to say this.

By the way, in Tallinn we were met by people who were carrying posters saying that our main task, after all, is to preserve the Ukrainian state. And I have never heard a single word on their part-although there were many people in the square-that pressure was exerted on them, that they were not allowed to work and live normally, although these problems do exist, as you understand. And the leaders of those states acknowledge this. So, the task now is to solve these problems at the government level.

[Zarya, ... ]: Sergey Zarya, Interethnic Information Bureau. Mr. President, excuse me for speaking in Russian. In Minsk you said that the question of borders is a question of sovereignty. Then why did Mr. Horbulin agree to sign a joint Air Defense Treaty with Russia? Our military objected, but Mr. Horbulin went ahead and signed it.

[Kuchma,. .. ]: I don't know whose gossip you are repeating because Horbulin did not sign any treaties and had nothing to do with them. So ask your source about it. We did not sign anything like that in Minsk, and Horbulin was not there, and he was not in Almaty, either....

5.36 Moroz Says Ukraine Will Never Join NATO

UNIAN, 29 May 1995 [FBIS Translation]

“Ukraine will not join NATO, and neither will Russia,” said Ukraine’s Supreme Council Chairman Oleksandr Moroz in an exclusive interview for UNIAN. “The Partnership for Peace formula makes it clear: Render unto Caesar what is Caesar’s,” the speaker said.

Moroz told UNIAN that he had held that view since 1993 when the Supreme Council approved the country’s foreign policy guidelines. Taking account of the objective circumstances, such as the existence of common Ukrainian-Russian air defense and strategic forces, as well as the existence of the Black Sea Fleet on the Ukrainian territory, these relations must be formalized in legal terms, he said. “I am not talking about military blocs or alliances. We need a legal framework for cooperation, including military cooperation, between neighboring countries. Perhaps we need a similar framework with NATO, if you consider the interests of Ukraine and her neighbors who may join the organization in the future.”

The parliament speaker said Ukraine had to seek other ways of protecting its interests, by promoting the transformation of the Black Sea region into a zone of peace and reducing confrontation between the military organizations of its neighbor states.

5.37 Duma Deputy Favors Return of Crimea

RIZ, 5 June 1995 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

[Press conference held by Viktor Grigoryavich Vishnyakov, deputy chairman of the Committee on Legislation and Judicial-Legal Reform, chairman of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Legislation of the State Duma, Russian Federation Federal Assembly.]

1. On the Russian Federal Status of Crimea

The situation surrounding the Republic of Crimea is approaching a dead end.

In January 1991, an all-Crimea referendum was held, at which 93 percent of the population of Crimea spoke out in favor of “restoration of the Crimean ASSR [Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic] as a subject of the Federation of the USSR.” In February of 1991, the Supreme Soviet of Ukraine ratified the Law on Restoration of the Crimean ASSR as a Component of the UkSSR, thereby distorting the results of the referendum.

In September of 1991, the Supreme Soviet of Ukraine adopted the Law on Delineation of Powers and Authorities Between Ukraine and the Republic of Crimea, which secures the status of the Republic of Crimea as a component of the Ukraine. The Republic Movement of Crimea collected 247,000 signatures in favor of holding a referendum on the independence of Crimea (according to the Law on Referendum of the Republic of Crimea, 180,000 were needed).

In May 1992, the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Crimea adopted the Statute on Proclaiming State Independence of the Republic, and ratified and implemented the Constitution of the Republic of Crimea. The Supreme Soviet of Ukraine adopted a resolution instructing the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Crimea to repeal the Statute Proclaiming State Independence of the Republic and the statute on holding an all-Crimea referendum, because they contradicted the Constitution of Ukraine.

But the “war of laws” went even further. In November 1994, the Supreme Soviet of Ukraine repealed en masse over a hundred legal statutes adopted by the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Crimea on grounds that they supposedly contradicted the Constitution and the laws of Ukraine. As a result, the struggle surrounding the legal status of Crimea became even more exacerbated.

In this struggle, the Ukrainian authorities are taking an ever harsher position. On 14 April 1995, the Supreme Soviet of Ukraine sent an appeal to the State Duma of the Russian Federation, stating that the questions concerning Crimea are “exclusively the internal affair” of Ukraine. The appeal concluded that the decisions of the State Duma regarding Crimea, and especially the invitation from Moscow to the chairman of the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Crimea to address the State Duma, contradict generally accepted international-legal standards and principles.

By what means are we to emerge from the dead end into which the Crimean problem has been pushed by Russian politicians, whose actions are dictated not by the state interests of Russia, but by immediate, personal ambitions?

Historically, Crimea never belonged to Ukraine. Such a state did not even exist until 1918. Prior to 1783, Crimea was a khanate dependent on Turkey. When the Khan Girey voluntarily went under the scepter of Catherine II, she issued the manifest of 8 January 1783, in accordance with which Crimea was annexed by Russia in February 1784, as part of Tavrich Oblast.

We know that the fate of Crimea was determined in 1954 by the independent decision of N.S. Khrushchev. The question of the transfer of Crimea was prepared and decided in surroundings of strictest secrecy. On 1 February 1954, a secret note was sent in response to N.S. Khrushchev's statement, and was signed by Suslov and Pegov. It spoke of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium on reviewing the "joint presentation" of the RSFSR Supreme Soviet Presidium and the UkSSR Supreme Soviet Presidium on handing over Crimea Oblast from the jurisdiction of the RSFSR to the jurisdiction of the Ukrainian SSR. Provision was made for everything-the date of the meeting ( 19 February 1954), the identify of those invited, who would call the meeting to order, who would be given the floor for speeches, and which of the members of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium would speak with "approval and support" of the party leader's initiative.

At that time, there was no "separation of powers," and the "matter" moved along at a rapid pace. Already on 5 February 1954, the RSFSR Supreme Soviet Presidium, at a closed session, adopted the resolution, "On the Order of Transfer of Crimea Oblast from the Jurisdiction of the RSFSR to the Jurisdiction of the Ukrainian SSR." It contained a point calling for ratification by the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium. On 13 February 1954, the chairman of the Ukrainian SSR Supreme Soviet Presidium, D. Korotchenko, asked the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium to hand over Crimea Oblast from RSFSR Jurisdiction to that of the Ukrainian SSR.

On 19 February 1954, the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium ratified the "joint presentation" of the two presidiums of republican supreme soviets. The “joint presentation” was not published, however. Moreover, it was not found in the state archives. The question thus arises, did it ever exist? On 26 April 1954, the USSR Supreme Soviet ratified the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium Edict of 19 February 1954 and resolved to retroactively introduce the appropriate amendments to Articles 22 and 23 of the USSR Constitution. After that, the RSFSR Supreme Soviet, by its Law of 2 June 1954, also retroactively, introduced amendments to the RSFSR Constitution, excluding Crimea Oblast from the jurisdiction of the RSFSR.

In the process of all these actions, “along the way,” fundamental principles secured in Articles 15 and 18 of the USSR Constitution were violated. According to these articles, the USSR was called upon to protect the sovereign rights of the union republics, and primarily their right to territorial integrity. Article 18 directly stated that the territory of a union republic could not be changed without its consent.

The decision of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium directly violated the sovereign rights of the RSFSR, since the “consent” for change in the jurisdiction of the RSFSR was given not by the RSFSR Supreme Soviet, but by the RSFSR Supreme Soviet Presidium.

Also violated were Articles 6, 13, 14, 16, 19, 23, and 33 of the RSFSR Constitution. Article 6 of the RSFSR Constitution, for example, stated that the land, its mineral resources, water, forests, factories, plants, and other objects of state property are all-people’s property. We might ask, why then were these objects, which are located on the territory of Crimean Oblast, “handed over” to Ukraine on an unlawful basis-by the decree of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium?

While Article 14 listed the oblasts and krais of which the RSFSR consists, at the same time Article 16 emphasized that “the territory of the RSFSR cannot be altered without the consent of the RSFSR.” According to Articles 19 and 23 of the Constitution, the question of the territorial make-up of the RSFSR is under the exclusive administration of the RSFSR Supreme Soviet.

All these violations of the principles of the constitutional order of the USSR and RSFSR received proper legal evaluation, but already in an entirely different historical situation. On 21 May 1992, the Russian Federation Supreme Soviet adopted the decree, “On a Legal Assessment of the Decisions of Supreme Organs of the RSFSR State Power on Change in the Status of Crimea, Adopted in 1954.” In it, the RSFSR Supreme Soviet Presidium Decree of 5 February 1954 was denied any legal validity from the moment of its adoption “by reason of violation of the RSFSR Constitution and legislative procedure.”

However, the decree of 21 May 1992 contained a certain inconsistency. It noted that, in connection with the conclusion of a bilateral treaty between Ukraine and Russia on 19 November 1990, in which the parties rejected territorial claims, the regulation of the question of Crimea must proceed by means of interstate negotiations between Russia and Ukraine with the participation of Crimea, and on the basis of a popular referendum.

But if the decree of 5 February 1954 was deemed not to have any legal force, then why at the same time proclaim Russia’s renunciation of all territorial claims on Ukraine? Once again, as countless times before, political concessions and compromises achieved at the price of violating constitutional principles have given rise to a new round of contradictions surrounding the Crimean problem.

The position of the jurists sharply deteriorated, as they were now forced to prove that the legality of the decisions of the RSFSR organs of state power, as decreed by the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation on 21 May 1992, retains its force.

Naturally, the question may also be resolved by means of interstate negotiations between Russia and Ukraine with participation of Crimea and on the basis of popular will, but under one condition: Strict adherence to the legal principles proclaimed by the Constitutions of the USSR and RSFSR. Specifically, the Treaty of 19 November 1990 spoke of the respect of the territorial integrity of the RSFSR and the UkSSR “within the currently existing boundaries within the framework of the USSR” (Article 6). In connection with the fact that the USSR still existed in 1990, the question arises: Why, in violation of the USSR Constitution, did the union republics independently resolve questions of recognizing boundaries between them, sanction their change, etc.?

Based on the fact that drastic changes had occurred in the legal situation surrounding Crimea since 1954, it is necessary to place the concept of “newly discovered circumstances” at the basis of this evaluation. Who could foresee in 1954 the disintegration of the Union, the division of unified state power, unified territories, property, citizenship, laws? Even in the most delirious dream, one could not foresee the coming to power in Ukraine of extreme nationalists, who implemented a hostile policy toward Russia and who refused the very idea of negotiations on handing over Crimea to Russia.

There are at least two possible options if the Ukrainian Supreme Soviet continues on a unilateral path, from a position of force, to repeal those statutes adopted by the Supreme Soviet of the Republic of Crimea which it does not like. Based on the situation in Crimea, such actions will continue to be regarded by the citizens of Crimea as unlawful, forceful, directed at the Ukrainization of the population of Crimea, and an infringement on the rights and freedoms of the Russian population, which comprises the majority in the Republic of Crimea, created by an 83 percent majority on 20 January 1991.

The first option is the presentation of the Crimean problem for discussion by the heads of state of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

The second option is an appeal to the International Court in The Hague.

Crimea, in strict accordance with the law, has been and remains Russian. And the recognition of this immutable legal fact will remove unnecessary tension in relations between Ukraine and Russia.

2. On the Russian Federal Status of the City of Sevastopol

By its Decree of 9 July 1993, “On the Status of the City of Sevastopol,” the Supreme Soviet of the Russian Federation confirmed the Russian federal status of the city of Sevastopol within the administrative-territorial boundaries of the city okrug as of December 1991. The Russian Federal Supreme Soviet Committee on Constitutional Legislation was assigned the task of preparing a Russian Federation draft law on securing the federal status of the city of Sevastopol in the Constitution of the Russian Federation.

However, almost two years have passed, and the problem of the status of the city of Sevastopol is growing more acute. The Ukrainian side is rather skillfully implementing the principle of “divide and conquer,” under which the legislative and executive branches in the city of Sevastopol are not interacting as they should, on the basis of various “checks and balances,” but are being used as a devilish mechanism in the hands of the authorities, located in Kiev, for setting against one another and mutually weakening the organs of power and administration in Crimea.

Indicative in this connection is the Edict of the President of the Republic of Crimea dated 9 September 1994, “On Organization of State Administration in the Republic of Crimea.” Annoyed by the endless efforts of the Kiev authorities to bribe the corps of deputies, President of the Republic of Crimea Yu. Meshkov is taking rather decisive actions. In connection with the “encroachment of the Supreme Soviet of Crimea on the extent of lawful powers and authorities,” states the edict, “and the serious consequences stemming from this, associated with the loss of manageability, the activity of the Supreme Soviet of Crimea, and the rayon and city Soviets of People’s Deputies is hereby suspended.” Their powers and authorities are handed over to the President of the Republic of Crimea and the heads of local administrations. The prosecutor’s office, in conjunction with the security service and the MVD [Ministry of Internal Affairs] of Crimea, are instructed to verify the “merging” between part of the deputy corps and the criminal structures.

At the same time, Ukrainian authorities are using “legal” arguments:

1. “The city of Sevastopol is an integral part of Ukraine, and therefore its status may be determined only by Ukraine.”

Sevastopol was founded in 1784, and from that moment sovereignty over it was exercised by the Russian Empire. Administration of the city was performed by a military general-governor, who by his duties was the commander of the Black Sea Fleet. The city of Sevastopol was a specific administrative okrug, managed by the military-naval administration, which was appointed directly in St. Petersburg.

The legal principle upon which the Russian federal status of the city of Sevastopol is based is, as we know, the decree of the RSFSR Supreme Soviet Presidium dated 29 October 1948, which separated the city of Sevastopol from the Crimea Oblast, making it into an independent administrative-economic center with its own specific budget, and relegating it to the category of a city under republic subordination.

The city of Sevastopol remains to the present time a part of the Russian Federation. The decree of 1948 was not repealed by anyone. The imposition of Ukraine’s jurisdiction over the city of Sevastopol in 1977 was accomplished unilaterally, without the appropriate decision by the constitutional organs of the RSFSR.

Since the formation of the independent states of Russia and Ukraine within the scope of the CIS, the legal status of the city of Sevastopol has not undergone any changes.

2. “The city of Sevastopol is a city of Ukrainian republic subordination.”

The decree of the USSR Council of Ministers dated 25 October 1948, “On Measures for Accelerating the Restoration of Sevastopol,” signed by I. Stalin, stated: “Sevastopol shall be categorized among the cities of republic subordination.” At that time, republic subordination clearly meant the subordination of Sevastopol under the RSFSR Council of Ministers, and certainly not under the Ukrainian SSR Council of Ministers. It was specifically under the RSFSR Council of Ministers that this same decree established a special administration for the restoration of the city of Sevastopol.

It follows from the RSFSR Supreme Soviet Presidium Decree of 29 October 1948, relegating Sevastopol to the category of cities of republic subordination, that Sevastopol was removed from the jurisdiction of Crimea Oblast, which at that time was part of the RSFSR.

However, relegation of Sevastopol to the category of cities of republic subordination was not specified in the RSFSR Constitution in 1948. The RSFSR Constitution did not contain any list of cities of republic subordination.

The RSFSR Supreme Soviet Presidium Decree of 5 February 1954, “On Transferring Crimea Oblast from the Jurisdiction of the RSFSR to the Jurisdiction of the UkSSR,” and the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium Edict of 19 February on this question also contained no mention of Sevastopol.

The subsequent edict of 29 October 1948 was neither amended nor repealed. Legally, it retains its validity to the present time, and the Russian Federation as the legal successor of the RSFSR even today exercises its sovereignty over the city of Sevastopol.

Therefore, all unilateral statutes of Ukraine declaring the city to be under Ukrainian jurisdiction cannot be recognized as legal.

State sovereignty over Sevastopol, in accordance with international law, was never handed over to anyone. International law demands, and this is confirmed by the practice of the International Court, that any transfer of state sovereignty to a territory be in the form of an international treaty. The Vienna Convention on the right of agreements defines a treaty as an international agreement concluded between states in written form and regulated by international law. Neither the edict of the RSFSR Supreme Soviet Presidium nor the decree of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium are international treaties. These are domestic documents, proscribing certain actions by the administrative organs of the USSR and RSFSR.

3. The edict of 29 October 1948 speaks not about administrative-territorial, but about the administrative-economic status of Sevastopol.

First of all, in the above-mentioned edict the discussion is not about the administrative-economic status, but about the administrative economic center, which is relegated to the category of cities of republic subordination. Sevastopol represents a specific administrative-economic center primarily because the decisive administrative authority belonged to the military administration.

The special regimen for administering the city was defined by its special purpose-to be a military-naval base for the Black Sea Fleet.

A special legal regimen was established for the city which concerned, specifically, the residences and activities of its residents, the procedures for entry and exit, the financing and supply of the city, and other issues. The position of the city as a military-naval base of union subordination stemmed from its importance to the defense and security of the country.

Even after its legal formulation as a city of republic subordination, the special-purpose designation of the city continued to play a decisive role as a city of union subordination. According to the USSR Constitution of 1936, all military affairs were relegated to the USSR, with the appropriate subordination to the Narkomat [People's Commissariat] of Defense in the city of Moscow.

4. "Since 1954, Sevastopol has been financed from the budget of Ukraine, and not the Russian Federation." These unfounded statements of Ukrainian nationalists have no basis in fact.

The financing of Sevastopol between of 1954 and 1958 was conducted out of the union budget. Aside from specialpurpose financing, at the end of the program for restoring Sevastopol in 1954, the USSR Council of Ministers adopted the decree of 26 July 1954, No. 1508, "On Measures for Continued Development of the Agriculture, Cities, and Resorts of Crimea Oblast." Within the scope of this decree, at the expense of the union budget, in which the relative share of Russia was 8588 percent, an extensive list of raw materials, equipment, transport, and monetary funds, including currency, were allocated specially for the development of Sevastopol and Crimea Oblast for the period 1955 to 1958. By 1958, and through 1990, the special-purpose capital investments continued to be made from the union budget. They were directed toward creation and development of the resort network, communications, transport means (including pipelines), improvement of power supply and development of culture.

Practically until 1991, not only financial, but also organizational functions, including the passport regimen on the territory of Sevastopol, were implemented under the direct management of the USSR Council of Ministers, without the participation of the Ukrainian SSR with Council of Ministers.

The most complex legal collisions arise in connection with the signing of the Treaty of 19 November 1990 between Russia and Ukraine, according to Article 6 of which the parties recognize and respect the territorial integrity of the RSFSR and the Ukrainian SSR within the “boundaries currently existing within the scope of the USSR.”

Russia is the legal successor of the USSR with regard to its right to use the port at the military-naval base of Sevastopol. This does not mean the submission of any territorial claims to Ukraine. The discussion here is not about claims to territory belonging to Ukraine, but under the administrative-territorial boundaries of Russia when the USSR existed. The fact is that the Treaty of 19 November 1990, in which the “High Agreeing Parties” (represented by the presidents of Russia and Ukraine) recognize each other as sovereign states and confirm the existing boundaries within the scope of the former Union, signifies that Ukraine, by Article 6 of this treaty, has confirmed that Sevastopol remains a city of the Russian Federation.

We will note that, in seeking out various legal hitches, the Ukrainian side is assiduously evading the main point.

Thus, the Declaration of State Sovereignty, adopted by the Supreme Soviet of the Ukrainian SSR on 16 July 1990, in proclaiming the state sovereignty of Ukraine, does not say a word about the USSR, about the USSR Constitution as the main legal basis for interrelations of the Union with the union republics, and the initial legal base for determining the competency of the union republics. Thus, the declaration states that the resolution of questions of “all-union property (common property of all republics)” is performed on the basis of agreement between the republics which are subjects of this property. However, the USSR Constitution did not contain any concepts of “all-union” property, or “common property of the union republics.” There was a singular state (all-people’s) property, and the union republics did not have the right of ownership to it.

Transformation of all-people’s property into common property of all republics was needed by the authors of the declaration to justify the anti-constitutional actions of Ukraine in seizing the all-people's property located on the territory of Ukraine.

The State Duma of the Federal Assembly of the Russian Federation must, as soon as possible, confirm once again the Russian federal status of Sevastopol; decisively declare that Ukraine's encroachment on a part of Russian territory contradicts the Constitution of the Russian Federation and all other legal statutes, including the Treaty of 1990; and confirm the jurisdiction of Russia over Sevastopol as the main base of the Russian Black Sea Fleet.

For the purpose of accelerating the stabilization of the situation surrounding the status of Sevastopol and the Black Sea Fleet and retaining good neighborly relations with Ukraine, the State Duma of the Russian Federation must instruct the government of the Russian Federation to take all possible measures to conclude negotiations with Ukraine on the status of Sevastopol and the Black Sea Fleet no later than July of 1995 (UP TO THEIR STRICT TIE-IN WITH FULFILLMENT OF ALL OTHER AGREEMENTS).

5.38 Talks End; Documents Readied

Moscow Television, 9 June 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The working meeting between the presidents of Russia and Ukraine has just ended in Sochi.

The main issue in today's dialogue between the two presidents concerns the Russian Ukrainian fleets' bases. Moscow wants to have Sevastopol as its main navy base as well as two Crimean airports-Gvardeyskiy and Oktyabrskiy-and two communication points. All other places of vessel deployment should be given to Ukraine in line with previous agreements. Unfortunately, the stance of the Ukrainian side was not always consistent. Kiev has departed from the previously announced principle of separate deployment. During recent meetings with Yeltsin in Moscow and Minsk, Leonid Kuchma said the two fleets should be deployed in Sevastopol together. Russia believes this is not acceptable and does not intend to return two of the four Sevastopol bays to Ukraine. All in all there are 220 places for mooring vessels in the city's bays. Ukraine is offering Russia only 28 percent of them, and this is despite the fact that the Russian part of the fleet is four times bigger than that of Ukraine.

Apart from the fleet deployment problem, the presidents of the two countries are likely to discuss economic problems, confidentially at first, and then at an expanded sitting with participation of foreign and defense ministers and experts.

5.39 Further on Agreement

ITAR-TASS, 9 June 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The Russian Black Sea Fleet will be based in Sevastopol under an agreement signed here today as a result of the Russian-Ukrainian summit.

The four-hour talks between Presidents Yeltsin and Kuchma resulted in the signing of two documents-the agreement on the Black Sea Fleet and a joint communique.

Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma told journalists

after the signing that Russian-Ukrainian summits will henceforth be held every month, and the prime ministers of the two countries will also meet on the same regular basis.

Yeltsin and Kuchma will next meet in Crimea in July.

5.40 Yeltsin Adviser: Agreement Not “Ideal”

Interfax, 9 June 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The Russian president’s adviser on national security, Yuriy Baturin, has said he does not consider the Russian-Ukrainian agreement on the Black Sea Fleet as “ideal.”

However, he told an Interfax correspondent in Sochi that he believes that the agreement has “rich potential opportunities for resolving the Black Sea Fleet issue.”

Baturin said that many diplomatic concessions were made at the talks “without which given the time shortage the agreement would not have been achieved.” “We have been trying to resolve the problem for three years already. Will another three years be needed?” he went on to say.

Baturin said that “if large steps cannot be made, smaller ones should be made more often.” He said that is why the presidents, the prime ministers, their advisors and ministers have decided to meet quite frequently. He said this means that Russian-Ukrainian contacts have been intensified.

Baturin said the agreement for the first time mentions that the interests of Russia and Ukraine in the Black Sea’s basin coincide. He said this wording is very important and it means even more than the term “strategic partnership” which was also introduced into Russian-Ukrainian relations for the first time.

Baturin said that the presidents agreed on the site for the Ukrainian navy’s headquarters while the decision was not fixed in the document. He said it would be inappropriate for a sovereign Ukraine to fix the stationing of its navy's headquarters in a bilateral agreement.

5.41 "Text" of Black Sea Fleet Agreement

Pravda, 10 June 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The Russian Federation and Ukraine, hereafter known as the "Sides," fully resolved to strengthen friendship and cooperation between the Russian Federation and Ukraine, note the coincidence of the two states' interests in the Black Sea basin and, based on Russian-Ukrainian documents signed previously in this sphere, have agreed on the following:

Article 1. The Russian Federation Black Sea Fleet and the Ukrainian navy are to be formed on the basis of the Black Sea Fleet. The Russian Federation Black Sea Fleet and the Ukrainian navy are to be based separately.

Article 2. The main base of the Russian Federation Black Sea Fleet together with the headquarters of the Russian Federation Black Sea Fleet are to be in the city of Sevastopol.

The Russian Federation Black Sea Fleet will use installations of the Black Sea Fleet in the city of Sevastopol and will also use other basing and deployment locations for ships, aviation, shore-based troops, and operational, combat, technical, and rear support installations in Crimea.

Article 3. The Sides' governments will settle questions pertaining to the property of the Black Sea Fleet and will sign a separate agreement on that matter, mindful of the previous accord on the division of the aforementioned property on a 50/50 basis.

Article 4. The Russian Federation is to receive 81.7 percent of the ships and vessels of the Black Sea Fleet, Ukraine— 18.3 percent.

Article 5. When dividing up the armaments, military hardware, and support facilities of the shore-based defense forces, marines, and land-based naval aviation of the Black Sea Fleet, the Sides will work from the situation existing as of 3 August 1992.

Article 6. If one Side is interested in using installations which under the terms of this agreement are designated for the use of the other Side, questions will be resolved by the conclusion of special agreements in each specific instance.

Article 7. Each officer, warrant officer, and petty officer of the Black Sea Fleet has the right to freely determine his future service.

Article 8. The Russian Federation will participate in developing the socio-economic sphere of Sevastopol and other population centers where the Russian Federation Black Sea Fleet is to be based.

Article 9. To preserve stability in the Black Sea region and ensure safety at sea, the Sides will pool their efforts in interaction and cooperation in the naval sphere. The organization of and procedure for cooperation in this sphere will be determined by the Agreement on Cooperation between the Russian Federation Fleet and the Ukrainian navy.

Article 10. The Sides will continue talks on the Black Sea Fleet and, in particular, the elaboration of the legal status and conditions governing the presence of the Russian Federation Black Sea Fleet on Ukrainian territory, the procedure for mutual settlements connected with the resolution of the problem of the Black Sea Fleet, and other questions.

Article 11. A Russian-Ukrainian Joint Commission consisting of the state delegations of the Russian Federation and Ukraine at the talks on the Black Sea Fleet is to be formed to monitor the fulfillment of the accords on the Black Sea Fleet.

The commission is instructed to draw up specific parameters for the division of Black Sea Fleet installations.

5.42 Russian-Ukrainian Accords Prompts U.S.
“Dismay”

Stanislav Menshikov

Pravda, 17 June 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The Sochi accords between the Russian and Ukrainian leaders caused concern across the ocean. Outwardly, Washington wanted to emphasize its neutrality and even expressed ostentatious satisfaction at the settlement of the “bitter infighting” over the Black Sea Fleet. But it is clear from the U.S. press that behind this outwardly calm reaction lies something very different. Some commentators claim that the Sochi agreements were achieved “against a background of deteriorating relations between Moscow and Kiev.” Others note the vagueness of the documents signed, which makes it possible for the sides to depart from the accords, as has happened more than once in the past. It is stressed that the domestic political situation in Ukraine and the stance of the nationalists there will hardly help President Kuchma to follow the agreements to the letter.

These predictions may not be far from the truth, but they also indicate that by no means everyone in Washington found the signs of a rapprochement between Russia and Ukraine to his liking. As one commentator noted frankly, although the “specter of the IMF hung over Sochi,” the Russian-Ukrainian summit testified to the diminishing role and influence of the United States in the region. It was also recalled that at one time George Bush’s mediation was apparently needed in order to resolve the Russian-Ukrainian dispute on tank exports, and later Bill Clinton helped to settle disagreements between Kiev and Moscow over nuclear weapons. But now, as The Washington Post puts it, the only sign of a U.S. role is that Yeltsin and Kuchma met in the Sochi Radisson-Lazurnaya Hotel, which is owned by Americans.

Such claims may seem unsubstantiated to the reader. Surely the share-out of the Black Sea Fleet and other questions of Russian-Ukrainian relations come exclusively within the sphere of authority of these two sovereign states themselves. What business is it of Washington’s, you may wonder, how Moscow and Kiev decide contentious issues between themselves? In this situation there is a crowd, so to speak. But it seems that people across the ocean look at things differently. Both Russia and Ukraine, thanks to the ill-fated reforms, have found themselves in the position of poor relations with the West. And the “high road of civilization” where the liberals are taking us exacts more political and economic dues than the legendary bandit Solovey.

As for Ukraine, Washington now counts it firmly among its own, and deems it part of the NATO sphere of interests. Listen, for instance, to the reasoning of prominent figures in the U.S. administration. U.S. Secretary of State Christopher called Ukraine “one of the pivots of European security.” His deputy Talbott added that “because of its geographical location it plays a key role in the new Europe that has sprung up since the end of the cold war.” Defense Secretary Perry explained that “Ukraine is of vital significance for U.S. national security interests.” All these statements were made not just anywhere, but during visits by the U.S. ministers to the Ukrainian capital. And President Clinton himself, when he was in Kiev in May, did not omit to emphasize Ukraine’s place in the U.S. plans.

Washington began to display a heightened interest in the fate of that country immediately after the breakup of the Soviet Union, but especially after last year’s elections, which brought President Kuchma to power. Initially Washington was concerned about his pre-election statements in favor of a rapprochement with Russia and the support he won from the Russian-speaking population. However, as The Washington Post writes, these misgivings were dispelled when it became clear that the gap between pre-election statements and real policy is considerable. There was approval for the new president’s leaning in the direction of market reforms, his tough confrontation with the Crimean autonomous formation and his own parliament, and his recent statement that Ukraine cannot remain outside military blocs. (There is really only one military bloc in existence in Europe now-NATO.)

All this won praise across the ocean. The Wall Street Journal expressed the hope that “Ukraine could return to the fold of European countries much more quickly than its northern neighbor, on condition that it is allowed to do so and is not included in Russia’s sphere of interests. Ukraine is a powerful factor for stability in Central Europe and the Black Sea region. Whether as a buffer or a bridge (as Kuchma sees his country's role), an independent Ukraine could play an important role as a counterweight to Russia's influence in Europe." So whether Ukraine is admitted to NATO or not, the unenviable role of anti-Russian pawn in the West's game is in store for it in America's geostrategic plans.

The newspaper went on to note that during his presidency Kuchma has achieved greater rapprochement with the West than with Russia. This, it says, is entirely the fault of Russia, because of its "great-power syndrome."

These thoughts were published not long before the Sochi meeting. And then there was dismay: The sides managed without an intermediary from across the ocean. Apparently there is no need to pay yet more dues to the gentlemen of fortune on the "high road of civilization." The gentlemen are offended. But they will be even more offended if things go even further and hopes for the early admission of Ukraine to the NATO system prove vain, and instead—who knows what may happen—it "follows the example of Belarus" (as the same Wall Street Journal wrote in horror). That was what Washington liked least about the Sochi meeting. But it is too soon to rejoice. Western strategists do not abandon their plans and objectives so easily. Too tasty a morsel is in danger of being wrested from their voracious maw, and it is one, moreover, that they think they have already paid for. So we can expect more dirty tricks from our "civilized" partners.

5.43 Concern over Nuclear Fuel Deliveries from Russia

Interfax, 17 July 1995 [FBIS Translation]

There are violations in the schedule of delivery of nuclear rods to Ukraine under the trilateral agreement on nuclear disarmament, Ukraine's Deputy Foreign Minister Konstantin Grischenko told Interfax....

"We cannot but be worried about this," he added.

According to Grischenko, a Ukrainian delegation headed by Defense Minister Valeriy Shmarov raised the issue during its visit to the U.S. Grischenko was also a member of the delegation.

"A nuclear power plant should have an emergency stock of fuel for 18 months," he added, saying the violations made the stations use the emergency stocks.

According to the trilateral statement of the U.S., Russian, and Ukrainian presidents, Ukraine will pull out nuclear warheads in exchange for nuclear fuel. For its part, the U.S. will fund the dismantling and recycling the nuclear charges under the Nunn-Lugar program.

5.44 Kuchma: Too Early for Customs Union

UNIAN, 17 July 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma, who arrived in the Belarusian capital today on an official visit, told journalists at the airport there were no border problems between the two countries.

He said: “Ukraine is in favor of a customs union, but it is too early yet. This is not an issue for the present. We would be pleased to establish a border-crossing system so that our citizens would not be inconvenienced, but we are not going to remove the customs barriers.”

He recalled that the two countries’ European neighbors, Poland, the Czech Republic, and Hungary, have allowed themselves 10 years to form a customs union. Kuchma stressed the need to create a legislative framework and sign a free trade treaty before such a union is established.

5.45 Analyst on Russia’s “Big Brother” Aspirations

Natalya Filipchuk

Golos Ukrainy, 22 September 1995 [FBIS Translation]

If one accepts the idea that Russia’s reassumption of the “big brother” role in the “CIS family” will gain popularity during the election campaign, it may be inferred that the election campaign has started. Russian Federation President Boris Yeltsin has put the first brick under his chair (so that it will not shake too much) by issuing an edict that will determine Russia's strategic course toward the development of relations with CIS countries.

The text of the document was published in full by quite a number of the mass media. There has still been no official reaction from Kiev, although Boris Tarasyuk, first deputy foreign minister, pointed out that "It is difficult to imagine integration processes that are regulated by edicts of the head of just a single member state."

"While developing relations with CIS partners, it is necessary to be firmly guided by the principle of doing no harm to Russian interests," reads the document. Before one grasps the full meaning of the text, one catches the continuation: One of Russia's main political goals is "consolidation of Russia as a leading force in the formation of a new system of interstate political and economic relations on the post- Union territory, acceleration of the integration processes within the CIS ... and gradual expansion of the Customs Union that will encompass states affiliated with Russia by a profoundly integrated economic and strategic political partnership."

Incidentally, with regard to the latter, the "profound economic integration and strategic partnership" apply, first and foremost, to Ukraine. We recently signed corresponding documents in Sochi. At the same time, our sober-minded attitude toward the Customs Union does not seem to bother our northern neighbor, as from now on, Russia intends to seek recognition on the part of the CIS countries “of the fact that the CIS is, primarily, a zone of Russian interests.”

To put it another way, the cited statements of the edict indicate that Russia is sick and tired of complying with the opinions of its partners, and has decided to exercise the rights of the “big brother” and to take the initiative and, concurrently, forbid the other CIS members to pursue their independent external policies. This is explained as follows: “To demand that the CIS states fulfill their commitments and refrain from participation in unions or blocs aimed against any of the states.”

Over time, the Council of Europe may also be listed among such blocs. Just recall that recently, after the question of Ukraine’s admission to the Council of Europe was raised at a parliamentary assembly session, some Russian politicians stated that Russia wanted nothing to do with that organization, because its attitude toward Ukraine was more “amiable.” How then should Ukraine treat the Council of Europe and NATO, which has recently been a matter of annoyance for the Russian leadership, and so on?

With regard to the pursuit of an independent external policy, which is one of the conditions for a state’s existence, it also appears that precisely this edict is directed against the CIS states. If one adheres to the clause on the “non-participation in blocs and unions,” then all CIS countries, with the exception of Russia (or the other way around), must immediately withdraw from the Commonwealth.

Therefore, Ukraine’s Foreign Ministry and also President Kuchma have something to ponder. So far, our state has refrained from an official reaction. However, something has already become obvious: An election campaign has started in Russia, and Yeltsin dreams of getting additional votes by taking advantage of the moods prevailing among the citizens-nostalgia for the great and indivisible [Russia]. For Ukraine, the role of small-fry has been prepared.

5.46 Yeltsin's Edict on Links with CIS Assessed

Interview with Borys Oliynyk

Elena Myloserdova

Kievskie Vedomosti, 26 September 1995 [FBIS Translation]

[Interview with Borys Ilich Oliynyk, chairman of the Ukraine Supreme Council Commission for Foreign Affairs and Relations with the CIS.]

From time to time, official Moscow "issues" state documents that involuntarily cause some bewilderment. Given our independence and sovereignty, some decisions by the Russian Duma-for example, on the Black Sea Fleet or the status of Sevastopol-are obviously not in step with the fact that Ukraine is an independent state and stopped being a Soviet republic some time ago. In this regard, Russian President Yeltsin's edict "Russia's Strategic Course on the Development of Relations With the CIS States" was not an exception.

Last week, Russian Federation Council Chairman Vladimir Shumeiko declared that Ukraine will soon become a full-fledged member of the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly (MPA), which he also heads. If a hasty and unexpected visit by Belarusian President Mr. Lukashenka (read: Yeltsin's emissary) is added to these developments, an impression of a mass attack on Ukraine is created.

But let us not make guesses. Let us give a word to Boris Oliynyk, chairman of the Supreme Council Commission for Foreign Affairs and Relations with the CIS.

[Myloserdova]: Borys Ilich, what is your opinion about Yeltsin's recent edict?

[Oliyynyk]: My opinion about the personality of Boris Nikolaevich has been known since 1990 and, contrary to our democrats, I warned: He is a changeable and impulsive man. It is necessary to deal with him with particular caution and with witnesses present, because it is possible that Yeltsin given all his objective qualities does not at all know what he will do tomorrow.

Precisely this has been confirmed, although such an edict did not surprise me. When I spoke about this before, our democrats attacked me: How could I oppose "the father of universal democracy"? But the events that followed confirmed that I, to my great regret, was right. This also concerns the full-scale agreement which we still cannot sign, the Black Sea Fleet problem, and the bombardment of the legally elected parliament. The left forces, by the way, have assessed this event, while democrats have not done so. We only heard that all leaders of contiguous countries have justified Yeltsin's activities. When such actions are forgiven, they lead to Chechnya. All this has been done by "the father of democracy." Hence, this edict did not surprise me.

With regard to its essence, each state must advocate its national strategic interests, but must not forget that its neighbors also have their national strategic interests. At least our foreign policy is based on the American model-live and make it possible for other people to live. Therefore, one must not shape his behavior as though he were alone, but one must consider the fact that similar people continue to live near him.

[Myloserdova]: Could you provide more detail?

[Oliyntyk]: Let us take the first postulate. I am citing: “Russia’s primary vital interests in the spheres of the economy, defense, security, and protection of Russians’ rights, on the provision of which national security is based, are concentrated on the territory of the CIS states.” This is a tenet from the American strategy: U.S. vital interests are those which the United States has the right to specify. In Zanzibar? Yes. In Somalia? Yes. In Yugoslavia? Yes. Even bombing can be applied there. Therefore, there is no difference between Yeltsin’s statement and the American concept.

[Myloserdova]: What do you think about the tenet “strengthening Russia as a leading force in the formation of a new system of interstate political and economic relations on the territory of what used to be the Soviet Union?”

[Oliyntyk]: This is precisely the U.S. imperial model with its “vital interests.” They also have the phrase “specific interests.” But each state has its own “specific interests” and one should remember them. I do want to say: Whoever says it and whatever it is that is said, I have my own position and I do not change it. The Moscow team must not be confused with Russia and the Russians. Teams come and go. The Russian people suffer; they, like the Ukrainian people, have great problems. No one has the right to separate [the peoples] and claim loudly that someone is enemy no. 1 or 2.

If the Moscow team, however, thinks it is possible to specify Russia’s vital interests wherever it likes, we, as a sovereign state, must do everything to ensure our national security.

[Myloserdova]: At the same time, good relations with Russia as the no. 1 partner should be preserved.

[Oliyynyk]: Undoubtedly. Therefore, I say that one should not mix up the [government] team with the country. One way or another, we are neighbors and we will have good relations with the Russian people, because we must not be divided by barbed wire.

[Myloserdova]: With regard to the country, I agree with you. But political issues have to be resolved with the team.

[Oliyynyk]: Yes, and therefore one should not be afraid. Our [politicians] are afraid when the point is relations with the CIS, the MPA, and so on. They are afraid that we will get into a force field. Who, however, is pushed into a force field? It is up to us not to enter it. At least economic relations should be developed if it is profitable for the entire state. We must guarantee our independence politically.

[Myloserdova]: Let us return to the MPA. Why is Mr. Shumeyko so confident when he is drawing conclusions?

[Oliyynyk]: He, as a rule, confuses reality with desires. Since the issue on joining the MPA has been raised, it is under consideration in our commission, and its members differ on whether Ukraine should join the MPA. At the demand of the members of the commission, a package of documents on the MPA-which we do not have should be submitted to us. Then the Foreign Ministry should submit its expert assessment to us. Our commission will draw its conclusions (will vote for or against the Foreign Ministry's option). Deputies with the right to a legislative initiative, however, have the right to submit this issue for consideration at the session of the Supreme Council.

[Myloserdova]: Are you personally a supporter or opponent of joining the MPA?

[Oliyynyk]: I support the friendship of all the peoples of the world and I favor the concept that we are living together according to God's will. Our relations should be built in such a way that our grandchildren will be able to peacefully look into each other's eyes. But we should determine our specific rights. Based on our will, we could delegate only part of our power [to the MPA], but not as the eight CIS countries have done. Every president has the right to specify his status. If we do not express a will to join the MPA nothing could be made of it ... Economic relations, however, must exist, because capillaries and vessels cannot be cut; one will be unable to discuss sovereignty and independence later because he will be bleeding to death.

With regard to the political aspect, if we consider Yeltsin's last edict, of course, the imperial mood is being felt there. If one state, however, claims "specific interests," I do not intend to join the field of these specific interests.

5.47 Udovenko Seen Rallying Other CIS States Against Moscow

Viktor Zamyatin

Kommersant-Daily, 7 October 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Nezavisimost, a Kiev-based newspaper, has published a letter by Foreign Minister Hennadiy Udovenko to President Leonid Kuchma. This sort of correspondence is, of course, confidential, particularly so this letter: In effect, it is a "reply to Chamberlain" [a strong negative response to an ultimatum], for it contains an assessment of Boris Yeltsin's recently announced "strategic line" in relations with CIS countries.

Generally speaking, there is nothing particularly unexpected about the letter-Kiev has been repeating at all levels that Russia does not see Ukraine as an equal partner and will not do so in the near future. The same is said in the minister's letter: "Russia does not intend to develop its relations with CIS countries on the basis of international law." Meanwhile, Udovenko believes that further integration within the Commonwealth, the need for which Moscow has been emphasizing on every occasion (and which was one of Leonid Kuchma's key electoral slogans), is leading to the watering down of CIS countries' sovereignty, subordination of their interests to those of Russia, and the recreation of a centralized superpower. The Foreign Ministry also warns the president about the realistic nature of Moscow's recent threat to call Ukraine a bankrupt country and to demand that all its debts be paid off in Ukrainian assets. Since all this runs counter to Ukrainian interests, the minister proposes a number of emergency measures.

What is needed first of all is collaboration with the states whose views on the CIS are similar to those of Ukraine in order to devise a joint approach to various problems of the Commonwealth. These states are not mentioned in the letter, but they are well known: Azerbaijan, Turkmenistan, and Moldova. The head of the Ukrainian foreign service also thinks it necessary to calculate the upper limit of Ukraine's economic dependence on Russia and to spot the enterprises and industries that are actually linked to the Russian economy and will be unable to function on their own. The letter asserts that, as a matter of fact, Russia may well demand Ukrainian gas-industry assets (pipelines and storage facilities) and shares in key Ukrainian enterprises as payment for Ukrainian debts. Yet, Leonid Kuchma has repeatedly stated that he will not allow anything like that to happen.

Nezavisimost did Udovenko a disservice—a scandal arose. Meanwhile, Udovenko's meeting with Andrey Kozyrev, on which the two ministers could agree only in New York, is scheduled for 13 October. Kiev expects much from the meeting: It should clarify, for instance, what line Moscow will take after Boris Yeltsin's words about Ukraine's penchant for bending agreements in its favor and Kuchma's resolute disagreement with this statement.

Now, after the publication of Udovenko's letter, Moscow appears to have obtained yet another moral trump card, for it can say that the game against it is not being played honestly. A moral trump alone may prove to be insufficient, however. But then one will have to admit that Udovenko was right to some extent after all.

6 Alternative Confederal Concepts

Introductory Notes

In previous chapters in this volume, we have documented key aspects of the policy debate over whether the CIS mission is to facilitate a “civilized divorce” among the former Soviet republics, or to furnish the mechanism for reintegration into some kind of new union through which the new Russian state will invariably attempt to carry out its great power ambitions. The viewpoints of the political elites in the CIS states have been so divergent on this overarching issue, and on the detailed subissues within each sphere of integration-economic, political, and military-that little progress has been made toward operative integration of any kind. There has, however, been a tendency for some leaders to take the question of integration more seriously and to admit that some kind of economic integration, as a first step, would hold advantages over what exists. Parallel with the major debate over the CIS’s direction, certain strong political leaders within several CIS countries have been taking steps toward the formation of new potential “unions” or confederations. All of these potential unions claim to be compatible with the CIS, at levels below the umbrella commonwealth apparatus. It is still difficult to ascertain the truth of this claim, or to determine whether these subassociations could end up replacing the CIS. For the present, these confederations provide a balance to Russia’s great power ambitions.

Chapter 6 documents the key events in the evolution of the concepts for four of these potential new unions: (a) a Russia/Belarus confederation (or the Moscow/Minsk axis); (b) a Slavic Union; (c) a Eurasian Union; and (d) a Central Asian Union. Each of these represents an association between two or more states which is to be built on stronger mechanisms than bilateral treaties or CIS agreements. An approximate analogy might be drawn with organizations like the European Free Trade Association (EFTA), or the European Coal and Steel Community, which preceded or operated in parallel with the European Community for some time, until the Community absorbed them.

Each of the potential new confederal concepts contains extensive references to eventual political and military integration, but starts out with economic integration mechanisms. As a result, most of the policy emphasis in these potential unions has so far been put on economic standardization. Several factors have influenced the decision to seek economic integration first. For one thing, economic modernization is difficult to achieve through bilateral contacts alone; often an entire region coordinating its economic development goals can achieve those goals faster and more efficiently. Furthermore, production relations in the Soviet empire were often regionally oriented, and it is tempting to try to reestablish these relationships. If, however, these new associations or unions do partially reinstate Soviet economic structures, they could exclude much of the restructuring being contemplated in the economic reform plans of several of the former republics. Still another factor influencing CIS leaders is the social cost associated with economic transformation. Leaders have weighed the economic benefits of reinstituting old economic patterns with the costs of restructuring and reform, and have endorsed a restoration of old ties in the interests of achieving social stability.

Strong political leaders have so far been the driving force behind these potential confederal concepts. In the case of the Moscow/Minsk axis, President Aleksandr Lukashenka has been the strongest proponent. After his election in July 1994 he carried out plans that had been in place since 1992, but which had never materialized under Stanislav Shushkevich. The Slavic Union has also been championed by Lukashenka, who would like to draw Ukraine into the nearly complete union between Russia and Belarus. The Slavic Union has strong adherents among Russian rightwing and left-wing political leaders. Vladimir Zhirinovskiy and several of the neo-communist groups, as well as leaders of the national-patriot groups (Sergey Baburin, for example) have often called for a Slavic Union as the nucleus of a new Russian empire. The Eurasian Union, which is a loose confederation, approaching a new Soviet Union, is Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev's creation. A formal draft of this concept was presented to CIS leaders on 12 April 1994. So far, the current Russian administration has sidelined the plan, but Nazarbaev has continued to advocate it. The Central Asian Union is led jointly by the presidents of Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Kazakhstan. Formed partly in reaction to the unification tactics of the Slavic states, and partly in order to break out of the isolation of the colonial era and open up new channels of trade and communications, these leaders have structured a union almost identical to the CIS, but organized along ethnic and regional lines within the post-Soviet space. It is clear that Moscow regards the Central Asian Union as a challenge to its zone of influence in Central Asia.

In each case, these quasi confederal unions have been initiated to meet the perceived inadequacies of the CIS, and to integrate its members more closely and efficiently. Although striving toward a “confederal concept” in each instance, the proponents of the new confederal concepts have actually steered toward reestablishing the old federal Soviet economic, military, and political relationships. (For example, the Eurasian Union Treaty is worded almost identically to Mikhail Gorbachev’s nine-plus-one Union Treaty, with phrases added that purport to respect individual nations’ sovereignty and territorial integrity.) In actual fact, it is difficult for CIS leaders to distinguish between “federation” and “confederation,” not yet having strong national identities or legal systems to bring to a confederal association of states. Furthermore, it is difficult to conceive of a true confederation of equal states which would include Russia, which dwarfs the other former republics economically, militarily, and politically.

In the documents which follow, the leaders advocating each confederal concept voice their arguments and opinions of what is needed in the post-Soviet space. These leaders' statements are interspersed with positive and negative reactions to the potential new unions. A special introductory note for each section fills in the background to the documents.

Russia/Belarus Axis

Despite an active political debate in which the opposition to a union with Russia swelled almost at the "last minute," and continued to grow with hindsight, Belarus's leadership took many of the steps required to unify its newly independent state with Russia in February and May 1995. Belarus's tilt toward Moscow has been based primarily on pragmatic and strategic considerations: 90 percent of its enterprises produce for the Russian market; it is dependent on Russia for almost all of its energy supplies; it shares its eastern Slav ethnic roots with Russia; and Belarus's geostrategic position constrains its foreign policy choices.

Actions to form a Russian/Belarusian confederation began early. In July 1992, Belarusian Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich and Russian acting Prime Minister Egor Gaydar signed a new "Comprehensive Union" package of bilateral treaties. This package embraced cooperation in military and economic matters and looked toward significant political alignment in the near future. Egor Gaydar called the agreement "a step in the direction of a confederation within the CIS framework."

Nevertheless, a confederation was not to be concluded between the two countries so fast. The issues of Belarusian military neutrality and confederation with Russia were on a direct collision course and spawned a fierce battle in parliament, as well as in the public domain for nearly two more years. The main subject of debate was over whether Belarus ought to join the CIS Collective Security Treaty, which was seen by Stanislav Shushkevich as a grave threat to Belarusian sovereignty. Shushkevich was thoroughly committed to the principle of neutrality, saying it should define Belarusian foreign policy for centuries to come, especially given Belarus's desire to maintain positive relations with its Baltic and Central European neighbors.

Moscow, however, had made it pretty clear that economic cooperation with Belarus was out of the question as long as it claimed strict neutrality. Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich, who supported the concept of confederation, became Moscow's ally on the issue and argued that Belarus ought to sign the treaty, with certain reservations. The strong Belarus military-industrial complex supported this position, as did pan-Slav factions in parliament and other organizations. The rest of the populace was slow to become embroiled in political questions, and was pro-Russian to a much greater extent than, for example, Ukraine or Kazakhstan, even though they appeared in surveys to be no less committed to "democratic values."

The first documents in this collection highlight the sharp policy differences between Prime Minister Kebich and parliament head Shushkevich. The neutrality debate between government and parliament lasted until the election of the first Belarusian president on 10 July 1994, with the consequence that there was neither an abrupt break with Moscow, nor was the confederation consummated.

In 1993, however, several key economic battles emerged to accompany the struggles over Belarusian neutrality and to cause trouble spots between Moscow and Minsk. One was the question of Belarus's continued membership in the ruble zone; another was about a proposed “monetary union” between Russia and Belarus; and another was over Moscow’s use of energy as an economic weapon against Belarus. Moscow may have unnecessarily created a pretext for later popular hesitancy about the merits of a confederation by using its energy weapon, although at the time it probably considered Belarusians too politically inactive to worry about such things. Moscow raised energy prices in March 1993, cut down on its energy supplies in response to Belarus’s gas and oil debt, and maintained this pressure on Belarus in order to obtain its signature on the CIS Collective Security Treaty and the CIS Economic Union.

Also in March 1993 Belarus took policy steps which de facto amounted to a split from the ruble zone. The National Bank of Belarus (NBB) was the force behind this decision, floating a Belarusian currency parallel to the Russian ruble, and establishing a Belarusian foreign currency exchange, on which the Russian ruble was listed as a foreign currency. One year later, the NBB began to seriously question the treaty on a merger between the monetary systems of Belarus and Russia, which was signed by the prime ministers in April 1994. Under the treaty, the NBB was to have been abolished, and the Russian Central Bank was to control all emissions, as well as the monetary, credit and currency policies of the two countries. Moreover, the treaty would have gone so far as to consolidate the two country’s budgets. The documents that follow provide insights into the NBB’s principle concerns and into the political positions of Belarusian opposition groups and Russia on these issues.

In July 1994, with the election of Aleksandr Lukashenka, all of these disputes were settled after two visits to Moscow, and Belarus moved squarely into Russia's orbit. In the documents to follow, Lukashenka voices his pragmatic but abiding loyalty to Moscow, stressing that Belarus has no other options. These documents make clear Lukashenka's opinion that the Belovezh Forest meeting was a tragedy. The leader of the Belarusian Popular Front, Zenon Poznyak, on the other hand, strenuously objected, saying: "We need to break from Russia ... a criminal, bureaucratic state." Nevertheless, the process moved inexorably forward with Lukashenka's enthusiastic embrace of all of Russia's overtures. Only in December 1994, when the Russian State Duma suggested that Belarus and Russia hold a joint session of the two parliaments to discuss unification into one state, did Belarusian Parliament Speaker Myachoslav Hryb protest that such a joint session was unconstitutional-the standard reply whereby a CIS state gracefully declines a "suggestion" from Moscow.

This move by the Russian parliament activated the opposition still further and began to raise doubts among the Belarusian people. These included low, but audible, rumbling in the parliament and in the oppositionist Popular Front against Lukashenka's stridently pro-Russian bias. Ironically, the press accounts collected here would make it appear that in the last hour, the Belarusian people might be becoming more politically active and nationally conscious. Speaker of the Belarusian parliament Myachoslav Hryb mounted a wave of complaints against Russia's policies, especially after the Russian parliament made its bid for the joint session of the two parliaments. Hryb attacked Moscow, saying it “does not always base its relations with Minsk on the equality principle.” Russia was forced to accelerate its diplomatic actions for implementing a confederation with Belarus, anticipating that the election of a new Belarusian Supreme Council could halt or seriously delay these plans, which included restoration of Belarus’s Soviet-era flag.

Consequently, in January 1995, a comprehensive Friendship and Cooperation Treaty was signed between the two nations following a three-day visit to Minsk by Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev. This was to be followed by the signing of a comprehensive package of bilateral agreements which would go far toward unifying the two governments in economic and military relations. On 14 May, Belarus held parliamentary elections and a popular referendum on Lukashenka’s policies of economic integration with Russia. The referendum gave Lukashenka surprisingly strong backing for his policies, thereby causing a political setback for the Belarusian nationalists. Nevertheless, the nationalists kept up their loud protests. According to Popular Front leaders, the customs agreement and others which accompanied the Friendship and Cooperation Treaty would result in “the liquidation of the independence of the state, the complete poverty of the Belarusian nation, huge losses. . . .” They also charged that these were political, not economic, agreements in that they provided for “free transit and maintenance services for military establishments of the Russian Federation on the territory of Belarus,” and made several other concessions, such as full-scale free trade. The free trade measure threatened Belarusian enterprises that might try to compete with much larger and more efficient Russian enterprises. In Belarus, for example, average per capita income comes to just $9.20 per month, whereas in Russia it is $120.00. The nationalists also accused Lukashenka of isolating Belarus from the West in favor of a reannexation to Russia.

To complicate the situation further, Belarusian parliamentary elections had failed to attract enough voters to elect a new Supreme Council in February 1995. The old Supreme Soviet, still under the leadership of Myachoslav Hryb, was kept alive, but Lukashenka made it clear he considered it illegal and rejected several pieces of its legislation. On Belarus's five-year independence day, 27 July 1995, the Popular Front held a public demonstration which grew to nearly one thousand people and erupted into violence near the end. This gave Lukashenka serious cause for reconsideration. Since then, he has increased his contacts with the West, established closer ties with Belarusian economic organizations, instituted an emergency “Economic Crisis Program” of his own, and ceased to emphasize Russia in his public speeches, even saying that “several mistakes have been made by the presidency.” It is still unclear where plans to unify the two countries are headed, but they can certainly not be ratified until Lukashenka arranges for the election of a new Supreme Soviet.

Since his election, Lukashenka has also actively campaigned for the unification of the three Slavic states. In his television address on 29 August 1994 he called Russia “elder brother” of the Belarusian people and said he stood “not only for unification of Belarus and Russia, but for all Slavic nations.” This declaration puts Lukashenka in the political camp which supports Russia as the great power leader of a separate Slavic bloc within the CIS, although he usually refers to the three eastern Slavic states and does not include Slovakia, the Czech Republic, or Serbia (as, for example, Zhirinovskiy does). Lukashenka’s pro-Slav union stance aligns him with the left-wing communist and pan-Slav parties in Belarus. He is also like these groups in other ways. On market issues, Lukashenka flatly opposes making land private property and supports the continuation of collective farming.

In sum, Belarus has experienced its own version of the tumultuous and bewildering search for identity occurring in every CIS country. Although the Moscow/Minsk Axis is still a distinct entity, and could become the nucleus for reintegrating the CIS states, Belarus is going through a maturation process. If Lukashenka can establish absolute power over weaker nationalist elements, Belarus is quite likely to enter into a confederation with Russia, becoming an appendage, which might worry some Central European states, such as Poland.

6.1 Economic Treaty with Belarus Issued Agreement

Izvestiya, 8 February 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Early in 1992, Belarus entered into a bilateral economic treaty with Russia. Parliamentary Chairman Shushkevich accepted the fact that Belarus was economically dependent on Russia's markets, although he tried to open avenues that would reorient Belarusian trade more to the West and tried to maintain Belarus's neutrality on defense matters. Despite his efforts, it was clear from the beginning of the CIS that Belarus was sovereign and independent only in words.

For the purpose of creating the most favorable economic and legal conditions for the entrepreneurial activity of all kinds of economic structures and the development of market relations and broad economic ties between the Russian Federation and the Republic of Belarus, the Contracting Parties have agreed on the following:

Article 1. Trading and economic relations between the Russian Federation and the Republic of Belarus are carried out within a single economic area on the basis of mutual advantage.

Article 2. The organs of power and management of the parties to this agreement, both at their centers and local level, take all necessary coordinated economic, legal, and organizational measures ensuring freedom of enterprise and the sale, acquisition, and movement of goods, work, services, and investments on their own territories and between the Russian Federation and the Republic of Belarus.

Article 3. A single monetary unit (the ruble) is used as the means of financial settlement, money circulation, granting of credit, and other kinds of financial transactions on the territories of the Russian Federation and the Republic of Belarus.

The governments of Russia and Belarus and their central banks provide arrangements for the unhindered movement of all kinds of monetary resources.

The central banks systematically inform each other about the volumes of credit and money issue and the state of money circulation.

Article 4. Enterprises and organizations of all legal organizational forms registered on the territory of the Contracting States are entitled to set up subsidiary enterprises, branches, departments, offices, and other individual subunits on the territory of the other state without let or hindrance provided the appropriate legislation is observed.

Article 5. In their activity and economic transactions on the territory of the other Contracting State, enterprises and organizations of all kinds of ownership comply with the latter's tax system.

Article 6. The organs of power and management of the Russian Federation and the Republic of Belarus pursue an active anti-monopoly policy, support the new economic relations, and do not allow the adoption of normative acts which restrict the free development of market relations.

Article 7. For the purpose of priority implementation of bilateral treaties on deliveries of goods, the Russian Federation and the Republic of Belarus conduct a coordinated export-import policy with respect to goods and services of substantial significance to the exchange of commodities between the parties to this agreement.

The governments of the Contracting Parties pledge not to introduce additional payments for transportation across their territory (transit) by any means of transportation, including pipelines. This procedure applies to all kinds of freight, including export and import freight.

Article 8. A bilateral intergovernmental commission is created for the elaboration and pursuit of specific measures in execution of this agreement and the monitoring of its observance by the government of the Russian Federation and the Republic of Belarus.

6.2 New “Comprehensive Union” Created with Belarus

Vitaliy Portnikov

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 22 July 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich, former Belarusian Communist Party chairman, succeeded in deepening the union between Belarus and the Russian Federation in July, cementing Russia's military role in Belarus and consolidating the quasi-confederation between them. The border between Belarus and the Baltic states represents a critical issue in relations between the Baltic republics and Russia. Kebich's allusion to the "closing" of this border has an ominous ring to it, which sounds as though calculated to warn the Baltic states against too independent a line. By the end of 1992, Kebich had won his battle with Stanislav Shushkevich over the question of a military alliance with Russia. Though Shushkevich continued to prevent Belarus from signing the CIS Collective Security Treaty, the bilateral treaty soon became a more powerful short-term tool in Russian leaders' hands than the Collective CIS Treaty.

After six hours of tiring coordination Belarusian Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich, Russian Federation Acting Prime Minister Egor Gaydar, and leaders of both republics' ministries signed a package of documents which the Belarusian premier described as a "comprehensive union." "Neither I myself nor my predecessors ever succeeded in signing such an agreement as the one we are signing today," Kebich emphasized. He urged journalists to draw special attention to the document on military cooperation as being most important. The Belarusian premier recalled that this aspect was absent from the interstate treaties concluded by the Russian Federation with Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan earlier.

In addition to military union, the Russian-Belarusian accords embrace very broad cooperation in the economy-even including setting up an interrepublic economic coordination council. Egor Gaydar concurred that the agreement is a step in the direction of a confederation within the CIS framework (Kebich said “tiny little steps”) and expressed hope verging on confidence that some CIS countries-Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan, above all-will join this union.

This statement by the head of the Russian government takes the accords reached between the Russian Federation and Belarus beyond bilateral contracts, as it were. Answering a question from Nezavisimaya Gazeta's correspondent as to whether the Russian-Ukrainian “reconciliation” at Dagomys had influenced the conclusion of the Russian-Belarusian union, Premier Kebich “unequivocally declared”-yes. It obviously became clear to the Belarusian leaders after Dagomys that there simply is no alternative to rapprochement with Russia, but Kebich refused to answer a question about the possibility of Ukraine’s subscribing to the Russian- Belarusian accords.

Russia and Belarus also agreed, according to V. Kebich, “on the joint closure of certain borders.” To all appearances, it may be a question, above all, of the borders with the Baltic countries, which will now have to regard Belarus as a definite ally of Russia (although the Belarusian premier remarked to journalists that the signing of agreements with Russia does not mean that Belarus has abandoned its policy of equidistance from its neighbors).

6.3 Shushkevich, Kebich Differ on Confederation Igor Sinyakevich

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 19 September 1992 [FBIS Translation]

During a visit to Germany, Belarusian leader Stanislav Shushkevich gave a news conference at which he expressed his attitude toward plans to create a confederation within the framework of the CIS.

According to ITAR-TASS, he stated: “My attitude toward this question is not what the newspapers have been writing recently. The issue of creating a confederation was missed in 1990, and after 1990 it is very difficult to return to it. Unfortunately, later too, in 1991, the USSR president did not heed advice on this issue. I believe a confederation is now hardly likely. Anyway, I do not have authorization from parliament to sign documents on closer interaction beyond that within the CIS. It is necessary to achieve truly legal relations on the basis of the documents already signed and not go further.”

References to the absence of authorization are the usual device used by the Belarusian Supreme Soviet chairman to avoid souring relations with Russia and at the same time not to follow in the wake of its “imperial policy.” Like any “centrist,” Stanislav Shushkevich merely reflects the real correlation of political forces.

Belarusian Premier Vyacheslav Kebich is more pro-Russian than the head of parliament. This is explained by economic pragmatism, on the one hand, and, on the other, by the need to strengthen his position on the eve of the referendum on early elections to parliament. The word “confederation” was heard for the first time in Moscow on 20 July during the signing of a package of Belarusian-Russian bilateral agreements. It may be assumed that this was a sort of “trial balloon” with the aim of eliciting public reaction to the said innovation. As was to be expected, the opposition, in the shape of the Belarusian People’s Front, mounted a campaign of criticism of the Moscow accords and designated them the result of “the capitulatory position of the comprador-style government of Belarus.”

Understandably, the premier will now be more cautious regarding the fraternal embraces of the “great eastern neighbor.” All the more so inasmuch as Russia has already broken the 20 July agreements. In accordance with the latter, the base price of the Russian petroleum delivered to the republic was not to exceed 2,800 rubles per ton before the end of the year. But it was precisely for the cheap petroleum so needed by the Belarusian ex-communists on the eve of the referendum that Russia obtained through the Moscow agreements a whole range of military-political and geoeconomic concessions.

The correlation of forces in the republic is such now that neither the abrupt disintegration of ties with Russia nor the voluntary return of its sovereign rights as the result of Belarus’s entry into a confederation will be welcomed by the public.

6.4 Security Commission Chairman on Treaty

Interview by Igor Sinyakevich

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 17 March 1993 [FBIS Translation]

[Sinyakevich]: Many Belarusian politicians today speak of the need for the republic to accede to the CIS Collective Security Treaty. There are also opponents who think it necessary for Belarus to maintain its neutrality. What do you think?

[Hryb]: If you look at questions of the security of the Republic of Belarus from the legislative viewpoint, we have determined our stand. At the Tashkent meeting of the CIS heads of state and heads of government, Stanislav Shushkevich, the head of our delegation, did not sign the treaty whereby the republic would have joined the collective security system. Proceeding from this fact, we are working out our own stand regarding the creation of the armed forces of the Republic of Belarus.

[Sinyakevich]: In a recent interview, however, Nikolay Shorynin, the Belarus prime minister's advisor, declared that the republic would sooner or later accede to the Collective Security Treaty. Are any changes expected in the republic's official stand on this matter?

[Hryb]: It is impossible to give a clear answer on whether we have gained anything from not acceding to the Collective Security Treaty, or whether we have lost by doing so. Many deputies and representatives of the executive branch think that, had we been among the states that signed the Collective Security Treaty, we would be finding it easier now to resolve the questions of securing arms and material for our armed forces. Belarus has concluded bilateral treaties on military and technical cooperation with Russia and Ukraine. But these agreements are not always fulfilled. There are various forces hindering it. We cannot simply ignore this. Of course, our sovereignty and our neutrality are very important and valuable notions. World experience shows, however, that neutrality is not to be interpreted in so lopsided a manner. Indeed, the neutral European states are members of a European security system. So there are different opinions, and everything will depend on our parliament's deciding whether we remain in a position of pure neutrality, or we accede to the Collective Security Treaty with certain reservations. Such as, for example, a reservation to the effect that we will not be supplying our armed forces for actions on the territories of other countries. Provided, of course, that this is accepted by the other parties to the treaty.

[Sinyakevich]: Does the Belarusian leadership regard military cooperation with Russia as enforced and temporary, or is this a strategy?

[Hryb]: As I see it, we should orient ourselves toward cooperation with Russia over a long period. There are also economic factors prompting us to cooperate: Russia has raw materials while we have a concentration of manufacturing sectors. It is not so easy to break into Western markets filled with goods, whereas Russia is a fine market for our products. I believe that we should be interested in a very close, well-disposed, and intimate cooperation with Russia. I see this as giving us advantages and adding appeal to our plan.

6.5 Communique Notes Importance of Ties

ITAR-TASS 18 March 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: By March 1993 a turning point had been reached in Belarusian-Russian relations. Russia had agreed to the creation of a joint monetary and banking system, based on the ruble. These plans ran into difficulties, originating in the different paces of economic reform espoused by the two governments.

Minsk reported today on the results of the visit to Belarus by a Russian parliamentary delegation led by Ruslan Khasbulatov, the parliamentary speaker. "The sides have expressed their resolution to strengthen their treaty and legal basis" the document notes.

The sides spoke in favor of bringing closer together their legislation on socio-economic questions, and also creating in the near future a concrete mechanism for the functioning of a common credit and monetary system based on a common monetary unit-the ruble-the currency of the Russian Federation.

The parliamentary heads agreed to begin work immediately on drawing up proposals to create the legal basis for a single monetary system for the two countries, to implement coordinated budgetary, tax, credit, customs, and price policies, and to form a single economic and customs union. Both sides confirmed their interest in interacting during the implementation of economic reforms. They noted the constructive approach of both sides in tackling problems in the military political sphere.

The chairman of the Russian Federation Supreme Soviet expressed his satisfaction at the ratification by the Belarus Supreme Soviet of the START I treaty.

6.6 Kebich Endorses CIS Collective Security Treaty

From the “Presidential Bulletin” feature compiled by Andrey Pershin, Andrey Petrovskiy, and Vladimir Shishlin; and edited by Boris Grishchenko
Interfax, 18 March 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: In the first half of 1993, Vyacheslav Kebich persistently lobbied for his pro-Russian, integrationist views, which included ceding supranational powers to CIS institutions. His position was that of the non-dogmatic, socialist wing of the former communists who thought of Russia as the “center” of a new confederation. Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich told heads of local executive power bodies Thursday [18 March] that Belarus's position with regard to the CIS Collective Security Treaty should be reviewed. He considered that the republic should join the treaty, but on the following two conditions: that citizens of Belarus carry out their military service only in the republic itself; and that the Belarusian armed forces do not take part in the quelling of regional conflicts on the territory of other states. Kebich was convinced that the Belarusian army would soon prove incapable of defending the republic if Belarus did not sign the treaty. “The situation which is developing outside Belarus compels us to strengthen our borders,” he said. The prime minister was of the opinion that a number of CIS states posed a considerable threat to the republic. These were states in which armed conflicts were taking place and political tension existed.

Kebich doubted the practicality and wisdom of the republic's achieving its declared goal of becoming a neutral state. He declared in the name of the government the necessity to back down from that goal made by parliament.

The prime minister considered it essential to set up an Economic Union of Commonwealth States. He said that this should incorporate agreed fiscal, credit and monetary, hard currency, and external customs policies. Economic trade relations would be built on the rigorous observation of agreements with the imposition of "harsh sanctions" on any state which ignored these. Kebich considered that the Interstate CIS Economic Court which was under formation must be given the appropriate powers. After stressing that the above was an official Belarusian governmental statement Kebich announced the results of his consultations on the formation of the Economic Union with the prime ministers of Russia, Kazakhstan, and Ukraine. He said that the Belarusian proposal had been backed unanimously.

The prime minister once again confirmed the government's policy on developing a "socialized economy." After speaking in support of the market and private ownership Kebich said that privatization in the republic should take place on a stage-by-stage basis. First of all, service sector enterprises would be privatized, then consumer goods manufacturing, agricultural enterprises, and, finally, steps would be taken to privatize large plants, the Belarusian prime minister announced.

6.7 Kebich Favors Creation of CIS Economic Union

Interfax, 18 March 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: As illustrated in the press note below, Prime Minister Kebich continued to cite two conditions on the deployment of Belarusian troops under the CIS Collective Security Treaty. These conditions, however, meant little in terms of Belarus's political position with respect to the CIS. The Collective Security Treaty determines "external borders" of the CIS (implying a single confederated state), and legitimizes Russia's CIS-wide "peacekeeping" role.

At a conference of heads of local executive organs on Thursday [18 March] in Minsk, Kebich said that such a union envisages implementation of a coordinated fiscal, monetary credit, currency, and customs foreign policy, establishment of trade-economic relations based on unconditional observance of treaties, and usage of "tough sanctions" with respect to the parties which violate these treaties. The premier believes that the currently created CIS Interstate Economic Court should have appropriate authorities.

Kebich made the point that the premiers of Russia, Kazakhstan, and Ukraine have unanimously supported this initiative put forward by the chairman of the Belarusian Council of Ministers in the course of consultations devoted to the creation of the Economic Union.

At the conference Kebich also proposed to revise Belarus's attitude toward the CIS Treaty on Collective Security. The head of the Belarusian government believes that the republic should enter the system of the Commonwealth's collective security under two obligatory provisions, namely, the citizens of Belarus will serve only on the territory of their homeland and the Belarusian armed forces will not participate in settlement of interethnic conflicts on territories of other states.

6.8 Country “Quietly” Leaving Ruble Zone

Egor Glukharev

Kommersant-Daily, 20 March 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: It was becoming apparent by the end of March 1993 that Belarus's slow pace of reform was incompatible with Russia's comparatively lively one. This was the primary reason for Russia's reluctance to become the primary creditor and monetary regulator in a CIS ruble zone. Belarus, after realizing that it would not receive special Russian subsidies or discounts on the oil it imported from Russia, decided to introduce its own ruble as a separate and freely floating currency on the Interbank Hard Currency Exchange of Belarus. By floating the Russian ruble and forcing 100 percent of earned rubles to be sold to the Central Bank, Belarus transformed the Russian currency into a foreign one on the Belarusian market.

Representatives of the Belarusian leadership continue to state that their republic does not intend to leave the ruble zone. Recent developments, however, attest to the contrary. Yesterday a joint decree by the Council of Ministers and the National Bank of Belarus “On Regulating Settlement with Republics of the Former USSR” was officially circulated. Its content makes it possible to conclude that a national currency is, in fact, being introduced. Kommersant-Daily correspondent Egor Glukharev comments on the situation that has taken shape.

Despite the understanding reached in Bishkek at the end of last year by heads of states in the ruble zone a republic leaving the ruble zone is supposed to notify parties to the agreement at least two months in advance of the introduction of national currency. Belarus is putting its own bank notes into parallel circulation and is adopting decisions that amount virtually to quitting the ruble zone. In particular, the joint decree adopted “without much ado” by the Council of Ministers and the National Bank of Belarus, and officially circulated yesterday, envisions a transition to floating official quotations for the monetary units of former USSR republics. Quotations will be fixed on the results of trading at the Interbank Hard Currency Exchange of the Republic of Belarus. This is a de facto recognition of the fact that the Belarusian and Russian rubles are two different currencies, and the decree draws a very clear distinction between the two.

The occasion for the signing of the new decree is innocent enough-to solve the problem of settlements with Russia, namely, to create a reserve of Russian rubles through the obligatory sale of all their rubles by Belarusian commercial structures to the National Bank of Belarus at the official current rate. Subsequently, these rubles are to be sold on the domestic currency market at the exchange-quoted rate. The purchased currency must be used within twenty days to pay for contracts with foreign suppliers, and, failing this, the monies are to be sold back to the National Bank.

According to specialists, the decision to officially float the Russian ruble actually amounts to the introduction of a Belarusian monetary unit. As it tries to solve the problem of settlements with Russia, however, and given the deficit of Russian rubles and the lower purchasing power of the Belarusian ruble, Belarus will soon come up against the problem of devaluation of its national currency, like what happened to Ukraine at the end of last year.

Increasingly, the present decree envisions 100 percent sales of Russian rubles whereas the normal quota for the mandatory sale of hard currency, in particular the dollar, is 20 percent of export takings. Thus, a curious situation arises where Russian rubles are valued in Belarus higher than dollars, and have in fact become a foreign currency.

6.9 Popular Front Warns Against Pro-Russian Orientation

Vasiliy Romanovskiy

Vecherniy Minsk, 24 December 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The Board of the Belarusian Popular Front [BPF] has issued a statement deeming the results of the Russian elections as a victory of fascist and communist extremists.

“Political strife in Moscow has been aggravated,” reads the document. “The events in Russia have testified to the danger of being in this country’s neighborhood. Union or concord with Russia means being hostage to unforeseen and aggressive Russian policies, as well as the unstable situation in that country.

“The BPF believes that Belarus should immediately leave the CIS. The Belarusian-Russian border should become a fully established state border.... A ‘common ruble zone’ with the country that permanently stands on the brink of civil war is out of the question. Union with Russia, which is being supported by the government, will lead us into the deadlock of murderous Russian conflicts and lead to an economic and political breakdown. Any further orientation toward Russia will bring destruction to Belarus.”

6.10 Discussion of Economic Integration

Gennadiy Ezhov

ITAR-TASS, 2 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor’s Note: A year passed, allowing Russian leaders to assess the political costs of allowing Belarus to opt out of the ruble zone. These were judged to be too high. In April 1994 a bilateral treaty providing for the merging of the Russian and Belarusian banking and monetary systems was drafted and submitted to the two governments for deliberation. The treaty would cede Belarusian economic sovereignty to the Russian Federation. Negotiations were to require a full year, but by mid-1995 Russia and Belarus were ready to join their economies through separate agreements on banking and payments, customs, and other trade regulations.

Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin met his Belarusian counterpart Vyacheslav Kebich for negotiations today to discuss the implementation of the bilateral treaty on monetary merging.

Russia is ready to change some treaty articles and sign an agreement on amendments, the Russian premier told correspondents upon the meeting's completion. In his words, the new agreement will be concluded with Vyacheslav Kebich to "stop political games around the close economic integration of Russia and Belarus."

The treaty of April 1994 provides for the transfer of all powers of the Belarusian Central Bank to the Central Bank of the Russian Federation which runs counter to the current Belarusian constitution. It seems that the Belarusian Central Bank will have to pass over its regulating functions to the Russian bank, chairman of the Russian Central Bank and member of the Russian delegation, Viktor Gerashchenko said here today.

Asked about the issuance of a Russian state credit to Belarus, Kebich said that Russia is to issue 150 billion rubles to Belarus in the first half of 1994 under the agreement of 24 May. Only 20 billion have been issued, he added.

Belarus hopes to receive an additional credit in the second half of 1994 but this will depend on who controls the money emission in the single system of the two states. Russia is now ready to allocate 42 billion rubles to eliminate the consequences of the Chernobyl accident on Belarusian territory.

The negotiations did not discuss the second stage of Belarusian presidential elections, Kebich told correspondents. He stressed it is an internal affair of the state. At the same time, the Russian prime minister did not exclude a meeting with leader of the Belarusian presidential race and parliament deputy Aleksandr Lukashenka.

6.11 Signs Monetary Merger Progress Protocol

Gennadiy Ezhov

ITAR-TASS, 3 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Russia and Belarus today signed a protocol on the progress in the implementation of the April agreements on uniting their monetary systems. Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin and Vyacheslav Kebich, the head of the Belarusian government, put their signatures under the document. The document reflects, on the one hand, the progress in the unification process, and on the other, it outlines very tough (in terms of time), objectives to work out ways and mechanisms of carrying out the monetary emission and exchange of monetary notes.

Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksandr Shokhin said in an ITAR-TASS interview that concrete mechanisms could be drawn up by August.

The treaty on merging the monetary systems of Russia and Belarus, signed in April 1994, contained a provision that the Russian Central Bank should have the power to control and regulate the activities of the National Bank of Belarus.

The protocol says that, if a need arises to introduce certain adjustments into the documents signed earlier, this can be done. However, in doing this Russia will be guided not by political, but by purely professional, banking, and finance considerations, Aleksandr Shokhin said.

According to the deputy prime minister, this means that if the National Bank of Belarus acquires a different status from that recorded in earlier agreements, a number of points in those agreements will have to be adjusted accordingly. The two sides agreed to outline in full detail by August 1994 how emission is to be regulated. For instance, if the Russian Central Bank carried out the emission through the National Bank of Belarus by using the corresponding control mechanisms, this could be practiced instead of the Russian Central Bank taking over all the controlling functions, and it would not contradict the existing Constitution of the Republic of Belarus.

6.12 Shumeyko Predicts Increased Integration with CIS

Interfax, 14 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Chairman of the Federation Council Vladimir Shumeyko is not inclined to overly exaggerate the consequences of the new Belarusian leaders' possible refusal to create a monetary union with Russia. He told journalists during his visit to Interfax agency on Wednesday that the Belarusian parliament had opposed such a union, because if the state loses control over monetary emission, it partly loses its sovereignty.

He said, however, that the Russian and Belarusian leaders would find a new form of integration, because integration as such reflects the vital interests of the two states. In his opinion, in the near future Russia's economic contacts with the CIS countries would become stronger, which will make their political ties stronger as well. Eventually, the Commonwealth of Independent States may develop into a confederation, he said.

In the meantime, the Russian Federation must establish borders with the former Soviet republics to protect Russia from the uncontrolled inflow of goods, drugs, and weapons from foreign states, said Shumeyko. The border regime will be different in different sections, he went on to say. It must be extremely stringent in the sections bordering on the Baltic states, while relations with those countries must be friendly.

He announced that as before he favored the idea of extending the mandates of the president and parliament. He also said that many public figures and statesmen shared this view.

6.13 National Bank Seeks to Amend Monetary Union with Moscow

Interfax, 14 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

The Bank of Belarus is insisting on amending the treaty of unification of its monetary system with Russia, signed in Moscow on 12 April. A source at the National Bank of Belarus (NBB) told the Financial Information Agency on Thursday that the bank's board had drafted amendments to be sent to experts at the Central Bank of the Russian Federation in the near future.

Among other things the amendments provide for changing article five of the treaty, because its current wording implies the abolition of the NBB. The Belarusian National Bank also suggests reserving in the treaty the right of the Bank of Belarus and the Central Bank of Russia to the joint control of emission, monetary, credit and currency policies. Besides, it proposes the coordination of credit emission and refunding rates.

The NBB insists on the exclusive right to independently carry out monetary emission in Belarus and control the activity of banks and creditor institutions. It is suggested opening correspondent accounts of the NBB at the CBR and of the CBR at the NBB.

The National Bank of Belarus is for setting the exchange rate of the Belarusian and Russian currencies on a parity basis proceeding from the real buying power of either currency computed by the national boards of statistics and irrespective of the free-market cross-rate of the Belarusian and Russian rubles against the U.S. dollar.

Instead of consolidating the state budgets of the two countries, the NBB suggests jointly coordinating the budgets of consolidated budgets in percent of their gross domestic products and jointly choosing methods and sources of covering the deficits, the minimum state debt, and terms of servicing it.

The proposed amendments provide for an inquiry by experts into the equivalency of incomes of either side after the abolition of customs duties.

Russia and Belarus early this month signed a protocol to pledge to amend the treaty, if need be. A Russian-Belarusian summit meeting is expected to take place in the first days of August where negotiations on the unification of monetary systems would continue.

6.14 Lukashenka Favors Pragmatic Relations with Russia

Editorial from the “Vzglyad” program Ostankino Television, 29 July 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

[Aleksandr Lukashenka] says that in the past his opponents had accused him of being anti-Russian, but this was not the case. He says: “In Belarus there is no politician who is more favorably inclined toward Russia than Lukashenka. You will not find such a politician in Belarus. Therefore, for me the concepts of independence and sovereignty are specific actions, specific actions by politicians. Up to now they have been just a routine uproar, particularly in parliament, in the Supreme Soviet. This was played as a political card. I would like to stop playing this political card.

“I am a pragmatist, a man from industry. When your Aleksandr Shokhin visited us-Aleksandr Shokhin has a pragmatic view of relations between Russia and Belaruswe reached a common understanding remarkably quickly on how to tackle this problem. We reached the understanding that today it is necessary to tackle urgent human problems, economic problems. We will tackle economic problems. Then we will tackle such things as confederation, federation, or former Soviet Union. Unfortunately, at present we tried to tackle this problem from the top downward, whether to be a confederation or a federation. In my opinion, if we go along this road we will not achieve any confederation or federation; we will not achieve any drawing together but more likely we will soon not even be speaking to each other. That is, I am in favor of the problem of Russian-Belarus relations being tackled from the bottom upward.”

6.15 Parliamentary Speaker Views Integration with Russia

Viktor Kuklov ITAR-TASS, 29 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Below, Myacheslav Hryb reacts to the economic pressures partially responsible for Belarus's preparedness to sign a treaty unifying the monetary systems of Belarus and Russia. All supplies bought from Russian factories would be purchased at the same price paid by Russian consumers, which would mean reductions of 50 percent, or more.

“The Russian armed forces' presence in Belarus is a historical necessity, an unavoidable legacy. We cannot ask our neighbor to withdraw all its troops immediately because they need to be stationed somewhere. A bilateral agreement has been signed, which recognizes that the situation is temporary,” chairman of the Belarus Supreme Soviet Myacheslav Hryb said in an interview in the Zvyazda newspaper, which is published in Minsk. He also noted that Russia is not to blame for this state of affairs and that “the Commonwealth of States can be compared to a family that owes its existence to skillful compromise.”

Belarus agreed with the timetable that Russia put forward for the withdrawal of its troops and will help with transit. Russia, in turn, will give the republic discounts on the purchase of fuel.

The speaker of the Belarus parliament stressed again that the signing of the treaty on the unification of the Belarusian and Russian monetary systems did not mean that they had actually been unified. The Supreme Soviet needs to ratify a number of articles in the treaty before this can happen. Nine articles are currently valid, involving taxation and customs tariffs among others.

“I personally support integration, but not by huge steps,” Myacheslav Hryb said, “although I must admit that it would be very much to our advantage to buy fuel, for example, at the prices for which Russians buy it. Russia currently supplies us with oil at $80 a ton, whereas it supplies its own consumers for $40. This, of course, affects the price of our own output. In addition to this, Russia is still the main market for our goods. We cannot sell them in Poland or in the West.”

6.16 President Pins Hopes for Security on Russia

ITAR-TASS, 10 August 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Aleksandr Lukashenka was elected president of Belarus in June 1994. He has been described by critics as a megalomaniac, a dictator, and a paranoid personality who has done much to turn the clock backward in the CIS, playing into the hands of Russian radical nationalists and empire-builders. Lukashenka was thirty-eight years old at the time of his election, having formerly achieved the sole distinction of being a collective farm director who had an understanding for his electorate. The document which follows is merely the precursor to Lukashenka's subsequent actions to join Belarus with Russia, and while doing so to create a deep constitutional crisis in Belarus over presidential and parliamentary rule.

“Who are we to ensure our security with? My answer is- Russia. Our economy and our army are most closely linked with Russia,” Belarus President Aleksandr Lukashenka told ITAR-TASS today. He added that “many Belarus enterprises were part and parcel of the common military-industrial complex and are tightly ‘linked with Russia.’ What is more, they manufacture goods of world quality standard which are supplied both to the Belarus and the Russian armies. There is a double link between the Belarus and Russian armed forces: The Belarus army cannot be ensured with everything it needs without close economic ties with Russia. There are also some purely military aspects, too. I do not intend to spoil the good relations existing between our two armies.”

“We have agreed to conclude a treaty of friendship and good-neighborly relations,” Lukashenka stated. “It is strange that no such agreement was signed so far. We have completed the formation of all the articles of the treaty to merge our monetary systems. But we have to catch up at least a bit with Russia in order to carry out this unification.”

The Belarus president stressed that he attached priority importance to the republic’s relations with Russia.

“Moscow is not trying to dictate the pace of the rapprochement between our two states,” he added.

“There is no sign of any diktat in our relations. On the contrary, I was somewhat surprised during the negotiations by the understanding, tact and even, I may say, emotion with which the Russian leadership treated Belarus and its new leadership.”

Speaking about his view on the problems of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), the president said: “Today it is our duty to safeguard the slightest form of unity left among the states of the former union. The CIS is the only thing left and the only thing that holds us together to a certain extent. This is why we must strengthen and expand the Commonwealth. And I shall do everything in my power to help raise the extent of the Commonwealth’s integrity to an increasingly higher level.”

6.17 Lukashenka Urges Unification of Slavic States

From the “Presidential Bulletin” feature compiled by Nikolay Zherebtsov and Andrey Petrovskiy; and edited by Vladimir Shishlin, Interfax, 29 August 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor’s Note: Aleksandr Lukashenka does not believe in the Belovezh Forest agreement. He would have preferred a confederated Soviet Union, with planned and coordinated production managed by state enterprises. He was to give many television addresses urging the reunification of the three eastern Slavic states, and even threatening dire consequences for Ukraine if it did not give up its sovereignty and become part of the Slavic Union.

President Aleksandr Lukashenka, speaking on Sunday night over the national TV, doubted the expediency of the construction in the Russian city of Lipetsk of a tractor-building plant. He said that the plan is being developed by the Russian government.

Lukashenka believes that there is no sense for Russia to spend money for the construction of a plant similar to the Minsk Tractor Plant and proposed to use better the available capacities for the construction of tractors in Belarus.

Calling the Russian people an “elder brother” of the Belarusian people, Lukashenka said that he stands not only for the unification of Russia and Belarus, but for all Slavic nations. “The Belarusian people is sincerely for the unification with Russia,” he believes.

Interfax Note: Lukashenka, as is known, was the only deputy in the Belarusian parliament who voted in 1991 against the ratification of the Belovezh Forest agreements on the creation of the Commonwealth of Independent States and the elimination of the Soviet Union. During his election campaign, the future president, addressing deputies of the Russian parliament, spoke in favor of the union of three Slavic nations, Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine.

He said that he is flatly against the idea of making land private property. He said that there are many individual farms in the republic, whose land is used with less efficiency than the land of collective and state farms.

He doubted the expediency of auctioning production enterprises and buying them by their work collectives. The auctioned enterprises in Belarus cannot elevate labor productivity, said Lukashenka. Tomorrow, 30 August, President Lukashenka will be forty. Interfax congratulates the Belarusian president.

6.18 “Dynamics” Forces Lukashenka to Face Many Issues

Yuras Karmanov Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 20 December 1994 [FBIS Translation]

The “Eastern vector” in Minsk’s policy again made itself felt during the Budapest summit of the CSCE member states. In his statement Aleksandr Lukashenka expressed concern about NATO's moving its borders to Belarus. In view of the Brussels failure of the Russian "Russia-NATO" program and Belarus's subsequent refusal to join the NATO Partnership for Peace program, the official Minsk position should be seen as having been made clear once and for all. The dynamics of geopolitical changes in Eastern Europe, conditioned by the drift by the Baltic states and the Visegrad group toward NATO, is forcing Belarus to define its own place. The memorandum on security guarantees, signed in Budapest by Great Britain, the United States, and Russia, to a large extent eases confrontation between countries orientated toward Russia and those oriented toward NATO, without, however, removing the cause of the confrontation. In practice this will mean that Russia's aspiration to keep Belarus within the sphere of its political influence will be growing in direct proportion to the growth of confrontation in the East European region. In this process, its energy dependence on Russian oil and gas is becoming the main lever to pressure Minsk. Belarus's debt to Russia for gas supplies has exceeded one trillion Russian rubles. The conflict between Minsk and Ankara, provoked by a mild wave of spy mania, with a subsequent rupture of diplomatic relations, in the runup to a switchover to world prices in mutual settlements for energy carriers between Minsk and Moscow deprives the republic of an alternative to Russian oil. This alternative could have been the Baltic-Black Sea terminal [kollektor] envisioning the participation of Turkey, the Baltic countries, and the Visegrad group. The pending agreement on a customs union, with a leading role for Russia, creates all prerequisites for Belarus's economic incorporation.

The emerging military-political integration of Russia and Belarus within the framework of the Collective Security Treaty, signed by ex-speaker Stanislav Shushkevich but not ratified by the Belarusian parliament, can become a starting point toward the formalization of two confrontation blocs in Eastern Europe. The so-called “cordon sanitaire” option, as a possible buffer between Russia and Europe with the participation of Ukraine, Belarus, and the Baltics, can be counted out automatically. The official moves by Belarusian parliament Speaker Myacheslav Hryb can be seen as an attempt to create a counterweight to the Belarusian Foreign Ministry’s official position. Recently he has stepped up his activities on the world arena, by visiting the United States, Poland, and Britain. Hryb does not consider it necessary to coordinate his moves with the republic’s Foreign Ministry. Attending the fortieth session of the North Atlantic Assembly, Hryb spoke in support of Belarus’s earliest possible accession to Partnership for Peace. The head of parliament did not read in the Visegrad group’s wish to join NATO any negative consequences for Belarus. The Belarusian parliament speaker described their position as quite reasonable and justified, so saying at a press conference on the results of his visit. Moreover, when in Warsaw, Hryb began to discuss the question of Belarus joining the Visegrad group, in which Lithuania and Ukraine are also seeking membership, and even obtained a promise of support from Hungary and Poland.

In all probability, Myacheslav Hryb’s attempts to create an alternative to Lukashenka’s one-sided orientation toward the Kremlin are dictated by the awareness of the fallout within the country from open confrontation between Moscow and the West. Given that the Supreme Soviet has not as yet defined the country’s foreign policy doctrine, disputes about Belarus’ s geopolitical affiliation are already taking on the character of open polemics. The mounting pro-Russian movement, which has risen on the wave of the “Eastern vector” proclaimed by Lukashenka, is running the risk at a certain point of colliding with the “Western vector” of the democratic opposition, which is seeking support in the opposing camp.

The attitudes in Belarus to the events in Chechnya demonstrate the remoteness of the two poles.

Addressing a press conference by the democratic opposition, Belarusian National Front leader Zenon Poznyak described the Chechnya developments as the beginning of the restoration of an imperial Russia. He said that the Belarusian National Front Seym has decided to send Dzhokhar Dudaev a letter expressing admiration for the fortitude of the Chechen people in the struggle for the right of nations to self-determination. The Belarusian National Front leader assessed the Belarusian president’s silence as full support by Aleksandr Lukashenka for the Kremlin’s position.

6.19 Hryb Sees Russian Unification as Unconstitutional

From the “Presidential Bulletin” feature, compiled by Nikolay Zherebtsov and Andrey Petrovskiy; and edited by Vladimir Shishlin

Interfax, 29 December 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Parliamentary Chairman Myacheslav Hryb said neither he nor the parliament presidium had been asked to approve a recent proposal to convene a joint session of the Belarusian parliament and the Russian parliament’s lower house to discuss unification between Belarus and Russia. The proposal came from the State Duma, Russia's lower house, which suggested convening such a session next March.

“Unification between Belarus and Russia would contradict our constitution,” Hryb told Interfax in Kiev, where he led a parliamentary delegation on an official visit. “I see this as an initiative of some separate group of members of the Russian State Duma.”

But he said the matter could be put on the Belarusian parliament's agenda if a group of its members proposed this.

Moscow “does not always” base its relations with Minsk on the equality principle, Hryb complained.

Unification was also the subject of an international congress in Moscow, which was held several days ago and decided to set up grassroots action committees to collect signatures under petitions to call referendums in Russia, Kazakhstan, Belarus, and Ukraine on the reunification of those countries.

“Only immediate steps to reintegrate the republics, bringing them together into an economic, political, and defense union, would enable each of them to surmount the total and deep crisis,” the head of the International Congress of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs, Arkadiy Volskiy, told the forum, whose motto was “Toward reintegration through consensus.”

He said the reintegration of Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, and Kazakhstan should go through four stages: creating an open alliance of the four post-Soviet states; lifting all restrictions on the movement of goods, capital, and labor between them; making the four countries’ laws as similar as possible, and forming supranational administrative bodies. “We must appeal to the peoples of the republics and via referendums force their governments to start concrete reintegration processes,” Volskiy said in an interview with Interfax. “I don’t have the slightest doubt that the people would accept the idea of unification referendums.”

However, another congress delegate, Nikolay Gonchar, a member of the Federation Council, the upper house of the Russian parliament, told Interfax: “At this point we can only talk of an economic union. As for a political union, all the forces who hold power in the member countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States would rise up against that and, as far as a defense union goes, some forces in the West as well would be against it.”

6.20 Press Release: Embassy of the Republic of Belarus to the United States of America

4 January 1995

At a press conference held 29 December 1994 the Speaker of the Parliament of the Republic of Belarus Myacheslav Hryb informed journalists that parliamentarians of the Russian State Duma suggested to hold a joint session of the Belarusian and Russian Parliaments to discuss unification of Russia and Belarus into one state. Commenting upon this fact the Speaker stated that the issue was consulted neither with the president nor with the Supreme Council of the Republic of Belarus.

“The most important thing,” M. Hryb noted, “is that this proposal contradicts our Constitution. We cannot support such a decision.”

6.21 Friendship, Cooperation Treaty Initialed

Interfax, 24 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Andrey Kozyrev's visit to Minsk in January 1995, as sherpa for President Yeltsin, marked the end of the negotiation phase between the two “brother” states. A treaty was prepared for signature during Yeltsin's upcoming visit; speeches were written; and announcements for the West and other third countries were drafted. Kozyrev took full advantage of the occasion, pointing to the broader implications of the Agreements, to say that the Moscow/Minsk access could even “become a new model,” obviously referring to a framework for confederation which other CIS members could emulate.

Culminating Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev’s three-day visit to Minsk in January 1995, Belarus and Russia initialed a treaty on friendship and cooperation, and concluded a consular convention and a protocol on consultations between the Russian and Belarusian foreign ministries.

Kozyrev told a press conference in Minsk on Tuesday [24 January] that “a good foundation has been laid for President Yeltsin’s visit to Belarus.”

Yeltsin is expected to visit Belarus at the end of January or the beginning of February.

Kozyrev stated that “a tendency toward the two countries’ economic integration has made itself felt.” He also noted that the restoration of economic contacts does not mean an automatic roll-back to the past. Economic contacts must be resumed on a mutually advantageous basis, Kozyrev stressed.

“The year 1994 made it clearer what the CIS actually is—a form of civilized divorce of former Soviet republics, or a model of new association,” he said. He noted that “the form of civilized divorce is of great importance,” adding that “there are clear integration processes in relations between Russia and Belarus.”

6.22 Press Briefed on Results of Visit

Minsk Radio 24 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The visit of Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev to Minsk has ended. A news conference was held today in the national press center for Belarusian and foreign journalists during which the head of the Russian foreign political department summed up the results of the visit and answered questions from the journalists.

[Begin Kozyrev recording.] Today's conversation with Mikhail Chyhir gave me hope. He confirmed the aspiration, which is also present on our part, to put into effect and realize an agreement on a customs union, on payments, and so forth, i.e., those agreements that have recently been reached and enable us to speak about Belarus and Russia going over to a new quality of economic relations. I think that it is even setting a certain example for the CIS. You know that agreements of approximately the same character are taking shape between us and Kazakhstan. In a number of aspects, our two countries are setting new patterns, new levels of cooperation. Yesterday's meeting in the Supreme Soviet gave me hope and joy. During that meeting, two members of our delegation, representatives of the Duma and the Council of Federation, participated actively. They are both present here now at the news conference; therefore, if you have any questions, you can put them directly to our legislators. The main thing is that both our legislators and the Supreme Soviet [of Belarus], as I understand it, have aspirations to support those agreements, both political and economic. There is a good chance for ratification of the political agreement after their signing by the presidents-at least that was my impression after yesterday's meeting. And what is not less significant, there is a good chance that the legislators will try to work in unison so that the laws they adopt will reflect, of course, internal specifics and, first of all, the interests of each state, as well as the foreign policy and other aspects of activities, but at the same time making sure that they comply with each other. Then economic cooperation will develop actively too.

In short, the meetings that have been held leave a very good and optimistic feeling, including the meeting yesterday with representatives of creative intellectual workers, which show that, although with difficulties, a new model of equal mutually beneficial, good-neighborly partners' relations between the two brotherly peoples and states is taking shape. [End recording.]

6.23 Article Criticizes Customs Pact with Russia

Uladzimir Kulazhenka BELAPAN, 26 January 1995
[FBIS Translation]

[Article by Uladzimir Kulazhenka: "If the Belarusian-Russian Agreement on a Customs Alliance Is Ratified, Belarus Will Lose Its Economic Independence," from the "Analysis, Commentaries, Forecasts" feature No. 15, 18-24 January 1995.]

During the last two weeks passions have raged in the Supreme Soviet of Belarus around the detailed redistribution of the expenses sector of the budget, for the purpose of increasing expenditure on health protection. Conditions became even more tense when the MPs [Members of Parliament] received a package of documents signed by the governments of Russia and Belarus which, according to the Prime Minister Mikhail Chyhir, will become the basis for a conclusion to the Treaty on Friendship, Cooperation, and Good-Neighborly Relations between the two states. MP

Uladzimir Zablotski announced that it was exactly the tactless action of signing the agreements that will determine the shortage of resources for health protection, education, and culture. In the newspaper Literatura I Mastatstva the signed agreements were called “the deal of the week.” Members of the “shady cabinet” of the Belarusian Popular Front consider that the agreements signed about the establishment of a customs alliance between Russia and Belarus, about the main principles of the establishment of financial-industrial groups, and others, will result in “the liquidation of the independence of the state, the complete poverty of the Belarusian nation, huge losses, and the irreversible desecration and destruction of national, material, and cultural possessions.”

A particularly great deal of criticism was directed to the customs alliance, on the main principles for the creation of financial-industrial groups, and on the ensuring of mutual convertibility and the stabilization of the exchange rates of the Belarusian ruble and the Russian ruble. The extent to which this criticism is justified can be judged by an analysis of the Agreement on a Customs Alliance between the Republic of Belarus and the Russian Federation. This is not only an economic, but a political act. So, in the Protocol on the Introduction of a Free Trade Regime Without Exceptions or Limitations Between the Republic of Belarus and the Russian Federation it was recorded, “the Parties, confirming the earlier bilateral agreement concerning free transit and maintenance services for military establishments of the Russian Federation on the territory of the Republic of Belarus, have agreed that from 1 January 1995 a free trade regime will be introduced between the Republic of Belarus and the Russian Federation on full scale with no exceptions or limitations....” Commentary is unnecessary. Apart from anything else, Belarus will keep the troops of a foreign country on its land for nothing. The conclusion of a customs alliance may look like an insignificant event far from the needs of the people (goods are conveyed somewhere or other across the border, they are sent somewhere, some sort of stock taking is done, etc.). At first glance, this has no meaning for the people at all. In fact, this is far from true. It was not by chance that the Russian side accelerated the official signing of the agreement.

Sensing the unpredictable atmosphere and the real possibility that the political situation in Belarus may change after the forthcoming elections to the Supreme Soviet, the Russian side demanded that the "Protocol for the Introduction of a Free Trade Regime ..." should contain a note about the necessity of internal state procedures for the legal implementation of the bilateral agreements about the preservation of the Russian Federation's military establishments on the territory of Belarus, and the agreement on a customs alliance, dated 6 January 1995, of which Moscow is to be notified through diplomatic channels.

At first the Belarusian government kept the agreements signed with Russia secret, hoping it would succeed in not submitting them for ratification. But at the demand of the opposition it had to distribute the texts of the agreements among the parliamentarians. And this was not mere chance because the content of the customs agreement provokes a lot of questions.

For instance, Point 2 of Article 1 reads: "The Contracting Parties define the customs alliance as an economic amalgamation of the states" though it will be based on certain principles. When and where was a customs alliance the economic amalgamation of states? Undoubtedly, they pursued political ends. Article 2, "Mechanism and Stages of the Creation of the Customs Alliance," is disadvantageous for Belarus. It specifies two stages of making the alliance. In the first the Parties are to carry out "the unification of the foreign economic, customs, financial, tax, and other laws concerning the foreign economic activities within four months from the date of signing the Present Agreement” (it means before elections to the Belarusian parliament). It is clear why one of the Contracting Parties is in such a hurry. It is not clear how the present composition of the Supreme Soviet, which is near its expiration and overloaded with lawmaking work as it is, can accept this. The following note in Article 2 is particularly interesting: “the power to regulate relations between the customs alliance and other countries and international organizations shall be delegated to one of the Contracting Parties.” It is evident that Russia will hardly delegate power to Belarus. One can see that here the agreement defines Russia’s aspiration to take upon itself the regulation of relations with third countries on behalf of our republic. If the customs agreement is ratified, then in accordance with it common customs tariffs and a common customs policy will be established toward third countries. This means that Belarus’s independence in the international economic arena will be liquidated. And we will be deprived of the opportunity to enjoy our unique geopolitical situation. In a disguised form it is Russia’s aspiration to establish a supernational organ which will control customs services. Article 6 reads: “The Contracting Parties shall ensure the unity of control of their customs services . . .” But this will be later, by order of the governments, without consent from the parliaments. And further: the Contracting Parties “shall arrange joint control over the circulation of goods and vehicles. The procedure and organization of official control shall be stipulated by special agreements (protocols) between the customs departments of the Contracting Parties.” It is clear what the “joint control” means. Belarus will lose the right to independent actions in the sphere of foreign economic activity, the more so, as this will be carried out “on condition of reliable customs control at the external borders.” This means that our external borders will be “our own” for Russia as well.

In the “Memorandum on the Expanding and Deepening of Belarusian-Russian Cooperation” this was spelt out even more candidly. Here the task was determined as the security of “effective combined defense” of external borders of the customs alliance. Following the Agreement on a Customs Alliance, Belarus will lose hundreds of millions of dollars, as customs duties will be revoked not only on those goods which Russia sells to Belarus or the other way round, but also on those which Russia sells to a third country and shifts across the territory of Belarus. The scale of external export is incomparable between Belarus and Russia.

Nevertheless, the Russian Federation as the deciding side, concerned for its interests, took the opportunity to include a note in the “Memorandum on the Expanding and Deepening of Belarusian-Russian Cooperation” which read, “supplying fuel to the Republic of Belarus will become more comfortable if it takes active steps to liquidate its debts for fuel supplies from the Russian Federation.” As they say, friendship is friendship, but money is something else.

The agreement on the customs alliance is so beneficial for Russia and so damaging for Belarus that Russia agreed to the following: “the current agreement will be temporarily applied from the moment of signing and will come into force on the date both sides exchange notifications that all the necessary internal state procedures have been fulfilled.” As apparent, Belarus will lose all sovereignty and independence if the customs agreement is ratified.

6.24 Upbeat on Russian-Belarusian Relations by BELINFORM for TASS

ITAR-TASS, 3 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: This article summarizes the scope of the package of articles signed by Moscow and Minsk, whose leaders now talk openly of using the agreements as a model for the other CIS countries.

Russian Duma Speaker Ivan Rybkin completed the first day of his Belarusian visit today with a meeting with Executive Secretary of the Commonwealth of Independent States, Ivan Korotchenya.

The one-hour-long meeting of the Duma speaker and Belarusian President Aleksandr Lukashenka focused on aspects of bilateral relations, including the official Belarusian visit of Russian President Boris Yeltsin scheduled for late February.

“Belarus and Russia cannot live without each other. We have always been brothers and must remain such. I think that a politician who has different opinion is a short-sighted person,” said Lukashenka.

In his opinion, Ivan Rybkin is both the Duma leader and “a most prominent and promising Russian politician.”

Ivan Rybkin has also met Chairman of the Belarusian Supreme Soviet Myacheslav Hryb. He noted that the Russian State Duma is positive about the idea of Russian-Belarusian economic integration. The latter will help both economies to solve numerous problems.

Rybkin told a news conference today that the Russian-Belarusian relations are a model of cooperation for the whole Commonwealth. In his words, many sovereign republics have come to understand the need for more active participation in integration.

As for the military-political union between Belarus and Russia, Rybkin thinks that all the prerequisites are there. Not a single Commonwealth sovereign state is now capable of independent protection of its borders, which means they should have more understanding than doubts in the sphere of military cooperation.

The Duma speaker has been received by Belarusian Prime Minister Mikhail Chyhir and Belarusian Foreign Minister Vladimir Senko.

Estimating the results of his official Minsk visit, Rybkin noted he is satisfied.

Speaking of his meetings with the Belarusian leaders, he noted they dwelt on boosted economic integration. The sides discussed the package of documents they have signed and the treaty to be signed during Yeltsin's visit to Belarus.

6.25 Opposition Leader Promises to "Sever Moscow Ties"

Eve-Ann Prentice The Times, 4 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Zenon Poznyak is leader of the Belarus

Popular Front. The front is a weak, but vocal nationalist opposition group in Belarus. President Lukashenka has cut this group off from all access to the Belarusian media, banning it from TV and radio. In April 1996, Poznyak began broadcasting his criticism of Lukashenka's "fascist policies" from a sympathetic Ukraine, whose president also opposes Belarus's Slavic absolutism, and refuses to sacrifice Ukrainian sovereignty to Russia, as Belarus has. Ukraine's harboring of Poznyak has become another highly sensitive political issue in the triangular politics among Belarus, Ukraine, and Russia.

Belarus will risk Russia's wrath and sever ties with Moscow if the opposition Popular Front wins elections on 14 May, Zenon Poznyak, the front's leader, said.

"We need to break from Russia ... a criminal, bureaucratic state," said Mr. Poznyak, whose party is believed to be gaining popularity and who is in London meeting MPs, police, and education officials at the government's invitation. Minsk, the Belarus capital, is capital of the Commonwealth of Independent States-the loose economic and security group comprising all the former Soviet republics except the Baltic states-and Mr. Poznyak promised to take his country out of the CIS if he wins.

"We have to prepare our own people for a siege by Russia," he said. "I know for sure that Russia would consider invading Belarus. All telecommunications, roads, and railroad networks from Russia to the West go via Belarus. We also have an important nuclear early warning radar system," he said.

The elections will be the first parliamentary poll in Belarus since the country declared independence from the Soviet Union in August 1991. They will be a key in helping to decide whether the country develops a market-reform economy, or reinforces cultural ties with Moscow. Parliament has been dominated by communists, but some observers believe that the Popular Front is gaining ground in traditional communist strongholds in the countryside.

In what may be a sign that President Yeltsin is concerned about the prospect of a Popular Front victory, the Russian leader is to lead a delegation to Belarus this month to sign a new friendship agreement with President Lukashenko, who was elected last July.

Mr. Lukashenka this week called for a referendum, to be held at the same time as the parliamentary elections, to decide whether the old Soviet symbols should be reinstated on the nation's flag and whether Russian should rank alongside Belarus as a national language.

Mr. Poznyak said: "The chances of Russia becoming a democratic state are bleak. The impoverishment of the people makes the government look for an external enemy, such as Chechnya. It is like Afghanistan again; they have imperialistic intentions. The Popular Front hopes to build a democratic state, regarded as mature and along the lines of those in Western Europe."

The opposition leader believes, however, that Minsk will not become another Grozny. “I know our nation and our people, we are not violent by nature.

“Yeltsin got where he is by slogans,” Mr. Poznyak said. “He is an old party communist and has the old mentality. He is good at leading from the top of a tank.”

6.26 Russia Reintegration Support Seen Falling Away

Aleksandr Starikov Izvestiya, 8 February 1995
[FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: In February 1995, the Belarusian center was still seen as a viable political force, even by the Russian newspaper Izvestiya. Opposition to unification with Russia was still strong enough in parliament to entirely squelch the idea of a joint parliamentary session with Russia's lower house-the Duma. Despite the Izvestiya journalist's pessimism, however, events three months later were to open another opportunity for Russian expansionist aims and were to push Belarus into the Russian parliament's open arms.

One after another Russian and Belarusian politicians have been announcing the latest steps down the road of economic and political integration. But with each new spiral fewer and fewer people believe in or welcome the coming unification. [Passage omitted.]

The Belarusian People's Front-one of the real contenders for victory in the parliamentary elections-is traditionally negative about such an alliance. Gennadiy Karpenka, leader of the centrist party bloc, also believes that the policy chosen by the president in the sphere of Russo-Belarusian ties is “hampering the establishment of normal economic relations between the two states.” Admittedly, there are still the left-wingers-who will settle for nothing less than the restoration of the USSR-but they are now unable to even organize a more or less noisy street rally.

Consequently, during his stay in Minsk Ivan Rybkin clearly felt as if he was being hit by contrasting showers. The exuberance of the presidential team gave way to a scandal in parliament, where the speaker wanted to make a short speech. He was allowed to speak, but with great difficulty. The only result of Rybkin’s visit was his attempt to smooth out the effect of the, to be blunt, not exactly brilliant idea of holding a joint session of the Russian and Belarusian parliaments.

It is not only the Belarusian political elite that is cool about its neighbors. Many ordinary people are coming to realize that, for all its good intentions, Russia can never solve Belarusian problems. The political cynicism shown by certain Russian representatives who stated during the visit that “the Belarusians should not sit on the fence behind Russia’s back” (with regard to the Chechnya conflict) did not go down well.

It is clear that the Russian side is not mistaken about the possibility of strengthening integration periods at this moment in time. The current Belarusian parliament has, at most, three months left, and it is no longer entitled to make changes to the Constitution. It is very hard to predict today what the new Supreme Council will be like. Since this is the case, the next wave of Moscow’s efforts on the Belarusian front will subside after a certain time, as has happened in the past.

6.27 Yeltsin Comments on Minsk Talks

From the “Vesti” newscast Russian Television, 21 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor’s Note: Boris Yeltsin positioned himself squarely in the unification camp in 1995, as the following document illustrates. Responding to the nationalist patriots, the former communists, and millions of Russians who have been unable to accept the collapse of the Soviet Union, he pressed forward, despite the economic objections, with a plan to become an “empire builder,” starting with the weakest CIS link. In February 1996, exactly one year after the meeting referenced below, Aleksandr Lukashenka made his first official visit to Moscow, where the two presidents announced that a “union” would be formed in March.

President Yeltsin and the officials accompanying him arrived in Minsk today at mid-afternoon. Today is the first day of President Boris Yeltsin’s official visit to Belarus.

[Begin recording.] [Correspondent V. Skvortsov]: Today’s meeting in Minsk between the presidents of Russia and Belarus was a logical continuation of the active process of agreements from last year. Aleksandr Lukashenka declared on more than one or two occasions that comprehensive cooperation with Russia was a priority thrust of his policies.

There is just no other solution. The economic crisis continues to deepen. An indirect consequence of this was an unusual surge in crime in once quiet Belarus. Incidentally, the presence of the border and the weak national currencies suit Belarusian profiteers. Russia accounted for 84 percent of Belarus trade turnover last year. Close integration with Russia and the restoration of the sundered links seem to be the only salvation for both civilian and military industry.

A considerable step in that direction was taken in Minsk today. Apart from an interstate treaty on friendship, goodneighborliness, and cooperation, signed by Yeltsin and Lukashenka, a number of agreements on economic and military cooperation were adopted.

[Lukashenka]: We have dotted the “i”s in all areas. We have concluded a major treaty. We have signed a major customs agreement, a specific one, on the administration of the customs system, and we have signed a model-for others, I mean-treaty on border issues, on cooperation in protecting the state border of the Republic of Belarus, and on building up our western border, working together jointly.

[Yeltsin]: In all of Russia’s foreign policy, foreign policy with the CIS countries is paramount. In the whole of the CIS’s foreign policy, foreign policy with the CIS, in the CIS with Belarus is paramount.

[Skvortsov]: The undoubted success of the Minsk meeting is likely to make Moscow’s talks with Kiev easier, where people think of sovereignty more often than the economy. [End recording.]

6.28 Grachev: “Early” to Talk About “Coalition”

Interfax, 21 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Russia’s Defense Minister Pavel Grachev stated in Minsk on Tuesday ... after talks with his Belarusian counterpart Anatol Kastenka, that “it’s early” yet to talk about Russian- Belarusian “coalition” armed forces. He said that “in principle he is not rejecting this idea, but there is no coordination mechanism so far between the Russian and Belarusian defense ministries.”

Pavel Grachev, who is accompanying President Yeltsin during his official visit to Belarus, told Interfax correspondent Boris Grishchenko that two documents were signed on Tuesday between the Russian and Belarusian armed forces: the agreement on the technical maintenance of airfields and the reception of planes, and the agreement on state acceptance of military equipment which implies that Belarusian military-technical experts will be delegated to Russian defense enterprises and Russian experts to Belarusian defense enterprises.

“We shall go further afterward, taking up questions of training, and material and technical supplies, and then raise the question of coalition forces,” said Grachev.

He said that “well-equipped and modern troops are needed to create joint armed forces.” “Therefore, the time has not come yet for such a military coalition,” he went on to say. “It is early yet to take up such global issues,” he added.

He expressed satisfaction that many problems, including the basing of Russian planes on Belarusian airfields, had been solved. He also noted that “we have no disagreements on the removal of our strategic missile forces from Belarus.”

He said that “the two early warning facilities in Baranovichy and Vileika will be under Russia’s jurisdiction” and that there is an agreement on paying the work of the Russian personnel servicing these facilities with due account taken of the economic possibilities of both countries.

6.29 Yeltsin on Protecting CIS Border

ITAR-TASS, 22 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Russian President Boris Yeltsin’s second day in Belarus opened today with a meeting with CIS Executive Secretary Ivan Korotchenya for talks on implementing decisions made at the recent CIS summit in Almaty. The summit elected Yeltsin for a second term as chairman of the CIS Council of the Heads of State.

Yeltsin's schedule was very busy on Tuesday [21 February]. He held talks with President Aleksandr Lukashenka of Belarus and signed the treaty of friendship, good-neighborliness and cooperation, as well as two other agreements-on joint protection of the Belarus state border and on joint efforts in upgrading customs services.

After the signing, the Russian president recalled that the two nations shared a common historical experience over many centuries. "This created the basis for signing the treaty and other documents on deeper integration of our two countries. Among all CIS countries, Belarus has the greatest rights to such a relationship due to its geographical location, its contacts with Russia, our friendship, and the progress of its reforms," the Russian president said. [As received.]

As concerns the military aspect, Boris Yeltsin singled out border questions. He noted that "throughout the years of existence of the Commonwealth of Independent States we were unable to find a solution to the problem of protecting the Commonwealth's external border. Only this time, we managed to sign a good agreement thanks to the attitude of the president of Belarus and the leadership of the republic. All borders will be well locked and at the same time no one stands to lose anything."

Asked if Belarus was likely to lose its sovereignty as a result of rapprochement with Russia, the Russian president replied: “All European countries tend to keep together. The European Union has many countries which are sovereign, independent, and pursuing their own policy. But they coordinate all their activities among themselves. This results in smaller costs to every country.”

Lukashenka replied to the same question using the words of Russian Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev: “May God forbid any encroachments on Belarus’s sovereignty. Russia would be the first to lose much.”

6.30 Reportage on Russian President Yeltsin’s Two-Day Visit

Yeltsin’s Speech at Academy of Sciences

Radio Minsk, 22 February 1995 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpts

Editor’s Note: Boris Yeltsin’s assurances that Russia had no intention of absorbing Belarus were made long before the presidential election campaign started in Russia. As the election drew nearer, Yeltsin’s rhetoric grew stronger and more openly nostalgic about the old Russian imperial reach. This document is noteworthy because it shows Yeltsin’s “old school” style of appealing to a foreign audience by making the promises of a “guardian and a protector,” all the while disguising the political and economic significance of what he is saying.

[Speech by Russian President Boris Yeltsin at a meeting with Belarusian President Aleksandr Lukashenka and Belarusian intellectuals at the Belarus Academy of Sciences in Minsk.]

Dear friends,

This is the last meeting on Belarusian soil before the end of my visit. So, perhaps at the end of my speech I shall give a brief account of what President Lukashenka and I did.

Dear friends, our visit to Belarus has been very important for me. Both in Russia and Belarus today many people are seriously concerned as to whether the thread that has linked our peoples for centuries will be broken, whether we shall forget that the Russian and Belarusian peoples have the same roots. This must not be allowed to happen in any circumstances. It would deal irreparable damage to our states. It would be mocking history, an act of violence against the fates of our peoples. ....

I think you know that in Russian society today there are various viewpoints coming up against each other on the issue of the nature of the national interests of the Russian Federation. There are forces in our country that are aspiring to restore the political domination of Moscow over the whole territory of the former Soviet Union, to restore the Russian empire in its previous dimensions. I think that such views are not only incompatible with international law, they are dangerous primarily for Russia itself. They threaten to turn into innumerable misfortunes both for it and for the other peoples. History cannot be turned back and attempts to restore the former Soviet Union under a new name are doomed. Russia's adherence to respect for territorial integrity of independent states cannot be doubted by anybody. This equally applies to both our western and southern neighbors.

However, we expect that everybody will adhere to this principle. We will not go for any redrawing of borders. This is the road to nowhere. This is the road to new artificial crises and conflicts.

Genuine interests of our country lie elsewhere:

consolidation of stability of genuinely democratic states situated near its borders and the development of equal and mutually beneficial relations with them. This is our stance and we will not shift from it.

Development of our mutual relations has nothing to do with some kind of absorption of Belarus by Russia, as some people say in Belarus and in Russia. We do not have such intentions and, of course, we won't have them in the future. In-depth integration, more in-depth integration than it is today, close interaction, this is the choice and this choice [pauses] has been reinforced in the documents, in the treaty, and in several agreements which we signed yesterday together with Belarusian President Lukashenka...

Integration became a prevailing tendency in the CIS last year, moreover, Belarus and Russia went for the maximum speed [as heard]. I would like to confirm once again that we stand for the closest, the most intensive Russo-Belarusian relations in all spheres. And indeed, Belarus was the first country among all the CIS countries, with which we decided to sign ten packages of agreements on in-depth integration. After Belarus and Russia, it is possible that Kazakhstan may join the process. Thus in this way, a certain nucleus will emerge in the Commonwealth and states will be bolder and more resolute in coming together ....

Our states had firmly decided to create a common market for goods, services, capital resources, and work force, and to cooperate closely in the spheres of investments, finance, and industry. In particular, our states agreed to unify the principles for investment activities and acquisition of real estate as well as their protection. Concrete measures will be taken in creating industrial and financial groups.

We have agreed today-and we will draw up a specific document to this effect-that our enterprises and organizations will enjoy equal conditions in terms of price, customs duty, and taxes. [Applause.]

Agreements on a customs union and on joint guarding of state borders have been signed-just imagine, what a saving it is: We protect the external border of the CIS; we protect the border of Belarus; we protect the border of Russia, and we do it together, and we do it all in Belarus. Thereby, of course, the expenditure is smaller and the quality and efficiency of border protection is higher.

Just recently, a program has been adopted for actions of Russia, Belarus, and Kazakhstan in implementation of accords on further expansion and intensification of mutual cooperation. This program includes specific measures that are designed to help all of us in overcoming the economic crisis more quickly, so that people can, at long last, feel positive changes ....

A long-term plan for the integrational development of the CIS was approved last October. It includes such questions as preparation of draft agreements on joint innovation activity, developing joint scientific projects in the fields of ecology, health protection, space utilization, training scientific cadres, restoration of a single information support system for scientific research.

By the way, Aleksandr Lukashenka, when I put forward my proposal regarding cadres, I did not only mean science. I meant cadres in general: industrial cadres, social cadres, cadres involved in health protection, culture, education, and so on and so forth. I meant cadres at different levels: managers, middle management, and others. In essence, this would be an attachment and training at an enterprise or organization involving a person who already has higher education and who will then become a well-known director or manager in Belarus. That is what we are proposing.

I think that this system is more effective because we are using it with Western countries. Two thousand of our people study in Japan, 1,000 in the United States, 1,000 in Great Britain, 1,000 in Germany, and 1,000 in France. The duration of study is one year in each case.

We managed to negotiate an agreement under which we are only paying for their food, while the cost of the entire process of study is covered by the host country. I will tell you about our initial experience relating to specialists who have already returned. They are indeed gaining modern experience, especially in advanced technologies, which can then be immediately invested

It is necessary to agree on the mutual recognition of doctors' and candidates' certificates. We are neighbors who lived together for such a long time, and now we do not recognize each others' certificates.

At the present time, almost all exchanges of scientific journals and books have stopped. There are virtually no joint publications. Our science has taken a unilateral step and decided to send, at its own expense, journals that are of interest for your academy to the Belarus academic library. This is just the beginning.

In addition to that the Russian Academy of Sciences has fully preserved the membership of the Belarus scientists in the editorial collegium of its journals, and its scientific councils, and in all the commissions. A number of the Russian scientific societies are including the teams and separate scientists of Belarus as their members. However, these initiatives and measures of the Russian scientists are not sufficient. Our nations sharply need an intergovernmental agreement on scientific and technical cooperation, and it should be signed as soon as possible. The work is being finished on this agreement, and I think that the agreement will regulate many issues, which are currently hampering the cooperation between the scientists of our nations

The integration from the bottom between Russian and Belarus peoples is underway, and we should help this natural process. I mean financial assistance as well. Of course, we will find some solution to this matter, let us suppose that first, it should not be said that I have brought something in my pocket, but at least we have decided that we will allocate or, in other words, give the first R150 billion as a long-term credit. Later, we shall find some other kind of financial support.

The people felt by themselves the consequences of the disruption of the ties. As far as we know, nowadays the absolute majority of Russian and Belarusian people-and I was convinced at the factory now about that as well as everybody speaks loudly about this-want the rapprochement of our states, and closer rapprochement means deeper integration.

Dear friends, there is such a close degree of relationship of trust and mutual understanding between Russian and Belarusian peoples, which rarely exists between two close neighbors. This is a reliable guarantee that all the difficulties in the way of our close cooperation could be overcome. In this field, our intentions and those of the Belarus president are the most serious, and I think that you will support us in these efforts.

Thank you. [Applause.] ...

Yeltsin Looking Forward to “Belo-Rus”

From the “Vesti” newscast Russian Television, 22 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Today is Boris Yeltsin’s second day in Belarus and it started with a meeting with CIS Executive Secretary, Ivan Korotchenya. During the conversation, ways to implement the decisions adopted at the recent Almaty summit were discussed.

The second day of Boris Yeltsin's stay in Belarus started with a visit to the Minsk Car Factory (MAZ). The directors of Belarus's large industrial enterprises have to call for immediate reintegration with Russia. Supplies of components have been discontinued and Belarus tractors, trucks, and refrigerators are losing the vast Russian market which is their only market. A joint project with a German company cannot save the factory. But the results of yesterday's talks between the two presidents hold a real chance to improve the situation for the production managers and engineers and workers of Belarus state enterprises who, together with the republic's entire population, are coping with yet another 50-100 percent rise in food prices.

[Begin recording.] [Yeltsin]: We will move, first, toward a deeper integration and the setting up of individual large corporations and then we will simply unite and there will be a Belo-Rus.

[Lukashenka, laughing]: Yes, Belo-Rus! [End recording.]

Yeltsin, Lukashenka Sum Up Results

Moscow Radio, 22 February 1995 [FBIS Translation],
Excerpt

Editor's Note: The following document, a conversational recording, is enlightening in that it sounds like two dictators discussing in detail their plans for their countries' joint activities in every sphere.

Now, some more details about one of today's main events. By that I mean the Russian president's visit to Belarus, which has just ended, and an appraisal of this visit from the mouths of the two presidents, Boris Yeltsin, and Aleksandr Lukashenka.

[Begin Yeltsin recording.] Further, everything that we have signed must be put into practice. A number of issues have not found their way into the agreement. We must also bring them together and discuss them among the representatives of both states, and include them in one document-a protocol so that absolutely all issues are included in them. At the same time, both presidents must have control over them, so that not a single issue is forgotten. We have problems in the motor vehicle construction industry, where there are a number of factories. Now the world has begun a policy of deepening [cooperation]; let us set up a common corporation in motor vehicle construction between Belarus and Russia. It must be advantageous to everyone and in everyone's interests. Of course, everything must be considered, and some kind of model of this idea must be made, and then we can begin to implement it.

I liked the president; and just now at this conference and in the academy we also said that we must restore the system that existed before in education, in the exchange of postgraduates and students on special courses, and so on and so forth. We decided that we will do this. We also spoke about issuing diplomas of various kinds, as many as we could. So, we have now immediately issued instructions on this, and we are to immediately issue a general edict. We are going to sign it together, and the diplomas will be jointly recognized on the territory of Belarus and Russia. [End recording.]

[Lukashenka]: For me personally, a young politician, Boris Nikolaevich's coming here was important to me. You will probably recall how people were saying that nothing could be decided between Lukashenka and Yeltsin, they could not talk to each other or come to any agreement. I will say to you frankly, and I can, of course, say this publicly, that we have become friends. It could not be any other way. I think that this is a tradition of our fraternal relations and our fraternal states.

Boris Nikolaevich feels somewhat-well, if not shy, then embarrassed when we say that we need not simply to integrate but to join together in certain areas. We spoke about this one-to-one. I am happy to speak about this-I am not afraid that when people talk about Russia devouring Belarus or, God forbid, Belarus devouring up Russia! I am not afraid of this. I promised the people one thing at the electionscomplete integration with the fraternal Russian state, and integration between the peoples. Therefore, I am moving toward this directly, including by way of a referendum. And we will be holding this referendum. So we are implementing a concept of the two presidents-to move on behalf of the economy and the lives of the people. And this will without doubt lead to a solution to political questions. The lives of the people will lead toward this. I am not afraid of that either. I would simply like to thank the Russian delegation and the president. They have responded to our request in a very positive manner. Practically all the questions have been solved, and the main thing is that we are placing equal conditions on all our enterprises-Russian and Belarusianas of today. These are our common enterprises, and the MAZ [Minsk motor-vehicle works] is not just a Belarusian but a Russian enterprise, too, and we must together show concern for their development and the benefit of our peoples. [End recording.] [Passage omitted.]

6.31 Moscow-Minsk Border, Military Agreements Hailed

Vasiliy Kononenko and Aleksandr Starikevich
Izvestiya, 23 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The series of documents signed during President BorisYeltsin's visit to Minsk gave material form to the achievements of Russian diplomacy on the Belarusian front. Russia's leader assessed relations between Moscow and Minsk as the best within the CIS. They are now consolidated by the Treaty on Friendship, Good-Neighborliness, and Cooperation, as well as other agreements.

Boris Yeltsin was greeted at Minsk-2 airport with flowers and kisses. The flowers were presented by young girls, and the kisses were from his Belarusian colleague Aleksandr Lukashenka. In the Belarusian capital itself, the highest level of readiness was displayed beforehand by the services ensuring the visit's security. Even before B. Yeltsin took off from Moscow, certain streets in Minsk were closed, and militiamen were placed along the entire route to be followed by the presidential motorcade. Viktor Sheyman, secretary of state of the Security Council, tightened up security to such an extent that the militiamen surrounding the government residence on Voyskovyy Pereulok would not even allow Sheyman himself through for a long time.

The services responsible for supporting the journalists in their professional activity worked with their traditional inefficiency, as was the case during Bill Clinton's visit. Many representatives of the press simply did not reach the official event, and many had all kinds of communications problems. But otherwise everything was fine.

"In the European Union, coordination of economic and foreign policy activity costs less," Boris Yeltsin said. Well, now the two states-and first and foremost, Russia-can save on this. The discussion of Belarus's debt for energy sources proved difficult, but the difficulties were overcome thanks to an accord on a barter basis: Russian enterprises (first and foremost "Gazprom") received the right to participate in share ownership of Belarusian enterprises. Specific projects for the creation of joint production facilities will be implemented by finance and industry groups, while the governments of the two countries have pledged to assist them. It became clear that the presidents also signed treaties on coordinating operations to protect the borders and the control of customs networks.

“For a long time we have been working toward an understanding with Belarus as to what border security is,” Col.-Gen. Andrey Nikolaev, commander of the Russian border forces, said in an exclusive interview for Izvestiya. “Within the framework of the commonwealth, this problem has not yet been resolved and is not likely to be in the near future. In relations with Belarus we have reached a remarkable and unexpected stage of mutual understanding. For instance, the treaty that was signed contains a definition of what constitutes security on the borders with Lithuania, Latvia, and Poland. This means that Russia is shifting its border interests 615 km to the west of the administrative borders. Under the bilateral agreement we have pledged to set up an operational group of border troops (headed on the Russian side by the deputy commander of border forces). The Belarusian side, in turn, is creating a group of representatives to the Russian Main Border Forces Directorate with a view to upholding their state’s interests on the actual borders. And in the agreement we avoid the contentious issue of representation of army subunits on the territory of Belarus. The border troops will be brought in under a special statute (which was signed during the visit—author’s note]) only to protect the border, and nothing more.”

Several documents were signed by the foreign ministers. Among these documents, the agreement on cooperation in the military sphere stands out. Russian Defense Minister Pavel Grachev said that talks on this subject “went remarkably smoothly and calmly.” “We have already resolved the problem of basing our long-range aviation at the Baranovici airfield. We have now reached an agreement on material and technical services for the two countries’ armies, with the introduction of state quality control [gospriemka] at specialized enterprises in Russia and Belarus.” In addition, the question of creating an integrated ABM defense system was discussed.

Summing up the results of the visit, it can be noted that the Russian leadership has achieved successes of some importance, meeting its interests in the economic, military, and other spheres. This must be formulated in documentation, since whereas at present the Belarusian political elite is putty in Moscow’s hands, in the foreseeable future there could be major domestic political changes in Minsk. Then Russia would encounter undesirable complications.

6.32 Parliamentary Elections and Referendum in Belarus

Press Release Embassy of the Republic of Belarus to the United States of America, 16 May 1995

Editor’s Note: The May elections to the Belarusian Supreme Council, and the referendum, were the turning points for Belarus in deciding what direction its domestic and foreign policies would take. The results of the election were disappointing for Belarusian democrats and Popular Front oppositionists. Even though there was good voter turnout throughout the country, its distribution failed to meet electoral requirements in most provinces, and only 19 deputies out of 260 were elected. The referendum provided the final blow to Belarusian representative democracy. Lukashenka won a mandate for extensive presidential powers, including that of dissolving the Supreme Soviet. These results meant that Lukashenka's reintegration policy would prevail in an environment of public confusion and lack of political will.

On 14 May, Belarus held parliamentary elections and a referendum. At a press conference on 15 May the Chairman of the Central Electoral Commission of Belarus A. Abramovich announced preliminary results of the first round of elections to the Supreme Council and of the referendum.

Despite predictions of widespread apathy, overall voter turnout was high-64.5 percent. But only 19 of 260 deputies (7.3 percent of the seats) were elected in the first round of voting. Elections in 27 electoral districts of 260 (in Minskin 11 of 42) failed to attract the requisite number of voters.

Runoff elections will be held on 28 May.

According to the preliminary results of the referendum, voters gave President Lukashenka a strong show of backing (82.4 percent) for his activities, aimed at furthering economic integration with the Russian Federation and surprisingly high approval (83 percent) for the equal status for the Russian language alongside Belarusian. Seventy-five percent of voters supported a proposal to establish new national symbols-state flag and state emblem. In addition, 77.6 percent of voters agreed with the need of making amendments into the Constitution for empowering the president to dissolve the Supreme Council if it violated the Constitution.

As reported by press agencies, a team of observers from the OSCE came to the conclusion that the voting “had peaceful and adequate character.”

6.33 Foreign Minister of Belarus on the Results of the Referendum

Press Release Embassy of the Republic of Belarus to the United States of America, 18 May 1995

Commenting on the results of parliamentary elections and a referendum, the Foreign Minister of Belarus Uladzimir Syanko in an interview with Reuters said, “While we move closer to Russia economically, we cannot give up what’s most important-our sovereignty, independence, and statehood.”

“Belarus sovereignty is not for sale. These are not mere words. We have to look at reality. Belarus has strong ties with Russia ... but I think national consciousness will grow quickly.”

6.34 Russians Eye Union with Belarus

19 May 1995 UPI Copyright © United Press International

The Russian Parliament launched a bid to bring Belarus back under the direct rule of Moscow Friday, overwhelmingly supporting a motion aimed at uniting the neighboring nations into a single state.

Lawmakers in the lower house of parliament voted 249 to 0, with one abstention, to charge a State Duma committee with the task of drawing up legislation that would lead to the unification of Russia and Belarus.

The move to meld the two Slavic states into one was led by nationalist lawmaker Sergey Baburin, who called for a referendum in December asking Russians whether they favor the reunification.

Baburin blasted the idea of a long-discussed monetary union with Belarus that many believe would hurt Russia’s more stable economy, urging fellow legislators to push instead for “full socio-political unity.”

The bid to bring Belarus back under Russia’s wing was buoyed by voters in the former Soviet republic of more than 10 million, who gave strong support to closer ties with their giant neighbor in a referendum Sunday.

A significant majority of voters in Belarus gave their backing to closer economic links with Russia, official status for the Russian language and a return to state symbols similar to those scrapped after the Soviet breakup. The referendum marked a defeat for narrowly supported nationalists in Belarus and a sign it will continue to gravitate toward Moscow as it seeks to solve serious economic troubles many see as a result of breakup of the centralized Soviet system.

The Russian legislators' move reflects a widespread Russian desire to see a revival of something like the Soviet Union-or at least a Slavic Union of Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine-with Moscow as its center.

In a separate State Duma vote Friday, lawmakers passed an official statement commending Belarus President Aleksandr Lukashenka for holding the referendum and saying they hope his initiative "will find support and understanding among the presidents of several Commonwealth of Independent States nations."

The Russian government's courtship of Belarus has been a quieter affair, as President Boris Yeltsin and his men worry that tight economic ties could drag Russia down toward the level of Belarus and hurt its bid to crush inflation.

Ivan Korotchenya, the Belarusian secretary of the Commonwealth of Independent States, said Thursday that Yeltsin and Lukashenka would take advantage of a CIS summit in the Belarusian capital Minsk next week to sign a broad-based economic agreement that would also be open to other members of the twelve-nation group.

A summit meeting in Minsk last year produced a customs agreement among the neighboring nations as well as pacts ensuring Moscow's continued military presence in Belarus, a buffer state separating it from Europe and NATO's possible expansion into Poland.

6.35 Caution Advised on Unification Moves with Belarus

Maksim Sokolov Kommersant, 6 June 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The last weekend in May enriched the political-economic situation in Belarus with two important innovations. On 27 May, after the symbolic removal of the border gate and its replacement with a birch tree planted by Chernomyrdin and Lukashenka, the Russian-Belarusian border columns were removed, and on 28 May, after the second round of parliamentary elections, the RB [Republic of Belarus] was without a parliament as well: the term of the old one had run out but a new one failed to be elected.

The symbolic ceremony to remove the border gate was accompanied by no less symbolic statements of the two presidents. President of the RB Lukashenka summed up and said: “The road is now open. Those who impede traffic will be put in the appropriate places,” alluding to the idea that during integration he is prepared to plant more than just birches [Russian verb also means “imprison”]. Ukrainian President Kuchma, commenting from afar on the birch-border gate procedure, noted sardonically: “The posts can be broken. The important thing is not to break the wood [make a lot of mistakes.]”

Despite how appropriate that desire is, its practical realization may not prove to be so simple-that became obvious the very next day when reports from the voting precincts showed that the elections were not accomplished and there is no parliament in Belarus.

Undoubtedly, the history of post-communist parliamentarism on the territory of the former USSR cannot be called glorious-suffice it to recall the RF Supreme Soviet and its deplorable end, and then too the Duma's activity can hardly be a subject of admiration. Nonetheless, the role of parliament as a whistle mechanism for releasing steam is difficult to deny, since where the safety valve is absolutely riveted shut, a tranquil life can only be achieved in two ways: either by direct terror (the USSR in the 1930s-1950s), or by using food to tame subjects who in addition still remember the past terror very well (the Brezhnev oil dollar prosperity). In the sense of using these methods, the capabilities of the present Belarusian regime seem questionable.

Direct terror presupposes not only a smooth-running repressive mechanism, but also the country's blind isolation from the outside world, and that contradicts not only the emotional procedure with the border gates and the birches, but also the very geopolitical position of the small republic, which is at a busy Eastern European crossroads. Given the impossibility of properly shutting a country off from relatively liberal neighbors, any half-formed terrorist intentions will produce not so much a frightening as an irritating effect, as happened in 1989 at the decline of the CMEA [Council for Mutual Economic Assistance] "people's democracy." An unwritten social contract with subjects, that is to say, steadily increasing the standard of living of working people in exchange for their abandoning any social activism at all, requires the appropriate economic resources no wonder there was perestroika; meaning the actual denunciation of the social contract a la Brezhnev coincided with the end of the oil dollar miracle. But in Belarus, the economic situation is such that there simply are no resources with which to buy people off. The only real resource may be ignoring the de facto failure to fulfill tariff-customs agreements with Russia-without saying so, letting subjects live on contraband at the expense of the Russian budget. Blaming the Belarusian leadership in this case would not be completely fair: they are not trying to get rich, just survive.

The political options which are now being developed amount either to changing legislation in hindsight and considering the parliament empowered when 40 percent of the deputies are elected, or merging the old and the new Supreme Soviets, or having direct presidential rule. In any case, this means only that social contradictions (which given the average monthly wage of U.S.$5 may be extremely critical) will begin to be channeled not to the parliamentary hall but to the street. Given such prospects, it is quite difficult to plan Russian-Belarusian relations for the long-term: while as applied to one partner (Russia), the word “stability” has a certain sense, this word no longer applies at all to the Belarusian partner. An altogether unpredictable political mishmash may appear beyond the birch on the border at any time.

The strangest thing here is that although the specific nature of the Belarusian leadership was no secret to anyone and the degree of democratism of the election procedure was obvious from the very start, Russian politicians amicably showed unprecedented enthusiasm right after 14 May, when the first round of elections was combined with a referendum on integration with Russia. The fact that all the fears and doubts were rejected by the Russian communists was more or less understandable, since it would be strange for a communist not to rejoice in a communist renaissance on his neighbor's land. However, the president of the RF rejoiced as well, immediately congratulating the integrator Lukashenka and recognizing democrats like the chairman of the Duma committee on foreign affairs, Vladimir Lukin, who was expected to understand that "there are secret, strategically fateful decisions which overrule all accounting calculations." "Fateful decisions" meant the reunification of the RF with the RB, while "accounting calculations" meant the economic price which Russia must pay for it.

Accounting

calculations can, of course, be overruled—the novel by Vasiliy Aksenov discusses the similar problem of the reunification of the USSR with the Crimean Peninsula, and one of the Politburo "little portraits" notes: "We do not economize on ideology." But it follows from Lukin's reasoning that "accounting calculations" are the only obstacle to the Anschluss, while the political prerequisites are in fine shape.

However, it would be best to refrain from the second assumption at least until the results of the second round of elections to the Belarusian Supreme Soviet are summarized. On the one hand, it would at least clarify what is happening on the Belarusian political scene; on the other, collating statistical data on the plebiscite and both rounds of elections to the Supreme Soviet would enable us to establish more precisely whether there were improprieties, and if so, then to what extent, and exactly what the value is of this plebiscite overall. Ultimately, if the natural mission of the Belarusian leadership is to push up the price for themselves in every possible way (including by means of manipulating the elections), then the mission of Russian politicians and diplomats which is just as natural is to understand what really is behind all the plebiscite manipulations. It has now become clear that nothing is behind them except the complete political and economic impasse in which the Lukashenka administration finds itself—but that was certainly almost obvious back on 15 May. Waiting another two weeks to talk with Lukashenka, taking into account the changed conditions is elementary diplomacy. But this elementary procedure proved to be unavailable to the Russian leadership, and they preferred, based on the principle of “ringing the bell without looking at the church calendar,” to make “fateful decisions” and break the border gates, which produced the biting comment by their neighbor Kuchma.

The Slavic Union

The Slavic Union is another confederal concept which has evolved within the CIS framework. Its supporters come from both the far-left and the far-right political factions in Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine. It is based partly on the reinvigoration of the pre-Bolshevik Slavophile tradition and doctrine, but in more pragmatic terms also on the “close natural ties” between the Slavic peoples. There are fewer language difficulties; the peoples share a strong ethnic identity; and the countries were integrated under the former Soviet economic, military, and political systems. The “Slav Card” is being played by several political parties (for example, Vladimir Zhirinovskiy’s Liberal Democratic Party) for its populist appeal and power to capture votes.

In the documents collected in this section, we see the Slavic Union concept being embraced by the Russian and Belarusian Slav Assembly—an umbrella party which desires a return to Slavic roots. The Belarusian component of the Slav Assembly, “Belaya Rus” (White Russia), wants to reinstate the “purity of the Slav home.” The Slav Assembly is well organized, with regional organizations in all the oblasts and major rayons of Belarus and Russia. It therefore considers itself a political structure rather than a civic association or club. The ideology of the Slav Assembly is that the Slav peoples possess the greatest intellectual resources, energy reserves, and traditions in the world, but they are split politically. The unity of these strong peoples must be restored. These goals are voiced here by Mikalay Syargeev, co-chairman of Belaya Rus. The economic program of the Slav Assembly is socialistic, with individual “freedom to work,” but “various forms of ownership” and no mention of private property.

Without Ukraine, obviously, the idea of a Slavic Union would be dead. On 26 June 1994 Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk spoke out urgently against the concept of a Slavic Union, calling it a “‘dangerous idea’ because it would split in two those states where Slavs and non-Slavs live,” and this would be followed by “horrible confrontation with the Asian states,” which would rush to form their own union. Kravchuk also made the point that no confederation should be based on ethnic considerations alone. Following Kravchuk’s removal in the 10 July 1994 Ukrainian presidential election, commentator Aleksandr Boroday wrote that the elections of Aleksandr Lukashenka (on the same day) and Leonid Kuchma would exert strong influence for the Slavic ideal and would advance the concept of a Slavic Union. Nevertheless, President Kuchma has not met these expectations and has never mentioned support for this movement or the concept. Lukashenka, however, as noted in the last section, has become a strong ally and spokesman for Slavic integration.

The conservative right-wing Russian national patriots also support the restoration of a Slavic Union. Several members of the Committee for the State of Emergency, which led the attempted coup against Gorbachev

(Vasily Starodubtsev, for example), are in the twenty-one-member organizing committee for the work of the Slav Assembly. The leader of the organizing committee is Boris Mironov, who was fired by Yeltsin for his “fascist-like statements,” and former KGB general and head of the Russian National Assembly Aleksandr Sterligov. Their involvement is documented here.

The ultranationalist, proto-fascist Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) has also embraced the political goal of forming a Slavic Union (but supports the idea of this Slavic community reaching out to embrace the Eurasian heartland). In April 1994, the Congress of Slav, Orthodox, and Christian Peoples elected Vladimir Zhirinovskiy, leader of the LDP, as their president. Zhirinovskiy’s concept of a Slavic Union includes the Eastern European Slavic states-the Czech Republic, Slovakia, and Serbia-with which he wants Russia to form a military-political alliance. In his speech to the Congress, which is documented here, Zhirinovskiy stressed that he believes the Balkan war was the catalyst of the idea of a Slavic Union.

A center-right group which supports a variation of the Slavic Union, but would include Kazakhstan (in a kind of “Slavic Home Plus One”) is the Russian coalition consisting of: the Union of Renewal, the Party of the Majority, the Civic Union (with branches in Belarus and Ukraine), and the Agro-Industrial Union. On 28 December 1994, this group held a conference in which it supported the full unification of Russia, Belarus, Ukraine and Kazakhstan. At the conference, Civic Union leader Arkadiy Volskiy voiced his full support for the political, economic, and military reunification of these states, with supranational structures, including a unified parliament, constitution, and combined armed forces. He posits four stages for creating such a unified state: (1) form an open union based on treaties and quadrilateral agreements; (2) form a joint customs union which lifts all restrictions on the free flow of goods, labor, and capital across members' borders; (3) align the legislatures; and (4) build supranational structures.

The following documents highlight the key organizing activities of these left, center-right, and right-wing groups which support some form of Slavic Union. How influential this concept becomes will partially depend on the future electoral successes of its adherents in both presidential and legislative contests.

6.36 Russian Economists Do Not Approve of Slavic Union

KAZTAG-Almaty, 22 July 1993 [FBIS Translation]

A group of prominent Russian economists and statesmen released a statement in which they characterized the economic policy reflected in the decision to form an economic union adopted by the government heads of Belarus, Russia, and the Ukraine as “shortsighted.”

In the statement that was signed in particular by Stanislav Shatalin, Leonid Abalkin, Vadim Bakatin, and other leaders of the Reforma International Fund, it is noted that the agreement of the heads of three Slavic states could be welcomed if not for the fact that it “can be viewed as a political reaction to steps taken by the countries of Central Asia, Kazakhstan, and Azerbaijan toward a closer cooperation with Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, and Afghanistan.”

The leaders of the Reforma Fund believe that the decision adopted by “the three” without having previously consulted Kazakhstan and the Central Asian states and clarified their relationship with the union members, “considerably restricts the possibility of participation in the Union.” “Moreover, such a decision can alienate these countries from participation in the economic union. It was Kazakhstan that has always been one of the major initiators of a much closer integration and a system of coordinating agencies.”

The authors of the document underline that such a foreign economic policy toward Kazakhstan and other CIS countries is “shortsighted and does not suit Russian or other countries’ interests either in a short- or a long-term prospect.”

“The main way of deepening economic integration with the former USSR countries is seen in the development and implementation of the declaration on setting up an economic union within the CIS frameworks. The efforts of all states should be focused on this issue. Limitations and obstacles should not be introduced into this essentially complicated process because they can undermine the fundamentals of such a fragile, and so badly needed, consensus reached in Moscow,” the statement says.

6.37 Slavic Economic Union Membership Assessed

Fedor Burlatskiy Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 22 July 1993
[FBIS Translation]

Editor’s Note: Fedor Burlatskiy expresses the views of the neo-democrats who perceive great problems involved in creating an exclusive economic union of Slavic states.

Burlatskiy makes the case for an even-handed policy with all former Soviet republics and the rejection of a reactionary policy against perceived Central Asian “collusion.” The Slavic Union movement is shown here to be an evasion by Russia of the insecurity it feels in dealing with the Transcaucasus and Central Asia.

In Brezhnev’s times our politicians advertised extensively and strenuously the common European home. In Gorbachev’s times, preference came to be given the Euro-Atlantic home, where relations between the USSR and the United States took precedence. There is no exception to be taken to this in principle, although it may bejudged variously whether our country derived many dividends from this strategy. But what is obvious to all is that in our enthusiasm for the building of new homes lacking as yet not only a roof but even the semblance of a foundation, we have increasingly demolished the Eurasian home, which Russian policy, diplomacy, and culture have been erecting for centuries.

Two events of a single week are graphic confirmation of this. The first was the meeting of a group of countries in Istanbul. This is the list of them: Turkey, Pakistan, Iran, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan. These countries agreed in principle on the formation of a common economic zone. The second was the signing of the agreement between Belarus, Russia, and Ukraine on close economic cooperation.

These events reflect new vectors of a geopolicy which could in the future change the character of the Eurasian continent.

Let us begin with the meeting near Moscow. Why did President N. Nazarbaev or his representative not take part? Why was the Belovezh Forest model repeated once again? The explanations given by the leaders of the three governments withstand no criticism.

Nazarbaev, who prior to the putsch, during the intoxication after the failure of the putsch and in the period of sobering up following the intoxication right up to the present has been an enthusiast of economic integration, was once again not invited, shoved aside, and insulted. The attempt to portray this as fortuitous is simply ridiculous. No, deliberate policy is behind this. The same questions arise concerning the leaders of Uzbekistan and the other states of Central Asia displaying an interest in preservation of the common economic space with Russia.

It may be said that the meeting near Moscow was revenge for the formation of the Muslim bloc. But this is wrong. If Russia is dreaming of a European home, why can Central Asian states not build their homes on their borders with peoples of kindred civilizations? Besides, at the Kiev meeting the participation only of the three Slav states was planned in advance. So we are faced with a design. And it consists of the exclusion from the economic union of the Caucasian and Central Asian states of the former USSR.

I was recently told of a staggering fact. Prior to the meeting in Belovezh Forest, a trio of the president of Russia's advisors had prepared a paper on three pages for B.N. Yeltsin. It proposed an "uncoupling of the cars from the train," that is, Russia withdrawing from the USSR and getting rid of the Union republics. The argument for this was that Russia could then derive enormous revenue from the sale at world prices of energy resources to the former republics of the Union. Another argument: These republics were, like leg-irons, preventing Russia from accomplishing a rapid transition to the market.

If this is the case-and it can be seen from the entire subsequent course of events that, indeed, it is everlasting shame will descend on the names of the authors of the treacherous paper. They will occupy a place alongside the two false Dmitriys, and, further, for company, to make up a trio, some furtive Byron will be added to them.

What has Russia gained from the great disintegration? Economically it has gained nothing. The increased revenue for oil and gas has not compensated for the decline in production on account of the destruction of the evolved business relations. And Russia has undertaken the reform-the leap into a financial hole, more like-together with the other states of the ruble zone all the same. And we have not as yet been able to do anything particularly good on our locomotive without the cars: However it has puffed and blown off steam, it has not rolled out of the impasse, despite the efforts of the switchmen replacing one another.

It can now be seen that the creators of this policy are not content. They are continuing to cut off from the economic union the majority of countries of the CIS. Even Kazakhstan, whose Russian-speaking population constitutes half, is no exception. Such a foolish policy of self-destruction is historically unparalleled.

This policy needs to be rectified as quickly and energetically as possible. It is necessary to apologize to Nazarbaev and the presidents of the other republics concerned. It is necessary urgently to convene a meeting of the leaders of the CIS to form an economic community along the lines of the common market in Europe and, most importantly, it is necessary, finally, to recognize the simple truth that without preservation of the Eurasian home, we will not be needed in any other homes.

Europe, America, and Japan are already laughing at our claims, as before, to play the part of great power. Our might is being squandered in deference to the momentary interests of petty politics and narrow-minded politicians.

Here also, for that matter, we see some inexplicable duality. Displaying no concern for economic and cultural integration with the Central Asian countries, we are once again prepared to become bogged down in military conflicts in this region. I refer to the events on the border of Tajikistan and Afghanistan. We should think ten times before allowing ourselves to become involved in a war which-the experience of the Afghan adventure showed this-we obviously cannot win. Here is imperial thinking in physical form: weapons, the blood of our soldiers, certainly, economic support, no, get out of it as best you can.

How many sweet-sounding speeches have been delivered as of late on the Russian idea! It is conceived of this way and turned around that way. But when the most acute question of the preservation of Russia as the center of Eurasian civilization has arisen, all the verbal trumpery has turned to ashes.

Take a listen to the speeches of the leaders of the new independent states. They all speak excellent Russian. And this applies to the political and cultural elite and to the majority of people in these countries. And this is most valuable capital for Russia. The United States detached itself from Britain two hundred years ago. But, having preserved English, it has remained the closest ally of the British.

The dilemma of a union of Slavic states or a Eurasian society is contrived. More precisely, it is an ideological fabrication. Dividing such a multinational country as the former USSR along racial or religious lines is impossible and dangerous. This is fraught with the danger of the disintegration of Russia itself, in which there are Tatarstan and Kalmykia and Chechnya and Sakha (Yakutia). In addition, can it be forgotten that the main disintegrating factor thus far has been the position of Slavic Ukraine?

If we behave in intelligent fashion, the peoples which negotiated together with us innumerable historical ordeals and which have made a tremendous contribution to Eurasian civilization will preserve what has been accumulated, regardless of the nature of the political unions with Russia. If, on the other hand, we take the path of further pan-Slavism or a one-sided Europeism, our descendants will in several decades find themselves in a completely different world. And it will, believe me, be the worst of worlds for a Russia scorned by its natural allies. Central Asia will be condemned to incorporation in the zone of influence of Turkey, the Far East, Japan, Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus, Germany, and West Europe.

We need to return to our common Eurasian home. Not in order to attempt to reconstitute from scratch the empire or the Union: In order to build new democratic relations jointly, equally and in the common interests of all participants. Then more heed will be paid to us in both the European and the Euro-Atlantic homes.

6.38 Slav Assembly Meets, Adopts Party Platform

Alyaksandr Zhuk Radio Minsk, 13 December 1993
[FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The Slav Assembly's platform is reviewed in the next document. This group combines the democratic ideal of market development with a reintegration of those states which founded the first Soviet Union in 1921. Ignoring the clear pro-independence position of Ukraine, this group expounds its racist views quite openly. It is well organized at grass-roots levels in Russia and Belarus and therefore offers a credible challenge to other contenders in the 1995 parliamentary elections and the presidential election of 1996.

Over 100 delegates gathered for the Slav Assembly congress. They adopted the party's program and outlined an action plan for the near future. What are the aims of this organization? Here are some features of the program. Belaya Rus is in favor of the unity of the Belarusian, Ukrainian, and Russian peoples, social justice, moral, and ecological purity of the Slav home. I will ask Mikalay Maksimavich Syargeev, the co-chairman of the assembly duma, to comment on the results of the congress:

[Syargeev]: The results of the congress pleased us. We summed up the outcome of the activity of our organization in the period since the founding congress, i.e., we have now made it clear that we have regional organizations in all oblast centers and in many rayon towns. That is the first thing. Second, we have gone through the stage of establishment, i.e., from a small group of enthusiasts who were organized as a club, we are now approaching the creation of a real political structure. Most importantly, the new version of our organization's rules and the program were passed.

The main aim is this: We have an analysis section in which we say that the strength of the Slav world is potentially gigantic, for it possesses the very greatest intellectual resources and energy reserves in the world. But its weakness is that the Slav world is politically and ethnically split. Therefore, the strategic task of our program is the restoration of unity, first and foremost, of the Slav- Russian peoples, i.e., the Great Russian, Belarusian, and Ukrainian peoples.

The second very important aspect is that we aspire to have a market economy socially oriented toward the person, to have freedom of work and creation, and various forms of ownership. At the same time, we shall aspire to carry out a strong social policy, i.e., our people must be fed, clothed and, so to speak, provided for.

[Zhuk]: Will the assembly be able to exert an influence on the political situation in the republic?

[Syargeev]: I think that it is already exerting some influence, the more so in that we are the initiators and now active participants in the biggest political association in the republic, the People's Movement of Belarus, and we act within the framework of that movement, which now already has its MP's association in the Supreme Soviet. So we shall obviously influence the situation in the Republic. [Passage omitted.]

[Zhuk]: The Slav Assembly program also includes a provision of the official status of the two languages-Belarusian and Russian. [Passage omitted] [End recording.]

6.39 Slavic Union: Union with Russia "Urgent"

BELAPAN-Minsk, 13 December 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

The First Congress of the Slavic Union White Rus [Belaya Rus] was held in Minsk on 11-12 December. The main issue on the agenda was the party's platform. According to the platform, the Slavic Union Belaya Rus is a part of an international Slavic movement that was established following the collapse of world stability, which had been ensured by two world powers-the USSR and the United States. The program emphasizes that the Slavic civilization is currently in a critical situation, and the only way of overcoming this crisis would be establishing a Slavic Union, whose nucleus would be a union of Slavic-Rus nations-the United Rus [Sobornaya Rus]. Unification of Rus, in the opinion of the Slavic Union, is the only possible way to provide military, political, and economic security for its historical components, including Belarus. In this regard, measures for a more rapid integration with the Russian Federation are inevitable and urgent for Belarus. According to the participants in the congress, the unification of Rus is a path to economic development and prosperity. Among the main objectives of the “nationally oriented economic policy” are fundamental changes in the tax policy, which should stimulate domestic production and the development of an infrastructure, the introduction of a state monopoly in external economic relations until the end of the period of economic stabilization, and the cancellation of the “destructive conversion of the defense industry complex.”

6.40 Slav Congress Elects Zhirinovskiy President

Moscow Television, 3 April 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Unity, national dignity, and independence have been proclaimed the main political principles of the World Congress of Slav, Orthodox, and Christian Peoples which took place in Moscow today. The congress proclaimed a union of Slav peoples. Vladimir Volfovich Zhirinovskiy, chairman of the Liberal Democratic Party of Russia, was elected president. A Slav parliament and government was also formed.

6.41 Zhirinovskiy Seeks Union of Slavic States

Interfax, 3 April 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Vladimir Zhirinovskiy represents the militant nationalist wing of the Slavic Union movement. Zhirinovskiy, however, changes his message to suit the crowd and the moment. He also identifies with the “Eurasianists” and the right-wing national patriots.

Leader of the Liberal Democratic Party Vladimir Zhirinovskiy stated in Moscow during the opening of the World Congress of Slavic Orthodox and Christian Peoples that a union of Eastern European Slavic states might make the twenty-first century an age of Slavic civilization.

He said that Western Europe had always feared the unification of Eastern European Slavic states and made efforts to prevent them from creating a union. “The time has come to stop taking instructions from Paris and London,” he said.

He believes that the Balkan war was the catalyst of the idea of a Slavic union and that Russia must form up a military-political alliance in Eastern Europe.

“If the Russian troops come to the Balkans, they will never tolerate humiliation of the Slavic peoples. We shall send as many divisions to the Balkans as our Slavic brothers will ask,” he said.

He emphasized at the same time, that Slavs would never become aggressors.

Leader of the Russian National Congress Aleksandr Sterligov said that the economic crisis in Russia was evolving into a catastrophe. This can be judged, he continued, from the unprecedented industrial recession and from the incompetence and inefficiency of the authorities.

Sterligov demanded that the events in Moscow last October be investigated and that their actual organizers not be allowed to evade punishment.

He said that the democrats were preparing for a civil war and were forming up armed units.

He urged the opposition to do everything they can to prevent Russian-American military exercises in the Urals.

In his opinion, the United States wanted to obtain information about the Russian army's combat capability so as to become better prepared for the occupation of Russia.

He said that public committees should be set up to organize actions of protest against Russian-American military exercises.

The World Congress of Slavic Orthodox and Christian Peoples is being held on the initiative of the Liberal Democratic Party which claims that the event is being attended by delegations from Poland, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Serbia, Bulgaria, Ukraine, and Belarus.

6.42 Three Parties Sign Appeal for Reunification of Slav Lands

Gleb Cherkasov Segodnya, 17 June 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Aleksandr Tikhonov, chairman of the "Consolidation" party; Igor Karpenko, leader of the "Slavic Unity of Ukraine"; and Nikolay Sergeev, chairman of the "Belaya Rus' Slavic Assembly" yesterday circulated an "Appeal to the Heads of State and Parliaments of the Republic of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and Republic of Ukraine." The appeal contains a call to pass “legislative acts on the unification of the sovereign states to form a confederation or some other mutually acceptable state entity.” In the opinion of its authors, “the creation of a confederation will make it possible to prevent disintegration of the unified community and to solve political, economic, and defense tasks.”

Speaking at a press conference devoted to the promulgation of the appeal, the leaders of the parties stated that the pro-integration feeling prevalent among the peoples of the three countries does not always meet with adequate understanding among members of the political elites of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus. At the same time, according to the assurances of the “Consolidation” chairman and State Duma deputy Aleksandr Tikhonov, Speaker Ivan Rybkin intends to meet with the authors of the appeal as early as 21 June. Mr. Tikhonov thinks the speaker’s stance is drawing closer to proposals expounded in the appeal.

As for practical steps to create a unified state entity, it is suggested that referendums be held in all three republics following which the supreme organs of representative power could take specific actions to carry into effect the peoples’ will. In the view of the authors of the appeal, the new Slavic statehood ought to have unified armed forces, a unified “ruble” system, and equality of state languages.

It is worth pointing out that the very fact of signing such an appeal is, to a certain extent, a new method in the political struggle both in Russia and in the Ukraine, as well as in Belarus. Until recently pro-integration and unification sentiments were mainly exploited by radicalcommunist and national-patriotic organizations, so the same sentiments expressed by “centrist” associations may have greater repercussions.

6.43 Kravchuk Terms Slav Union Idea “Dangerous”

Viktor Demodenco and Mikhail Melnik ITAR-TASS,
26 June 1994 [FBIS Translation]

“Alliances based on ethnic identity are dangerous per se, for they inevitably engender nationalism, pan-Slavism, and all that ensues from it,” Ukraine’s President Leonid Kravchuk told ITAR-TASS today, when asked about a possibility of creating a Slav union. “Both politicians and historians condemn it, knowing that that is where aggravated nationalism is rooted,” he said.

Leonid Kravchuk also believes that this question is not quite specific in practical terms. “As for a union, one should then speak in terms of East Slavs, rather than Slavs. Otherwise, what should one do with Poland, Slovakia, Yugoslavia, or Bulgaria? Thus, the Slavs will be divided into Western Slavs and Eastern Slavs,” he summed up. One should bear in mind that about thirty million Russians, Ukrainians, and Belarusians live beyond the borders of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus. “The Slav Union will inevitably create problems for them.” “By having such a union, we will split in two those states where Slavs and non-Slavs live.” Kravchuk is convinced that “by this step we will begin dividing states of the former Soviet Union.” He expressed the belief that this would be followed by creating Asian and other unions, and “then horrible confrontation will begin.”

“One should not raise questions that are ready to be resolved today, neither theoretically nor practically.

One should live and follow the chosen path: build independent states but not on the basis of ethnic identity,” he said. “We are building a civil society in Ukraine and Russia is building the same society in its country. If we pursue a different policy a social explosion is possible. Russia is also not 100 percent a Slav state.”

“I advocate economic relations, integration, and the use of the CIS in resolving issues that can be resolved by good will,” Kravchuk said. In his opinion, one should not try to establish new structures and organizations immediately, he said. One should do everything to avoid confrontation between states and peoples, he said.

6.44 Shakhray Sees Three-to-Four-State CIS Confederative “Nucleus”

Interview Novaya Ezhednevnyaya Gazeta, 6 July 1994
[FBIS Translation]

Sergey Mikhaylovich, I have two questions for you:
What are the prospects for the reintegration of the CIS states and how do you see its stages?

[Shakhray]: There is no alternative to reintegration. The only question is how it will happen. Either on a voluntary and equitable basis with the preservation of the political sovereignty of the states-and then, legally speaking, it may be only a confederation-or by an uncivilized, imperial method, with people washing their boots in some ocean or other [allusion to expansionist Zhirinovskiy remark].

The difficult situation in the economy, the impossibility of defining borders and establishing customs control to protect the country's economy, and the undeveloped state of the budget, taxation, and banking systems means that the factors of economic reintegration are being turned into a platform for internal political struggle both in Russia and in other countries of the CIS.

Reintegration will be complex and will take place in several stages: First, it is absolutely essential to preserve the CIS by creating a confederative (Eurasian) union not in place of but within the CIS; in other words, it is necessary to form a nucleus consisting of three or four states.

I believe that the main conditions for reintegration can and will be as follows: the fight against crime and economic union.

The interim, transitional form of reintegration will be through bilateral agreements such as the Russia-Belarus or Kazakhstan-Belarus type, and so forth. In this way the network of bilateral treaties will create the model for the future Eurasian union.

Subsequently, when the political and economic forms of reintegration have been perfected, we will surely proceed along the lines of the Maastricht accords in which sets of draft agreements will be submitted to referenda.

That will take several years-on condition that political stability is preserved in the CIS countries, of course.

6.45 Integration with Ukraine, Belarus Viewed

Aleksandr Golts Krasnaya Zvezda, 16 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

[Article by Aleksandr Golts: "Ukrainian and Belarusian Presidents Win Mandate of Confidence. Exercising It Will Take Strength and Willpower"]

Comparing the post-Soviet area to a unified organism that has broken down into different parts and lamenting this fact (sometimes sincerely, but sometimes speciously) have become frequent occurrences of late, when many parts of the former USSR are suffering from the inevitable hangover induced by a distorted sense of independence. Now that the peoples of Ukraine and Belarus have given those they have elected president an obvious and clear mandate for reintegration, there is hope that we will all be able to create some kind of new association which will allow all its participants to develop.

But the experience of the post-Soviet years shows that the best way to destroy an undoubtedly positive idea-be it the idea of democracy or of independence-is to decide that if it is acceptable to both peoples, it will come about by itself. That is the case with integration too. After all, just putting a torn fabric back together by no means always results in an integrated whole. Let us be frank-the period of almost three years since the Belovezhskaya Forest meeting has left its mark. And if the question of closer ties than those which exist in the CIS is really put on the agenda, their organization will by no means be painful.

In my view, the main thing today for Moscow, Minsk, and Kiev is to decide just what specifically they mean when they talk about reintegration. After all, it is different ideas of the aims and tasks of the CIS on the part of our countries' leaders (some seeing it as a chance to preserve everything positive accumulated during the Soviet years, others seeing it merely as a device for a civilized divorce) that have made this a not particularly effective association.

The same thing could happen to the new ideas about integration. If we proceed on the basis of the election programs of Leonid Kuchma and Aleksandr Lukashenka, we can be said to be dealing with more or less definite intentions. They could in principle be used to organize any policy, including the policy followed by their predecessors. And that is no accident. Our countries, which are going through economic crises-caused, among other things, by the breakdown in economic links and the loss of markets-are simply preordained to restore their ties. And this should be done irrespective of who occupies the presidential residence. The entire question is just how it should be done.

Let us be frank, restoring mutually advantageous economic ties is currently just a political slogan. In practice it is a highly complex balance of priorities and interests. For instance, the paramount vital interest of Ukraine and Belarus is obvious. This is to obtain from Russia sources of energy cheaper than those available on the world market. But Russia's interest is not so obvious. Our production slump has brought about a crisis in sales of enterprise output. Quite simply, our industry produces costlier and lower-quality output than is available abroad. In an attempt to protect its own producers, Moscow is creating concessions for them (which is causing a lot of controversy). If we are talking about simple production-sharing or expanding commodity turnover, then Russia-insofar as I understand it-will have to indirectly subsidize inefficient production in Ukraine and Belarus as well.

And this despite the fact that the two republics' leaders have views of reform that are very different from those of Moscow. So if we are talking seriously about economic union, we need to agree on the overall concept for reforming our economies. After all, talking about the advantages of integration, the EU, which people in our country love to refer to, was able to be established when the economic situation in the West European states had evened out somewhat. But so far the economies of our three republics are functioning on the basis of fundamentally different rules.

It is this fact rather than nationalistic idiocy that has led to the emergence of all these customs posts, entry and exit regulations, and all the other things that so annoy the peoples of all our states. But if we continue to make economic progress not only at different speeds but in different directions-as is the case at the moment-the customs posts will never disappear since they are an attempt by the state to regulate inequalities in development and distribution between neighboring states.

It is another matter if we manage to reach agreement on the overall concept of reform. Within this framework programs would be elaborated in which interstate cooperation would make goods produced in the three republics competitive on the domestic and world markets. And it is not just a question of supplying components. The contribution of Ukraine and Belarus could be special privileges in the use of Black Sea or Baltic ports, preferential transit regulations, and much else besides.

But there is one “but”-and one which, incidentally, the EU encountered as well. Any integration leads to a certain amount of sovereignty being transferred to suprapstate organs. And this annoys those who are accustomed to thinking in terms of absolute independence. Yet the more effective integration is, the less room there is for notorious separatism. Let us not forget that optimizing the economy will unambiguously require not only the elaboration of unified approaches in the sphere of financial activity and production relations, but also in defense, security, and foreign policy. After all, deciding each time what weapons to buy where, where to deploy troops and to what end, what maneuvers to participate in, and whom to apply sanctions against should be agreed with those with which we have a common economic interest.

But we are talking about areas where until recently Kiev and Minsk had sought and found symbols of their own sovereignty (we would recall merely the unfinished saga of the division of the Black Sea Fleet). But whether the new representatives of the Belarusian and Ukrainian elites, who have only just gained access to power, will agree to coordinate not only the level of interest rates and the size of the money supply, but also military programs and participation in certain international programs remains an open question.

And this question-of striking a balance between sovereignty and commitments within a union-has not been unambiguously resolved either by France, Britain, or a number of other West European states. As for our three states, the real potential for integration will not be evident before all its conditions are clearly and precisely spelled out. And that is work that needs to be expedited, not least by Russia.

6.46 Creation of Slav Union Viewed

A. Boroday Krymskie Izvestiya, 11 August 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Policy in the East European region, which has thus far depended on the three “Belovezh diehards”-Leonid Kravchuk, Stanislav Shushkevich, and Boris Yeltsin-could change appreciably and influence the situation in the Slav countries with the appearance of the new presidents of Ukraine and Belarus-Leonid Kuchma and Aleksandr Lukashenka.

The newly elected heads of the Ukrainian and Belarusian states emphasized in their campaign programs the desirability of their countries’ close cooperation with Russia. In addition, Aleksandr Lukashenka insisted on political and economic integration with his northeast neighbor. Leonid Kuchma was considerably more guarded in his statements that concerned cooperation with Russia. But we will see the presidents' true colors some time hence inasmuch as it cannot be ruled out that the campaign promises of one of them were merely a bluff.

The Belarusian head of state has now found himself in a very difficult situation. First, he is the first president of Belarus, and this will require of Aleksandr Lukashenka sufficient discretion and level-headedness. The first two years will be difficult for Belarusians, I believe, since the institution of the presidency has yet to be perfected legislatively, and conflicts between the executive and the legislature are therefore possible. Especially since Aleksandr Lukashenka has, compared with Leonid Kuchma, no experience of work in the top echelons of power. His very modest position on a commission of the Supreme Soviet of Belarus has hardly given him substantial political equipment. Second, Russia, understanding that it could soon lose not only Ukraine but Belarus also, will try in any way to keep it near it. It cannot be ruled out that the northeast neighbor will begin to “bear down” economically. Although it has to be said that such a development of events is possible only provided that Aleksandr Lukashenka moves to confront Boris Yeltsin. Currently, however, the president of Belarus is disposed toward a close alliance with Russia, realizing that the voice of the Belarusian state in the world community will not be heard any time soon and that, consequently, it should not “gamble” entirely on assistance from the West. It is not surprising, therefore, that Aleksandr Lukashenka declared in the course of the campaign battles that Belarus’s attitude toward the Partnership for Peace program would be coordinated with Russia.

Relations between Ukraine and Belarus will shape up pretty well since neither party has yet any claims on the other. Although the unification of Belarus, Ukraine, and Russia in a single Slavic union can be ruled out at this time. Even were the Belarusians to agree to it, Leonid Kuchma would not, I believe, want to be under the thumb of Russia, especially since Ukraine has already undergone a certain evolution since the times of the proclamation of independence. In the immediate future, therefore, Belarus and Ukraine and Russia will be finding one another's range, and the creation of a unified bloc and union among them is possible only after a certain length of time, when all three states have their own voice in the world.

6.47 National Patriots Urge Restoration of Slav Union

Oleg Artyushin ITAR-TASS, 1 October 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The following document briefly characterizes the views of the national patriots on Slavophilism. The patriots distinguish themselves from nationalist by pointing to their traditional Slavophile origins, literally the "soilbound" (pochvennik) tradition which focuses on the historic existence of a supranational community on the central Eurasian land mass. During the Russian empire, these peoples were basically free to pursue their own paths, while their "elder brother" provided rich cultural inputs but tolerated the parallel development of other cultures. The "imperial" approach stressed the rights of individuals and communities, rather than nations. In contrast, the Russian nationalists stress the development of state structures in which the ethnic Russian nation would be seen and treated as superior, and "protective" of lesser nations. The nationalists endorse Russification techniques to a far greater extent than the national patriots do. Consequently, the nationalists have been more willing to make common cause with the overtly pro-Soviet neo-communists. The article names among the patriots who support the Slavic Union Vasiliy Starodubstev, a member of the Emergency Committee which initiated the aborted coup attempt against M. Gorbachev. Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn is a patriot in the Slavophile tradition who condones a voluntary reconstitution of some sort of Slavic union, and views Soviet adventurism as the kind of colonialist-type imperialism that ruined Russia's true spirit.

National Patriots of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus called for the possible restoration of the union of three Slav nations.

They held a conference in the city of Bryansk on Saturday, which was attended by 200 representatives of twenty-four political parties and movements from thirty regions of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus. The conference was also attended by a Serbian delegation.

The participants set up a twenty-one-member organizing committee to carry out the idea of restoration. The committee will be headed by former KGB general, head of the Russian National Assembly, Aleksandr Sterligov.

Apart from Sterligov, other committee members include General Valentin Varennikov, Agrarian Union Leader Vasiliy Starodubstev, Orlov Region Administration Head Egor Stroev, former Soviet Coal Industry Minister Mikhail Shchadov, former leader of the Russian State Committee for the Press Boris Mironov, and leader of the Workers' Union Dmitriy Igoshin.

They also agreed to establish a party of national and patriotic forces of Russia in the run-up to parliamentary and presidential elections to be held in 1996. An organizing committee set up to coordinate work on the establishment of the party will be headed by Boris Mironov, recently sacked by President Boris Yeltsin for “fascistlike” statements.

The party congress is expected to be held by the end of the year.

6.48 Zhirinovskiy Proposes Slav Economic Union

23 October 1994 UPI Copyright © United Press International

Editor's Note: In the case of the Economic Union, the distinctions between nationalists and patriots become blurred. Both agree that the collapse of the centrally controlled Soviet economy was a disaster and seek the reinstitution of a supranational economic "bloc," dominated and controlled by Russia. For nationalists, however, economic union represents only the first stage of unification.

Russia's ultranationalist Liberal Democratic Party is going to propose that Slav nations form an economic union, LDP leader Vladimir Zhirinovskiy said.

In a letter to lower parliament house chairman Ivan Rybkin, Zhirinovskiy says the proposal is to be considered by an academic conference in April or May 1995 and by a "congress of Slav peoples held at the governmental and legislative levels" two or three months later. The congress would draw up a legal basis for the future Slav community, the LDP leader says. He says his party has already formed an organizing committee for the conference and congress, headed by Aleksey Zvyagin, a parliament member and professor at the Moscow Commercial University.

Zhirinovskiy asks the lower house to back the proposal and says he has made the same request to upper house chairman Vladimir Shumeyko.

6.49 New Electoral Association Supports Economic

Union with Three Former USSR States

Interfax, 1 December 1994 [BBC] Copyright © 1994
The British Broadcasting Corporation

Editor's Note: The so-called Third Force coalition was led by Arkadiy Volskiy, leader of the Union of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs, or "Civic Union." Volskiy is spokesman for the coalition, and probably one of its founders. His support for a Slavic Union coincides with his organization's call for a strong center in Russia, and a harsh form of federalism. For this group of industrialists, as for the Zhirinovskiy ilk nationalists, an economic union with supranational powers is merely the first step toward inevitable political unification. A majority of the executives in Russia's privatized enterprises are veterans of the old party and state hierarchies, and Volskiy's group finds common cause with the former, or (depending on one's viewpoint) "neo"-communists.

The leaders of a new electoral association, the Third Force, have announced the convocation of a congress of citizens of Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, and Kazakhstan in Moscow between 28 and 30 December to discuss practical steps needed to bring about a common economic union of these countries.

Arkadiy Volskiy, the leader of the Civic Union, which is a member of the new alliance, told a news conference on 1 December that the congress would discuss holding referendums in the four countries, to bring about their speedy unification.

Volskiy said that, in his opinion, it was the disintegration of economic ties between the republics rather than the reforms which had been the main cause of their decline.

Volskiy added that the first stage of unification at an economic level would inevitably be followed by the amendment of laws and later probably by political unification. He thought that other countries could join later, on a voluntary basis.

“It is time countries got over the sovereignty mania and realized that we will not survive without each other,” Volskiy said.

According to him, economic and political recovery is possible only with the reintegration of former Soviet republics into a new economic and military strategic entity.

The Party of the Majority, the Union of Renewal and the Agroindustrial Union are among the parties which make up the Third Force, together with the Civic Union.

6.50 Lukashenka Favors Tripartite Economic Unity

BELAPAN-Minsk, 14 December 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The following report on a meeting between A. Volskiy and A. Lukashenka epitomizes the degree of authoritarian control desired by supporters of an economic union. Lukashenka's willingness to issue a decree establishing the industrial structure of the country verges on blatant dictatorship, if not megalomania.

President of the Republic of Belarus Aleksandr Lukashenka voiced resolutely in favor of unification of the economies of Belarus, Russia, and the Ukraine, and approved the steps toward this, which were made by the participants of a meeting of industrialists of Belarus, Russia, and Ukraine the other day in Minsk, Arkadiy Volskiy, chairman-coordinator of the Council of the International Congress of Industrialists and Enterprises, president of the Russian Union of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs, informed the press. The leaders of the national organizations of industrialists of the three Slavic countries acquainted the Belarusian president with the agreements that had been reached at the meeting: on the most-favored regime for the countries and on the establishment of transnational companies and industrial-financial groups common for the countries, as well as a statement for the heads of states, governments, and parliaments, which contained a call for creating a real alliance of the economies of Belarus, Russia, and Ukraine with some subsequent steps in the political field. Mr. Volskiy stressed that since the very beginning of their cooperation the industrialists and enterprises of the three countries called upon their colleagues in Kazakhstan to back up the cooperation on a mutually beneficial basis.

Answering a question on the prospects of integration, Mr. Volskiy said that it was inevitable. The same is as regards the other CIS member states. "We had been constructed as one large factory. We have so many specialized enterprises that it is absurd to develop these productions in every newly independent state, and it requires a lot of money that Belarus, Ukraine, and Russia lack." But having started establishing financial-industrial groups and transnational companies in practice without the participation of the governments, the industrialists came across the impossibility of solving concrete problems because of the difference in the national legislations. These problems can be solved within the framework of regulation of interstate relations in the political and legal fields. According to Arkadiy Volskiy, Aleksandr Lukashenka expressed his willingness to support the establishment of the first transnational companies by means of a presidential decree authorizing the unification of the values of basic funds of the enterprises under amalgamation into transnational companies, corporations, and groups.

6.51 Industrialists Support Slav Union Plus Kazakhstan

An international congress “Toward Integration Through Accord” opened in Moscow on Wednesday.

Participants in it decided to form pressure groups to collect signatures in favor of holding referendums on reunification in Russia, Kazakhstan, Belarus, and Ukraine.

“Immediate efforts to reintegrate the republics into an economic, political, and defense union will make it possible for each of them to overcome their profound crisis,” the chairman of the International Congress of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs Arkadiy Volskiy told the forum.

According to him, the process of reintegration must go through four stages: form an open union between Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, and Kazakhstan; lift all restrictions on the free movement of goods, capitals and labor; adjust legislations; build supranational management structures.

“We must appeal to the peoples of our republics and use referendums to force the authorities to start a real reintegration processes,” Volskiy told Interfax. “I have no doubt that the people will give a positive answer to the question concerning reunification.”

In the meantime a member of Russia’s Federation Council, Nikolai Gonchar, who also attended the congress, told Interfax that currently “only an economic union can be discussed; a political union will be opposed by the forces now in power in the CIS countries, and some forces in the West will object to a defense union.”

Convened at the initiative of the Civic Union-Third Force association, the forum gathered spokesmen for 128 political parties and organizations from the former Soviet republics.

The Eurasian Union

The Eurasian confederal concept originates partially from pre-revolutionary Russian political theorists who saw Russia’s power and might emanating from its position between Europe and Asia. In brief, these theorists embraced an anti-European, anti-Atlanticist doctrine, which held that Russia is not European, but a combination of European and Asiatic. They proposed the construction of a great Eurasian state which could eclipse the culturally bankrupt societies of the West, and become a great superpower and leader of the Eurasian heartland.

Within the context of the CIS, however, Kazakhstani president Nursultan Nazarbaev is the author of the Eurasian Union concept. It is not clear that Nazarbaev adheres to the pre-Soviet doctrine of Eurasian power, or that he is a

“neo-Eurasianist” (although he may be). It is clear that he envisions the restoration of something similar to the USSR, but professes that it must incorporate the ideals of sovereignty, territorial integrity, and independence for its member states.

In the documents collected here, speaking before the USSR Supreme Soviet on 26 August 1991, Nazarbaev proposes the formation of a confederation, which he would call “Free Union of Soviet Republics.” He associates his proposal with the ideas of Andrey Sakharov. (The prize-winning scientist and human-rights activist had pressed for a Confederation of Free and Independent States at the first USSR Congress of People’s Deputies in May 1989, comparing his concept with the British Commonwealth.) Nazarbaev’s organization would contain all former Soviet republics that wished to join and would be managed by supranational councils for defense, transportation, and communications. He specifically excludes a council for foreign affairs, conceding autonomy in this realm to the individual states. He concentrates economics in an interim economic council and community, to which any former republic may belong even if it decides not to join the Union. Nazarbaev’s proposal lacked many specifics. Consequently, coming in the wake of the attempted coup and Ukraine’s declaration of independence, as well as the unsuccessful discussions associated with Gorbachev’s Novo-Ogarevo Union Treaty, he was unable to reassure the republican deputies that his confederation would be truly democratic.

Since the Belovezh Forest declaration of 8 December 1991 and the formation of the CIS, Nazarbaev has continued to advocate a new confederation of free and equal republics. At times, his proposal has seemed to represent the only clear formulation of what CIS integration would entail. None of the presidents or legislatures has definite ideas on how to integrate a commonwealth, or how such an integrated organization would operate. Nazarbaev's concept also has the advantage of coming from a man who is a known entity, has consistently advocated the same course, and who offers his own state as a supportive, but impressive counterweight to Moscow's authority. His "Eurasian Union" appeals to some of the Central Asian states, but is still rejected for various reasons by the other CIS leaders.

During 1992-93 CIS politicians were in no mood to contemplate seriously the persistent arguments of a man who had never accepted the breakup of the Union. These were years of frenetic foreign contacts, writing of new laws and constitutions, elections, introduction of economic reforms, and political organizing. Nevertheless, the winters of 1992 and 1993 were particularly harsh. Fuel was in short supply. Several violent interethnic conflicts were raging and many people in the afflicted regions were starving. In many places, the flow of food and other products through the economic pipelines of the former republics had slowed to a trickle, or stopped altogether, causing high unemployment and sending prices into the stratosphere.

During this time, the Commonwealth was faltering. It had utterly failed to create a common defense force and had stalled on every economic issue it took upcurrencies, monetary policy, customs union, interenterprise debt, etc. In June 1993, the three Slavic leaders created a trilateral economic union within the CIS framework without consulting Kazakhstan or any other CIS state. Kazakhstan had already been conspicuously left out of the Belovezh Forest meeting, and this second exclusion was glaring. In July, Russian president Boris Yeltsin arranged an extraordinary summit between Russia and the Central Asian leaders in Almaty. The documents collected here record the meeting. This meeting demonstrated that Russia understood it could not leave out Kazakhstan or the other Central Asian nations in its integration plans. This was the first meeting Moscow had held with the Central Asian leaders since forming the Commonwealth. It gave the Central Asian states new status within the Commonwealth and Nazarbaev's proposal for a Eurasian Union a new lease on life.

Nazarbaev has continued to refine and defend his concept. Other CIS leaders have registered lukewarm reactions, although Kyrgyz president Askar Akaev has consistently supported it. The documents here focus on the 1994-95 period in which the Eurasian Union was being taken more seriously, but still receiving negative reactions, especially from Russia and Belarus, whose leaders would prefer to integrate the entire CIS, or the Slavic states and Kazakhstan under the CIS umbrella.

In the documents that follow, Nazarbaev draws attention to the fact that his proposed union would provide the apparatus currently lacking in the CIS to ensure that its four-hundred-plus documents and protocols (each one signed by varying numbers of CIS members and ratified by even fewer of the parliaments) would be observed by each member state. Nazarbaev also makes particularly strong reference to the need to align the legislation of the CIS states through the creation of a Eurasian Union parliament, which would become the organization's supreme consultative and deliberative body. Modernization within the post-Soviet space is impossible without a supranational legislative mechanism. (In Chapter 8 the reader may judge how well the CIS Interparliamentary Assembly, created for this purpose, is working.) An alignment of CIS members' legislation would of course also mean a sacrifice of essential sovereignty, and this particular feature is not likely to be acceptable to most CIS leaders for some time to come. This and a number of other binding articles in Nazarbaev's draft, aimed at guaranteeing the ability to implement Union decisions, actually resemble a federation more than a confederation, although Nazarbaev contends that his concept is the latter.

One surprising aspect of the draft is that it assumes side-by-side existence with the CIS, which Nazarbaev insists would be compatible with the Eurasian Union. The Eurasian Union is only being offered as an option, he says, which CIS states may or may not join. The mere existence of such an integrated, supranational organization (if it contained Russia) would, however, create pressures to join, because it could be harmfully exclusive of other states in its policies and laws.

The Eurasian Union draft of April 1994, which Nazarbaev presented during a CIS summit, evoked a landslide of press reaction, not only in the CIS but in the Western industrial states. There was much conjecture among Western reporters that the proposal would carry far-reaching repercussions within the CIS. Some European commentators surmised that the supranational Economic Council would improve the success of the new states in their foreign economic activity. Several Western correspondents saw the Eurasian Union as the possible basis of a new association of sovereign states, replacing the CIS for the purpose of strengthening the security, and social and economic modernization process in the post-Soviet space. On one issue, that of citizenship, the Eurasian Union improves matters by eliminating the “dual citizenship” concept and establishing automatic citizenship for any Union resident moving to another Union state.

The article included here by Kazakh writer Asylbek

Bisenbaev puts a positive slant on one clause in the proposal which would distinctly curtail freedom of the press. This measure would create an Executive Committee Information Bureau which would have the power to censure any articles which it judges “unfriendly” to parties of the treaty or that could be “harmful to relations between them.” Presumably this clause exists in order to rid the Union of the slanderous press campaigns sometimes launched against a leader or a particular event in another state, but it removes the sanctity of free speech and freedom of the press.

Only Belarus and Kyrgyzstan immediately supported the Eurasian Union proposal. In Russia, opinions ranged across the gamut. Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn (Izvestiya, 4 May 1994) fiercely attacked the proposal and suggested a union of Belarus, Russia, Ukraine, and Kazakhstan as the only feasible variant of the Eurasian Union. Others, confusing Nazarbaev’s concept with neo-Eurasianism, which has more than one hundred models, interpreted it as an attempt to advance Central Asia’s dominance in the region. Some high Russian officials (for example, Sergey Shakhrai) expressed support for the proposal, saying that such integration was inevitable. Askar Akaev, on the other hand, blamed Russia’s coolness on its imperial ambitions and its jealousy of Kazakhstan. It is worthwhile noting that in Ukraine, when the proposal was first put forward, Leonid Kravchuk rejected it out of hand, but Leonid Kuchma called it “the optimum solution to the crisis situation in which the sovereign states of the former USSR have found themselves.”

At the September 1994 CIS summit of heads of state the issue of the Eurasian Union draft was once again brought up, but deep-sixed. The proposal appeared dangerous to some and confusing to others. Yeltsin, Kuchma, and Shevardnadze all said the concept “needed reflection,” though Yeltsin said it contained valuable ideas which could be absorbed into the CIS integration process. The Izvestiya article recording the proposal’s reception at the summit drew a picture of total lack of enthusiasm. Russia retained control of the summit session and the direction in which the CIS was going. Reactions to the concept have continued in the same vein since then. Each leader views the CIS as preferable to the Eurasian Union’s restoration of a structure reminiscent of the USSR.

The following documents provide a thorough discussion of Nazarbaev’s proposal and internal CIS reactions. It is clear that Nazarbaev does not intend to give up his struggle. Time will tell whether his ideas will help to construct a new USSR.

6.52 Nazarbaev Proposes Confederative Treaty

Moscow Central Television, 26 August 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Esteemed people’s deputies! The past week has been not just days, not just time. It is an era separating us from our entire past life. We celebrate the victory of democratic forces over reaction. We have deep respect for the Muscovites who stood in the way of those who were prepared to chase us back into the stable of a totalitarian regime. We cordially thank the Supreme Soviet of the RSFSR [Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic] and Yeltsin, president of Russia, who took a decisive and uncompromising position in a serious and tragic situation. We deeply grieve for those who perished on the streets of Moscow, for those who, at the cost of their lives, defended the young democracy. At this time, we cannot but also remember all of those who joined so selflessly in the struggle against reactionary forces in practically all regions of the country-the students of Alma-Ata, who, as far back as 1986, went out with their bare hands against military hardware, the victims of Tbilisi, Yerevan and Baku, Vilnius and Kishinev.

However, there is acute concern for the future of the country. We need to take on the broad problems facing us, which, as events of the past few days have shown, are far from being solved. We now all have a different awareness, and this obliges us to look at the future of the Union and the Union Treaty in a new way.

For me it is obvious that the renewed Union can no longer be a federation. We have spent too long chasing after the past. The declaration of independence by the Ukraine and the similar decision being prepared by Belarus are evidence of new historical realities which we must not turn away from, or pretend that they do not exist. The situation has changed significantly.

You know that I was an active supporter of the speedy signing of the Union Treaty. I remain one. But recent events have shown how explosive and fraught with the danger of bloodshed the old scheme was.

In our time, we failed to listen to Andrey Dmitrievich Sakharov who proposed the Union as a community of equal republics. He said before we did that the republics had matured for that. But the time has now come for us to understand the correctness of what he said.

How do I envisage that future union? Having entered into contractual economic agreements among ourselves, we republics have in mind broad economic relations with everyone who agrees to it. It is not to the benefit of any of the fifteen republics in economic terms to go their separate ways now.

Common Union bodies retain certain functions. In my opinion this should be the protection of common borders, a supreme council for control [kontrolnyy komitet] over nuclear arms under the Ministry of Defense, in which all members of the Union would take part, controlling those who have their finger on the missile launch button.

The Union Ministry of Defense is the ministry for the defense of our borders. As for the army in each republic and this has already been decided by the RSFSR and Ukraine, and others have also decided this, and Belarus also intends this—we send the requisite number of servicemen for the Union Ministry of Defense. If an external threat arises, the ministry combines all our armed forces to defend the union.

We should have a joint Union transport network, as well as a republican transport system, including an air transport system. There should be interrepublican service lines [kommunikatsii], and our own service lines should be under our own control. The same applies to communications: there should be interrepublican communications and our own.

International relations are shared only in working out general trends, including the problems of disarmament, general world problems, and so on. But each republic must have its own ministry of foreign affairs with full rights, regulating its foreign political and economic activity and foreign economic and political treaty relations with other states. Each republic must also have completely autonomous consular administrations, so our citizens do not have to depend on the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the USSR to be allowed to travel abroad or to invite guests from abroad.

We are used to the abbreviation USSR. I propose leaving it and expanding it into the Free Union of Sovereign Republics [svobodnyy soyuz suverennykh respublik]. By republics I have in mind all republics, including the autonomous ones that have declared and want to declare themselves sovereign. We must give the right to representatives of any nationality to speak in their national language at all Union and republican forums and give every person the right and opportunity to hear their deputy in their mother tongue. In other words, we are proposing that a confederative treaty be concluded.

I am convinced that only then shall we attain genuine equality for the republics. Perhaps only through this shall we achieve a true federation: I am convinced of it. I should like to note, by the way, that the Novo-Ogarevo treaty is in effect practically a confederative treaty. We are being cagey in regarding it as a federal treaty. So let us admit this honestly, and finally put everything in its rightful place. The conclusion of a non-economic treaty can only be done in a stable and tranquil atmosphere, and only with republics that fully guarantee human rights and trust each other. Guarantees of human rights for people of all nationalities, religious faiths, and party allegiances, apart from fascist parties, of course, must be assured without fail on our territories in line with the Helsinki accord. To this end, Kazakhstan is prepared to be the first to invite an international commission to operate permanently in our multiethnic republic. We want to completely end violations of human rights that we have inherited from the old system.

We are also prepared to invite an international commission of experts to examine all patients in all hospitals, maybe in our republic, too. We are going to immediately launch a review of all so-called economic crimes, most of which were a punishment for ordinary entrepreneurial activity. We also regard all this as an assurance that we shall build a law-governed state and as a guarantee of republican sovereignty.

I call for an immediate solution to the question of giving full freedom to the Baltic republics, Moldova, and Georgia, and all who have expressed their aspiration for independence and autonomy by legal, democratic means, without any settling of accounts or the presentation of the notorious claims for debts amounting to billions, because even one human life is invaluable, and the people of our country have paid with so many for the love of freedom which they have displayed. And are these victims the last?

So, the ten-plus-one formula remains a thing of the past. Then, I must say straight out that in the new Union there should not be any Union cabinet of ministers, no Union parliament, apart from the treaty relations entered into by the republics. The moment of truth has arrived today. I cannot imagine any other basis on which Kazakhstan will enter a union with the other republics.

That, so to speak, is strategy. But the tactics for the immediate future must consist of the urgent formation not of a cabinet of ministers, but of a transitional interrepublic economic council. In it representatives of all the republics will work on an equal footing, joining in an economic community. But before that, we must give those who have decided to leave the opportunity to realize that right. All may join that interim economic council, including those who decide to secede from the Union. But economic cooperation will still continue, for the time being, for we are aware that, while they will leave politically, they will continue to cooperate economically with the others.

We have a legally elected president and parliament, which continue their activity. This should be mainly directed at ensuring that people should survive the winter and not die of hunger.

That is my view, in general terms, of the future Union. In conclusion I want to stress-so that no one should harbor any illusions-that Kazakhstan will never be any region's underbelly and will never be anyone's little brother. We shall enter the Union only with equal rights and equal possibilities. Thank you for your attention.

6.53 Nazarbaev Statement at News Conference

Moscow Ostankino Television 16 April 1993 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, esteemed representatives of the mass media: I imagine how impatiently and tensely you are awaiting the results of our meeting. It is really very extraordinary that there were few who suspected it a week ago. Although I would say that it is very timely-a meeting that was achieved through long suffering, yet was quite usual. It has been waiting its turn for a long time, and the peoples and the leaders of the countries of the Commonwealth have long been asking themselves why is it that there are more and more documents and agreements after CIS summits, but our life is becoming worse and worse?

Just think what a paradox we have here. The more documents we adopt on coordination and integration, the greater the lack of coordination there is in our actions, the more quickly and fruitlessly the previously unified economic space slides apart, thereby undermining not only the ties that have evolved, but also the very fate of ordinary people. Thus, the idea of the meeting was born. The awareness of this paradox grew with every day, with each of our steps toward integration.

Finally, the moment came when concern over the growing destabilization in the CIS led us to realize a very important thing. We realized that such a paper integration could not continue any longer, that it gave rise to endless papers and agreements. Our people are expecting us to take real, responsible steps.

It is concern for the state of affairs in the CIS that gave rise to the renowned appeal by the president of Russia at the beginning of March to the heads of our states. It is concern over the lack of results of that integration that did not allow us to remain silent. In reply, Alma-Ata gave its support to Moscow, and the idea was born of holding a meeting of the heads of states in the nearest future at which one question would be discussed, a question that was approved on the agenda today. It is the question of the further strengthening of the CIS. No other questions were examined. No documents were signed apart from the protocol on instructions that I, as chairman, have been instructed to sign and that I will speak about further. Despite the rather complex situation in each of our states, all the states of the CIS viewed that initiative sympathetically and responded to it with great interest. None of us remained indifferent, because this question worries us and is of concern to us all.

I would like to draw your particular attention to this. Despite the difficult conditions and the rather difficult situation in Russia-in spite of certain opinions-the Russian president, just as we all are, is concerned with the problems of the CIS. At the beginning of March, he appealed to all of us. I emphasize the role played by Russian President Yeltsin in today's meeting. This is important because, at the present state, precise and correct actions by the Russian leadership and by all power structures in Russia determine more than the political stability in Russia itself. In a sense, the development of events in Russia could seriously affect the progress of democratic reforms and market transformations in all CIS states today. I think it is in the interest of all of us that the process of reforms begun in Russia should continue. A president elected by popular vote and a legitimate parliament are guarantors of this ....

I am well aware that the question of whether or not to move toward closer union in the CIS is very difficult and complicated for a politician and a head of state. It is not every man who can find in himself the courage to answer this question. The result is destabilization, collapse, suffering, and torment. I wonder, how many more victims and how much more suffering must there be before we appreciate the need for closer coordination? How many more losses must we sustain before we stop dithering and doubting in this regard? Or perhaps the heads of state of our Commonwealth simply need the assistance of our parliaments? Take a look at the interesting experience being gained in this respect here, on Belarusian soil.

The question came up regarding the need for Belarus to join the Treaty on Collective Security. The Belarus parliament examined it and adopted a decision. Perhaps other Commonwealth countries should adopt this experience. After all, the question of the CIS's future is not a political question. It is simply a human question-the most everyday question-the question of people's futures, of the possibility for us all to live normal human lives.

Before this meeting, all of us were moving, as it were, in a crowd, but each of us had his own thoughts. Each of us had his own ideas about the intermediate stages along the way, and the speed of travel. We all had confused and individual ideas about which way we were moving toward integration, what we wanted from the Commonwealth, what we were joining together for, and what we intended to use the Commonwealth for as an instrument. Each of us had his own vision of a desirable near and distant future and his own views on our relations with the other participants in this difficult and unexplored voluntary integration.

Now this extraordinary meeting has taken place. At the meeting, we stopped, as it were, and determined the direction in which we should proceed. Which of us is already prepared to go in that direction? How do we organize an effective joint movement? How do we join our resources? How do we employ them collectively in the interests of our peoples?

At the next meeting, which we planned by mutual accord to take place in mid-May, we will decide how to organize effective joint advancement, how to unite our resources, and how to apply them collectively in the interests of our peoples. ... We will be examining substantial work carried out by working groups on documents that we made rough plans for today.

For its part, Kazakhstan proposed a whole range of questions of principle and strategy to be expanded at the next meeting. These questions concern key issues: closer integration in the economic, military, and foreign policy areas.

We have suggested setting up a union of agricultural workers. A meeting has already been held in Akmola, and it has been set up by all ministers in the former USSR states. A council of oil workers has held a session in Surgut. We have invited all industry ministers to convene in Karaganda at the end of May. Seven states have signed documents on the Collective Security Council, the CIS Charter, the Economic Zone, and the Single Currency Zone. They were ready for close cooperation, hoping that our subsequent summits would really become important milestones on the road to a new integration in real terms. We cannot help but take into consideration the hopes and expectations of our peoples. Thank you for your attention.

6.54 Russian, Central Asian Leaders Hold Summit-Ties Viewed

Vitaliy Portnikov Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 6 August 1993
[FBIS Translation]

The Kremlin Has Finally Noticed Central Asia

If we forget for a moment that the leaders of Russia and the Central Asian countries are gathering in Moscow to stop the escalation of civil war in Tajikistan, it can be acknowledged that we are witnessing a truly unprecedented event. Indeed, every cloud has a silver lining. Boris Yeltsin held separate meetings with the leaders of the Baltic countries, he met with the leaders of Ukraine and Belarus-and each time these meetings turned out to be historic-but he has not yet held separate meetings with the heads of the Central Asian states. Obviously, there were many collective gatherings after the meeting of the leaders of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus in Belovezh Forest that led to the dismantlement of the USSR and creation of the CIS, but apart from Yeltsin and his Central Asian partners, they were invariably attended by Kravchuk, Snegur, Shushkevich, and Ter-Petrosyan, for whom Central Asia, judging from their countries' geographical position, holds much less interest than for Russia. As a matter of fact, leaders of the Central Asian countries have also met with each other more than once. But Yeltsin did not attend. Now, dispatching his special representative, Anatoliy Adamishin, to Central Asia, the Russian leader has effectively put forward a new concept of collective responsibility of Russia and local countries for stability in the region. What is effectively at issue is the creation of a new geopolitical union-this time without European republics of the former USSR, which are not particularly interested in such an association. It will be recalled that this is occurring literally a few weeks after the demarche of the prime ministers of the three Slavic states, who announced-almost like their heads of state in Belovezh Forest-the creation of an economic union of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus; and also after sharply critical statements by some high-ranking Russian politicians accusing the Central Asian countries of desiring to set up their own economic union without Russia, but including Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan. But the goings-on in Tajikistan have pushed Russia and the Central Asian countries toward each other.

Nazarbaev as Guarantor of Russian Stability

Kazakhstan's unexpected absence from the economic union of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus looks as inexplicable and conspicuous at this former union republic's non-participation in setting up the CIS. Yes, Kazakhstan is not the most immediate neighbor of Ukraine and Belarus. For Russia, however, it is not simply a country next door, but a guarantor of the secure existence (if not survival) of the Russian state. It is Kazakhstan with its half-Kazakh, half-non-Kazakh population that makes it possible for Moscow to feel itself to be part of Europe, by giving it a bridge into Asia; a Kazakhstan that turned into a sort of buffer between two different civilizations not only for Russia, but for the whole world. Kazakhstan's significance for Russia appears even greater when, looking at the map, you realize how narrow a strip of land separates this country from the predominantly Muslim republics of the Russian Urals. One can imagine the consequences of Almaty's switch from a favorable policy vis—vis Moscow to a confrontational one. This is why one cannot stop wondering how deep-seated the Kremlin's desire is not to pay heed to Nursultan Nazarbaev—not only an outstanding politician, but also a real "political gift" to the current Russian authorities. At a time when it is becoming increasingly evident that "an Islamic revolution" in Central Asia in one form or another is inevitable, Russia would be wise to hold onto Kazakhstan with both hands. This is its only chance not to bog down in Central Asia, but to remain a respected and welcome partner for the region's countries.

Karimov Rethinks Viewpoints

On the eve of the Moscow meeting, the Uzbekistan president has made a whole range of political statements on Tajikistan that would confound observers. The Uzbek president, who had actively supported the forces that defeated the current Tajik opposition, now calls on Dushanbe to start talks with opposition leaders. Evidently, Karimov does not need instability on the Tajik-Afghan border because it can at any moment turn into a factor for instability on Uzbekistan's borders with Afghanistan or even with Tajikistan. Besides, the Uzbek president is unlikely to be satisfied with the fact that all the key positions in Dushanbe have been seized by people from Kulyab and not those from Leninabad, who have traditionally oriented themselves toward Tashkent.

Taking part in the Tajik events, Islam Karimov has shown who can be the region's master. Now it is essential for him to add to this a reputation as Tajikistan's "pacifier." Sooner or later, the instability in Tajikistan may backfire against its neighbors. For Uzbekistan, for its fledgling statehood, the blow may prove fatal. This is why Islam Karimov has to come to grips with the most complex problem in his political biography. Not only will his political future depend on it, but also the future of the republic itself. Inclined to make pragmatic decisions, Islam Karimov is set to confound, and repeatedly so, those who are inclined to view him as a marginalized post-communist leader.

Niyazov as Observer

Turkmenistan intends to distance itself from the rest of the Central Asian countries trying to resolve the Tajik conflict jointly with Russia. President Saparmurad Niyazov said in advance that a Turkmen military contingent could not be sent to Tajikistan and that he would attend the Moscow summit as an observer. The very concept of the society that Saparmurad Niyazov is building in Turkmenistan requires such a distance. There is no denying, however, that this viewpoint evokes understanding and approval among Turkmenistan's neighbors from among foreign countries that are "far" from Russia, but close to this country. Saparmurad Niyazov has more than once met with his regional neighbors without Yeltsin-and did not look like an observer at all. It is Niyazov, moreover, who can be seen as the initiator of the process of independent communication between heads of the former Soviet republics of Central Asia.

Akaev at the Helm of a European Kyrgyzstan

Kyrgyzstan tried to play the role of a peacekeeper in the civil war in Tajikistan until military units were sent there (which resulted in a conflict between the president and the parliament). Although Bishkek's political clout is not very strong, this gesture by Akaev (as well as some others, including the introduction of the som) was designed to produce a favorable external effect-to demonstrate that Kyrgyzstan, being a CSCE member like the other Central Asian countries, is willing to play according to European rules. Perhaps it is precisely from the Kyrgyzstan president that Russia can expect support for its new concept of collective responsibility. This support may be brought to nil in the event of a lack of understanding between Russia and Kazakhstan, albeit in a veiled form.

Rakhmonov as a Transitional Figure

The current Tajik leadership's stubborn unwillingness to start talks with the opposition only emphasizes its provisional nature. Still, there is a big difference between the refusals to do so that are coming from Prime Minister Abdumalik Abdullodzhanov, who is from Leninabad, and Kulyab-born Supreme Soviet Chairman Emomali Rakhmonov. The struggle for power is not over yet, and the Kulyab people, who have seized the commanding positions from the Leninabad group by force, are unlikely to feel secure. The Leninabad clique may obtain the highest posts even through compromise. For the Kulyab people, however, war means life and power. The leaders of Russia and the Central Asian countries are unlikely to persuade Rakhmonov. Anyway, decisions by the Moscow summit may help the current Tajik leadership in its castling process and open the way for a negotiating process.

Stability Will Suit All

Even a superficial analysis of the approaches taken by the Central Asian leaders shows that any durable union between these countries and Russia is thus far out of the question. The only thing that can actually unify the interests of Moscow, Almaty, Tashkent, Ashkhabad, Bishkek, and, sometime in the future, Dushanbe is stability in a region where any heavy-handed movement is fraught with civil wars, massacres, bloodshed, and even the collapse of a state. This understanding alone could be a factor contributing toward a successful summit in Moscow.

6.55 Karimov Comments on CIS, Euro-Asian Union

Mikhail Kalmikov and Vilor Niyazmatov ITAR-TASS,
27 April 1994 [FBIS Translation]

“I have no doubt that we needed the Commonwealth of Independent States. Otherwise we would have had a Yugoslavian version here after the collapse of the Soviet Union. History shows that such apprehensions are grounded,” Uzbek President Islam Karimov told a joint press conference here, devoted to the results of French President François Mitterrand’s state visit to Uzbekistan.

Replying to an ITAR-TASS question, the Uzbek leader noted that he believed the future of the CIS lay in economic integration, including the formation of interstate transcontinental corporations, which could unite Russian and Uzbek enterprises in joint-stock societies.

“We believe that the future of the CIS depends precisely on the formation of such associations, uniting the enterprises of Russia, Uzbekistan, and other republics. It will be even better if such associations are created not on a bilateral, but on a multilateral basis,” Karimov stressed.

Asked by ITAR-TASS to comment on the idea of the Euro-Asian union, recently voiced by Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev, Karimov said: “Much is left unsaid when the term Euro-Asian is used. If this implies a single parliament, single suprastate structures and even a single citizenship and a single constitution, it means the restoration of the old union, no matter what it is called. I am vehemently opposed to any comeback of the past. It is not for this that we have achieved sovereignty and are now engaged in national revival. There is no return to the past. History moves only ahead.”

“To put it in a nutshell,” Karimov stated, “the Euro-Asian idea smacks very much of populism, no matter who voices it.”

6.56 Karimov: Eurasian Union Dead; No Hurry to Join PFP

Vyacheslav Bantin ITAR-TASS, 18 May 1994 [FBIS Translation]

“Agreement has been reached with Kazakhstan’s President Nursultan Nazarbaev on scrapping the proposal to set up the Eurasian Union,” Uzbekistan’s President Islam Karimov, on his first visit to Japan, told a news conference in Tokyo today.

The president expressed the view that the idea to set up the Eurasian Union was no more than a “populist slogan.” “If we are unable to enforce real economic integration between CIS countries, how can one talk about setting up the Eurasian Union?” he said. Islam Karimov stressed the importance of the creation of the CIS, noting that “without the Commonwealth, the breakup of the former USSR could have resulted in the start of civil war” in several republics.

Speaking about NATO’s Partnership for Peace (PFP) program, the president made it clear that Tashkent does not intend to hurry in deciding whether to join it. “We are now studying the issue,” Islam Karimov said. He noted that Uzbekistan is consulting with Russia on the issue of joining the NATO program. “We have good understanding with Russia on the matter,” the president said.

6.57 Nazarbaev Proposal for Eurasian Union

Kazakhstanskaya Pravda, 7 June 1994 [FBIS Translation]

[Draft proposal signed “President of the Republic of Kazakhstan”: “Formation of a Eurasian Union of States.”]

Editor's Note. In the following proposal, Nursultan Nazarbaev makes it clear that he considers the CIS a spent force. He offers a detailed, written manuscript which proposes extensive voluntary reintegration of the former Soviet republics into a Eurasian Union.

At the present time all CIS countries are continuing to experience a profound crisis in all spheres of social life-the economy, policy, ideology, and international relations-and socio-economic tension is on the rise. This is happening under conditions where the development of the CIS is being determined by two trends. On the one hand the continued formation of national statehood is taking place, on the other, a trend toward the integration of the CIS countries is being observed.

The CIS, as an interstate association, is performing a positive role in the legal structuring of the interstate relations of its constituent countries. CIS potential is not exhausted. Nonetheless, the structure of CIS organs that exists at the present time is preventing the realization to the full extent of the available integration potential. Not only the leaders of the CIS countries, but also a large part of the population of these states are calling attention to this.

The experience of CIS functioning in past years shows the need for a transition to a new level of integration that would guarantee observance of the jointly adopted commitments by all the participating states.

International practice shows that any interstate association goes through different stages in its development and is supplemented by new forms of cooperation. The CIS has appreciable advantages-the high degree of integration of the economy and similar socio-political structures and mentality of the population and also the multinational composition of the majority of the republics and common historical traditions.

All this testifies to the need for a combination of the process of national-state building and the preservation and development on this basis of interstate integration processes. The logic of history is such that integration in the world community is possible only by the joint efforts of all CIS countries taking advantage of the powerful integration potential that has taken shape over decades.

The actual conditions show that while perfecting the mechanisms of the CIS, we should not regard it as the sole form of association. As practice has shown, the further development of the CIS countries is being held back by the insufficiency of the intrinsic potential of each of them. The development of the latter is possible only with the economic integration of the countries of the post-Soviet space on a new, market basis.

The inherited structures of the single national economic complex are continuing to corrode. Outmoded forms of economic relations are objectively dying away. At the same time perfected production engineering relations corresponding to the economic interests of our countries in the near and distant future are being disrupted.

Market reformations have universal regularities. No country can ignore them without succumbing here to economic romanticism. It would be expedient to combine the efforts geared to market reform of the economies of the countries of the former USSR on the basis of the close business relations that have already taken shape over the course of decades.

As world practice shows, only with collective efforts are transitional societies in a position to undertake successful modernization. At the same time, on the other hand, we see that the continuing attempts to tackle this task by individual countries of the CIS alone are, as before, proving unsuccessful. They will remain such until the realization of economic integration on new conditions. On the other hand, the unrealistic nature of the attempts at a reorientation toward some regional economic associations in the far abroad is obvious.

The lack of coordination in price policy with respect to exported raw material, which is having a negative effect on the states' economic position, has become a serious problem for them. On the other hand, this is introducing an element of instability to the settled world economic relations and forcing third countries to adopt strict sanctions. Exports of raw materials and energy resources are our states' most important revenue item. There is an urgent need in this connection for a unified export policy within the CIS countries in the interest of all the participants, with the adoption of serious measures in the event of some country's failure to observe the quotas and prices agreed upon.

An important component of the successful implementation of market reforms is an improvement in the national legislative bodies of the CIS countries. Further modernization is impossible without the rapprochement of the legislative foundations of economic activity, inasmuch as the current differences between them are becoming a serious obstacle to integrative processes in the economy.

Considering the differences among the countries in levels of development of the market economy and the democratization of political processes, we propose the formation of an additional integration structure—a Eurasian Union—in harmony with the activity of the CIS. Account is taken here of the polyvariant nature of the integration and the different pace and the heterogeneousness and varying vectors in the development of the CIS states. This is reason to speak of the urgent need for the formation of a new economic order in the CIS. The purpose is the harmonization of economic policy and the adoption of joint programs of economic reforms binding on the participating states.

The socio-economic and political crisis is occurring against the background of the multinational composition of the population of practically all the CIS states. As a consequence, interethnic tension leading not only to intrastate tension but also, in a number of cases, growing into interstate conflicts is on the rise. This situation is undermining the very institution of the CIS. Consequently, it is essential by joint efforts to devise mechanisms for deterring, localizing, and extinguishing various types of conflicts.

At the present time all CIS countries are searching for forms of constitutional arrangement appropriate for the internal conditions. But, as practice shows, neither the unitary nor the federative CIS states can be considered completely stable.

A solution to the questions of economic integration dictates the need for the creation of political institutions possessing a sufficient volume of authority. They must incorporate within themselves the regulatory functions of states' mutual relations in the economic, political, legal, environmental, cultural, and educational spheres proper.

Thus the time has come for the removal of the obstacles to interaction at the highest level and the simultaneous creation of the instruments for this.

A process of disintegration in the sphere of science, culture, and education is taking place at this time. The once unified cultural and educational space is becoming disconnected. The claim under these conditions that "science has no borders" is proving to be simply unfounded. Against the background of the intensifying socio-economic difficulties, the drain of specialists from the sphere of science, culture, and education, the decline in intellectual potential, and the fall in the standard and quality of education are increasing. These processes are leading not only to the rupture of the once unified system, but also to isolation from the cultural and scientific achievements of world civilization.

At the same time, on the other hand, the aspiration to intensify integration processes in the economy and policy should be based on the preservation and development of a concerted policy in the sphere of culture, education, and science. It is essential to preserve and augment the internationalization of the processes of the acquisition and practical use of new knowledge. The integration of R&D in the S&T sphere has become an inalienable part of the globalization of industrial activity in general.

The isolation of the post-Soviet space from the world cultural and scientific community is fraught with the danger of a new stage in the lag of the technological sphere.

A key task for the new states is the assurance of territorial integrity and security. At the present time the post-Soviet space is a zone of instability and the combination of various types of conflicts and is also experiencing the impact of centers of tension outside of the CIS. The guarding of the exterior borders and the stabilization of the situation in the conflict regions may be accomplished only by the joint efforts of all the states concerned and requires the concerted approach of the participants to a range of questions of a defense nature.

The problem of environmental safety remains one of the most painful and unresolved problems in the CIS countries. The environmental tension has been caused by a number of factors. The consequences of the testing of nuclear weapons and the activity of the nuclear power stations, the contamination of the environment with industrial waste, and the degradation of the natural environment as a result of man's economic activity (the running dry of water basin, deforestation, soil erosion, and so forth) may be attributed to these.

These problems are urgent for practically all CIS countries, especially since the main zones of ecological disaster are located in border areas, as a rule. They have been caused by the community of the evolved production engineering base and the methods of economic activity, the basis of which was the extensive focus. Not one of these problems can be resolved today by the independent efforts of one, even the biggest, state. Environmental preservation is a global task requiring large-scale capital investments and a combination of the efforts of all states.

The draft of the creation of a new integrative association, provisionally entitled the Eurasian Union, is offered for discussion.

Eurasian Union

The Eurasian Union is a union of equal independent states that is geared to the realization of the national-state interests of each participant and that has an aggregate integration potential. The Eurasian Union is a form of the integration of sovereign states aimed at a strengthening of stability and security and socio-economic modernization in the post-Soviet space.

Economic interests determine the bases of the convergence of the independent states. The political institutions of the Eurasian Union should adequately reflect these interests and contribute to economic integration.

Principles of Association

The following principles and mechanism for the formation of the Eurasian Union are proposed:

- national referenda or parliamentary decisions on states' membership in the Eurasian Union;
- participant signing of a treaty on creation of the Eurasian Union based on principles of equality, non-interference in one another's internal affairs, and respect for sovereignty, territorial integrity, and the sanctity of borders. The treaty shall contain the legal and organizational prerequisites for an extension of integration in the direction of the formation of an economic, currency, and political union;

- associate membership in the Eurasian Union is not permitted;

- decisions shall be adopted in the Eurasian Union on the basis of the principle of a necessary majority of fourfifths of the total number of participants.

Independent states shall be members of the Eurasian Union given fulfillment of the following preliminary conditions:

- obligatory observance of adopted interstate agreements;

- mutual recognition of the evolved state and political institutions of Eurasian Union participants;

- recognition of territorial integrity and sanctity of borders;

- renunciation of economic, political, and other forms of pressure in interstate relations;

- termination of mutual hostilities.

New countries shall be admitted to the Eurasian Union following the presentation of expert findings concerning their readiness to join the Eurasian Union by the unanimous vote of all members of the Eurasian Union. The expert findings shall be produced by a body formed on a parity basis by the states that have expressed consent to become members of the Eurasian Union.

Eurasian Union states may participate in other integration associations, including the CIS, on the basis of associate or permanent membership, or they may have observer status.

Each participant may withdraw from the Eurasian Union, having given the other states advance notice no later than six months prior to the adoption of the decision.

The formation of the following supranational bodies is proposed:

A Council of Heads of State and Heads of Government of the Eurasian Union-the supreme organ of political leadership of the Eurasian Union. Each participant shall preside in the Eurasian Union for six months at a time in Russian alphabetical order.

The supreme consultative-deliberative body is the Eurasian Union Parliament. The parliament shall be formed by way of the delegation of deputies of the parliaments of the participants on the basis of equal representation from each participant or by way of direct elections. Decisions by the Eurasian Union Parliament shall take effect following their ratification by the Eurasian Union state parliaments. The question of ratification must be considered within one month.

The main area of Eurasian Union parliamentary activity shall be to coordinate the legislating bodies of the participants to ensure the development of a single economic space and the accomplishment of tasks pertaining to the protection of the social rights and interests of individuals and mutual respect for state sovereignty and the rights of citizens in Eurasian Union states.

A common legal base regulating the mutual relations of the economic transactors of the participants shall be created via the Eurasian Union Parliament.

A Eurasian Union Foreign Ministers Council for the purpose of the coordination of foreign policy activity.

The Eurasian Union Interstate Executive Committee the permanent executive and control body. The leader of the Executive Committee shall be appointed in turn from representatives of the participants by the heads of state of the Eurasian Union for a time that they determine. The structures of the Executive Committee shall be formed from representatives of all the participants.

The Eurasian Union, in the shape of its Executive Committee, should acquire the status of observer in a number of important international organizations.

The Eurasian Union Executive Committee Information Bureau. The adoption of a special commitment or law by the participants to prevent unfriendly words about the parties to the treaty that could damage relations between them.

An Education, Culture, and Science Council. The shaping of a concerted educational policy and cultural and scientific cooperation and exchange and joint activity in the creation of textbooks and aids.

For the more in-depth coordination and efficiency of the activity of the Eurasian Union countries, the creation in each of them of a state committee (ministry) for Eurasian Union affairs would be expedient.

At the level of ministers of Eurasian Union countries the holding of regular meetings and consultations on questions of health care, education, labor and employment, the environment, culture, the fight against crime, and so forth.

Encouragement of the activity of non-governmental organizations in various spheres of cooperation in accordance with the national legislation of the Eurasian Union participants.

The official language of the Eurasian Union, together with the functioning of the national bodies of language legislation, shall be Russian.

Citizenship. The unrestricted movement of citizens within the Eurasian Union will require the coordination of external-in relation to third countries-visa policy. Upon a change in the country of residence within the Eurasian Union, an individual shall, if he so wishes, automatically acquire the citizenship of the other country.

A city at the intersection of Europe and Asia, Kazan or Samara, for example, could be proposed as the capital of the Eurasian Union.

The Economy

For the purpose of creating a single economic space, it is proposed to form within the framework of the Eurasian Union a number of supranational coordinating structures:

- a commission for economics under the auspices of the Eurasian Union Council of the Heads of State elaborating the main directions of economic reforms within the framework of the Eurasian Union with regard to the interests of the national states and presenting them for confirmation to the Eurasian Union Council of Heads of State;
- a commission for raw material resources of Eurasian Union exporting countries for the harmonization and confirmation of prices and quotas for exported raw material resources and energy and the signing of the corresponding interstate agreement. Coordination of policy in the sphere of the mining and sale of gold and other precious metals;
- a fund for economic and technical cooperation formed from contributions of the Eurasian Union countries. The fund would finance promising, research-intensive economic and S&T programs and assist in the accomplishment of a wide range of tasks, including legal, tax, financial, environmental, and so forth;
- a commission for interstate financial and industrial groups and joint ventures;
- a Eurasian Union international investment bank;
- a Eurasian Union interstate arbitration tribunal for economic matters legally ruling on contentious issues and imposing penal sanctions;
- a commission for the introduction of a monetary unit of settlement (transferable ruble).

Science, Culture, Education

It is proposed to implement a number of measures to preserve the potential achieved in previous decades and increase integration in this sphere:

- to create Eurasian Union common research centers for basic research in the sphere of modern learning;
- to create a Eurasian Union fund for the development of scientific research uniting the research outfits of various countries;
- to create a committee for relations in the sphere of culture, science, and education under the auspices of the Eurasian Union Council of Heads of Government;

Defense

The conclusion within the Eurasian Union framework of the following accords is proposed:

- a treaty on joint actions to strengthen the national armed forces of Eurasian Union members and to protect the exterior borders of the Eurasian Union.

The Eurasian Union proposes the creation of a common defense space for the coordination of defense activity:

- the formation of a collective Eurasian Union peacekeeping force for maintaining stability and extinguishing conflicts in the participating countries and between them. With the consent of Eurasian Union participants, in accordance with international rules of law, the dispatch of the peacekeeping force to conflict zones on the territory of the Eurasian Union;
- the presentation of a collective appeal of Eurasian Union countries to international organizations, including the UN Security Council, for conferring the status of peacekeeping force on the joint contingent;

-the creation of an interstate center for problems of nuclear disarmament with the participation of representatives of international organizations.

All states of the Eurasian Union, aside from Russia, shall maintain their nuclear-free status.

The Environment

The formation as soon as possible of the following mechanisms is essential:

-an environment fund under the auspices of the Eurasian Union Council of Heads of State realizing within the framework of the Eurasian Union environmental programs and financed by all the participating states;

-the coordination of operations with international organizations to reduce the degree of environmental pollution;

-the adoption of short-term and long-term programs on major problems of environmental restoration and the elimination of the consequences of ecological catastrophes (the Aral, Chernobyl, the Semipalatinsk Nuclear Test Range);

-the adoption of a Eurasian Union interstate treaty on the storage of nuclear waste.

History is affording us an opportunity to enter the twentyfirst century by the civilized path. One method, in our view, is the realization of the integration potential of the initiative pertaining to the creation of a Eurasian Union reflecting the objective logic of the development of the post-Soviet space and the will of the peoples of the former USSR to integration.

President of the Republic of Kazakhstan

6.58 Foreign Minister Rejects Eurasian Union Proposal

Interfax, 17 June 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Uzbekistan's Foreign Minister Saydmukhtar

Saydkasymov said that the Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev's proposal of a Eurasian Union is an attempt to restore the former USSR. He was speaking in Tashkent on Friday [17 June] at a meeting with the heads of the diplomatic corps accredited in the republic.

Saydkasymov said the CIS has not exhausted its opportunities yet and a Eurasian Union would mean a return to the past. "Uzbekistan links its future with the sovereignty obtained by the republic," he said.

Kazakhstan's Ambassador to Uzbekistan Nazhameden Iskaliev told Interfax that "every state has the right to express its opinion on issues in which it has an interest." Iskaliev believes that the idea of an Eurasian Union would be discussed at the September summit of the heads of CIS states.

"Of course, certain corrections will be introduced into the document, nevertheless it should be treated with great attention," Iskaliev said.

6.59 Eurasian Union: For and Against

Asylbek Bisenbaev Kazakhstanskaya Pravda, 27, 30, 31 August 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpts

Editor's Note: The following article reveals the large number of supporters Nazarbaev's Eurasian Union plan claimed when it first appeared. This was perhaps because so many Russians regarded the CIS as an ineffective creation; they felt that Russia lacked the firmness shown by Nazarbaev. Of particular note is the support reported on behalf of the international community. However, by introducing a new version of the union treaty, Nazarbaev was appropriating Russia's role and gaining an upper hand, psychologically if not politically, within a reconstituted union. Yeltsin, therefore, warily distanced himself from the concept, calling it “premature.” The development of the Eurasian option also entailed the danger of Russia’s being drawn into regional conflicts and even assuming the burdens of the old union. Yeltsin knew Russia had little capacity for assuming such a responsibility. Russia, furthermore, was still hopeful that it could pull Ukraine back to its fold, and preferred to avoid the creation of a Russian-Muslim bloc.

[27 August]

The draft “Formation of a Eurasian Union of States” is an initiative that has evoked the most extensive press in the CIS in the spring and summer of 1994 and the close attention of the news media of the far abroad. The majority of journalists has evaluated the draft as “sensational” and as having “had powerful repercussions.” It may be said that the idea has fallen on fertile ground and has been taken up seriously by the press, part of which, even while according it a guarded or negative evaluation, has involuntarily attracted public interest in the new integration idea and the personality of the president of Kazakhstan.

Many observers link N.A. Nazarbaev’s idea concerning the creation of a Eurasian Union (EAU) with his lecture at the M.V. Lomonosov Moscow State University. But he launched the first trial balloon on the need for the formation of a new integration formation during his visit to Great Britain. Speaking in the Royal International Relations Institute, N. Nazarbaev declared: “The development of the post- Soviet space is being determined currently by two trends: On the one hand, the formation of national statehood is under way; on the other, the trend toward integration of the countries of the CIS. There is an urgent need for a reform of the Commonwealth of Independent States itself that would ensure the creation in this region of a belt of stability and security and would enhance the degree of predictability of political evolution.” Despite this, the idea of the creation of an EAU was for many politicians unexpected, although thinking on the transformation of the CIS had been in the air, so to speak. N.A. Nazarbaev himself and many analysts and politicians have expressed repeatedly the need for the conversion of the amorphous CIS into a really operative union. “More than 300 documents have been adopted in the time of the CIS’s existence,” N.A. Nazarbaev explained in his interview with the Japanese paper Mainichi. “But no results are in sight because a number of states partially rejects some of them, interpreting the content of the agreements in their own interests.”

The international community always awaits the overseas trips of the president of Kazakhstan with interest since, during the meetings with the leaders and the public of other countries, he frequently presents enterprising proposals for a solution of global and regional problems.

N.A. Nazarbaev’s speech at the Moscow State University, in which he set forth his basic vision of the EAU, evoked an active response on the part of the international community. Many representatives of diplomatic circles of the United Nations recognize that the president of Kazakhstan is in the CIS “the most sober-minded and attractive politician of high international standing who has a realistic evaluation of the situation both in the republic and in the Commonwealth as a whole.” They believe that the basic principle of his proposal concerning the creation of an EAU is the “equality, respect for the sovereignty, and the independence of each state, the rights of the individual, and the individuality of each state.”

Realization of this initiative, in the opinion of foreign diplomats, would enable the EAU members, while preserving the states’ economic independence, to coordinate more precisely questions of foreign policy and foreign economic activity. In the view of UN representatives, the military aspect of an

EAU and the principles of its structure would seem the most complex. Forecasting the possible response on the part of countries of the CIS to Kazakhstan's initiative, VOA observed that "the proposal to create on the basis of the CIS a union similar to the European Union will, most likely, be supported in the states of Central Asia. Ukraine, which is actively defending its independence, will most likely reject the idea of membership of any union that specifies a central parliament, common citizenship, and a common currency."

A number of news media have perceived President N. Nazarbaev's new initiative as a "forced piece of impromptu politics" (ABV, 22 April 1994, for example). It is hard to agree with such an approach. You could make an analysis of all N. Nazarbaev's speeches and see for yourself that, behind the initiative, which appeared somewhat of a surprise, there is lengthy work on the Kazakhstan leader's part on the shaping of integration on the basis of new principles. Let us recall some of them. At the UN General Assembly's Fortyseventh Session, the president of Kazakhstan expressed concern that "the fragile structure of our Commonwealth is not yet fully taking account of the age-old traditions of the interaction of the countries and peoples of this part of Eurasia. As a result, the processes of transition to an economy of free markets and democracy in the CIS are being accompanied by a growth of socio-economic and political instability and an exacerbation of existing conflicts and the emergence of new ones."

Back in the perestroika period, N. Nazarbaev was expressing his idea of an economic union, and his position in the period of the signing of the Belovezh Agreement was essentially pivotal in the preservation of the unity of the new states. Returning to the events of that period, Ya. Plyays in the article “Present and Future of the CIS” (Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 3 March 1994) believes that the most significant mistake of the politicians, both former and present, was the signing by the leaders of the three republics on 8 December 1991 of the Belovezh Agreement “without the consent and in defiance, even, of the wishes of the peoples expressed in March of that same year for the preservation of the Union of SSR.

“The Belovezh Act was a mistake because it interrupted the process of reform of the USSR and its conversion from a unitary state, if not into a genuinely federative, then, at least, into a confederative state.” Analyzing the state of the integration processes in the post-Soviet space, Ya. Plyays concludes: “The present CIS is an ineffective formation and, generally, not all that viable. We need to honestly acknowledge this and, having boldly abandoned it, switch emphatically to the creation of a confederative union of Eurasian states, with the intention that it could in time develop into a stronger national-state association.”

Speaking of the invariability of President N.A. Nazarbaev’s policy of a strengthening of ties between the republics, A. Gurskiy also notes the negative impact of the Belovezh Agreement. “The October arrangement of thirteen heads of republics was suddenly muffled by the forest echo of the decision, which flew around the world, adopted in December’s Belovezh Forest. And, in what might this forest itself have resulted for our peoples and what guns of a regional, interethnic, and fratricidal caliber might it have begun to fire had it not been for the wisdom of Kazakhstan and its Uzbek neighbor. Meeting on the insistence of Nursultan Nazarbaev, the leaders of ten union republics signed in the evening of 21 December 1991 the Alma-Ata Declaration on the appearance on the political map of the world of the Commonwealth of Independent States and on the termination of the existence of the USSR and a number of documents for easing this transitional period” (Vestnik Kazakhstana, 6 May 1994).

The draft “Formation of a Eurasian Union of States,” which has been published in the press and which has been sent out to the heads of states of the Commonwealth, could be the basis of the formation of a new association of states. I would like to call attention to several fundamental points of this draft. The idea of an EAU does not in the least signify the demolition of the CIS, as some politicians believe. N. Nazarbaev’s draft says that “the CIS, as an interstate association, performs a positive role in the legal structuring of the interstate relations of the countries that are a part of it, and the potential for action of the CIS is not exhausted.” In addition, the EAU states could participate together with the CIS in other integration associations, with associate- or permanent-member status or observer status. On the other hand, some politicians and journalists have perceived the EAU project as a resuscitation of the former USSR. But they have overlooked such propositions as “non-interference in one another’s internal affairs and respect for sovereignty, territorial integrity, and the sanctity of borders.” The EAU is thus a form of integration of sovereign states for the purpose of a strengthening of stability and security and social and economic modernization in the post-Soviet space.

Considering the experience of the activity of the CIS, the imposition of preliminary conditions for membership of the EAU is proposed: obligatory observance of interstate agreements that have been adopted, mutual recognition of the evolved state and political institutions of the participating countries, recognition of territorial integrity and the sanctity of borders, the renunciation of all forms of pressure in interstate relations, and an end to mutual hostilities.

A “golden rule” suggested by Jean Monnet at the time of the unification of Europe was the formula: “go as far as possible in the mechanisms of union. But never touch the sovereignty of the members.” As we can see, the draft of the EAU, abiding by this formula, has proposed much that was in the mechanisms of the Union, but has not touched the foundations of the sovereignty of the new states. Moreover, the concept of the EAU strengthens this sovereignty.

This aspect of the problem is, truly, extraordinarily important. Many people see as a threat the possibility of the restoration of the USSR. But when it is a question of integration on a voluntary, democratic basis whose purpose is not military-political supremacy but economic cooperation and a strengthening of stability, the attitude toward such an association changes. U.S. President B. Clinton's speech, for example, which coincided with the debate on the discussion of the draft of the EAU, was an important event. The American president declared that he did not believe that the possibility of the democratic and legal reunification of the republics of the former Soviet Union would represent a threat to the countries of the Baltic, Europe, or the interests of the United States. "This will depend on whether such decisions are really adopted voluntarily and are in keeping with the wishes of the majority or not," he emphasized in an interview published on 4 July 1994.

For the accomplishment of the tasks set in the draft of the EAU, the formation of a number of supranational bodies is proposed. Including a Council of Heads of State and Government with the rotating chairmanship of each participant, and EAU Interstate Executive Committee-a standing executive control body-and so forth. An EAU Parliament is to be an important body providing for the coordination of sets of legislation. A number of observers have noted also the great flexibility of the problem of citizenship, which is considerably superior to the idea of the introduction of dual citizenship and corresponds more precisely not only to the national interests of the countries and the citizens but also to international standards-“upon a change of country of residence within the framework of the EAU, an individual may, as he wishes, automatically acquire the citizenship of the other country.”

In addition, the draft provides for the creation of an EAU Executive Committee Information Bureau with the adoption of a special undertaking concerning the inadmissibility of unfriendly expressions directed at parties to the treaty that could be harmful to relations between them. A multitude of examples of the news media being used for such unseemly purposes could be adduced. The question of the northern oblasts, oppression of the Russian-speaking population, and such is regularly raised in respect to Kazakhstan, for example. Similar statements are being made, what is more, by people that are far from having a knowledge of the actual situation in the republic and also by those that would like to enhance their political popularity thanks to a “winning theme.” When the bulk of the information space of the CIS is concentrated in single hands, such statements seriously undermine stability. The adoption of the corresponding law or commitment could do away with this problem.

We could quote the example of the situation in Kazakhstan being evaluated via the established stereotype concerning the growth of Islamic fundamentalism and interdominion and clan contradictions. Thus, S. Kurginyan has quite a lot to say in his material (“Content of the New Integrationism,” Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 7 July 1994) about “dominion-clan,” tribalist tendencies. Granted all the outward attractiveness and the mass of “predigested facts,” the substantial quantity of material can only evoke in the reader, who really comprehends the situation in depth, regret or consternation. Speaking of the various models of Eurasianism, and there are, indeed, quite a lot of them, and they are frequently of a directly opposite content, S. Kurginyan has failed to notice that the president of Kazakhstan invests in this concept a purely geographical meaning. If a union of states that are located in Europe and Asia could be called not “Eurasian” but something else, does this need to be underpinned by an ideological base? Unfoundedly contriving for N. Nazarbaev’s draft farfetched models “in the spirit of apologetics for the Golden Horde,” and “reconstruction of the USSR,” and, even more, “neo-fascist Eurasianism,” as the author of the article does, is, at least, inappropriate. If we attempt to take as a basis S. Kurginyan’s procedure, which is distinguished by a one-sided view, it may be said that his article is a reflection of the interests of the “republic partynomenklatura elites,” which aspire on the basis of a common idea (communist once again, perhaps) and a “balanced attitude toward the values and experience of the Soviet period” to restore the “indestructibility of a new union state.”

The draft of the EAU has, naturally, evoked a serious response primarily in Kazakhstan. Different political forces and individual authors have evaluated the idea and, subsequently, the draft itself differently. The majority of deputies of the Supreme Council of the republic has supported the idea of a Eurasian union, judging by polling results (93.9 percent).

O. Suleymenov, leader of the People's Congress of Kazakhstan, defined his position almost immediately. It is necessary right now to create an integration "think tank," O. Suleymenov believes, which would before the end of the century have worked up the theory of the Eurasian Union and the paths and methods of its interaction with the European and North American confederations (Biznes-Klub, 28 June 1994). In addition, the leader of the People's Congress of Kazakhstan Party believes that the draft of the EAU presented by President N.A. Nazarbaev has been useful on a purely practical level also—"the structures of the CIS have stepped up their work sharply. Important documents were signed in record time at the meeting of the heads of 16 April" (Kazakhstanskiye Novosti, 18 June 1994). This approach shows O. Suleymenov's consistent position on questions of the integration of the Eurasian space. We may, thus, remind the readers of an interview in the newspaper Aziya that was published in July 1993, in which the poet spoke of the need for the formulation of a theory of Eurasian integration. Other party members supported their leader also. Khalyk Kongresi published on 12 April an article by Professor B. Alikenov in the Topical Problems column, which makes a positive assessment of the idea of a Eurasian union. The author emphasizes that, although its creation is not for Kazakhstan the sole way out of the crisis, it is the most efficient as of this time.

The international independent newspaper Turkistan (12 April 1994) expresses the fear that the idea of an EAU could be a step en route to the revival of the empire. At the same time, on the other hand, it recognizes that both in Russia and within Kazakhstan itself this initiative has knocked the ground from beneath the feet of separatists and reactionary forces. The difference in evaluations of the idea of the EAU, in the paper's opinion, is an objective point, but this initiative has, on the whole, captured the people's mood.

[30 August]

A. Solzhenitsyn commented in sharply negative words on President N. Nazarbaev's initiative and proposed the unification in a single state of the Slav republics and Kazakhstan (Izvestiya, 4 May 1994). He kindly consented here to "release" the other peoples from this state. The famous Kazakhstani writer I. Shchegolikhin expressed his attitude toward A. Solzhenitsyn's interview, noting that this position represented the "customary Soviet, Bolshevik style: pin a topical label on, and that's all there is to it." As far as North Kazakhstan is concerned, "it is sufficient to glance at the topography to see that Southern Siberia is North Kazakhstan. But we are making claims on neither Russia nor Siberia, and neither politicians nor even writers are talking about this, and there are among them such daredevils as are not a bit inferior to the Nobel Prize winner either in national ambitions or rashness of generalizations” (Kazakhstanskaya Pravda, 13 May 1994).

Kh. Kozha-Akhmet, chairman of the Azat Movement, even issued an appeal in which he expressed a protest at the “separatist adventure of President Nazarbaev regarding the creation of a Eurasian union.” In his television interview on a news program of the Tan Television and Radio Company of 23 June of this year, he called for resistance to the EAU project and the formation of a popular front and various headquarters for resistance to this idea. But, as subsequent events have shown, there are fewer and fewer of those that wish to flock to the banners of Kh. Kozha-Akhmet. They are made leery, evidently, not only by the absence of any constructive ideas but also by the Azat GDK’s [further expansion unidentified] borrowing of the experience of the Communist Party, which formerly was continually in the business of resolving all problems by the creation of so-called “three-man teams,” “operational groups,” and headquarters for combating the latest phenomenon. Extremism in policy has never been supported by Kazakhstanis, and individual figures still do not understand or are unwilling to understand this. It is not surprising that the popularity of such parties and movements has sunk to the lowest level....

Certain distortions of the EAU project were reflected in a number of publications of the Russian press also. Thus Obshchaya Gazeta (17-23 June 1994) published the article “Our Response to Nazarbaev” based on sociological data of the Vilchek Service. It reflected, unfortunately, the old habit of criticizing without knowing the subject of the discussion. The article says, for example, that “Boris Yeltsin’s comments on Nazarbaev’s plan for the creation of a Eurasian Confederation contained nothing other than an ironical intonation.... In any event, the Russian president made it understood that the referendum proposed by the president of Kazakhstan will not take place.” I would like to recall that the draft deals with the formation of a Eurasian union of states and that the republics would join it here in the wake of national referendums or decisions by the parliaments. One has the impression that the Vilchek Service, which placed in the newspaper the results of a sociological survey of 2,000 Muscovites, familiarized itself with the plan for the formation of an EAU insufficiently seriously. Nonetheless, the results of this survey show that from 33 to 38 percent of Muscovites supported N. Nazarbaev’s idea, whereas 24.5 percent took a negative view of it (18 percent were sharply opposed). As the newspaper observes, “even among the people that in principle take a positive view of the idea, almost one-third does not believe that this idea can be implemented.” But one further figure, on which the sociologists did not comment, is indicative-only 15.5 percent of Muscovites believe that it will be easier for Russia to extricate itself from the crisis alone...

As far as Russia, without which the Eurasian idea is simply dead, is concerned, “total disarray reigns there as yet.” The opponents of the idea in Moscow, in V. Verk’s opinion, proceeding from the danger of Russia’s conversion into a Turkic power in the first twenty years of the twentyfirst century even, consider possible rapprochement on “horse and rider” principles. The seriousness of the assertion concerning Russia’s “Turkization” in the next twenty years evokes puzzlement, to say the least. Various excesses are possible in polemical ardor, and a journalist is free to employ various methods of calling attention to his publication, but in this case they have assumed a cyclopedic nature.

If, however, we lend an ear to the opinions of real scholars, several publications may be distinguished. Thus, V. Tishkov, director of the Russian Academy of Sciences Ethnology and Anthropology Institute, writes in his article: “Nazarbaev’s recent proposal concerning the creation of a Eurasian union would seem exceptionally important since a powerful economic and social and cultural symbiosis between Kazakhstan, Russia, Kyrgyzstan, and a number of other post-Soviet states is preserved, and it is more rational to use it for people's common reconstitution, not to break things down by strict borders, which, among these three states at least, the present generation of politicians will not succeed in imposing on the population. This would not damage either the sovereignty of the peoples or the culture of the peoples, and it could spare us tragic mistakes. It is gratifying that Nazarbaev's initiative has been supported by many top politicians, Sergey Shakhrai, for example" (Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 8 April 1994).

The newspaper Aziya (No. 22) offers the reader an interview with A. Brudnyy, corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences of the Kyrgyz Republic. Making a very high assessment of the EAU idea, the scholar observes that "whether it is realized or not, it will go down in history. A material point: I do not believe that it should be counterposed to the CIS since other unions are possible within the framework of the Commonwealth also. The Eurasian Union is stronger by design. It does not infringe on the CIS nor does it infringe on the various sovereignties. Such a union is possible, I believe, between Russia, Kazakhstan, and Kyrgyzstan ...." A. Brudnyy believes that imperial ambitious are the cause of Russia's cool attitude toward the president of Kazakhstan's initiative. In his opinion, "this idea is not exclusively the personal invention of Nursultan Nazarbaev, it reflects a trend that has supporters in both countries. He has caught it and expressed it. As president. And it is President Yeltsin's duty to 'speak for Russia.' He has not, however, expressed a precise position. Nor has his team either."

A. Sergeev ("EAU: Reason Against Chaos," Rik, No. 23, 16-22 June 1994) believes that publication of the draft of an EAU put an end to the speculation of certain news media and politicians concerning the impromptu, improvised nature of this initiative of the Kazakhstani president. In his opinion, "even the most 'thick-skinned' politicians are beginning to understand that without a new commonwealth of equal and independent states filled with creative meaning there remains just one path-into the abyss."

B. Aubakirov writes in an article entitled "Back to the Future" (Argumenty i Fakty, No. 24, June 1994): "The proposal concerning the creation of a Eurasian union of states, seemingly advanced spontaneously by N. Nazarbaev at a meeting with students of Moscow State University, has acquired a real edifice. In the form of a published draft-with a detailed study of both the general idea of such a union and of its individual 'components.' This is eloquent testimony to the fact that a true politician does not make incidental statements." The author notes that President N. Nazarbaev's proposals, which are geared to a strengthening of integration processes, "have either been glossed over in silence or have been supported in order to mollify public opinion." The main obstacle in the way of integration, in his opinion, are the leaders of the new sovereign states, "who did not even dream that they would end up with enormous power. They have gotten a taste for it and will hold on to it until the end. The examples of Ukraine, Tajikistan, and Azerbaijan are confirmation of this. It is immaterial who is at the helm—communists or democrats—they will not give up the ‘riches’ that have fallen into their laps. Even if they have to cover the country with blood, as we have seen in Georgia.” In this connection the directive elite of the new states will see the idea of an EAU as a “hankering to limit their power.” And it is not important that the draft speaks of entirely new principles of association. They will interpret them in a way that is beneficial for themselves, juggle them, or simply gloss over them in silence. We need to be prepared for this lest we once again suffer a major disappointment.” Yu. Kirinitsyanov (correspondent of Rabochaya Tribuna) also notes in the newspaper Novoe Pokolenie (23 June 1994) the cool attitude toward the EAU idea of neighboring republics....

In his subsequent interview with Nezavisimaya Gazeta (24 June 1994), S. Shakhrai said that the statement of Andrey Kozyrev, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Russia, that Russia was undoubtedly prepared to conduct negotiations on a confederation, but on the Eurasian Union format, only following “the specific decisions of parliaments and the political leadership,” seemed unwarranted.

The EAU idea was actively supported by V. Shumeiko and many other top political figures, who took account of the mood of the bulk of the population of Russia and the CIS and who are attempting to construct the image of consistent supporters of integration. Specifically, S. Shakhrai deemed it possible even to publish the draft Confederative Agreement that he had put forward in 1992 and that he had announced in the PRES’s election platform. Nonetheless, a comparative analysis of the drafts of the EAU and the Confederative Agreement points to the more thorough development of the Kazakhstan document. V. Shumeyko considered even that the advancement of the EAU idea had “prompted some people in the direction of more active integration steps,” and the success of the meeting of heads of state of the Commonwealth in Moscow was “largely due to President Nursultan Nazarbaev” (Kazakhstanskaya Pravda, 6 May 1994).

Various organizations adopted a positive attitude toward the EAU idea. The International Democratic Reform Movement issued an appeal to the Moscow conference of heads of state of the CIS “Yes to the Eurasian Union.” It speaks on behalf of more than sixty group participants operating in the independent states of the need for support for President N. Nazarbaev’s initiative.

The “Toward a New Accord” forum, which was founded on the initiative of the International Democratic Reform Movement, fully supports the initiative concerning the creation of a Eurasian union. The forum staged on 18 June 1994 was the conference “The Eurasian Community: The Common in Diversity,” in which representatives of thirty parties and sixty grassroots movements of the post-Soviet states took part. The conferees adopted an appeal to the people, members of parliament, and heads of state: “We support the draft of a Eurasian union devised by N.A. Nazarbaev, president of Kazakhstan, and call on the heads of state to view it from the standpoints of the interests of their peoples.”

The General Confederation of Trade Unions (VKP) and the International Confederation of Journalist Unions (MKZhs) called for support for N. Nazarbaev’s initiative. The VKP is confident that the association would “give the peoples of the Commonwealth countries a real opportunity for a better future, the speediest way out of the global impasse, and the creation of living conditions worthy of man” (Panorama, 7 May 1994). On behalf of the members of fifteen journalists unions, the MKZhs declared that “the embodiment of the president of Kazakhstan’s initiative would afford an opportunity for removing the grounds for any kind of conflicts” (Kazakhstanskaya Pravda, 16 April 1994).

Shaykh R. Gaynutdin, chairman of the Religious Administration of Muslims of the Central European Region of Russia, mufti, and chief imam-khatyb of the Moscow Central Mosque, evaluated highly and supported N.A. Nazarbaev's draft. A meeting was held in the Embassy of the Republic of Kazakhstan in the Russian Federation with Professor E. Bagramov, chief editor of the journal Evrasiya, Narody, Kultura, Religiya, and Professor G.E. Trapeznikov, president of the Russian-Hellenic Religious Unity International Foundation, who consider timely and fruitful the appearance of this document, which points to a prospect of a revival of the relations of the Eurasian peoples with regard to the new historical realities (Kazakhstanskije Novosti, 2 July 1994).

I. Rybkin, chairman of the State Duma of the Federal Assembly of the Russian Federation, observed during a meeting with K. Saudabaev, minister of foreign affairs of the Republic of Kazakhstan, that the idea of the creation of a Eurasian union was being received very well in Russia. "And despite the fact that not all states of the CIS are yet prepared for association on such a basis," he said, "we are open to such a union" (Kazakhstanskaya Pravda, 3 June 1994).

I. Korotchenya, executive secretary of the CIS, fully supported the idea of an EAU. As he told journalists, the realization of this idea would not harm the CIS in the least.

L. Kravchuk, the former president of Ukraine, commented negatively on the proposal concerning the creation of an EAU. "I do not believe that we should today disband the CIS and create a Eurasian union," he declared. "This idea is premature. In addition, this could not be done without regard to the opinion of all citizens. We would be forced to conduct a referendum, as was the case at the time of the creation of the European Union” (Reuters). “President Nursultan Nazarbaev’s initiative,” Leonid Kuchma, the newly elected leader of Ukraine, believes, “represents just about the optimum solution of the crisis situation in which the economy of the sovereign states, former republics of the USSR, has found itself.... The great danger for all countries of the CIS, Ukraine included, would be to remain outside such a formation.”

“The initiative of Kazakh President Nazarbaev on the creation of a Eurasian union should be seen as positive,” V. Zametalin, press spokesman for the chairman of the Council of Ministers of Belarus, said. “That its realization will be just as complex as answering the question of why such a structure as the Commonwealth of Independent States is inoperative is another matter.” The recent elections in Belarus showed that the electorate had a positive attitude toward integration projects. Account was taken of this by A. Lukashenka, the new president of Belarus, also.

The position of the leadership of Uzbekistan is ambivalent. For several months the press has been earnestly exaggerating the differences between the two leaders of Central Asia. But the conclusive position of president of Uzbekistan I. Karimov was determined only recently. In his letter to N. Nazarbaev, he writes: “The idea of the creation of a Eurasian union instead of completing the economic integration of the CIS countries offers a solution of the crisis situation that has taken shape in certain states that gained independence following the disintegration of the Union of SSR by political means and, essentially, if we investigate more deeply, a renunciation of sovereignty and statehood and a return to the previous formats and norms of the unitary associated state.” A definite position, in any event. It is regrettable that the draft of the EAU, which contains not a whiff of encroachment on the sovereignty of the republics and which contemplates voluntary, equal cooperation in all spheres, has come in for such a distorted interpretation. But I. Karimov’s practical actions are, for all that, directed into an integration channel, which was shown by Uzbekistan’s membership of the Central Asian integration zone.

In the past, at the time of the formation of the European Community, Jean Monnet, who is called the father of a united Europe, advanced the following formula in respect to Great Britain, which could pertain to Uzbekistan also: “Do not wear out your nerves on Great Britain. It will always start by saying ‘no.’ It will affiliate with the Community because it will have no choice.” This forecast in respect to Great Britain was fully justified.

Kyrgyzstan President A. Akaev observed in his letter to N.A. Nazarbaev: “I consider it necessary to emphasize once again that I have from the very outset unreservedly supported your initiative concerning the creation of an EAU (the sole president among those of the CIS countries, possibly), I support it now, and I will remain a convinced supporter of it.” A. Akaev submitted a proposal concerning the creation of a joint commission of experts of interested states for the more in-depth and high-quality study of the mechanisms and principles of realization of this initiative.

K. Zatulin, chairman of the Committee of the State Duma for CIS Affairs, acknowledged that N. Nazarbaev’s idea concerning the creation of a Eurasian union has a future, but needs detailed study. It is essential that this work be performed thoroughly, the Russian deputy emphasized, first among a group of experts and only then at the “political responsibility” level.

At a news conference on the results of his visit to Pakistan, E. Rakhmonov, chairman of the National Assembly of the Republic of Tajikistan, speaking about the initiative concerning the creation of an EAU, observed that this idea deserved attention.

Commenting on President N. Nazarbaev’s initiative, E.A. Shevardnadze termed it “very interesting and deserving of attention.”

L. Meri, president of the Republic of Estonia, observed during his official visit to Almaty that “such associations and such integration are the future” (Panorama, 18 June 1994).

Deutsche Allgemeine (No. 175, 18 June 1994) carried under the heading “Eurasian Union: Ways Out of the Crisis” the opinion of a number of representatives of diplomatic departments of the near abroad in Kazakhstan. V. Sokolov, minister-counselor of the Russian Federation in Kazakhstan, writes: “This idea is not contrary to the interests of Russia and has, on the whole, obtained a benevolent response. Although not all share it. The idea of Eurasianism is not new, it has been around for several dozen years. But it acquires in President Nazarbaev’s initiative a new, opportune resonance, thereby attracting attention.” G.

Bezhuashvili, minister extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the Embassy of the Republic of Georgia in Kazakhstan: “The EAU idea is acceptable to Georgia because this union could create guarantees of stability within the state-political and economic-which is what we currently lack. Mechanisms of the elimination of interethnic conflicts not only in Georgia but in all countries of the former USSR could be found.” A. Grigoryan, first secretary of the Embassy of Armenia in Kazakhstan: “The attitude toward the idea of a Eurasian union of states is favorable in the leadership of Armenia as a whole.”

N. Johns, ambassador of Great Britain in Kazakhstan, declared his country’s readiness to send to Kazakhstan British experts experienced in work in the structures of the European Union and the CSCE to study President N.A. Nazarbaev’s initiative concerning the EAU.

A number of opinions on the position of the Russian leadership in respect to the draft of the EAU has been expressed in the Russian press. We shall cite two of them. V. Portnikov in the article “The Dream as an Instrument of Real Policy. There is No Eurasian Union, But It Is Already Getting in Many People's Way” (Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 7 May 1994) described the idea of an EAU as a dream and saw it as a successful test “of the true nature of Russian integration intentions—a test that has demonstrated to the former Soviet republics once again that they should not count on Moscow’s effective support, unless they agree to such a semicolonial scenario of ‘integration,’ with unpredictable consequences, as the Belarusian scenario or show up on the Kremlin porch following a bloody civil war, like the Tajik leaders.”

Aleksandr Vladislavlev, president of the Independent Foundation for Realism in Policy, writes, stressing the priority in Russia’s foreign policy toward the CIS countries (Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 6 May 1994): “The priority of this direction is recognized by all, but, unfortunately, nothing has been done or is being done here as yet. . . .”

“It is astonishing, therefore, when we not only lack our own initiative but do not even have the time to respond to the initiative of others.” A. Vladislavlev believes that Nursultan Nazarbaev has put forward “an idea that is undoubtedly interesting and that moves in the direction of the development of the integration process. Of course, many aspects, which require clarification and further study, arise here. But reacting to this important initiative with total official silence is not simply incomprehensible, it is impolite also. Such an approach is enormously damaging to us and casts a shadow on the readiness and desire of Russian diplomacy to do business respectfully and properly with our most important partners.”

In his letter to Kazakh President N.A. Nazarbaev, B.N. Yeltsin observed that “we need to move toward unification, while preserving, of course, the sovereignty of the states, and on a purely voluntary basis. This is an imperative of life itself. Integration should be of a profound nature and should extend to all spheres: the economy, policy, science, military matters, the environment, and the social sphere. The creation of supranational control mechanisms will most likely be needed also.” Having made specific mention of certain issues, Russian Federation President B. Yeltsin believes that “the most in-depth study of the issue is needed to ensure that, at the upcoming meeting of heads of state of the Commonwealth in September, all determine together how best to advance the cause of integration.”

The broad palette of opinions on President N. Nazarbaev’s new initiative reflects the need for the stabilization of the post-Soviet space and an intensification of the integration processes, primarily in the sphere of the economy. No CIS state is in a position to accomplish the transformations in isolation from its neighbors. The draft of the EAU determines a sufficiently extensive range of zones of cooperation. Professor V.V. Kiyanskiy, who was elected at the Interparliamentary Assembly of CIS States chairman of the Environmental Protection Commission, believes: "Ecologists have to the greatest extent felt the consequences of the centrifugal forces, having been left on their own to confront problems requiring a collective solution, in respect, for example, to the Caspian, the Aral, the Urals, Kapustin Yar. Through the ecological prism, the Eurasian Union is a command of the times" (Kazakhstanskaya Pravda, 2 July 1994).

In his article "EAU: Stalemate" (Karavan, 12 August 1994), S. Mekebaev says that "the idea of a Eurasian union is closer and more comprehensible to political scientists and theoreticians than practical politicians." If the responses of politicians and statesmen of the CIS countries are analyzed, the majority of practical politicians have expressed agreement in principle with the basic propositions of our president's initiative. It is sufficient to cite the example of the parliamentary hearings organized by the Committee of the State Duma of the Russian Federation for CIS Affairs, at which representatives of the parliaments of Ukraine and Belarus and diplomats were present. It was observed during the hearings that the EAU was the most developed and substantiated of the integration ideas that have been proposed as of this time and that it corresponds entirely to the cherished aspirations of the majority of the population of the Commonwealth countries. Leonid Kuchma commented positively on Nursultan Nazarbaev's initiative, noting that not political, but economic, interests would prevail in this association. N. Nazarbaev's draft has caused a sharp upsurge of both theoretical studies on problems of the integration of the post-Soviet space and of practical measures pertaining to a resolution of this problem. Thus, the Council of Foreign Ministers of the CIS states has adopted the decision to hold a meeting of experts of the Commonwealth countries for a detailed discussion of N.A. Nazarbaev's proposal. A.L. Adamishin, First Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation, declared: "An integration plan, which encompasses a whole number of aspects of the activity of the CIS, is being prepared at this time, and the Russian position is that the president of Kazakhstan's ideas could be incorporated in this common integration plan of development of the Commonwealth."

It is today clear that the draft of the formation of this integration association is already performing a practical role. As N. Nazarbaev observed during his visit to St. Petersburg: "Even for ensuring that people may go to see each other in the now independent states without hindrance, we should if only for this reason settle the question of association in a community or, if you will, a union. We need to alleviate the processes occurring in our countries, approach people in civil, human fashion.... The times themselves demand that the issue of the greatest convergence and integration of our economies and peoples be part of the agenda" (Sovety Kazakhstana, 9 August 1994).

The creation of the union of three Central Asian republics is a practical result of N. Nazarbaev's initiative also. The first meeting of the Council of Prime Ministers of Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan in Bishkek initiated real work within the framework of the new union of the three states. These trilateral accords are even today a model for the further expansion of integration processes.

The EAU has ceased to be an idea to whose implementation people aspire and has become a realistic project, which will undoubtedly be supplemented and revised in accordance with the new conditions, a project that is already being realized in practice. This is a long path. But we are being prompted toward this path not only by national interests but also the objective logic of history consisting of the world trend toward integration.

Making a full survey of all the responses to President N.A. Nazarbaev's initiative today is, naturally, quite difficult. Each new day is bringing information concerning the positions of this politician, statesman, and scholar or the other of various states. And this flow will increase by the day. Especially since there is an opportunity today even to discuss not only the idea of integration but also a prepared document.

Little over a month remains until the next meeting of heads of state of the CIS-sufficient time for a thorough study and analysis of the Eurasian Union project. Let us hope that the leaders do not repeat the old mistakes and that the possibility of uniting efforts for a resolution of common problems is realized.

6.60 Nazarbaev Struggles to Push Eurasian Union

Boris Vinograd Izvestiya, 29 October 1994 [FBIS

Translation]

[Report by Boris Vinogradov: “Another Union-But This Time Eurasian? Why Moscow Refutes Nazarbaev’s Idea”]

Editor’s Note: Despite the initial attention the EAU received, it did not ultimately succeed. There were many complex psychological and political reasons why its first adherents pulled back from their original enthusiasm and rescinded their support. After 1994, the EAU continued to be mentioned in speeches, but only in a token, lukewarm manner.

Belarus's President Lukashenka adamantly opposed an EAU because he was devoted, in a fanatical way, to a Slavophile "center" for the CIS. The other Central Asian nations seemed to harbor suspicions of Nazarbaev's motives, not wishing to see a Kazakh/Russian coalition become dominant in their region of the world. There has definitely been political competition between Nazarbaev and Uzbekistan's Islam Karimov for influence over Central Asia. The Transcaucasian leaders-Aliev, Ter-Petrosyan, and Shevardnadze somewhat listlessly continued to share an interest in a reconstituted economic union and an alternative to Russian hegemony within the CIS, but could do little for Nazarbaev on their own. The Moldovan president, Mircea Snegur, simply rejected any supranational institutions and clung to the basic, but workable, approach of strong bilateral ties with as many former republics as possible. As the following article so aptly notes, however, the idea of some kind of confederal community lingered in many leaders' minds because it had struck a definite chord in the public consciousness. The reader might expect to see several confederal options appear, and perhaps disappear, over the next few years as state leaders determine just how much or how little integration they and their citizens can tolerate.

Ever since Nursultan Nazarbaev thought of setting up a Eurasian Union on the expanses of the CIS-and this was back in March this year-the attitude both of the masses and individuals toward this idea has remained almost unaltered. Perception fluctuates between

Efforts to test the water and promote this idea at the recent summit in Moscow also proved unsuccessful. Kazakhstan’s leader barely managed to keep the Eurasian Union question on the agenda, and then only in the “any other business section.” Aleksandr Lukashenka-a newcomer to the presidents’ club- demanded that it be taken out of the discussion altogether.

Nursultan Abishevich might have expected such blatant ostracism from anybody else but the man who stood alone in his own parliament when he ventured to vote against the 1991 Belovezh Forest Agreements. According to logic, a kindred spirit had to be found in him at least. The lack of logic in the Belarusian leader’s move only reflects all the confusion and chaos surrounding the Eurasian Union.

Few people will remember now that the abbreviation EAU appeared in our midst before CIS as a product of the dream of the great humanist Andrey Sakharov for a union of the peoples of Europe and Asia. During the collapse of the superpower, it was proposed as the new name most in line with the geopolitical essence of the former fraternal, now independent, republics. It most probably failed to gain a foothold for lexical considerations. The word “union” warmed the hearts of some, and shocked others. So closely linked is it with the phrase ” . . . inviolable union of free republics” [from the Soviet national anthem].

Obviously, Nazarbaev took account of this rather important circumstance when he circulated his draft to all CIS aspirants “for perusal and recommendations.” I do not know how things progressed with the perusal, but no recommendations followed. According to the results of the Moscow summit, the following configuration of forces emerges.

Boris Yeltsin sees in the EAU many positive points which could be used in the course of integration, but he believes that the peoples “do not want this.” Leonid Kuchma has yet to clarify his stance: “It requires reflection.” At the end of the conference, Lukashenka declared that he “had been incorrectly understood” when the agenda was being confirmed, and he had thereby completely obscured the position of Belarus. Mircea Snegur remained enigmatically silent. Eduard Shevardnadze supported it “in principle” as an innovation with which it is possible to step with dignity into the twenty-first century. Geydar Aliev also expressed support, but he hedged it around with a mass of provisos and comments. Levon Ter-Petrosyan reiterated the Russian sentiments. Islam Karimov gave an unequivocal “no.” Saparmurad Niyazov, who attended the conference only in the physical sense, uttering not a single word at it, kept his thoughts to himself. Askar Akaev, who considers himself a close friend of Nazarbaev, approved. Emomali Rakhmonov seemed also to be “in favor,” but he showed no particular enthusiasm.

In other words, the participants in the discussion formed up into a defensive circle, clearly not wishing to make too much of the issue. Everyone seems to understand that it is a matter of some kind of an alternative to the CIS, into the formation of which Moscow is putting so much effort. To vote for the Almaty project would mean opposing Russia, to whom the other members of the Commonwealth are in debt.

Everyday economic reality determines cognizance. One way or another, integration within the framework of the CIS is progressing according to a plan dictated from Moscow. The creation of the Interstate Economic Committee [IEC], where Russia has 50 percent of the votes, formalized its leading role for the first time. Experts believe that this figure is artificially low and does not reflect the real weight of a state possessing such mighty resources. However, Boris Yeltsin managed to obtain a rejection of the principle of consensus-that is, unanimity when taking decisions which gives him a chance to act more authoritatively.

Behind the fine rhetoric and good intentions, perspicacious Russians detected in the EAU a desire to return to the old system of the distribution of raw material assets. So it is that Konstantin Zatulin, chairman of the Duma Committee for CIS Affairs, suggests: The majority of republics have already realized that they have no future without Russia, but as yet they are not all prepared to pay the real political price for a chance to hitch themselves to its apron strings once again.

Nazarbaev's position is special. His influence abroad rivals that of Gorbachev during the era of perestroika. His laurels on the international arena give rise to jealousy in the Kremlin, and half-hearted utterances regarding Russia's interests prompt suspicion. Nursultan Abishevich is finding it hard to convince Boris Nikolaevich that he does not intend to restore what the latter demolished. (The draft contains an item on the inviolability of borders and the renunciation of strong-arm pressure.)

The domestic situation is another matter. Moscow observes somewhat maliciously that Nazarbaev is between the devil and the deep blue sea. Namely, the nationalists, who curse him for his pro-Russian inclinations, and the Russianspeaking population, demanding dual citizenship and compliance with human rights. It is no accident that the aspiration to transfer the capital from Almaty to northern Kazakhstan was viewed as a political maneuver aimed at lessening the discontent of the Russians [in Kazakhstan].

The very same force of inertia is operating in the case of the EAU. Nazarbaev thumps his chest, trying to demonstrate the sincerity of his kindly feelings toward Russia and the purity of his intentions. Official Moscow is in no hurry to believe him, discerning other "motives" between the lines of the precocious draft.

Almaty's proposals to introduce the free movement of citizens and uniform visa regulations, to make the ruble the pan-national currency, to create a single defense system, parliament, and legislation, to set up one executive committee as a suprastate organ, and so on, met with a positive response only from an insignificant proportion of Russian politicians.

At the beginning, Sergey Shakhrai, Arkadiy Volskiy, Gennadiy Zyuganov, Mikhail Gorbachev applauded enthusiastically. But the applause faded. Now, each of them has furnished himself with his own plan for the reintegration of the post-Soviet area, having been persuaded that the idea of reviving the union has proved more tenacious in people's minds and maybe highly popular at the next elections.

In these conditions, the Almaty initiative has two chances. It will either assume central place in future discussion on the given theme, having undergone adjustments from the sidelines, or else it will be buried by the joint efforts of those who, from the outset, saw it more as a piece of craftiness than as an acknowledged necessity. As well as those who bank on exploiting the nostalgic feelings of the voters, and who are not averse themselves to assuming the role of the new messiah.

Incidentally, Nursultan Abishevich says that he is ready to share copyright, just so long as the "matter goes through."

6.61 Skepticism Toward Eurasian Union Idea Noted

Marat Salimov Kommersant-Daily, 25 October 1994
[FBIS Translation]

A press conference with Nursultan Nazarbaev, president of Kazakhstan, that was held on Saturday was devoted entirely to problems of the realization of Nazarbaev's idea of the creation of a Eurasian union. Despite the fact that this idea aroused no enthusiasm in the majority of heads of state at the Moscow summit, Nazarbaev is sure that the real integration of the new independent states may occur only on the principles stated in the concept of creation of the union.

At the news conference the president did not conceal his disappointment with the results of the meeting of heads of state of the CIS. This disappointment was connected not only with the rejection of the idea of a union but also with the fact that the economic integration of the Commonwealth countries has in practice come to a halt. In Nazarbaev's opinion, the main reason preventing the Commonwealth countries from restoring those that have been lost and developing new ties in the economic and humanitarian spheres is the absence of supranational bodies capable of monitoring and directing the integration processes. Nazarbaev observed that a barrier blocking the creation of such structures is the negative attitude of the leaders of some states of the Commonwealth toward the integration process as a whole. Specifically, the president of Kazakhstan mentioned the presidents of Belarus and Uzbekistan, Aleksandr Lukashenka and Islam Karimov, who are definitely opposed to the creation of supranational bodies and who at the meeting proposed that the item concerning the creation of a Eurasian Union be removed from the agenda. Despite the fact that this matter was nonetheless discussed, it was decided merely to note the proposal concerning the creation of a union and to use the ideas contained in the concept of its creation to stimulate integration processes in the CIS.

Kommersant-Daily: The Nazarbaev draft concerning the creation of a Eurasian Union was presented for consideration by the heads of government of the Commonwealth countries in the spring. It provides for the creation of an economic and political union of the former republics of the USSR, including supranational executive authorities and an interstate parliament, which would coordinate the legislative activity of the participants.

It is significant that Belarusian President Aleksandr Lukashenka also expressed dissatisfaction with the results of the Moscow meeting following his return to Minsk. That is, he stuck to the opinion that he had expressed at a news conference on the threshold of the summit—the signing of interstate agreements could not get integration moving.

Despite the absolute skepticism of Lukashenka and Karimov's rejection of the principle of integration itself, the first supranational body was created in Moscow. But the position of the presidents needs to be given its due. Of the more than 450 documents signed by the heads of state and government of the Commonwealth countries, no more than one-fourth are actually working. It is entirely likely in this connection that the Russian delegation will propose new initiatives at the December meeting of heads of state of the Commonwealth in Almaty.

6.62 Ministry Official Rejects Nazarbaev Proposal on Union

Interfax, 1 November 1994 [FBIS Translation]

Leonid Drachevskiy, director of the CIS Department of the Russian Foreign Ministry, told Interfax in Moscow on Tuesday that Russia and other CIS countries were not yet ready to create a Euro-Asian union, which was initiated by Kazakhstan's President Nursultan Nazarbaev.

He addressed a meeting in the Russian Foreign Ministry, involving representatives of public organizations, members of the Russian delegations at the talks with CIS countries, as well as staff members of the ministries and departments concerned.

Drachevskiy said "the Commonwealth countries are advancing toward a sort of a community, be it a union or something else.” “But haste is out of place here,” he said.

6.63 Nazarbaev Urges “Vigorous” Integration Push

Interview by Vladimir Ardaev Izvestiya, 30 December 1994 [FBIS Translation], Excerpt

Just before New Year, your Izvestiya correspondent interviewed Nursultan Nazarbaev, president of the Republic of Kazakhstan.

[Ardaev]: Nursultan Abishevich, you are a consistent defender of the idea of integration among the peoples and states of the former Union. How would you describe the outgoing year in that regard?

[Nazarbaev]: When I put forward the idea of creating the Eurasian Union, I set myself several tasks. First, to break the deadlock over the CIS. I believe that some movement has been made in this regard. We have finally formed the Interstate Economic Committee and signed an agreement setting up a free-trade zone, which is the first stage in organizing a customs union. Parliamentary collaboration has become more active. The experts have approved the pact on peace and stability in the CIS, which will clearly be discussed at the presidents’ meeting in Almaty at the start of 1995.

All these things are based to a greater or lesser extent on the ideas of the Eurasian Union. There is also understanding for our approach to citizenship, particularly with regard to making the procedure for acquiring and changing citizenship as simple as possible. More constructive approaches are emerging on the question of protecting external borders. Second, my task was to formulate a general concept for the integration process, a kind of model or norm to work toward. This makes it possible to see clearly the main outlines of integration in the long term. Finally, one of the main schemes was to arouse the mass consciousness of people whose lives are affected by the success or failure of integration.

Of course, many things were not done, but I am not going to reduce the problem to the conduct of the political elites. There are objective factors creating barriers to integration. I respect the attitude of many of my colleagues who put forward perfectly sensible arguments. But the concept of the pace of play operates in politics too. I do not accept the argument that integration will occur of its own accord sooner or later. Time can be wasted here. That is why vigorous efforts are needed.

But we must not resort to extremes. Of course it is possible to restore the rigid centralized state. But that would certainly not do people a favor. The second stereotype is a faith in an instant integration into the European or, say, Asian home. It is time to get over these romantic illusions.

I see the future of the independent states being decided on a purely voluntary basis.

[Ardaev]: In your opinion, what will 1995 be like? What will we be able to do away with and what will we build in the new home, and under what conditions?

[Nazarbaev]: It has already become customary to cite the great Russian economist Kondratyev's idea on the model of long-term economic cycles. The analogy is weak, of course, but we are clearly standing on the threshold of a wave of integration. The first to sense this, by the way, were the businessmen, entrepreneurs, and directors. Probably this has to do with the fact that feedback in the business sphere is more effective than in politics. I hope that the will of the political elites will be channeled in this direction.

To be specific: I would like to see the results of the activity of the economic structures which have been created-in particular the Interstate Economic Committee.

Clearly the problem of simplifying the acquisition or change of citizenship will be resolved. It is to be hoped that economic legislation will be harmonized. The implementation of major economic projects between Kazakhstan and Russia will begin.

The republics are increasingly beginning to understand that the joint solution of the majority of common problems is also the constructive path which will enable us to find our place in the world.

The main thing, in my view, is that a similar process has also begun in Russia. I have met with many scientists and politicians and I felt, especially in the second half of 1994, that Russia's role and place in the new geopolitical area have begun to be reassessed. In other words, its three-year policy of "repelling everyone" is producing an understanding that this will cause political and economic harm, most of all to Russia itself....

6.64 Nazarbaev on Eurasian Union, CIS Future
Interview by Viktor Kiyanitsa

Moskovskie Novosti, 15-22 January 1995 [FBIS
Translation]

Editor's Note: The following document was chosen for Nazarbaev's interesting explanation of his belief in regional blocs. He offers this explanation as a reason why the former Soviet republics must not think they can simply attach themselves to other regional blocs in the West, and should instead form their own bloc.

Three years ago you became the first popularly elected president of Kazakhstan. And something else happened almost simultaneously-the signing of the Belovezh agreements and the disintegration of the Union. How did you perceive it then and how do you evaluate it now?

[Nazarbaev]: As distinct from many of my colleagues, I have been and remain a consistent supporter of integration. Mine has always been a clear position-it is essential not only to recognize and declare but also to engage the colossal potential of economic, cultural, and human relations in the Eurasian space. But history does not know the subjunctive mood. It is only in analytical scenarios that it is permissible to argue in the style: "What if the USSR had not been demolished?" In practical politics people operate mainly in the categories of real, not conditional, time. The disintegration of the USSR means a complex set of objective historical and personality factors. The great German sociologist Max Weber once seriously asked whether there would have been World War I had Archduke Ferdinand not been assassinated in Sarajevo. The disintegration of the USSR undoubtedly has its inner logic. But the problem is now in a different key. First, everyone recognizes the complexities and difficulties of an autonomous surmounting of crisis. Second, we are talking about the relations of politically independent states.

[Kiyanitsa]: The Commonwealth of Independent States was created at that time in Almaty, with your active participation. You described it at that time as a "form of civilized divorce.” Are you not now disappointed in the sense that “the mountain has given birth to a mouse?”

[Nazarbaev]: The Commonwealth of Independent States was created, for all that, in Belovezh. As far as the situation that has taken shape since the Belovezh agreements is concerned, it has been very complex. In December 1991 we faced the potential threat of a breakup of the entire post-Soviet space along the lines of the Slav and Turkic republics, Christians and Muslims. It was on that basis that actions were pursued to preserve the manageability of the processes in this vast space. We took account of the global aspects of this decision also, incidentally. A colossal arc of instability could have had critical consequences for all of Asia and Europe.

[Kiyanitsa]: Nonetheless, you have all these years voiced dissatisfaction with the amorphousness of the CIS. And the meeting planned for December was canceled. What was the reason for this?

[Nazarbaev]: Concerning postponements-if there are valid reasons, why not accommodate them. And on this occasion there are valid reasons. The documents had not been prepared, and this was, besides, connected with the tragic events in Chechnya. I will say frankly that Kazakhstanis cannot fail to be concerned that blood is being spilled on the territory of a friendly state. As before, the impact of events in Russia on its neighbors is great. Consider also the fact that many Chechens live among us and that they are all anxious for the fate of near ones and dear ones. People wish for the speediest end to the bloodshed.

While viewing the Chechen problem in the context of Russia's territorial integrity, I consider a search for peaceful paths of a settlement essential and possible, nonetheless. I spoke about this on New Year's Eve with Boris Nikolaevich Yeltsin. I permitted myself to express concern at the protracted conflict on Russian soil. Taking as a basis the opinion of the community and the mood of the thousands of Chechens living in Kazakhstan included. And I recently had a lengthy telephone conversation with Viktor Stepanovich Chernomyrdin. I offered to send humanitarian assistance for the civilian population of Chechnya. Food and medicine have now been dispatched from Kazakhstan. I plan to meet with the Russian leaders, and this difficult subject-the Chechen crisis-will be discussed in our conversation. I am prepared personally to make every effort for the speediest settlement of the conflict.

[Kiyanitsa]: All these years you have been a consistent sponsor of integration, which has gained you the reputation of a supporter of a “new Union,” just about. Was this required by your political image or is it a question of some inner requirement?

[Nazarbaev]: It is not a problem of my image or my inner requirement. There are in politics clear imperatives which you may accept or reject, but they continue to exist, regardless of personal likes or dislikes. There is such an imperative in the modern world-regional integration. The whole world today is first and foremost an aggregate of integrated blocs. No one, other than utterly archaic isolationists, denies this. It is wholly a question of how to integrate and with whom. I am convinced that Eurasian integration is of great importance for the post- Soviet states. And it is not so much a question of historical and cultural realities even as of exclusively pragmatic factors: economic geography, transport accessibility, unity of infrastructural system, relatively similar production engineering base, and so forth. It is time to rid ourselves of “romantic integration” into the developed integrated blocs of East and West. It is time to understand that no one needs us there.

[Kiyanitsa]: At the last meeting of heads of the CIS you presented the latest initiative-the EAU [Eurasian Union]. Many people deemed it untimely. Some saw it as your personal failure, when you were left among your colleagues practically on your own. Do you intend to return to this idea at the coming meeting or will you put it off “until better times,” when public opinion and leaders have “matured”?

[Nazarbaev]: I would remind you that the documents of the Moscow summit point to the need for use of the valuable ideas of the EAU project for a further intensification of integration processes in the CIS. It is not the case that this project or the other is accepted immediately 100 percent in politics. I do not believe that such a large-scale project could have been accepted immediately, but its positive significance is already great enough. First, the CIS has finally gotten moving-an Interstate Economic Committee (one of the pivotal ideas of the EAU) has finally been formed. Questions of interparliamentary cooperation are coming to be analyzed more actively. In accordance with the EAU project, this is for the future a most important issue: the convergence of legislation primarily in the economic sphere. A set of questions of specific military-political cooperation has been discussed at expert level. A political document in development of the ideas of the EAS-a peace and stability pact-will be prepared for the Almaty meeting.

Second, a number of elements of the EAS are being realized at the bilateral relations level also. Specifically, we are hoping in the very near future for a concerted decision on a simplified procedure of the change and acquisition of citizenship between Kazakhstan and Russia. Third, the EAS project has exerted great influence on the mass consciousness on the scale of the entire CIS. No other foreign policy document in the CIS has, perhaps, throughout its existence evoked such extensive discussion.

[Kiyanitsa]: In the years of your presidency Kazakhstan has acquired all the signs of a sovereign state and the final attribute of statehood—a national currency being introduced a year ago. What are the results of the first year of “full and final” sovereignty?

[Nazarbaev]: It has already been said that Kazakhstan never previously controlled its economy in full. And this assertion was correct up to this year. Now we have this experience. And although it has begun not entirely successfully—the inflation indicators have deteriorated, and the decline in production has continued—signs of positive change in the direction of financial stabilization are already visible, nonetheless. Having signed the standard bank agreement with the International Monetary Fund, we are adhering to all the necessary conditions. This obligation is, naturally, stimulating foreign investment. As of today agreements have already been signed on official financial assistance with the IMF, the World Bank, the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the Asian Development Bank, and the government of Japan on the allocation of long-term loans on favorable terms (totaling $910 million altogether). Eighty-eight individual credit agreements for a sum in excess of $1.5 billion have been signed.

Of course, all transformation involves certain hardships for the population. Nonetheless, the level of the average wage, in terms of which we have established ourselves in the CIS in second place behind Russia, has been rising steadily here since September. By the start of 1995 this indicator will be over $70. I myself recently appealed to parliament for the immediate discussion and adoption of most urgent legislation determining the legal basis of economic relationships and regulating questions of ownership, investments, bankruptcy, mortgages, and so forth.

6.65 Lukashenka Criticizes “Eurasian Union” Plan

Moscow Radio Rossii Network, 25 January 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: Lukashenka's rejection of Kazakhstan in the following document could pose problems for Russia, which can afford neither to ignore the Muslim populations to its south, nor to risk a Slavic/Muslim split within the CIS. To complicate matters for President Yeltsin, the Slavophile national patriots (of whom Solzhenitsyn is a member) are gaining a modestly large following in Russia. A split between Slavophiles and radical Eurasionists (like Zhirinovskiy) is a dangerous political possibility within the larger political picture.

Aleksandr Lukashenka, president of Belarus, has categorically distanced himself from Russian-Kazakhstan unification, and has sharply criticized Nursultan Nazarbaev's idea of setting up a Eurasian Union instead of the Commonwealth of Independent States. In an interview to a group of journalists, which included our Minsk journalist Yuriy Svirko, Aleksandr Lukashenka said:

[Begin Lukashenka recording.] I have nothing to do with that so-called Eurasian Union, which began taking shape with the signing of Russian-Kazakhstan agreements in Moscow. Moreover, I am also convinced that Boris Yeltsin does not consider these signed agreements as a Eurasian Union. We clearly decided at the last meeting of heads of state that we had the Commonwealth of Independent States, and that we wanted to cooperate at various levels. It has been demonstrated by Ukraine, Belarus, and Russia. Here it is, and let us get on with it. And any attempts by certain politicians to declare that Belarus, Russia, and Kazakhstan have set up some new Eurasian Union, or have started setting it up, believe me, I can speak for myself, and for Yeltsin, and I can tell you that there is nothing like that. We have decided that we shall continue to develop the trends which are being shaped in the CIS. I am ready for this. I will not depart from this policy. [End recording.]

6.66 Meshkov Supports Eurasian Union

Governmental Telegram Krymskie Izvestiya, 11 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: A very interesting letter was sent to CIS leaders by Yuriy Meshkov, then president of separatist Crimea. In it, Meshkov requests designation as “staff headquarters” of a Eurasian Union. The Crimean nationalists’ rejection of Ukraine and the Slavic confederal concept led them to opt for a Eurasianist course. In this letter, the Crimean government head is also clearly enunciating the direction in which he wishes to see Russia go.

Esteemed Nursultan Abishevich! I request that you promulgate our appeal in the high forum of Commonwealth countries in Almaty.

Appeal to the CIS heads of state participating in the Almaty meeting.

Esteemed Gentlemen!

Ardently supporting your efforts to strengthen cooperation in the sphere of defense, the economy, safeguarding of borders, customs control, and humanitarian contacts, I am hoping for further development of this cooperation within a framework which implements the concept of the Eurasian Union.

The Crimean Peninsula has always received all guests of every nationality, from any corner of the former USSR, with cordiality and hospitality. We are deeply convinced that henceforth as well, for all of time, Crimea must not only be the health and resort center for all people from the CIS countries, but must become a peninsula of peace, friendship, and unification of the citizens of Commonwealth countries.

In the event that the Eurasian Union is established, we propose to make Crimea the location of its staff headquarters. Objective circumstances exist in favor of this:

- (a) Proximity to all the CIS countries and convenient transportation links;
- (b) The kindly predisposition of Crimean Republic residents to representatives of all nationalities, and excellent environmental and climatic conditions for fruitful work;
- (c) Our readiness to afford high-quality premises and everything else necessary to accommodate representatives of the Commonwealth countries on short notice.

I am relying on the wisdom of Commonwealth heads of state in this most important matter—the unification awaited by all our peoples.

With sincere respect,

[Signed] President of the Crimean Republic Yu.
Meshkov

6.67 Nazarbaev: People Will Support the Eurasian Union

ITAR-TASS, 19 November 1995 [FBIS Translation]

“The idea of a Eurasian Union is a very serious concept of the post-Soviet era. It has its logical sources in the world practice,” president of Kazakhstan Nursultan Nazarbaev said in an interview with ITAR-TASS. Nazarbaev is [in Paris to participate] in celebrations to mark the fiftieth anniversary of UNESCO.

“Integration processes are forging their way ahead in Western Europe, Southeast Asia, and the Middle East,” the Kazakh head of state said. “The twenty-first century is the century of integration. We lived together for several centuries in the territory of the former Soviet Union, developed a common culture and have a common history. Hence the people are greatly inclined toward one another, and the idea of a Eurasian union will in the end win over minds of the people,” he said.

Speaking today at a solemn session in the Paris-based headquarters of UNESCO, Nazarbaev noted that Kazakhstan strives for developing equal and mutually beneficial relations with all states of the world on the basis of fundamental principles of the UN charter, the Helsinki act on cooperation and security in Europe, and other documents. He highly appreciated the selfless activities of UNESCO to protect ideals of humanism, [including] human rights and liberties and the spiritual wealth of peoples.

The Central Asian Union

The Central Asian Union is a recently formed association of Central Asian states (excluding Tajikistan and Turkmenistan), but it also refers to a process of gradually increasing cooperation among the Central Asian states, which started at a 4 January 1993 meeting of Central Asian leaders in Tashkent. Or perhaps the starting point should be pushed back to the December 1991 Belovezh Forest meeting of Slavic leaders, from which Kazakhstan was excluded, thereby offending the Central Asian republics by not initially including them in the ranks of the founding members of the CIS. Whatever is taken as the beginning point, the Central Asian countries began a process of regional integration among themselves at a level which they explain comes under the CIS umbrella and is compatible with CIS integration goals. It would, however, be difficult to say that this process is creating a regional unit, because each country is entirely unique in its level of political and economic development and in its national composition and aspirations. Nevertheless, the process had progressed from a concentration on coordinating transportation and environmental projects in 1993 to instituting an organizational basis for military and political cooperation by 1995.

The documents collected in this section depict an ongoing debate over the true intentions of the leaders of the Central Asian Union. On 13 May 1993 an article appeared in Nezavisimaya Gazeta authored within the Russian Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations, which charges Central Asian leaders with “undermining the interests of Russia,” stressing the “Muslim component” as the main base for cooperation, and forming a “Central Asian Regional Alliance.” A rebuttal of the accusations made in this article appeared in an open letter from the press office of the Embassy of the Republic of Uzbekistan published by Nezavisimaya Gazeta on 23 May 1993. This debate is documented here.

In July 1994 the process of Central Asian integration took a more serious conceptual direction. At a press conference following a meeting of the presidents of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan it was announced by the director of the Kyrgyz president's Institute for Strategic Studies that "it is not enough to form a unified economic space." Councils for the three countries' heads of government and state and foreign and defense ministers were established at this meeting and planned to meet regularly thereafter. Later in July, President Askar Akaev stated at a press conference that he expected the Slavic and Transcaucasian republics to follow the Central Asian states' example, saying he was convinced that the integration of Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine would take place. Such statements suggested that the Central Asian leaders still may feel excluded by the Slavic CIS countries, and are reacting to this situation by launching a strong regional initiative.

The concept of the Central Asian Union raises many questions concerning the participation of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and even Uzbekistan's adherence to any supranational decisions made by the organization's councils. Turkmenistan's President Niyazov is opposed to any collective structures in general. Tajikistan, at this time, is almost in the status of a Russian protectorate. Uzbekistan's President Islam Karimov also maintains an extremely independent political and military stance. Some of these questions are addressed in this collection by Kyrgyz President Askar Akaev.

As the following highlights of the Central Asian Union's activities show, progress toward real coordination, even on economic issues, has been slow. It is also questionable whether these countries have the resources to make cooperation produce effective results. One article in this section contains a Kazakh economist's pessimistic analysis of the ability of the Central Asian states to form any kind of union without

Russia. The three presidents, in fact, often point to their joint goal of simulating the CIS to take more resolute steps toward operative integration, rather than to present the CIS with any competitive structures. In April 1995 the presidents of Kyrgyzstan and Uzbekistan announced their readiness to join the Russian/Belarus/Kazakhstan customs union as soon as possible. Another goal is to draw international attention to security problems in the region.

In conclusion, the Central Asian Union is still more of a consultative body than a true confederation. Its regular meetings have continued, and a plan for economic integration through the year 2000 has been approved. Nevertheless, there is little evidence yet that this trilateral union presents any threat to Russia's interests in the region or to the CIS.

6.68 Agreement on Economic Cooperation in the Implementation of Projects of Mutual Interest

Interfax, 13 May 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Guided by the principles of friendship and solidarity, Iran, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Pakistan, Turkey, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan hereby agree upon the following:

1. To accelerate the construction of a trans-Asian railway. To complete the construction of the Sarakhs-Meshkhed section by 1995 and to speed up the development of the Druzhba (Friendship) station of the border railway section linking the Republic of Kazakhstan and the People's Republic of China.
2. To design and build a gas pipeline that would supply natural gas from Turkmenistan to the Islamic Republic of Iran, to the Turkish Republic and to Europe in the following volumes: 15 billion cubic meters a year at the first stage and 28 billion cubic meters a year at the second stage. The states concerned shall ensure the transit of gas from Turkmenistan through their territories during at least thirty years.

3. The signatories to the agreement have found it expedient to design, build, and reconstruct sections of the highway linking Istanbul, Teheran, Islamabad, Ashkhabad, Tashkent, Bishkek, and Almaty, pending the opening of international motor communication. To implement the said projects the signatories have found it expedient to set up corresponding coordinating councils consisting of the leaders of corresponding bodies.

Joint Communiqué

“The presidents and prime ministers of Iran, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan hereby state the following:

1. Proceeding from the belief that economic and trade contacts constitute a considerable part of their relations, the parties will make efforts to broaden trade and develop joint investment projects.

2. The parties will exchange delegations, organize exhibitions and conferences, and other events facilitating the sale of goods and services.

3. The parties have expressed readiness to exchange goods on a mutually advantageous parity basis, to grant each other the most favored nation status and to set up joint banks and small and medium enterprises.

4. Attaching great importance to the establishment and development of motor, railway, air and sea transportation and lines of communication, the parties have agreed to develop and implement bilateral and multilateral projects in the said areas.

5. The parties note that the construction of gas and oil pipelines, the production of oil and gas, and the building of refineries, will allow them to ensure normal economic development of the given region and to transport natural gas and oil to other countries.

6. The parties have agreed to consider the possibility of introducing soft customs dues and a simpler procedure of crossing the border to ensure free movement of people and goods through their territories in accordance with international provisions and agreements.

7. With the purpose of promoting tourism and improving mutual understanding in the region, the sides will jointly study each other's culture and history, and restore historical and cultural monuments.

8. The parties note that the Economic Cooperation Organization plays an important role in broadening mutual cooperation, and agree that the members of this organization should make every effort to attain its goals.

9. The parties emphasize that by broadening regional cooperation they pursue no plans for establishing any blocks threatening the interests of other states.

10. The parties have agreed to instruct their foreign ministers to explore the possibility of convening a conference on interaction and trust-building measures in Asia.

11. The parties find it expedient to hold regular consultations on problems of mutual interest. [No closing quotation marks. As received.]

6.69 Central Asian Leaders Conclude Summit in Tashkent

Editor's Note: The next five entries give alternative accounts of the 1 January 1993 meeting of Central Asian leaders who came together in order to increase their chance to negotiate from strength with Russia. Each report contains a slightly different emphasis. Each one however, exhibits the important motive of economic integration behind each new report.

News Conference

Interfax, 3 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Kazakhstan have confirmed their allegiance to the Commonwealth of Independent States, which, in their view, is still relevant. President Islam Karimov, of Uzbekistan, has said that at the same time each CIS member state wants to have guarantees it is free to develop the way it deems right. President Karimov was speaking at a news conference in Tashkent following Monday's meeting of the leaders of the five republics in the Uzbek capital.

President Karimov said the meeting was a "complete success." Among other things the conference decided to specify the term "Central Asia." From now on it should be applied to the region comprising Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan.

President Nursultan Nazarbaev, of Kazakhstan, told the news conference the Tashkent summit had taken "appropriate steps" to bring about a common market of Central Asian countries with common taxation, customs, pricing, investment, and export policies. President Nazarbaev said the term "common market" would incorporate the principles of cooperation and integration of all economies of the region.

At the same time he warned against locking up oneself within the bounds of the region and called for broader cooperation with other countries, in the first place, Russia. President Nazarbaev said that the five republics would like to preserve the ruble zone on the principles of equality. He said there should be a banking union to control monetary policies and emission, where one member state would have one vote. President Nazarbaev and other participants in the summit believe that this would guarantee a lasting ruble zone.

The presidents of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan said they were prepared to step up their efforts to help eliminate the effects of the conflict in Tajikistan, for instance, to provide additional food and medical supplies.

President Saparmurad Niyazov, of Turkmenistan, suggested holding the next summit in Ashkhabad.

Karimov, Nazarbaev Comment

From the "Presidential Bulletin" feature compiled by Andrey Pershin, Andrey Petrovskiy, and Vladimir Shishlin; and edited by Boris Grishchenko
Interfax, 4 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Leaders of the five [Central Asian] states held a joint press conference on the results of the Tashkent meeting. At the press conference they proposed that the geographic understanding of "Central Asia" should henceforth be understood as the region encompassing the territories of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. It is their belief that the new term will require changing the cumbersome phrase "republics of Central Asia and Kazakhstan."

The president of Uzbekistan, Islam Karimov, ascertained "the complete success of the meeting." He spoke against the assertion that the CIS has exhausted itself. At the same time I. Karimov did not rule out the possibility of forming a general market of countries of Central Asia, which will envisage a general customs duties, pricing and export policy, and also mutual harmonization of the economies of all states. I. Karimov noted in connection with this that “appropriate steps (toward a general Central Asian market-IF [Interfax]) have already been taken” at the summit in Tashkent. The president of Uzbekistan called for the maintenance of one equal ruble zone in which the administration of financial policy and monetary emission would be realized on the principle of “one state, one vote.” Karimov believes that this approach might guarantee the “durability of the ruble zone.” He assessed the possibility of withdrawing from the zone as “undesirable.”

At the press conference, the establishment of a number of joint programs of the states of the Central Asian region was announced. This concerns, in particular, the processing of surplus crude oil, extracted in Kazakhstan, at enterprises of Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan which have available free capacities. It was decided to create a unified information space. With this aim, the Tashkent TV and radio center will be used as a base to begin transmission on the whole region and the publication of a general Central Asian newspaper.

States of the region will form expert committees on energy (with headquarters in Bishkek), on oil (Ashkhabad), on cotton (Tashkent), on grains (Almaty).

The president of Kazakhstan, Nursultan Nazarbaev, proposed that the general symbol of the states of Central Asia be the plane-a tree which has one root and five branches.

Leaders Adopt Joint Communiqué

ITAR-TASS, 4 January 1993, [FBIS Translation]

Five Asian republics of the former Soviet Union ended their summit meeting in Tashkent on Monday by agreeing to pursue a concerted policy aimed at creating a common market in the region.

The participants also agreed to set up an Interrepublican Coordinating Council and exchange governmental representatives to coordinate joint activities and oversee the implementation of agreements.

The meeting was attended by Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev, Kyrgyz President Askar Akaev, Turkmen President Saparmurad Niyazov, Uzbek President Islam Karimov, and Tajik Parliament Speaker Emomali Rakhmonov.

They discussed the economic and political situation in the region and in the CIS as a whole and called for stronger economic and financial ties, stressing the need to preserve the ruble as a common currency. They also decided to set up an international fund for the salvation of the Aral Sea, the joint communiqué adopted at the summit said.

In addition, the five states agreed to create a regional information network, including television with the headquarters in Tashkent and a regional newspaper.

The leaders at the summit said their republics will continue humanitarian aid to conflict-torn Tajikistan which signed a treaty of friendship, cooperation, and good-neighborly relations with Uzbekistan. Uzbekistan also signed a cooperation agreement with Kazakhstan.

They suggested holding such meetings on a regular basis. The next meeting will be held in the Turkmen capital of Ashkhabad in April.

Agreements, Discussion Outlined

Turkmen Press-TASS, 5 January 1993 KAZTAG Press-

TASS, 5 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

[Turkmen Press-TASS, 5 January 1993]

Ashkhabad 5 January TASS-The need to establish closer economic cooperation among countries in the region was emphasized by participants in the recently concluded meeting of regional heads of state in Tashkent.

They reached agreement on the elaboration of a specific mechanism for permanent monitoring of the implementation of interstate and intergovernmental treaties and agreements.

Turkmenistan's newspapers today widely published accounts of the meeting and a joint communiqué, adopted as a result of a discussion of the political and economic situation in countries of the region and of an exchange of views on matters aimed at further strengthening equal and mutual beneficial contacts between the sovereign states.

The heads of state instructed the respective governments to work out issues connected with the problems of the Aral and Caspian seas in the interests of the states of the region and decided to set up an international foundation for the salvation of the Aral.

Participants in the meeting [agreed] to hold such meetings of the heads of state and government regularly. Next meeting is to be held in Ashkhabad in April.

Alma-Ata 5 January TASS-The following heads of state had a meeting in Tashkent on 4 January: President Nursultan Nazarbaev of the Republic of Kazakhstan, President Askar Akaev of the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan Parliament Speaker Emomali Rakhmonov, President Saparmurad Niyazov of Turkmenistan, and President Islam Karimov of the Republic of Uzbekistan.

Participants in the meeting discussed in detail the political and economic situation in the states of the region, had a useful exchange of views on matters aimed at further strengthening equal and mutually beneficial economic and humanitarian relations between the sovereign states, considered the state of affairs in the Commonwealth of Independent States, and discussed other matters of mutual interest.

During the discussion, participants made proposals on the pursuance of a coordinated policy in economic, financial, and other spheres in the light of a stage-by-stage transition to market relations.

The heads of state reviewed the implementation of bilateral and multilateral treaties and trade-and-economic agreements between countries of the region, pointing out that these became a basis for constructive solutions to political, economic, social, and humanitarian problems, including that for a certain softening of the consequences of production slump, inflation, and decline in the living standards of the population.

Participants in the meeting emphasized the importance of closer economic cooperation among countries in the region and reached agreement to work out a specific mechanism for constant monitoring of the implementation of interstate and intergovernmental treaties and agreements.

The heads of state reaffirmed readiness to render every kind of assistance to the fraternal Tajik people and supported measures being taken by the leadership of the Republic of Tajikistan to take it out of the critical political and economic situation as soon as possible, and declared for increasing moral support for the constitutional authority of Tajikistan and humanitarian aid with food, medicines, and clothes.

Within the framework of the meeting, there was an exchange of views on matters concerning international cooperation and the coordination of action in this respect, including those in strengthening regional security and peace.

The heads of state decided to exchange ambassadors and instructed their ministries of foreign affairs to decide the matter before 1 February 1993, according to an established procedure.

As a result of the exchange of views, the heads of state instructed their governments to work out matters connected with the pricing policy, the development of communications, the provisions of energy resources, the problems of the Aral and Caspian seas in the interests of the states of the region.

The sides decided to set up an international foundation for the salvation of the Aral and deemed it necessary to hold foundation meetings in Kzyl Orda, Nukus, and Tashauz.

The participants in the meeting were unanimous about the advisability of holding meetings of the heads of state and government on a regular basis. Next meeting is to be held in Ashkhabad in April.

6.70 Uzbekistan Repudiates Charges of Undermining Russia's Interests

Open Letter to Editor Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 25 May 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Dear Sir: 30 May marks the first anniversary of the treaty on fundamentals of interstate relations, friendship, and cooperation between Russia and Uzbekistan. Collaboration between the two countries is strengthening and developing. Regular meetings of presidents B. Yeltsin with I. Karimov make it possible to find forms of political, economic, and cultural ties, optimal to both states, which suit the interests of Russian and Uzbek people. The visit of V. Chernomyrdin, chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Russian Federation, to Uzbekistan in March of this year provided fresh impetus in bilateral relations.

Analyzing the current level of collaboration of Uzbekistan and Russia at a session of the Supreme Soviet of the republic in May of this year, President I. Karimov stressed that “with regard to the conduct of profound democratic transformations in society, formation of a market economy, and the establishment of bilateral, mutually advantageous relations between two independent states, Uzbekistan and Russia have identical views.”

However, the fact that certain forces do not like the consolidation and development of mutually advantageous collaboration of the two states is becoming increasingly clear. The article by V. Yurtaev and A. Shestkov “Asiatic Gas to Flow West. New Alliance Harms Russia’s Interests,” published on 13 May of this year in Nezavisimaya Gazeta, provides graphic proof of that. What is significant is that its authors are officials of MVES [Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations] of Russia. That is evidently designed to convince readers of the substantiated nature of conclusions reached in the article and be accepted by them as a presentation of the position of an important government organ of Russia on questions raised in it.

The principal goal of this article is to prove that centralized cooperation, which formed as a result of a meeting of the heads of state of the region on 4 January at Tashkent, bears a character that is hostile to Russia, detrimental to its political and economic interests in Central Asia and the Middle East, violates previous agreements within the framework of the CIS, and intensifies the position of those countries which are interested in the creation of a “Turkish belt” along the southern borders of Russia, separating it from a broad region rich in raw material and energy resources.

Uzbekistan is especially condemned by the authors for, they assert, occupying Tajikistan and striving to establish its hegemony in the southern part of Central Asia as well as expanding its territory at the expense of neighboring countries.

The danger of such reasoning is obvious. Left without attention, it is capable of sowing seeds of distrust in relations between states of Central Asia and Russia and among themselves as well. That, in turn, may complicate the development of regional cooperation, disrupting the efforts of countries aimed at resolution of economic difficulties, leaving them one-on-one with numerous political and economic problems.

In that connection we consider it necessary to provide an appropriate explanation of the true motives behind the Tashkent meeting of the heads of five Central Asian states on 4 January and the significance of the decisions adopted in the course of it.

Even though the January meeting in Tashkent was called “unexpected” by journalists, in reality, preparations for regional cooperation befitting the new realities which had formed as a result of the formation of independent states in Central Asia were being made gradually by the countries in that region. In 1991-92 there were several meetings of the leaders of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan in the course of which promising forms of multilateral political and economic relations between the countries were explored.

Action by the governments was determined by objective factors-the aspiration of jointly surviving with the least possible losses the breaking up of economic ties following the disintegration of the USSR and preventing a sharp drop in the living standards of the people while laying the foundation of future economic development.

It is specifically an understanding of the fact that singlehandedly it would be impossible to survive under difficult conditions of the period involving transition to a market economy that led the heads of state of Central Asia to think about new forms of cooperation, the bases of which were created on 4 January in Tashkent.

Governments in the region are unified by their fate, cultural similarities, and traditional economic links which were determined by historically formed division of labor among the peoples of the region. The goal of such cooperation is to live in peace, helping each other work to mutual advantage, while consolidating efforts and raising friendly ties to a qualitatively new level and utilizing the mighty economic potential of the region for entry into the civilized market with minimal losses.

Heads of state of Central Asia have repeatedly stressed that the creation of the new commonwealth does not signal a break with the CIS as a whole or with certain individual states forming a part of it.

They unanimously agree that great hopes are being attached to cooperation within the framework of the CIS, its preservation and strengthening. They stress that they unified not for the purpose of seeking a handout from their CIS partners. The new collaboration is primarily called upon to resolve economic problems and there is not even any mention of infringement on the interests or sovereignty of others. As indicated by the time that has passed since January, all assertions concerning “the Muslim component” as the main feature of cooperation among Central Asian countries have lost their validity. There are no grounds to speak of an aspiration to isolate those states on the basis of their ethnic or congregational features. Moreover they are actively seeking ways for establishing bilateral ties with CIS states and other countries, striving to establish themselves as full members of international organizations: the United Nations, CSCE, IBRD [International Bank for Reconstruction and Development], UNESCO, and others.

Independent countries of Central Asia strictly recognize the existing boundaries and are prepared to cooperate closely with other states of the Commonwealth, particularly with the Russian Federation.

In the article, however, the actions of independent states aimed at a resolution of their domestic economic problems are declared as undermining the interests of Russia. The absurdity of such allegations is obvious.

Neither the documents adopted based on the results of the meeting of 4 January in Tashkent nor the declarations and actions by the heads of state of Central Asia provide any grounds whatsoever for accusations of that nature. Consequently, allowing themselves to voice them, the authors must come to grips with the fact that they are producing idle fabrications, juggling with the facts, interpreting events loosely, and ascribing plans to government figures of independent states of which there was never even any mention.

The article contains an entire series of factual inaccuracies and fabrications by the authors. In none of the documents is it possible to read about the creation of the Central Asian Regional Alliance (TsARS). Not a single speech by the heads of state of the Central Asian commonwealth contains even a hint of their adherence to the idea of creating a “Greater Turkestan,” a “Turkic Belt,” especially inclusion in it of the Muslim territories of Russia.

What violation of an agreement by the Central Asian states concerning the unified strategic defense space within the framework of the CIS can there be if none of the documents even mention a defense alliance of the new commonwealth? It does not exist in practice. More than that, I. Karimov, president of Uzbekistan, repeatedly focused attention on the key role of Russia in the maintenance of peace and stability in the region.

It is unfortunate that the unseemly distortion of facts was engaged in by personnel of the MVES of Russia, a state organization called upon to develop foreign economic relations and not create the image of an enemy of Russia consisting of the peoples of Central Asia who are traditionally friendly toward the Russian people.

Publication of the article one day before the meeting of heads of state and government of the CIS in Moscow, in the course of which the principal question under discussion was that of the creation of an economic alliance, bears a provocative character, and is nothing other than an attempt to heat up the situation, to cause a clash between leaders of the CIS countries.

Unfortunately it is necessary to surmise that certain forces once again utilized Nezavisimaya Gazeta for the purpose of undermining Russian-Uzbek relations.

In the situation that has formed, reference to freedom of speech in a democratic society appears not only unconvincing but rather a mockery, since a democracy cannot provoke interstate conflicts, interethnic tension, or manifestations of religious extremism. The indicated article, however, is aimed specifically at that.

From the editorial office. The reader who directed attention to the given article published in Nezavisimaya Gazeta in the “Ekonomika” section could not help but be surprised by the fact that in the last few paragraphs the authors take a sharp turn away from the “petroleum and gas” theme to a political prediction of a highly sensational nature. They predict (pay attention!) a swift occupation of Tajikistan by Uzbekistan with the involvement of Russia in such an act. The scenario of these events is also described in considerable detail involving the participation of Turkish intelligence services, certain forces in Afghanistan, etc. In other words, the end of that article by the two Russian MVES staffers has a distinctly non-economic and an exceptionally extravagant character.

In this connection Nezavisimaya Gazeta declares that the given viewpoint is that of the authors of the article which was published due to an oversight by the editorial office in a specialized section of the newspaper. If Nezavisimaya Gazeta had at its disposal information on such sensational plans, it naturally would immediately publicize them on the front page of the newspaper and not in the “Ekonomika” section. Thus far we have no reason for doing so, and we regret the publication of the article with such serious predictions of the future and interpretation of past events, without having information in accordance with which it would have been possible to determine the correctness of the authors’ position.

6.71 Integration Among Central Asian States at “New Level”

Interfax, 11 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

The meeting between the presidents of Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Kyrgyzstan held in Almaty last Friday “showed that integration between the three Central Asian states reached a qualitatively new level,” the director of the Institute for Strategic Studies under the president of Kyrgyzstan, Asylbek Saliev, told Interfax on Monday [11 July].

According to him, President Nazarbaev's statement concerning the need to form a unified economic, political, and military space also testified to this.

As Saliev said, the union does not conflict with the CIS; on the contrary, in practice it is prepared to effectuate the ideas that failed to be reflected in the framework of the Commonwealth. He believes that the forming of coordinating councils involving the heads of government and state, foreign ministers, and defense ministers, and the establishment of the joint Central Asian Bank for Cooperation and Development show how serious the three countries' intentions are.

The Kazakh, Kyrgyz, and Uzbek leaders realize that "it's not enough to form a unified economic space" Saliev said. "Industrial development must also be coordinated. The union of three Central Asian countries builds mechanisms for preemptive solutions to numerous regional problems both in the socio-economic and in the political and military areas," he said.

6.72 Akaev on Creation of Central Asian Union

From the "Presidential Bulletin" feature compiled by Nikolay Zharebtsov and Andrey Petrovskiy; and edited by Vladimir Shishlin
Interfax, 13 July 1994 [FBIS Translation]

President Askar Akaev believes that creation of regional associations like the union of three Central Asian countries (Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan) will increase efficiency of the CIS as a whole. Speaking at a press conference in Bishkek, Akaev voiced a supposition that the Slavic and Transcaucasian republics will follow example of the above-mentioned republics. "I am convinced that integration of Russian, Ukraine, and Belarus will take place, the issue concerns only the time of the conclusion of this alliance between these countries," Akaev declared.

In his opinion, the results of three Middle Asian presidents in Almaty lay the ground for a hope that the next CIS summit scheduled for this September will make a resolute step to strengthen integration trends.

Mentioning possibility of Tajikistan's joining the Central Asian Union, Akaev noted that it will depend upon establishing firm civil peace and stability in this country. At the same time Akaev said that Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, and Uzbekistan, whose peacekeeping contingents are participating in the defense of the Tajik-Afghan border will assist in stabilizing the situation in Tajikistan by creating premises for its possible joining the single economic and political Central Asian space.

Speaking about probability of Turkmenistan's joining the Central Asian countries union, Akaev reminded that the leadership of this country has a traditionally restrained attitude toward participation in any collective structures within the CIS-the republic has not signed the Collective Security Treaty and the agreement on creation of an economic union. "Turkmenistan pursues this course in the sphere of its relations with its neighbors in Central Asia; however, one should not rule out that in the near future the situation can change," Akaev said.

He underlined that despite several contradictions in the opinions between the leaders of the Central Asian union member-countries they have no principal differences. In particular, he declared about the absence of any contradictions with Uzbek President Islam Karimov and called the latter “a deep, constructive, and pragmatic politician.”

Akaev believes that on the whole the course of the Uzbek leader coincides with the aims and tasks of the neighboring states and the CIS as a whole. Akaev agrees with Karimov, who deems it necessary to restrict freedom of speech “during the transition period.” In Akaev’s words, in this case one should speak exclusively about restriction of a moral-ethical nature but not about “suppression of critics.” Akaev added that freedom of press in Kyrgyzstan, which is not limited by anything, is a destabilizing and destructive factor. Explaining his opinion, Akaev accused the Kyrgyz press of irresponsible staining of political leaders, artificial stirring of passions, and provoking conflicts between different power branches.

6.73 Central Asian Economic Zone Viewed

Boris Plyshevskiy Rossiyskie Vesti, 6 September 1994
[FBIS Translation]

In early January 1994 Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan signed an agreement on the formation of a common market, the repeal of customs borders, and the free movement of citizens. In the same month Kyrgyzstan acceded to the agreement. In April at Lake Issyk-Kul the leaders of the three countries reached a fundamental agreement on the creation of a regional economic union and the general coordinating organs. This decision was explained by the slowness of the formation of CIS structures and the failure to fulfill the interstate agreements and decisions adopted by the heads of state and government.

At the second meeting of the three countries’ presidents in Almaty, documents were adopted which essentially formed a Central Asian alliance. And although many of the declared decisions are for show and will require a long time to be implemented, it would be wrong to consider them to be merely a declaration of intent. Some of the decisions made are already being implemented in practice.

An interstate council consisting of the presidents and prime ministers has been created. Its structure includes a council of prime ministers, which resolves economic questions, a council of foreign ministers, which should coordinate foreign policy issues, and a council of defense ministers, for questions of preserving stability in the region.

The structure of the interstate council provides for the institution of a permanent executive committee with coordination, consultation, analytic, and information functions, which will be located in Almaty. The executive committee chairman has already been appointed-a representative of Kazakhstan. The Interstate Council session in Bishkek 6 August reached agreement on the conditions of the executive committee's activity and approved the statute on the creation of the Central Asian Bank.

The creation of this coordination organ anticipates the solution of the same question within the framework of the CIS. Proposals for the formation of an interrepublican economic committee with some controlling functions and the right to make binding decisions, prepared back in September last year, will again be examined by the heads of state only at the forthcoming meeting. The emergence, alongside the secretariat in Minsk, of similar regional organs in Almaty is becoming a reality. Of course it is appropriate here to recall N. Nazarbaev's proposal on the creation of a Eurasian Union.

Initially N. Nazarbaev's proposals were seen only within the framework of the CIS. The states prepared for closer forms of economic and political integration were to create a Eurasian Union. In August it was stated that this integration was also possible within the framework of the Economic Cooperation Organization in which countries of the Near and Middle East (Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, Afghanistan) take part alongside a number of CIS states. But such plans are in the future. Today the reality is the Central Asian Union.

What are its prospects? Of course the Central Asian Union under certain conditions could merge with CIS organs. But its independent existence is also possible.

Primarily this is promoted by the presence of rich mineral and fuel and energy resources in the region and favorable climatic conditions for food production. Previously the region's economy was specialized in meeting the requirements of the union national economic complex for raw material and fuel. The processing sectors were insufficiently developed and the republics' requirements for foodstuffs and industrial goods were met mainly by imports from Russia. Actually it was the disruption of economic ties and the reduction of trade turnover with Russia which obliged the leadership of the Central Asian states to seek joint ways of resolving economic problems.

The priority avenues of regional cooperation include the buildup of the extraction and export of fuel, the production of export commodities like cotton and non-ferrous metals, the processing of agricultural raw material, the joint construction of a gas pipeline and an oil pipeline, railroads, and communications lines.... All this should help the three states to reach the markets of the Near and Middle East, Europe, and Asia. In two or three years the three could become independent of Russian supplies of petroleum products, ferrous metals, and construction materials....

The formation of a common Central Asian market is also promoted by the active penetration of foreign capital into the economy of the region's states and by the restoration of traditional ties with Asia's Muslim countries. Foreign businessmen are attracted by the rich resources, the cheap manpower, preferential conditions for investments and the export of profits, enormous markets for the sale of commodities, and political stability.

The expansion of this alliance through the entry of other states of the region is so far rather problematic. Turkmenistan objects to the formation of any coordinating organs in the CIS. Tajikistan is in the grips of a keen political conflict and so far intends to remain in the ruble zone.

As for Russia, its leadership advocates the consolidation of the CIS as a whole. At the same time, taking into account the reality of the emergence of the Central Asian Union, it is expedient to set up collaboration with the coordination institution of regional cooperation. Otherwise the Asian union will never become a Eurasian one.

6.74 President of New Central Asian Bank Interviewed

Interview by Tleuzhan Esilbaev Pravda, 27 September 1994 [FBIS Translation]

As people will know, the agreement founding the Central Asian Bank for Cooperation and Development was signed by the presidents of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan in Almaty at the start of July this year. It could become the prototype for a CIS international bank. Satybaldy Sazanov was recently confirmed as president of the bank by decision of the heads of those states.

[Esilbaev]: The idea of setting up a Central Asian Bank has been in the air for several years now. What, in your view, speeded up the practical implementation of this idea?

[Sazanov]: First, it is important to organize normal, multilateral, interstate settlements for trade and other transactions envisaged by government decisions. Second, it is important to provide credit for the three republics' strategic programs and finance facilities of regional significance.

There are a host of other questions concerning, for example, the convertibility of the national currencies-the Kazakh tenge, the Kyrgyz som, and the Uzbek sum. After all, the way things are now if someone from Almaty say, decides to go to Bishkek but doesn't have any Kyrgyz som, it's a problem to buy that currency in Kazakhstan. You have exactly the same picture in Tashkent, and with the tenge in Bishkek. Our bank intends to set up the exchange of national currencies. We will be opening branches in Tashkent and Bishkek in the very near future.

[Esilbaev]: Satybaldy Sazanovich, clearly the bank which you direct did not appear in a vacuum, did it?

[Sazanov]: Alas, we are starting from scratch. Our initial incorporation capital of $9 million is made up of contributions of equal amounts by the three founders-$3 million each from Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan.

[Esilbaev]: It cannot be ruled out that Russia, a large part of whose territory is on the Asian continent, will become a founder member; the same applies to Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, Mongolia, and China.

6.75 Central Asian Economic Integration Plan Complete

KAZTAG, 10 October 1994 [FBIS Translation]

A session of experts of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan has been held in Bishkek with the participation of representatives of the executive committee of the Interstate Council. It considered and discussed items on the agenda of the next session of the council of prime ministers of the three states to be held in Tashkent.

The economic integration program between Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan was finalized. A new section has been included-“Geological Structure”-which sets out the creation of a coordination council with the aim of integrating the efforts of the geological services to study the Central Asia region.

Agreement was also reached on creating an interstate joint-stock company, “Ak-su,” on the basis of the Aksu corn-processing combine and the Kyrgyz starch syrup works.

Kyrgyzstan will consider the question of its share of participation in financing construction of the second segment of the gas pipeline passing through its territory and the West Kazakhstan-Kumkol oil pipeline.

A mechanism and principles have been worked out for implementing joint plans in the area of the pharmaceutical industry and health care, and approval was given to a draft agreement on cooperation and interaction in the sphere of research into earthquakes and the forecasting of seismic danger.

The experts drew up proposals to supply the three republics with sugar as well as control and measuring devices for gas, water, and electricity. The execution of the measures outlined will provide the possibility to improve supplies of medicines to the population at more accessible prices, to reduce the cost of sugar production, ensure greater satisfaction of the demand for it, and reduce imports of this product.

Apart from that, draft documents were considered on measures to bring economic legislation more into line on concepts of use of energy sources and electricity, and on other issues.

6.76 Akaev: Trilateral Central Asian Union Active

Boris Mainaev ITAR-TASS, 4 November 1994 [FBIS Translation]

“At long last, we came to have a mechanism for real economic unity. We have a united bank, customs association and, most importantly, we agreed on (joint) use of arterial roads,” Akaev said.

“We should live and surmount the crisis together. There is no alternative to it. Nobody is waiting for us on the world market, all of its sectors are occupied,” he added.

Akaev regretted the fact that other CIS member states “have not yet come to realize this.” “One year ago we signed documents on founding a united bank, but it did not begin working until now,” he complained and added that the idea of a united economic space was not realized so far, either.

The Kyrgyz president referred to the Interstate Economic Committee, established by the Commonwealth, as “extremely necessary and vitally important agency of economic integration” and emphasized that its activities would largely depend on the personality of its leader.

“If (the leader) is an active and respectable person, we shall get the business moving. In the opposite case, everything will remain at dead center,” he emphasized.

6.77 Prospect of Central Asian Integration Explored

Kenes Akhmetov Ekspress-K, 9 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The transformation of the former Soviet Union into a new arrangement of interdependent, modernizing countries is bound to be a prolonged process. Whether the Central Asian Union “prevails” over other confederal concepts is almost irrelevant. What is to the point is that the Central Asian countries are experimenting with layers of bilateral and multilateral integration and planning frameworks, which will all contribute to the process of transformation within the region and the broader CIS. The following discusses economic progress in Central Asia, drawing the conclusion that little can happen without Russia. While this may be true in the current stage of transformation, it would be shortsighted to simply dismiss the regional formations and institutions being established, which might at some later date play an important role in CIS events.

Can the Central Asian Union become, with the passage of time, an alternative to the relatively incapable Commonwealth? Analysis shows that this version of events is impossible. Despite the integrative efforts of the leaders of the former Central Asian republics of the USSR, centripetal processes are building up in the region, and economic reality encourages unification, which is inconceivable without Russia.

In the autumn of last year, RK [Republic of Kazakhstan] Prime Minister Akezhan Kazhegeldin made the following statement: “We have our interests in Russia. And if there are forces in Russia that will not let us in the door, we must climb through thefortochka [small hinged window pane for ventilation]. It is our market.”

That statement was made soon after President N.

Nazarbaev spoke optimistically about Central Asian economic space, but a week earlier had signed in Istanbul a joint declaration with the leaders of five other Turkic states, in which there is mention of the reinforcement of "pan-Turkic" integration.

But Kazhegeldin failed to agree with N. Nazarbaev's views. He simply formulated a reality without taking consideration of which Central Asian countries might cease their existence without even having begun to integrate. Only Russia is today the guarantor of the region's security in the face of the threats of religious fundamentalism, tribalism, and the military and economic expansion of China. Also, Russia is the largest creditor and trade partner of Central Asia. And its influence is constantly growing.

For Kazakhstan its Central Asian partners play a considerably lesser role than Russia does. In 1994, Kazakhstan's exports to Russia constituted, according to intergovernmental agreements among the CIS member states, more than 60 percent of the total, and to the Central Asian countries, 20 percent.

Moreover, Russia's share in Kazakhstan noticeably increased precisely after the proclamation of independence, and Kazakhstan's exports to Central Asia during recent years has noticeably decreased.

The leaders of Central Asian integration, in addition, are not distinguished by punctuality in fulfilling reciprocal pledges. Kazakhstan fulfilled its shipments in accordance with intergovernmental agreements to Uzbekistan by 37 percent, and to Kyrgyzstan by 48 percent. In turn, Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan realized their pledges to Kazakhstan by 60-65 percent. For purposes of comparison: Turkmenistan, which stands all alone, fulfilled its pledges for shipments to Kazakhstan by 85 percent.

Kazakhstan, as the militarily strongest state in Central Asia, also rejected the idea of creating a defensive union on parity principles. That became obvious after the ratification by its parliament of the agreement on deploying Russia's strategic nuclear forces on the territory of Kazakhstan and

Table 6.1

Export and Import Shipments (in percent)

the signing of an intergovernmental agreement on the use of test ranges on our territory by the Russian military.

Kazakhstan has actually revealed its cards in the Central Asian game. Balancing on the junction of the leading geopolitical forces in the region, it is playing a very complicated game in attempting to coordinate its interests and resources with other people's. For Russia, Kazakhstan is becoming a reliable ally in the region: for China, a partner in preserving the calm in Sinkiang; and for Iran and the other Islamic countries, an outpost of Islam. For all of them simultaneously, Kazakhstan is at the same time a promising and capacious sales market. Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan are acting for Kazakhstan, to a greater degree, as competitors in the region.

The realities make the plan for creating a Central Asian Union, more than anything else, an object of theoretical analysis. This kind of attempt was undertaken by experts from Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and Kyrgyzstan.

The conclusions that were drawn by the scientists are not comforting. They establish the fractionalism among national markets in the Central Asian countries.

Competition for the world market of goods, credit, and investments has intensified. The limitation of financial and technological resources has become obvious. The countries in the region are not yet capable of opposing the economic pressure exerted by the stronger states.

6.78 Uzbek, Kyrgyz, Kazakh Presidents Sign Accords

A. Kondrashov from the “Vesti” newscast Moscow Television, 10 February 1995 [FBIS Translation]

A few hours after the end of the Almaty summit of Commonwealth heads of state, three Central Asian leaders decided to continue the meeting on a smaller scale.

Nursultan Nazarbaev, Askar Akaev, and Islam Karimov renewed their efforts to deepen the integration between the Asian states that was started back in 1991 immediately after the breakup of the Soviet Union. As a result of today’s negotiations, the presidents of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan signed an agreement on an Interstate Council in which they themselves feature in the role of chief coordinators. A Council of Heads of Government and a Council of Foreign Ministers of the three republics were also set up. In conclusion, the leaders of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan set up the Central Asian Bank of Cooperation and Development.

In response to the question as to whether the Asian republics fear all this might be taken to separate action, bypassing Russia, the President of Kazakhstan Nursultan Nazarbaev, answered:

[Begin Nazarbaev recording; shown addressing news conference alongside other presidents] Russia and Belarus have signed accords, Russia and Kazakhstan have just done so, should everyone take offense at that? No one is becoming offended at all: On the contrary, I reckon that within the CIS, as the CIS Charter states, bilateral and regional alliances are not excluded. I believe, the three of us believe, that this strengthens the CIS. [End recording.]

6.79 Central Asian Presidents Issue Communiqué on Cooperation

Narodnoe Slovo, 15 April 1995 [FBIS Translation]

[“Communique” on “regular” meeting of Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev, Kyrgyz President Askar Akaev, and Uzbek President Islam Karimov on 14 April in Chimkent, Kazakhstan]

On 14 April, a regular meeting of the heads of three Central Asian states-Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbaev, Kyrgyz President Askar Akaev, and Uzbek President Islam Karimov-took place in the city of Chimkent.

The heads of state exchanged opinions on a number of issues relating to the situation in the Central Asian region and relations between the three countries.

The presidents' negotiations again confirmed the unity of the positions of these states in further developing mutually beneficial relations. In the course of the meeting, concrete approaches were defined for the fuller use of the potential available for cooperation between the three countries and for the acceleration of the process of integration of the Central Asian states.

The presidents of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan considered the key aspects of the process of implementing the Treaty on Creating a Single Economic Space.

Concrete recommendations for further strengthening cooperation within the treaty framework were made.

The program for economic integration between the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Kyrgyz Republic, and the Republic of Uzbekistan up to the year 2000 was considered in detail and approved. Information from the executive committee of the Interstate Council of the Republic of Kazakhstan, the Kyrgyz Republic, and the Republic of Uzbekistan, and the Central Asian Bank for Cooperation and Development was heard.

The presidents of Kyrgyzstan and Uzbekistan emphasized their adherence to a single customs space and declared their readiness to join the customs union of the Russian Federation, the Republic of Belarus, and the Republic of Kazakhstan, which will become a new testimony to the Central Asian republics' aspirations to strengthen the processes of integration.

The heads of state considered the political processes under way in their countries in their broad historical context.

President Askar Akaev of Kyrgyzstan and President Islam Karimov of Uzbekistan believe that, in the prevailing socio-political conditions, the decision to hold a referendum on extending the term in office of President Nursultan Nazarbaev is the most optimal, and will serve to secure social stability, and ensure the consequent and dynamic implementation of economic transformations in the name of the prosperity and well-being of Kazakhstan's people.

The meeting of the heads of state confirmed once again the need to continue dialogue between the leaders of the three countries, and the long-term prospects for extending cooperation between Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan in the context of CIS integration processes.

The heads of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan, having analyzed the development of processes in the region in the economic, political, and humanitarian spheres, stated that a definite legal basis and the political preconditions have been created for the formation of an Association of Central Asian States.

In order to secure stability in the region, the heads of the three states deem it expedient to establish a joint battalion of peacekeeping forces under the UN aegis, and noted with satisfaction that this initiative had received the backing of UN Secretary General Boutros-Ghali.

They ordered their heads of government and ministries of defense to introduce concrete proposals for its formation.

The presidents of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan decided to support and undertake the necessary efforts in the international arena to promote the Kazakh initiative to organize a permanent UN seminar in Tashkent on the problems of security and cooperation in Central Asia.

The parties expressed their intention in the future to carry out an active policy within the CIS framework, to encourage the strengthening of the Commonwealth with the aim of preserving regional stability in the region, and achieving mutual understanding and further developing international cooperation.

6.80 Official Outlines Functions of Interstate Council

Interview by Tleuzhan Esilbaev Pravda, 10 August 1995 [FBIS Translation]

The Executive Committee of the Interstate Council of the three countries is a fundamentally new interstate formation in the Central Asian region formed a year ago on the initiative of Presidents Nursultan Nazarbaev, Askar Akaev, and Islam Karimov. What does it represent and what goals does it pursue?

[Serik Primbetov]: The appearance of the Interstate Council and its Executive Committee was preceded by the decision of the leaders of the three republics to create a single economic space within the confines of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan. We are integrating on the basis of centuriesold ties of neighborliness, preserving national distinctiveness and sovereignty here. But our rapprochement under the new historical conditions does not in the least mean regional exclusiveness. The treaty on the creation of the single economic space is open to other countries of the CIS.

If, however, we are speaking about the principal functions of the Executive Committee, they are manifold. We organize meetings of the presidents and the heads of government and the foreign policy departments and experts on this matter or the other. In addition, we have been entrusted with the elaboration of substantiated drafts and decisions of a conceptual nature for consideration by the Interstate Council and also joint proposals on the rational interstate division of labor.

The staff of the Executive Committee, manned by experienced, highly professional employees, is performing a great deal of work on the creation of practical economic conditions for the mutual investment of capital, including the attraction of foreign investments and credit, in spheres of the economy of mutual interest.

[Esilbaev]: The leaders of the three neighbor republics have jointly signed a number of important documents. How do they work for integration?

[Primbetov]: Their basic propositions are geared to the long term inasmuch as integration is a lengthy process, not one that can be accomplished overnight or in a year. As the experience of the states which are members of the European Union shows, it took them forty to fifty years to get there.

The main thing today is that the leaders and the community of a majority of republics of the former USSR realize that before moving onto the world market, it is necessary to create a regional market. In my view, many people mistakenly understand the market as freedom of each and everything. Let the doors be opened wide to all who can make the effort, they say, and let everything come in and go out. But the experience of the developed countries testifies that a market may take shape only if there is strict state regulation.

The Executive Committee has published the digest

”Brief Survey of the State of the Economy of the Participants.” It presents the main socio-economic indicators of the development of our republics in 1991-94. It is not difficult upon familiarization with them to conclude that it is unrealistic to hope that we can manage without the support of and firm ties with our traditional partners. This is why each republic that is a part of the Interstate Council must with great perseverance seek the full-fledged work of the Economic Union as an integrated formation with permanent and stable ties making it possible to ensure the dependable cooperation of production and the development of trade and other forms of cooperation.

We have held approximately twenty meetings of experts. A draft program of economic integration up to the year 2000 has been drawn up on the basis of their results. This program, which has been approved by the premiers, includes more than sixty-nine projects in all the main branches of the economy-fuel and energy, iron and steel, mechanical engineering, the agro-industrial complexes, and chemical and light industry.

In addition, there is the task of examining priority investment projects. There are ten of them altogether. Primarily the stabilization and development of the raw material base of the Karatau phosphorite basin. After all, our trade and economic cooperation with the two neighbor countries is built on the fact that Uzbekistan supplies us with gas, and Kyrgyzstan, with electricity. It is these types of products that account for the lion’s share of the commodity turnover. For this reason the phosphorite basin performs a big role both for Kazakhstan and for Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan, which use a large quantity of the Karatau raw material.

Unfortunately, the Karatau phosphorite basin has thus far been developed extremely unsatisfactorily. This problem requires the speediest solution by the efforts of both Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Russia, more than forty of whose enterprises work on Karatau raw material.

Economies in energy resources could produce rapid returns. And meters and gauges are needed for this first and foremost. This is why the development of capacity for the production of instruments for recording the consumption of gas, water, and electric power is the second main investment project.

[Esilbaev]: What, in your view, is holding up the entry of Turkmenistan and Tajikistan into the Interstate Council?

[Primbetov]: Turkmenistan, as far as I know, has yet to express its intentions with regard to the treaty on a single economic space. Nor have we yet made it an official offer. I believe that Turkmenistan's position may at this time be regarded as being wait-and-see. It obviously wants to see what the results are. If Turkmenistan sees that the treaty is working, its affiliation to the single economic space will not be far off. As far as Tajikistan is concerned, it will become a full member of the Interstate Council, I believe, as soon as the domestic political situation in this republic normalizes. Especially since the emblem of the alliance of our states is a plane tree under the sun. And plane trees, as we know, have five branches.

We regard Central Asia as a single whole. And the whole civilized world understands Central Asia as being five states together. Were they all together, they could, naturally, perform a more appreciable role in the world community and in the world economy, since there is within the confines of our states everything necessary for their successful development. As long only as there is peace and harmony.

7 The Debate on Economic Integration

Introductory Notes

Chapter 7 documents key issues in the CIS debates on economic integration. In many ways, these economic issues represent the continuation, within a transformed political and economic context, of the 1990-91 debates (documented in Chapter 1) over the USSR's Economic Union. During that debate, the former republics could not agree on how far they wanted economic independence to go. With Ukraine as a catalyst, most of the former republics decided they wanted complete economic independence following the collapse of the Soviet Union. They wanted to sever all economic bonds with the former system and they did not want to replace former economic linkages with a Russian version of the same. Nevertheless, socio-economic problems associated with reform and significant troubles in each country's bilateral economic relations with Russia forced most CIS leaders to accept at least the concept of economic integration by the spring of 1993. Now the debate concerns not whether, but how far these leaders would like economic integration to go. As the documents collected here reveal, while the non-Russian CIS leaders support the principle of forming a single economic space, they still hesitate when it comes to assigning supranational authority to any CIS economic executive agency.

The first big economic issue on the CIS agenda was to redefine the status of the ruble zone. Although CIS leaders were intent upon establishing independent economies, an agreement had been signed at the 21 December 1991 Alma-Ata meeting to preserve the ruble as the single monetary unit on the territory of the CIS. Most CIS states (especially Belarus and the Central Asian states) were committed to retaining the ruble as the common CIS currency. Nevertheless, the Russian administration soon began pressing for supranational monetary policies (which it said were required for the ruble to remain the common unit of exchange), which convinced non-Russian leaders that their sovereignty was at stake.

Those monetary policies included a demand from Russia that a CIS Interstate Bank be created, which would be located in Moscow and would control all currency emissions as well as regulate all bank credits to enterprises or government budgets. An attempt was made in October 1992 to draft an Interstate Bank agreement, but only six states signed and it was doubtful whether even those six would be able to obtain ratification by their parliaments. Had the Interstate Bank agreement been implemented, it could easily have brought each CIS country financially to its knees. For one thing, it would have obligated each parliament to give up its authority over its Central Bank. For another, decision making in the CIS Bank would be assigned on the basis of each member's capitalization and economic potential, which meant that Russia would dominate the institution.

Guaranteed Russian domination was therefore the main issue that split the countries apart in this important area, where policy coordination could have actually aided with the early economic transformation process. When Ukraine introduced the karbovanets in November 1992, acting Russian Prime Minister Egor Gaidar reassured the other CIS countries that Ukraine's dropping out of the ruble zone would have little effect on their ruble rate. Both Russia and Ukraine agreed not to interfere with the exchange rate between the ruble and the karbovanets, but to allow the market to determine the rate. This encouraged other CIS leaders to consider introducing national currencies, and even Belarusian Prime Minister Keichik, in one of the documents in this collection, voiced his opinion that each state should make its own decision whether or not to introduce its own currency.

By the end of 1992, most CIS leaders had instituted steps to introduce their own national currencies. Three countries-Belarus, Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan-retained the ruble as their national currencies until late fall 1993, but Russia's recall of all pre-1993 rubles in July, and its reluctance to issue credits to the ruble-strapped CIS republics, forced even these stalwart supporters of economic integration out of the single economic space. It may have been that Russian economic officials decided that they also did not want to risk bankrupting their own state coffers by becoming the official commonwealth "treasury."

The second major issue to appear on the economic front was that of Russia's use of its energy weapon to extort political and military concessions from the near abroad. After Ukraine introduced the karbovanets, President Yeltsin and Egor Gaydar both declared in December 1992 that Russia would deliver oil to non-ruble states only at world prices, and only in return for freely convertible hard currencies. This and the new payments settlement policy adopted by the Russian Central Bank for all state-owned enterprises caused Ukrainian enterprise debts to skyrocket to about 25 billion rubles. Russia convinced many in the West that it could not afford to "carry" the other former republics' energy debt, but Russian officials failed to put that debt in the context of the ruble shortage problem which Russia itself had caused. Whether economically justified or not, Russia's energy payments policy led to a catastrophic fall in oil deliveries to Ukraine, ending up in December at only about 5 percent of deliveries expected in 1992. After that, Russia did not hesitate to establish linkage between the other republics' energy debts and its own agenda at CIS summits.

Throughout the economic debate, articles have appeared in CIS media which have pointed out Russia's use of its economic prowess and leverage to blackmail the countries of the "near abroad" into accepting its policies and vision for the CIS. One such article appears here in the Russian periodical Rabochaya Tribuna, disclosing the way in which Russia uses the debts of its partners to extort concessions from them in economic and foreign policy (and other matters). The article also points to Russia's own responsibility in creating the ruble shortage in the "near abroad," and confirms Russia's hand in the development of interenterprise payments problems.

By May 1993 every CIS country was experiencing, for a number of reasons, almost complete economic collapse. The karbovanets collapsed, partly because Ukraine failed to institute effective economic reforms. Other states were caught in the whirlwind of civil war, or stagnation associated with the economic patterns established under Soviet colonial rule. The interenterprise payments problem had spiraled out of sight. When CIS heads of state met on May 14, the non-Russian leaders made an abrupt collective about-face in their stance on independence and signed a Declaration of Intent to form a CIS Economic Union. In an Izvestiya article contained here, Andrey Illarionov, leader of Egor Gaydar's analytical team, attributes this change of heart to the CIS states' need for Russian ruble credits. Indeed, the Russian administration had warned a few weeks before that it was planning to impose tough restrictions on the granting of state credits to the former republics' budgets, in accordance with intergovernmental agreements and within the Russian Federation's budget limits. Any outstanding debts of state-owned enterprises in the former republics were to be transformed into state debts owed by the governments to the Russian government. Without Russian subsidies, many of the other CIS enterprises would fall into bankruptcy.

By mid-1993 economic integration was seen as the only way out of the crisis in which each state found itself. In accordance with the 14 May 1993 Declaration of Intent, the CIS executive body, the Consultative and Coordinating Committee (CCC), was instructed to prepare the legal basis for a deepening of economic integration among the CIS states. Twenty-five legal documents were to be prepared by the end of July 1993, all to be negotiated and adopted on the “principle of consensus.” The framers of the CIS Economic Union used the European Community as its model. The problem was that the CIS countries were rarely able to arrive at a compromise position in its debates which would facilitate a consensus.

Before the CCC could complete its work, the prime ministers of Belarus, Russia, and Ukraine met in Moscow on 3 July 1993 to adopt a “Resolution on Urgent Measures to Deepen Economic Integration,” forming a preliminary economic alliance among the three Slav countries. This alliance became known as the “Tripartite Economic Alliance,” although it never went very far and was not implemented. At the time, economists like the ones writing in Nezavisimaya Gazeta in the series of documents collected here (for example, S. Shatalin, L. Abalkin, and V. Bakatin) interpreted the resolution as a political reaction to the 4 January 1993 Tashkent meeting of Central Asian states (documented in Chapter 6) at which plans were drawn up for closer economic cooperation with Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, and Afghanistan. All of the points contained in the tripartite resolution were contained in the provisions of the CIS Treaty for the Creation of an Economic Union. However, the tripartite agreement resolved a number of issues that had been the subject of heated debate within the full CIS. The emotional chain of events put in motion by this joint declaration is well documented in this chapter. Many principal actors in the CIS administrative framework were astonished by the joint resolution. In the documents to follow, the CIS Executive Secretary, Ivan Korotchenya, who knew nothing until the agreement was announced in the press, voices his displeasure over the "joint Slav agreement."

An article from Segodnya (30 October 1993) discusses the problems with the formation of joint or "transnational" enterprises. This issue is significant because in 1995 Ukraine and the other CIS governments began to enter into Russian-inspired "financial and industrial groups" (FIGs). The article contained here reveals the problems that can be encountered under such plans, which are open to extensive manipulation by the partner who contributes the greatest share of capital.

In 1994, the trend toward melding the region's economies continued-in principle. At the Moscow CIS summit in April, the need was discussed for an Interstate Economic Committee (IEC), which would possess supranational managerial powers over the CIS national economies. An agreement on forming such a committee was drawn up, but ultimately watered down into a Commission for Economic Union, which would have mainly analytical and advisory responsibilities. This was probably because Ukraine and Turkmenistan objected to a body to which each republic would assign much of its authority over its own economic affairs.

The Belarus and Ukrainian elections of 10 July 1994, however, rejuvenated the idea of forming the IEC. Yeltsin was sure that the new leaders of these two Slavic nations would make commitments to the goals of economic integration, and decided to add more pressure to move forward. Meeting in mid-July, the CCC responded to a request from Boris Yeltsin to lay the legal foundations for an IEC, whose role would be to administer a customs union, a payments union, and perhaps even manage the fifty intersectoral cooperative bodies which had grown up over the short life of the CIS. Resolving the question of how the IEC and the CCC would work together, the CCC was transformed into the Board of the IEC.

Chapter 7 documents in explicit detail the evolution of the IEC debates, the fiercest ones being over the decisionmaking structure within the body and whether it should have the power to impose sanctions. In one of the documents in this series, the new CCC Executive Secretary, Aleksandr Shokhin, expresses his view that the future of CIS integration depends on the IEC. At the October 1994 CIS summit, which every CIS head of state attended, further plans for the IEC were laid. Despite Belarus's protests, it was decided that its head office would be set up in Moscow. One ominous note sounded during the summit, however, is discussed in the Segodnya article appearing here, and that was Yeltsin's suggestion that former Soviet Gosplan chief Baybakov be brought back to help run the agency.

In November, the IEC presidium met for the first time. In his message to the gathering, Yeltsin asked the body to draw up plans for CIS customs and payments unions, which would both create the conditions for making the transition to a CIS common market. Though the momentum toward a regional economic union seemed to be gathering, Russia may have overplayed its hand in dismissing the disagreements that were still being heard in other CIS capitals. Moreover, the new Ukrainian leader turned out to be a disappointment to Moscow. When Belarus and Russia triumphantly initialed a customs union agreement in December 1994 and asked Ukraine to join, Leonid Kuchma rejected the idea. Kuchma had seen how Russian customs officials stood side by side with Belarusian officials on Belarus's borders with Poland, Latvia, Lithuania, and Ukraine (though no Belarusian customs officials appeared on Russia's borders with other countries) and helped determine Belarus's import and export policies with third countries. Obviously, Kuchma had second thoughts when it came time for Ukraine to sign such an agreement.

In January 1995, realizing they stood little chance of drawing in Ukraine, a customs pact was signed among Belarus, Russia and Kazakhstan which envisaged unifying their customs and other trade regulations by mid-1995. According to economic analysts in Russia's Economics Ministry, however, this agreement is expected to be just another facade due to the wide disparities in these countries' economic interests, levels of political and economic reform, and disagreements over trade policy with third countries. Significant problems in bilateral economic relations between Russia and Kazakhstan are reviewed in the documents found in this chapter.

Notwithstanding his rejection of the customs union, Kuchma has sent delegations to the IEC presidium meetings. In March 1995, as documented in a Kiev Radio broadcast, the presidium's agenda was to draft an agreement on establishing an Interstate Currency Committee (ICC). Ukraine submitted a number of proposals on the draft agreement, mostly concerning methods of seceding from the ICC, which it said should be based on internationally recognized principles. At the IEC meeting, Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan submitted applications to join the customs union formed by Russia, Belarus, and Kazakhstan. Ukraine conspicuously did not ask to join. In a press interview documented here, Ukrainian delegate Serhiy Osyka says: "Ukraine supports the idea of setting up the customs union in general but the distance to it should be covered not at a rocket-escape velocity, but at a normal pace." President Kuchma, in a 17 July 1995 visit to Minsk, confirmed Ukraine's position on this seminal issue, adding that a customs union should follow the signing of a free trade treaty between Russia and Ukraine.

Of particular note is a recent Russian initiative in economic integration at local levels within the CIS. A significant piece from Kommersant-Daily reports on a meeting in July of the local governors of twenty-seven oblasts in Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine. This first “intergovernors” conference was held under the direct auspices of the Foreign Minister Andrey Kozyrev in Novgorod; the second, reported on here, was held in Minsk. The participants attacked the Interstate Economic Committee as totally ineffective. They also called for joint investments in their oblasts and direct agreements between micro-economic entities to stimulate the process of integration at local levels. The significance of these meetings lies in their grass-roots approach to economic integration, and in their potential for forming a local groundswell in support of rapid CIS integration.

The economic integration movement within the CIS continues to ebb and swell. As can be observed from the press accounts selected for this chapter, the view now exists that integration is moving forward; at least most CIS leaders accept the principle of melding their economies into some form of economic union. There is also the impression that Moscow's influence over the pace of integration and the economic policies of the near abroad has increased. However, the Interstate Economic Committee has not yet become operative, and none of the twenty-five agreements comprising the legal foundations of an economic union has been fully accepted or implemented. The picture is complex, with activity at several levels and on many issues at once. In general, bilateral economic agreements are still preferred by the non-Russian CIS leaders as the means for socio-economic improvement. Other multilateral economic groupings, and banks, are also being formed within the former Soviet space, such as the Central Asian Development Bank.

It might be said that much of the recent integration momentum has been motivated by popular nostalgia for the Soviet Union and by the pragmatic desire of the "Red Directors" in Russia to shore up their new wealth and power. Essentially, notwithstanding the idle agreements, however, an intricate framework has been laid and the issue of CIS economic integration is still very much alive.

7.1 Further on Gosbank Ivan Zhagel

Izvestiya, 27 December 1991 [FBIS Translation]

Editor's Note: The following document describes the situation immediately following the creation of the CIS, in which each new state suddenly found itself forced to apply to the Russian Central Bank (CBR) to obtain credits with which to meet its budget requirements. This meant trouble for both Russia and the other republics. Inflationary pressures on Russia in 1992 mounted to the point where they threatened its stabilization program. The CBR issued credits to other republics amounting to 10 percent of GDP in 1992, but total credits amounted to a staggering 40 percent of GDP. Banking and access to international credits within the CIS could be called the primary economic issue for former communist states in their social transformation to modern industrial, pluralist states.

It has become known that V. Gerashchenko, chairman of the country's Gosbank [State Bank], has resigned. His resignation has not yet been accepted, but this is obviously a matter of a few days or even hours. In any case, the liquidation commission authorized by the Russian parliament and the Central Bank is already working at the Gosbank.

Not many people know that the day before the meeting of the independent states' leaders in Alma-Ata, where, among other documents, an agreement to preserve the ruble as the single monetary unit throughout the territory of the CIS [Commonwealth of Independent States] was signed, the Russian Federation Supreme Soviet Presidium adopted a resolution on the practically immediate liquidation of the Gosbank and the transfer of its premises, documents, and specialists to the control of the Russian Central Bank.

Meanwhile, if the Commonwealth is to have a unified currency, then there must also be a unified supranational organ to regulate all questions of monetary policy. This alone can be the USSR Gosbank's legal heir. Other options could be regarded as an attempt on the rights of other CIS members.

Incidentally, I telephoned V. Matvienko, chairman of the board of the Ukrainian National Bank, and inquired whether he knew that the liquidation commission authorized by the Russian parliament had been working at the USSR Gosbank since 23 December. V.

Matvienko replied that no one had agreed to such a step with the Ukraine. In his opinion, this could lead to a whole series of "piquant" situations. For example, there is now a catastrophic lack of ready money in Ukraine. Hitherto such questions have been resolved at the USSR Gosbank. If it is liquidated and not replaced by a jointly created supranational banking organ, then Ukraine and all the other republics will have to turn ... to the Russian Central Bank for additional bank notes.

However, we should not be in a hurry to accuse Russia and its parliament of creating a "piquant situation." The question of creating a unified banking system and an interstate banking organ as the legal heir to the USSR Gosbank has already been placed on the agenda repeatedly. The Russian Central Bank has, as a rule, been the initiator of this. True, its proposals have not always seemed attractive to the others, but, instead of seeking ways to a compromise, the former republics have sent representatives not endowed with powers to discuss the draft. No wonder the question of the Interstate Bank has still not been resolved.

The absence of even a mention of an interstate banking organ in the documents signed in Alma-Ata seems a mistake which can and must be eliminated at the next meeting in Minsk. Otherwise the collapse of the economy cannot be halted.

All the independent states are now preparing their budgets for next year. It is natural that under the present complex conditions these budgets will, as a rule, end up with a deficit. It will be possible to stop the financial holes only by means of credit emission. But who will be able to give permission for this and to decide the size of the increase in the money supply?

In principle there can be two options here. In the absence of an interstate organ the Russian Federation Central Bank will regulate credit emission. At the same time, however, all the other members of the CIS must virtually get their budgets approved ... in the Russian parliament.

With the second option the central banks of each state will independently carry out credit emission. But this is nonsense! Such a path will lead not only to a rapid devaluation of the ruble but also to the erection of barriers on the borders which will cancel out all the Alma-Ata accords in the economic sphere.

In short, the question of the Interstate Bank is overdue. And it cannot be resolved unilaterally, even by liquidating the USSR Gosbank.

7.2 Kazakhstan's Nazarbaev Favors Ruble Zone

Arkadiy Rotmistrovskiy ITAR-TASS, 11 September 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Kazakhstan is for maintaining the ruble zone, a unified economic, credit, and monetary space, Kazakhstan's President Nursultan Nazarbaev said during a meeting with heads of a number of CIS countries' agrarian academies and other participants of a symposium on problems of the development of international scientific and economic relations in the system of agricultural industrial complex, now under way in Alma-Ata, the capital of the republic.

The prevailing situation in republics of the former Soviet Union, the continuing fall in production in each of them, and the economic crisis increasingly convince us about the necessity of restoring disrupted national economic ties, the president said.

Nursultan Nazarbaev supported the idea of the formation of a Council of Presidents of the Commonwealth's Academies of Agrarian Sciences. The president is of the view that the integration of scientific research will enable government bodies to find more rational forms and methods for a transition toward market relations, especially in such important spheres of reformation as decentralization of property, improvement in investment policy, and establishment of effective contacts with entrepreneurs of other countries.

7.3 Central Banks Open Talks on Forming Ruble Zone

Interfax, 17 September 1992 [FBIS Translation]

During a two-day meeting which opened in Alma-Ata on Thursday [17 September], representatives of the governments and central banks of the former Soviet republics will formulate the basic provisions of the former currency union-“ruble zone.”

One of the managers from the National Bank of Kazakhstan told “IF” [Interfax] that the documents prepared at the meeting will most likely be submitted for review by the heads of states at the Bishkek summit in early October.

The representatives of ten republics initially agreed to attend the meeting, including Russia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, Georgia, Armenia, Lithuania, and Moldova. However, Aleksey Dudkin, deputy chairman of the Kazakh bank, said that Ukraine and Turkmenistan joined in the talks at the last minute. Representatives from Azerbaijan, Estonia, and Latvia are not participating in the meeting.

Managers from the Central Bank of Russia [CBR] said the bank will call for the creation of a single currency zone with the ruble as the main or reserve currency, if the nations decide not to form a banking union.

Deputy chairman of the CBR Aleksandr Khandruev told "IF" that the bank "advises setting up an interrepublic payment union, regardless of whether a banking union is organized." The leaders of Belarus and Kazakhstan said they plan to remain in the "ruble zone."

7.4 Shokhin Cited on Interstate Bank, Foreign Debt

Interfax, 12 October 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Aleksandr Shokhin, vice premier of the Russian government, called the decision of the Council of the Commonwealth's heads of state in Bishkek on creation of an Interstate Bank of CIS a compromise. In his interview with Interfax he pointed out that at the first stage the bank "would be an accounting chamber." The need for such body is great, Shokhin said, as mutual payment accounts are not balanced in the economy of the CIS states and the mechanisms for their regulation are not established.

According to the vice premier, the issue of when the Interstate Bank will become “a real bank” is “to be solved not today and even not tomorrow.” Shokhin noted that the main task for today is to define the principles for bank’s functioning. He believes that “it will be based not on democratic principles (one country—one vote) but on principles of a joint stock company—according to the capital.”

Shokhin reported that at the recent negotiations in Kiev between the governmental delegations of Russia and Ukraine devoted to the problems of the former USSR’s foreign debt, the parties stood on the positions that “the old system of common responsibility does not work.” Russia proposed two variants for solving the debt problem.

According to Shokhin, the first variant envisages handing over to Russia all assets and liabilities on the foreign debt of the former USSR. The second foresees separate servicing of the foreign debt with a single subject controlling it, that is, the Russian Foreign Economic Bank.

Shokhin said that the Ukrainian party promised to work out its own position with respect to foreign debt before the session of the Paris Club scheduled for late October in the French capital.

7.5 Ruble Zone Agreement Problems Viewed

Ivan Zhagel Izvestiya, 13 October 1992 [FBIS Translation]

The agreement signed in Bishkek on preserving the ruble zone on the territory of six CIS states-Russia, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Belarus, Kyrgyzstan, and Armenia-inspired hope that at long last a solution to the poser of uncontrolled credit emission, at least by the twelve republic central banks, will be found.

Just prior to the meeting in Bishkek, V. Gerashchenko, acting chairman of the Central Bank of Russia, stated to an Izvestiya correspondent that he saw no possibility of stabilizing the ruble and the Russian economy as a whole without a coordinated credit and monetary and currency policy and without setting up an interstate bank, which would regulate all these questions. However, despite the fact that fundamental agreement between the six CIS countries already exists, the enormous complexities that will certainly be encountered en route to creating interstate banking structures must not be underestimated.

The most serious problem is that as of today all republic central banks are subordinate, or more precisely accountable, to their national parliaments, which must have the final say on this question. But this will not be so easy for them. At any rate, not one of them has made such a decision.

The prospects that an interstate bank will be set up mean that the parliaments will be forced to harmonize their budgets, or at least their budget deficits, with this suprastate structure. This means that the parliaments are being deprived of the chance to make up for their failings in implementing economic policy by credit emission. In other words, they will no longer have such an inexhaustible source of financial resources as their own tame central banks.

This problem will certainly surface during ratification of the Bishkek agreement by the republic parliaments. It can be expected that the magnificent six will be reduced to five, four, and so on. At any rate, the parliamentary debates could be quite prolonged, which means that the period of the ruble's instability will be dragged out.

There is one more serious problem that could affect the time taken to create unified banking structures. When the idea of an interstate bank was discussed a year ago, Russia stated that representation in this organ and the share of votes on its board must correspond to each republic's economic potential. And this, in general, is fair. That is the principle on whose basis most international financial organizations for instance the IMF itself, in which the United States plays a leading role-were built.

However, at the time this position was sharply criticized by Ukraine. The point is that Russia's economic potential exceeds that of all the other former Union republics put together. Which means that they would be obliged to remain simple extras in the interstate bank leadership, deciding nothing and influencing nothing. That is, all the states in the ruble zone would effectively have to get their budget deficits approved in the Russian parliament.

An even bigger imbalance on the interstate bank's board could occur now, when Russia's economic potential is opposed by only five states. True, the Russian leadership and Russian bankers have repeatedly stated that they voluntarily agree to limit their influence on the interstate bank. But this also has its limits, about which lengthy debates could develop in the Russian parliament.

7.6 Shokhin: Review of Foreign Debt Payments Needed

Ivan Ivanov ITAR-TASS, 27 October 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Russian wants to review the mechanism of foreign debt payments since it is the only former Soviet republic that is paying the debt now, according to Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksandr Shokhin.

“The mechanism of joint responsibility (for debt payments) is not working,” he told reporters on Tuesday [27 October], adding that Russia wants to take over either the debt and assets of other former Soviet republics or the right to manage former Soviet debt and assets so that it becomes the only partner for foreign creditors.

Shokhin said [while] several CIS states have already transferred their foreign debts to Russia, others have not yet adopted the final decision. Ukraine wants to pay its share of the foreign debt itself, he added.

Russia remains interested in getting humanitarian aid from the West. A group of Russian envoys left for Tokyo on Tuesday where they would attend the conference on humanitarian and technical help to the Commonwealth. Shokhin said that their main task is to work out mechanisms of rendering aid to Russia and the rest of the Commonwealth.

The forum will be used by Russian envoys also for meetings with representatives of the World Bank and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development at which they will discuss legal and technical issues of granting credits to Russia, according to Shokhin.

7.7 Interstate Bank Accord Unlikely to Be Ready for CIS Summit

From the "Presidential Bulletin" feature compiled by Andrey Pershin, Andrey Petrovskiy, and Vladimir Shishlin; and edited by Boris Grishchenko
Interfax, 29 October 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Head of the economic affairs department of the Russian State Committee for economic collaboration with the Commonwealth member states Adrian Budyanu considers that there is little likelihood that the draft agreement on the Interstate Bank will be ready in time for the next meeting of the heads of CIS states.

IF [Interfax] Note: A resolution was passed at the recent Bishkek summit by which all nations bound by the agreement on the ruble zone would draft, by 1 December, their proposals on the form that this bank would take and on a multilateral accounts system. Experts from the Commonwealth nations will meet in Minsk from 3-5 November to discuss these matters.

Budyanu told Interfax correspondent Boris Zvyeriyev that the Interstate Bank is seen in Russia as nothing other than an international accounts bank. Here he pointed out that Russia was in favor of the number of votes on the bank council being proportional to the amount of capital at the disposal of its members, but several states, he continued, were in favor of a “one-country-one-vote” system.

IF Note: Interfax has been informed that the Russian leadership is currently discussing sanctions against any of the CIS nations who failed to observe recent agreements concerning the coordination of the activities and protection of the interests of those states which belong to the ruble zone in the event a national currency is introduced by them. Such sanctions include halting the shipment of commodities, refusing to prop up the cash circulation of any one nation, prohibiting the opening of ruble accounts in Russian commercial banks by residents of any particular state, and halting energy supplies for rubles.

7.8 Gaydar, Kebich Comment on New Ukrainian Currency

Interfax, 13 November 1992 [FBIS Translation]

Commenting on Ukraine's introduction of its own monetary unit, the karbovanets, acting Russian Prime Minister Egor Gaydar said that Russia and Ukraine now need an urgent agreement on new mutual credits in new currency. Neither the Russian nor the Ukrainian government, he said, will interfere with the market exchange rate of the ruble to the karbovanets. He said the introduction of the karbovanets will have no disastrous consequences for any of the ruble zone states.

Belarusian Prime Minister Vyacheslav Kebich said, "We have practically no ruble zone; what we do have is a bilateral ruble crisis which has put an end to the ruble zone." He thinks it is each state's internal matter whether to introduce its own currency or not.

Ukrainian Prime Minister Leonid Kuchma said this is a measure all CIS countries will ultimately have to take.

7.9 Impact on Interstate Bank Noted

Ivan Zhagel Izvestiya, 14 November 1992 [FBIS Translation]

It would be a mistake to think that the breakup of the single ruble area is beginning specifically with the Ukrainian president's decision. The real start of this process came on 1 July this year, when Russia imposed tough reciprocal payment conditions on all former Union republics, which restricted the flow of money across borders. As a result of uncoordinated credit issuances by national banks, the ruble in Russia began to differ in weight, so to speak, from the ruble in Ukraine, Belarus, Kazakhstan, and so on. So by introducing the karbovanets, Ukraine merely legitimized the fact that a number of national currencies have emerged.

The recent intergovernmental agreement in Bishkek, under which an interstate bank should be set up, does not guarantee the preservation of the single ruble area either. Incidentally, a conference of experts opens next Monday in Moscow; the experts will work on the practical implementation of the agreement. They conceive of an interstate bank not as an organ that unites the republics' banking systems, but merely as a structure that will enable economic ties to be preserved under conditions in which a number of national currencies exist.

This is the view of A. Khandruev, deputy chairman of the Central Bank of Russia: "It would be senseless to impose unrealistic tasks on the interstate bank right away, to establish it as a common issuance center controlling the monetary systems of all the republics. This is impossible, primarily for political reasons. Therefore, at the initial stage its main business should be organizing multilateral settlements between former Union republics."

Well, the mechanism for settlements between republics and their enterprises remains the same as before-via correspondent accounts [korrespondentskiyschet]. The only difference is that these accounts will now be opened not in national banks but in the interstate bank that is being set up. With time it is planned to extend this practice to commercial banks as well, which will open correspondent accounts with each other directly and thus link together enterprises from various republics. It is clear that this system envisages the existence of a number of national currencies.

It is true that the interstate bank's draft charter contains a point that envisages the function of managing the cash and credit issuance by central banks. This will only be possible, however, after appropriate decisions have been made by national parliaments, which will voluntarily renounce their right to control the activity of national banks and delegate this right to the interstate bank.

Incidentally, it would be good if one national parliament were to show some initiative on this issue and thus set an example to the rest; otherwise, the process of separating the monetary systems will continue. In the first place, this will prompt Russia to introduce its own Russian ruble, as the continuing chaos in the money supply impedes the implementation of further economic reforms. According to available information, these decisions are already being discussed in the Russian echelons of power.

7.10 Kiev, Moscow Agree on New Rules for Banking, Economic Relations

Interfax, 18 November 1992 [FBIS Translation]

In his exclusive interview with Interfax, Vadim Getman, the chairman of the National Bank of Ukraine, declared that at the negotiations in Moscow on 17-18 November, Russia and Ukraine worked out a joint position concerning the establishing of new correspondent relations and principles of accounts between the banks and economic subjects of two states. In Getman's words, the necessity of introduction of new principles of accounts of Ukraine with Russia and other countries of the ruble zone was raised after the introduction of the Ukrainian national currency, the karbovanets. Now a Ukrainian enterprise can procure goods in Russia only with the consideration of the available rubles (or hard currency) and vice versa. The head of the National Bank added that an analogous scheme would be used at the level of interstate accounts.

According to Getman, the key issue of the negotiations is the fact that Russia agreed to allow to its commercial banks to open correspondent accounts directly in the Ukrainian banks, by-passing the Central Bank of Russia.

Vadim Getman also reported that Russia and Ukraine agreed to complete the solution of all issues on interstate accounts and accounts between the enterprises before 1 March 1993.

Getman said that in the near future Ukraine and Russia agreed to make an inventory of payments of both countries' enterprises to each other. Getman pointed out that at present the debt of Russia to Ukrainian exporters constituted "several hundred billion rubles." Getman reported that at the Moscow negotiations the parties discussed an issue concerning the division of assets and liabilities of the former USSR State Bank. According to the chairman of the National Bank of Ukraine, the parties should receive appropriate shares of the assets and liabilities.

7.11 Karbovanets Is a Lifesaver for Ukraine's Power Industry

Sergey Leskov Izvestiya, 2 December 1992 [CD Translation]

Talks with a Ukrainian government delegation headed by Vice Premier Yu. Ioffe were held at the Russian Ministry of Fuel and Power. The amounts and terms of oil deliveries from Russia were discussed at the talks.

After Ukraine left the ruble zone, first B. Yeltsin and then E. Gaydar declared that Russia would deliver oil to that state (as well as to others that take the ruble out of internal circulation) at world prices, with accounts to be settled solely in freely convertible currency. The situation was aggravated by the position of the Central Bank of Russia, which on 1 July changed the procedures for settling accounts with the former Union republics. As a result, Ukrainian enterprises' debts to Russian suppliers began to rise catastrophically and are now estimated at 25 billion rubles.

This whole tangle of problems led to the result that in November, oil deliveries from Russia to Ukraine dwindled to a thin trickle. At the end of the month the Lisichansk Oil Refinery, Europe's largest, was shut down. The Kremenchug and Odessa refineries are on the verge of shutting down. According to experts' estimates, Ukraine has enough reserves of fuel oil to last only a week. The impending energy famine is being felt especially keenly by motor transport enterprises, which have reduced the number of trips they make to a minimum, while gasoline is hardly being released at all to private individuals.

At the same time, specialists believe that Ukraine itself has helped aggravate the difficulties. The Ukmeftekhim [Ukrainian Petrochemical] state company, which was created at the beginning of the year and was supposed to set up joint enterprises with the Russian oil industry, has been accused of machinations involving fuel and has been liquidated. In the same decision, Yu. Ioffe banned deliveries of petroleum products from Ukraine to commercial structures in the CIS.

According to unofficial information, during the Moscow talks the Ukrainian delegation had only one weighty trump card in its hands-Russia's need of the new Ukrainian currency, the karbovanets, for upcoming trade operations. This trump card did not bring any particular gains, however, and the talks did not end with the signing of any documents.

However, as our staff correspondent N. Lisovenko reports, the news has spread in Kiev that Ukraine has been given assurances that two million tons of crude oil will be delivered before the end of the year. This has caused rejoicing at oil refineries, although the amount is only 5 percent of the deliveries that were expected in 1992. But in any case, the question of deliveries of petroleum products from Russia to Ukraine next year has not been studied at all and remains a big question mark.

7.12 Republics Fail to Meet Export Commitments to Russia

I. Kirilina and E. Lyadeeva, Administration of Statistics and Material Resources

Rossiyskaya Gazeta, 10 January 1993 [FBIS Translation]

In 1992, despite the fall in the levels of production and the disintegration of the market, the geography of Russia's economic relations with countries of the former Union on the whole experienced no serious changes.

At the same time the reduction in levels of production changed the nature of the distribution of output between the states. The limited resources of the Commonwealth countries were primarily used for internal republic consumption. As a result exports began to decline, which made it impossible to fulfill mutual intergovernmental agreements. During the first nine months of 1992, Belarus, for example, delivered to Russia only 6 percent of the automobile fuel stipulated by annual agreements, only 2 percent of diesel oils, 28 percent of diesel fuel, 39 percent of truck tires, and 32-

33 percent of bulldozers and scrapers. Kazakhstan shipped to us 55 percent of the oil, 65 percent of the gas, 65 percent of the coal, and only 5 percent of the grain; Kyrgyzstan delivered 63 percent of the trucks; Armenia 20-22 percent of the synthetic rubber and AC motors and 16 percent of the metal cutting machines; Moldova sent 47 percent of the wood-working machines; and Turkmenistan delivered 25 percent of the wool and less than 10 percent of the petroleum products stipulated by the annual agreements. Latvia delivered only 66 percent of anticipated minibuses.

7.13 Ukrainian Deputy Prime Minister Discusses USSR Debt

Kiev Radio Ukraine World Service, 20 January 1993
[FBIS Translation]

Ihor Yukhnovskyy, Ukraine's first deputy prime minister, gave a news conference today at the Ukrainian Cabinet of Ministers. He informed journalists about issues regarding the foreign debts and assets of the former Soviet Union, and replied to the questions of those present.

He said Russia has thus far allocated to our state a sum to the value of $81 billion (for the debts). Ihor Yukhnovskyy reported that repayment of this sum may begin only after it has been analyzed in detail. According to Ihor Yukhnovskyy, Ukraine has so far checked the justification regarding $38 billion. As to the money the Soviet Union once lent to other countries, it has now been established that the debtor states have a fairly low payment capability.

The first deputy prime minister emphasized the importance of dividing fairly the foreign assets and liabilities between the former republics of the USSR and stressed the complexity of this process.

He also set forth his point of view on a number of other topical economic problems.

7.14 Leaders to Sign Economic Union Declaration

Ivan Ivanov ITAR-TASS, 13 May 1993 [FBIS Translation]

Intensive efforts by a number of CIS countries, primarily Russia and Kazakhstan, toward deeper economic integration of CIS countries are expected to lead to the signing of a declaration on the establishment of an Economic Union at the CIS summit here on Friday [14 May].

The document will recognize the need to establish an Economic Union of CIS countries and indicate approaches for experts to be guided by when drawing up specific agreements about a mechanism for the creation of an economic community on a larger part of the territory of the former Soviet Union. Highly informed sources believe that “all heads of state will apparently put their signatures to such a declaration.”

It is so far difficult to say for certain which specific provisions the declaration will contain: experts are yet to work on it, and the presidents themselves are, most likely, to introduce some adjustments to it at their meeting on Friday.

One can only suppose that, since Russia as of now is actually the locomotive of reforms among CIS countries, a Russian economic reform will be adopted as a basis for CIS countries’ common strategy in an economic union, considering Russia’s economic potential.

Russian experts on the economic cooperation of CIS countries believe that the formation of a customs union should become the first step toward the establishment of an economic one. This presupposes the lifting of customs duties and quantitative restrictions—quotas and licenses in trade among CIS states and at the same time the fixing of a common tariff with regard to third countries. With this end in view, customs union member countries will have to agree to follow a common strategy and a common pace of the realization of economic reforms.

This also presupposes a consistent introduction of market-determined forms of economic management, the pursuance of a coordinated pricing policy, the harmonization of taxation systems (having in mind the creation of a single taxation system subsequently), the joint elaboration of an effective anti-monopoly regulation and a common foreign economic policy with regard to third world countries.

It must be taken into account that both a strategy to achieve the adequacy of economic reforms and the carrying out of foreign economic activities would require that the customs union member states to a certain extent give up part of their national sovereignty both in foreign economic relations and in purely national approaches to reforms.

Therefore, it can be supposed that if no effective political accords are reached among CIS states before these economic measures, the customs union idea may burst as a soap bubble.

The formation of an economic union which would effectively function in the interests of all member states would require a number of other serious stages.

The recreation of a single monetary system (the formation of a currency union) and the pursuance of a rigidly coordinated currency and financial policy are an indispensable condition for the creation of a common economic space.

This may be connected with CIS states' consent to create an interbank union and transfer the right of casting the deciding vote to the Central Bank of Russia on such matters as emission, amounts of credits, and the rate of interest on them.

For the Economic Union to function effectively, CIS countries are also to make efforts consistently to bring national legislations closer together and, most importantly, create supranational agencies for coordination and management and refer to them part of the functions of national managerial bodies.

Incidentally, the latter condition is expected to be implemented as early as Friday when the leaders of CIS states will sign documents on the formation of a CIS Consultative and Coordinating Committee and an Executive Secretariat.

Apart from these two items and the signing of a declaration on the establishment of an economic union, the tentative agenda of the Moscow summit also includes items concerning a program for the drafting of documents on further strengthening of the CIS and on permanent plenipotentiary representatives of CIS members at the CIS charter-provided agencies.

7.15 Union Seen to Threaten Russia's Interests

Mikhail Berger Izvestiya, 18 May 1993 [FBIS Translation]

The conference of CIS heads of state that took place last week in Moscow culminated, as already reported, in the signing of a declaration on the formation of an economic union.

The fact that an agreement was reached at the highest political level to set up an economic union and general CIS coordinating organs such as the Consultative and Coordinating Committee can be considered the indisputable achievement of both Russian economic diplomacy and that of the former Union republics. From December 1991 until very recently, the leaders of the former Soviet republics were in no hurry to tie themselves to any kind of specific commitments in relation to their Commonwealth partners, seeing any supranational organs as a threat to their own economic independence.

So it is possible that, being practically sentenced to economic cooperation, the former fraternal republics have indeed come to understand the need to integrate.

However, even if the coordination mechanism does not have serious shortcomings, in no way does it mean that all sides will benefit equally from the formation of an economic union. Andrey Illarionov, leader of the Russian prime minister's analysis and forecasting group, surmised that what lies at the bottom of the sharply changed sentiments of the CIS states who have displayed their readiness to form an economic union is primarily Russia's first timid attempts to impose order in mutual settlements with its Commonwealth partners. It is above all a question of the so-called technical credits which are allocated to purchasers of Russian products in nearby foreign countries without any preconditions. In practice this means the virtually free transfer of Russian resources to neighboring republics' citizens and enterprises.

Last year technical credits reached 10 percent of Russia's gross domestic product [GDP]. The proportion of free aid given by the United States to other countries does not exceed 1 percent of GDP.

It is the danger that Russia will sharply cut subsidies to neighboring economies by reducing the amount of technical credits that has, in Illarionov's opinion, forced the move to very rapidly set up the economic union, which, he believes, could turn into an instrument reproducing Russia's donor role in relation to the Commonwealth states.

Illarionov, the Russian prime minister's chief economic analyst, says that what is worrisome is the fact that so far the Russian side has not, for all intents and purposes, made the Economic Union's formation conditional on any demands favoring its own interests.

7.16 Karaganda Conference Aims at "Economic Commonwealth"

Oleg Stefashin Izvestiya, 1 June 1993 [FBIS Translation]

A meeting of heads of government and plenipotentiary representatives of the governments of CIS countries convened on the initiative of Kazakhstan President Nursultan Nazarbaev ended in Karaganda with the creation of an intergovernmental council for industry and also an interstate joint-stock company and corporation.

The participants in the conference, which was attended by delegations from ten states-Russia, Azerbaijan, Armenia, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Ukraine, and Uzbekistan-noted that the reason for holding it was the disintegrating processes that have become more marked of late and which are bleeding the sovereign states' economies dry as well as giving rise to additional difficulties in their mutual relations. Attempts to establish an economic commonwealth on a fundamentally new basis have certainly been made before, but these have not led to the desired result. In the opinion of Kazakhstan President N. Nazarbaev, who spoke at the conference, this is primarily due to the lack of fully functioning CIS coordinating organs, and also to the lack of proven mechanisms for implementing the reforms that have been adopted and effectively monitoring their execution.

It is intended that the establishment of the intergovernmental council for industry will go some way toward finding a solution to this problem.

The conference also saw the adoption of a decision to establish the “Karatau” interstate joint-stock company and an interstate coal and steel corporation and the signing of agreements on basic principles governing cooperation in the military-industrial complex and machine building.

7.17 CIS Economic Union Faces “Serious Test”

Artur Vardanyan Kommersant-Daily, 17 June 1993
[FBIS Translation]

The idea of an Economic Union of CIS countries is facing its first serious test. Yesterday, in Moscow, the leaders of the Russian government held bilateral talks with representatives of Kazakhstan and Belarus, which focused on credit and payment settlements. No specific solutions were found, but the sides are intent on continuing the search. Their efforts may result in the preservation of the ruble zone or may trigger the launch of national currencies in Belarus and Kazakhstan.

If yesterday’s talks between Russian Deputy Prime Minister Aleksandr Shokhin and Kazakhstani Prime Minister Sergey Tereshchenko were preplanned, the visit to the Russian capital by Vladimir Zalomay,

Belarusian state secretary for relations with the CIS, was prompted by a telegram in which Moscow asked Minsk to make it clear by 1 July whether Belarus will stay in the ruble zone or whether it will introduce its own currency. In effect, both talks were held to discuss one subject: credits and their settlements. This issue is of importance for Russia's relations with all the CIS countries, but it holds particular interest with regard to Belarus and Kazakhstan because these are the countries that, judging from the pronouncements by their top leaders, are to make up the "core" of the CIS economic union on the basis of the ruble zone.

The talks dwelled on matters of the conversion of technical credits into government ones and Russia's granting fresh credits to Belarus and Kazakhstan in 1993. Meanwhile, Russia estimates Kazakhstan's debt for these credits at 300 billion rubles [R] and that of Belarus at $267 billion. The debtors, for their part, offer estimates that are 10-30 percent lower. An even greater gap is evident in the approach to new credits: Almaty has requested an astronomical amount of R4 trillion, and Minsk is willing to put up with R300 to 500 billion. At the same time, both Belarus and Kazakhstan, while technically remaining in the ruble zone, insist that they be given a ten-year grace period for repayment of the credits.

New ruble credits are the centerpiece of the debate. Yesterday, this issue remained unresolved. Probably during the next round of talks a radical solution may be found: Russia would meet its partners' credit requests to such an extent that they would be faced with the need to introduce their own currencies. Russia pursues similar policies with regard to the former republics of the USSR-which are not regarded as the "core" of the Economic Union-the basic characteristic of which is the retention of the ruble zone. A compromise solution, however, seems more probable, which, strictly speaking, serves Russia's interests to a lesser extent:

The credits would be given in the requested amounts on condition that the republics stick with the ruble zone, and the decision on the introduction of national currencies in Belarus and Kazakhstan would be postponed.

While the Russian-Belarusian talks were limited to the subject of credits, the Russian-Kazakhstani meeting got around to considering the oil issue as well. As a result, the fuel and energy ministers, Yuriy Shafranik and Kadyr Baykenov, initialed an agreement setting up a Russian-Kazakhstani company to deal with the prospecting, production, and transportation of Kazakhstani oil. It was also tentatively agreed that the agreement would set quotas for Russian oil exports to Kazakhstan for the second half of 1993.

7.18 Importance of Economic Cooperation Viewed

Aleksandr Golts Krasnaya Zvezda, 19 June 1993 [FBIS Translation]

People grow accustomed to anything. Thus, we, the inhabitants of the former Soviet Union, seem to have gotten accustomed to living in conditions of crisis, be they political or economic crises. Who could be amazed by multiple price hikes, huge demonstrations, or mass strikes? But the events in Ukraine this week do, in my view, merit very close attention. Not only owing to their scale, although the strikes and protest actions have encompassed virtually the whole southeast of the republic. And not even owing to the political consequences, although the strikes have forced the people's representatives to agree to hold a referendum on confidence in the president and the parliament.

In my view, this crisis has highlighted an extremely curious trend, which may, in the future, be crucial in the so-called post-Soviet area. For all that the economic position of all the states in this area leaves a great deal to be desired, Kiev, in the Soviet tradition, has managed to cause itself major additional difficulties. I am referring to the attempt to put the idea of total and absolute independence into practice. It is probably possible, although far from always rational, to achieve this in politics or defense. But in the current circumstances the desire to secure economic independence is comparable to trying to be independent of the law of gravity, with all the attendant consequences or, more precisely, the consequences that fall on the heads of the supporters of “independence.”

Remember that it is Kiev that has opposed-resolutely and extremely consistently-any attempts to coordinate economic efforts within the CIS framework. Ukraine blocked the creation of common organs, which it constantly saw as the revival of the notorious “center.” It was Kiev that carried on an utterly pointless dispute over its share of the USSR’s foreign assets, preventing our foreign creditors from adopting the decision to reschedule debt repayments. And Ukraine was more zealous than the others in erecting customs and other barriers in the way of normal commodity turnover between the republics. Trade and economic links that had taken not years or decades but centuries to create were blocked. The result is obvious: economic collapse.

I am by no means writing this in order to reproach and accuse anyone in particular. Russia, too, has plenty of people willing to destroy and smash what we have in the name of their own, often speculative, idea. I am writing this to, once again, emphasize that the idea of a
